Albon, Count Gilbert d': and lawsuits, 170
Albret, Jeanne d': at La Rochelle, 305
Alcades and Spanish absolutism, 70
Alcalá: Carmelites of, 71; Polyglot of, 246
Alcalá University, the Complutenses, 232 f.
Aldobrandini (family) and the Farnesi, 15
Aldobrandini, Ippolito (Clement VIII), 11 note
Aldobrandini, Pietro (cardinal), 10, 15
Aldrovandi (cardinal), 451
Alembert: the Encyclopedia, 461; Voltaire to, 508
Aleppo (Syria)
  Adam bishop, 563
  Capuchins, 566
  Carmelites, 566
  Catholics, 560
  Church of, 567
  Jesuits, 566
  Mission at, 559
Alest, Seminary at, 332
Alet: Pavillon bishop of, 331; See of, 413
Alexander VI (pope): Arbitral decision of, 206; bull Inter caetera, 206

Alexander VII (pope), 255
Affair of the Corsican Guard, 327
Bulls: Cum ad sancti Petri sedem, 407; Sollicitudo, 260
Chinese rites, 204 f.
Death of, 261
Devotion to study, 259
Election of, 255 f., 443
Jansenism, 260: condemned, 407
Louis XIV and, 260
Nepotism of, 259
Ordination retreats, 131
Philometi labores juveniles by, 260
Policy of, 259
Rome adorned by, 260
St. Francis de Sales canonized by, 260
St. Peter's colonnade erected by, 260
Sapienza College finished by, 260
Spanish government and, 257
Venice asks help of, 257
Alexander VIII (pope), 269
Approval of Congregation of the Mission, 149
Bull Inter multiplices, 270, 354
Death of, 270, 354
Nepotism of, 270
Alexander (Russian emperor), 286
Alexander, Noel: Histoire de l'Eglise by, 531
Alexandria, 549, 586: Patriarchate of, 556
Alfieri, Voltaire's influence on, 503
Algiers, 36: Christian prisoners in, 227
Alhausen, Protestant Union formed at, 28
Alkosch (Nestorian see), 538
Almanach de la déroute et de la confusion des jansénistes, 408
Almodovar (Spain), 72
Aloysius Gonzaga, St. (Jesuit): Canonization of, 42, 446
Alphonsus, St. (founder), 515
Ascetical writings, 516
Atheists in Naples, 513
At deathbed of Clement XIV, 470
On Diana, 240
Equiprobabilism, 517
Glories of Mary, 516
La fedeltà dei Vassalli, 519
Theologia moralis, 516
Altieri, Emilio (Clement X), 263
Amakusa (Japan), 196
Amasia (Asia Minor), 549
Amazon (river), Vieira along the, 213
Amedeus, Victor (of Sardinia): Concessions to, 446
America: Missions to islands of, 181; Pietism in, 286; Spanish emigration to, 69. See also North America, South America
Amettes, birthplace of St. Benedict Labre, 545
Amiens, Seminary at, 134
Anatomie de la Messe by Dumoulin, 175
Ancestors, Cult of: Ricci and, 202
Anchieta (Blessed), Apostle of Brazil, 207, 211: Death of, 212; Marvels in life of, 213
Ancienne et nouvelle discipline de l'Eglise, 531
Ancient regime: End of, 3 note; Religious conditions in, 4
"Ancient regime," Meaning of, 3
Ancona, Improvement of port of, 453
Andilly, Arnauld d'. See Arnauld d'Andilly
Andreae, Jakob (chancellor of Tübingen), 548
Andrew Avellino, St. (Theatine): The beatification of, 42
Andrew Corsini, St. (Carmelite): Canonization of, 56
Angélique, Mother (abbess of Port Royal), 370
Attracted by austerity, 380
Bishop Zamet and, 175
Bleeding the sick, 373
Confirmation of her vows, 371 f.
Day of the Grille, 372 f.
Influence on her family, 374
At Maubuisson Abbey, 374
Reform of Maubuisson, 374
Reform of Port Royal, 372 ff.
Resignation as abbess, 377
St. Cyran and, 378
St. Francis de Sales director of, 375
On suffering of the poor, 142
Vocation of, 371
Weak side of, 376
Anger. See Anjiro
Angers, Henri Arnauld bishop of, 413
Anglican Church: Break-up of, 291; Cromwell and, 293; Dupin (Jansenist) and, 490
Anglicanism under Charles II, 297
Angouleme, General Hospital, 161
Angoumois, Philippe d' (Capuchin):

Angoumois (continued)
Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 157
Anjiro (Japanese), baptized by St. Francis Xavier, 287
Annales ecclesiastici by Baronius, 17
Annat, François (Jesuit): confessor of Louis XIV, 326
Anne, St.: Devotion to, 40
Anne (queen of England): anti-Catholic measures, 302; Laws of Discovery, 302
Anne of Austria (queen of France): Charity of, 146; St. Vincent and, 127, 145, 147; and worthy episcopate, 173
Anne of Gonzaga (princess), 279
Annecy, Visitation beginning at, 97
Anthimus II (patriarch), 549
Antilles: Caribs of the, 216; Depopulation of, 208; Discovery of, 207; Las Casas in, 208
Antin, Duke d': Masonry, 507
Antioch: Catholic patriarchs of, 561; Patriarchate of, 555, 559
Antipope (Felix V), 585
Antitaurus, The, 555
Antonines, Order of the Armenian, 569 f.
Antonio de Molina (Carthusian) and frequent Communion, 80 note
Antwerp, 245: Jesuit church in, 230 note; Polyglot of, 246
Apologetics, 232, 533
Apologia of the Rosy Cross by Fludd, 505
Apology of Casuists, 260
Apostolic Camera, Administration of the, 268
"Apostolic Majesty," Title of, 460
Apostolic Secretaries, College of: dissolved, 266
Aquinas. See Thomas
Arabic (language): Bible in, 559, 564; Byzantine liturgy in, 559; Chairs of, 31
Arakhova, 557
Aranda (minister), 519
Arcadia, Early missions in, 225
Archaeology, Christian, 246
Ardzivian, Abraham (bishop), 569
Arenthon, D' (bishop of Geneva), 421
Argenson, Count d', 174, 179: and foreign missions, 181
Argenson, Marquis d': dispersion of Port Royal nuns, 485; and Huguenots, 479
Argentan, Denunciation of, 178
Aristotle translated into Chinese, 202
Arles (see), 160
Armand (Jesuit) at court of Henry IV, 93
Armenian Antonines, Order of, 569
Armenians, 569: Persecution of Catholic, 570; Submission of, 470
Armies, Permanent, 63
Arminians and Council of Chalcedon, 450
Arnauld (family): aristocratic connections, 369 f.; Mother Angélique's influence on, 374; and Pascal, 409
Arnauld, Agnes (Port Royal nun), 374
Arnauld, Anne (Port Royal nun), 374
Arnauld, Antoine (father), 369: Children of, 369 note
Arnauld, Antoine (the "Great Arnauld"), 390
Body at Port Royal, 486
Book on the Eucharist, 415
Error of "philosophical sin" denounced by, 270
La nouvelle héresie des Jésuites, 326
Leibnitz and, 276
Lettre à un duc et pair, 406 f.
Lettre à une personne de condition, 406
Name removed from Sorbonne register, 407
On Frequent Communion, 334, 393
Restoration of, 262 note
And St. Cyran, 390
At service of Port Royal, 374
Submission of, 396, 414
Wanderings of, 414
Arnauld, Catherine: wife of Le Maître, 374
Arnauld, Henri (bishop of Angers), 413
Arnauld, Jacqueline. See Angélique
Arnauld, Madame: Death of, 391; Port Royal nun, 390
Arnauld, Marie Claire (Port Royal nun), 374
Arnauld, Robert. See Arnauld d'Andilly
Arnauld d'Andilly, 369, 390: Bishop Pavillon and, 332; hermits of Port Royal, 381; St. Cyran and, 377 f., 387; St. Cyran presented to the queen mother by, 388
Arndt, Johann (preacher), 82: Theories

Arndt (continued)
of, 283; True Christianity by, 284; Wahren Christenthum by, 283
Arsinoe (see), 571
Ascetical theology. See Theology
Asia Minor under patriarch of Constantinople, 555
Assemani, Joseph Aloysius: Codex liturgicus Ecclesiae universae, 565
Assemani, Joseph Simeon, 565 f.: Bibliotheca Orientalis, 565
Assemani, Simeon, 565
Assemani, Stephanus Evodius, 565
Assembly of La Rochelle, 304
Assembly of the Clergy of France, 530: Archbishop Harlay and, 342
(1606), 100
(1614), 106
(1625), papal infallibility, 351
(1645), 123 f.
(1650), and the five propositions, 402
(1651), 311: on dueling, 163
(1653), papal infallibility, 351
(1661), and the formulary, 413
(1675), 111, 334
(1680), 342: loyalty to Louis XIV, 336
(1681), 343 ff.: Bossuet at, 344 ff.; Gallicanism of, 345; and papal authority, 347
(1682): Alexander VIII, 354; Bossuet, 351; Declaration of, 272; the four articles, 348 ff.; Innocent XI and, 353; Louis XIV and, 351
(1723), on the Huguenots, 478
(1745), on Protestant activities, 479
(1765), 532: feast of the Sacred Heart, 463; Parliament annuls acts of, 498; rights of the spiritual power, 498; the Unigenitus, 498
Astronomy: Nicholas of Cusa, 48; Ptolemy, 48. See also Galileo
Asuncion (Paraguay), Jesuits at, 216
Athanasius (bishop of Jerusalem), 571
Athanasius IV Dabbas (patriarch), 560
Athanasius Dahan, 562
Athanasius Jauhar, 562
Athanasius Patellaros (patriarch), 549
Athos (monastery), 579, 587
Attrition, St. Cyran on, 384 note
Augsburg, League of, 354
Augsburg, Peace of, 27, 46
Augsburg Confession, 46, 275
Augustine, St.: Baius and writings of, 359; Benedictine edition of, 416; Duvergier's study of, 365; Jansenism and, 360, 400; Jansen's study of, 365
"Augustinians" and Baianism, 363 note
Augustinus, The, 384
Beginning of, 366
Contents of, 385
Its printing forbidden, 386
Jansenists and condemnation of, 326
Publication of, 385
St. Cyran on, 385
Theses against, 386
Augustus II (of Poland), 584
Aulica, The: at the Sorbonne, 235
Austria: interference in papal elections, 443; Jansenism in, 470; Masonry in, 507; state direction of seminaries, 495
Auvergne (district), 333: Father Lejeune in, 152
Auxentius (hermit), 554: Death of, 554
Auxiliis, Congregation De, 387
Avignon: Carmelite convent at, 157; College of, 521; Offer to restore, 467; seized by Louis XIV, 354; Sisters of Mercy at, 152
Avully, Baron d': Conversion of, 90
Azzolini (cardinal), 256

Babik (monk), 571
Baccalaureate (Sorbonne), 234
Baccano, Marshes of, 260
Bachelor in theology (Sorbonne), 234
Bacon, Francis: principle of morality, 250
Bahia, Vieira and siege of, 214
Baianism, 358 ff.: of the Augustinus, 385; censured by Faculty of Paris, 361; Comma in condemnation of, 362; Louvain University, 361
Baius, Michael, 359
Character of, 359
Condemnation of 79 propositions, 362
At Council of Trent, 362
Death of, 363
Doctrinal aim of, 359
Doctrine of, 359 f.
Elected chancellor of Louvain, 362
Louvain professor, 359
On original sin, 360
Submission of, 362
Balance of powers, 63

Balaszfalva (see), 575
Baluze on royal rights over convents, 338
Balzac, 250
Baptism: by heretics, 553; by infusion and by immersion, 553; St. Francis Xavier's esteem for, 186
Baranyj (Jesuit), 575
Barbary: Missions in, 35, 226 f.; Spanish Moors, 74
Barberini (cardinal) and the Augustinus, 388
Barberini (family) and the Farnesi, 56
Barberini, Maffeo (Urban VIII) and Galileo, 49
Barbosa, Agostino (canonist), 243
Barcos, De (nephew of St. Cyran), 381, 390
Baronius (cardinal), 14
  Annales ecclesiastici by, 17
  Confessor of Clement VIII, 11
  At election of Leo XI, 17
  At election of Paul V, 18
  Henry IV and, 17 note
  Master of Church history, 247
Barraut, Jean de (archbishop of Arles), 160
Barré (Minim), 525 f.
Bartholomew a Martyribus, pastoral theology, 238
Bartholomew Holzhauser, reformer, 84
Bartholomites, Congregation of the, 82: Approval of, 85
Basel. See Basle
Basil, St.: Rule of, 562, 578
Basil IV (czar), 587
Basil, Father (Franciscan): at Port Royal, 372
Basil II the Bulgaroktonos, 573
Basilides (king of Ethiopia), Jesuits expelled by, 572
Basle (see), 181 note
Basle, Council of: Gallicanism, 318
Bassancourt (Sulpician), 139
Bassompierre, 36
Bastille, The, 416: Father Lacombe in the, 425; Pellisson in the, 278
Baudry, Michael: Manuale sacrarum caeremoniarum, 243
Bauny, Etienne (Jesuit): casuist, 239; Question s'il est meilleur de communier souvent que rarement, 392; Somme des péchés, 239
Bavaria, Bartholomites in, 86
Bay, Michel de. See Baius
Bayeux (diocese), 150
Bayle, Pierre, 505: Dictionnaire historique et critique, 442
Bayonne, birthplace of St. Cyran, 365
Béarn (France), 322
Beaubassin (Canada), 225
Beauchet-Filleau (Benedictine), 256
Beaucousin (Carthusian), director of Berulle, 116
Beaudrigue, David de: arrest of Calas family, 480
Beaufort, Duke of: "cabal of the Important," 396 note
Beaufort, Eustache de: Sept-Fons Abbey reformed by, 108 note
Beaumont, Christopher de (archbishop of Paris), 497, 521: Charities of, 541; Episcopate of, 498; exiled, 498; and Madame Louise, 546
Beaumont de Péréfixe. See Péréfixe
Beaupuis, Vallon de: the "little schools," 395
Beauséjour (Canada), 225
Beauvais, Buzanval bishop, 413
Beauvais College: St. Francis Xavier at, 183; St. Vincent at, 131
Beauvillier, Duke of, 431
Beggars dressed as priests, 172
Belelli accused of Baianism, 455
Bellarmine (cardinal), 14, 39
  Canonization of, 458
  Controversies, 237
  At election: of Gregory XV, 33; of Leo XI, 17; of Paul V, 18
  Galileo and, 51
  Robert de' Nobili, nephew of, 192
Bellefonds (marshal) at La Trappe, 109
Belzunce (bishop of Marseilles), 521
Benedict XII (pope), building corporations, 504
Benedict XIII (pope), 445: Canonizations by, 210, 446; a Dominican, 445; and predestination dispute, 445
Benedict XIV (pope), 451
  Abraham Ardzivian and, 569
  Absence of nepotism, 452
  On acceptance of the Unigenitus, 498
  Bologna birthplace of, 452
  Bulls: Ex quo singulari, 206; Providas, 456, 509
  Chinese rites, 206
  Condescension of, 452

Benedict XIV (continued)
Constitutions: Demandatam caelitus, 562; Etsi pastoralis, 578; Sollicita ac provida, 453
Coptic Church, 571
De synodo dioecesana, 452, 456
Death of, 456
Description of, 451
Encyclical Vix pervenit, 452
Favors to Jesuits, 455
Jacques Brydaine and, 537
Jubilee year 1750, 455
Learned writings of, 452
Long conclave for election of, 451
Piety of, 455
On the process of canonization, 456
Rumanians and, 576
On usury, 452
Voltaire's works condemned, 456
Benedict (of Nursia), St.: Rule of, 570
Benedict Labre, St., 545
Benedictines: Congregation of St. Maur, 40
Benevento: Offer to restore, 467; See of, 445
Berlin, Spener in, 285
Bermond, Françoise de: and the Ursulines, 110
Bernard of Clairvaux, St.: papal infallibility, 350
Bernard of St. Joseph (Carmelite), 71
Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, Naturalism of, 88
Bernini: interior of St. Peter's, 61; Piazza del Popolo decorated by, 260
Bernis, Cardinal de, 464 f.
Berrhoea, 549 f.
Berry, Father Lejeune in, 152
Berti accused of Baianism, 455
Berulle, Pierre de (cardinal), 104, 115, 159
Carmelites and, 110
Character of, 116
Education of, 116
Esteem for Bishop Zamet, 379
Form of the Oratory, 117 note
Founding of the Oratory (France), 118
Holiness of the priesthood, 240
Meeting of St. Cyran and St. Vincent at house of, 368
Relations with St. Cyran, 398
Richelieu and, 45
Berulle (continued)
St. Francis de Sales and, 99
Visited by St. Cyran, 367
Besançon, birthplace of Nonnotte, 533
Bessarion (Serb monk), 576
Bethlehem, Church of the Nativity, 338, 551
Bétille, papal infallibility, 352
Beynes (France), 426
Beyrouth, 560, 566 f.
Béziers (see), 327
Bible: in Arabic, 559, 564; canon in the Orthodox Church, 552; deutero-canonical books, 552; Study of, 244
Bibles, Polyglot, 530
Biblia Polyglotta by Ximenes, 245
Biblical exegesis, 244: Science and, 53 note
Bibliotheca Orientalis by Assemani, 565
Bibliothèque janséniste, 455
Bichi (nuncio), 446
Bicken, Johann von (archbishop of Mainz), 82
Bignon, Jerome (lawyer), 377: St. Cyran at home of, 367
Billets de confession, 497: Decree concerning, 498
Billuart (theologian), 531
Binet, Etienne (Jesuit), preaching at Port Royal, 377
Bishops: Appointment of, 356; obligation of residence, 20; Richelieu on qualities of, 115; Rights of, 356
Bisignano (see), Uniate Greeks, 450
Bizerta, Christian prisoners in, 227
Blackwell, George: and Paul IV's condemnation, 26
Blasendorf (see), 575
Bleeding the sick, 373
Blessed Sacrament, Company of the, 104, 155
Activities of, 160, 169
Aid to poor churches, 171
Aims of, 158
Annals of the, 156
Devotion to the Eucharist, 171
End of, 179
Foreign missions, 181
Jansenism and, 175, 178
Jansenists not admitted, 176
Jansenists' attitude to, 177
Justice to the poor, 169
Membership, 158

Blessed Sacrament (continued)
Opposition to, 176
Origin of, 156 f.
Orthodoxy of, 173
Papal favors to, 174
Practice to usury, 170
Secrecy of, 158
Suppression of dueling, 162
The working classes, 167 ff.
Workmen's societies, 169
Blessed Sacrament, House of the (Paris), 379
Blessed Sacrament, Jansenists' attitude to, 380
Blessed Sacrament, Sisters of, 525
Blessed Virgin. See Mary
Blois, birthplace of Jean Morin, 237
Blois, Ordinances of (1579), 114
Boehme, Jacob: Writings of, 285
Bohemia: Protestantism in, 29; Serfdom in, 29; Utraquists in, 29
Boileau: Body of, 487; Livre des métiers, 543; Satires of, 432
Boismont, De: Preaching of, 538
Boite à Perrette, 490
Bojitchkovitch, Basil (bishop), 577
Bolland, John van (hagiographer), 249
Bollandists: Acta sanctorum, 247, 531; Beginning of the, 249
Bologna, birthplace of Benedict XIV, 452
Bonacina, Martino: moral theology, 238
Bonal, De (bishop of Clermont), 521
Bonfrère, Jacques: Commentaries, 244
Bons-Enfants, Collège des, 131
Bonzes: Conversion of, 196; St. Francis Xavier and the, 189
Bordeaux, galley convicts, 147
Boretsky, Job (bishop), 583
Borghese, Camillo (Paul V), 19
Borromeo, Charles. See Charles
Borromeo, Frederick: at election of Gregory XV, 33
Bosio, Antonio (archaeologist), 246: Roma soterranea, 247
Bossuet (bishop of Troyes), the Unigenitus, 490
Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne (bishop of Meaux), 343, 433
At Assembly of 1681, 344
On Bishop Caulet, 334
Conflict with Fénelon, 272
On constraint of Huguenots, 313
Defense de la Declaration revised, 355
Bossuet (continued)
Fénelon consecrated by, 430
Funeral of Henrietta, 309
And infallibility, 345, 355 note
Investigation of Madame Guyon, 427
On King Charles I, 288
At La Trappe, 109 f.
Leibnitz and, 279 f.
Leibnitz' correspondence with, 277
Méditations sur l'Evangile, 241
On Nicholas Cornet, 234
On Oliver Cromwell, 289
On Pierre de Marca, 322
Policy of, 344 f.
Prestige of, 344
On the priesthood of Christ, 242
Protestantism and, 345
Qualities of, 344
Refutation of the Catechism of Paul Ferry, 344
Sermon pour l'Ascension, 241
And submission of Port Royal, 414
Treatment of Huguenots, 476
At Tuesday conferences, 132
Tutor of the Dauphin, 344
Boucherat, Nicholas (abbot of Citeaux), 107, 374
Bouillon, Duke of (Huguenot), 304 f.
Boulogne, Father: Preaching of, 538
Bouquet, Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France, 531
Bourbon, Jeanne de (abbess of Fontevrault), 339
Bourbon-Condé, Louis de: Masonic Grand Master, 507
Bourbonism, 449
Bourdaloue, Louis (Jesuit), 434: The preaching of, 432
Bourdoise, Adrian, 104, 120
And first Sulpicians, 138
Holiness of the priesthood, 240
On indolent priests, 174
On neglect of churches, 143
At Vaugirard seminary, 139
Bourgeoisie, Christian virtues among, 544
Bourgeoys, Margaret: in Montreal, 224
Bourges, 247
Bourges, Pragmatic Sanction of, 350
Bourges University, Petau at, 236
Bourgogne (college), Berulle at, 116
Bourgoing (Oratorian), 122: and John Eudes, 123

Bourlemont (archbishop of Toulouse), affair of the Corsican Guard, 327
Bourlemont, Abbé de, 263
Bourzéis, Abbé de (Jansenist), 406
Bouvier, Claude, 420
Braganza, Portuguese house of, 47, 297
Brahmanism, Stubbornness of, 184
Brahmans: Attitude of, 184; John de Britto and, 194; Robert de' Nobili and, 193
Brahman-Saniassi missioners, 194
Bramante, 32
Brassac, Count de: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 159 f.
Brassac, Father de (ambassador), 174
Braunau. See Broumov
Brazil: Anchieta in, 211; The Church in, 211; Jesuits in, 211-13; John de Britto in, 194; Vieira in, 207, 213
Brazilian language, Dictionary of, 212
Bréchard, Charlotte de (Visitation nun), 97
Brédevent (Jesuit), missioner in Ethiopia, 228
Brescia, Ottoboni bishop of, 269
Breslay (Sulpician) at Port Royal (Canada), 225
Brest, Union of, 548
Brest Litovsk, 580
Brethren of the Rosy Cross, 505
Breviary: revision by Clement VIII, 15; revision by Urban VIII, 57
Brie, Madame de: St. Vincent and, 144
Brienne, Madame de, 279: Bossuet and, 279; Leibnitz and, 280 f.
Brissac, Madame de (abbess of Chelles), 339
Brittany: Le Nobletz in, 149; Montreal colonists, 223 f.; the rural clergy, 523; Superstitions in, 149
Britto, John de (missioner), 194: Martyrdom of, 195
Broglie, Duke de: on Leibnitz, 279
Brother Shoemakers, Association of, 168
Brother Tailors, Association of, 169
Brothers Hospitallers of St. John of God, 78
Brothers of the Christian Schools: early growth, 528; Establishment of, 308 note; method of instruction, 527; Rules of, 527
Brou, birthplace of Bourdoise, 120
Broumov (Russia), Protestants in, 29
Bruno, St. (founder): Canonization of, 40
Brunswick, 275
Brussels, Antoine Arnauld in, 417
Buch, Henry (shoemaker), 165: and Trade Union of Duty, 167
Buch, Jacques: Preaching of, 537
Bucharest (see), 574
Buckingham, English prime minister, 44
Buddhism: in China, 189; in India, 184; in Japan, 187; Ricci and, 202
Buffier (Jesuit), school curriculum, 529
Bulgar empire, 573
Bulgaria under patriarch of Constantinople, 555
Bulgaroktonos, Basil II the, 573
Bulls, Papal (list of)
Aeterni Patris, 443 note
Cum ad sancti Petri sedem, 407
Cum occasione, 60, 402
Divinam Psalmodiam, 58
Ex omnibus, 362
Ex quo singulari, 206
In caena Domini, 21, 48, 465
In eminenti, 388, 450, 456, 509
Inter caetera, 206
Inter multiplices, 270, 354
Pastoralis officii, 489
Pastoralis romani pontificis vigilantia, 48 note
Providas, 456, 509
Sollicitudo, 260
Unigenitus, 441, 444, 448 ff.
Vineam Domini, 440, 483
Zelus domus meae, 65
Burgundy, Father Lejeune in, 152
Burnet on Baron de Renty, 166
Buxtorf (Hebraist), 284
Buzanval (bishop of Beauvais), 413
Byzantine liturgy, 559, 586
Bzommar (see), 570
Bzovius (historian), continuator of Baronius, 30, 247

"Cabal of Devotees," 156 note, 159, 163
"Cabal of the Important," 396 note
Caen: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 178; Seminary at, 123 f.; Society of Jesus and Mary founded at, 123
Caesaropapism in Germany, 81
Cahors, Seminary at, 134

Cairo, 571
Cajetan of Thiene, Beatification of, 42
Calabria, 450: Albanian clergy, 578; Albanians in, 577
Calas, Antoine: Case of death of, 480
Calas, Jean: rehabilitated, 480
Calasanctius, St. Joseph, 40
Calendar (Chinese) corrected by Verbiest, 204
Calénus, friend of Jansen, 384
Calixt, 283: Consensus quinquesaecularis, 275; Leibnitz and writings of, 277
Callinicus II (patriarch), 551
Callistus III (pope): College of Apostolic Secretaries founded by, 266; and Polish Church, 585
Calmet (Scripture exegete), 531
Calvalchini (cardinal), The exclusive against, 458
Calvin, St. Cyran's esteem for, 383
Calvinism: among Rumanians, 574; in Transylvania, 574
Calvinists in Germany, 27
Calvinists (French). See Huguenots.
Cambridge University, Cromwell and, 293
Camera, Apostolic: Administration of, 268
Camillus de Lellis, St.: Work of, 78
Camisards, Huguenot bands, 313
Campagna, Roman: Insecurity in the, 30
Campomanès (jurist), 511
Canada, 223: Duke de Ventadour and missions in, 181; Jesuits in, 222; Sulpicians in, 223 f.
Candia, 548: threatened by Turks, 262
Canisius. See Peter Canisius
Cannibals, Vieira and conversion of, 214
Cano, Melchior (theologian), 235
Canonesses of Notre Dame, Founding of, 110
Canonization, Benedict XIV on process of, 456
Canton (China), 201
Capuchins
  At Aleppo, 566
  Berulle's retreat with the, 116
  In the Congo, 227
  Expelled from Venice, 22
  In Georgia, 579
  In Italy, 80
  In Switzerland, 181 note
Caraccioli, Marquis: ambassador of Naples, 52, 502
Caractères de la vraie devotion by Grou, 539 f.
Caraffa, Carlo (founder), 40
Cardinals: the Congregations, 259; consulted by the pope, 259; Non-residence of, 21; Power of the, 259
Caribs (tribe), 214, 216
Carlos, Don (of Spain), 444
Carlyle, Thomas: on Oliver Cromwell, 289
Carmelites
  At Alcalá, 71, 232 f.
  At Aleppo, 566
  And attendance at the universities, 233
  Congregation of St. Elias, 71
  Rational theology, 231
  Richelieu and reform of, 105 note
  Of Salamanca, 71, 232
  In Spain, 70
  Worldwide foundations of, 71
Carmelites (nuns): Madame Louise joins, 470; promoted by Madame de Villemar, 110; Spreading influence of, 71
Carpentras, 521
Carvalho, Paul de: made cardinal, 465
Cas de conscience, 482
Casimir, John (of Poland), 585: released from his vows, 257 note
Castile, Febronianism in, 494
Castres (France), 480
Castro (duchy): Farnese estate, 16; seized by Urban VIII, 56
Casuistry, 239: of the Jesuits, 412; Origin of, 232
Catacombs: Archaeology of the, 246; removal of saints' bodies, 265
Cateau-Cambresis, Treaty of, 512
Catechism, method of St. Sulpice, 154
Catherine (of Russia) and suppression of Jesuits, 469
Catherine de Medici on religion in France, 304
Catholic Controversy, The: by St. Francis de Sales, 91
"Catholic Majesty," Title of, 495
Catholic reform in France, 87 ff.
Catholic renaissance, 3 ff.: in Spain, 68
Catholicoi, Chaldean, 568
Catholics in England, Disabilities of, 475
Catignac (France), 152

Caucasus, Georgian Church, 579
Caulet, Jean (bishop of Grenoble), Charities of, 542
Caulet, François (bishop of Pamiers), 332 f., 413
  Appeal to the pope, 335
  Bishop Pavillon and, 334
  Death of, 336
  Founding of Sulpicians, 138
  Jansenism, 334
  Private life of, 333
  Reform of the clergy, 333
  Right of regalia, 334 f.
Caussade, De: Instructions spirituelles sur les états d'oraison, 538; L'abandon à la Providence divine, 539
Cavalier, Jean: Huguenot leader, 313
Cavaliers, Party of the, 297
Caylus (bishop of Auxerre), the Unigenitus, 490
Ceará, Vieira and cannibals of, 214
Ceillier, Histoire générale des auteurs sacrés ecclésiastiques, 531
Cenarro y Lapiedra (bishop of Valladolid), 512
Central America, colonized by Catholics, 206
Ceremonial of Bishops, New edition of, 15
Cerularius, Michael: and baptism by infusion, 553
Cervantes, 70: Captivity of, 226; Don Quixote by, 12 note; and expulsion of Moors, 74
Cesar de Bus, 60
Cévennes, Huguenots of the, 313, 476
Ceylon: Buddhism in, 184; Nestorian missions, 568; St. Francis Xavier in, 191
Chablais (province), St. Francis de Sales in the, 89
Chaise-Dieu (abbey), 489
Chalcedon, 549
Chalcedon, Council of: The anathema against, 569; Arminians and, 450
Chaldeans, The, 568
Chaldeo-Nestorians, 565
Châlon-sur-Saône, 248
Châlons (see), 418
Chambre des Comptes, 331
Champagne, 160: Father Lejeune in, 152; St. Vincent's work in, 147; Suffering in, 160
Champré, Jansen at, 365
Chang-ti as name of God, 203, 205
Chantal. See Jane Frances
Chao-king (China), Missioners at, 201
Charfe (monastery), 567, 570
Charity, Daughters of: Approval of, 149; Conferences of charity and, 144; Establishment of, 308 note; Ladies of Charity and, 147
Charity, works of, 541: in France, 141-80
Charlemagne, 346
Charles V (emperor): Las Casas and, 208 f.; Louvain University endowed by, 358
Charles VI (emperor), 474
Charles I (of England), 288
  Absolutism of, 288
  Cromwell's war against, 291
  Death of, 292
  Fall of, 309
  Marriage to Henrietta of France, 45
  Policy of, 292
Charles II (of England), 296: Death of, 299; and Walton's Polyglot, 246
Charles VII (of France), 330
Charles III (of Spain): and Clement XIV, 470; and Jesuits, 466; Jesuits expelled, 459
Charles V (of Spain) and the Moriscos, 73
Charles Alexander von Würtemberg, Conversion of, 472
Charles Borromeo, St., 77
  Canonization of, 31, 78
  Cardinal de La Rochefoucauld and, 106
  Missions in Switzerland, 181 note
  Pastoral theology, 238
  Schools founded by, 77
Charles Emmanuel (duke of Savoy), 89
Charles Stuart (pretender), 296
Charles the Simple, 330
Charles William (margrave), Conversion of, 472
Charlottenburg (Germany), 315
Charon, Father, 547 note
Charonne, Convent of, 339
Charost, Duchess de, 422, 426; Fénelon at house of, 426
Charron, attitude to Catholicism, 88
Chartres (see) made suffragan to Paris, 35

Châtel, Jean: attempt on life of Henry IV, 319; Trial of, 92
Chaulnes, Duke de: ambassador, 269
Chaumrédy, Paul de: in Montreal, 223
Chaurand (Jesuit), poor relief, 542
Chavigny and St. Cyran, 387
Chelles (convent): Abbess of, 337; Henry IV's natural daughter abbess of, 339
Chenu, Jean, 247
Chesnay, Château du, 395
Chevreuse, 395
Chiapa, Las Casas bishop of, 209
Chieti (Italy), 197
Chigi, Fabio (Alexander VII), 256
Chigi, Mario (brother of Alexander VII), 259
Chigi Piazza, constructed by Alexander VII, 260
Chimera (district), 578
China
  Buddhism in, 184, 189
  Dominicans and Jesuits in, 205, 272
  The literary examinations, 200 note
  The literati, 200
  The missions in, 199
  Missioners and the literati, 201 f.
  Nestorian missions, 568
  Paris Foreign Mission Society, 204
  Persecution in, 205
Chinchilla (Benedictine) and frequent Communion, 80 note
Chinese rites, 204, 272
  Benedict XIV and, 206
  Clement XI and, 205
  Decree of Propaganda, 204
  Domestic, 206
  Forbidden by Longobardi, 203
  Holy Office and, 204 f.
  Question of the, 441
  Ricci and, 203
Chios, 559
Choiseul, Duke de: and the Jesuits, 465
Choiseul, Isabelle de: Jansenist, 403
Choiseul-Praslin (bishop of Tournai) and the regalia, 346
Chosen. See Corea
Christian August von Holstein, Conversion of, 472
Christian Brothers. See Brothers of the Christian Schools
Christian Doctrine, Congregation of, 79
Christian Doctrine, Sisters of, 525
Chrysanthus (patriarch), 558
Church: Authority in the, 492; of Constantinople, 555; Father Olier on the early, 399
Church property, Treaty of Westphalia, 65
Chytraeus, David: Oratio de statu Ecclesiarum in Graecia, Asia, Africa, Boemia, 548
Ciampoli, Giovanni Battista, 50
Cicero, Treatise on Law, 250
Cistercian nuns, Habit of, 373
Cistercians, Mother Angélique's charges against, 376
Citeaux (abbey): and Port Royal, 376; Port Royal under jurisdiction of, 107; Reform of, 107
Citeaux (nuns), Habit of, 373
Civil power, supremacy in religious matters, 65
Civitavecchia: Arsenal at, 260; Improvement of port of, 453
Clairvaux (abbey), Reform of, 107
Claude on rule of faith, 415
Claver, St. Peter, 70 f.
Clémencet on Jansen's study, 365
Clément, Jacques: assassin of Henry III, 319
Clement IV (pope) and state encroachments, 330
Clement VII (pope): and bishop of Mexico, 207; and the Spanish Moriscos, 73
Clement VIII (pope), 11
  Attitude to Henry IV, 10
  Baronius confessor of, 11
  Cardinals of, 14
  Conflict with Caesar d'Este, 12
  Consultation of cardinals, 15
  Crusade project, 12
  Death of, 16
  Early career of, 11 note
  Friendliness for France, 16
  James I of England and, 14
  The jubilee, 8
  And Molinism, 16 note
  Mother Angélique's benefice, 371
  New edition of the Index, 15
  Oath of Rutsky, 582
  Reforms of, 14
  Revision of breviary by, 15
  The Ruthenian Church, 580

St. Philip Neri, friend of, 11
Treaty of Lyons, 12
Treaty of Vervins, 12
Veneration of St. Charles Borromeo, 78
Clement IX (pope), 261
Absence of nepotism, 262
Chinese rites, 205
Death of, 263
Election of, 261
And Jansenism, 262
Submission of the four bishops, 414
Clement X (pope), 263: Death of, 265; Election of, 263; Jansenism and, 264
Clement XI (pope), 440
Absence of nepotism, 440
Bulls: Pastoralis officii, 489; Unigenitus, 441, 488 ff.; Vineam Domini, 440, 483
Cas de conscience condemned, 482
Chinese rites, 205
Dispersion of Port Royal nuns, 485
Vatican Library, 565
Clement XII (pope), 447
Bull In eminenti, 450, 509
Condemnation of Freemasonry, 450
Death of, 450
Monthly lottery, 447 note
Rumanian Church, 575
St. Francis Regis canonized, 151 note
St. Stephen monastery (Rome), 571
St. Vincent canonized, 149, 151 note
Seminary at St. Benedict of Ullano, 578
Warning on Masonry, 509
Clement XIII (pope), 457: Death of, 463; encyclical on errors of the day, 461; feast of the Sacred Heart, 463; Febronianism condemned, 494
Clement XIV (pope), 464
Brief Dominus ac Redemptor, 467
Death of, 470
Febronianism condemned, 494
Jesuits suppressed, 226, 467
Louis XV and, 466
Clement, Abbé (Jansenist), 458
Clement, Jacques: attempted assassination of Henry III, 92
Clement Mary Hofbauer, St. (Redemptorist), 518
Clementine peace, 262, 415
Clerical conferences at St. Lazare, 132
Clerical reform, 240 f.: Council of Trent on, 98
Clerks Regular Ministering to the Sick, 78
Clerks Regular of Christian Doctrine, 60 note
Clerks Regular of the Pious Schools, 79: Approval of, 40
Clermont: birthplace of Pascal, 409; De Bonal bishop, 521
Clermont (college): Berulle at, 116; Coret's thesis at, 326; Petau at, 236
Cluny (abbey), reformed by Richelieu, 108 note
Cochin, St. Francis Xavier, 187
Codde, Peter (Oratorian): Jansenist, 499
Codex liturgicus Ecclesiae universae, 565
Coëffeteau (bishop), 126
Coelestis Pastor (constitution), 423
Coimbra University, Anchieta at, 211
Colbert (bishop of Montpellier), the bull Unigenitus, 489 f.
Colbert, Jean Baptiste, 327
Death of, 354
Huguenots and, 311
Minister of Louis XIV, 264
The regalia, 346
Repression of Huguenots, 311
Coligny at La Rochelle, 305
Collège de France, 233
Collège des Bons-Enfants: Retreat exercises at, 131; Seminary at, 134 note
Collège Louis-le-Grand, 532
College of the Propaganda, Founding of, 57
Collegia Philobiblica, 285
Collegia pietatis, 285
Collenbrusch, Samuel (Pietist), 286
Collins, the term "freethought," 303
Cologne, birthplace of Father Schall, 203
Colonia, Father: Bibliothèque janséniste, 455
Colonnade (St. Peter's), erected by Alexander VII, 260
Columbus, Christopher, 206: counsel of Pinzon, 220; discovery of Hispaniola, 207
"Columbus of the Catacombs," 247
Comma in condemnation of Baianism, 362
Commendam in France, 520

Commentaries by Bonfrère, 244
Commentaries by Cornelius a Lapide, 244
Communion, St. Philip Neri and frequent, 80
Comorin, Cape: St. Francis Xavier at, 185
Companies of Ladies, 179
Companions of Duty. See Trade Union of Duty
Company of Mary, Founding of, 536
Company of New Converts, 179
Company of Prisons, 179
Company of the Blessed Sacrament. See Blessed Sacrament
Compiègne, Richelieu at, 383
Complutenses, The, 72, 232 f., 246
Comtat Venaissin, 521
Concordat with France (1516), 324, 337, 520
Condé, Prince of, 344: at La Rochelle, 305
Condorcet, philosophy of Freemasonry, 506
Condren, Charles de (Oratorian), 115, 119 f.
  Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 155, 157, 174
  Director of Caulet, 333
  Esteem for Bishop Zamet, 379
  Father Olier and, 137, 139
  Jansenists and, 175
  L'idée du sacerdoce et du sacrifice de Jésus-Christ, 241
  On the priesthood of Christ, 241 f.
  St. Cyran and, 368
Conferences, clerical: at St. Lazare, 132
Conférences de Saint-Lazare by St. Vincent, 241
Conferences of charity, St. Vincent and, 144
Confession of Augsburg, 46: Greek translation, 547
Confession of Dositheus, 551
Conflans, De Beaumont exiled to, 498
Confucianism, 189: Ricci and, 202
Congo, Missions in the, 226 f.
Congregation of the Mission, Approval of, 57, 149
Congregations, New religious, 110
Congregations, Religious. See Religious orders
Coninck, Giles de: moral theology, 238
Connecticut (colony), Protestantism in, 221
Conquistadores, Atrocities by, 208
Consensus quinquesaecularis, 275
Considérations sur l'entreprise faite par M. Cornet, 401
Constance, Council of, 349: Gallicanism, 318
Constantinople
  Anti-Catholic synod (1722), 553, 560
  Church of, 557, 560
  Holy Synod of, 557, 560
  Patriarchs of, 323: Jurisdiction of, 555; Number of, 555; Succession of, 548 ff.
Conti, Michelangelo (Innocent XIII), 442: promise before election, 443 f.
Conti, Prince de, 159: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177
Contrat social by Rousseau, 500
Controverse pacifique sur l'authorité de l'Eglise by Lefranc, 534
Controversies by Bellarmine, 237
Convents: number in France, 520; Royal rights over, 337 f.
Converts, Relief for, 174
Copernicus, Nicholas: De revolutionibus orbium caelestium, 48
Copts, The, 571: Abjuration of, 450; Gregory XIII and, 571; Pius IV and, 571
Corbara (Jesuit) on suppression of the Jesuits, 469
Corbières, Religious conditions in the, 332
Corea, Japanese victories in, 197
Coret (Jesuit) on infallibility, 326
Corinth, 557
Cornet, Nicholas: Bossuet on, 234; the five propositions, 400; and Navarre College, 234
Coronel, Mary. See Mary of Agreda
Corraro, Angelo: account of Alexander VII, 260
Corregidors, 69
Corsica, dispute with Genoa, 448, 460
Corsican Guard, Affair of the, 260, 326
Corsini, Lorenzo (Clement XII), 447
Cortez, Fernando: in Mexico, 207
Coscia (cardinal): Benedict XIII's confidence in, 446; freed from imprisonment, 452; Imprisonment of, 447
Cospéan (bishop of Lisieux), 112

Coton, Pierre (Jesuit), 92
Appearance of, 93
Confessor of Henry IV, 367
Confessor of Louis XIII, 96
At court of Henry IV, 93, 95
Death of, 96
On the Oratory, 118
Coulanges (abbey), 132
Coulanges, De, 386
Council of Conscience, 173: Cornet president of, 234; St. Vincent and the, 127
Council of Requests, 480
Councils, Superiority of general, 349 f.
Councils, List of Basle (1423), 318
Chalcedon (451), 450
Constance (1414), 318, 349
Embrun (1727), 521
Florence (1423), 553
Lateran III (1179), 37
Lateran IV (1215), 576
Lyons I (1245), 351
Lyons II (1274), 330 f., 334
Moscow (1654), 587
Zamosk (1720), 584
Counter Reformation in Germany, 258
Cour des Comptes, The, 330
Court of Aids, 409
Coutances: See of, 140; Seminary founded at, 123
Cramoisy bookshop, 320
Créqui, Duke de, 327, 337
Crete, 548: under patriarch of Constantinople, 555
Creutz, Count de: ambassador to Sweden, 502
Cromwell, Oliver, 289
Anti-Catholic spirit of, 293
Charles I and, 288
Death of, 296
Education of, 290
Foreign policy of, 295
Jews and, 295
Member of Parliament, 290
Presbyterians and, 293-95
Puritan Reformation, 287
Religion of, 291
Title of Protector, 292
Walton's Polyglot, 246
War against Charles I, 291
Cromwell, Richard: ruler of England, 296
Cromwell, Thomas: minister of Henry VIII, 290
Crusade: Clement VIII's project, 12; Henry IV and projected, 12 note
Crusius, Martin, 548
Crypto-Calvinism, 275
Cuba: Adrian VI and bishop of, 207; Discovery of, 207; First bishop of, 207
Cum ad sancti Petri sedem (bull), 407
Cum occasione (bull), 60, 402
Cumana (province), Las Casas and, 209
Cyprian of Constantinople (patriarch), 553
Cyprus, Synod of, 551
Cyril V (patriarch), 554, 560
Cyril VI (patriarch), 561
Cyril VII Siaj (patriarch), 562
Cyril Lukaris. See Lukaris
Cyril of Berrhoea (patriarch), 550: Death of, 550
Czech Protestants, 29
Czenstochowa, 268

Dahan, Athanasius, 562
Daimios, 188, 196
Damascus, 560: Catholics at, 560 f.; Patriarchs of Antioch at, 559
Daubray and submission of Port Royal hermits, 411
Daughters of Charity. See Charity
Daughters of Notre Dame. See Notre Dame
Daughters of Providence. See Providence
Daughters of Wisdom. See Wisdom
Day of the Grille at Port Royal, 372 f.
De Auxiliis, Congregation, 17, 387
De concordia sacerdotii et imperii by De Marca, 322 f.
De doctrina temporum by Petau, 236
De emendatione temporum by Scaliger, 236
De haeresi, schismate et apostasia by Santarelli, 320
De la pénitence publique by Petau, 396
De la puissance ecclésiastique et politique by Richer, 318 note
De naturae arcanis by Lucilio, 251
De praesenti statu Ecclesiae by Febronius, 492
De republica christiana by De Dominis, 318 note

De revolutionibus orbium caelestium by Copernicus, 48
De statu praesenti Ecclesiae by Febronius, 461, 496
De statu religionis et reipublicae by Sleidanus, 27
De synodo dioecesana by Benedict XIV, 452, 456
Declaration of Indulgence, 297
Declaration of Rights (English), 303
"Defender of the Church," Title of, 35
Defenestration of Prague, 29
Defense de la Declaration, revised by Bossuet, 355
Deir-az-Zafaran (monastery), 567
Deism, Masonry and, 506
Demandatam caelitus (constitution), 562
Demia, seminaries of schoolmasters, 525
Denis (abbot of Clairvaux), 107
Denis, St. (bishop of Paris), 35
Denmark, treaty with Cromwell, 295
Deplessis-Mornay, 304
Descartes, 499: Brethren of the Rosy Cross, 505; Philosophy of, 231; Sincerity of, 230
Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la Société, 508
"Desert, The," Huguenots in, 313
Des Mares (Jansenist), 406
Deuterocanonical books of Bible, 552
Devotion réconciliée avec l'Esprit by Lefranc, 534
Dialoghi delle nuove scienze by Galileo, 54
Dialogo dei due massimi sistemi del mondo by Galileo, 54
Diana, Antonino (casuist), 239 f.: Resolutiones morales, 239
Diarbekir, 555, 568 f.
Dictionnaire historique et critique by Bayle, 442
Dictionnaire philosophique de la religion by Nonnotte, 533
Diderot, the Encyclopedia, 461
Dijon (France), 269
Dimitrovics, Peter (bishop), 577
Dionysius (archimandrite), correction of liturgical books, 587
Dionysius (of Paris). See Denis
Diplomacy, Development of international, 63
Diplomatic career, Origin of, 13 note
Dippel (Pietist), 286
Directorium in exercitiis spiritualibus, 80
Distinctio inter Sedem et Sedentem, 347 note
Doctorate in theology (Sorbonne), 235
Doctrinarians, 79
Dogmata theologica by Petau, 236 f.
Dominic of Jesus Mary (Carmelite), 71
Dominicans
  In Africa, 226
  In the Congo, 227
  And Jesuits in China, 205
  Jesuits versus, 10, 16
  Martyred by Mussulmans, 226
  Missioners in South America, 207 ff.
  Rational theology, 231
Dominis, Marco Antonio de: Career of, 318 note; De republica christiana, 318 note; multitudinist Gallicanism, 318
Dominus ac Redemptor (brief), 467
Don Quixote by Cervantes, 12 note
Donauwörth: under ban of the Empire, 28; Disturbance at, 27; Rudolf and, 28; seized by Maximilian, 28
Donnadier (bishop), preparation of his ordinands, 130
Dositheus (patriarch of Jerusalem), 557: Confession of, 551; History of the Patriarchs of Jerusalem, 558
Drechsel, Jeremias (preacher), 81
Dresden, Spener in, 285
Du Barry, Madame: Influence of, 502
Dubois, Guillaume (cardinal): and bull Unigenitus, 489; Elevation of, 444
Duchesne, André (historian), 247
Duclos, Mémoires, 478
Dueling: Henry IV's edict against, 96; Prohibition of, 15; Suppressing of, 162
Dumoulin: Anatomie de la Messe, 175; on royal rights over convents, 338
Duperron (cardinal), 14, 92: and Morin, 237; project of new Polyglot, 246
Dupin, Ellies (Jansenist): and Anglican Church, 490; power of kings, 492
Dupleix, 126
Du Plessis d'Argentré (bishop), bureau of charity, 542
Durfort, De (archbishop of Besançon), 541
Du Vair, attitude to Catholicism, 88

Duval, Andrew, 234: confessor of St. Vincent, 234; Sorbonne professor of theology, 234
Duvergier (see also St. Cyran)
Becomes abbot of St. Cyran, 367
Character of, 364
Code terms used by, 366
Jansen and, 364
At Paris, 367
Study of St. Augustine, 365

Eastern Church, 547-89
Ecchellensis, Abraham, 564
Ecclesiastical courts, Competence of, 355 and note
Ecclesiastical Reservation, 27
Echter, Julius (bishop of Würzburg), 82
Edessa, 569
Edict of Alais, 307
Edict of Nantes, 9, 310
French Protestantism, 304
Huguenots exiled, 476
Innocent XI and revocation of, 314
Louis XIV's interpretation of, 308
Revocation of, 267, 308 f., 312 ff., 354
Richelieu's interpretation of, 307
Edict of Restitution by Ferdinand II, 45 ff.
Education in France, 524 ff., 528: and classical studies, 529; Elementary, 524 ff.
Edward I (of England), expulsion of Jews, 295
Egypt: Church of, 556, 571; Franciscans in, 571; Monophysites in, 556
Elections, papal. See Papal elections
Eliano (Jesuit), Missions of, 564
Elizabeth (of England), 287
Elizabeth, St. (of Portugal), Canonization of, 56
Elizabeth (of Russia), Benedict XIV esteemed by, 454
Elizabeth (wife of Philip II), 72
Eller, Elias (Pietist), 286
Embrun, Council of (1727), 521
Emile by Rousseau, 461, 529: condemned, 461
"Eminence," Title of, 47 note
Emperor, title of "Defender of the Church," 35
Encheiridion by Epictetus, 250
Encyclical Vix pervenit, 452
Encyclopedia, The, 461, 501: condemned, 461; study of Latin, 528 f.
England
Anne, queen of, 302
Aristocratic character of constitution of, 258
Catholics excluded from office, 298
Charles I, 288 f.
The Church in, 25
Colonization of North America, 221
Cromwell's government, 292
Disabilities of Catholics, 475
Growth of power of, 287
Jews expelled from, 295
Landing of William of Orange, 301 f.
Masonry in, 504, 506
Persecution of Catholics, 25
Pietism in, 286
Political influence of Masonry, 504
Protestantism in, 8, 287, 474
Puritanism in, 287
Sea power of, 448
Trinitarians in, 226
English College (Rome), Jesuits imprisoned in, 469
Ephrem (patriarch of Constantinople), 558
Epictetus, Encheiridion by, 250
Epicureanism, Modern, 250
Epirus, 555
Episcopalians, American colonists, 206
Equiprobabilism of St. Alphonsus, 517
Erlon (in Luxembourg), 165
Escobar y Mendoza, Antonio: casuist, 239 f.; Universae theologicae moralis receptae sententiae, 239
Espirito Santo (Brazil), 212
Esprit by Helvetius, 461: condemned, 461
Esprit de Jésus-Christ et de l'Eglise sur la fréquent communion, 455
Essais de morale by Nicole, 416
Este, Caesar d', 12
Estius, 245
Estrées, Cardinal d': Bossuet to, 345 f.; French envoy to Rome, 314, 336
Estrées, Gabrielle d', 371
Estrées, Jacqueline d' (abbess of Maubuisson), 371, 374
Etampes, birthplace of Guénée, 533
Etats d'oraison by Caussade, 538
Etchmiddzin, Armenian patriarchs of, 569

Ethiopia: Eutychianism in, 228; Missions in, 226, 228, 572
Ethiopians, 572
Etsi pastoralis (constitution), 578
Eucharist. See Blessed Sacrament
Eudes, St. John (founder), 122
  Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 155
  Congregation of the Good Shepherd, 150
  Feast of Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, 462
  Holiness of the priesthood, 240
  Missioner, 149
  As Oratorian, 122
  Preaching of, 150
European equilibrium in Treaty of Westphalia, 63
Euthymius (patriarch), 559
Euthymius Saifi (patriarch), 560, 562
Eutychianism: the Armenians renounce, 470; in Ethiopia, 228
Eutychius Saqzi (patriarch), 559
Evangelical Union and Ferdinand II, 30
Evangeline by Longfellow, 225
Evreux: Seminary founded at, 123; Sisters of Providence, 525
Ex omnibus (bull), 362
Examination of conscience, St. Francis de Sales on, 101
Exclusive, Right of, 443: Albizzi on, 443; against Cardinal Rampolla, 443 note
Excommunications, Annual publication of, 48
Exegesis, Biblical, 244
Exequatur, Requirement of, 459
Exercitationes biblicae by Morin, 238
Existence of God by Fénelon, 432
Expectative, Right of, 532: at the Sorbonne, 235
Explication de la méthode d'oraison, 538
Explication des maximes des saints by Fénelon, 430
Exposition de la doctrine chrétienne by Mésenguy, 461

Faculty of Theology (Paris), 482, 489: acceptance of the Unigenitus, 490; Baianism censured by, 361; Composition of, 351
Fagaras (see), 574 f.
Faith, human faith and divine, 413 f.
Falconnet and Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 179
Family names (French), 125 note
Far East, Clement X and mission in, 265
Farargi, John (bishop), 572
Farnese (family): and the Aldobrandini, 15; and the Barberini, 56
Father of Pietism, 285
"Fathers of a Good Death," 78
Fathers of Christian Doctrine, 425
Favre, Jacqueline (Visitation nun), 97
Feast days, Reduction of number of, 455
Febronianism, 492: papal condemnations, 494
Febronius, Justinus: De praesenti statu Ecclesiae, 461, 492; Doctrine of, 496
Felix V (antipope), 585
Felix of Cantalice, Beatification of, 42
Fénelon, François de (bishop of Cambrai), 425, 434
  On apologetics, 535
  Appeal to Rome, 431
  On Archbishop Harlay, 342 note
  Cas de conscience refuted by, 482
  Conflict with Bossuet, 272
  Consecrated by Bossuet, 430
  Contents of the Maximes, 431
  On dispersion of Port Royal nuns, 486
  On example of St. Sulpice, 155
  Explication des maximes des saints, 272, 430
  Influence of Madame Guyon on, 427
  Meeting with Madame Guyon, 426
  Quietism, 420
  Réfutation du système du P. Malebranche, 426
  At St. Sulpice, 426
  Submission of, 431
  Télémaque, 432, 434
  Treatise on the Existence of God, 432
Fénelon, Marquis de: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177; and dueling, 162 f.
Feodor I (czar), 586
Ferdinand (archduke) and German conflict, 28
Ferdinand II (emperor), 83: Catholic champion, 30; Decline of authority of, 258; Edict of Restitution, 45 ff.; and prince electors, 34
Ferdinand III (of Spain), 208: Cult of, 260; Las Casas and, 208
Ferrara (duchy), 12

Ferrier, Jean du: Father Condren and, 137; and founding of Sulpicians, 138; Louis XIII's confessor, 388 note
Fersen, 502
Feuillants, reformed by La Barrière, 108 note
Fidelis Sigmaringen, St.: in Switzerland, 181 note
Findel, philosophy of Freemasonry, 505
Fire insurance companies, Origin of, 542
Fishery Coast (India), St. Francis Xavier, 191
Fitter, Adam (Jesuit), 575
Five Mile Act, 297
Five propositions (Jansenist), 400: condemned by Innocent X, 402
Flaifel, Anthony (bishop), 572
Fléchier, Preaching of, 434
Fleury, Abbé: at La Trappe, 109
Fleury, André de (cardinal): bull Unigenitus, 489; made cardinal, 446; Masonic meetings forbidden, 508; treatment of Huguenots, 478
Fleury, Rosset de (bishop of Cambrai), 521
Florence, Council of (1439), 553: papal infallibility, 351
Florence, Union of, 571
Floriot, Father: and approval of Frequent Communion, 396
Fludd, Robert: Apologia of the Rosy Cross, 505
"Flying squadron," 254, 261, 443
Foix (district), 334
Fontaine (Jansenist), Mémoires, 387
Fontainebleau, 93
Fontanges, Catherine de (abbess of Chelles), 339
Fontanges, Mlle de: and Louis XIV, 339
Fontcouverte, birthplace of St. Francis Regis, 150
Fontenay-Mareuil, Count of, 160
Fontenelle, Histoire des oracles, 442
Fontevrault: Jurisdiction of abbess of, 337; Henry IV's natural daughter abbess of, 339
Foreign missions, 181-229
  In Africa, 226
  In China, 199
  Gregory XV and, 39
  Henry IV's interest in, 96
  In Japan, 195
Foreign missions (continued)
  In North America, 220
  In South America, 206
Foreign Missions, Paris Seminary of, 204
Foreign Missions, Society of, 179
Formulary (anti-Jansenist), 404: rejected by four bishops, 413; Revision of, 407
Forty Hours' Adoration, Institution of, 15
Foucault (intendant), 335: Dragonade under direction of, 336; his sisters appointed abbesses, 339
Fouquet (bishop of Bayonne), 132
Fouquet, Madame: and St. Vincent, 145
Fouquet (superintendant), Trial of, 177
Four articles of 1682, 348: Louis XIV and, 352
Fourier, St. Peter, 110
Fox, George: Quakers founded by, 302
France
  Administration of the colleges, 532
  Anne of Austria queen, 127, 145-47, 173
  Anticlerical magistracy, 324
  Catholic reform in, 87 ff.
  Concordat (1516), 324, 337, 520
  Conditions in, 141
  And Cromwell, 295
  During Thirty Years' War, 141
  Elementary education, 524 ff.
  Exclusive against Calvalchini, 458
  Famine, 160
  Growth of the Jesuits in, 95
  Habsburgs versus, 36
  Higher studies, 530
  Influence in the Orient, 36
  Interference in papal elections, 443
  Jesuit schools, 95
  The laboring classes, 164
  Masonry in, 507
  The plague, 160
  Protestantism in, 304, 476. See also Huguenots
  Regulation of education, 532
  The schoolmaster, 524
  Schools in, 524
  Secondary education, 528
  Tributary to foreign industry, 141
  Tridentine decrees not accepted, 114
  Tridentine reforms, 87
France, Church in, 520
  Appointment of bishops, 356
  Appointment of prelates, 100, 112

France (continued)
Assembly of the Clergy. See Assembly
Clergy in education, 532
The commendam, 520
Concordat of 1516, 100 note
Ecclesiastical feudalism, 114
Influence of the clergy, 112
Life of the prelates, 112
The lower clergy, 113
The missions, 128
Number of religious houses, 520
Organization of, 355
Reform of monasteries, 106
The regular clergy, 105
Restrictions on, 114
The rural clergy, 522 f.
The secular clergy, 111
Sees vacant in 1688, 363
Seminaries, 123, 132
The tithes, 523
The upper clergy, 324
Wealth of, 520
Wealth of the clergy, 111
Works of charity, 141-80
France, Collège de, 233
France, University of, 532
Frances of Rome, St.: Foundation by, 97
Francesco Girolamo, St., 514
Francis I (of France), 35
Francis Borgia, St.: Beatification of, 42
Francis de Sales, St., 88
Admiration for Mother Angélique, 372
Ascetical theology, 232, 240
Canonization of, 260
Cardinal de Berulle and, 99
Catholic Controversy by, 91
In Chablais province, 89
Character of, 88
Diocesan synods, 98
Director of Mother Angélique, 375
On duties of one's state of life, 101 f.
Education of, 89
Efforts to found a seminary, 99
Esteem for Bishop Zamet, 379
Esteem for the Jesuits, 96
On examination of conscience, 101
Handwritten leaflets, 90
Henry IV and, 91
Introduction to the Devout Life, 101, 393
Jane de Chantal and, 97
On meditation, 101
On the Oratory, 118
Francis de Sales (continued)
In Paris, 91
On piety of the laity, 100
Reform of the clergy, 98
In Savoy, 90
In Switzerland, 181 note
Treatise on the Love of God, 89, 102
The Visitation founded by, 97
Writings of St. Theresa, 101
Francis Regis, St., 150 f.: Canonization of, 151 note
Francis Solanus, St.: in Lima, 210
Francis Xavier, St. (missioner), 40, 182
Attempt to enter China, 190
Beatification of, 31
And the bonzes, 189
Canonization of, 40
Death of, 190, 191 note
Esteem for baptism, 186
At Goa, 185
In India, 184
In Japan, 187 ff.
Method of, 185
Number of converts, 191 note
At Paris University, 182
Return to India, 189
St. Ignatius and, 183
Sent to India, 183
Vows at Montmartre, 183
Franciscans
In Africa, 226
In California, 221
In Egypt, 571
Martyred by Mussulmans, 226
Missioners in South America, 210
In Spain, 70
Frankfort, Fair of, 385
Frankfort-on-Main: Spener, pastor of, 284
Frantz (Jesuit) and Joseph II, 495
Frascati seminary, 466
Fray Gerundio by Father Isla, 511
Frederick (elector Palatine), leader of Protestantism, 28
Frederick II (of Prussia): anti-Christian rationalism, 472; Benedict XIV and, 454; and Jesuit suppression, 469; and Joseph II, 496
Frederick Augustus: Conversion of, 272; elector of Saxony, 440; victory over Charles XII, 441
Frederick William I (of Prussia), national Church, 472

Freemasonry. See Masonry
Frémyot. See Jane Chantal
French Academy, 341
French Revolution, Jansenism and, 497
Frequent Communion, by Antoine Arnauld, 334, 393, 482: Attacks on, 396; Condemnation of, 397; Consequences of, 399
Friars Minor. See Franciscans
Friars Preachers. See Dominicans
Fromont, friend of Jansen, 384
Fronde, The, 142: Results of, 257; St. Vincent during, 147
Frumentius, St.: in Ethiopia, 228
Fulda (monastery), German monasticism and, 83

Gabriel VIII (Coptic patriarch), 571
Galanti, Ippolito, 79
Galerie, La (Annecy): The Visitation foundation, 97
Galicia, 579, 585
Galileo, 48
  Attitude to the Church, 230
  Bellarmine and, 51
  Cardinal Barberini and, 49
  Character of, 50
  Condemnation of, 51 f.
  Death of, 54
  Dialoghi delle nuove scienze, 54
  Dialogo dei due massimi sistemi del mondo, 54
  Imprisonment of, 54
  Istoria e dimostrazioni intorno alle macchie solari, 49
  Paul V and, 49
  Urban VIII and, 54
Galley convicts, St. Vincent and, 146
Gallia christiana, 247 f.
Gallican Church, the customs of, 350
Gallicanism, 317-57, 491
  Assembly of the Clergy (1681), 345
  Boldness of, 266
  Bossuet, 343
  Ecclesiastical, 318
  Four articles of 1682, 348
  Innocent XI and, 353
  Louis XIV, 325, 340
  The new, 319
  In the Parliament, 337
  Presbyterian, 321
  Proposition signed by Jesuits, 320
Gallicanism (continued)
  Regalian, 270
  Richelieu, 319 f.
  Richer, 321
  In the Sorbonne, 337
  The term, 317
  And Western Schism, 318
Gamache, Sorbonne doctor, 236
Gambling at French court, 162
Ganganelli, Lorenzo (Clement XIV), 464
Garasse, 143: on modern Epicureans, 251
Garfellini (nuncio), 329
Gaspard de Vintimille (archbishop of Paris), 490
Gaspard Hoffmann (abbot), 83
Gaspareaux (Canada), 225
Gaulin, missioner in Canada, 225
Gausset, François (Jesuit), 567
Gavanti, Bartholomew: Thesaurus sacrorum rituum, 243
Gavantus (Barnabite), 80
Gayet, Palma (historian), 126
Gazette de France on affair of Corsican Guard, 327
"General Alms," The: Organization of, 542
General Assemblies of the Clergy. See Assembly
General Hospital of Paris, 148, 160 f.
Geneva: D'Arenthon bishop of, 421; Sirvens flee to, 480
Genevieve, Mother (abbess of Port Royal), 377: Installation of, 380
Genoa: dispute with Corsica, 448, 460; and the Holy See, 492; price on head of papal legate, 460; and Savoy reconciled, 265
George II (Jacobite patriarch), 567
George III (Jacobite patriarch), 567
George von Schönborn (prince elector), 493
Georgia: incorporated into Russia, 579; Theatines in, 579
Georgians, 579
Gerlach, Stephen (Lutheran), 548
German College (Rome), 265, 575
German mentality, 493
Germanus II (patriarch), 557
Germanus Adam, 563
Germany
  Absolutism of the princes, 274

Germany (continued)
Caesaropapism in, 81
Calvinists in, 27
Catholic princes, 27
The Church in, 27, 80
Church property, 27
Clerical reform, 82
Counter Reformation, 258
Disregard of the Holy See, 460
Influence of Gaspard Hoffmann, 83
Influence of monasticism, 82
Lutherans in, 27
Penetration of Roman law, 274
Power of the princes, 81
Predominance of the nobility, 258
Project of Melk congregation, 82
The Protestant princes, 27
Protestantism in, 8, 273, 472
Religious syncretism, 274
Roman law in, 81, 274
St. Peter Canisius in, 181 note
Seminaries in, 85
Swedish invasion of, 83
Gerson, episcopalian Gallicanism, 318
Gesù (church, Rome), 468
Gex, Madame Guyon at, 421
Ghrebnitsky, Florian (bishop), 584
Girgeh (see), 572
Girolamo, St. Francesco, 514 f.
Girolamo da Narni (Capuchin), 39
Glories of Mary by St. Alphonsus, 516
Goa: Nobili and archbishop of, 194; St. Francis Xavier at, 185
Godeau (bishop of Vence), 132, 154: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177
Godet des Marais (bishop of Chartres), 420: and Madame Guyon's doctrine, 427
Goldoni, Molière's influence on, 503
Golvan, Antonio (archbishop of Granada), 512
Gondi (family), 113: St. Cyran at home of, 367
Gondi, Emmanuel de: St. Vincent and, 126, 146
Gondi, Henry de (cardinal), 119, 146: Louis XIII and, 105
Gondi, Jean de (archbishop of Paris): Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 159; retreats for his ordinands, 131
Gondi, Madame de: Death of, 129; St. Vincent and, 128 f., 145
Gondrin, De (archbishop of Sens): Apparent austerity of, 402 note; Jansenist, 402
Gonzaga, Aloysius. See Aloysius
Gonzaga, Princess: and St. Vincent, 145
Good Jesus of Ravenna (congregation), abolished, 60
Good Shepherd, Congregation of the: Founding of, 150
Goodwin (Puritan preacher), 296
Goto Islands (Japan), 196
Gotti, Vincenzo (cardinal), 451
Goupil, René: Martyrdom of, 222
Gournay, Marie de: Olier and, 135
Grace, efficacy of, 358 f. See also Jansenism
Grammaire générale, 395
Gramont, Marshal de: and Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 178
Gran (see), 575
Granada (Spain), St. Turibius in, 210
Grand Age, The, 432 ff.
Grand Châtelet, Chapel of the, 173
Grand Orient: first Grand Master, 507; Installation of, 507
Grandchamp, Madame de: superior of convent of Charonne, 339
Grandin, Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177
Grands Augustins (church, Paris), 346
Granges, Château de: "Little schools" at, 395
Granier, Claude (bishop of Geneva), 90
Granvelle (cardinal) and Baianism, 361
"Great Arnauld." See Arnauld, Antoine Great Augustinians, Monastery of, 105 note
Great Britain. See England
Greater Antilles, Discovery of, 207
Greece: Holy Synod, 552; under patriarch of Constantinople, 555
Greek College (Rome), 575-77, 582
Greek liturgy, Variants in, 586
Greek Orthodox Church, 547
Greek rite: Alteration of, 578; Clement VIII and the, 15; in Italy, 578
Greek Uniate patriarchate, 455
Greeks (Uniate): in Bisignano diocese, 450; in Venice, 460
Greenland, Pietism in, 286
Gregory IV (patriarch), 549
Gregory VII, St. (pope): Canonization of, 446

Gregory XIII (pope)
Baius' submission, 362 f.
Bull against Baianism, 362
Coptic Church, 571
Greek College founded by, 577
Maronite College founded by, 564
Missions of the Orient, 39
Moors of Spain, 73
Gregory XV (pope), 33
Bull Aeterni Patris, 443 note
Canonizations by, 40
Cardinal de La Rochefoucauld and, 106
Character of, 33
Congregation of Propaganda, 39
Death of, 37, 41
Election of, 33
Friendly to the Jesuits, 33
On the Immaculate Conception, 41
On papal elections, 38
Piety of, 39
Policy of, 33
Reform efforts, 37
Religious congregations approved by, 40
The right of exclusive, 443
Gregory XVI (pope), Council of Qarqafe condemned, 563
Grenade, De: Le guide des pécheurs, 100
Grenoble: Caulet bishop of, 542; General Hospital, 161; See of, 314; Workmen's societies at, 169
Grignan, Jacques de (bishop of Uzès), 160
Grignan, Madame de, 336
Grignon de Montfort (Blessed), 525: Company of Mary, 536; Daughters of Wisdom, 536; Preaching of, 536
Grisar on Galileo's condemnation, 52 note
Grisons (canton) and Valtellina, 36
Grosswardein (see), 576
Grottaferrata (monastery), 578
Grou: Caractères de la vraie dévotion, 539 f.; Intérieur de Jésus et de Marie, 541; Science pratique du Crucifix, 540
Guaranis (tribe), 216
Guatemala, see created, 207
Guayra (province), Reductions in, 217
Guémené, Princess de: Jansenist, 403; retreat at Port Royal, 374
Guénée (apologist), 533: Lettres de quelques juifs à M. de Voltaire, 534
Guide des pécheurs by De Grenade, 100
Guide spirituelle by Molinos, 423
Guignard (Jesuit), Execution of, 92 note
Guitton, mayor of La Rochelle, 306
Gunpowder Plot, The, 14, 25
Gustavus Adolphus (of Sweden), 46
Guyenne (France), 305, 310: Huguenot meetings in, 478; Jesuit houses in, 94
Guyon, Madame, 420
Arrest of, 425
Confined in Meaux convent, 427
Father Lacombe and, 421 ff.
Le moyen court et facile pour faire l'oraison, 422 ff.
Les torrents spirituels, 423
Meeting with Fénelon, 426
Orthodoxy of, 425
Theological inquiry at Meaux, 427
Guyon du Chesnoy, Jacques, 421
Guy-Patin, 385
Guzzetta, George: Oratory of the Oriental rite, 578

Habert, Isaac: preaching against Jansenism, 387
Habit of Citeaux nuns, 373
Habsburgs: Ambition of, 13; Empire of the, 13; Strength of, 9; versus France, 36
Hagiographic Confraternity, 557
Hague, The: Leibnitz at, 276; Pseudo-chapter at, 499
Hainaut, 359
Haiti: Discovery of, 207; Measures to populate, 208
Hakim, Maximus, 562
Hama (see), 560
Hamel, Father du: Jansenist practices, 399
Hamon (physician), Port Royal hermit, 382
Hampton Court, 504
Hanover (Germany), 276
Hapsburgs. See Habsburgs
Haqlani, Abraham 'el, 564
Harcourt, Count of: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 178
Hardouin de Beaumont de Péréfixe. See Péréfixe
Harlay, Achille de (Procurator General), 328
Harlay, François de (archbishop of Paris), 341 f.

Harlay (continued)
Investigation of quietism, 425
Jansenists opposed by, 342
Louis XIV and, 354
Private morals of, 487
And quietism, 423
And the regalia, 346
Secularization of Charonne convent, 340
Harnack, Adolph, 473
Hasselius, Leonard (Louvain professor), 359: at Council of Trent, 359
Hauranne, Duvergier de. See Duvergier
Hebrew: Chairs of, 31; Teaching of, 233
Hebrides, The: missions, 181
Helmstedt University, 275
Helvetius: Apron of, 508; Esprit by, 461
Henrietta of England, Bossuet's funeral sermon, 344
Henrietta of France: Bossuet's funeral sermon, 309, 344; wife of Charles I of England, 45, 288
Henry III (of France): Attempted assassination of, 92; Assassination of, 319; Declaration verbale, 338
Henry IV (of France), 91
Acquaviva (Jesuit general), 93
Appointment of prelates, 100, 112
Assassination of, 29
Attempted assassination of, 92, 319
Baronius and, 17 note
Character of, 9
Clement VIII's attitude to, 10
And crusade project, 12 note
Duvergier's pamphlet, 367
Esteem for St. Vincent, 126
Father Coton, confessor of, 367
Favors to Jesuits, 94
Heart bequeathed to La Flèche, 96
La Flèche founded by, 95
And Maubuisson Abbey, 374
Mother Angélique and, 371
The pope and, 319
Private morality of, 95
Recall of the Jesuits, 92
Reform of Paris University, 94
St. Francis de Sales and, 91
And the Sorbonne, 234
Supposed grand design of, 13
Suspicion against the Jesuits, 93
Treatment of Protestants, 87
Urban VIII and, 42
Venetian conflict with Paul V, 24
Henry of Béarn at La Rochelle, 305
Henry the Navigator, African missions, 226
Heracles, 550
Herder, 287
Hermant on St. Cyran, 389
Hermitage, The (in Normandy), 178
Hermits of Port Royal, 381: regard for Mother Angélique, 382
Hessels, John: at the Council of Trent, 362
Hexapla by Origen, 245
Hideyoshi, persecutor, 196-98
Hindustan, St. Francis Xavier's preaching, 186
Hirado (Japan), Christian center, 195
Hispaniola, Discovery of, 207
Histoire de l'Eglise by Noel Alexander, 531
Histoire de Port Royal by Racine, 394
Histoire des oracles by Fontanelle, 442
Histoire généalogique de la Maison de France by Sainte-Marthe, 248
Histoire générale des auteurs sacrés ecclésiastiques, 531
Histoire littéraire de la France by Rivet, 531
History of the Council of Trent by Pallavicino, 260
History of the Council of Trent by Sarpi, 24
History of the Patriarchs of Jerusalem by Dositheus, 558
Hoadly (Anglican bishop), 475
Hochman, Christian (Pietist), 286
Hofbauer, St. Clement, 518: strife against Josephism, 518; Vocation of, 518
Hoffmann, Gaspard (abbot), 83
Hohenstaufens, The, 449
Holland
Colonization in North America, 221
Jansenist Church in, 441, 460
Jansenists in, 484, 495, 499
Masonry in, 507
Quesnel in, 499
Treaty with Cromwell, 295
Hollandine, Louise (abbess of Maubuisson), 279
Holy Alliance, The, 286
Holy Ghost, Order of the, 341
Holy Ghost, Sisters of the, 525
Holy Office on Chinese rites, 204 f.

Holy Roman Empire: Decline of, 81; Dissolution of, 274; End of, 64
Holy Synods, 550, 552
Holy Trinity (monastery), 581 f.
Holzhauser, Bartholomew (reformer), 84
Homme d'oraison by Nouet, 396 note
Hontheim, Nicholas von (bishop of Trier), 493. See also Febronius
Hortus pastorum by James Marchand, 238
Hospitallers of St. John of God, 78
Hospitals, Administration of, 357
Hospodars of Walachia, 558
Hôtel-Dieu (Paris), 541
Houbigant (Oratorian), 119
Houmain (Sulpician), 139
House of Instruction in St. Sulpice parish, 155
Hovsepian, James, 570
Hradschin castle, 29
Hrob, Protestants at, 29
Huet, Leibnitz and, 276
Huguenot assemblies, 478 f.
Huguenots
  American colonists, 206
  Conversion of, 310, 476
  Edict of Alais, 307
  Exile of, 313, 315, 476
  Intendants on treatment of, 476
  The liberal professions, 174 f.
  Louis XIV's measures against, 308 f.
  Material losses of, 314
  National synod, 478
  Organization of the, 304
  Penalties against, 311
  Repression of, 311
  Richelieu and, 307
  "Synods of the Desert," 313 ff., 477
  Violent methods of conversion of, 311
Humboldt, Alexander von: on Columbus' voyage, 220
Hume, David: on death of Cromwell, 296; on Oliver Cromwell, 289
Hungary: Bartholomites in, 85; devotion to St. Joseph, 40; Heretical sects in, 9
Hurons (tribe), 222
Hussites and Greek Church, 547
Huygens, Leibnitz and, 276
Hyacinth (Capuchin), 34
Hyacintha Mariscotti, St. (Franciscan), 80
Hysopolis (see), 572

Iassi, Conferences of, 551
Ieyasu (shogun), Missioners banished by, 199
Ignatius Loyola, St.: ascetical theology, 232; Beatification of, 31; Canonization of, 40; St. Francis Xavier and, 183
Île de France, 337
Île d'Orléron, Father Lacombe imprisoned at, 425
Illuminated, The, 295
Illuminism and Masonry (French), 508
Imitation of Christ, 283, 538
Immaculate Conception: Cult of, 60; Doctrine of, 41; dogma affirmed by Alexander VII, 261; in Orthodox Church, 552
Immunities, Ecclesiastical, 22
In caena Domini (bull), 21, 465
In eminenti (bull), 388, 450, 456, 509
Incarnation, Traité de l': by Thomassin, 241
Independent Puritans, 293
Index, The: New edition of, 15
Index, Congregation of the, 453: Provincial Letters condemned, 412 f.
India (see also Nobili)
  Early evangelization of, 184
  Jesuits in, 191
  John de Britto in, 194
  Nestorian missions, 568
  Religions of, 184
  St. Francis Xavier sent to, 183
  St. Francis Xavier's return to, 189
Industriae ad curandos animae morbos, 80
Industry, France tributary to foreign, 141
Infallibility, Papal
  Bossuet and, 345, 355 note
  Coret on, 326
  In definition of dogmatic facts, 414 note
  De Marca on, 322
  Distinction of right and fact, 413
  And Jansenists, 404
  Limitation of, 350
  Parliament against, 337
  St. Thomas on, 350 note, 352
  The Sorbonne and, 329, 337

Innocent III (pope) and state encroachments, 330
Innocent X (pope), 59
Bulls: Cum occasione, 60, 402; Zelus domus meae, 65
Character of, 59
Character of preaching under, 60
Chinese rites, 204
Condemnation of the Frequent Communion, 397
The dead body of, 67
Death of, 67
External policy of, 61
The five propositions condemned, 402
Jansenism condemned, 402
Jubilee (1650), 59
Nepotism of, 66
Petition of French bishops, 402
Protests against Treaty of Westphalia, 65
Rome adorned by, 60
Treaty of Westphalia, 256
Innocent XI (pope), 265
Absence of nepotism, 266
Admiration for Molinos, 423 note
Advice to James II, 300
Approval of the Bartholomites, 85
Assembly of the Clergy (1682), 353
Charonne convent, 340
Condemnation of forty-five maxims, 267
Death of, 268
Excommunication of Louis XIV, 354 and note
Gallicanism, 353
James II and, 300
Laxism condemned, 412
Louis XIV felicitated, 314
Quietism condemned, 268
Threat to Louis XIV, 336, 341
Innocent XII (pope), 271
Bull against nepotism, 270 f.
Death of, 272
End of nepotism, 11 note
Fénelon's Maximes condemned, 431
Jansenism and, 272
Louis XIV and, 270, 354
Innocent XIII (pope), 442: Death of, 445; promise before election, 443 f.; and Rumanian Church, 575
Inquisition: printing of the Augustinus forbidden, 386; Vieira condemned, 214
Inquisition (Spanish), 73, 492
Institute of the Visitation, 96
Instruccion de Sacerdotes by Molina, 238
Intendants on treatment of Huguenots, 476
Inter caetera (bull), 206
Inter multiplices (bull), 270, 354
Interdict, Treatise on the: by Sarpi, 24
Intérieur de Jésus et de Marie by Grou, 541
Interprétation du cantique des cantiques, 424
Introduction to the Devout Life by St. Francis de Sales, 101, 393
Ipek (see), 576
Ireland, Catholics persecuted under Queen Anne, 302
Iroquois (tribe), 223: instructed by Sulpicians, 224; and Montreal colonists, 224
Isaac (patriarch of Constantinople), 549
Isaac Jogues, dispensation to say Mass, 223
Isidore the Laborer, St.: Canonization of, 40
Isla, Fray Gerundio by, 511
Ismidt (Nicomedia), 554
Issy: investigation of quietism, 427; St. Vincent at, 126
Italo-Greeks, 578
Italy
Austro-Spanish influence, 45
The Church in, 77, 512
Greek rite in, 578
Greeks of southern, 577
Masonry in, 507
Menaced by Turks, 265
Spanish power, 8
Ivan IV the Terrible, 587

Jacobite Syrians, 566
Jacobites, Conversion of, 566
Jamaica: Discovery of, 207; oppression of Indians, 208
James I (of England), 288: greetings from Clement VIII, 14; oath of supremacy, 25; and Venetian conflict with Paul V, 23

James II (of England), 296
Adda papal envoy to, 300
Catholicism in England, 267
Death of, 302
And French Huguenots, 314
Innocent XI and, 300
At La Trappe, 109
Louis XIV and, 300
Louis XIV's hospitality to, 302
Papal envoys to, 300
In Rome, 440
James of York, Conversion of, 298
Jane Frances de Chantal, St.: on Father de Condren, 120; Fénelon and, 426; Madame Guyon's fondness for life of, 421; and St. Francis de Sales, 97
Janson, Jacques: chancellor of Louvain, 363
Jansen, Cornelius, 363
Armchair of, 365 note
The Augustinus, 384 ff.: its beginning, 366
Becomes bishop of Ypres, 368
Code terms used by, 366
Death of, 384
His hatred of the Jesuits, 364
Last illness of, 384
Letter to St. Cyran, 378
Letters of, 366
Mars Gallicus by, 368
On original sin, 386 note
In Paris, 364
The Secret Rosary approved by, 378
Study of St. Augustine, 365
Jansenism, 358-419, 482
In Austrian universities, 470
Becomes schism, 499
Benedict XIV and, 456
Bishop Pavillon, 332
Blaise Pascal, 407 ff.
The case of conscience, 392
Clement IX and, 262
Clement X and, 264
The Clementine peace, 415
Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 175, 178
Condemned by Alexander VII, 407
Condemned by Urban VIII, 47
The condemned propositions, 334
The contents of, 400
Doctrine of, 382
Evasions of, 400
The five propositions, 60, 400 ff.
Jansenism (continued)
Foes of, 408
Formed into a Church, 441
The formulary, 334, 404 f.
And French Revolution, 497
Individualism of, 294
Innocent X's condemnation of, 60
Innocent XII and, 272
The Jesuits and, 394
New formulary, 407
Olier and, 398
Opposed by Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 175
Opposed by Father Olier, 399
Origin of, 358
Port Royal the center of, 383
Quesnel, leader of, 417
Repudiation of, 397
Resistance of the four bishops, 413
A semi-Protestantism, 382
A sort of Calvinism, 383
Submission of the four bishops, 414
Jansenist Church in Holland, 460
Jansenists
Attitude to Blessed Sacrament, 380
Attitude to bull of condemnation, 389
Attitude to the Church, 175
Clannish spirit, 397
Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 159, 177
Denounced by St. Vincent, 126 note
Formulary to be signed by the, 260
In Holland, 484, 495, 499
Jesuits versus, 389, 394 ff.
Opposed to devotion to Sacred Heart, 463
Opposition to the Unigenitus, 460
"Philosophical sin" denounced by, 270
"Respectful silence," 482
The Russian Church and, 490
Secret paper of, 490
Submissions of, 403
View of infallibility, 326
Zamet attacked by, 379
Japan
Banishment of priests, 197
Buddhism in, 184, 187
Closed to Europeans, 199
Jesuits in, 195
The missions in, 195
Political constitution of, 188
Rapid spread of the Church, 196

Japan (continued)
St. Francis Xavier, 187 ff.
Shintoism in, 187
Jardin des racines grecques, 395
Jarue, Michael, 567
Jauhar, Athanasius, 562
Javorsky, Stephen (bishop), 588
Jeremias II (patriarch), 548, 586
Jeremias III (patriarch), 553
Jerez, college of, 512
Jerusalem: Athanasius bishop of, 571; Council of (1672), 551; the Eastern Church, 556; Patriarchate of, 323
Jesuitesses, Suppression of, 57
Jesuits
In Africa, 226
At Aleppo, 566
Attacked by the Provincial Letters, 409 ff.
Banished from France, 92
In Brazil, 211-13
In China, 204
Demand for suppression of, 459 f.
Destruction of the, 458
Development in France, 95
Devotion to the Sacred Heart, 463
And Dominicans in China, 205
Dominicans versus, 10, 16
Expelled from: Ethiopia, 572; France, 92; Prussia, 469; Spain, 459; Venice, 22
Gallican propositions signed by French, 320
Grievances adduced against, 467
Imprisonment in Portugal, 459
In India, 191
Intention to suppress, 457
Favored by Benedict XIV, 455
Foreign missions of, 465
And Jansenism, 394
Jansenists versus, 387, 389, 394 f.
Jansen's hatred of, 364
In Japan, 195
In Mexico, 211
Noailles withdraws faculties of, 488
Opposed by Archbishop Harlay, 342
In Paraguay, 207, 211, 216
In Peru, 211
In Poland, 580
Recalled to France, 92
Refuge in Silesia and White Russia, 469
And the regalia, 337
Jesuits (continued)
Report of visitator, 455 note
Return to France, 94
Rubens' paintings for the, 230
In Rumania, 574
St. Francis de Sales' esteem for, 96
School curriculum, 529 f.
Schools in France, 95
In Spain, 70
Suppression of, 225 f., 467
In Switzerland, 181 note
Unpopular in England, 301
Jesus and Mary, Society of, 123
Jews: Cromwell and the, 295; expelled from England, 295
Joachim III (patriarch), 555
Joachim V (Melchite patriarch), 586
Jogues, St. Isaac: dispensation to say Mass, 223; Martyrdom of, 222 f.
John II (of Portugal), Congo missions, 227
John IV (of Portugal) and Vieira, 213
John V (of Portugal), Benedict XIII and, 446
John XIII (Coptic patriarch), 571
John Baptist de la Salle, St., 525: Explication de la méthode d'oraison, 538
John Eudes, St. (founder), 122
John Frederick (duke of Brunswick), 275: Political difficulties of, 276
John Joseph of the Cross, St. (Franciscan), 450
John Karophyllis, 551, 558
John Nepomucene, St.: Canonization of, 446
John of Serpos, 570
John of the Cross, St.: canonized by Benedict XIII, 446
John Sigismund III (of Poland), 30
Jokhovsky, Cyprian (bishop), 583
Josaphat Kuncevyc, St., 581 f.: Martyrdom of, 583
Joseph, St.: Devotion to, 40; Feast of (March 19), 40; "Preserver of Peace," 40; and St. Cyran, 368 f.
Joseph II (of Austria): Aim of, 495; Clement XIII and, 460; Confiscations by, 496; and the episcopate, 496; influence of Father Frantz, 495
Joseph I (of Portugal), 465: Attempted assassination of, 459
Joseph II (Greek patriarch), 547

Joseph, Father (Richelieu's confidant), 44, 321
Joseph Calasanctius, St. (founder), 40
Joseph of Leonessa, St.: Apostle of the Turks, 80
Josephism, 496: Doctrine of, 496; Hofbauer's strife against, 518
Joyeuse, De (cardinal), 25
Juan Bautista of the Immaculate Conception, 72
Juan Falconi (brother of Mercy) and frequent Communion, 80 note
Jubilee: (1600), 8; (1750), 455
Judicium doctoris catholici by Leibnitz, 281
Julius II (pope), American foreign missions, 207
Julius III (pope), 568
Jumièges, Harlay, abbot of, 341
Jurieu (Huguenot), 315: on rule of faith, 415
Justo, Japanese convert, 196

Kagoshima (Japan), St. Francis Xavier at, 187
Kakongo, Christian population in the, 227
Kang-ti (Chinese emperor), 205
Kant: influence of pietism, 286; influenced by Rousseau, 503
Karalevsky, Cyril, 547 note
Karme, Meletius, 559
Karophyllis, John, 551, 558
Kautzen (Lutheran theologian), 287
Kenebec River, 225
Kerveno, Madame de, 340
Kiev, 579, 583: Church of, 585
Killis (see), 569
Kings, divine right of, 347
Kishka, Leo (bishop), 584
Klein, John Innocent (bishop), 575 f.
Klesl (cardinal), 83
Klostergrab. See Hrob
Kohlbrugge (Pietist), 286
Kollonitz (cardinal), 574
Koninsky, George (bishop), 584
Kontaris, Cyril (patriarch), 549
Korea. See Corea
Koros (see), 577
Korydaleus, Theophilus, 551
Kotchannes, 568
Kotzim, Sobieski's victory at, 268
Kovacs, Meletius (bishop), 576
Kraus. See Crusius
Kreim (monastery), 569
Kreutz (see), 577
Krijevtsy (see), 577
Kruedener, Baroness von, 286
Kyushu (Japan), St. Francis Xavier on, 187

La logique de Port-Royal, 395
La paix intérieure by Lombez, 539
La perpetuité de la foi de l'Eglise catholique, touchant l'Eucharistie, 415
L'abandon à la Providence divine by Caussade, 539
La Barre, Jean François de: The case of, 481
La Barrière, Jean de: Feuillants reformed by, 108 note
La Beaumelle on Huguenot assemblies, 479
Labor, condition in France, 141
La Borde, Principes sur l'essence, la distinction et les limites des deux puissances, 456
Laboring classes in France, 164: Company of the Blessed Sacrament and, 167 ff.
Labrador, Pietism in, 286
Labre, St. Benedict, 545
La Broue (bishop of Mirepoix): appeal from bull Unigenitus, 489; at La Trappe, 109
La Bruyère, Writings of, 432
La Chaise, François de, 339: confessor of Louis XIV, 354; Leibnitz and, 276; Louis XIV and, 309; the regalia, 346
La Chassaigne (Sulpician), 139
La Chassaigne, Madame de: St. Vincent and, 144
Lacombe, Albert (Barnabite): Imprisonment of, 425; Madame Guyon and, 421 ff.; Orationis mentalis analysis, 424
La Dauversière, Jerome de: and colonization of Montreal, 223
Ladies of Charity, 145: and Daughters of Charity, 147; founded by St. Vincent, 128
La Flèche (Jesuit school), 95, 332: Henry IV's heart bequeathed to, 96
La Fontaine, Fables of, 432

La Force, Marquis de, 305
La Guerra, Diaz de (bishop of Siguenza), 512
Lalande (astronomer), 458
La Louvesc, St. Francis Regis at, 151
La Maisonfort, Madame de, 420
La Manche, Sisters of Mercy, 525
Lambertini, Prospero (Benedict XIV), 451: made cardinal, 446
Lamoignon, Guillaume de, 160: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177, 179
La Mothe-Brion, Count de, 151
La Motte, Jeanne de. See Guyon
La Motte, Louis de (bishop of Amiens), 521
Lamy (Oratorian) and education, 529
Lancelot, Claude: the "Little schools," 395; Racines grecques, 381
Langeron, Abbé de: at La Trappe, 109
Langle, Abbé de: at La Trappe, 109
Langle, De (bishop of Boulogne): appeal from bull Unigenitus, 489
Langres (France), 223: See of, 175, 379
Languedoc, 332: Huguenot meetings in, 478; and Huguenot war, 305; Huguenots of, 313; Jesuit houses in, 94
Laotse, 189
Lapide, Cornelius a: Commentaries, 244
La Régripière (monastery), 105 note
Largentier, Claude (abbot), 107
Largentier, Denis (abbot), 107
La Rivière, Port Royal hermit, 381
La Rochefoucauld, François de (cardinal), 105: Gregory XV and, 106; Maximes of, 432
La Rochelle
  Assembly of, 304
  Government of, 306
  In hands of Huguenots, 306
  Huguenots at, 305
  See of, 416
  Siege of, 306
  Sisters of Wisdom, 525
L'art de vérifier les dates, 236
La Ruelle, Servet de: Premonstratentians reformed by, 108 note
La Salle, St. John Baptist de, 525
Las Casas, Bartholomew (missioner), 207: becomes Dominican, 209; and beginning of the slave trade, 209 note
La Suchère, 151
Lateran Basilica, Façade of, 447
Lateran Council III, 37
Lateran Council IV, 576
Latin, The study of, 528 f.
Latin America: colonized by Catholics, 206; Portuguese scandals in, 207; Spanish scandals in, 207
Latitudinarians (English), 302
La Trappe (abbey): Bossuet on, 110; reform of, 108
La Trémoille, Conversion of, 309
Launoy (hagiographer), 233
Laurentiana (library, Florence), Oriental manuscripts, 565
Laval (bishop of La Rochelle), Submission of, 416
Laval, François (bishop of Quebec), 225
Lavalette (cardinal), 47
Lavardin, Marquis de (French ambassador): excommunicated, 353 f.
Laws of Discovery (England), 302
Laxism condemned by Innocent XI, 412
Lazarists: Origin of the name, 129. See also Vincentians League of Augsburg, 354
League of the Rhine, 64
League of Würzburg, 28
Lebanon, 563, 569: Maronite Church in, 565; Syria under emirs of, 561
Le Bret, Traité de la souveraineté des rois, 176
Le Brun (painter), 243
Le Camus, made cardinal, 314
Le Chapelain (Jesuit), Preaching of, 537
Leclerc, Alix, 110, 151
Leczinska, Marie (queen), 522
Lefort, tutor of Peter the Great, 552
Lefranc, George (archbishop of Vienne), 534: Controverse pacifique sur l'authorité de l'Eglise, 534; Devotion réconciliée avec l'Esprit, 534; Questions diverses sur l'Incrédulité, 534; Religion vengée de l'Incrédulité, 534
Legrand (theologian), 531
Legras, Mlle (Louise de Marillac), 148
Leibnitz, William, 276 ff.
  Attempt to unite Protestantism, 273
  Bossuet and, 279 f.
  On Council of Trent, 277 f., 280
  Judicium doctoris catholici, 281
  Louis XIV and, 281
  And syncretism, 275
  Union of Christian Churches, 275 ff.

Leiburn, John: papal envoy to James II, 300
Leipzig, birthplace of Leibnitz, 276 note
Le Jay, Guy: Paris Polyglot, 246, 564
Lejeune, John (Oratorian), 119, 152: "the blind priest," 152; Preaching of, 152
Lemaitre (Sulpician), slain by Indians, 224
Le Maitre, Simon: Port Royal hermit, 381
Lemberg. See Lwow
Lemère (Oratorian), billet de confession, 497
Le Nobletz, Michel: missioner, 149
Leo X (pope), Sapienza College begun by, 260
Leo XI (pope), 17
  Character of, 18
  Death of, 18
  Election of, 17
  Spanish influence at election of, 17
  Veneration of St. Charles, 78
Leo XIII on Denis Petau, 236
Leon (see), 149
Leonard of Port Maurice, St., 514: Preaching of, 514
Leonardo (doge), 22
Leonardo da Vinci, 230
Leopol. See Lwow
Leopold (emperor): and Innocent XI, 267; Prussia made a kingdom, 441
Le Puy, 151: Missions in, 174
Lercari (cardinal), 446
Lerma, Duke of: and Philip III, 69
Les sociétés secrètes et la Société by Deschamps, 508
Lesdiguières, Maréchal de, 305
L'esprit de Voltaire by Nonnotte, 533
Lesser Antilles, Discovery of, 207
Lessing, 287, 473: Febronianism rejected by, 494; and French "philosophers," 503
Lestonnac, Jeanne de: Daughters of Notre Dame founded by, 110
Leszcynski, Stanislaus, 584
Le Tellier, Charles (archbishop of Reims): on excommunication of Louis XIV, 341; and the regalia, 346
Le Tellier, Michel: and Charonne convent, 340; on Edict of Nantes, 309; Le Tellier (continued) minister of Louis XIV, 264; revocation of Edict of Nantes, 312
Letourneau on Bourdoise, 121
Lettre à un duc et pair, 406 f.
Lettre à une personne de condition, 406
Le Vayer de Boutigny (intendant), 325
Levellers, The, 295
Levesque, Sister: superior of Charonne convent, 340
Levis, Henri de: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 156 f.
Leyden University, Jean Morin at, 237
L'Hôpital, Michel de: rationalist deism, 315
Li (Chinese convert), 202
Liancourt, Duchess de: retreat at Port Royal, 374
Liancourt, Duke of: absolution of, 406; and dueling, 162; Jansenist, 405; and Sulpicians, 407
Liancourt, Marquis of, 159
Liberal professions, Huguenots in the, 174 f.
Libertés de l'Eglise gallicane by Pithou, 325
"Libertines," The: at Paris, 143
Licentiate in theology (Sorbonne), 235
L'idée du sacerdoce et du sacrifice de Jésus-Christ by Condren, 241
Ligne, Prince de, 502
Ligny (bishop of Meaux), submission of, 416
Liguori. See Alphonsus
Lilburn (a Leveller), 295
Lima: St. Francis Solanus in, 210; St. Rose of, 207, 210; St. Turibius made archbishop of, 210; see created, 207
Limoges, missions at, 174
Limousin, Father Lejeune in, 152
Lionne, minister of Louis XIV, 264
Lisbon: birthplace of Vieira, 213; Vieira sent to, 214
Lisieux: Cospéan, bishop of, 112; Seminary founded at, 123
Litanies, Liturgical, 15
Literati, The Chinese, 200, 203: and missioners, 201 f.
"Little Assembly" of the clergy (1681), 343
Little Schools of Port Royal, 381, 394, 528: method, 395
Liturgy, The Byzantine, 559

Livre des métiers by Boileau, 543
Locke, 500
Lombard. See Peter Lombard
Lombez, Ambrose de: Traité de la paix intérieure, 539
London: Fire of (1666), 297; Leibnitz at, 276; Suburb of French silk workers at, 315
London Polyglot, The, 246
Longer, The Masons of, 504
Longfellow, Evangeline by, 225
Longobardi (missioner): in China, 203; Chinese rites forbidden, 203
Longueville, Duchess of: Heart of, 487; Jansenist, 416
Lorenzo da Brindisi, St.: apostle of the Jews, 80
Lorraine: St. Peter Fourier in, 151; Suffering in, 160
Louis IX, St. (king of France), 346
Louis XIII (king of France)
  Cardinal de La Rochefoucauld and, 106
  Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 159
  Father Coton, confessor of, 96
  At La Rochelle, 306
  At Marmoutiers Abbey, 105
  Port Royal reforms, 374
  See of Paris, 35
Louis XIV (king of France), 308
  Absolutism of, 338
  Advice to James II, 300
  Affair of the Corsican Guard, 326
  The Age of, 432
  Alexander VII and, 260
  Appeal to future council, 354
  Archbishop Harlay, 342
  Arnauld received by, 415
  Assembly of the Clergy, 351
  Avignon seized, 354
  Bishop Caulet's letter to, 335
  Bull Vineam Domini, 483
  Convent of Charonne, 339
  The convents, 337
  Copies of Réflections morales seized, 488
  Death of, 488
  Dispersion of Port Royal nuns, 486
  Early policy of, 325
  Ecclesiastical courts, 355
  Excommunication of, 354 and note
  Father La Chaise and, 309
  The four articles, 352
Louis XIV (continued)
  The General Hospital, 161
  Hospitality to James II, 302
  Influence of Madame de Maintenon, 354
  Innocent XI, 267
  Innocent XII, 270, 354
  James II (of England), 301
  Last will of, 498
  Leibnitz, 281
  Oratorians in Rome, 119
  Port Royal des Champs, 484
  The regalia, 331, 334 ff.
  Religious policy, 308, 325, 340
  Repression of Huguenots, 309
  Revocation of Edict of Nantes, 267, 309, 312 ff., 354
  Threat of Innocent XI, 336, 341
  On treatment of Huguenots, 476
  Turks favored by, 265, 267
Louis XV (king of France)
  Clement XIV, 466
  Exequatur required, 470
  Febronianism, 470
  Jesuits, 459, 466
  Madame Louise, 546
  Masonry, 508
  Parliament versus, 498
  Penalties against Huguenots, 478
Louise, Madame: becomes Carmelite nun, 470, 546
Lourdes castle, Father Lacombe's imprisonment, 425
Louvain University
  The Augustinus, 385
  Baianism, 361
  Endowed by Charles V, 358
  Endowed by Philip II, 358
  Faculty of theology, 358
  Jansen's anniversary celebrated, 387
  Question of grace and free will, 358
  Thomism and Molinism, 358
Louvaise (monastery), 566
Louvois, repression of Huguenots, 311
Love of God by St. Francis de Sales, 89, 102
Loyac (abbey), 159
Lucaris. See Lukaris
Ludovisi, Alessandro (Gregory XV), 33
Ludovisi, Ludovico, 33
Lugo on the exclusive, 443
Luillier, Marie: and founding of Sulpicians, 138

Lukaris, Cyril (patriarch), 548: Calvinist catechisms, 549; Calvinist leanings, 549; Death of, 550
Luke (catholicos of Sis), 569
Lunéville, 151
L'unité de l'Eglise, 416
Lutheran consistories in Prussia, 472
Lutherans in Germany, 27
Lutzk (see), 580
Luynes, De (cardinal), 458
Lyons, Council of (1245): papal infallibility, 351
Lyons, Council of (1274): the regalia, 330 f.
Lyons, Treaty of, 12
Lyons, Workmen's societies at, 169
Lwow: Armeno-Ruthenian seminary at, 582; See of, 583

Mabillon: deciphering of documents, 531; preface to edition of St. Augustine, 416 note Macao, 190
Macarius III (patriarch), 559
Macaulay on policy of James II, 300
Maccioni, Father: in Hanover, 276
Macedonia, 549, 555: and suppression of Jesuits, 468
Macerata (Papal States), 200
Machault (bishop of Amiens), diocesan charities, 542
Machiavelli, 63
Mâcon, Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, 525
Madagascar, Vincentian missioners in, 228
Madeleine of St. Joseph (Carmelite) and Father Berulle, 117
Maderna, Carlo: completion of St. Peter's, 32
Madrid: monastic poor relief in, 512; Nuncio driven from, 441; Treaty of, 36
Maffei, 454
Magasin charitable (periodical), 146
Magius (Jesuit) and Berulle, 117
Mahomet by Voltaire, 454
Maignelay, Marchioness of: St. Vincent and, 128
Maillard, Charles (papal legate): in China, 205
Maine (colony), Protestantism in, 221
Maintenon, Madame de, 279, 420
  Esteem for Madame Guyon, 425
  Huguenots and, 310
  Influence on Louis XIV, 354
  Repression of Huguenots, 309
  St. Cyran at house of, 423
  Wife of Louis XIV, 309
  Secret marriage to Louis XIV, 309
Mainz, Prince elector of, 28
Maisonfort, Jeanne Le Maistre de la, 420, 423
Maisonneuve (France), 223
Maistre, Joseph de: Saint-Martin and, 505
Major, Gregory (bishop), 577
Majorca, Jesuit college at, 71
Malabar Coast, 192, 568
Malacca, St. Francis Xavier at, 187
Malaval, François, 424: blind priest, 422; Ordination of, 424 note
Maldonatus, 245
Malebranche (Oratorian), 119, 231: Leibnitz and, 276
Malherbe, 306
Malissoles (bishop of Gap), 521
Malta: Defense of, 444; Pignatelli at, 271
Mamelukes, 217
Manchester, Count of, 293
Manchu dynasty in China, 203
Manse, Jeanne: in Montreal, 223
Manuale sacrarum caeremoniarum by Baudry, 243
Mar Hanna, Conversion of, 568
Marais, Godet des. See Godet
Marca, Pierre de (archbishop of Toulouse), 326: appointed archbishop, 326 note; author of the formulary, 405; De concordia sacerdotii et imperii, 322 f.
Marcellus II (pope), Robert de' Nobili relative of, 192
Marchand, James: Hortus pastorum, 238
Marchand, Peter: Tribunal sacramentale, 238
Marco de Sadis Cusani, 79
Mardin, 569: residence of Jacobite patriarchs, 567
Margaret of Lorraine, 339
Margaret of Valois, St. Vincent and, 126
Maria Amelia (daughter of Maria Theresa), 465
Maria Theresa (empress)
  "Apostolic Majesty," 460

Maria Theresa (continued)
Bishop Klein honored by, 576
"Catholic Majesty," 495
Character of, 494
Febronianism, 470, 495
Jesuits, 460
Partition of Poland, 470
The Serb Church, 577
Maria Vittoria (Blessed), founder, 79
Mariana, Juan (Jesuit), and regicide, 92
Marianna of Jesus (Blessed), 72
Marie de Gonzaga, and the Frequent Communion, 393
Marie de Medici, 35: Zamet at court of, 379
Marie Leczinska (queen), 463, 522
Marie Louise of Luxembourg, 157
Marie of the Incarnation, 71
Marignier, confessor at Port Royal, 483
Marillac, St. Louise de: founding of Sisters of Charity, 148
Marillac, Michel de, 159
Marmoutiers (monastery), Louis XIII at, 105
Maronite College (Rome), 564
Maronites, 564: Disturbances among, 455; Schism among, 441
Marot, Hymns of, 143
Marquemont (archbishop of Lyons), 98
Mars Gallicus by Jansen, 368
Marseilles: De Belzunce bishop, 521; galley convicts, 147; General Hospital, 161; Madame Guyon at, 424; Sisters of Mercy at, 152
Martin, Madeleine (founder), 152
Martini, anti-Christian professor, 496
Martinitz (governor of Prague), Death of, 29
Martyribus, Bartholomew a: pastoral theology, 238
Mary (Blessed Virgin): Devotion to, 40 f.; doctrine of Immaculate Conception, 41
Mary, Company of: Founding of, 536
Mary of Agreda, 75: advice to Philip IV, 75; The Mystical City of God by, 76
Mary of Jesus. See Mary of Agreda
Mary Stuart, wife of William of Orange, 301
Maryland (colony), Protestantism in, 221
Marzilla (Benedictine) and frequent Communion, 80 note
Mascaron (Oratorian), 119: Preaching of, 435
Masonry
Antecedents of, 503
In Austria, 507: influence on Joseph II, 496
Clement XII's warning, 509
Date of origin, 505
Deistic religion, 506
In England, 303, 504, 506: organization copied in army, 504; William III, 504
In France: and illuminism, 508; installation of Grand Orient, 507; meetings forbidden, 508; Voltaire, 508
General Constitutions of, 506
In Holland, 507
In Italy, 507
In Portugal, 507 f.
In Spain, 507 f.
Spread of, 449
In Sweden, 507
In Switzerland, 507
Mass: Mockery of the, 167; prohibited in Ireland, 302
Massachusetts (colony), Protestantism in, 221
Masillon, Jean Baptiste (Oratorian), 119: on misuse of churches, 172; Preaching of, 434
Master of Arts (Sorbonne), 234
Mathurin Regnier (poet), 126
Mattaincourt, 110: St. Peter Fourier at, 151
Matthew II (patriarch), 555
Matthew of Alexandria, 554
Matthias (emperor), 30, 83
Maubuisson (convent), 277, 279
Henry IV and, 374
Louis XIII and, 374 f.
Madame d'Estrée, abbess, 371
Mother Angélique, abbess, 371
Reform of, 374 f.
Reformed by Mother Angélique, 375
Maury, Father: Preaching of, 538
Maximilian (duke of Bavaria), 29: and Bohemian Protestants, 29; and German Catholics, 28; made elector Palatine, 34
Maxims of the Saints by Fénelon, 272, 431: condemned, 431; Contents of, 431; Errors of, 431
Maximus Hakim, 562

Maximus Mazloum, 563
Mazarin (cardinal), 388
  Cardinal de Retz and, 404
  Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 159, 177
  Council of Conscience formed by, 127
  The Huguenots and, 307
  Nicholas Cornet, 234
  Opposed to Cardinal Chigi, 256
  Opposition to Cardinal de Retz, 257
  Recalled to Rome, 47
  St. Vincent and, 147
Meaux (see), 416: made suffragan to Paris, 35
Mechitar (abbot), founder of Antonines, 570
Medici (family), Illustrious members of, 18
Medici, Alessandro de (Leo XI), 18
Medici, Marie de, 35
Meditation, St. Francis de Sales on, 101
Méditations sur l'Evangile by Bossuet, 241
Mekhitaristes (monks), 571
Melanchthon, 547: Augsburg Confession, 275; pietism, 283
Melchite Church, 564
Melchite patriarchate, 455
Melchites, 557, 559, 561
Meletius (patriarch of Jerusalem), 558
Meletius Karme (patriarch), 559
Meletius Pighas (patriarch of Alexandria), 548, 586
Meletius Syrigos (patriarch), exiled, 550
Meletius Zaim (patriarch), 559
Melk (monastery): Influence of, 84; project for congregation, 82 f.; Rule of, 82 f.
Memphis, Coptic council, 571
Mendelssohn, 287
Mendon (France), 223
Mercy, Order of: in Africa, 226; in Spain, 70
Mercy, Sisters of, 525: Founding of, 152
Mersenne, 143
Mésenguy, Exposition de la doctrine chrétienne, 461
Mesmes, 160
Mespelbrunn, Julius Echter von, 82
Methodists, founded by John Wesley, 286, 302
Metz, Debates at, 174
Mexico: Cortez in, 207; first bishop, 207; Jesuits in, 211, 221; Las Casas in, 207
Mézeray (historian), 122
Michael Cerularius, and baptism by infusion, 553
Michael Romanov (czar), 586
Michelangelo, 32, 230: Sapienza College designed by, 260
Micu, John Innocent (bishop), 575 f.
Middle Ages, Intellectual edifice of, 230
Miki, Paul (martyr), 198
Minerva (church, Rome), 268
Miracles, The (asylum, Paris), 161 note
Miramion, Madame de: and St. Vincent, 145
Missal, New edition of the, 15
Mission, Congregation of the: Papal approval of, 149
Missioners (in China), and bull Ex quo singulari, 206
Missions, Foreign. See Foreign Missions, Parish: in France, 149
Modon (monastery), 570
Moghilev (see), 584
Mogrobejo (Spain), 210
Mohammedans. See Moors
Mohawks (tribe), 222
Molanus (Protestant pastor): Leibnitz and, 277; and syncretism, 275
Moldavia, Church of, 573
Molina (Carthusian): Instruccion de Sacerdotes, 238; pastoral theology, 238
Molinism, Clement VIII and, 16 note
Molinists and Thomists, 10
Molinos, Miguel de
  Abjuration of, 268
  Admired by Innocent XI, 423 note
  Death of, 423 note
  Doctrine of, 423 ff.
  Errors of, 268
  Guide spirituelle, 423
  His doctrine condemned, 423
  Imprisonment of, 423 note
  At Rome, 421
Monasteries: closed by Joseph II, 497; Decline of, 105; number in France, 520; Reform of French, 106; Visitation of, 356
Monasteries, List of Athos, 579, 587
  Braunau, 495

Monasteries (continued)
Chaise-Dieu, 489
Charfe, 567, 570
Citeaux, 107, 376
Clairvaux, 107
Cluny, 108 note
Coulanges, 132
Deir-az-Zafaran, 567
Fulda, 83
Grottaferrata, 578
Holy Trinity, 581 f.
Jumièges, 341
Kreim, 569
La Régripière, 105 note
La Trappe, 110
Loyac, 159
Louvaise, 566
Marmoutier, 105
Melk, 82-84
Modon, 570
Motrena, 584
Rabban Hormizd, 568
St. Anthony of Qarqafe, 563
St. Cyran, 367
St. Etienne du Mont, 106
St. Gall, 181 note
St. John of Shuweir, 562
St. Maron, 564
St. Maur, 489
St. Remi, 151
St. Savior, 562
St. Stephen, 571
Salzburg, 83
Sept-Fons, 108 note
Solovetsk, 587
Monasticism: Decline of, 105; in Germany, 82
Monk (general), governor of Scotland, 296
Monmouth, Duke of: pretender, 299
Monophysites in Egypt, 556
Monothelitism in Syria, 564
Mons Bible, 416, 482
Montaigne: attitude to Catholicism, 88; modern Stoic, 250
Montauban, Seminary at, 134
Montcalm at Quebec, 225
Montenegro, 555
Montes pietatis, 459
Montespan, Madame de: her sister made abbess, 339
Montfaucon, 454
Montfort, Grignon de. See Grignon
Montfort-sur-Meu, birthplace of Grignon de Montfort, 536
Montmartre (church), Jesuit vows at, 183
Montmartre (faubourg), 161
Montmorency, Duke de, 161, 181
Montpellier: Colbert, bishop of, 489 f.
Montreal: Beginning of, 223 f.; Colonization of, 223; seminary established, 224
Moors: Dominicans martyred by, 226; expelled from Spain, 69, 74; Franciscans martyred by, 226; in North Africa, 226; in Valencia, 73
Moral theology. See Theology
Morales (Dominican missioner) and Chinese rites, 204
Moravian Brethren, 286
Morin, Jean (Oratorian), 119, 235, 237: Blois birthplace of, 237; Conversion of, 237; Exercitationes biblicae, 238
Moriscos in Spain, 73
Moscow: Adrian patriarch of, 588; Synod of (1667), 554
Mossul, George (patriarch), 567
"Most Faithful King," Title of, 454
Motrena (monastery), 584
Moyen court et facile pour faire l'oraison by Madame Guyon, 422 ff.
Mozambique: Missions in, 226; Portuguese colony, 227
Müller, Johann von: Febronianism rejected by, 494
Münster, Treaty of Westphalia, 62
Muhlfrauen, Monastery at, 518
Munkavz (see), 576
Murad IV (sultan), 36
Muratori, 454
Murom (see), 588
Muscovy. See Russia
Mustafa I (sultan), 35
Mystical City of God by Mary of Agreda, 76
Mystical theology, 232
Mysticism: of Johann Arndt, 283; Quietism and, 428

Nagasaki (Japan): Christian center, 195; Crucifixions at, 198
Nagy Varad (see), 576
Nairon, Faustus, 565
Names, Family (French), 125 note
Nancy, Sisters of St. Charles, 525

Nantes, Edict of, 9, 310
French Protestantism, 304
Huguenots exiled, 476
Louis XIV's interpretation of, 308
Revocation of, 308 f., 312 ff., 354
Richelieu's interpretation of, 307
Naples: appointment to benefices, 448; Atheists in, 513; and the Holy See, 492; number of clergy, 512
Nassau Siegen, Count von: Conversion of, 472
Nativity (church, Bethlehem), 551, 558
Navarre, 182
Navarre, College of, 233: Bossuet at, 344
Nectarius (patriarch), 551, 557
Neophytus (patriarch), 550
Neophytus VII (patriarch), 555
Neophytus Saqzi (patriarch), 560
Nepal, Buddhism in, 184
Nepotism
Alexander VIII, 270
Character of, 11
End of, 11 note
Innocent X, 66
Paul V, 32
Urban VIII, 47
Nervault, Pierre: on siege of La Rochelle, 306
Nestorians, missions in Asia, 568
Netherlands, devotion to St. Joseph, 40
Neustadt (Germany), 275
Neuville, Charles de: Preaching of, 537
New Catholics, Fénelon, superior of the, 426
New France. See Canada
New Hampshire (colony), Protestantism in, 221
New Haven, Protestantism in colonial, 221
New Plymouth, Protestantism in, 221
Nicholas II (pope): and papal elections, 37; right of exclusive, 443
Nicholas III (pope), building corporations, 504
Nicholas of Cusa, astronomy, 48
Nicholas of Hontheim. See Febronius
Nicole, Pierre (Jansenist), 178, 491
Body of, 487
Book on the Eucharist, 415
Essais de morale, 416
Jansenist, 428
The "little schools," 395
Nikitich, Philaret (patriarch), 553
Nikon (patriarch), 560, 587
Nivelle, Peter de (abbot), 107, 376
Noachites (i.e., Masons), 506
Noailles, Count de: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 160
Noailles, Louis Antoine
Archbishop of Paris, 482
Bishop of Châlons, 482
The Frequent Communion approved by, 418
Inconstancy of, 487
Investigation of Madame Guyon, 427
Huguenots and, 476
Jesuits' faculties withdrawn, 488
Port Royal nuns, 484
Port Royal nuns excommunicated, 485
Réflections morales, 488
Unigenitus accepted, 446, 489
Nobili, Robert de' (missioner), 192 f.: Death of, 194; Method of, 193 f.
Nobility, Growing power of the, 258
Nobility of the robe, 370
Noble Widows of Dole, confirmed by Innocent X, 60
Nobunaga, Japanese Church under, 196
Nointel, Marquis of, 551
Nolay, Hilarion de, 140
Nonconformists under Charles II, 297
Nonnotte, Claude (Jesuit), 533: Dictionnaire philosophique de la religion, 533; L'esprit de Voltaire, 533; refutation of Voltaire, 519
Non-residence, Penalties for, 20
Non-residence of cardinals, 21
Non-resident clerics, Council of Trent on, 20
Noris, accused of Baianism, 455
Normandy: Father Lejeune in, 152; Montreal colonists, 223 f.; St. John Eudes in, 149 f.
North America
Colonized by Protestants, 206
Discoveries, 221
Dutch colonization in, 221
English colonization of, 221
French colonization of, 221
The missions in, 220
Notre Dame (cathedral, Paris), 234: Vegetable merchants at, 172
Notre Dame, Congregation of, 339: founded in Montreal, 224; Founding of, 151

Notre Dame, Daughters of: Foundation of, 110
Notre Dame des Victoires (church), 306
Notre Dame of Loreto, Olier's visit to, 135
Nouet, Jacques (Jesuit): attack on the Frequent Communion, 396; Homme d'oraison, 396 note
Nouvelle héresie des jésuites by Arnauld, 326
Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, Jansenist paper, 490
Novaes on election of Innocent XIII, 445
Noyon, Seminary at, 134

Oates, Titus: and the "Popish Plot," 298
Oath of Supremacy, 25
Observance of Melk, Approval of, 83
Ochsenfurt (in Franconia), 83
Odescalchi, Benedetto (Innocent XI), 266
Old Regime. See Ancient regime
Olier, Jean Jacques, 104, 134, 398
  Appearance of, 135
  Benefices held by, 135
  Catechism at St. Sulpice, 154
  Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 155, 177
  Director of Caulet, 333
  Doctrine of spiritual life, 242
  And dueling, 162
  Esteem for Bishop Zamet, 379
  His program at St. Sulpice, 153
  Holiness of the priesthood, 240
  And Jansenism, 398
  Jansenism opposed by, 399
  Jansenism repudiated by, 397
  Mother Agnes, 136
  Pastor of St. Sulpice, 139, 153
  On priesthood of Christ, 242
  Regard for the pope, 140
  Retreat at St. Lazare, 136
  St. Vincent confessor of, 136
  Traité des saints ordres, 241
  At Tuesday conferences, 132
  At Vaugirard, 138
  Vision of, 136
  Worldly life of, 135
Olimpia Madalchini, sister-in-law of Innocent X, 66
Oliva, Gian Paolo (Jesuit general), 67: confidant of Alexander VII, 259
Olivares, Duke (Spanish minister), 44, 69, 74
Omura (Japan), Christian center, 195 f.
Optatus Gallus by Rabardeau, 323
Oratorians: ascetical theology, 232; bull Unigenitus, 489; Colleges of the, 119; established in France, 308 note; ordination retreats, 131
Oratory, The, 116
  Activities of, 119
  Approval of, 78, 118
  Founding of, 118
  And Scholasticism, 529
  Spread of, 119
Oratory of the Oriental rite, 578
Orbitello, Passionist mission in, 515
Orcades (the Irish), Missions in, 181
Orders, Religious. See Religious orders
Ordinances of Blois (1579), 114
Ordinances of Paris (1624), 114
Ordination retreats, 129-31: by Oratorians, 131
Orfa (Edessa), 569
Orient: Influence of France in the, 36; Missions of the, 39
Origen, Hexapla, 245
Original sin: Baius on, 360; Jansen on, 386 note
Original Writings of Masonry, 506
Orléans: birthplace of Petau, 236; General Hospital, 161
Orléans, Duchess of: and Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 178; and convent of Charonne, 339
Orléans, Duke of (regent), 444: bull Unigenitus, 489
Orléans, See of: made suffragan to Paris, 35
Ormesson, Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177
Orontes (river), 564
Orsini, Pietro (Benedict XIII), 445: bishop of Benevento, 445
Orthodox Church: the canon of the Bible, 552; clergy in Protestant universities, 552; Theologians of, 552; validity of heretical baptism, 553
Osiander on Arndt, 283
Oslabsky, Manuel (bishop), 576
Osman II (sultan), Assassination of, 35
Osnabrück, Treaty of Westphalia, 62
Ossat, Arnaud d': and Clement VIII, 13

Ottoboni, Pietro (Alexander VIII), 256, 268
Ottoman Empire, 555: Weakening of, 12
Ottomans, Syria conquered by, 559
Our Lady of Mercy (nuns), 72
Ouse River (England), 289
Oxford University, Cromwell and, 293

Pacifique (Capuchin), friend of Berulle, 117
Padua (see), 458
Paez, Father: missioner in Ethiopia, 228
Paisee II, 557
Palatine, Princess: and Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 178
Palermo, Albanian seminary at, 578
Pallavicino, Pietro Sforza (cardinal), 402: on election of Alexander VII, 254; History of the Council of Trent, 260
Pallu and the Frequent Communion, 393
Palma Gayet (historian), 126
Pamiers (see), 332, 413: Caulet bishop, 332 f., 413; Chapter of, 333; Religious conditions in, 333
Pamplona (in Navarre), 182
Pandara-Swamis missioners, 194
Pantheon (Rome), 61
Paolucci (cardinal), Austria's exclusive, 443
Papacy (see also Popes)
  (1600–55), 8-67
  (1655–1700), 255-72
  (1700–74), 440-71
  Authority of the, 492
  Indefectibility of the, 347
  Opposition of Gallicanism, 319
Papal authority, Assembly of the Clergy and, 347
Papal bulls. See Bulls
Papal elections
  Austria's interference, 443
  France's interference, 443
  Gregory XV's constitution, 37
  Imperial placet, 37
  Modes of, 38
  Spain's interference, 443
Papal States: Administration of, 447; Invasion of, 448; Sicily detached from, 441
Paraguay: Jesuits in, 207, 211, 216; The reductions of, 217 f.
Paray-le-Monial (convent), apparition of Sacred Heart, 462
Pariahs, 191
Paris
  Attractions to foreigners, 502
  Duvergier at, 367
  The General Hospital, 160 f.
  House of the Blessed Sacrament, 379
  Illustrious bishops of, 35
  Jansen in, 364
  Leibnitz at, 276
  Made metropolitan see, 35
  Ordinances of (1624), 114
  St. Francis de Sales in, 91
  St. Vincent in, 147
  Sisters of Mercy at, 152
  Suffragan sees of, 35
  Treaty of (1763), 225
Pâris (deacon): Jansenist, 491; Scenes at grave of, 491
Paris Foreign Mission Society: missioners' arrival in Canada, 225; missioners' arrival in China, 204
Paris Polyglot by Le Jay, 246
Paris University
  Decline of, 94
  Faculty of Theology of, 328, 361
  Gallicanism, 324
  Jean Morin at, 237
  Privileges of, 532
  Rise of, 233
  St. Francis Xavier at, 182
Parish church, center of life, 544
Parish missions in France, 149
Parliament (England), 475: Cromwell's purge of, 292; war against Charles I, 289
Parliament (Paris), 162
  Banishment of the Jesuits, 92
  Billets de confession, 497
  Bull Vineam Domini, 483
  Charges against Cistercians, 377
  Complaint to Louis XIV, 351
  Declaration of abuse, 340
  And Faculty of Theology, 328
  Gallicanism, 324, 337
  Gallicanism defended by, 321
  Independence toward the pope, 490
  Jansenism, 407
  The Jansenist propositions, 401
  Louis XV versus the, 498
  Papal infallibility, 352
  Religious questions, 320

Parliament (continued)
Sorbonne versus the, 329
Suppression of Jesuits, 459
The Unigenitus, 498
Unigenitus registered, 488
Parliament (Grenoble), penalties against Huguenots, 479
Parliament (Provence), 545
Parliament (Toulouse), decision overruled, 480
Parliaments (France), 258: and the bishops, 350
Parma (duchy): ceded to Don Carlos, 444; and the Holy See, 465, 492
Parthenius (patriarch), 57, 550, 554
Pascal, Blaise, 407
Apologetics, 535
Conversion of, 409
In Paris, 409
The Provincial Letters, 408-12
Remains of, 487
Youth of, 409
Pascal, Etienne: father of Blaise Pascal, 409
Pascal, Jacqueline: Death of, 416 note
Passionists: Approval of, 470; Founding of, 515
Pastoral theology, 232, 238
Pastoralis officii (bull), 489
Pastoralis romani pontificis vigilantia (bull), 48 note
Pataky, John (bishop), 575
Patin, Guy: and Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 179
Patriarchate of France, Project of, 323
Patriarchate of the South, 556
Patristic theology, 232
Patrology, Study of, 495
Pau (France), 322
Paul III (pope): Latin American sees, 207; and St. Francis Xavier, 183
Paul IV (pope), Church of Ethiopia, 572
Paul V (pope), 18
Approval of Daughters of Notre Dame, 110
Bohemian rebellion, 30
Canonizations by, 31, 78
Character of, 19
Completion of St. Peter's, 32
Conflict with Venice, 22
Death of, 32
Economic measures, 31
Election of, 18 f.
Paul V (continued)
Enforcement of clerical residence, 21
English oath of supremacy, 26
The French Oratory approved, 118
Galileo and, 49
Law enforcement, 31
Mother Angélique pardoned by, 373
Nepotism of, 32
Oratorians in Rome, 119
The Oratory approved, 78
Passion for splendor, 32
Promotion of catechetics, 31
Questions of grace, 386
Reform efforts, 30
Rome adorned by, 31
St. Vincent and, 126
Vatican Library enriched by, 31
Paul of the Cross, St., 515: Passionists founded by, 464, 515
Paul of Holy Faith, convert of St. Francis Xavier, 187
Pavillon, Nicholas (bishop of Alet), 132, 331, 413: and Bishop Caulet, 334; Death of, 335; his seminary, 332; on infallibility, 414
Peace of Augsburg, 27, 46
Pébroc (abbey), 135
Peking: Catholic Church in, 203; Father Schall in, 203; Father Ricci in, 201; Nestorians in, 568
Pellisson: Conversion of, 309; correspondence with Leibnitz, 278; repression of Huguenots, 309, 311
Pelmenand, Father: in Canada, 225
Peloponnesus, 557, 570
Penitent Daughters of Paris, 375
Penitents of Third Order of St. Francis, Reform of, 108 note
Perche (province), 109
Péréfixe, Hardouin de Beaumont de (archbishop of Paris), 383, 413: comment on Port Royal nuns, 377; and submission of the Jansenists, 413; tutor of the Dauphin, 383
Pereira and St. Francis Xavier, 190
Peremyshl (see), 583
Périer, miracle of the holy thorn, 411
Périgueux, General Hospital at, 161
Pérot (Jesuit), his book on the Index, 260
Perraud (cardinal), L'Oratoire de France au XVII^e siècle, 117 note
Perrochel (bishop of Boulogne), 132

Peru: The Church in, 210; Jesuits in, 211; St. Rose in, 207; St. Turibius in, 207; Spanish scandals in, 210
Petau, Denis (theologian), 235
De doctrina temporum, 236
De la pénitence publique, 396
Death of, 237
Dogmata theologica, 236 f.
Positive theology, 531
Petavius. See Petau
Peter Canisius, St.: missioner, 80; missions in Germany, 181 note
Peter Claver, St.: apostle of the Negroes, 70 f.
Peter Fourier, St. (missioner), 110, 151
Peter Lombard, 232: Book of Sentences, 232
Peter of the Mother of God (Carmelite), 71
Peter the Great (czar): Civil reforms of, 587; Lefort tutor of, 552; Persecutions by, 584; Religious influence of, 552
Petitière, De la: Port Royal hermit, 381
Petrus Aurelius, pen name of St. Cyran, 368
Phanar, The, 573
Phanariotes, The, 561, 574
Philaret Nikitich (patriarch), 553
Philaret Romanov (patriarch), 586
Philip II (of Spain): Las Casas and, 208; Louvain University endowed by, 358; and Polyglot of Antwerp, 246; Turibius made archbishop of Lima, 210
Philip III (of Spain)
Death of, 69 note
Effort to encourage agriculture, 69
Expulsion of Moors, 74
And Ferdinand II, 30
Rule of, 69
Treaty of Madrid, 36
Philip IV (of Spain): conflicts with the Holy See, 77 note; Death of, 76; decline of Spain, 74; Rule of, 69
Philip V (of Spain): meddling in Church affairs, 448; regime of intendants, 511
Philip Neri, St. (founder), 77
Beatification of, 31
Biographies of, 78
Canonization of, 40
Clement VIII friend of, 11
Philip Neri, St. (continued)
Form of the Oratory, 117 note
And frequent Communion, 80
Veneration for, 78
Philip of Champagne (painter), 364
Philip of Orléans (regent), 488: attitude to Huguenots, 478
Philometi labores juveniles by Alexander VII, 260
"Philosophers," The, 500 f.: The influence of, 502
"Philosophical sin," Doctrine of, 269
Philosophy: of Descartes, 231, 499; of Locke, 500
Photius on baptism by infusion, 553
Pia desideria by Spener, 285
Piacenza (duchy) ceded to Don Carlos, 444
Piauhy, Vieira and cannibals of, 214
Picardy, 325: Father Lejeune in, 152; St. Vincent's work in, 147; Suffering in, 160
Piccinardi, Execution of, 20
Pichon, Esprit de Jésus-Christ et de l'Eglise sur la fréquent communion, 455
Picoté (Sulpician), 406
Pietism
In America, 286
Decline of, 285
In Germany, 282
In Greenland, 286
In Labrador, 286
Methodists, 286
Moravian Brethren, 286
Spener apostle of, 275, 285
Piety, 538
Pighas, Meletius (patriarch), 548
Pignatelli, Antonio (Innocent XII), 271
Pinzon, Martin: advice to Columbus, 220
Pious Missioners, approval of the, 40
Pithou, Pierre: Libertés de l'Eglise gallicane, 325
Pithou, Code of, 350
Pius II (pope) and Polish Church, 585
Pius IV (pope) and Coptic Church, 571
Pius V, St. (pope), 73, 248: bull Ex omnibus, 362; propositions of Baius condemned, 362
Pius VI (pope): and Baius, 361; Febronianism condemned, 494; and the Serb Church, 577

Pius X (pope), The Austrian exclusive at election of, 443 note
Pius XI (pope), St. Alphonsus proclaimed doctor, 514
Place de Gréve (Paris), 320
Plessis, Roger du (Jansenist), 405
Plessis-Guénégaud, Countess du (Jansenist), 403
Plessis-Montbart, 161, 177
Pociej, Hypace (bishop), 580
Poitiers, Duvergier at, 367, 369
Poitou (France), 310, 337: Huguenot meetings in, 478
Poland
  Bartholomites in, 85
  Defense against Turks, 265
  Greek bishops in, 448
  Independence of the nobility, 258
  Jesuits in, 580
  League against, 457
  Nationalities in, 580
  Partition of, 470, 584
  Russian Empire and, 579
  Theatines in, 582
Polemical theology, 232
Polish succession, War of the, 448
Polotsk (see), 583
Polyglot Bibles, 530
  Alcalá, 246
  Antwerp, 246
  Le Jay's, 564
  London, 244
  Paris, 244
Pombal, Marquis de (Portuguese minister), 455, 519: Jesuits imprisoned by, 459
Pomerania, Gustavus Adolphus in, 46
Pompadour, Madame de: Influence of, 502; Jesuits and, 459
Pompignan, Lefranc de, 534
Pomponne, Marquis de: Port Royal and, 486
Poncet, Conversion of, 90
Pons, Father de: at death of St. Cyran, 389
Pont-à-Mousson, 269
Pontifical, The: New edition of, 15
Pontine marshes, Draining of, 453
Pontoise, Convent at, 142
Poor, St. Vincent on serving the, 144
Poor Clerks of the Mother of God, 79
Pope, temporal power of the, 320
Popes. See Papacy
Popes, election of. See Papal elections
Popes, List of Clement VIII (1592–1605), 11
  Leo XI (1605), 17
  Paul V (1605–21), 18
  Gregory XV (1621–23), 33
  Urban VIII (1623–44), 41
  Innocent X (1644–55), 59
  Alexander VII (1655–67), 255
  Clement IX (1667–69), 261
  Clement X (1670–76), 263
  Innocent XI (1676–89), 265
  Alexander VIII (1689–91), 269
  Innocent XII (1691–1700), 271
  Clement XI (1700–21), 440
  Innocent XIII (1721–24), 442
  Benedict XIII (1724–30), 445
  Clement XII (1730–40), 447
  Benedict XIV (1740–58), 451
  Clement XIII (1758–69), 457
  Clement XIV (1769–74), 464
"Popish Plot," 298
Port Royal (Canada), 225
Port Royal (convent, France), 175, 485
  Archbishop Noailles, 484
  Austerity at, 373
  Bishop Pavillon, 332
  Buildings demolished, 486
  Bull Vineam Domini, 484
  Center of Jansenism, 383
  Day of the Grille, 372 f.
  Great ladies attached to, 403
  Hermits of, 403
  Jurisdiction of Citeaux, 107
  Laxity at, 371
  The "little schools," 381, 394, 528
  Miracle of the holy thorn, 411
  Mother Angélique abbess, 371
  Mother Genevieve abbess, 377
  Opinion alienated from, 397
  Reform of, 372 ff.
  Rodriguez' book favored by, 70
  St. Cyran and, 377
  St. Cyran's power at, 380
Port Royal des Champs (convent), 142, 378, 395
  Bull Vineam Domini, 483
  Dispersion of the nuns, 485 f.
  Louis XIV and, 484
  Nuns excommunicated, 485
  And Port Royal of Paris, 485
Port Royal nuns: condemnation of the five propositions, 414; Pride of, 413

Port Royal of Paris (convent): Foundation of, 376; and Port Royal des Champs, 485
Porta del Popolo, decorated by Bernini, 260
Portieux, Daughters of Providence, 525
"Portion congrue," The, 523
Portugal
  Febronianism, 494
  Masonry in, 507 f.
  "Most Faithful King," title, 454
  Report on Jesuits in, 455 note
  Treaty with Cromwell, 295
  Urban VIII and, 47
Portuguese: in China, 190; colonists in America, 206; in India, 184
Positive theology. See Theology
Possevinus, Antonius: in Sweden, 548
Potages économiques, 146
Potier (bishop of Beauvais), St. Vincent and, 130
Potsiey (bishop), 582
Potterie, Father de la: and the holy thorn, 410
Poulle, Father: Preaching of, 537
Pouy, birthplace of St. Vincent, 125
Practice of Christian and Religious Perfection by Rodriguez, 70
Pradel (bishop of Montpellier), Charities of, 542
Prado, John de (martyr), 226
Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, 350
Prague, Defenestration of, 29
Pranguis (pariahs), 191
Pratique du tribunal de la pénitence by Renaud, 238
Preachers, Order of. See Dominicans
Preaching, 536: under Innocent X, 60
Predestination, Benedict XIII and question of, 445
Préjugés légitimes, 416
Premonstratensians, 518: reformed by De la Ruelle, 108 note
Presbyterians, Cromwell and, 293-95
Pressy (bishop of Boulogne), 541
Priesthood: Idea of the, 240; Reform of the, 172
Priests, Houses for retired, 85
Prisoners, Treatment of, 170
Problème ecclésiastique, 482
Profession de foi du vicaire savoyard, 500
Prokopovitch, Theophane (bishop), 552, 588
Propaganda College (Rome), 571, 575: Founding of, 57
Propaganda, Congregation of, 37: on Caen seminary, 124; on Chinese rites, 204; developed by Urban VIII, 39; established by Gregory XV, 39
Protestant Union, The, 28
Protestantism (seventeenth century), 273-316
  In Bohemia, 29
  Bossuet and, 345
  Break-up of, 273
  In England, 8, 287, 474
  In France, 87, 304, 476. See also Huguenots
  In Germany, 8, 273, 472
  Gustavus Adolphus, 46
  In North America, 221
  In Switzerland, 8
Protestants, North America colonized by, 206
Protestants in France, Treatment of, 475
Provence (France), 151: Father Lejeune in, 152; Parliament of, 545
Providas (bull), 456, 509
Providence, Daughters of, 151, 525
Providence, Sisters of, 525
Provincial Letters by Pascal, 408-12: Condemnation of, 412 f.; Occasion of, 409
Prussia: Lutheran consistories, 472; made into a kingdom, 441; Rationalism in, 472; recognized as kingdom, 454; Rise of, 448
Pskov (see), 588
Ptolemy, Astronomical system of, 48
Puerto Rico: Discovery of, 207; first bishops, 207
Puritanism in England, 287
Puritans, 292: Independent, 293
Puritans of Scotland, American colonists, 206
Pussort on royal absolutism, 325

Quakers, founded by Fox, 302
Quebec, Seminary at, 225
Quercy (France), 305
Quesnel, Pasquier (Jansenist), 417
  Antoine Arnauld and, 417
  Biographer of Arnauld, 407
  Bull Vineam Domini, 484
  In Holland, 499
  Jansenist leader, 417 ff.

Quesnel (continued)
Propositions condemned, 488
Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament, 417, 482: Attitude of Noailles to, 488
In refuge, 484
Questions diverses sur l'Incrédulité by Lefranc, 534
Queyrot (Jesuit), 560
Quietism, 420-38: Condemnation of, 268, 429; Errors of, 429. See also Guyon

Rabardeau, Michel (Jesuit): Optatus Gallus, 323; Question s'il est meilleur de communier souvent que rarement, 392
Rabban Hormizd (monastery), 568
Racine: Body of, 486 f.; Histoire de Port Royal, 394; influenced by Antoine Le Maître, 381; Tragedies of, 432
Racines grecques by Lancelot, 381
Ragon, philosophy of Freemasonry, 506
Rainaldi, continuator of Baronius, 247
Rambouillet, Madame, 150
Ramnad (India), 195
Rancé, John de (abbot), 104: Bossuet on, 343; Conversion of, 108; reform of La Trappe, 108
Raphael (painter), 230
Rapin (bishop), 335: on Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 157; Mémoires, 159
Rappolstein, Count von, 284
Rappoltsweiler (Alsace), birthplace of Spener, 284
Raskolniki, The, 587
Ratio studiorum, 80
Ratisbon, Monastic assemblies at, 83
Raustenstrauch (abbot), Febronianism, 495
Ravenna, Maronite college at, 564
Recollects: and Canadian missions, 181; expelled from Canada, 225
Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France, 531
Rednik, Athanasius (bishop), 576
Reductions of Paraguay, 217 f.
Referendarius, 269
Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament by Quesnel, 417, 482: attitude of Noailles, 488
Reform, Clerical: in France, 105-40; St. Francis de Sales and, 98
Reform efforts: by Gregory XV, 37; by Paul V, 30
Reformed Protestants of Holland, American colonists, 206
Reformers, The Protestant: and St. Cyran compared, 382
Réfutation du système du P. Malebranche by Fénelon, 426
Refutation of the Catechism of Paul Ferry by Bossuet, 344
Regalia, The, 330
Archbishop Harlay, 342
Bishop Caulet, 334 f.
Extension of the, 330
Louis XIV, 331, 334 ff.
Meaning of, 330
The spiritual, 330, 347
The temporal, 330, 347
Regensburg. See Ratisbon
Regiminis apostolici (constitution), 413
Regis, St. Francis: missioner, 149
Regnier, Mathurin (poet), 126
Reims: birthplace of St. John Baptist de la Salle, 525; See of, 476
Reiner von Landau (abbot), 83
Religion vengée de l'Incrédulité by Lefranc, 534
Religious: faculties for confessions, 264; regulation of preaching, 264
Religious (exempt) in France, 264
Religious equality, Principle of, 64
Religious instruction, 79
Religious orders: approved by Gregory XV, 40; New, 110; opposition to Louis XIV, 351; in Spain, 71
Religious orders, congregations, and institutes (list of) Armenian Antonines, 569
Bartholomites, 82, 85
Capuchins, 22, 80, 227, 566
Carmelites, 70 f., 231 ff., 470
Charity, Daughters of, 149
Charity, Ladies of, 128, 145, 147
Charity, Sisters of, 147 f., 152
Christian Doctrine, Fathers of, 425
Christian Schools, Brothers of the, 527 f., 308
Clerks Regular Ministering to the Sick, 78
Clerks Regular of Christian Doctrine, 60 note
Clerks Regular of the Pious Schools, 40, 79

Religious orders (continued)
Congregation of Christian Doctrine, 79
Congregation of the Mission, 57, 149
Dominicans, 207 ff., 226 f.
Feuillants, 108 note
Foreign Missions, Society of (Paris), 179
Franciscans, 210, 221, 226
Good Jesus of Ravenna, 60
Good Shepherd, Congregation of, 150
Holy Ghost, Order of, 341
Holy Ghost, Sisters of, 525
Hospitallers of St. John of God, 78
Jesuitesses, 57
Jesuits. See Jesuits
Jesus and Mary, Society of, 123
Lazarists. See Vincentians
Mary, Company of, 536
Mercy, Order of, 70, 226
Mercy, Sisters of, 152, 525
Mission, Congregation of the. See Vincentians
Noble Widows of Dole, 60
Notre Dame, Congregation of, 151, 224, 339
Notre Dame, Daughters of, 110
Oratorians, 116, 118, 131, 308 note
Oratory of the Oriental rite, 578
Order of Preachers. See Dominicans
Our Lady of Mercy, 72
Passionists, 470, 515
Penitent Daughters, 375
Penitents of Third Order of St. Francis, 108 note
Pious Missioners, 40
Poor Clerks of the Mother of God, 79
Preachers, Order of. See Dominicans
Premonstratentians, 518
Priests of the Mission. See Vincentians
Providence, Daughters of, 161, 525
Providence, Sisters of, 525
Recollects, 181
St. Basil of the Armenians, 60
St. Charles, Sisters of, 525
St. Elias, 71
St. Maur, 40
Secular Priests of Christian Doctrine, 60
Somaschi, 60
Sulpicians, 138, 308 note
Theatines, 22, 582
Trappists, 108, 308 note
Trinitarians, 226
Religious orders (continued)
Ursulines, 80, 110
Vatelottes, 525
Vincentians, 129, 149, 308
Visitation, 42, 96 f.
Wisdom, Daughters of, 536
Wisdom, Sisters of, 525
Remiremont, jurisdiction of abbess, 337
Renaissance, The Catholic, 3 ff.: in Spain, 68
Renaud (Jesuit): pastoral theology, 238; Pratique du tribunal de la pénitence, 238
Renaudot, book on the Eucharist, 415
René Goupil, Martyrdom of, 222
Renty, Baron de, 166: and dueling, 162
Resolutiones morales by Diana, 239
"Respectful silence," Question of the, 482
Retreats for ordinands, 129-31: at St. Lazare, 131; and the Vincentians, 128
Retz, Cardinal de, 367
Archbishop of Paris, 257
Friend of the Jansenists, 404
Imprisonment of, 403
Louis XIII and, 105
Mazarin and, 404
Mazarin's opposition to, 257
St. Vincent tutor of, 126
Vocation of, 113
Revival, the Catholic, 3 ff.
Rezzonico (Clement XIII), 458
Rheims. See Reims
Rhode Island (colony), Protestantism in, 221
Rhodes, 549
Ri, birthplace of St. John Eudes, 122
Rians (France), 152
Riazan (see), 585
Ribandeneira (hagiographer), 248: hagiographical work, 234
Ribera, Juan de, 73
Ricci, Matteo (missioner), 197, 200
Apostolic method of, 202
Death of, 203
Chinese rites permitted by, 203
Euclid translated into Chinese, 201
At Peking, 201
Studies in natural sciences, 200
The True Idea of God, 202
Ricci, Scipio, 563
Richelieu (cardinal)
Arrest of St. Cyran, 383

Richelieu (continued)
Cluny reformed by, 108 note
Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 159
Condemnation of the Augustinus requested, 387
Death of, 387
Dislike for St. Cyran, 368
European equilibrium, 63
Gallicanism, 319 f.
On Huguenot peril, 305
Huguenots and, 307
Inquiry into Jansenist party, 383
Limitation of the Church, 322
Made cardinal, 35
The Mars Gallicus, 368
Nicholas Cornet and, 234
Offer to first Sulpicians, 139
Opposition to Habsburgs, 44
Program of, 44
Project of French patriarchate, 323
On qualities of a bishop, 115
Reform of the Carmelites, 105 note
Religious policy, 319
Richer's doctrines opposed by, 45
And seminaries, 133
Seminary at Caen, 123
Taking of La Rochelle, 306
Urban VIII and, 45, 47
View of political justice, 63 note
Warned against St. Cyran, 369
Won to St. Cyran, 368
Richer, Edmond, 234
Career of, 318 note
De la puissance ecclésiastique et politique, 318 note
Gallicanism, 321
Presbyterian Gallicanism, 318
Retraction of, 321 and note
Richelieu opposed to doctrines of, 45
Righet, Matthew (bishop), 572
Rio di Janeiro, Anchieta at, 212
Rites, The Chinese, 204
Rivera, Count de: on Benedict XIV, 457
Rivera, Diego de (bishop of Barbasto), 512
Rivet, Histoire littéraire de la France, 531
Robert, Claude: Gallia christiana, 248
Rodez (see), Abelly bishop, 132
Rodriguez, Alonzo, 70: Practice of Christian and Religious Perfection, 70
Rohan, Anne de (Jansenist), 403
Rohan, Duke de, 305
Rohan-Guémené, Princess: case of conscience, 392
Rollin, Charles, 533: Traité des études, 528
Roma soterranea by Bosio, 247
Roman Campagna, Insecurity in the, 30
Roman College, 197: inspection ordered, 467
Roman law: in German jurisprudence, 274; in Germany, 81
Romanov, Michael (czar), 586
Romanov, Philaret (patriarch), 586
Rome
Alexander VII adorns, 260
Aristocratic government of, 258
Completion of St. Peter's, 32
Famine of 1649, 59
Farnese quarter, 353
Hofbauer at, 518
Innocent X adorns, 60 f.
Monthly lottery, 447 note
Oratorians in, 119
Paul V adorns, 31
St. Benedict Labre at, 545
St. Louis of the French (church), 119
St. Vincent at, 126
Rosary of the Blessed Sacrament, 374
Rose of Lima, St., 207, 210
Rosella, Isabel: founder of the Jesuitesses, 57
Rospigliosi (cardinal): under Alexander VII, 259; becomes Clement IX, 261
Rosweyde, Heribert: project of the Acta sanctorum, 249
Rota, The, 458
Rouen, 94: the Augustinus, 385; Father Lejeune at, 152; Harlay archbishop of, 341; Seminary founded at, 123
Roumania. See Rumania
Rousseau: appealed to by Huguenots, 479; Contrat social, 500; Emile, 461, 529; Naturalism of, 88; Profession de foi du vicaire savoyard, 500
Royas, Christopher (bishop of Neustadt), 275
Rubens (painter), devotion to the Church, 230
Rudolf II (emperor), 83: and Bohemian Protestants, 29; Character of, 9; and city of Donauwörth, 28; Problems of, 9

Rueil, Château de, 139
Ruggieri, Michael (missioner): at Peking, 201
Rumania: Conversion of, 573; Holy Synod of, 552; Jesuits in, 574; under patriarch of Constantinople, 555
Rumanian (language), Liturgy in, 574
Rumanian Union, 575
Rumanians, The, 573; in Austrian Empire, 574; Calvinism among, 574; Jesuits among the, 576 f.
Russia, 556
  Frederick Augustus helped by, 441
  Georgia incorporated into, 579
  Greek bishops in Poland, 448
  Jesuits find refuge in, 469
  Mongol invasion, 585
  Pietism in, 286
  Poland and, 579
  Rebaptism in, 553
Russian Church, 585: Holy Synod, 552; Jansenism and, 490
Ruthenia, 556: Cyril Lukaris in, 548
Ruthenian Church, 557, 579: Rights of the, 15
Ruthenians, Attitude of Poles to, 581
Rutsky, Benjamin, 582
Ryazan (see), 588

Sabas, St.: bishop of Serbs, 573
Sablé, Marquis of: retreat at Port Royal, 374
Sablé, Marquise of, 416: case of conscience, 392
Saci, De, 390: Body of, 487; at Madame Arnauld's deathbed, 391
Sacraments to the dying, 497
Sacred Heart: apparition at Paray-le-Monial, 462; Devotion to the, 462
Sacred Heart, Feast of the, 463
Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, Devotion to, 150
"Sacristan emperor" (Joseph II), 519
Saddle makers, Union of, 167
Sadis Cusani, Marco de, 79
Saifi, Euthymius, 560, 562
Saint-Alby, Sirven case, 480 f.
Saint-Amour, Louis de: and examination of Jansenism, 401; at Rome, 402
St. Anthony of Qarqafe (monastery), 563
St. Athanasius (church, Rome), 578
St. Basil of the Armenians (congregation), abolished, 60
St. Benedict of Ullano, Seminary at, 578
Saint-Brieue, Sisters of the Holy Ghost, 525
St. Catherine of Langeac (convent), 136
St. Charles, Sisters of, 525
Saint Cyr (France), 279, 427
St. Cyran (abbey), Duvergier becomes abbot, 367
St. Cyran (i.e., Duvergier)
  Adversaries of, 368 f.
  Arnauld d'Andilly and, 369, 378
  Arrest of, 383
  Attitude to the Church, 175
  On attrition, 384 note
  On the Augustinus, 385
  Bayonne birthplace of, 365
  Body of, 487
  Director of Port Royal nuns, 380
  Doctrine of, 382
  House of the Blessed Sacrament, 379
  Jansenists and, 175
  Last days of, 389
  Letter from Jansen, 378
  Letters, 334, 482
  Liberation of, 388
  Meeting with Madame Guyon, 423
  Mother Agnes, 378
  Mother Angélique, 378
  At Poitiers, 369
  Port Royal and, 377
  And Reformers compared, 382
  Richelieu's dislike of, 368
  St. Vincent and, 368
  Secret Rosary approved by, 378
  Spiritual director, 392
  Tactics of, 382
  Visit to Mother Agnes, 378
St. Denis (convent), 546
St. Elias, Congregation of, 71
St. Etienne du Mont (church), 487, 497 f.
St. Etienne du Mont (monastery), reform of, 106
St. Gall (abbey), 181 note
St. Genevieve (church, Paris), 234
St. George (church, Venice), 460
St. George River, 225
St. Germain (faubourg), 126, 139, 143: Evil conditions in, 153; Huguenot academy in, 175; Jansenism in, 398

St. Germain-des-Prés (abbey), 140: Reform of, 135
St. Germain-en-Laye, James II at, 302
St. Gilles (Jansenist), 397
St. Jacques (church, Paris), 389 note
St. Jacques (faubourg): Carmelites of, 418; St. Cyran's lodgings, 388
St. Jacques du Haut-Pas (church), 487
St. Joachim (college, Quebec), 225
St. John (island), oppression of Indians, 208
St. John Lateran, Façade of, 447
St. John of God, Brothers Hospitallers of, 78
St. John of Shuweir (monastery, Beyrouth), 562
St. Julian of Brioude, Chapter of, 135
St. Lazare (in Paris)
Clerical conferences at, 132
Father Olier's retreat at, 136
Founding of, 124
Headquarters of Vincentians, 129
Plundered by the rabble, 147
Priests confined at, 173
Retreats at, 131, 139
St. Lazare (island), Armenian monks, 570
St. Louis of the French (church, Rome), 119
St. Magloire (college), 119
St. Malo: Diocese of, 150; Seminary at, 134
St. Marceau (faubourg), 491
St. Maron (monastery), 564
St. Martin, theosophist, 505
St. Maur (abbey): bull Unigenitus, 489; Gallia christiana, 248
St. Maur, Congregation of, 40
St. Médard (cemetery), 491
St. Médard (church), 487
St. Merry (church), 399
Saint-Mesmes, Marquis of: and dueling, 162
St. Nicholas du Chardonnet, 138: Seminary of, 122
St. Peter (basilica): alteration of plan, 32; Breviary at, 58; Completion of, 32
St. Peter's chair (Rome), 61
Saint-Pierre, Bernardin de: Naturalism of, 88
St. Remi (abbey), 151
St. Savior (monastery), 562
St. Simon, Duke de, 140: on Archbishop Harlay, 341; on election of Innocent XIII, 444
St. Stephen (monastery, Rome), 571
St. Sulpice (church): Fénelon at, 426; Method of catechism at, 154; Father Olier pastor of, 153
St. Sulpice (parish): House of Instruction in, 155; Life of the clergy at, 153 f.
St. Sulpice seminary, 138: anti-dueling pledge, 163; Father Caulet director of, 333; not Jansenist, 487; origin of name, 139
St. Sulpice, Society of: Origin of, 139 f.
St. Thomas Christians, 568
St. Vincent (college), Anchieta rector, 212
Sainte-Beuve, Madame de: and the Ursulines, 110
Sainte-Marthe, Abel Louis de (Oratorian), 119; Exile of, 417
Sainte-Marthe, Denys de (Benedictine): Gallia christiana, 248
Sainte-Marthe, Louis de: Gallia christiana, 248
Sainte-Marthe, Scévole de: Gallia christiana, 248
Saintes (France), Seminary at, 134
Saintonge (France), 305; Huguenots of, 313
Saints, List of
Aloysius (Jesuit, d. 1591), 42, 446
Alphonsus (founder, d. 1787), 515
Andrew Avellino (Theatine, d. 1608), 42
Andrew Corsini (Carmelite, d. 1373), 56
Bruno (founder, d. 1101), 40
Benedict Labre (pilgrim, d. 1783), 545
Cajetan of Thiene (founder, d. 1547), 42
Camillus (founder, d. 1613), 78
Charles Borromeo (cardinal, d. 1584), 31, 78
Clement Hofbauer (Redemptorist, d. 1821), 518
Elizabeth of Portugal (queen, d. 1336), 56
Felix of Cantalice (Capuchin, d. 1587), 42
Fidelis Sigmaringen (martyr, d. 1622), 181 note

Saints (continued)
Frances of Rome (founder, d. 1440), 97
Francesco Girolamo (preacher, d. 1716), 514
Francis Borgio (Jesuit, d. 1572), 42
Francis de Sales (bishop, d. 1622), 88
Francis Regis (missioner, d. 1640), 150 f.
Francis Solanus (Franciscan, d. 1610), 210
Francis Xavier (missioner, d. 1552), 31, 40, 182
Frumentius (apostle of Abyssinia, d. cir. 383), 228
Gregory VII (pope, d. 1085), 446
Hyacintha Mariscotti (Franciscan tertiary, d. 1640), 80
Ignatius Loyola (founder, d. 1556), 31, 40
Isaac Jogues (martyr, d. 1646), 222
Isidore the Laborer (farmer, d. 1130), 40
John Baptist de la Salle (founder, d. 1719), 525
John Eudes (founder, d. 1690), 122, 150
John Joseph of the Cross (Franciscan, d. 1739), 450
John Nepomucene, (martyr, d. 1393), 446
John of the Cross (founder, d. 1591), 446
Josaphat Kuncevyc (martyr, d. 1623), 581
Joseph Calasanctius (founder, d. 1648), 40
Joseph of Leonessa (Capuchin, d. 1612), 80
Leonard of Port Maurice (preacher, d. 1751), 514
Lorenzo da Brindisi (Capuchin, d. 1619), 80
Louise de Marillac (founder, d. 1660), 148
Paul of the Cross (founder, d. 1775), 515
Peter Canisius (missioner, d. 1597), 80
Peter Claver (missioner, d. 1654), 70 f.
Peter Fourier (missioner, d. 1640), 110, 151
Philip Neri (founder, d. 1595), 31, 40
Saints (continued)
Pius V (pope, d. 1572), 362
Rose of Lima (Dominican tertiary, d. 1617), 210
Stanislas Kostka (Jesuit, d. 1568), 446
Theresa of Avila (founder, d. 1582), 31, 40
Turibius (missioner, d. 1606), 207, 210
Veronica Giuliani (Capuchin, d. 1727), 450
Vincent de Paul (founder, d. 1660), 144 ff.
Vladimir (Russian ruler, d. 1015), 579
Saints ordres, Traité des: by Olier, 241
Salamanca, Carmelites of, 71
Salamanca University: St. Thomas' Summa at, 232; the Salmanticenses, 232
Saldanha (cardinal), visitator apostolic, 455
Salic law, The, 368
Salmanticenses, 72, 232 f.
Salons, The, 500
Salutary Warnings of the Blessed Virgin by Widenfelt, 264
Salzburg (monastery), Congregation of, 83
Samurai, 188, 196
San Domingo: Discovery of, 207; First bishops of, 207; Las Casas in, 207, 209
San Felice (cardinal), 85
Sánchez, moral theology, 238
Sancian (island), St. Francis Xavier's death, 190
Sanctuary, Right of: Extension of, 353
Saniassi (Brahman penitent), 192
Sant' Angelo (castle), Jesuit general imprisoned in, 469
Santarelli (Jesuit): De haeresi, schismate et apostasia, 320; moral theology, 238
Sapienza College: designed by Michelangelo, 260; finished by Alexander VII, 260
Saqzi, Eutychius (patriarch), 559
Saqzi, Neophytus (patriarch), 560
Saragossa University, 126
Sardinia and the Holy See, 448
Sardinia, King of: "Vicar of the Holy See," 454 Sarpi, Paolo, 23: History of the Council of Trent by, 24; Treatise on the

Sarpi (continued)
Interdict by, 24; Venetian veneration of, 42
Sarrasin (bishop of Vicenza), Arrest of, 22
Sassuma (Japan), 189
Sava, St.: bishop of Serbs, 573
Savoy (duchy): Ambition of, 8; Charles Emmanuel duke of, 89; and Genoa reconciled, 265; St. Francis de Sales in, 90
Scala (Italy), Redemptorists founded at, 515
Scaliger, De emendatione temporum, 236
Schall, Johann (missioner), 203: Chinese writings of, 203; Death of, 204; in Peking, 203
Scherer, Georg (preacher), 81
Schiller, influenced by Rousseau, 503
Schlegel, Frederick von, 509 note: Conversion of, 509 note; on history of eighteenth century, 509; on international peace, 64
Schönborn, George von, 493
Schomberg, Marshal, 159: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177; and dueling, 163
Scholasticism, Aversion to, 495
Schoolmaster in France, 524
Schwenkfeld, Theories of, 283
Sciala, Victor, 565
Science, Bible and, 53 note
Science pratique du Crucifix by Grou, 540
Scotland: General Monk governor of, 296; political influence of Masonry, 504
Scriptural exegesis, 244
Scripture, Study of, 530
Scrofula, Curing of, 368
Scudéry, Mlle de, 279
Scutari, 555
Sebaste, 570
Secret Rosary of the Blessed Sacrament: approved by St. Cyran, 378; condemned by Sorbonne, 378
Secular Priests of Christian Doctrine, Approval of, 60
"See of the East," 568
Séez (see), 150, 178
Segneri (preacher), 60
Séguier (chancellor), 142: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 177
Séguier, Madame: and St. Vincent, 145
Seminaries
In charge of Vincentians, 134
Founded by Bishop Caulet, 333
Founding of, 445
In France, 123, 132: opposition of Assembly of the Clergy, 124; Richelieu and, 133; State direction of, 495
In Germany, 85
Seminary: at Caen, 124; Francis de Sales' efforts to found a, 99
Seminary of Foreign Missions (Paris), 204
Seminary of St. Sulpice, 138: origin of name, 139
Semler, 287, 473
Senez (see), 521
Senlis (see), 106
Sens (see), 402
Sept-Fons (abbey), reformed by Beaufort, 108 note
Seraphim Tanas (patriarch), 561
Serbia: Holy Synod of, 552; under patriarch of Constantinople, 555
Serbo-Croats, The, 577
Serbs, The, 572: Conversion of, 573
Serfdom in Bohemia, 29
Séricourt, Simon Le Maître de: Port Royal hermit, 381
Sermon pour l'Ascension by Bossuet, 241
Sesmaisons, the case of conscience, 392
Seven Tours (castle), 35
Sévigné, Madame de
On Bishop Caulet, 336
On glorification of Louis XIV, 353
On Innocent XI and Louis XIV, 336
Reading of St. Augustine, 386
On revocation of Edict of Nantes, 312
Writings of, 432
Seville, Siege of, 208
Shintoism, 187
Shoemakers, Association of Brother, 168
Shoguns, 188
Shun-chi (Chinese emperor), 203
Shuweirites, 562
Sicily: Albanians in, 577; detached from Papal States, 441; Greek element in, 577; Greek monasteries, 578; number of clergy, 512
Sick: Bleeding the, 373; Care of the, 77 f.
Siegnelay, Marquis de, 353
Sigismund III, John (of Poland), 30, 580, 582
Signatures, the two, 269 note

Silesia, Jesuits find refuge in, 469
Silveira (missioner) in Africa, 228
Simeon V (Nestorian catholicos), 568
Simeon bar Mama (catholicos), 568
Simeon of Trebizond (patriarch), 553
Simon, Richard (Oratorian), 119: and Father Morin, 238
Simon de Rojas (Blessed), 72
Simpson, on Jesuits in California, 221
Sinai: Orthodox bishop of, 556; See of, 557
Si-ngan-fou, Inscription of, 569
Singlin, Antoine, 390: the case of conscience, 392; Jansenist orator, 381; Severity of, 391
Sionite, Gabriel, 565
Sirven, Elizabeth: Case of, 480
Sis, Armenian patriarchs of, 569
Sisters of Charity, Founding of, 147 f., 152
Sivas (Sebaste), 570
Six premiers siècles de l'Eglise, 530
Sixtus V (pope), the Congregations of cardinals, 259
Skarga (Jesuit), The Unity of the Church, 580
Slavata (governor of Prague), Death of, 29
Slave trade, Beginning of the, 209 note
Sleidanus, De statu religionis et reipublicae by, 27
Smolensk, 586
Smotritsky, Meletius (bishop), 583
Soanen (bishop of Senez): appeal from bull Unigenitus, 489; condemned by Council of Embrun, 521; Death of, 489 note; suspended and exiled, 489
Sobieski, John, 583: Polish patriot, 265; victory at Vienna, 268
Society of Foreign Missions, 179
Society of Jesus. See Jesuits
Society of Priests of the Mission, approved by Urban VIII, 129
Society of the Blessed Sacrament. See Company of the Blessed Sacrament
Socinianism in Hungary, 470
Socinios (king of Abyssinia), 228
Sogno (Congo, Africa), 227
Soissons, Workmen's societies at, 169
Soissons, Countess de: and the "devotees," 178
Solbert (Huguenot minister), 306
Solitaries. See Hermits
Sollicita ac provida (constitution), 453
Solovetsk (monastery), 587
Somaschi, union with Secular Priests of Christian Doctrine, 60
Somme des péchés by Bauny, 239
Sommières, Huguenot synod near, 478
Sophronius V (patriarch), 557
Sorbière, Samuel: and royal absolutism, 177
Sorbonne, 233 f., 395
  Anti-Roman tradition, 324
  Case of conscience, 406
  Companions of Duty condemned by, 168
  Degrees at, 234
  Emile condemned by, 461
  Gallicanism defended by, 321
  Gallicanism in the, 337
  Jansenism: censured by, 407; denounced by, 401; in seminary of, 487
  Meetings forbidden, 352
  Opposition to Louis XIV, 351
  Papal infallibility and, 329, 352
  Rebuilt by Richelieu, 324
  Religious excluded from deliberations, 321
  Royal rights over convents, 338
  The Secret Rosary condemned, 378
  Versus the Parliament, 329
  Villeneuve's thesis at, 328
Soto, Peter de: on grace and free will, 358
Soubise, Duke de, 305
Sourdis (archbishop of Bordeaux) and reform at Maubuisson, 374
South America: colonized by Catholics, 206; The missions in, 206
Souveraineté des rois by Le Bret, 176
Spada (nuncio), 320
Spain
  Alexander VII and, 257
  Bartholomites in, 85
  Catholic renaissance in, 68
  Church in, 68, 510
  Clerical ignorance, 511
  The clergy, 511
  Concordats, 492: (1717), 511; (1723), 511
  Cromwell and, 295
  Decline of power of, 68
  Despotism of the monarchy, 69, 511
  Devotion to St. Joseph, 40
  Economic decline of, 74

Spain (continued)
Emigration to America, 69
Expulsion of the Moors, 74
Holy bishops, 512
The Inquisition, 492
Interference in papal elections, 443
King as "patron" of the churches, 511
Lack of seminaries, 511
Land of scholastic theology, 232
Limitations of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, 492
Maritime decadence of, 296
Masonry in, 507 f.
Moors in, 73
Penalties against apostates, 73
Power in Italy, 8
Pressure on Europe, 12
Property rights of the clergy, 511
Quality of preaching, 511
Regime of favorites, 69
Regime of intendants, 511
Religious monuments in, 511
Religious orders in, 71
Religious spirit, 70
Sale of Church property, 511
State of agriculture, 69
Spalatro (see), 318 note
Spanish colonists in America, 206
Spener, Jacob, 284: apostle of pietism, 275, 282; Pia desideria, 285
Spinola (bishop), Leibnitz and, 277
Spinoza, Leibnitz and, 276
Spiritual Combat, 100
Spiritual Guide by Molinos, 423
Spondanus. See Sponde
Sponde, Henri de (bishop of Pamiers), 333: continuator of Baronius, 247
Stanislas Kostka, St.: Canonization of, 446
Staroviertsi, The, 587
States General (1614), 106
Stedingk, 502
Steenhoven, Cornelius (schismatic archbishop of Utrecht), 499
Stigmata, St. Veronica Giuliani, 450
Stoicism, German, 250
Strasbourg, Spener in, 285
Strikes, and Trade Union of Duty, 168
Stuart, Charles: pretender, 296
Suarez, Theological works of, 236 f.
Subiaco, preaching by Thomas of Cori, 450
Suffern (Jesuit), Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 157
Sulaka, John (archimandrite), 568
Sully, Duke de, 305: Mémoires, 13
Sulpicians
Among the Acadians, 225
Ascetical theology, 232
In Canada, 223 f.
In colonial America, 223
Founding of the, 138, 308 note
And Jansenists, 406 f.
Summa theologica by St. Thomas: at Salamanca, 232
Sunderland, adviser of James II, 301
Surius (hagiographer), 248
Susneos (king of Ethiopia), 572
Swabia, Bartholomites in, 86
Sweden: Estates of, 258; Growing strength of, 258; Masonry in, 507; Pietism in, 286; treaty with Cromwell, 295
Swedenborg, Emmanuel, 286, 474, 505: Vera christiana religio, 474
Switzerland: Conversions in, 181 note; Masonry in, 507; Protestantism in, 8
Sylvester Dahan, 560
Syncretism, Religious, 274 f.: in Germany, 472 f.
Synods, Diocesan: St. Francis de Sales, 98
"Synods of the Desert," 313, 315, 477
Syria: conquered by the Ottomans, 559; Church in, 561, 563; Melchite patriarchate, 455
Syriac, Byzantine liturgy in, 559
Syrian Church, 566
Syrians: Catholic, 567; Literary works of, 565
Szeklers in Hungary, 470
Szunyogh (Jesuit), 575

Tahayma, Japanese convert, 196
Tailors: Association of Brother, 169; Union of, 167
Talon, Denis (Advocate General), 328
Talon, Omer: on war suffering, 141
Tamil (language), 185
Tanas, Seraphim (patriarch), 561
Tangier, John de Prado patron of, 226
Tanucci (minister), 519
Taoism, 189: Ricci and, 202

Tapper, Ruard (chancellor of Louvain), 358: and Baianism, 361; at Council of Trent, 359
Tapuyans (tribe), 214
Tartar Manchu dynasty, 203
Tasswitz, birthplace of Hofbauer, 518
Tauler, Sermons of, 284
Taurus, Cilician, 555
Tazbas Melkoun (bishop), 569
Tchernoievitch, Arsenius, 576
Tegee (see), 576
Télémaque by Fénelon, 432, 434
Tellier, Le, 147
Temporal power of the pope, 320
Tencin (archbishop of Embrun), Provincial council under, 489
Tencin, Madame de: Salon of, 501
Teneriffe, birthplace of Anchieta, 211
Tentative, The: at the Sorbonne, 234
Terlitzki, Cyril (bishop), 580
Ternovo (see), 573
Tersteegen, Gerhard (Pietist), 286
Test Act, 298
Test Oath, 301
Theatines: expelled from Venice, 22; in Poland, 582; sent to the Caucasus, 579
Theodore I (czar), 586
Theodore of Beza, 50 f.
Theodosius VI (patriarch), 562
Theologia moralis by St. Alphonsus, 516
Theology, The study of, 231
Theology, Ascetical, 232, 240
Theology, Moral: Bonacina, 238; Sánchez, 238. See also Casuistry Theology, Mystical, 232
Theology, Pastoral, 232, 238, 495
Theology, Patristic, 232
Theology, Positive, 235: Petau, 531
Theophanes IV (patriarch), 557, 583
Theophanes Procopovich, 552
Theophilus (bishop of Fagaras), 574
Theophilus Korydaleus, 551
Thesaurus sacrorum rituum by Gavanti, 243
Theresa of Avila, St.
  Ascetical theology, 232
  Beatification of, 31
  Canonization of, 40
  Influence of, 426
  Madame Guyon's fondness for writings of, 421
  Way of Perfection, 539
Thessalonica, 549
Thibet. See Tibet
Third orders in Middle Ages, 176
Thirty Years' War, 43, 284: Beginning of, 29; End of, 62; Sufferings of the, 141, 145; Urban VIII, 45
Thomas, St. (apostle): in India, 184
Thomas Aquinas, St.: papal infallibility, 350 note, 352; Summa at Salamanca, 232; Summa in European universities, 232
Thomas of Cori (Blessed), Franciscan, 450
Thomas of Jesus (Carmelite), 71
Thomassin (Oratorian), 119: Ancienne et nouvelle discipline de l'Eglise, 531; disavowal of Jansenism, 403; Traité de l'Incarnation, 241
Thomists and Molinists, 10
Thonon: birthplace of Father Lacombe, 421; Protestantism in, 89
Thorens (in Savoy), 88
Thorn, The holy, 410 f.
Thou, Jacques de: project of a Polyglot, 246
Thrace, 555
Thury, Father: in Canada, 225
Tibet, Missions in, 450
Tien-chu as name of God, 202, 205
Tillemont, Lenain de: Les six premiers siècles de l'Eglise, 530
Tithes, Collection of, 523
Tivoli, Arms factory at, 43
Toland, the term "pantheism," 303
Toletus (cardinal), 14
Toletus, Franciscus: and submission of Baius, 362
Tor de Specchi, 97
Tories (party), 299
Tosa (Japan), 198
Toulouse
  Bourlemont bishop of, 327
  Case of Antoine Calas, 480
  De Marca archbishop of, 323 note
  General Hospital, 161
  Lucilio executed at, 251
  Parliament of, 332
  See of, 335
  Workmen's societies at, 169
Toulouse University, 126: St. Vincent honored by, 126 note
Touraine: Choiseul-Praslin bishop of, 346; Father Lejeune in, 152

Tournely (theologian), 531
Tournon, Charles de (papal legate): in China, 205
Trade Union of Duty, 167: Spirit of, 165; Strikes and, 168, 176
Trade unions in France, 167
Transylvania, 574: Calvinism in, 574; Protestantism protected by Cromwell, 296
Trapes (archbishop), 320
Trappists, The, 108: Establishment of, 308 note; reformed by Rancé, 108
Travancore (India), St. Francis Xavier in, 191 Treaties
  Cateau-Cambresis, 512
  Lyons, 12
  Madrid, 36
  Paris (1763), 225
  Vervins, 12
  Westphalia. See Westphalia
Tréguier: Diocese of, 149; Seminary at, 134
Trent, Council of Attitude of French clergy to canons of, 106
  Clerical life, 31
  Commentaries on reforms of, 232
  Ecclesiastical immunities, 22
  Episcopal residence, 20
  Its decrees not received in France, 114
  Leibnitz on, 277 f., 280
  Reform of the clergy, 98
  Reforms in France, 87
Tribunal of mathematics (China) under direction of Jesuits, 204
Tribunal sacramentale by Peter Marchand, 238
Trinitarians, 72: and Barbary missions, 226; in England, 226; in Spain, 70
Trinitarians, Discalced, 72
Trinity, Order of the. See Trinitarians
Tromp, Corneille: and Huguenots, 310
Tronson (Sulpician), investigation of Madame Guyon, 427
Trous, Château of: the "little schools," 395
Troyes (France), 224: Seminary at, 134
True Christianity by Arndt, 284
True Idea of God by Ricci, 202
Tucuman (see), 216
Tübingen University, 548
Tuesday conferences, 132: Bossuet on, 132
Tuki, Raphael (bishop), 571
Tunis: Christian prisoners in, 227; St. Vincent at, 126
Turenne (Huguenot): Conversion of, 309; on religion in France, 304
Turgot, regard for the curés, 523
Turibius, St.: Apostolate of, 210; Canonization of, 210; in Peru, 207, 210
Turkestan, Nestorian missions in, 568
Turks
  Alexander VII and war against, 260
  Attack on Malta, 444
  Candia threatened by, 262
  Defeated by Sobieski, 268
  Europe menaced by, 267
  Favored by Louis XIV, 265, 267
  Italy menaced by, 265
  Poland defended against, 265
  Venice at war with, 269
  Weakening of, 12
Tuscany, 447: Ambition of, 8
Tyre (see), 565

Ukraine, Conversion of the, 583
Ulric von Brunswick, Conversion of, 472
Unbelief, Development of, 472-509
Unigenitus (bull), 441, 444 f.
  Accepted by Noailles, 446
  Benedict XIV on acceptance of, 498
  Bossuet (bishop of Troyes), 490
  Individual refusal to accept, 498
  Jansenist opposition to, 460
  Origin of, 488
  Quesnel's propositions condemned, 488
  Treatment to opponents of, 454
Union of Brest, 548
Union of Florence, 571
Unions, Trade: in France, 167
United Kingdom, 287. See also England
Unity of the Church by Skarga, 380
Universae theologicae moralis receptae sententiae by Escobar, 239
Universities, List of Alcalá, 232 f.
  Bourges, 236
  Cambridge, 293
  Helmstedt, 275
  Leyden, 237
  Louvain, 358 ff.
  Oxford, 293

Universities (continued)
Paris, 182, 233, 237, 532
Salamanca, 232
Tübingen, 548
University of France, 532
Urban VIII (pope), 41
Activities of, 56
Anti-Jansenist bull, 47
Bull condemning the Augustinus, 388
Bulls: Divinam psalmodiam, 58; In caena Domini, 48; In eminenti, 388
Canonizations by, 42, 56
The Castro war, 56
Congregation of Propaganda, 39
Congregations of cardinals, 259
Death of, 58, 397
Early career of, 42
Galileo and, 54
Greek rite in Italy, 578
Interest in fortifications, 42
Nepotism of, 47
Observance of Melk approved, 83
Port Royal and, 376
Publication of excommunications, 48
Reform measures of, 42
Relations with France, 42
Religious orders encouraged, 57
Revision of the breviary, 57
Richelieu and, 45, 47
Society of Priests of the Mission approved, 129
Valtellina conflict, 43
Venice and, 47
Ursulines: promoted by Madame de Villemar, 110; Spread of, 80
Usury: Abuse of, 170; Benedict XIV on, 452; Decrees against, 266
Utraquists in Bohemia, 29
Utrecht: Jansenist schism, 499; Religious decisions at, 441
Uzés (see), 478, 537

Vaissette (historian), 531
Valdemarino (abbot), Arrest of, 22
Valencia (Spain), 73
Valignano, Alexander (missioner), 197
Valladolid: Cennaro y Lapiedra bishop of, 512; Las Casas at, 209
Vallon de Beaupuis, the "little schools," 395
Valtellina, Conflict over, 36, 43
Van den Steen. See Lapide
Van Espen, power of kings, 492
Vanini, Lucilio: De naturae arcanis, 251
Van Swieten (Jansenist), 471, 495
Vardes, Marquis de: Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 178
Vatelot, Father (founder), 525
Vatelottes, The, 525
Vatican Council, 347 note
Vatican Library, 565: enriched by Clement XII, 447; enriched by Paul V, 31; Oriental manuscripts, 565
Vaudois, Cromwell's support of the, 296
Vaudreuil at Montreal, 225
Vaugirard (village), 138: Growth of seminary at, 139; Seminary at, 333
Velay, St. Francis Regis in, 150
Venaissin, Comtat, 521
Venice
Ambition of, 8
Birthplace of Clement XIII, 458
Capuchins expelled, 22
Conflict with Paul V, 22
Decline of, 21
Disdain for the papacy, 21
Ecclesiastical restrictions by, 22
Excommunications against, 21
Febronianism, 494
Fire in, 21 note
Help asked of Alexander VII, 257
And the Holy See, 492
Ill will of, 47
Jesuits expelled, 22
Mechitar at, 570
Sarpi canonist of, 24
Schismatic clergy in, 460
Senators excommunicated, 22
Theatines expelled, 22
Treaty with Turks (1573), 21 note
Veneration of Sarpi, 42
War against, 21
At war with Turks, 269
Ventadour, Duke de, 175: viceroy of Canada, 181
Vera christiana religio by Swedenborg, 474
Verbiest (missioner): and Chinese calendar, 204; Death of, 204
Verceil, 424
Veronica Giuliani, St. (Capuchin), 450
Vervins, Treaty of, 12
Vespers, The: at the Sorbonne, 235
Vialart (bishop of Chalons), 132, 418
"Vicar of the Holy See," Title of, 454
Vico, Anthony: on Nobili, 193

Victoria, Francisco (bishop of Tucuman), 216
Vieira, Anthony: in Brazil, 207, 213; Death of, 215
Vienna, Redemptorists at, 518
Vigeau, Mlle de: and St. Vincent, 145
Vignal (Sulpician), slain by Indians, 224
Villa Barberini (Rome), 61
Villemar, Acarie de: promotion of Carmelites and Ursulines, 110
Villeneuve, Gabriel de: Thesis of, 328
Villeneuve, Madame de: founding of Sulpicians, 138
Vilna, 582
Vincennes castle, St. Cyran imprisoned in, 384
Vincent de Paul, St., 104, 124
  Advice to missioners, 229
  Barbary missions, 227
  Bishop Caulet and, 333
  Canonization of, 141, 149 note
  Cardinal Mazarin and, 147
  Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 155
  Conférences de Saint-Lazare, 241
  Conferences of charity, 144
  Confessor of Father Olier, 136
  Death of, 149
  Early life, 125 f.
  Esteem for the priesthood, 124 f.
  Father Duval confessor of, 234
  First attempt to found preparatory seminary, 134 note
  On the Frequent Communion, 398
  Friendship for St. Cyran, 398
  During the Fronde, 147
  Galley convicts, 146
  General Hospital, 148, 161
  Holiness of the priesthood, 240
  Honored by Toulouse University, 126 note
  Influence in Gondi family, 113
  Jansenism repudiated by, 397
  Jansenists and, 175
  The missions, 128
  Opposition to Jansenism, 402
  Parish missions, 128
  Paul V and, 126
  Pavillon disciple of, 331
  Poverty of his origin, 125
  Queen Anne and, 127
  Relief undertakings, 146
  Retreats, 128
Vincent de Paul, St. (continued)
  At Rome, 126
  Royal chaplain, 126
  St. Cyran and, 368
  On serving the poor, 144
  Slave at Tunis, 126
  Virtue of, 127
  Work of, 144
Vincentians: in Africa, 226; Approval of the, 149; Establishment of, 308 note; in Madagascar, 228; missions, 128; retreats, 128; seminaries, 132, 134
Vineam Domini (bull), 440, 483
Vinnitzki, George (bishop), 584
Virginia (colony), Protestantism in, 221
Visitation, Order of the: Approval of, 42; Foundation of, 97; Rapid spread of, 98
Vitebsk, 583
Vivarais, St. Francis Regis in, 150
Viviers (see), 151
Vix pervenit (encyclical), 452
Vladimir, St.: conversion of Ruthenians, 579
Volodkovitch, Philip (bishop), 584
Voltaire
  Becomes Mason, 508
  Calas case, 480
  Correspondence with Benedict XIV, 454
  Defense of Huguenots, 479
  Glorification of, 471
  Huguenots' appeal to, 479
  Influence of, 519
  On Jesuits in Paraguay, 216
  La Barre case, 481
  Mahomet by, 454
  Sirven case, 480
  Works condemned, 456
Vratanya, Simeon (Serbian monk), 577

Wading (Recollect), disavowal of Jansenism, 403
Wahren Christenthum by Arndt, 283
Wake (Anglican archbishop), 490
Walachia, 556-58: Church of, 573
Wallenstein (general), 46
Walpole on Benedict XIV, 457
Walter on Treaty of Westphalia, 66
Walton, Brian (Anglican bishop), London Polyglot by, 246
Wan-li (Chinese emperor), 201

Warsaw, Redemptorists at, 318
Way of Perfection by St. Theresa, 539
Wealth of French clergy, 111
Weishaupt, Masonic leader, 506
Werner, Franz: on Spener, 282
Wesley, John: founder of Methodism, 286, 302
Western Schism and political Gallicanism, 318
Westphalia, Treaty of, 59, 62, 256, 273, 284, 287
Whigs (party), 299
White Hill (battle), 30, 34
Whitehall Palace, 301
Widenfelt, Adam: Salutary Warnings of the Blessed Virgin, 264
Willermoz, 505
William III (of England)
  Anglicanism at coming of, 474
  Anti-Catholic spirit of, 281
  Catholics and, 302
  Freemason, 504
  Innocent XI and, 267
  Leibnitz and, 281
  Mary Stuart wife of, 301
William (margrave of the Palatinate), conversion of, 472
William of Orange. See William III (of England)
Wine merchant to the court, 135 note
Wisdom, Daughters of: Founding of, 536
Wisdom, Sisters of, 525
Witasse (theologian), 531
Wittemberg, 547
Wladislaus IV of Poland, 583
Wolff, disciple of Leibnitz, 287
Working classes, Company of the Blessed Sacrament, 167 ff.
Workmen's corporations, 543

Ximenez (cardinal): Biblia Polyglotta, 245; Las Casas and, 208 f.

Yang Kweisien (astronomer), 204
Ypres: Jansen bishop of, 368; See of, 384
Ysambert, Sorbonne doctor, 236
Yukinaga (Catholic prince), 197
Yvan, Anthony (founder), 152

Zagreb (see), 577
Zaim, Meletius (patriarch), 559
Zalenski, Leo (bishop), 584
Zamet, Sebastian (bishop of Langres), 175, 379 f.: Conversion of, 379; House of the Blessed Sacrament, 379
Zamosk, Council of, 584
Zelanti, in papal elections, 443, 445, 451
Zelus domus meae (bull), 65
Zenon, Bernardine (Jesuit), 79
Zinzendorf, Emmanuel: founder of Moravian Brethren, 286

HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

MOURRET-THOMPSON

VOLUME SEVEN

1775-1823

A HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

A HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

BY

THE REV. FERNAND MOURRET, S.S.

TRANSLATED BY

THE REV. NEWTON THOMPSON, S.T.D.

VOLUME SEVEN

PERIOD OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

(1775-1823)

MONASTERY OF SAINT DOMINIC
13th AVENUE AND SOUTH 10th STREET
NEWARK 3, NEW JERSEY

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
15 & 17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS 2, MO.
AND
33 QUEEN SQUARE, LONDON W. C.

MONASTERY OF [illegible] DOMINIC

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 31-507

IMPRIMATUR

✠ Joseph E. Ritter, S.T.D.
Archbishop of St. Louis

August 27, 1954

COPYRIGHT 1955 BY B. HERDER BOOK CO.

Printed in the United States of America
by Vail-Ballou Press, Inc., Binghamton, New York

CONTENTS

PAGE

INTRODUCTION 3

PART I

DECLINE OF THE ANCIENT REGIME

CHAPTER

I. THE POLITICAL AND SOCIAL CRISIS 9
Abuse of Royal Absolutism 12
The Clergy 14
Josephism and Febronianism 16
The Punctuation of Ems 16
Synod of Pistoia 18
Church and State in France 20

II. THE INTELLECTUAL CRISIS 23
The Philosophical Movement in England 24
The Philosophical Movement in Germany 25
The Philosophical Movement in Italy 27
The Philosophical Movement in Holland 29
French Philosophers 32
Voltaire 33
Rousseau 35
Influence of the New Theories 38
The Clergy 43

III. THE FIRST YEARS OF THE PONTIFICATE OF PIUS VI . . 46
Pius VI 46
The Pope's Popularity 48
The Danger of Philosophism 50
Pius VI's Visit to Vienna 52
Difficulties with Russia 55
Grand Duke of Tuscany 57

PART II

THE REVOLUTION

CHAPTER		PAGE
IV.	THE CHURCH DESPOILED	63
	The Conditions in France in 1789	64
	The Assembly	65
	The Upper Clergy	67
	The Lawyers	69
	The Lower Clergy	69
	Abbé Sieyès	70
	Mirabeau	72
	Beginning of the Anarchy	74
	The Pillage of St. Lazare	74
	The Taking of the Bastille	76
	The Provinces	78
	The Night of August 4	79
	The Tithes	81
	Hostility toward the Holy See	82
	The Cahiers of the Three Orders	84
	The Clergy	84
	The Three Principles of the Declaration	88
	Development of Anarchy	90
	Four Destructions	92
	Church Property	95
	Talleyrand	97
	Abbé Maury	100
	The Religious Orders	106
	Church and State	112
	The Civil Constitution of the Clergy	116
	Final Appeal	119
	The Civil Constitution of the Clergy	121
	Foreign Views of the Revolution	125
	Pius VI's Inaction	127
	The Pope and the Civil Constitution of the Clergy	132
V.	THE PERSECUTION	137
	The Taking of the Oath by the Clergy	138
	Aim of the Assembly	140

CHAPTER PAGE

Louis XVI and Pius VI 144
The Avignon Affair 147
Abbé Grégoire 152
Bishops Boisgelin and Bonal 154
The Papal Condemnation 156
The Constitutional Clergy 158
Archbishop Gobel 159
Bishop Grégoire 161
The Legislative Assembly 167
Cardinal Bernis 171
The Provinces 172
New Laws of Persecution 174
Execution of Priests 176
Danton 179
Imprisonments 180
The Taking of Verdun 182
The September Massacres 184
Massacres at the Abbaye 185
Massacres at the Carmelite Monastery 187
Further Massacres 189
The Oath of Liberty and Equality 192
The Convention (1792–95) 196
The Emigré Priests 199
The Emigrés in Germany 205
The Emigré Priests in Italy 209
The Emigré Priests in America 212
Fresh Outbreak of Revolutionary Persecution . . . 215
Execution of Louis XVI 219
Consequences of the King's Execution 221
The Liturgy 226
The Constitutional Clergy 228
Despotism of the Convention 231
Brittany and the Vendée 236
The First Vendean Insurgents 241
Cathelineau 243
The Second Period 246
The Other Provinces 250
The Vendée and Brittany 257
The Constitutional Church (1795) 265

CHAPTER PAGE

VI. THE CHURCH SUPPLANTED BY CIVIL RELIGION . . . 271
Second Encyclical of the Constitutionals 275
Decrees of the Pseudo-Council 278
Failure of the Council 279
A National Religion 280
The Weekly Holyday 284
Irreligion (1789–99) 287
The Terror under the Directory 289
The Armistice of Bologna 293
Recoil of the Directory 295
The Taking of Rome 298
The Persecution in France 300
Exiles in Guiana 302
The Interned Priests 305
Deeds of the Directory 310
The Persecution in Belgium 312
Motive of the Persecution 314
Sacking of Rome 317
Pius VI in France 321

PART III

TOWARD A RELIGIOUS RESTORATION

VII. THE RELIGIOUS SITUATION IN 1799 327
The Protestants 328
The Jews 329
The Freemasons 331
Vitality of Catholicism 332
Popular Feelings 334
Switzerland 337
The Catholic Cantons 338
Ireland 340
Napoleon 342
The Conclave 344
Election of Pius VII 346
Life of Pius VII 347
Pius VII and Bonaparte 349

CHAPTER PAGE

VIII. THE FRENCH CONCORDAT OF 1801 350
First Acts of Pius VII 350
Roman Distrust 355
Louis XVIII 359
Papal Envoys to Paris 363
Spina and Bernier 366
First Proposals 368
Diplomatic Activities 370
Consalvi and Bonaparte 374
The New Concordat 378
Ratification of the Concordat 380
The Organic Articles 383
Religious Situation 385
Resistance of Emigré Bishops 389
The Significance of the Concordat 392
Protestantism in France 398
Napoleon Proclaimed Emperor 402
The Coronation 406
Humiliations of the Pope 408

IX. THE CHURCH AND THE EMPIRE (1804–14) 410
Napoleon's Project 410
The Marriage of Jerome Bonaparte 412
Conflict between Napoleon and the Pope 415
The Holy Roman Empire 417
New Threats 420
Sentence of Excommunication 424
Arrest of Pius VII 426
Imprisonment of the Pope 428
Napoleon's Divorce 430
The French Church 435
French National Council of 1811 442
Pius VII at Fontainebleau 445
The Concordat 447
Napoleon and the Protestants 450
Napoleon and the Jews 452
Napoleon and the Freemasons 454

X. LAST YEARS OF PIUS VII 457
European Situation 458

CHAPTER PAGE

The Holy Alliance 462
The Church in France 468
Concordats 472
The Papal States 478

XI. The Religious Movement 481
Chateaubriand 482
Joseph de Maistre 486
Louis de Bonald 488
The Clergy 490
La Mennais 493
Germany 497
England 505

XII. The Foreign Missions 508
Interest in the Foreign Missions 509
New Apostolic Workers 511
Korea 514
India 516
China 518

XIII. The Eastern Church 523
Non-Catholic Greek Church of Constantinople . . . 523
Melchite Catholic Church of Antioch 530
The Churches of Eastern Europe 533
The Ruthenian Catholic Church 541
The Catholic Church in Russia 547
Alexander I 552

Appendix I. Declaration of the Rights of Man . . . 559

Appendix II. French Concordat of 1801 562

Bibliography 575

Index 587

A HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

Volume VII

I. Decline of the Ancient Regime

II. The Revolution

III. The Religious Restoration

Introduction

VOLUME VI of this history of the Church described the elements of religious revival and social preservation that made the "great century." It also discussed the various heretical, irreligious, and antisocial currents that prepared for the French Revolution. The present volume has the following aims: 1. an account of the various efforts of the papacy, from 1775 to 1789, to preserve from religious and social decadence the Christian nations, which had been undermined by a spirit of revolt and impiety; 2. a description of the persecutions undergone by the Church in its possessions, in the person of its faithful, and in its worship, from 1789 to 1799, under the regime of the unrestrained Revolution; 3. a picture of the religious revival that took place following the storm, from 1800 to 1823, not merely among Catholic peoples but also in the countries where heresy prevailed, and consequently even in the infidel regions most remote from the center of Christianity.

Two long pontificates filled this period. From 1775 to 1799, Pius VI attempted at first to restrain the revolutionary movement; then he resisted it courageously. From 1800 to 1823, Pius VII, amid countless difficulties, directed the work of the Catholic restoration.

Sincere and competent persons, viewing the events from opposite points of view, have expressed divergent appreciations of the Revolution. According to Ballanche and Buchez, the Revolution was a reflection, even a social realization, of Christianity.[1] Joseph de Maistre regarded it as satanic in its very essence.[2]

Indeed certain declarations of the first leaders of the Revolution—about individual liberty, equality before the law, the brotherhood of man, justice in the application of punishments—are nothing more than an echo of the truths promulgated by the gospel. They are the reverse of the morality prevailing in the days of the pagan world. But if, in the work of the Revolution, we consider the war upon the Church and the application of the theories of the social contract, we can to some extent agree with De Maistre's severe judgment.

The French Revolution was indeed a most complex affair. To appraise it fairly, we should distinguish its three movements from one another: the political reform, the social renovation, and the anti-Catholic persecution.

The movement of political reform, if considered within the limits of the desires expressed by the cahiers of the States General, can be approved in its main lines. The clergy of the two orders defended it earnestly, King Louis XVI favored it without ulterior considerations.[3]

The movement of social renovation was unfortunately inspired by the false principles of Rousseau. Today we no longer have any need of showing their falsity. Experience has manifested the emptiness of those utopias. The ideas of original perfection, of absolute equality, and of the social contract have to give way before the sounder ideas of original corruption, of a necessary hierarchy, and of tradition.

As for the movement of anti-Catholic persecution, from 1789 to 1799, from Mirabeau to Robespierre and from Robespierre to Barras, it simply advanced toward a more radical and more sectarian impiety. We may well condemn this aspect of the Revolution with utmost severity. The present volume will be devoted mostly to an account of this third movement.

[1] Buchez, Traité de philosophie, III, 571–73; Ballanche, Œuvres, VI, 268.

[2] De Maistre, Considérations sur la France, chap. 5.

[3] Cf. Godefroid Kurth, The Church at the Turning Points of History, 1929, pp. 159 ff.

What aggravated the character of this movement is that it not only developed parallel to the other two movements, but progressively invaded them and penetrated them with its spirit. Gradually it became their heart and soul. The formulas of the Declaration of the Rights of Man are susceptible of being understood and accepted in a Christian sense. But they were interpreted and applied in the sense of the unbelieving philosophers of the eighteenth century. Thereupon the political reforms themselves collapsed lamentably: the reaction against the royal absolutism of the old regime led merely to the despotism of the Convention and the corruption of the Directory; the aristocracy of the old nobility merely gave place to the oligarchy of the ideologists; the court clergy, formerly too dependent on the king, disappeared only to give free play to a constitutional clergy, servilely submissive to the new government. The old state religion survived in a way under the form of an official worship, rigidly imposed on all. This new religion was the worship of the Revolution, whose "immortal principles" were regarded as sacred, whose laws were untouchable, whose heroes were thought worthy of apotheosis, and whose violators were considered guilty of treason and of betrayal of justice. We may perhaps see in this attitude the basic error of the Revolution. The Revolution did more than create a new state religion; it became itself the object of a new religion, destined to supplant the old one. The state was conceived as a sort of Church against the Church.

Humanly speaking, we may say that in those conditions Christianity appeared to succumb, and the triumph of the Revolution seemed to be final. However, the contrary happened. A certain writer, who often has the appearance of a prophet and sometimes the intuitions of one, wrote in 1796 as follows:

Attend to my words, all of you who have not been well instructed by history. You said that the scepter sustained the tiara. Well, now the scepter has been crushed. You did not know how far the influence of a rich and powerful priesthood could sustain the dogmas it preached. Now the priests are no more; or at least those who escaped the guillotine and deportation now receive the alms which formerly they bestowed. You feared the force of custom, the dominance of authority. Now we no longer have customs, no longer any masters; each man's spirit is his own. You no longer need fear the enchantment of the eyes; men no longer behold the magnificence of ceremonial pomp; the temples are closed. . . . Philosophism has nothing to complain of; all the chances are in its favor. . . . But if Christianity comes through this terrible trial purer and more vigorous, if a Christian Hercules by his own strength raises up the son of the earth and stifles him in his arms, patuit Deus, God is there. . . .[4]

The clergy of France should not sleep; they have numerous reasons for thinking they are summoned to a great mission. The same conjectures that enabled them to perceive for what they suffered, also permit them to believe themselves destined to an essential undertaking.[5]

Fifteen years later the prediction was fully realized. At the dawn of the new century the clergy of France, chastened by poverty and matured by persecution, filled their temples with the joyous Easter alleluias. The French concordat became the model after which the principal nations regulated the conditions of their religious life. The Genius of Christianity, translated into all languages, carried the echo of a Catholic rebirth everywhere. And again France gave to the distant apostolate the most intrepid of its laborers and the most abundant of its resources, by the restoration of the foreign missions and the formation of the work of the Propagation of the Faith.

[4] De Maistre, ibid., chap. 5.
[5] Ibid., chap. 2.

PART I

Decline of the Ancient Regime

THE Protestant Revolt was furthered by the misunderstandings arising from the need of a religious reform; the French Revolution took place in consequence of the attitude produced by the need of a political and social reform. But neither the statesmen, who were won over to the new ideas or were blind to the dangers of those ideas, nor the churchmen, too long absorbed in matters of internal conflicts and too often influenced by the doctrines they had to combat, were able to assume in time the leadership of the reform movement. This movement was marked by an anti-Christian and revolutionary spirit, under the direction of a rationalist philosophy. A history of the Revolution, therefore, will not be adequate unless we first study the political and intellectual crises that prepared the way for it.

CHAPTER I

The Political and Social Crisis

THIS crisis is marked by three European political facts: a great event of world-wide political significance, and two profound modifications in the internal organization of human society, particularly of French society.

The War of the Austrian Succession, the partition of Poland, and the expulsion of the Jesuits are events for which the great courts of Europe were responsible. But these three events showed an abdication of the old traditional public law, the lack of respect that was accorded to solemn agreements, and the ignoring of the established sovereignties, particularly the spiritual sovereignty of the pope. The War of the Austrian Succession showed that the might of states could take precedence over the rights of sovereigns; and the partition of Poland showed that the might of sovereigns could take precedence over the rights of states.[1] By the expulsion of the Jesuits, a deed concerted and matured in the Bourbon courts, civil society showed its determination to interfere in the organization of the Church and to regulate the activity of the Church by its own initiative.

On the other hand, men were stirred by the enthusiasm which the American War of Independence evoked. The Declaration of Independence (1776) was based on the civil and political equality of the citizens. In the preamble of the Declaration we read: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, . . . that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it." In France on June 11, 1780, the Assembly of the Clergy, when asked to grant a subsidy to the government on the occasion of the American war, generously voted a gift of 30,000,000 francs without any discussion about the particular character of the war.[2]

[1] Albert Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, I, 89. Voltaire wrote to Frederick II: "Sire, you are said to be the one who imagined the partition of Poland. I believe it is so, because it has the mark of genius." Letter of November 19, 1772.

The events of foreign policy coincided with a crisis of the internal institutions in the European nations, particularly in France. A spirit of impatience over feudal rights and an undercurrent of revolt against royal absolutism were the chief signs of this crisis.

At the close of the eighteenth century serfdom was completely abolished in almost no part of Germany. Generally the people remained attached to the soil, as in the Middle Ages. Nearly all the soldiers making up the armies of Frederick II and Maria Theresa had been serfs.[3] England was also administered as well as governed by the wealthy landowners.

But while the people saw the nobility assure public order, render justice, execute the laws, and come to the aid of the weak, they had endured without much impatience, almost as the public of today supports its government, the burdensome rights and the sometimes irksome privileges of the landed aristocracy. But according as the latter ceased to render the services corresponding to its rights, its authority became more onerous.

The weight of this authority was felt particularly in France. Serfdom, which had almost completely disappeared, continued only in one or two provinces. Almost everywhere the peasant ceased to be a serf. He even became a landowner. But this very situation made more unbearable for him the permanence of the feudal taxes that weighed so heavily on him and that were piti-lessly collected by intendants for the profit of a nobility living in affluent ease at the court. In a celebrated chapter of the Origines de la France contemporaine, Taine speaks of those "thoroughbreds that had double or triple rations that they might be idle and might do nothing after all, while the draft horses rendered full service on a half-ration which often they did not receive." [4] In a less figurative language, Alexis de Tocqueville depicts the French peasant at the close of the eighteenth century, as a small landowner, passionately fond of that piece of land which he has bought out of his savings, everywhere confronted with the privilege of his powerful neighbor who annoys and hinders him. To acquire his property he had to pay a tax, not to the government, but to a big near-by landowner, a man as unconnected with the government as the peasant himself. This same neighbor obliges him to abandon the cultivation of his fields in order to render some service without pay; or he waits for him at the crossing of some stream to require a toll tax from him. Or the peasant goes to market, where the powerful neighbor sells to him the right to sell his own produce; and when, upon returning home, he wishes to use for himself what is left of his grain, he can do so only after sending it to be ground in the mill and baked in the oven of that same man.[5] Feudalism had been one of our greatest and most beneficent national institutions. Upon ceasing to fulfill the social function for which it had been established, feudalism became a most serious danger.

[2] Picot, Mémoires (3rd ed., 1855), V, 131–34.

[3] A. de Tocqueville, L'ancien régime et la Révolution, pp. 53 f.

[4] Taine, L'ancien régime, Vol. I, Bk. I, chap. 4. "About the middle of the eighteenth century, if, in the material and moral budget, you were to make two totals, one for the debts, the other for the credits, you could have calculated that the more capital a man contributed the less dividend he received. The privations of the large number supplied the superabundance of the small number. This fact applied to all the categories, thanks to the effective preferences favoring the court nobles at the expense of the provincial nobles, the nobility at the expense of the commoners, the cities at the expense of the country districts, and in general the strong at the expense of the weak. This scandalous disproportion finally shocked everyone, because almost everyone suffered from it." Taine, Le régime moderne, II, 80.

[5] Tocqueville, op. cit., p. 86.

Abuse of Royal Absolutism

The same may be said of royal absolutism, which had been rendered inevitable by the need of restraining the factions of the great nobles and of guaranteeing national unity. This absolutism at its origin was as popular as the feudal institutions had been. But this absolute power of the kings now became a cause of political and social unrest. Only the appearance remained of those municipal institutions which, from the thirteenth century to the sixteenth, had turned many cities of Germany, Italy, and England into little, wealthy, and enlightened republics, powerful and free cities. The communal activity, energy, and patriotism, together with the virile and fruitful virtues which they had inspired, gradually disappeared. Those provincial assemblies and those states general, where unhampered initiative and the free speech of the people of France used to be openly displayed, were abolished or survived merely in name.

We should, of course, avoid confusing the absolutism of Philip V of Spain, of Maria Theresa of Austria, or even of Louis XIV and Louis XV with that of an Oriental potentate or with that of an emperor of the Roman decadence. The great jurist Loyseau said that three kinds of law limit the power of the sovereign: the laws of God, the rules of natural justice, and the fundamental laws of the state. The basis of this limitation is that the prince is bound to make use of his sovereignty according to its proper nature and the conditions thus established. Bossuet observes: "To say that government should be absolute, is one thing; to say that it should be arbitrary, is something else. Even in empires certain laws exist, against which any enactment or deed is null." [6]

In a certain sense, the royal power of Louis XIV, by its undeniable glories, shows the most perfect accord of the people in one man that history has ever seen. But the very prestige of those glories created a danger. Says La Bruyère: "Whoever considers that the countenance of the prince makes a courtier's whole joy, will understand a little how seeing God can make the whole happiness of the saints." In reality, however, these earthly gods were merely gods of flesh and blood, or clay and dust. Too often, instead of governing solely for the nation, they governed for themselves.

[6] Bossuet, Politique tirée de l'Ecriture sainte, Bk. VIII, art. 1, prop. 1.

After overthrowing all the ancient political pillars of the state to assure for themselves alone the whole power of government, they make the royal power like a Gothic cathedral where the height of the structure and the pointed arches have been pushed to the point of paradox. They must govern with the maximum of foresight, order, and moderation if they are to avoid seeing the edifice totter on its foundation. . . . Were the successors of Louis XIV at the height of their duties? We believe that the historian cannot truthfully say that they were. The central power too often became the prey of intrigues by courtiers and favorites. It lost something of its stability and prestige. The government remained absolute, but its action fell into incoherence. France no longer had at its head a monarch who guided it confidently along the glorious path of its destinies. Soon at the very heart of the overcentralized nation a sort of corruption appeared as in a fruit that is overripe. As the common soul grew weak in the person of the king, each one regretted the earlier sacrifice of independence, the people became accustomed to despise its leaders, and anarchy tended to break out in the centralization.[7]

From all these disproportions, all these faulty adaptations, and all these dangers, the whole nation suffered, not merely the peasant and the artisan, but also the nobleman, the great lord, the prelate, and the king himself.[8] We shall see in the sequel what the grievances of the cahiers of 1789 were. But already in 1775, in a remonstrance dated May 6, the court of aids said:

[7] G. A. Gautheror, Conférences sur les origines de la Révolution, conference 2, p. 12.

[8] Taine, Le régime moderne, II, 80.

"They have labored to stifle in France the entire municipal spirit, to extinguish it, if they could, even to the feelings of the citizens. They have, as it were, interdicted the whole nation." [9] In a speech (February 23, 1787), delivered by order of the King and in his presence, M. de Calonne declared: "The abuses that men talk of abolishing are of serious importance and are the ones most protected." [10]

The Clergy

This political and social crisis brought so much suffering to the Church because, in consequence of her close union with the state, she found herself intricately involved in it. By her upper clergy she was involved in those privileges with rights that became daily more hated. She had the entree in those courts where the affairs of the country were centralized. Moreover, in the person of the humblest of her priests, the little country curé à portion congrue, she heard the griefs of the people, whose burdens and miseries the pastors shared.[11] Berulle, Vincent de Paul, Olier, Hofbauer, and Alphonsus Liguori had strongly imprinted a virile faith and a firm discipline on the clergy of the ancient regime. These qualities had enabled this great body of the state to escape, in large part, that corruption of the people of the world, those utopias of the literary class, and that irritation of the common people, which constituted the essential ills of the closing years of that century. Two favorable traits showed this fact morally and socially: a spirit of charity, manifesting itself on every occasion with chivalrous generosity,[12] and a spirit of fervor that remained alive in chosen souls, which the scandals of the time did but stimulate. Yet the clergy of [9] Gustave Gautherot, op. cit., p. 17.

[10] Quoted by Taine, op. cit., II, 81.

[11] On the wretched situation of the curés à portion congrue, see Taine, L'ancien régime, I, 114–20.

[12] Sicard, L'ancien clergé de France, II, 109.

the eighteenth century did not succeed in avoiding a threefold danger.

In the practice of charity they were too inclined to follow in the wake of the philosophers of the age; they too often used the language and the so-called principles of those philosophers. They did not appeal earnestly enough to the strong theology of St. Thomas Aquinas, where they would have found many fruitful maxims and many safe rules. Nor did they appeal loudly enough to the traditions of the Church, where they would have met many fine models; and thus they allowed the sentimental philosophy of the eighteenth century to profit by the prestige of their devotedness.[13]

Between the two orders of the clergy a chasm had been opened by the social and political conditions. The clergy themselves made this gulf the more evident. The upper clergy, drawn from the ranks of the nobility and the higher bourgeoisie, sometimes laid claim to honors instead of devoting themselves to the ministry of souls. The lower clergy, recruited from the humblest ranks of society, often had nothing but duties to perform without profit or honor to encourage them. More than one poor priest, upon returning from the bishop's residence where he had beheld the splendors of a princely installation, kept a bitter remembrance of the riches he had seen. Perhaps, in his lowly presbytery, he cast his eyes on some issue of the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, in which the Jansenist party railed at the luxury and the attitudes that were traits of the nobility and that had been introduced into the Church. Or his eyes might fall upon one of those revolutionary pamphlets which the Encyclopedists were circulating in the most remote provinces.[14] Then the poor plebeian curé felt arising in his soul a vague feeling of unrest [13] Cf. ibid., II, 43, 101; Kurth, op. cit., pp. 182 ff.

[14] In 1782 Archibishop du Lau of Arles noted the scandalous spread of the works of Voltaire and Rousseau. He complained that licentious writings were thrown at night even into the enclosures of monasteries. See De La Gorce, Histoire religieuse de la Révolution française, I, 67.

and hatred, no less threatening to the social order and the peace of the Church than was the blind tranquillity of the great Church dignitary taking his repose in the luxury of his sumptuous palace.[15]

In fine, part of the upper clergy let themselves be drawn into too close alliances with the state. The three chief centers of these alliances were Vienna, Florence, and Paris.

Josephism and Febronianism

Toward the end of the eighteenth century two theories, often confused by historians because they were themselves merged in a common action, obtained a great credit with the king and the upper clergy. These were Josephism and Febronianism.

The Josephist theory, much earlier constructed by the jurists and confused with texts of the Roman law, maintained that the religious establishment was a matter of the civil government. Maria Theresa, and especially Joseph II, had injected this system into the laws. It renewed, in aggravated form, the errors of the Caesarean Gallicanism of the kings of France.

The Febronian theory, based on arguments of a canonical order and on conciliar texts of the fifteenth century, particularly on the rights of the sovereign, revived and exaggerated the claims of the episcopal Gallicanism of the French bishops. The leading bishops of Germany, chosen from the most devoted partisans of the emperor, spread the spirit of this view.

The Punctuation of Ems

But the exigencies of the strife soon practically united the adherents of the two theories. In 1781 Febronianism, in the person of its chief, Nikolaus von Hontheim, placed itself at the service of Josephism. Five years later the three ecclesiastical electors of the Empire—Baron Charles Joseph von Herthal (archbishop of Mainz), Clement Wenceslaus of Trier, and Archduke Maximilian Franz of Cologne—together with the Archbishop of Salzburg, sealed the alliance in the famous twenty-three declarations, known in history under the name of the Punctuation of Ems.

[15] Many priests even went so far as to join Masonic lodges. See De La Gorce, op. cit., p. 66.

As Cardinal Pacca wrote in his Mémoires, the Churches and the clergy of Germany, at the close of the eighteenth century, were at the height of human greatness. The most beautiful and most fertile regions of Germany belonged to the clergy, who there possessed the right of temporal sovereignty. In the electoral college, out of eight electors three were ecclesiastics: these were the archbishops of Mainz, of Trier, and of Cologne. When we reflect that these prelates in their opulence were not greatly satisfied to pay the levy imposed on them by the Holy See,[16] that they were easily faultfinding with regard to that Roman power, and that their spirit of absolutism took proud pleasure in holding up their crosiers in the presence of the tiara, we are not surprised at their complacency toward the new movement. Pecuniary interest, the desire to flatter public opinion, and their hierarchical sensibilities, all conspired to stiffen them against Rome. Says Hergenröther: "A large number of bishops dreamed of establishing a national German Church." [17]

The Congress of Ems, held in the month of August, 1786, declared that the pope had no right to send nuncios invested with any jurisdiction. Its members acknowledged in the Sovereign Pontiff merely a right of primacy and of general inspection; but, on the other hand, they granted to all the bishops the [16] The Roman monetary demands on the prince electors appear excessive if we simply look at the figures. But the amount that had to be paid once and for all by the archbishop of Mainz was no more than a twenty-eighth of his annual revenue. G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, I, 39–42.

[17] Hergenröther-Kirsch, Kirchengeschichte, Vol. VII, Bk. II, Part II, chap. 4.

most absolute right of binding and loosing, without any recourse from the episcopal jurisdiction to the jurisdiction of the Holy See. Every bull, every papal brief, was to be regarded as null unless received and accepted by the bishops. The declarations of Ems mark the last insurrection of ecclesiastical nationalism against the Roman Catholicism. They were eagerly backed and encouraged by Emperor Joseph II. But many members of the episcopate, notably the bishops of Freising and Spires, taking umbrage at the slight account which at Ems was taken of the right of simple bishops, voiced energetic protests. The nuncio at Munich, Zoglio, and the nuncio at Cologne, Pacca, sustained them in the name of Rome. The people joined their voices to them in the name of its traditions. Josephist statesmen and Febronian prelates thus had against them the ancestors of that Catholic people which more than once in the course of the nineteenth century would constrain the upper clergy of Germany to take account of the directions of Rome. By a letter dated November 14, 1789, a masterpiece of calm and moderate firmness, Pope Pius VI condemned the doctrine of the four bishops. The controversy died out in the uproar of the French Revolution.

Synod of Pistoia

But another center of revolt against Rome was lighted up in Italy, where the brother of Emperor Joseph II, Grand Duke Leopold of Tuscany, was maintaining similar principles. Joseph II found his inspiration in the philosophers; Leopold I welcomed the teaching of the Jansenists. However, on the question of the relations between Church and state, the two doctrines easily came into accord. The man whom Leopold used to consult for the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs was Scipio Ricci. This man was an ambitious and intriguing bishop whom the Emperor put in the see of Pistoia in 1780. He was related to the general of the Society of Jesus, the celebrated Lorenzo Ricci, who had died five months before as a prisoner in the Castle Sant' Angelo following the events related in the preceding volume. Bishop Ricci, a daring and meddlesome man, had early embraced the principles of Jansenism. A faithful imitator of the "appelants" of France, he took for himself and proposed to others as a model the following four men: Soanen, whom he called "the great bishop," Quesnel "the martyr for truth," and Mésenguy and Gourlin "the lights of the Church." He said that his aim was to combat the "spiritual Babylon," for the communion of saints and the independence of the princes. He gathered about him a few priests already known for their liberal opinions: Tamburini, Zola, Natali, Bottieri, and Palmieri. Then, in agreement with Grand Duke Leopold, he convoked at Pistoia a synod intended to provide a remedy for the abuses in the Church.

The Synod of Pistoia, which opened on September 18, 1786, was attended by 234 priests. They began by proclaiming the principles of the most radical Jansenism on faith, grace, and predestination. They forbade the worship of the Sacred Heart. Ricci had a special antipathy for this devotion. Then the question of the authority of the Church was taken up. They proclaimed the pope the ministerial head of the Church. This view, taken in the sense that the pope received his powers from the Church itself, was heretical. They adopted the four articles of 1682. Further, they declared that, in the doctrine of salvation, nothing is true except what goes back to antiquity, and that what has been produced in the course of time is necessarily false. Consequently they maintained that all the doctrinal decisions reached in the Church during recent centuries are without any authority. Lastly, they invited Leopold to reform the Church by virtue of his own authority, to abolish certain feast days, to regulate the parishes; and they expressed the wish that all the religious orders should be reduced to a single one, in accordance with the constitutions of Port Royal.

Ricci's project was to have the Pistoia decrees confirmed by a national council. With a view to preparing for such a council, Leopold summoned the seventeen bishops of Tuscany to meet at Florence in April, 1787. Only three answered the summons. The meeting could not be held. The clergy became divided. The popular opinion turned against Ricci, and his palace was sacked. When, upon the death of Joseph II in 1790, Leopold left Tuscany and ascended the imperial throne, the Bishop of Pistoia was obliged to abandon his see and flee to Florence. Four years later Pope Pius VI, after mature examination, issued his bull Auctorem fidei (August 28, 1794), condemning eighty-five propositions taken from the Synod of Pistoia.[18] The papal bull was generally received respectfully. Bishop Benedict Solari of Noli was the only prelate who publicly refused to publish it.

Church and State in France

France did not witness manifestations of this sort until after the fall of the monarchy, when it was evidenced by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. But, ever since the beginning of the eighteenth century, the spirit that dominated the relations of the state with the upper clergy was very much like that which animated the courts of Vienna and Florence.

As Pierre de La Gorce says, close to every cathedral stood an edifice having the appearance of a palace. This mansion was the bishop's residence. No presentation, whether of the bishops of the province or of the local authorities, guided or hindered the decision of the prince. Under the title of ministre de feuille, the monarch had a sort of minister of worship who proposed to him the candidates to be nominated. This high office was held, until 1777, by Bishop Jarente of Orléans, an unworthy prelate. The Holy See refused to grant institution to the person thus designated. At the end of Louis XIV's reign, Massilon wrote: "The Church has no need of great names, but of great virtues." In the eighteenth century the practice had become established of nominating to prelacies only men of the nobility. In the list of bishops given in the royal almanac of 1788, we find all the great houses of the kingdom represented. At Metz was a Montmorency; at Strasbourg, a Rohan; at La Rochelle, a Crussol; at Besançon, a Durfort; at Laon, a Sabran; at Auch, a La Tour du Pin. In 1789 we find two Talleyrands, "as though one would not have been enough." [19] The 1,500 church benefices subject to royal nomination "became a sort of mint for the benefit of the great. In accordance with the custom of giving more to those who have the most, the wealthiest prelates had, over and above their episcopal revenue, the richest abbeys. According to the Almanac, Bishop Rohan of Strasbourg thus had an additional income of 60,000 livres; Archbishop La Rochefoucault of Rouen, 130,000." [20]

[18] Denz., nos. 1501–99.

These immense incomes were used by some to maintain "the dignity of their rank," as they said; by others, to reward the assiduous attentions of their close friends. Still others, more scandalously, spent these incomes at the court.[21] A type of these court prelates was that Duke de Rohan, bishop of Strasbourg, whose culpable and heedless conduct in the "affair of the necklace" stirred popular indignation against the Queen. Another was La Font de Savine. His family's influence with Louis XVI obtained for him in 1778 the bishopric of Viviers. By the rashness of his doctrines and also by the oddities of his life he was deservedly called by his followers the Rousseau of the clergy.[22]

[19] De La Gorce, Histoire religieuse de la Révolution française, I, 41.

[20] Taine, L'ancien régime, I, 101.

[21] D'Argenson, with some exaggeration, exclaims: "The court! In this word is the whole evil. The court has become the Senate of the realm; the lowest Versailles valet is a senator; the chambermaids are part of the government. . . . The court is the death of the nation." Quoted by Taine, op. cit., I, 113.

We do not see the authoritative representatives of the French clergy opposed to a reform of the ecclesiastical organization. None dared to demand the maintenance of the status quo. On May 29, 1790, Archbishop Boisgelin of Aix, speaking in the name of the clergy of the Assembly, declared: "Undoubtedly, abuses must be reformed, and a new order of things must be introduced." [23]

In what spirit would this needed reform take place? The Archbishop of Aix asked that the reform be undertaken by the Church, or at least with the consent of the Church. But the Gallicans and the Jansenists wished to have it accomplished by the state alone; and the so-called philosophers thought of having it carried out in the spirit of their doctrines. These last tendencies would prevail. The political crisis, which was threatening the ruin of the ancient regime, would be complicated by a no less formidable intellectual crisis, which tended to nothing less than the overthrow of the very foundations of the social order.

[22] Sicard, L'ancien clergé de France, II, 51.
[23] Moniteur of May 30, 1790, p. 610.

CHAPTER II

The Intellectual Crisis

JOSEPH DE MAISTRE says that the French Revolution was prepared by its victims. But this statement, if taken without qualification, is an exaggeration. The Revolution, that is, the revolutionary and antireligious character given to the legitimate movement of reform which took place at the close of the eighteenth century, was owing to unchristian philosophy. Robespierre's triumph was prepared by Voltaire and Jean Jacques Rousseau.

We cannot say that the revolutionary spirit originated in France alone. If the French Revolution so promptly won practically all Europe to its cause, that success and consequence is to be traced to the fact that everywhere the soil was well prepared for it. England, Germany, Italy, and Holland were ready to receive the revolutionary poison. We know how much in the way of ideas Voltaire took from the English philosophers. Rousseau's chief principle, that the moral question merges into the social question, that is, the origin of our evils does not come to us from our nature but from the organization of the society in which we live, is a principle taken over from English philosophy. In Germany the advisers of Joseph II got their inspiration from the Lutheran Reformers as much as from the French philosophers. In Italy the utopias of Campanella and the fiery verses of Alfieri in behalf of abstract and almost deified liberty had almost the same tone as the enthusiastic pages of the French visionaries. In Protestant Holland the disciples of Grotius and Spinoza did not wait for the publication of the Encyclopedia and of the Social Contract before they fancied a complete restoration of the law of nations and of the political organization. The revolutionary spirit was everywhere. And everywhere, in the elation of minds and the eagerness of efforts, the same two traits stood out: the utopia in the ideal aimed at and the violence in the proposed means. These will be the two elements of the Revolution, which will be the work of the ideologist and of the Jacobin.

The Philosophical Movement in England

In England, from More to Hobbes and Locke, social philosophy developed with theories that possessed an unheard-of daring.

In Thomas More's Utopia, which appeared at the beginning of the sixteenth century, how much was purely chimerical and how much was serious? [1] The fantastic paradox, which aroused the attention and tempered astonishment with a smile, was often the form chosen by the innovators to insinuate more surely the truths they considered useful. More's Utopia was clearly inspired by Plato's Republic. The Greek philosopher had said: "So long as the wise will not be kings and so long as the kings will not be philosophers, no remedy will be found for the evils that desolate the states." Like Plato, More made his whole social conception rest on the criticism of ownership. His ideal was a society where all goods would be in common. He was, however, far removed from Plato by a broad feeling of humaneness and by a deep sympathy for the classes that suffered. His republic had no castes: each citizen was called on to engage in material labors, ennobled by intellectual recreations. The principle of power was placed in the consent of the people, and the regime of the state was that of an industrious and democratic republic.

What More had conceived with his Catholic spirit, sincerely

[1] De optimo reipublicae statu, deque nova insula Utopia, first published in 1516.

submissive to the Church, Hobbes and Locke took up from an entirely different point of view. Imbued with Bacon's utilitarian ideas,[2] which were far from being lofty or philosophical, they set forth the plan of their society, based on the ideas of conservation and interest. Hobbes established the theory of absolutism, but based it on such arguments that he stirred discussion of it and opposition to it. For him morality is not an end; it is a means, the means for having order and peace.[3]

Hobbes had written against the English Revolution; Locke took up his pen in its defense. Hobbes was the first to imagine that the origin of civil society might be found in a certain state preceding society. Locke set out from the same hypothesis. But there, where Hobbes thought he could establish the basis of despotism, Locke claimed to find the justification for a permanent right of rebellion. In reply to the question, "Who shall be judge whether the prince or the legislative power acts contrary to its trust?" he answers: "The people shall be judge. For who shall be judge whether his trustee or deputy acts rightly and according to the trust reposed in him, but he who deputes him?" [4] Locke also held that all the power of civil government relates only to the civil interests, is limited to the things of this world, and has no concern with the world to come.[5]

The Philosophical Movement in Germany

In Germany, the social philosophy offered nothing original. But metaphysics, from Wolff to Kant, and religious criticism,

[2] "What I attack is the idea of English science, which is not lofty or philosophical. There they judge science merely by its practical results and its civilizing effects. This way of viewing science is unsafe. It is as if, for establishing morality, we should confine ourselves to setting forth the advantages it procures for society." E. Renan, L'avenir de la science, p. 22.

[3] Cf. Paul Janet, Histoire de la science politique dans ses rapports avec la morale (2nd ed.), II, 266–306. Hobbes' ideas are set forth in his De cive and his Leviathan.

[4] Locke, Of Civil Government, Bk. II, chap. 19, no. 240.

[5] This is the principle of his Epistola de tolerantia, which appeared in 1689.

from Semler to Goethe, turned in the direction of a revolutionary naturalism.

Christian Wolff, who undertook the task of summarizing the philosophy of Leibnitz and pushing it to its ultimate consequences, taught that God cannot be man's end and that society should be organized merely in view of an earthly end. The popular acclaim given to his writings was extreme; the study of his doctrines was made obligatory for all candidates who presented themselves for theological degrees. The invasion of Wolffianism into German theology was disastrous. On the pretext of scientific thought, many persons attenuated Christian dogma; others abandoned it entirely and accepted no laws but those of reason, those of free choice.[6]

Later on we find Kant deriving his inspiration from Rousseau in his individual and his social doctrine. Rousseau's "conscience" becomes the "categorical imperative" of Kant's practical reason; the general principles of the Social Contract dictate Kant's whole political system. Those principles are that of "the general will" considered as the sole source of the laws and that of the distinction, in each individual, between the "citizen lawmaker" and the subject.

German religious thought, which appealed to the authority of Scripture, regarded by Protestantism as the only source of revelation, developed in the direction of an autonomous naturalism. In 1771 Semler proposed a new criterion for establishing the canon of the Bible: to accept as inspired by God only the books producing a moral betterment. In 1777, the Wolfenbüttel Fragments, edited by Lessing but composed by Samuel Reimarus, a professor at Hamburg, absolutely denied miracles, particularly the miracle of Christ's resurrection, and declared the impossibility of a divine revelation. Shortly afterward, in a personal work, the drama of Nathan der Weise, Lessing clearly professed religious indifferentism.

[6] Hergenröther, op. cit. (4th ed.), Bk. II, Part II, chap. 13.

On the ruins heaped up by radical naturalism, in Germany then developed a visionary pantheism which received the name of Illuminism. Herder, Goethe, and Schiller, in different degrees, may be considered its most illustrious representatives. Johann Gottfried Herder, poet and philosopher gifted with a mighty imagination, in his Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit preached a vague and grandiose religion, with ill-defined dogmas, almost identical with the worship of humanity. Goethe, failing to see anything higher than the ancient Hellenism and earthly beauty, deified plastic beauty and the satisfaction of the senses. Schiller who, at the close of his days, was not far removed from Christian ideas and became almost Catholic, bemoaned the death of the gods of Greece and Rome.

The Philosophical Movement in Italy

Italy likewise had its social utopia in Campanella's Civitas Solis. More's Utopia is a popular republic; Campanella's Civitas Solis is a theocratic republic. At the summit of the state is the metaphysician, a sort of "good tyrant" whose office is to enforce the sway of reason; beneath are three magistrates (Might, Love, and Wisdom), applying the prescriptions of Reason. The function of the first is the national defense; that of the second to watch over the development of the population; the third has charge of the progress of the sciences and the arts. In the Civitas Solis the communism goes beyond that of the Utopia. It includes not only property, but also the women and the family.

More restrained in his plan of reform, but more precise in his demands, Marquis Cesare Beccaria of Milan simply gathers together, a hundred years later, in his Tratto dei delitti e delle pene and in his work on agriculture and manufactures, all the appeals that had been disseminated during a century in a countless number of pamphlets and large volumes. Avoiding the use of trifling expressions and digressions, he lays down several of the principles that later, with the doctrines of Adam Smith, constituted the liberal political economy. For Beccaria the best social organization is the one that produces the largest amount of useful labor. By useful labor he means that which gives the greatest quantity of negotiable products. He analyzes the real functions of productive capital and the vicissitudes of the population. He recommends the division of labor and proposes a decimal system based on the system of the world. But, with most of the economists of the time, he declares that manufacturing is barren. A peaceful and even timid man, Beccaria took little part in the agitations of the world; but his ideas exercised a notable influence on men's minds.

Almost at the same time as Beccaria's work on agriculture, in Italy, under the title of Scienza della legislazione, a great work appeared which, in a vigorous, picturesque, even theatrical style, embraced not only political economy, but also public and private law, the family, education, and religion. This book was the work of a young man, thirty years old, Gaetano Filangieri of Naples, who died six years later without seeing his utopias evaporate before the lessons of experience. Filangieri's aim was to reform humanity from top to bottom. For the realization of his projects he counted on the unlimited power of the laws and of authority. According to him, authority gives birth to the geniuses and creates the philosophers. A ruler, merely by pressing the mainspring of honor, can form legions of Scipios and Reguluses. He would concentrate all the social functions in the hands of the prince, whose authority he wished to see enter everywhere. Filangieri and other Italian writers of the time, being without experience in political affairs, indulged in fanciful schemes that failed to appreciate the practical obstacles in the way of their abstract maxims.[7]

An Italian poet spread the revolutionary ideas among the common people. Alfieri of Asti was an aristocrat enamored of the abstract liberty then being preached. He boasted that he scorned Rousseau and the philosophers, but he imitated them. In him every sentiment turned into passion, every passion into frenzy; a frenzy of study, of love, of liberty. In his political comedies his humor consisted in showing the heroes on their prosaic and grotesque side. In La tirannide he exaggerated Rousseau's doctrines, attacked the arts and industry, proclaimed that Christians were more enslaved than were the Orientals, and advised everyone to come to an agreement not to obey the despots. In one of his plays, he puts on the lips of a jester of Philip II this question: "What would Your Majesty do if, when you say Yes, everyone else should say No?" He witnessed the Revolution, but did not grasp its import. Death came to him in 1803, after he had dedicated several of his tragedies to posterity.[8]

[7] Cf. Cesare Cantu, Storia dei cent' anni, 1750–1850.

The Philosophical Movement in Holland

Like sunny Italy, foggy Holland had its authoritarians and its republicans, its partisans of the "good tyrant" and its abettors of anarchy. The difference separating one party from the other was less than may appear at first sight. The former appealed to the authority of the jurist Grotius; the latter claimed the authority of the philosopher Spinoza. Both aspired to a complete regeneration of society.

Grotius is known especially as the one who revived the law of nations. Although his fame on this point is overrated, for he was preceded by the Dominican Vittoria,[9] therein lies his true title to renown. But Grotius was also concerned with the renewal of political and social institutions; and his ideas, systematically arranged and explained by his disciple Pufendorf, inspired the policy of Joseph II. His conclusions were not unlike those of Hobbes; but his procedure was quite different. What the English thinker examined as a philosopher, the Dutch thinker studies as a jurist. Grotius treats the questions of the natural law by the maxims of the civil law. The civil law which he invoked is that of ancient Rome. With a text of the jurist Paulus he decides the question of the origin of property;[10] and again following Paulus, he solves the problem of sovereignty by an argument of analogy with the Roman tutorage. He says: "There is no reason why civil governments should not exist that are established for the advantage of the sovereign. Even when the establishment of the government has taken place in the interest of the subjects, this condition would not require in consequence the superiority of the people over the sovereign, for nobody considers that the pupil should be above the teacher."[11]

[8] Arthur Graf, in his well documented work, L'Anglomania in Italia (Turin, 1911), shows that Alfieri and the Italian writers of the eighteenth century, generally owe much to the English influence.

[9] See his De jure belli.

Spinoza is a philosopher, and his metaphysics, at least at first glance, presents a certain principle of grandeur and dignity, which is quite absent from the metaphysics of Hobbes. According to Spinoza, man is not merely a part of nature, he is a part of the Divinity. But, as some have held that the Amsterdam philosopher is "intoxicated with God," and others that he is basically atheistic, his political and social doctrine evidently contains a fundamental ambiguity. To one of his friends, Spinoza wrote: "What distinguishes my political views from those of Hobbes is that I preserve the natural law, even in the civil state, and that I grant the sovereign rights over the subjects only according to the measure of his power."[12] But if the natural law is preserved, how is force the measure of the right; and if force is the measure of right, how does the natural law remain? However this may be, Spinoza's doctrine differs essentially from that of Hobbes in its spirit. Hobbes requires of the state nothing more than order and peace. What Spinoza demands of it is first of all liberty. He says that if we give the name of peace to slavery, barbarism, and solitude, then peace is the most wretched thing in the world. Peace, however, does not consist merely in the absence of war, but in the union of spirits and in concord.[13] On the question of the advantages of monarchy, he is in direct opposition to the English philosopher. He says: "Some think that if the power is given to a single man, it will be stronger. This view is wrong. A single man has not the strength to support so great a burden: hence he will have counselors who will govern for him; and this government, which has an appearance of being monarchical, will in practice be an aristocracy, but a hidden aristocracy, and thereby the worst of all. Furthermore, if the king is a child, an invalid, or aged, he is king only in name; often, when impelled by his passion, he leaves the power in the hands of a mistress or a favorite courtier." [14]

[10] Grotius, De jure pacis et belli, Bk. II, chap. 3, § 3.
[11] Ibid., Bk. I, chap. 3, § 15.
[12] Spinoza, Epist. 25.

Thus from one end of Europe to the other a general unrest stirred men's minds. Reform plans of vastest scope, the most rash, the most general, the most hateful, the most subversive, and the most revolutionary, arose on all sides, stirring an enthusiasm the more lively since they were often vague as a dream, rallying to their support a number of minds as great as generally they were ambiguous: abstract and calculating, under a scientific and precise appearance, pagan and mystical, glorifying in turn despotism and anarchy, tracing everything to man and nature, and making of man and nature a sort of divinity. But this widespread excitation had a center, France, toward which, since the "great century," all the thinkers of Europe persistently turned their eyes.

[13] Spinoza, Tractat. polit., § 4.
[14] Ibid., chap. 6, § 5, 8.

French Philosophers

An endless subject of discussion is provided by the question of the influence exercised by France and the influence exercised upon France in the spread of the revolutionary ideas. But we may be certain that, where an outside influence is evident, the French expression of it finally prevailed. The success of this formulation of the ideas was owing to the clearer, more ingenious, or more eloquent turn that it took. In this respect, Voltaire, Rousseau, and the Encyclopedists are truly the fathers of the Revolution.

We have already studied the history of their predecessors.[15] The Renaissance of ancient literature had, in many souls, brought about a revival of the pagan spirit. Pantheistic or atheistic rationalism, which in the Middle Ages appeared under the form of Averroism and Illuminism, gradually assumed the form of radical unbelief. This rationalism was spread quietly by the semi-rationalism of Faustus Socinus, which attacked the divinity of Christ and even the nature of God. The movement was also furthered by the literary skepticism of Rabelais, the changing and varied dilettantism of Montaigne, the political indifferentism of Michael de l'Hospital, the theoretical Epicureanism of Gassendi, and the exaggerated cultivation of science and the laws of nature as set forth by the school of Descartes and brilliantly interpreted by Fontenelle. This same movement was also affected by the harmful influence of that increasing group of reckless spirits who were pardoned everything by the salons of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and who alarmed not only the orthodoxy of Father Garasse and Father Mersenne but also the good sense of Nicole and Leibnitz. Naturalism had thus leaped over the various stages that led from Petrarch to Voltaire, from humanism to philosophism, from the college of apostolic secretaries to the salon of Ninon de Lenclos, and from the movement of the Renaissance to that of the Encyclopedia.

[15] Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, VI, 499 ff.

We have already spoken of this vast undertaking, which brought together men of the most diverse views—atheists and deists, revolutionists and conservatives, individualist economists like Turgot and communist economists like Mably. But this same undertaking found its unity in an identical inspiration, belief in the supremacy of reason.

These men met one another in the salons of high society. The salons of the seventeenth century had produced psychologists; those of the eighteenth century produced philosophers, or at least men who called themselves philosophers. In the list of the subscribers of the Encyclopedia, we find the greatest names of France.

In the course of the eighteenth century the literary people used to meet especially in the salons of two women well known for the looseness of their morals and the freedom of their spirit: the notorious Ninon de Lenclos and the extravagant Madame de Tencin. So fashionable was the frequenting of the salon of Ninon de Lenclos that we find there the most distinguished persons of the royal court and such celebrities as Saint-Evremond, Guy-Patin, Molière, La Fare, and Chaulieu. Abbé de Châteauneuf there presented his godson, François Arouet. Ninon was so impressed by the mind of this young man that she bequeathed to him 2,000 francs for the purchase of books for his library.

Voltaire (1694–1778)

Thus began the fame of François Arouet de Voltaire. This renown was like that of most of his contemporaries. To be launched by a salon was the surest means of attaining fame. For budding reputations the salon was in those days what the press is today.

In a general history of the Church we have no need to relate in detail the life of Voltaire. But the part this man played in the strife against Catholicism requires that we briefly take note of his person and his work. Voltaire did incalculable harm. Few characters have been more contemptible than his, and even his writings are a strange mixture of literary values. But he possessed an undeniable power of seduction. He was representative of a whole group of minds, and he exercised on his age an incomparable influence.

The first part of his life, until 1746, was devoted to acquiring a reputation. While still a youth he succeeded in widely extending his relationships. College students, eminent people of the world, literary people, persons of the business world, actors, in all these circles he counted his friends. He engaged in every form of writing: epic poetry in his Henriade, tragic poetry in his Œdipe or his Zaïre, didactic poetry in the Epistles or the Discourses on Man, history in his Charles XII, scholarly writing in the Memoirs that he composed for the Academy of Sciences, philosophy in his Lettres anglaises and his Essay on the Philosophy of Newton. His ambition was to be the teacher and guide of the minds of his time.

His ideas are summed up in three essential works: the Epîtres à Uranie (1722–31), the Philosophical Letters (1733–34), and the Discourses on Man (1734–38). The first of these works proposes deism or natural religion in opposition to revealed religion; the second exalts the idea of science; the third popularizes a number of ideas current in English philosophy, such as the idea that virtue is measured by the degree of social usefulness, and the progress of mankind by the development of the arts and of life. In short, Voltaire nowhere shows himself an original thinker. But in a lucid, incisive, and unequaled popular style, he presents under a form easily grasped the ideas scattered in the world of the libertines, the venturous minds, and the innovators of every sort. Voltaire sets forth in detail and explains the great discoveries, the great hypotheses of the human mind. He parades before his readers' astonished eyes—but with distortion, caricature, and ridicule—the great men of sacred and profane history, the ancient religions, the old legends. The Frenchmen of his time discussed these books, pamphlets, treatises, novels, histories, and dictionaries, in which all human knowledge, all reviews of the past, all the disputes of the day, and all dreams about the future were gathered together in lively phrases, in sparkling metaphors, in familiar proverbs, and in indecent anecdotes. "I have done more in my time," said Voltaire, "than Luther and Calvin did in theirs." At least he had in common with the two Protestant Reformers this trait, that he finally aggravated all the ills of his time.

Jean Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778)

Voltaire was only a destroyer. Jean Jacques Rousseau wished to be a reconstructor. Taine, with his habitual vigor, has depicted the dominating powers of "this man of the people, ill suited to the elegant world, ill at ease in a salon, ill born, ill brought up, stained by his wretched and precocious experience, sick in soul and body, carrying the defilement of his temperament even into his austere morality and into his purest idyls. He was alien, Protestant, at once philanthropic and misanthropic, dwelling in an ideal world which he had erected into something quite the reverse of the real world." [16] Yet this man would exercise over his contemporaries and especially over generations to come, an influence greater than that of Voltaire. In fact, the latter was effective only by satire; Rousseau was particularly captivating by his fancies. He was not merely an amusing comedian, he was a magician who charms, a man of passion who draws others in his train. He spoke of conscience, of duty, of Providence, of the Gospels, of Christ "whose death was that of a God, as the death of Socrates was that of a sage." All this he did with a contagious warmth, in a style overflowing, virile, forcible, impetuous, vibrant, and sonorous.

[16] Taine, L'ancien régime, II, 104–7.

Le Play has denounced the false dogmas bestowed on the Revolution by Rousseau. These doctrines are three in number: the dogmas of man's original perfection, of man's providential equality, and of the right of revolt; and are found set forth in three chief works: the Discourse on Inequality, the Social Contract, and Emile.

Outraged at the miseries of the present world, Rousseau imagines a perfect state, which he supposes was and must have been the natural and primitive state of mankind. He built up his ideal man out of whole cloth, a man such as must have come forth from the hands of the Creator. This man is strong and agile, able to triumph over all the obstacles of nature; the passions have not changed his harmonious constitution; a rare delicacy of the senses, a feeling of conservation, an instinct of goodness, and a natural sobriety assured him of tranquillity and happiness. Rousseau writes: "I see him sitting down under an oak, quenching his thirst at the first brook, finding his repose under the same tree as furnished his repast; and thus all his needs are satisfied." [17] The society of the eighteenth century, so artificial, so polished, so complex, but suffering from that very complexity, contemplated this ideal man with delight and surprise and, by the very contrast, became enamored of him. "By this contrast," says Taine, "Rousseau found himself so forcible. He showed the dawn to people who never rose from bed before noon. In a society where life consisted in strutting gracefully according to a set manner, he preached the return to nature, independence, a life active, earnest, happy, and free, in the light of day and in the open air." [18]

[17] Discours sur l'inégalité, Part I (1864 ed.), I, 536.
[18] L'ancien régime, II, 110.

Rousseau could easily show that in this primitive state of original perfection providential equality prevailed. The less human nature was developed, the less it took account of differences between men. The most natural and the most equal state is that of the germ. Inequality is, then, the work of civilization, of the passage from the state of nature to the social state. Work created property, property created inequality, and inequality gave rise to the social organization, which by its laws established the domination of the strong and the servitude of the weak. Rousseau said: "Such was and such must have been the origin of society and of laws, that provided new shackles for the weak and new power for the rich, permanently destroyed natural liberty, fixed the law of property and inequality, and, for the advantage of some, thenceforth subjected the whole human race to labor, to servitude, to wretchedness." [19]

In these terrible words is found the sentiment that would supply Rousseau with the third of his "false dogmas," the dogma of the perpetual right to revolt. The people have, first of all, the right and the duty to revolt against the social state which he showed had an unjust origin. He says: "For man to give up his liberty is to give up his quality of being man." [20] Even when the people, in conditions which the philosopher carefully determines, have stipulated a social contract, this contract does not oblige. The people are sovereign, and a sovereign cannot bind himself except toward himself. "It is against the nature of the body politic for the sovereign to impose on himself a law that he is unable to break: whence we see that no fundamental law, not even the social contract, can be obligatory for the body of the people." [21]

Such a theory so excessively flattered the passions of a soft

[19] Op. cit., I, 558.
[20] Contrat social, Bk. I, chap. 4.
[21] Ibid., chap. 7.

and corrupt society that it found therein great acceptance. With most men of the Revolution, we find a surprising contrast between their idyllic dreams and their bloody acts, a contrast that is explained by Rousseau's doctrine. These utopias of the Constituent Assembly and the massacres of the Terror are connected with the Discourse on Inequality and the Social Contract. The ideologist and the Jacobin would find their views in Jean Jacques Rousseau.[22] In his writing as in the work of the Revolution, the idyl gave birth to tragedy.

Influence of the New Theories

The revolutionary doctrines spread the more easily as they found powerful auxiliaries among the Gallicans and the Jansenists, incomparable aid in Freemasonry, and accomplices even in the Church.

We have already noted how the Jansenism and the parliamentary Gallicanism of the eighteenth century, while firmly determined to remain in the Church, had been led to take an attitude clearly revolutionary.[23] The religious policy of Joseph II in Germany and the attitude of the Synod of Pistoia in Italy were the last stages of that evolution. These two events exercised a notable influence over men's minds.

"During the second half of the eighteenth century, not only theology, but the faith itself underwent a profound decline. The old methods no longer exercised any attraction; the new ideas brought honors and advantages; the novel doctrines were expressed in a sparkling style that fascinated people." [24] By a phenomenon that is met more than once in the history of apologetics, defections took place among the most earnest opponents of the current errors. Some Benedictines and some Jesuits, through studying the aberrations of Josephism with a view to refuting them, had let themselves be taken in by their sophisms. Furthermore, too much emphasis was given to the sole aim of refuting the adversaries. Thus the studies of the Catholics became dependent on those of the Protestants; all continuity with the great preceding era was broken; rationalist, Jansenist, and revolutionary elements penetrated Catholic literature; theology took the tone of the philosophy of the time; attempts were made, by transforming it in a more "rational" sense, to put it in the current of the so-called progress. In 1774 the Benedictine Rautenstrauch, director of the faculty of theology at Vienna, prescribed the abandonment of the scholastic dryness to give more importance to exegetical, patristic, and historical studies.

[22] On Rousseau, see J. Lemaitre, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and Faguet, Vie de Rousseau. On the philosophers of the eighteenth century in general, see, besides the works of Taine and Roustan, the following: Faguet, Le XVIII^e siècle; J. Fabre, Les pères de la Révolution, favorable to the philosophers; for a different view, Tornézy, La legende des philosophes.

[23] Mourret, op. cit.; see Vol. VI, Index.

[24] Hergenröther, op. cit., Vol. VII, Bk. II, Part II, chap. 14.

Soon prudent men could see that the new regulation had merely favored frivolity and caprice, especially when Emperor Joseph II proclaimed liberty of conscience and liberty of the press. The exegete Christopher Fischer and the scholar Jahn were notable for their doctrinal boldness; the historian Dannenmayr published a manual of history filled with prejudices against the Holy See. A Vienna ecclesiastical review, the Wiener Kirchenzeitung, took for its motto, "To work for the progress of the earliest Christianity and of the most modern philosophy." A former Jesuit, Joannes Yung, professor at Mainz, remained faithful to Catholic dogma, but he favored the novelties in discipline; a Friar Minor, Philip Hedderich, insulted the Apostolic See in his lectures on canon law; a Benedictine, Andrew Spitz, took his inspiration from the same spirit in his lectures on history; another Friar Minor, Elias Van den Schüren, taught a pure subjectivism. The Bishop of Trier sanctioned with his approbation the most dubious theories. Many Bavarian Benedictines openly embraced the doctrines of Wolff; others, the doctrines of Kant.

These dissolving influences reached the ranks of the lower clergy and even the laity. Some priests who, under the Josephist regime, sat beside the young Protestant pastors at the lectures of the theologian Paulus and whom the state wished to make good "teachers of the people" rather than ministers of God, became, as someone has said, "the interpreters, always banal even though elegant, of a natural ethics, half-rationalist and half perfumed with incense." [25]

Their "enlightened" catechisms preached a sort of higher morality, purposely leaving in the shadow the fundamental mysteries of Christianity: original sin, the Incarnation, and the redemption.[26] In the presence of this German Church, which blushed for its dogmas, which veiled or dissimulated, with shame and embarrassment, its most traditional patrimony and its most essential reason for existence, German rationalism felt its arrogance increase. Those who followed the lead of the French philosophers and those who jealously defended the autonomy of German thought were at least agreed on the decline of Catholicism. "The Church of Rome," said Herder, "no longer resembles anything but an old ruin, where no new life can enter." In like vein, Nicolaï said: "Only among the superstitious populace can the Roman faith be prolonged; before science, before culture, it will no longer exist." [27]

The secret society of the Illuminati, founded (March 1, 1776) by a professor of canon law, Adam Weishaupt, found a terrain well prepared for its recruitment. This society pretended to reveal "the hidden meaning of the doctrines of the great teacher of Nazareth"; it pretended to give the true significance of the dogmas of original sin, of the redemption, and of grace.

[25] G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, I, 162.

[26] Abbé Baston, a canon of Rouen, exiled by the Revolution, has left us a picture of those Westphalian priests who frequented the inns and said Mass wearing boots. They were well enough educated and upon the whole they were virtuous; but in matters of ceremonies they were without any propriety. Baston, Mémoires, II, 275 and passim.

[27] Quoted by Goyau, op. cit., p. 161.

According to Weishaupt, those dogmas signified simply that man, fallen from his primitive state of probity and liberty by the violence of his instincts and passions, and having degenerated into barbarism, was imperfectly liberated by the work of the priests, of the scholars, and of the statesmen, and would be freed completely by the effort of his own reason, by the consciousness of his own dignity, and by the free use of his own strength. These tenets were the very principles of Rousseau, elaborated by the mystical brain of a German.

In 1784 the Illuminati imprudently made public their internal dissensions: on February 11, 1785, Weishaupt was removed from his office of professor; he withdrew to the home of Duke Ernest of Gotha. Several of his followers were exiled or imprisoned. Most of them already had relations with the secret society of the Freemasons. These relations became more intimate, but without ending in complete fusion. The society founded by Weishaupt continued to spread with increased precautions and reserve.[28]

In France the Jansenist dispute had ended in disastrous consequences for the Church and for society. "In one sense it inflicted greater harm than Protestantism, because the Jansenist error was better adapted to the French temperament of the eighteenth century; it was more dissimulated and clever." [29] In sharply criticizing the traditions and the persons of the Church, the Jansenists had opened the way for the raillery and the negations of the Encyclopedists. Moreover, by stirring up endless disputes, they had turned the defenders of the Church aside from more serious and fruitful labors. On January 26, 1762, Voltaire wrote: "The Jesuits and the Jansenists continue to tear each other with sharp teeth; we must shoot at them while they are engaged in biting each other." [30]

[28] On this whole movement in Germany, see Hergenröther, op. cit., Vol. VII, Bk. II, Part II, chap. 14.

[29] J. Bourlon, Les Assemblées du Clergé et le Jansénisme.

[30] Voltaire, letter 3517 to D'Argenthal; Lefèvre ed., LX, 143. Cf. p. 139.

Unfortunately the constituted authorities showed themselves more and more favorable to the sect. The parliaments, always censorious, became its more or less avowed defenders in many circumstances. In 1723, King Louis XV refused to create the independent and impartial tribunal which the Assembly of the Clergy had requested to judge the religious disputes. In 1725 the prime minister, the Duke of Bourbon, abruptly had the dissolution of the assembly decreed just as it was about to condemn the Jansenist libels, and the Duke even erased from the records of its sessions a note regarding the sending of a letter of protest to the King. Finally, in 1762, indirectly but not less injurious to the interests of religion, the government of Louis XV became the active accomplice of the judiciary coup d'état which abolished the Society of Jesus in France and thus removed the mightiest adversary of schism and unbelief.

Ever since Henry IV the Jesuits were the ones who had educated generations that were the most devoted to the Holy See. The sophisms and the unsound practices of the false disciples of St. Augustine had no hold on minds trained by the Jesuits, for they vigorously combated rationalism and naturalism without ignoring the legitimate rights of nature and reason. When they disappeared from the scene, they were replaced by congregations, like the Oratory, the doctrinaires, and the Benedictines of St. Maur, who were more and more imbued with Jansenism and sometimes, especially toward the end, with revolutionary philosophy. The mild stubbornness of Rollin had anchored the Paris University itself deeply in lamentable errors that even admired the convulsionary "miracles."

Although religious teaching did not disappear from the colleges at the end of the eighteenth century, we can say that religion was often presented there under an altered and ridiculous form which naturally made the students, who were entrapped in the impiety of the age, consider religion with disgust and aversion. The extravagant worship of the deacon Pâris was confounded with real piety, of which this devotion was merely a sacrilegious parody. And as the abstention from the sacraments dried up the piety of the purest souls, "the ancient faith of the nation, a victim of both feverishness and anemia, was declining along with the morals; the national religion appeared superficially like a citadel of early times, half ruined, stripped of its best soldiers, occupied by invalids, many of them in a state of intoxication, and, in spite of the immense population still living under its shelter, unable to resist the enraged assaults of the passions and of the reasonings combined against it. The barbarians could now enter and celebrate their insolent and tragic triumph on these ruins.[31]

The Clergy

This triumph was the easier as the revolutionary spirit found accomplices in the souls of those very ones who reckoned themselves among the most submissive sons of the Church or who professed to be the most loyal supports of tradition. Such venerable priests, who with all their might rejected the Jansenist doctrines condemned by the Church, felt its hidden influence, approached the sacraments with trembling timidity, kept the faithful from the sacraments, and thus took from them the surest means of living the Christian life and of defending it against its enemies. Some others, too imprudently although in a spirit of zeal, had read the publications of the time and had unconsciously absorbed their poison. True, the germs of religion which a strong Catholic education had sowed in their hearts remained deeply rooted there, even under the dust of contrary germs. But slowly, gently, without thought of treason, without hypocrisy, in these priestly souls the entrance of supernatural inspirations became more difficult, whereas that of the pseudo-philosophical and vaguely humanitarian speculations grew apace. A certain fact is characteristic of this state of soul. Pierre de La Gorce says:

In many cities of France, Masonic lodges were established. Their names have a certain sameness: Egalité, Sincérité, Parfaite Union, [31] Gautherot, op. cit., p. 17.

Parfaite Amitié. At these lodges poetry was read, music was played, and collections were taken up for the needy. The program was that religion should not be mentioned; but they flayed superstition, in which they included everything that the veneration of men has proclaimed sacred. . . . Who would have expected to meet priests at these meetings? Yet some were there. At Béthune several priests belonged to the lodge; at Besançon among the members were some Bernardines, a Carmelite, and five canons of the chapter.[32]

On July 15, 1778, Archbishop Conzié of Tours, a prelate quite free from prejudices, writing to Archbishop de Brienne, regarded as ridiculous the charge brought against a Cordelier who had joined the Masons. "It has seemed to me," he said, "very amusing that the great reproach of Seigneur Saint-Luc [33] against this religious is that he is a Freemason."

Not many priests were Freemasons. In 1775 the Assembly of the Clergy had approved an association of writers and theologians founded to combat unbelief. In 1782 the defenders of the good cause were recommended to the munificence of the minister of the press; a sum of 40,000 livres was subscribed for the republication, after Bossuet's works, of those of Fénelon. But these measures came too late. In 1778 Voltaire's coming to Paris had been an occasion for a sort of apotheosis. In the salons the philosophers were the masters of the conversation. The Jansenists, who had them condemned by the Parliament, read their writings in secret and were delighted at seeing them avenge their old grudges. At the court the Encyclopedists found powerful friends. According to a historian favorable to the philosophers of the eighteenth century, "Madame de Pompadour was for them more than an ally; she was a genuine friend." [34] She was the one who prevented the publication of Dupin's criticism of Montesquieu.

[32] De La Gorce, Histoire religieuse de la Révolution française, I, 63–65.
[33] That is, Bishop Conen de Saint-Luc of Quimper.
[34] Roustan, op. cit., p. 97.

The authority of the Most Christian King slowly started moving to repress these disturbances of the religious and social order. Many Catholics then wondered if the greatness of the danger had not been exaggerated. Perhaps these criticisms of the philosophers did not have the import attributed to them. On July 17, 1787, De Montmorin, the minister of foreign affairs, wishing to calm the anxieties of the Pope, wrote to Cardinal de Bernis, French ambassador at Rome, that, since the death of Voltaire the books against religion were hardly being read at all. In that same year Abbé Bertola concluded his philosophy of history with these words: "Few reforms remain to be done. They will take place peacefully. As for a revolution, Europe no longer need fear any." [35]

We have thus reached the year 1789, which would be decisive for the history of Europe and of the whole world.

Before relating the tragic vicissitudes of the French Revolution, we must turn our attention to the Supreme Pontiff of the Church, who would have the heavy responsibility of steering the bark of Peter through the great storm.

[35] Quoted by Cantu, op. cit., II, 48.

CHAPTER III

The First Years of the Pontificate of Pius VI (1775–89)

THE pope who took possession of the see of St. Peter (February 15, 1775) under the name of Pius VI seemed in no way prepared to withstand a revolution. On the contrary, everything apparently had destined him to govern the Church gloriously in an era of peace and prosperity.

Pius VI

The new pope was a tall man of majestic bearing, a friend of festivities and ceremonies that brought him into contact with his people; he was benevolent, generous, with a sincere worthiness of life and piety, which always inspired respect in the minds of the most ill-willed. He seemed to be one of those whose names are transmitted to future generations with the epithets of Good, Magnificent, or Magnanimous. A scion of the noble family of the Braschi, he had acquired the fondness of the masses and the esteem of the influential in the various offices he held: administrator of the diocese of Ostia and Velletri, private secretary of Benedict XIV, treasurer of the Apostolic Camera, cardinal, and commendatory abbot of Subiaco.[1]

Says the most recent biographer of Pius VI: "I do not know if, in the history of the Church, any pope saw his reign open under such happy auspices, and his coming greeted with so much enthusiasm by the whole Catholic world." [2] The republics vied with the kings; the prince electors with the sovereigns. Empress Maria Theresa did not wait for the official notification of the election before sending her felicitations to the common father of the faithful; and the emperor of the Romans, Joseph II, in a long letter written by his own hand, assured the Pope of his joy and devotedness.[3]

[1] See Jules Gendry, Pie VI, sa vie, son pontificat, I, 1–65. This work, published in 1906, is based on the Vatican archives and various other unpublished documents.

The new pontiff was in the full vigor of mature years.[4] His soul opened to the most grandiose projects. The affairs that had engaged the pontificates of Clement XIII and Clement XIV seemed to be settled. The disputes that had arisen with the house of France ended with the re-establishment of the sovereignty of the Holy See over Comtat Venaissin. The Pope's first projects were directed to the prosperity and embellishment of the Papal States.

Many pontiffs, from Boniface VIII to Clement XIII, had tried to make habitable the extensive plains which, under the name of Pontine Marshes, thirty-six miles long and twelve miles wide along the coast of the Mediterranean, were in such condition that agriculture was impossible there. Pius VI appealed to the cooperation of all to assure the success of this vast enterprise. In the spring of 1780 we see him, accompanied by some persons of his suite, encourage by his presence the 3,500 workmen engaged in the drainage of the stagnant waters; for ten years each spring he watched over these gigantic works and stimulated the workmen.

The great expenses thus occasioned prompted the Pope to introduce a drastic economy in the management of the public funds. While he had been treasurer of the Apostolic Camera, he gave proofs of his vigilance and of his firmness in the government of the Treasury.[5] The financial regime introduced into the Papal States by Sixtus V [6] had been powerless to save them from the distress which all the national economies of Europe were experiencing at that time.[7] The vigor with which the Pope repressed the malpractices, which included those of the prefect of the Congregation of the Annona,[8] Nicholas Bischi, inspired a salutary fear in all the employees of the Treasury Office.

[2] Ibid., p. 91.

[3] For the text of this letter, cf. ibid., p. 489.

[4] Pius VI, at the time of his elevation, was fifty-seven years old. Some remarked that no pope of his years had ever been elected who enjoyed sturdy health equal to his. Cf. ibid., p. 106.

While treasurer of the Apostolic Camera, Cardinal Braschi had been authorized to create, for the assemblage of the masterpieces of sculpture, a museum called the Clementine Museum. Upon becoming pope, he urged the excavations required to discover the treasures of art buried in the Roman soil and he enlarged the museum destined to receive them. Eleven fine halls, among them the Belvedere, the Gallery of the Statues, the open loggia, and the Sala a croce graeca, were restored or constructed by order of Pius VI. The new museum, one of the richest of Europe, rightly then took the name of Pio-Clementine Museum.

The Pope's Popularity

The people, who for a long time had seen only popes bent under the weight of years, acclaimed this pontiff of robust appearance, majestic bearing, smiling countenance, and firm and dignified step. They could not restrain the expression of their joy as he passed, "How handsome he is!" The frugality of his life and the purity of his morals made them add, "He is as holy as he is handsome." The Jews, whose requests he generously

[5] We find related that the employees of the Treasury used to say of him: "Our treasurer has a good nose for scenting and teeth for biting."

[6] Mourret, op. cit., V, 538; Gendry, op. cit., I, 123.

[7] Cardinal de Bernis wrote: "All Europe is sick; all its finances are in disorder." Quoted by Masson, Le Cardinal de Bernis, p. 122.

[8] The prefect of the Annona had charge of provisions, the markets, and food allowances.

granted by allowing them to leave the confines of their ghetto during the night,[9] by authorizing them to bury their dead according to their own rites, and by correcting the injustices by which they had sometimes been oppressed, joined their acclamations to those of the Christians. Furthermore, the most devoted friends of the Jesuits, the Zelanti, as they were called, were gratified, for the most part, with the new pope's attitude toward the Society of Jesus, by whom he had been educated. Pius VI, in spite of the insistence of the Spanish diplomacy,[10] disapproved of the proceedings that had been previously followed against the Jesuits. He called these proceedings "a mystery of impiety";[11] in the face of much opposition, he had decided on the liberation of the Jesuit fathers who were imprisoned in the Castle Sant' Angelo. Unfortunately this decision, which freed the assistants of Father Ricci, no longer found the general of the Society alive. Father Ricci had died on November 24, 1775, protesting under oath and in the presence of the sacred host which was brought to him on his deathbed, that he had not deserved the prison where he was about to die. Pius VI ordered a solemn funeral for him and decided that he should be buried in the church of the Gesu as his predecessors had been.[12]

The schismatical and heretical sovereigns entertained courteous and deferential relations with the Supreme Pontiff. Empress Catherine II of Russia, who had energetically refused to publish in her states the decree of suppression of the Jesuits, [9] The law which ordered the closing of the gates of the ghetto every night was prompted by the desire of protection from the Jews and also with a view to protecting the Jews themselves from the hatred of the people.

[10] Masson, op. cit., p. 323.

[11] Hergenröther, op. cit., Vol. IV, chap. 3, § 1.

[12] Ibid. But Pius VI persistently refused to annul Clement XIV's decree of suppression of the Jesuits. He even condemned the writings that were published against that decree. See Bullarium (Barberi ed.), VI, 332, 347. To Ricci have been attributed the words, "Sint ut sunt, aut non sint." But the saying was not his. We find it, at least in substance, in a letter of Clement XIII to Louis XV (January 28, 1762). Cf. Boero, Osservazioni sopra del pontificato di Clemente XIV (2 vols., 1853), II, 15.

obtained from Pius VI, in 1778, a secret approbation (for Russia) of the suppressed Order.[13] Shortly afterward (1783) Catherine received with the greatest honors the apostolic nuncio, Archetti, who was provided with all powers to regulate the religious affairs. On this occasion the Pope officially recognized the title of emperor given to the sovereigns of Russia. In that same year King Gustavus III of Sweden came to Rome to see the Pope and confirmed the edict issued two years earlier to assure the Catholics the free exercise of their worship, and he accepted the sending to Stockholm of a vicar apostolic. The next year the Church in the United States, recently freed from England, obtained from the Holy Father the appointment of a vicar apostolic to govern the Catholics of that country. Five years later (1789), when the government of the American Union was established, Pius VI had the joy of placing at the head of the Catholic hierarchy in America, on the episcopal see of Baltimore, a holy prelate, Bishop Carroll, a personal friend of Washington.

The Danger of Philosophism

All this occurred at the moment when the revolutionary movement, let loose in France and ready to pour out over all Europe, was preparing for the Pontiff the most cruel anxieties perhaps that a head of the Church universal had ever known.

Never was Pius VI misled about the perils which the license of morals and the impiety of men's minds made the Church and society undergo. His first encyclical (December 25, 1775) denounced "the corruption of morals, of speech, and of life" which characterized the society of the ancient regime at that time, and the daring of "those wretched philosophers who, repeating to the point of weariness that man is born free and that he ought not to submit to the rule of anyone, ended only by the loosening of the bonds that joined men together." [14] But that such doctrines would soon manifest themselves by a political and social revolution and that this revolution would first break out in that France where the pious King Louis XVI reigned, all this the Pontiff was far from suspecting at the time.

[13] A written and open approbation would have stirred the wrath of the Bourbon courts.

Other dark days would precede that great storm. When the first acclamation that greeted his coming quieted down, the Sovereign Pontiff soon perceived on the political horizon four dark spots, apparently localized and precise. The Kingdom of Naples' inclination to independence with regard to the Holy See, Emperor Joseph II's encroachments on the spiritual authority of the Church, the interference of the court of Russia in the affair of the Jesuits, and the penetration of Jansenist doctrines into the court of Tuscany: such were the objects of Pius VI's first concern.

An ancient feudal tribute, going back to Robert Guiscard, obliged the king of Naples to bring yearly to the Sovereign Pontiff a sum of 10,000 Roman ecus. This tribute had given rise to diplomatic differences between the court of Naples and the Holy See. From the beginning of the eighteenth century the question had been assuming graver proportions. With regard to this conflict, the Roman Curia had filled the chanceries with its complaints.[15] In 1759 Ferdinand IV ascended the throne of Naples. This pupil of Tanucci, who strangely mingled a sincere religious piety [16] with the principles of Rousseau's philosophy, did but embitter the quarrel when he became king. He obstinately refused to render the traditional homage of vassalage that was demanded of him. Neither the rebukes of the Supreme Pontiff nor the intervention of friendly powers nor the compensations proposed by Pius VI, who offered to the King of Naples even the right of nomination to bishoprics,[17] was able to move Ferdinand to perform a ceremony in which the Holy See saw the recognition of a lawful tribute, but which the Neapolitan court regarded as an outworn ceremony, irreconcilable with the spirit of modern times. Fundamentally the great question of the French Revolution was in this conflict. That fact was undoubtedly what gave the affair so much importance. This famous question of the tribute was terminated only by the French invasion, the deportation of Pius VI, and finally the expulsion of the King of Naples.

[14] Barberi, Bullarium, V, 180–85.
[15] Gendry, op. cit., II, 91.
[16] Ibid., I, 92.

In Germany, too, Pius VI encountered a form of the revolutionary crisis. We are acquainted with the movement of ideas that occurred in the Germanic countries during the second half of the eighteenth century. The two chief forms of Gallicanism —Caesarism and episcopalism—had entered there and had even acentuated their offensive against the papacy, under the names of Josephism and Febronianism.

Pius VI's Visit to Vienna

In 1781, while the commission of regulars in France, under the auspices of the sole authority of the civil government and apart from any influence of the Holy See, was pursuing the pretended reform of the monastic life, Emperor Joseph II of Germany, on a vaster scale and with far greater activity, had already undertaken to regulate the entire discipline of the Church in his states. To require the imperial placet for the publication of all papal bulls, to suppress all monasteries that did not tend to the development of the national education such as he meant it, to forbid all religious houses to hold any relations with foreign superiors, to place in the hands of the state the entire public education, including that of the clergy, to suppress confraternities, to abolish processions, to regulate the number of Masses, Benedictions, and even the number of candles to be lit at certain church services: such had been the principal measures undertaken against the Church by him whom Frederick II of Prussia called "my brother the sacristan." With uneasy forebodings, Pius VI followed the steps taken against the Holy See by the son of Maria Theresa, and at first showed a paternal condescension toward the sovereign. Then, seeing that his protests obtained no good result, he took, in spite of the contrary advice of all the ambassadors accredited to him and of most of the members of the Sacred College, a supreme resolve: that of going to Vienna to talk to the Emperor, who he knew was endowed with great natural qualities, particularly with a sincere devotion to the welfare of the people.[18]

[17] Ibid., II, 91.

The Emperor did not dare oppose the Pope's journey. But, at the Vienna court, those who inspired the Emperor's religious policy trembled. The minister, Kaunitz, proposed to Joseph II that a circular instruction should be issued, directing all the bishops to remain in their episcopal cities as long as the Pope was at Vienna.[19] He feared a contact of the head of the Church with the episcopate. Certain others even feared that the Pope, once he should arrive at the Austrian capital, might take advantage of some solemnity to interpellate the Emperor directly and thus exert a mighty influence on the masses. Joseph judged it more prudent in receiving the Holy Father to act "as a respectful son of the Church, as a courteous host," yet, as he added, determined not to let himself be taken advantage of by [18] This journey was not something unprecedented in the history of the papacy. From Innocent I (409) to Clement VIII (1598) thirty-seven pontiffs had taken up the traveler's staff from a sense of duty. See Histoire des voyages des papes depuis Innocent Ier jusqu'à Pie VI (1786).

[19] Schlitter, Die Reise des Papstes, p. 36.

any tragic acts of the Pope and to remain unshakable in his principles.[20]

On March 20, 1782, Pius VI made his entry into the Austrian capital. The Emperor and his brother came out to meet him at a distance of a few miles from the city. The people gave the Pontiff a most enthusiastic testimony of their respect and affection.

> Almost every day the two sovereigns had long conferences by themselves. They used to pass three or four hours together and, when they separated, they appeared satisfied with each other. Very likely they really were so, and evidently this satisfaction could be produced only by a common understanding. If the results corresponded so little to the hopes, we may well suppose that this failure was owing to Kaunitz and Cobenzl, and that a large part of the responsibility for the subsequent acts must weigh on those ministers, those two evil geniuses of the Emperor.[21]

Upon returning to Rome, Pius VI did indeed have the pain of learning that the Emperor was continuing to abolish the monasteries and to regulate public worship as before. Had the Pontiff's journey, then, been useless? Far from it. Josephism had experienced some fear; this was the most notable result of the step taken by Pius VI. Joseph II had felt in the papacy a power in public opinion which he must take account of. When, two years later, the Emperor, having arrogated to himself the free disposal of the Lombard bishoprics, judged that he must go to Rome and there confer with the head of the Church and conclude a sort of concordat with him, Pius VI could know that his journey to Vienna had constrained Josephism to inaugurate a policy of deference toward the Holy See.[22]

Six years later, when, prompted by the episcopalism of Fe-

[20] Letter of March 7, 1782, quoted in Joseph II und Leopold von Toscana (1872).
[21] Gendry, op. cit., I, 265.
[22] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, I, 52.

bronius, the ecclesiastical electors of Germany, in a memorial presented to the Diet of Ratisbon, demanded a new law of the Empire, which would suppress on German soil the jurisdiction of the nuncios; when, the following year, four days after the taking of the Bastille, Archbishop Erthal of Mainz issued to his priests, as a defiance to the Holy See, a circular letter of convocation to the national synod, the danger seemed to arise again under another form. But "successive incidents caused the adjournment of the assembly; then the brutal reality, in the person of Custine and French soldiers, stifled the schism even before it started." [23]

Difficulties with Russia

At the very height of the Josephist crisis, the Pope found himself involved in the greatest difficulties with Russia. We have already seen how, at the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits by the different states of Europe, Empress Catherine II received them with favor. A ukase of Peter the Great had forbidden these religious admittance into the Empire. But Catherine, after the partition of Poland, was able to appreciate the education given by the fathers in their flourishing colleges of Mohileff and Polotsk. The governor of White Russia,[24] Tchernychef, pushed his sympathy for the Society of Jesus so far that, when Clement XIV's brief of suppression appeared, he forbade, under the severest penalties, the publication in Russia of any brief coming from Rome.[25] By making itself the protector of the Catholic cause, the government of St. Petersburg surpassed at a single stroke the utmost limits of the Gallicanism practiced at the courts of Versailles and of Vienna; or rather, Gallicanism, everywhere latent, took in each country the form adapted to the national customs. The Muscovite autocrat did not stop there. Catherine had noticed among the new subjects that the treaty of 1772 had given her a canon of Vilna by the name of Siestrzencewicz, a man of rare intelligence and vast erudition.[26] The Czarina obtained from the nuncio of Poland, Garampi, a decision that Siestrzencewicz should be consecrated titular bishop of Mallo.[27] An imperial decree (May 12, 1774) attributed to the newly chosen prelate an annual salary of 10,000 rubles and assigned Mohileff to him as his residence. Then, not satisfied with erecting on her own authority a new Catholic episcopal see, the schismatic sovereign gave to the incumbent of this bishopric a universal jurisdiction over the Latin Catholics of her Empire. This move was paralleled by the audacity to which, sixteen years later, the authors of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy would proceed.[28]

[23] Ibid., I, 79.

[24] The term White Russia designates the country which Russia acquired by the partition of Poland. It comprised almost the entire diocese of Livonia and the part of the diocese of Vilna professing the Latin rite. On the attitude of the Jesuits at the time of the partition of Poland, see Zalenski, S. J., Les Jésuites de la Russie Blanche (French translation, I, 244).

[25] "The parish priest of Orcha and that of Vitebsk published the brief of suppression. Soon afterward a messenger came to them, with his carriage, and took away the poor priests to join the other exiles in Siberia." Gendry, op. cit., I, 340.

Some declare that, before his consecration, the Bishop of Mallo had signed and placed in the hands of the Empress an explicit promise to maintain the Jesuits in the fullness of their status.[29] Whatever may be the truth of this statement, Russia soon became a refuge for the members of the Society of Jesus, expelled from Poland, Germany, and Italy. The Bishop of Mallo arrogated to himself the right to ordain them even to the priesthood. The Bourbon courts protested vigorously.[30] The Pope seemed to be in an impasse. From the religious point of view his conscience refused to abrogate the decree of Clement [26] On this strange personage, skeptical, worldly, and clever, a Russian type of the eighteenth-century episcopate, see Zalenski, op. cit., I, 257–64.

[27] Gendry, op. cit., I, 329.

[28] Zalenski, op. cit., I, 261.

[29] Masson, op. cit., p. 338; Gagarin, La Compagnie de Jésus conservée en Russie, p. 29; Zalenski, op. cit., I, 268.

[30] Cf. Masson, op. cit., p. 344.

XIV and to pursue the Jesuits in their last asylum. From the political point of view he was obliged to conciliate both the Catholic kings of the house of Bourbon and the haughty Czarina, who threatened expressly to withdraw from her subjects the liberty of professing the Catholic religion if her desires were not heeded.[31] Pius VI protested, by a letter addressed (January 27, 183) to the King of France and the King of Spain, that he confirmed the brief Dominus ac Redemptor of his predecessor, but he approved orally, in an audience given in March of the same year, granted to the coadjutor of Mohileff, the status quo of the Society of Jesus in Russia. Henceforth the Society had a vicar general in the person of the vice-provincial, Father Stanislaus Czerniewicz, who was succeeded two years later by Father Lenkeiwicz. At the same time the Bishop of Mallo, now promoted to the archbishopric of Mohileff, received the title and powers of apostolic visitator of all the houses of regulars established in Russia.[32]

Grand Duke of Tuscany

While the Russian court was so keenly taking up the quarrel for the Jesuits, the court of Tuscany moved to defend Jansenism. We know what spirit prevailed at Florence under the rule of Grand Duke Leopold, brother of Emperor Joseph II, and under the influence of Bishop Scipio Ricci. We are acquainted with the principal decisions of the strange gathering assembled at Pistoia (September 15, 1782) under the name of a council. Its undisguised aim was to introduce the maxims and the spirit of Port Royal, first in all the religious houses, then in all the churches of Tuscany. But when (April, 1787) the Grand Duke, in conformity with Ricci's desires, convoked at Florence an assembly of the seventeen bishops of his duchy for the purpose of carrying out the decree of the so-called council, fourteen of them firmly refused. They were, moreover, the interpreters of public opinion, outraged by the Jansenist innovations, which were intended to replace the traditional worship.

[31] See the letter quoted by Masson, op. cit., p. 365.

[32] Zalenski, op. cit., I, 322–25.

Ricci and his followers day by day made themselves more disliked. On May 20, a popular uprising directed against them suddenly broke out and, as usually happens in such circumstances, became unbounded. The day was a Sunday, toward evening. The faithful were coming for a festivity which the Confraternity of a Happy Death was celebrating at the cathedral of Prato. All of a sudden the report spread that Ricci and his followers decided to destroy the altar which had a particularly venerated Madonna. The church bells were rung. At this summons the people of the city and neighborhood came running, armed with clubs and picks. Crying out, "Long live the Holy See," they seized the bishop's throne,[33] smashed it, and burned it. They spent the whole night collecting, at the seminary or in various other places, crucifixes, Madonnas, and other images which Ricci had removed from the churches. These they carried in procession through the city and forced Ricci's followers to acclaim them. The tumult continued for several days. The Bishop's residence was broken into; his manuscripts and his Jansenist books were burnt in the public square.

For the time being the only effect of these deeds of violence was to exasperate the irritable spirit of Bishop Ricci. As counselor of Leopold, he instigated the latter to adopt the most odious measures against the popular devotions, particularly against the devotion to the Sacred Heart; the congregation established under this title was suppressed. But these excesses by a prelate whose unbalanced character had offended many persons, finally turned even the Grand Duke's advisers against him. When in 1790, on the death of Joseph II, Leopold left Tuscany to assume the imperial crown, the hatreds that the Bishop of Pistoia had stirred up against himself broke loose. Driven out of Pistoia by the people, Ricci withdrew to Florence, and there he resigned his see.

[33] The see of Prato was joined to that of Pistoia, where Ricci was bishop.

These events put the Sovereign Pontiff in a delicate position. He could not seem to approve doctrines manifestly unorthodox, nor could he sanction a popular movement that had been stained by disorder and hatred. Pius VI also judged that the interests of the Church would not be served by risking, against the Emperor, a strife that might have disastrous consequences. He temporized. He ordered a close study of the seven volumes containing the acts of the Synod of Pistoia. Scarcely had Emperor Leopold been laid at rest, when the bull Auctorem fidei officially proclaimed the Catholic doctrine, by solemnly condemning the decrees of the so-called council.

The "acts of emancipation" of the court of Naples, like the abusive interference of the court of Russia, the ideas that the minister Kaunitz suggested to Joseph II, like the policy which Bishop Ricci inspired in Leopold, were merely intermittent and scattered manifestations of a state of mind that was agitating all Europe. France was about to give the final maxims of this state of mind.

PART II

The Revolution

THE Revolution, though a European event, was in some ways universal; but the heart of it was in France. There we can more easily mark the various stages that it passed through. From the religious viewpoint these stages were three in number: the Constituent Assembly stripped the Church of her goods and her rights; the Legislative Assembly and the Convention persecuted her in the person of her ministers and her faithful; the Directory tried to supplant her in her worship. From this religious point of view, which is the one we intend to take, the picture we shall have to paint of the revolutionary work may appear to some readers as depicted in too somber colors.

But we adopt as our own the declarations which the eminent author of the Histoire religieuse de la Révolution puts at the head of his work. We, too, wish that the reader should see in our severity "neither lack of justice nor any trace of passion." In our turn, "if we were to judge in its totality the work of the Constituent Assembly, we would not fail to place in relief, among all the reforms accomplished by it, those measures that marked memorable progress in the field of administration, and especially in civil, financial, and criminal legislation." [1] We shall also have occasion to note that the Catholic Church was never the foe of these progressive measures. Her faithful and her ministers were often the first to second them; more than once they took the initiative in these matters. Only by falsification of history can anyone maintain that the honor belongs only to her enemies.

[1] De La Gorce, Histoire religieuse de la Révolution, I, iv.

CHAPTER IV

The Church Despoiled (1789–90)

On May 4, 1789, the city of Versailles presented an unusual sight. King Louis XVI, accompanied by representatives of all the classes of the nation, took part in a procession of the Blessed Sacrament, which was followed by a Solemn Mass in the church of St. Louis.[1] Archbishop de Juigné of Paris pontificated, and Bishop de La Fare of Nancy delivered a discourse which had for its subject the influence of religion on the happiness of nations. Some passages of the sermon, when the preacher directed his attack against the abuses of the political and religious institutions and called for liberty as the chief remedy, were received by prolonged applause, which some persons judged little suited to the sacredness of the place. The next day the King, with great solemnity, opened the States General. In the hall of the Menus-Plaisirs the King took his seat, surrounded by the princes of the blood royal. The court was ranged on the steps of the throne. The three orders occupied the rest of the hall: on the right the 291 deputies of the clergy; on the left the 270 representatives of the nobility, glittering with gold and embroidery; at the rear, on the lower seats and in simple black dress, bareheaded, the 584 members of the third order.

[1] This procession was not merely a liturgical ceremony, isolated and unconnected with the feelings of the people. The whole nation set itself to pray, asking God to bestow His blessings on the States General. We have before our eyes one of the printed sheets which at that time circulated among the priests and the faithful. It says: "Let us do a holy violence upon the Lord to obtain from His mercy that He will direct the counsels and measures of the assembled nation and that He will spread in all hearts a pure, efficacious, and generous love for the public welfare. And let us beg favors and success for ourselves and for our country only as a means of attaining that blessed and eternal society where we shall all be kings and where one single good will suffice for all and for all time by its immense fullness." The sheet ends by the repetition of several different prayers, the first three of them being taken from the Paris Missal, "For the holding of the States General."

In this city of Versailles, which the absolute power of Louis XIV had created, all the classes of society and all the provinces were represented. All the demands, all the wishes of the people of France which, for almost two centuries, had not had royal audience were at length able to find expression.[2]

The Condition of France in 1789

A subdued and restless discontent stirred the masses. The harshness of the winter of 1788, marked by famine, had exasperated men's minds. The 1,200 deputies[3] assembled about the King could render a report of those conditions. The representatives of Normandy were prepared to tell of the scenes of pillage and death that smeared their province with blood.[4] The Bretons could relate how some people of Nantes had almost cut to pieces a man who was thought to be a receiver of stolen goods. The deputies from Provence could likewise draw a picture of the violence committed by an incensed populace at Marseilles, Aix, Toulon, Brignoles, Riez, and Manosque.[5] Touraine, Poitou, the Orléans district, Burgundy, Auvergne, and Languedoc had witnessed similar scenes.[6] Everywhere, among these people that famine exasperated, that the social inequalities enraged, certain vague hopes appeared. In the newspapers and in pamphlets that the public read avidly, the sole question was that of a new era of liberty, of equality, of moral and material well-being, which they felt was now at hand.

[2] The last meeting of the States General had been held in 1614. An assembly of the notables had been convoked by Richelieu in 1626. The assembly of the notables, called by Louis XVI in 1787, adjourned to give way to the States General.

[3] The exact figure is 1,158.

[4] Floquet, Histoire du parlement de Normandie, VII, 508.

[5] Taine, Les origines, III, 27–33.

[6] Ibid., p. 15. "In the four months before the taking of the Bastille, France witnessed more than three hundred uprisings." Taine, loc. cit.

What the Bishop of Nancy had just openly proclaimed in the Versailles church, in the presence of the King and the deputies, many a village curé had already said to his people. For several years parish and provincial assemblies had been held. At those meetings, where plebeians sat beside lords, the raising of taxes was discussed and decided. On Sunday upon coming out of church, or on market days, at the village inn, the peasants were made acquainted with the situation. The royal letter of July 5, 1788, permitting to all competent persons and bodies the sending of memorials on the state of the country, and the regulation (January 24, 1789) requiring that, "from the remotest places of the kingdom and from the most inconspicuous habitations, each should be assured of sending its wishes and its demands to His Majesty," [7] had encouraged the popular movement. Serious ecclesiastics constructed gigantic systems for the reorganization of the possessions of the clergy.[8] The Journal ecclésiastique, issued since 1760 under the direction of Father Barruel, a former Jesuit, was the organ of the most orthodox Catholicity. In its columns, beginning in April, 1789, was a special section in which the abuses of the times were pointed out.[9]

The Assembly

After such a movement of popular opinion, we should not be surprised that the first session of the States General was [7] Duvergier, Collection des lois et décrets, I, 1–23.

[8] In Pisani, L'Eglise de Paris et la Révolution, I, 61–63, the reader will find the curious project of Father Thuin. The general principle of the project was the cession to the state of the entirety of the ecclesiastical goods. With the liquidation of these possessions an annual net revenue of 456,000,000 francs should remain available. Four-fifths of this revenue should furnish the support of the clergy; the rest would be divided between the poor and the church boards, these latter being responsible for the upkeep of the religious buildings. The nation would receive from the division a revenue of 76,000,000 francs.

[9] Cf. ibid., pp. 64–67.

marked by an unusual agitation. Moreover, in the outward circumstances everything seemed calculated to provoke this agitation. The assembly included many upright and educated men, some eminent persons. But the fact of the immense number of the members was not favorable to serious discussions. The large size of the hall—a detail brought out by Taine's psychology—by obliging the speakers to raise their voices, favored pompous and abstract oratory. Besides, from the very first session, an impression was given that the division of the three orders no longer corresponded to the actual situation; but their suppression apparently could not be made without disturbance and clamor.

At any rate, might a man be found in the assembly, capable of taking the lead in the movement so as to direct it or at need to restrain it if not to halt it?

The natural head of this assembly, King Louis XVI, was evidently not of a stature to fill such a part. Kind, affable, and sincerely attached to the Catholic Church, whose precepts he observed most exactly in his private life, he had been received, at his entrance, with bursts of enthusiasm, but at the same time with cries of complaint against the disgraces of the preceding reign. But in the fifteen years during which he held the reins of government, he had too often shown a gentleness that tended to weakness, to indecision, to blundering evasions. The various influences active about him were successively cast off, one after the other. Maurepas, Turgot, Malesherbes, Necker, to whom he appealed to relieve the disastrous state of the finances, had fallen. The Queen then decided to intervene in the handling of the affairs and in the choice of the ministers, but she raised up against them and against herself such unpopularity [10] that the King had to turn again to Necker. The [10] The unfortunate affair of the necklace is too well known to require relating here. It greatly injured the Queen's popularity. She was also accused of having understandings with the powerful enemies of France. But Marie Antoinette was a summoning of an assembly of the notables, then of the States General, seemed to be the supreme remedy for the situation. But now the question arose whether the path on which they were entering was not full of formidable complications.

The Upper Clergy

Often, in great critical epochs, the king of France had found in some member of the upper clergy a prudent and loyal adviser. Four prelates stood out among the members who sat at the King's right: they were Archbishop de Juigné of Paris, Bishop de La Fare of Nancy, Archbishop Le Franc de Pompignan of Vienne, and Archbishop de Boisgelin of Aix.

De Juigné, son of Marquis de Juigné who was killed in the Battle of Guastalia, was charity personified. The 600,000 francs that the archbishopric of Paris brought to him was used entirely in alms: each day hundreds of the poor received at the Archbishop's door food which he put at their disposal with inexhaustible generosity. No one ever knew the number of persons that he pensioned from his personal resources. He had a cultured mind; his ideas were orthodox beyond reproach. The flatteries heaped on him by the Jansenists at the outset of his episcopate were powerless to win him to their cause. Unfortunately with Archbishop de Juigné the qualities of mind and will were not at the level of his charity and piety. To discern the future, to sense the strong side and the weak side of men and of things, to fix a rule of conduct, and to adhere to it with energy, such was never the good fortune of this virtuous prelate. Although an excellent shepherd so long as he had merely to walk along paths already marked out, he was unequal to his complete stranger to the intrigues of the affair of the necklace. The entire responsibility in the case falls on Madame de La Mote and Cardinal de Rohan. As to her so-called steps toward bringing foreign interventions into France, we shall see later what is to be thought of this accusation.

task when he should have to give proof of far-sightedness and firmness.[11]

Neither the clear view of the reforms to be accomplished nor the courage required to pursue them was lacking in Bishop de La Fare of Nancy and Archbishop de Pompignan of Vienne. The former, after boldly speaking of abuses to be fought and of liberty to be established, in his opening address in the church of St. Louis, would have to defend vigorously on the rostrum of the Assembly the independence of the goods of the Church and the life of the monastic institutions. De Pompignan, who in his writings had disclosed the poison of Rousseau's doctrine better than anyone else, would soon have to lend the King his devoted collaboration to safeguard whatever could still be rescued of the traditional institutions of France. But neither of these men was a politician in the lofty sense of the word.[12]

The title of great politician seems rather to belong to Archbishop Boisgelin of Aix. Before appearing in the States General this noble prelate was known simply as a strong and hardy thinker by his commentary on Montesquieu. In times of disturbance he had been seen holding under his strong and supple hand the agitated population of Provence.[13] Again and again we shall see him manifesting the clear-sightedness and the spirit of decision that belong to a statesman. If the Assembly that was opening were capable of listening to a doctrine of moderation, of justice, and of prudent progress, De Boisgelin would have furnished it with convincing formulas. But the men of that time, according to the remark of Joseph de Maistre, seemed to be led by a power stronger than themselves.[14] The passion agitating them would heed only the language of passion, and the worthy prelates who sat in their midst could not offer them this language.

[11] On Archbishop de Juigné, see Lambert, Vie de Mgr de Juigné (1821); Sicard, L'ancien clergé de France, I, 91 and passim; Pisani, L'Eglise de Paris et la Révolution, I, 77–112.

[12] See Claude Bouvier, Le Franc de Pompignan, pp. 89–98.

[13] Cardinal de Bausset, who had been Archbishop de Boisgelin's vicar general, relates how that Provençal prelate in the winter of 1789, by the influence of his virtue, the persuasive power of his words, and the wisdom of his procedure, was able to calm an almost general uprising of the city of Aix. See Picot, Mémoires, V, 354. In the Œuvres oratoires de M. de Boisgelin, p. 196, see the order issued on that occasion, March 27, 1789.

In this tumultuous gathering of men sent to Paris to express the wishes of France, we may distinguish two rather compact and distinct groups in spite of all the artificial divisions: the group of jurists, 374 in number, and the lower clergy, counting no less than 208 representatives.

The Lawyers

In an assembly meeting with the vague intention of recasting the constitution of France, the group of lawyers would enjoy a decisive role. Unfortunately these men brought with them all the prejudices of parliamentary Gallicanism and of the Jansenist sect. Camus and Treilhard, whom we shall see taking part with all the prestige of their technical erudition and of their tricks of procedure, will not for a moment lose sight of the two aims of the old Gallicanism and the most radical Jansenism: to oppose the so-called encroachments of Rome and, by the intervention of the civil power, to lead the Church back to a so-called spirit of the first centuries.[15]

The Lower Clergy

By their closer contact with the people the priests of the lower clergy had, more than the others, an appreciation of the miseries of the regime. Out of pity for their brethren much more than by a one-sided desire for innovation, they aspired to an [14] De Maistre, Considérations sur la France, chaps. 1 and 5.

[15] On the clearly Gallican principles of Camus and Treilhard, see Picot, op. cit., VI, 3–7.

era of social reorganization. But their tendencies, precisely because they proceeded from sentiment rather than from reason, ran the risk of being chimerical. Too many, while energetically rejecting the antireligious theories of the reformers, readily gave ear to their political and social ideas. One of them, Sieyès, in the interval between the dissolution of the assembly of the notables and the meeting of the States General, had published three ringing pamphlets. Their subjects were respectively: View on the means of execution, Essay on privileges, What is the Third Estate? Their contents may be summed up in two phrases: "What is the Third Estate? Nothing." "What ought it to be? Everything."

Abbé Sieyès

Emmanuel Joseph Sieyès, born at Fréjus on May 3, 1748, would become one of the most noteworthy figures of the Revolution and perhaps the most singular.[16] At any rate, he would become the most representative man of the Constituent Assembly, to which he would, most of the time, furnish the inspiring idea or the final formula of its declarations. With a doubtful religious vocation, he entered the seminary of St. Sulpice at the age of seventeen. There he expressed such hardy ideas that his teachers invited him with friendly consideration to withdraw to another establishment.[17] After receiving his licentiate at the Sorbonne, he was ordained priest a few years later at the seminary of Saint-Firmin. Soon afterward, from his reflections on the writings of Condillac, Bonnet, Helvetius, [16] Sainte-Beuve, Galerie de portraits historiques, p. 537.

[17] In the register of the seminary of St. Sulpice we read the following: "Josephus-Emmanuel Sieyès, entered November 13, 1765, left December 4, 1770; sly, of a spirit suspect. He was advised to leave. He went to the seminary of Saint-Firmin." Some of Sieyès' manuscripts of this period are venturesome outlines. As Sainte-Beuve says, we can easily understand that they aroused his superiors' suspicions. Sainte-Beuve, loc. cit.

Rousseau, and some economists, Abbé Sieyès composed a personal doctrine of "social art," as he called it. This "social art," which he declared he had discovered, consisted essentially in the abolition of the privileges of the aristocracy and in the organization of democracy in certain extremely complicated arrangements. Its basis was the division of labor applied to various functions of the state, and an ingenious system of representation of persons and interests.

Venturous minds and some naive souls took up these innovations with passionate enthusiasm. One day Madame de Staël, in her salon, declared that the Abbé's writings and opinions would form a new era in the art of government as those of Newton did in physics.[18] And Sainte-Beuve said that in Sieyès was something of Descartes, that is, of the man who gladly made a tabula rasa of everything that had gone before, a man who began over again a new organization in every matter, social, economic, and political.[19]

Sieyès' ideas so well corresponded to the general tendencies of the Assembly that they exerted a preponderant influence there. The attitude of the clergy from the outset was largely dependent on this influence.

The representatives of the three orders, as all the classes of French society, were dominated more or less by the spirit of those who called themselves "the philosophers." Two men summed up that so-called philosophical spirit. They were Voltaire and Rousseau: Voltaire the demolisher of the old world, and Rousseau the self-designated builder of a new world. The teaching of both of them had received a hearty welcome in the salons of the upper society and had been effectively propagated there. Freemasonry counted among its members or friends a number of persons belonging to the high nobility and the clergy.

[18] Testimony of Gouverneur Morris, quoted by Sainte-Beuve, op. cit., p. 542.
[19] Ibid.

Mirabeau

But neither the Jansenism of Camus and Treilhard nor the utopias of Sieyès nor the doctrine of the "philosophers" nor the influence of Freemasonry would have acquired a prompt and effective influence unless they had found a powerful mouthpiece to express and impose them. We meet this organ of expression in a man who would be the most fiery of the orators and the most crafty of the politicians: Mirabeau. A man of aristocratic stock, whose family reckoned more than four hundred years of established nobility and who had just now passed over to the Third Estate out of contempt for aristocracy, Mirabeau, even when he sold himself to the monarchy, even when he proposed to the clergy that he would become the defender of their rights, would always remain the type of revolutionary, who upsets the established order and suggests a new order.

In him everything was a power because in him everything was a seductive influence that exerted a sort of violence on men's impatient spirit. He himself said, "No one knows all the might of my ugliness." This man, in disrepute because of his immorality, might well speak thus of his moral ugliness no less than of his physical ugliness. When, proudly thrown back on his bull-like neck, his enormous head appeared on the rostrum, with its olive tint, his cheeks scarred from smallpox, his flaming eyes, which passion at times animated to the point of their being bloodshot, and his mouth with its irregularly lined lips, from which a thunderous voice issued forth, whatever revolt was in men's souls recognized itself at once. The speaker's words were repeated throughout France. The dreams and passions that were fermenting in the souls of the people and finding expression in his fiery words increased the people's uneasiness. Anarchy was near the point of breaking forth.

The Antireligious Work of the Constituent Assembly

At the very first sessions of the Assembly that anarchy burst out, and events occurred pell-mell. By the Declaration of the Rights of Man, which because of the anarchy was practically interpreted as a forgetfulness of the rights of God; by the law "placing at the disposal" of the state the goods of the Church, which thus ended in the out-and-out spoliation of the clergy; by the suppression of the vows of religion, which amounted to suppression of the religious life; and by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, which was the utter control of the clergy by the state: by all these measures the Revolution soon accomplished the first stages of the war undertaken against the Catholic Church.

Two expressions of Mirabeau and of Sieyès let loose the revolutionary movement. On June 17 the deputies of the Third Estate, on Sieyès' motion, declared that, as they represented 86 per cent of the nation, they constituted themselves the "National Assembly." Six days later the King annulled the decisions of the 17th and ordered the three estates to break up instantly. Thereupon Mirabeau exclaimed: "Nothing but force can make us depart. As for myself, I shall be put forth only if I am pierced with bayonets." [20] And Sieyès, addressing his fellow deputies, said: "You are today what you were yesterday; continue your deliberations." A short time afterward the majority of the clergy and forty-seven members of the nobility, with the Duke of Orléans at their head, joined the deputies of the Third Estate. The better to indicate its aim, the Assembly took the name of Constituent Assembly. The Revolution had begun in principle.

[20] These were Mirabeau's actual words. They have often been wrongly quoted as: "Go tell your master that we are here by the will of the people and that we will leave only by the force of bayonets."

Beginning of the Anarchy

Such events could not take place without a deep echo in the popular mind. We are not called upon to relate the excitement that followed: the concentration of troops at Versailles and Paris; the dismissal of the minister, Necker; the disturbance at the Palais Royal when Camille Desmoulins, with a pistol in his hand, shouted to the crowd: "The dismissal of Necker is the signal for a St. Bartholomew slaughter of patriots: To arms!"; the people wearing a new cockade as a rallying sign; Paris suddenly filled with an armed mob; the shops closing everywhere; the church bells ringing the alarm almost ceaselessly. Paris was exhibiting "a spontaneous anarchy," according to Taine's expression.[21]

Two incidents marked the character of the movement: the pillage of St. Lazare (July 13, 1789) and the taking of the Bastille (July 14).

The Pillage of St. Lazare

For the pillage of St. Lazare we have a detailed account in a memorial drawn up by two eyewitnesses. The report bears the marks of a most exact truthfulness.[22]

The house of St. Lazare was then inhabited by almost 400 persons: 200 priests, more than 100 novices or students, 80 brothers and boarders. . . . In the night of July 12, without any forewarning, 200 men variously armed rushed in tumult to the gates. They seemed to [21] Taine, Les origines de la France contemporaine, Vol. III, Bk. I, p. 3. Taine's expression, "spontaneous anarchy," has had a remarkable success. But this term is not altogether exact. The real anarchy did not begin until the taking of the Bastille and the night of August 4. Even then the anarchy was encouraged, sometimes provoked.

[22] The authors of this account were Father Dubois and Father Philippe, priests of St. Lazare. Father Dubois became pastor of St. Margaret's church and died in 1824. The narrative which we here quote is taken from the account first appearing in the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la religion à la fin du XVIII^e siècle, published by Abbé Jaufpret.

be undecided what to do. Then, at half-past two in the morning, at the command of some leaders, the doors were battered down. The brigands poured into the house. . . . They began eating and drinking in the refectory and demanded money. At first the hope was that they could be made to leave without difficulty. But, as all the entrances were open, a countless throng filled the house. About ten o'clock in the morning a horrible devastation began. They smashed the furniture, decorations, windows, beds; they pillaged all the rooms. The big library, containing almost 50,000 volumes, those of the professors, students, and boarders, were thrown out of the windows, scattered over the courtyard, reduced to a hopeless state of ruin. . . . They ravaged the room of St. Vincent de Paul, where various objects used by him were preserved. They smashed his statue, recently placed in a vestibule.

They killed some sheep that were feeding in the enclosure. They set fire to the barns, and the firemen had difficulty in preventing the spread of the conflagration. . . . Even the priests of the house were in danger. Several of them were beaten, but none were killed. A number of them climbed over the walls of the enclosure; some sick persons were taken to the house of the Recollects near by and to the Hôtel-Dieu. . . .

Word had spread that the Lazarists had large stores of wheat, that they were hoarders. But the provision that was found would hardly have been enough to supply the house for three months. That whole section knew that, during the preceding six months, the Lazarists had distributed bread and soup to several hundred poor people. But the mob wished to give the charge the semblance of truth in the eyes of the people. They seized a priest and a subdeacon of the house. These two men, wearing their cassocks, were put in a cart, seated on sacks of wheat, and were thus taken to the market place, escorted by men who carried torches and arms. These men would finallly have immolated the two victims but for the cleverness and energy of an officer of the guard.

Amid this disaster certain circumstances were noteworthy. No profanation occurred in the church, the only spot in the whole establishment that was spared. Moreover, in the wrecked bedrooms the crucifixes were respected. Another striking incident concerned a venerable old man, almost eighty years of age, who was a paralytic. At the infirmarian's request, they themselves carried him to the house of the Daughters of Charity, whose spiritual director he had been. When they reached there, they said: "We are bringing your father to you." A few hours later, that is, about five o'clock, a larger number appeared at the house of the Daughters of Charity in the hope of finding there that store of wheat which they had vainly searched for at St. Lazare. Some of these men decided to enter the chapel, where the novices were gathered together. The evident fright of these young women and the holiness of the place impressed the men. They withdrew with signs of respect. A few of them even knelt down. In the course of these various visits not a single indecent word was heard.

This account, with all the marks of sincerity, shows us the nature of those first popular uprisings. Camille Desmoulins, a theorist, a journalist, a young lawyer without any practice, a man not yet thirty years old, nourished on the theories of the Social Contract, was the one who set everything going. A starving populace turned to pillage. Yet, at the very moment of their greatest excitement, the people still retained an instinctive respect for religion, for modesty, and for all holy things. This condition would not last; and the people of Paris, as well as those throughout the rest of France, would unfortunately become accustomed little by little to every sort of sacrilege and horror.

The Taking of the Bastille

Mere hatred for the "hoarders" had stirred up the mob in the pillage of St. Lazare. The taking of the Bastille, which occurred the next day, was owing to a movement of political excitement.

The Bastille was an old state prison where persons were confined by simple lettre de cachet of the king.[23] In the public mind the Bastille was the most conspicuous personification of despotism. True, in it had been imprisoned far more great lords than common people. Historical evidence has shown that the prisoners generally led a rather comfortable life.[24] But legends and pamphlets had made of it a place of mystery and dread, and the people clung to this notion of it.

[23] A lettre de cachet was a judiciary act, issued by the royal power, without any opportunity of defense by the accused and without any legal procedure whatever.

The events of July 14 are so well known that we need not recount them here: the attack led by the militia, hastily armed with rifles and cannons taken from the Invalides; De Launey (the governor of the prison), Flesselles (the provost of provisions), and several subordinate officials massacred, their heads streaked with blood, stuck on the ends of pikes above a howling mob; and the freed prisoners paraded in triumph. These prisoners were seven in number: four forgers, two lunatics, and a sadist. Louis XVI, upon hearing a report of the event, is said to have remarked, "Is this a revolt?" To which the Duke of Liancourt answered, "No, Sire. It is a revolution." The mob, which the day before had halted in the presence of the image of Christ, would not recoil before the symbol of what it called tyranny.

The event produced a deep impression throughout Europe. The sovereigns saw in it a presage of approaching upsets in their states.[25]

We should note that neither the people nor even the clergy seemed to regard this event as an attack on religion. The next [24] Funck-Brentano, Légendes et archives de la Bastille (1904). By the same author, Des lettres de cachet à Paris (1903). Cf. Lavisse, Hist. de France, Vol. III, Part I, pp. 314–17.

[25] Michelet relates the following anecdote about Kant. For sixty years Kant used to set forth each day at precisely the same hour. For a definite number of minutes, without speaking to anyone, he followed exactly the same route, as we see on certain old city clocks an iron man come forth, strike the hour, and then return. But one day a strange irregularity was noted by the inhabitants of Königsberg. The familiar planet was not following his set course. Emmanuel Kant was walking toward the highway by which the courier from France used to come. The previous day Kant had learned of the taking of the Bastille. He had a presentiment that a great event had taken place.

day a deputation of the Assembly, taken from the three estates and including Count de Lally, Tollendal, Archbishop de Juigné of Paris, and Bailly, the deputy of the capital, went to the Hôtel de Ville. Bailly was acclaimed mayor of Paris in place of the provost Flesselles; Lafayette was given the command of the National Guard. Then the Archbishop invited the people to come to the cathedral for the singing of a Te Deum "in thanksgiving for the re-establishment of peace." [26] Between the brutal passions of the mob, the philosophical chimeras of Rousseau's disciples, and the principles of the gospel, a confusion existed at least in a large number of minds. This confusion would disappear only little by little. Its persistence enables us to understand many of the events among those we are about to relate.

The votes taken during the night of August 4 and the Declaration of the Rights of Man, published August 23, reveal the continuance of the same state of mind.

The Provinces

The example given by the capital was followed in the provinces. The mobs had pillaged Paris: they had destroyed the symbol of tyranny; in a spontaneous movement they had elected a municipal government. Under the inspiration of seditious papers, circulated profusely in the cities and country districts, and at the instigation of revolutionary agitators who journeyed through France sowing false terrors, bands of brigands rose up everywhere. The alarm was spread wherever a center of "hoarding" was pointed out, wherever a feudal or monastic "bastille" rose up. Seize the grain being held to provoke a famine; destroy the last asylums where social inequalities were being perpetuated: such were the watchwords.

At once those who might naturally be expected to take up the defense of the ancient regime began to emigrate. The Count of Artois with his two sons, Prince de Condé, Prince de Conti, Maréchal de Broglie, Maréchal de Castries, the Duke de Polignac, Prince de Lambesc, Baron de Breteuil, and many other members of the nobility fled to foreign lands. Their abandoned estates were seized by armed bands that pillaged them; bonfires were lighted, the flames fed by old charters; many a château was a prey to the flames: [27] such was the end of a regime that had become hateful. To complete the ruin of the nobility, cities and towns accomplished their municipal revolution, as was done at Paris: they elected permanent committees, armed the National Guard, dismissed the agents of the central power, and tried to govern themselves.

[26] Picot, Mémoires, V, 368.

The Night of August 4

The reports of these disturbances reached the capital and troubled men's minds. The most effective means of calming the popular excitement seemed to be to sacrifice whatever angered the populace. What the people were going to take by force had better be offered to them with good grace. Such was the origin of the decisive action taken on the night of August 4.

A representative of the nobility, Viscount de Noailles, proposed the immediate abolition of all feudal taxes; the clergy, in a burst of enthusiastic generosity, at once joined in the proposal. They were used to great sacrifices; at every crisis they had offered their dons gratuits bountifully to the monarchy.[28] This time the gift was as reckless as it was generous. By the lips of Archbishop de Juigné the clergy gave up their land taxes. Then, one after the other, Bishop de La Fare of Nancy, [27] In January, 1790, Necker estimated at 60,000,000 francs the amount of the indemnities due the victims of these outrages. Prudhomme, Révolutions de Paris, no. 47.

[28] Cf. Mourret, op. cit., V, 17 ff.

Bishop de Lubersac of Chartres, and Archbishop de Boisgelin of Aix arose: the first condemning the feudal taxes of the "ecclesiastical lords"; the second speaking against "the right of the chase"; the third denouncing the arbitrary extension of the so-called rights of domain, the salt tax, and other taxes. The Assembly voted the redemption of the tithes, the prohibition of plurality of benefices, and the abolition of the right of deport, that is, the right which, in several dioceses, was held by the bishops or the archdeacons to enjoy the revenues of vacant parishes.

The curés, having no feudal rights to sacrifice, offered at least their perquisites. With impulsive ardor they associated the pope himself in this sacrifice by suppressing the annates. Toward the close of the session, Abbé Grégoire mounted the rostrum and said: "I propose the abolition of the annates, that monument of simony against which the Council of Basel has already decreed." Men's minds were too heated for a cool discussion of this question which, however, deserved the trouble. The authority of the Council of Basel could not be canonically appealed to. Moreover, the French clergy could not juridically dispose of the rights of the Sovereign Pontiff without even consulting him. Furthermore, the question of the annates had been regulated by an explicit provision of the concordat of 1516.[29] But the abolition of this right was decided without any discussion. The entire collection of articles was passed amid general enthusiasm. The deputies of the Third Estate, to have their part in this movement of generosity, gave up the privileges belonging to certain provinces and cities. The clergy, through the Archbishop of Paris, offered to chant a solemn Te Deum of thanksgiving at Notre Dame, and the nobility, through Marquis de Lally-Tollendal, proposed to decree for Louis XVI the title of "Restorer of French Liberty."

[29] It is true that this tax was paid very irregularly and only by a few of the benefice-holders. Cf. Mourret, op. cit., V, 258.

On the following days the Assembly, far from manifesting any regret over its decision, did but accentuate the provisions.

The Tithes

Article 5 of the decree passed on the night of August 4 ordered the redemption of the tithes due to the clergy. But, in the deplorable situation to which the finances of the state were reduced, how could the state meet the obligations created by the redemption? On August 8, in connection with a loan requested by the minister (Necker), Marquis de La Coste, deputy from Charolais, proposed to hypothecate this loan on the possessions of the clergy. The measure was premature and, for the time being, was rejected. But the next day Mirabeau asked the Assembly to vote the suppression of the tithe pure and simple.

After all, was the tithe anything more than a form of salary always subject to revocation, "with which the nation paid the officers of morality and education"? When these words provoked some murmuring, the orator with the full thunder of his voice replied: "I know of only three ways of existing in society: a man must be a beggar or a thief, or he must be salaried." The whole principle of communism was in these words. A notable part of the Assembly was drawn by Mirabeau's discourse. But Abbé Sieyès had the courage, in this circumstance, to utter words of good sense. He drew attention to the fact that the property burdened with the tithe had been purchased by the present owners only with a reckoning of the charges that were incumbent on it. To suppress these charges would simply raise the value of such property. He wisely remarked: "I do not think we need to make a present of 70,000,000 francs in taxes to the owners of this property. Those who profit by the outright abolition will not be the poor; they will be the rich." In a more pathetic tone a humble curé declared: "Gentlemen of the Third Estate, when you asked us to come to you in the name of a God of peace, did you do so to strangle us or make us die of hunger?" In fact, the suppression of the tithes diminished by half the revenue of the clergy.[30]

Hostility toward the Holy See

But the Assembly was beginning to feel the influence of the mobs, exasperated by wretchedness, fascinated by social utopias, and exploited by the leaders who were eager for popularity. On August 10, disorderly bands from Paris arrived at Versailles, asking with loud outcries for bread and demanding it from the property of the priests. The next day, to disarm any prejudice that might be felt toward them, the clergy decided not to prolong a discussion in which they blushed to defend their pecuniary interests. Several curés called for the reading of a bill in which they declared that they gave up their rights to the tithe. The Archbishop of Paris mounted the rostrum and made the following declaration: "My colleagues have merely gone beyond the sacrifice we are all offering to our country. We, all of us, place in the hands of the nation all the ecclesiastical tithes, and we entrust ourselves entirely to our country's wisdom. Let the gospel be proclaimed, let divine worship be celebrated with decency and dignity, let the churches be provided with virtuous and zealous pastors, let the poor be succored: this is the purpose of our ministry."[31]

That same day a memorial sent to the Assembly from the Roman court asked the French lawmakers to revoke the decision about the annates. This communication led the members of the Constituent Assembly to make more emphatic the character of their decree on the rights of the Holy See. Someone asked to whom the bishops should henceforth turn for their institution if the annates were suppressed. The Jansenist Camus answered: "The bishops will be confirmed by the metropolitans, the latter by the national council." Thus the Assembly decreed that the diocesans should henceforth address their bishops for all provision of benefices and dispensations. Says Frédéric Masson: "The whole Civil Constitution of the Clergy is to be found in germ in this resolution." [32] But the members of the clergy undoubtedly failed to perceive its full import, and no protest was raised against Camus' proposal.

[30] At the session of April 9, 1790, Chasset estimated these revenues of the clergy at 170,000,000 francs. Moniteur, I, 412. But Necker, in 1784, put the figure at only 130,000,000. Necker, De l'administration des finances de la France, II, 316.

[31] Journal ecclésiastique of September, 1789, p. 36.

A frank enthusiasm blinded the best minds. On August 14, in a charge to be read from the pulpit by all priests having the care of souls in the diocese of Paris, Archbishop de Juigné declared: "O ever-memorable epoch in the history of the nation! What you might have beheld, my brethren, taking place on the fourth of this month in the National Assembly! How thankfully you would have seen these representatives of all the estates, of all the provinces and all the cities of the kingdom, animated and transported by love and enthusiasm for the public good, emulating one another in stripping themselves of the most ancient and most precious privileges and rights so as to sacrifice them for the solace of the people and the general happiness of our country!" [33] The Jansenists, on their side, rejoiced at seeing the Church at length "spiritualized" by abandonment of its material riches. The revolutionary Prudhomme wrote in his diary under date of August 16, "France emerges from a long and humiliating slavery." Lastly, the Moniteur had the following remark: "In a single night the face of France has changed; in one night the famous tree of feudalism, whose shadow covered all France, has been reversed; in one night a new people seems to have repeopled this vast empire."

The lawmakers were too much encouraged by such approbations for them not to go further. In declaring themselves a Constituent Assembly, they showed their intention of performing a more positive work. On the ruins of the ancient regime they intended to erect a new constitution.

[32] Masson, op. cit., p. 361.

[33] Journal ecclésiastique, loc. cit.

The Cahiers of the Three Orders

The memorials of grievances drawn up by the three orders furnished them with a natural basis.[34] On several points these memorials were almost unanimous. A division of powers, such as England practiced and such as Montesquieu had extolled; administrative decentralization by suppression of the intendants, of internal customs taxes and of all hindrances to commerce and industry: such were the wishes on which the nobility and the clergy agreed with the Third Estate. But the nobility and the Third Estate differed on the way the taxes should be assessed; and the clergy differed from both by the preponderant place it gave to religion in the social organization.

The Clergy

A capital importance was attached to the memorials of the clergy because of the gravity of their wording and the loftiness of their general inspiration. An attentive study of them reveals the deepest and truest thought of the nation at the close of the eighteenth century. In certain particularly vibrant expressions, we feel the very heart of France beating, as it were, with all the passions then agitating it.

The clergy seemed to be unconcerned with defending the [34] The most complete publication regarding the cahiers of the States General is that issued in 1875 by Madival and Laurent. It appeared first in the Archives parlementaires, then separately in six quarto volumes and a seventh volume of tables. The Constituent Assembly ignored most of the cahiers, having under its eyes only the general summary (by Prudhomme and Laurent de Mézières), which was tendentious. Even today we do not possess a complete publication except for ten provinces. See Edme Champion, La France d'après les cahiers de 1789 (3rd ed., 1907). Cf. Vialay, Les cahiers de doléances du tiers état en 1789 (1910).

political aspect of the ancient regime. Periodical meetings of the States General, the development of provincial assemblies, and the abolition of lettres de cachet formed the program of a liberal political constitution which was not opposed in any of the clergy's memorials. Sometimes a favorable echo of such proposals is found therein.[35] Apparently the clergy were resigned to the fall, not of the monarchy—on the contrary, they asked for its continuance—but of the political part of the ancient regime. What aroused the clergy's solicitude was the danger to the Catholic faith by the growth of unbelief, the corruption of morals, and the lack of zeal in too many priests. The clergy of the Amiens district proposed that an inspection service of publications should be organized under the direction of a commission composed of an upright magistrate, an incorruptible man of letters, and an exact theologian. A certain district of the Midi proposed, as an antidote to the publications of unbelief, the widespread circulation of a popular explanation of Catholic doctrine. Many memorials asked for a closer organization of the clergy by the establishment of diocesan synods and provincial councils and by the formation of special schools of preaching where the young priests would be trained in public speaking.

The demands of the clergy for the maintenance of their rights was not without a certain sharpness of expression which they make no attempt to hide. These complaints were evidently discussed, sometimes in stormy sessions, by men who suffered from the social disorder. Where the influence of the upper clergy prevailed, the memorials recall: "with a haughtiness mingled with uneasiness, that the clergy is the first order of the state. The demand is the more insistent as it shelters itself behind the cause of God." [36] When the influence of the lower clergy is dominant, the expressions of grievances sometimes have a vague accent of revolt. Almost everywhere, in the north as well as in the south, in the east as in the west, the curés are plainly rising up against an old edict that gave the bishop the right to impose on his priests a three-month internment in a seminary. Many of the memorials ask that henceforth access to ecclesiastical dignities should be by way of concursus, conditions of age and of length of time in the priesthood. "This desire was altogether just. But the request was anonymous only in appearance. In the eyes of those who framed it, the petition had in mind a definite person, the bishop appointed at too early an age, the vicar general who is utterly ignorant, and the canon promoted at the age of twenty-five, who at that early age began a life of repose." [37]

[35] Bishop de Chabot of Saint-Claude, in the assembly of the Aval bailiwick, demanded equality of taxation, the suppression of mortmain, and the reform of the constitution. Cf. A. Mathiez, Rome et le clergé français, p. 107. Bishop de La Luzerne of Langres spoke out clearly against absolute power, saying: "It is dangerous that there should be only one power in a great nation; for, if this sole power is that of the sovereign, it will degenerate into despotism." Ibid.

In many places the bishops made reservations in their memorials. The Bishop of Amiens expressed the fear that the Estates General would contain too few prelates and that the religious questions would be discussed without competence. The Bishop of Evreux protested against the spirit of cabal and insubordination on the part of the curés at the assembly over which he presided. He declared: "Justice cannot mean that a class should exist which, by the superiority of thirty votes against one, would overwhelm the rest." He railed at the presumption of the curés, who, in drawing up of the memorials, prided themselves on being "administrators, jurists, and men of finance." [38]

We should note a curious fact, one that gives us a glimpse of the clergy of France as representative of the whole nation. The acrimony, the rancour, and the half-suppressed rivalries [36] De La Gorce, Histoire de la Révolution française, I, 98.

[37] Ibid., I, 100.
[38] Archives nationales. Cf. ibid., I, 101; Mathiez, p. 104.

that show through here and there in the documents of this period between the different classes of society do not hinder the touching and sometimes naive unanimity with which prelates and curés ask for whatever can improve the lot of their flocks. A breath of Christian philanthropy pervades these memorials of the clergy of France. In these they request a greater number of asylums for the aged, schools, relief offices, and free distribution of medicine in the country districts. The clergy of Charolles, demanding the maintenance of the monks, emphasize that they are useful for "the relief of families." [39] Everywhere a reaction is manifested against the excessive centralization of the ancient regime. A wish is expressed that the money of the provinces should be spent where it is produced and that the offices and dignities be reserved to people of the district.[40] Everywhere also appear the words "liberty, reform, fraternity, nation, and equality." The frequency of these terms indicates a fermentation of ideas in which the spirit of Christianity and that of the eighteenth-century philosophy are strangely mingled.[41]

The theorists of the Assembly intended to establish the basis of the French constitution on these general ideas, which were often ambiguous. Unfortunately they interpreted these ideas in the sense of the rationalist philosophy. The men who succeeded them almost always applied these ideas in a spirit hostile to the Catholic Church. Thus the Declaration of the Rights of Man, which, in the minds of its authors, was to be merely the philosophy of the cahiers of the three orders, became in fact the starting point of measures of persecution taken against religion.[42]

[39] Mavidal and Laurent, II, 614.

[40] Grille, Tableau comparatif des mandats et pouvoirs donnés en 1789 aux représentants de la nation (1826), Vol. II, passim.

[41] Ibid.

[42] Barnave, for instance, on the sole basis of the Declaration of the Rights of Man, asked for the suppression of the religious orders. The Legislative Assembly would take the same basis to proclaim divorce.

The Three Principles of the Declaration

In its first session the Assembly decided that the new constitution, in imitation of the American Constitution, should be preceded by a declaration of principles. On August 19, Abbé Sieyès presented a project which "was found too metaphysical by most of the speakers." [43] The meetings on the following days were devoted to the discussion of several other projects. Two philosophical currents then appeared. But the constitutional school, which was connected with Montesquieu and which was represented by Mounier, Lally-Tollendal, Clermont-Tonnerre, and Necker, tried unsuccessfully to have adopted a realistic and moderate policy. The democratic school of Rousseau, defended by Sieyès [44] and Mirabeau, soon won over the majority of the Assembly to its abstract and systematic theories. Says Condorcet: "The method of the mathematical sciences opened new avenues for the political and social sciences." [45] The lawmakers of 1789 seemed to be inspired by this maxim. On August 23, "in the presence of the Supreme Being and under His auspices," there was published the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen. This decree had a preamble, which Mirabeau declared to be his work, and seventeen articles. Of these the first three were inspired by Lafayette.[46] These three articles, containing all the essential provisions, from which all the others could be logically deduced, may be summed up in these three words, which express Rousseau's Contrat social: liberty, equality, and sovereignty of the people.

Article 1 says: "Men are born and remain free and equal before the law." The most orthodox theologians had long since [43] Prudhomme, Les Révolutions de Paris, no. 6, p. 36.

[44] Sieyès always denied that he belonged to the school of Rousseau, but he continually got his inspiration from the spirit of the Contrat social.

[45] Condorcet, Tableau des progrès de l'esprit humain, tenth epoch.

[46] Prudhomme, op. cit., no. 6, p. 37.

proclaimed that "all men are equal in nature and that, by nature, no one is either inferior or superior"; but they had been careful to add that the community has received from God the right to transfer the power to one or to many, who will then command each one in the name of God.[47] The revolutionary declaration, on the contrary, seemed to proclaim the primitive liberty and equality as something inalienable.

Article 3 says: "The principle of all sovereignty resides essentially in the nation." Cardinal Bellarmine had taught, in the sixteenth century, that "the public power resides immediately in the multitude as its subject." This doctrine, taught by most scholastic authors, rested on the authority of St. Thomas Aquinas. But the learned Jesuit denied that such a principle implied for the people the perpetual right of revolt.[48] This right is indeed what the lawmakers of 1789, after the example of Rousseau, seemed to affirm.

The radical error, suited to give a revolutionary meaning to the three words, "liberty, equality, popular sovereignty," was found in article 2, restricting the purpose of any political association to the preservation of the natural and inalienable rights of man. Both the whole Catholic school of thought and tradition taught that the purpose of civil society is to assist man, within the sphere of his temporal interests, to accomplish his duties toward God and toward his fellow men. Mirabeau himself, supported by the Jansenist Camus, spoke right when, presenting a project in nineteen articles "intended to establish [47] Compendium Salmanticense, tract. III, De legibus, cap. 2, punctum 1, inq. 2. St. Gregory the Great wrote: "Since our Redeemer, the Maker of every creature, vouchsafed to assume human flesh for this end, that . . . He might restore us to pristine liberty, it is a salutary deed if men whom nature originally produced free, and whom the law of nations has subjected to the yoke of slavery, be restored by the benefit of manumission to the liberty in which they were born." A Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (1895), XII, 191. Cf. Mourret, op. cit., III, 105.

[48] On this subject, see Mourret, op. cit., V, 631 f. As regards St. Thomas, see ibid., p. 84.

reason and perfect human liberty," he declared: "What we need to proclaim is not the declaration of rights, but the declaration of duties." [49]

Less realist on this point than the fiery orator, and more reliant on the wise interpretation of a declaration drawn up "in the presence of the Supreme Being and under His auspices," the members of the clergy did not discern clearly enough the dangers of the formulas they were asked to subscribe to. All of them agreed to these formulas without any thought of making a schism.[50] We have seen Christian kings, in a respectful sense and one not excluding the rights of God and the Church, apply this formula of the jurists, likewise unacceptable in its literal sense, namely, that "the good pleasure of the king has the force of law." [51] Events would soon dispel these illusions.

Development of Anarchy

The proclamation of the rights of man, interpreted in the individualist and rationalist sense which Rousseau's philosophy gave it, was certain to favor the development of the ferments of anarchy which we have already seen appear in the first days of the Constituent Assembly.

The very day when the Declaration was published, the journalist Prudhomme remarked in his paper that the sixty districts of Paris, formed to replace parish boundaries, considered themselves independent authorities, assuming legislative functions and revoking decrees that did not satisfy them. In conclusion he said: "Such are the causes of the anarchy into which we are plunged. Each day aggravates our situation in this respect." [52] Besides the district committees, the clubs and the Masonic lodges also took the initiative into their own hands. Gustave Bord has shown that, as early as the beginning of 1789, the following were Masonic societies, at least through affiliation of their most influential members: the Société du Port, whose leading member was Lafayette; the Société Bergasse, which paid the expenses of publishing Brissot's pamphlets; the Société de Viroflay, which, according to Lameth's Masonic expression, labored "for the progress of lights"; and especially the Club breton, the future Club des jacobins, which already was preaching "a cavern policy."

[49] Mirabeau saw the essential defect of the Contrat social. He wrote: "Man is truly man only when society begins to organize itself." On this subject see Faguet, XVIII^e siècle, p. 497. On the Declaration of the Rights of Man see Godard, Les principes de 89 et la doctrine catholique, and Emile Keller, Le Syllabus et les principes de 89.

[50] So said Father Emery. See Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, I, 448.

[51] Quidquid placuit Principi, legis habet vigorem. Cf. Funck-Brentano, "La popularité et le 'bon plaisir' du roi" in Revue des Deux Mondes (October 15, 1911, pp. 926–33). However, since Louis XIV the absolutism was hardly any longer in the person of the king. He found himself in a system, with the king its chief slave. "Slave of his court," wrote Madelin, "slave of his minister and of tradition, the king sometimes aspired to freedom more than his subjects did." L. Madelin, La Révolution, p. 4.

About these associations certain more or less spontaneous clubs and groups of wretched men, embittered by misery, provoked frequent alarms. "From the 14th of July, the ministry was dominated by the Assembly; the Assembly, by the clubs; the clubs, by the demagogues; the demagogues, by the armed populace, fanatical and starving, which they thought they were leading but which in reality was driving them before it." [53]

The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen merely fanned the fire of these revolutionary undertakings. Basing the entire social organization on the single protection of individual independence, the Declaration intoxicated the "citizens" with their own might. "The divine right of the crowds," according to the words of a certain psychologist, "then pretended to replace the divine right of kings." [54] On [52] Prudhomme, Révolutions de Paris, no. 7, pp. 7–9. Cf. Avant-Moniteur (made up chiefly of Bailly's Mémoires), VII, 9. See Ernest Mellié, Les sections de Paris pendant la Révolution française.

[53] Albert Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, II, 4.

[54] Gustave Le Bon, La psychologie des foules, p. 3.

August 24, Bailly wrote in his Mémoires: "Today the distribution of bread was most painful. . . . An uprising of the workmen of Montmartre was feared." [55] The preceding day, Prudhomme wrote in his paper: "We have been free for only one day. Shortly the districts will be peopled only with slaves, and the committees will be composed only of tyrants." [56]

A sort of feverish excitement stirred the man of the people as well as the bourgeois and accompanied him even in the common pastimes of his daily life. In the paper having the widest circulation at that time, under date of August 25, 1789, we read: "At Paris they are having the visit of the paintings on exhibition at the Louvre. The number of visitors is smaller than in preceding years. In fact, the allegories of love, the portraits of courtiers, the flatteries of slaves, all these are of little interest to us. Henceforth Brutus, pronouncing the death of his son, or Decius, dying for his country, are subjects that will appeal to us." [57]

Four Destructions

In the presence of such a disorganization and such a state of effervescence, four traditional powers, if wisely restored, might have effectively withstood the rising flood of anarchy. These controlling factors were the royal power, the authority of the judiciary bodies, the influence of the professional corporations, and the ascendancy of the clergy, regular and secular. The Assembly strove to destroy each of these forces, one after the other.

Here we shall do no more than summarily recall how the first three destructions were accomplished. In the presence of the [55] Avant-Moniteur, p. civ.

[56] Prudhomme, op. cit., no. 7, p. 11. The avowal is notable. In preaching man's duties, the gospel had trained free souls; in proclaiming only man's rights, the Revolution was preparing slaves and tyrants.

[57] Ibid., no. 7, p. 18.

constitutional projects that practically annihilated the royal power, Bailly wrote, under date of August 28: "It seems to me that the result of the constitution is a democratic monarchy or a royal democracy." [58]

At the side of kings, the parliaments had constituted very potent powers. A law of November 3, 1789, decreed their adjournment sine die, and these "sovereign courts," as they were called, which more than once had dared to withstand the might of kings and even that of the popes, let themselves be dissolved. Some of them did so after a few vain protests; others, as the parliament at Toulouse, deplored "the irresistible force of circumstances." Persons might have said that they felt themselves powerless in the presence of a revolutionary movement which they had favored in spite of themselves by their principles and often by their attitude.

The corporations of arts and crafts were also a strong social force. For the working classes they constituted a sort of nobility, sometimes hereditary, which gave the profession and the individual a dignity they were rightly proud of. But in 1789 these corporations went through a hard crisis. A royal edict of 1776 had reorganized them according to a plan that quite changed them. The edict established, besides the organized professions, free professions, admitted women to the mastership, lowered by two-thirds, sometimes by three-fourths, the payments for admission, and provided for the election of the administrators and syndics, thereafter assisted by a permanent council. "We may well believe that if the time should have come to consolidate the work of the royal edict, the societies would have acquired the unity and cohesion that had been the strength of their predecessors, and this without deserving the same criticism or falling into the same abuses." [59] Unhappily they had not emerged from their period of transition when the Revolution broke out. Unable to reorganize themselves amid the ceaseless disturbances, they found themselves actually destroyed when (June 14, 1791) the Le Chapelier law suppressed them legally, forbidding workmen to "form regulations about their so-called common interests."

[58] Avant-Moniteur, p. cvi. In the declaration the democratic school of Rousseau prevailed. But in the constitution the constitutional school of Montesquieu guided the provisions. Hence resulted a contradictory dualism, which was expressed by the formula of the letters patent: "Louis, by the grace of God and by the constitutional law of the state, King of the French." But little by little the King will be disarmed, and the nation will be provided with formidable weapons.

One institution remained, the Church, with its immense religious ascendancy and its undeniable power. By its vast possessions, valued at 3,000,000,000 francs,[60] it had continually remained in permanent contact with the people. Its great monasteries and the sumptuous palaces of its bishops, not only imposed respect by their massiveness or their fine architecture, but also had poured out, in times of distress, the most generous alms. And the little curacies and humble chaplaincies, where poor priests courageously shared the hard life of the populations to whom they ministered, had made the influence of the Church reach into the remotest country districts.

Three important decrees of the Constituent Assembly aimed at destroying that power. By the decree of November 2, 1789, which placed all ecclesiastical property at the disposal of the nation, by that of February 13, 1790, which suppressed the vows of religion, and by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (July 12, 1790), which made even the ministry of the clergy dependent on the state, the Constituent Assembly did not fear to attack this last rampart of the Christian faith, of the social order, and of true liberty.

[59] Martin Saint-Léon, Histoire des corporations, p. 593.

[60] According to Chasset's report, the clergy possessed a fifth of the landed property. Moniteur, I, 412. De La Gorce says 2,992,538,400 livres. "After examining the different evidences," writes Madelin, "we must grant that De La Gorce is right. The annual revenue was 85,000,000 francs. But this sum was almost doubled by the tithes, which amounted to about 80,000,000 francs." Louis Madelin, La Révolution, p. 6.

Church Property

Of course, since the formation of the National Assembly the clergy no longer existed as the first order of the state. But its immense landed possessions might, so it was said, render it formidable. Moreover, on this point as on many other points, the jurists and the philosophers of the ancient regime had prepared for the Revolution. In 1749 an edict forbade any bequest in favor of the Church and decided that acquisitions by gift or with any obligation attached would not be valid except by special authorization.[61] In the Encyclopedia, Turgot proclaimed the right of the government, for reasons of public utility, to suppress all foundations.[62] In certain districts the lower clergy vaguely adopted these views, declaring that small ecclesiastical properties were sacred and inalienable, and letting it be understood that the same restriction did not apply absolutely to large properties.

On August 6, following the generous sacrifice which the clergy had just made of the revenues, one of the deputies, Buzot, ventured this remark: "I hold that all ecclesiastical property belongs to the nation." Two days later Marquis de La Coste repeated the same thing. But these words did not then find any response. Public opinion was not ready for an immediate spoliation. Three months afterward, when the question was put clearly before the representatives of the nation, even those who most eagerly desired the ruin of the Church or its political subjection to the civil power had to avoid so shocking an expression of their views. They enveloped their thought in clever circumlocutions. To obtain the votes of the other members they will be obliged to offer reasons of a political and economic order.

[61] Isambert, Anciennes lois françaises, XXII, 226. Louis XIV said in his Mémoires: "The kings are absolute lords of all the goods, whether of seculars or of ecclesiastics, to use them according to the needs of the state."

[62] Under the word Fondations, VII, 75.

The Assembly was divided into committees. The formation of an ecclesiastical committee showed from the start the desire to give a large place to the religious questions. But the composition of this committee gave reason to fear that these questions would be settled only in a Jansenist, Gallican, and rationalist sense. The committee had eleven members, six of them lawyers. Among these we find four men already known for their opposition to the Roman doctrines: Durand de Maillane, Lanjuinais, Treilhard, and Martineau.

Durand, born at Saint-Rémy in Provence in 1729, had been a lawyer in the Aix parliament. His reputation was that of an honest and learned magistrate, and his name was well known to the public by a commentary, published in 1771, on Pierre Pithou's articles concerning the Gallican liberties, and by several works on canon law. In these writings the doctrines of the most radical Gallicanism were plainly professed. Canon law was also the subject to which the lawyer Lanjuinais applied himself particularly. In the two Latin works that he wrote on canon law, according to the testimony of his son Victor, "his sole desire was to revive the faith by a return to the discipline of the first centuries."

Less scholarly than Durand de Maillane, but a man of no less probity and austerity, Lanjuinais, descended from an old Breton family, would show throughout his life, in defense of his ideas, the proverbial tenacity of the people of Brittany. We shall see him in the Convention, during the uprising of May 31, 1793, after being thrown down from the rostrum, mount it again and cling there amid pistols and fisticuffs. John Baptist Treilhard, son of a sculptor of Brives, unlike Durand and Lanjuinais, did not profess an austere Christianity. Rather his ideas attached him to irreligious philosophy. His uncouth appearance, his slow and at first hesitant manner of speech, were not in his favor. But his deep knowledge of affairs and his remarkable suppleness of mind would soon win for him a particular influence in the committee and in the assembly. The Parisian lawyer Martineau had the reputation of being an active, hard-working, and scholarly man, who openly professed the purest Catholic faith. His Jansenism seems to have been beyond doubt.[63] On this point we have precise evidence, not only in the testimony of his contemporaries [64] and in his own explicit approval of the official journal of Jansenism,[65] but also in the very text of his report and discourses. The influence of these four men, in whom the Gallican spirit, the Jansenist spirit, and the philosophical spirit of the age were fused in their defiance of Rome and in their jealous attachment to so-called national liberties, would be decisive in the revolutionary legislation regarding the clergy.

Talleyrand

But the person who, in the Assembly, brought up the question of ecclesiastical property was not one of these men. That role would belong to a member of the frivolous society of the eighteenth century, to a member of the upper clergy and the high nobility, Maurice de Talleyrand-Périgord, bishop of Autun. Nothing seemed to designate Maurice de Talleyrand for this audacious project. "Formerly as general agent of the clergy,[66] he had proclaimed the domain of the Church inalienable. At the beginning of the States General he had backed the court, advised resistance, and only later on rallied to the National Assembly. The devastation that followed July 14 reached

[63] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 92.

[64] See Abbé de Bonneval's testimony in Etudes for April 20, 1907, pp. 263, 267.

[65] "Martineau's report was strongly applauded. . . . Nothing could be more judicious or more conformable to the spirit of the Church." Nouvelles ecclésiastiques of July 24, 1790, pp. 117–19.

[66] The general agents of the clergy, instituted at the close of the sixteenth century, were the permanent delegates of the clergy to the royal authority. They were in continual correspondence with the dioceses. On this important institution, see L. Serbat, Les Assemblées du clergé de France, pp. 178–89.

him even in his personal interests: the Sénozan château, one of the finest in the Mâconnais district, which was burned down on July 28, was a possession of his family." [67] But the later events made him give more and more significant approval to the new ideas. Chosen a member of the constitution committee along with Sieyès, Mounier, and Lally-Tollendal, he had, by virtue of his position, taken an active part in the formulation of the famous Declaration of the Rights of Man. A priest without a sacerdotal vocation,[68] Talleyrand was advanced to the episcopacy by reason of his administrative services and in spite of the notorious disorder of his morals. He was more daring than deep, indifferent to the means employed and almost to the purpose intended, if only he found some personal success therein.[69] His complete change of attitude, which would be followed by many other such changes during the rest of his life,[70] was not otherwise mysterious. The cause of the ancient [67] De La Gorce, op. cit., I, 140. Cf. Sicard, L'ancien clergé de France, II, 129 ff.; Pisani, Répertoire biographique de l'épiscopat constitutionel, p. 217; Bernard de Lacombe, Talleyrand, évêque d'Autun.

[68] "My parents, according to what they considered a family interest, decided to lead me to a state of life for which I showed no disposition." Talleyrand, Mémoires (published by Duke de Broglie, 1891), I, 16. Talleyrand reveals the depth of his soul and the mentality of the age when, a little further on, he writes; "Youth is the period of life when a person has the greatest uprightness. I did not yet understand what it was to enter into a state of life with the intention of following another, to go to the seminary for the purpose of becoming minister of finance. . . . But I had no means of defense; my entire surroundings had ready-made answers for all my objections. My weary spirit resigned itself: I let myself be brought to the seminary of St. Sulpice." Ibid., p. 19. Count de Choiseul relates that, being at Talleyrand's house the evening before the latter's ordination to the priesthood, he found him in a violent state of interior struggle, of tears and despair. The Count then made every effort to dissuade him from going on. But Talleyrand's fear of his mother and of a public sensation at his tardy change of mind, as also a false shame, deprived him of courage. He exclaimed: "It is too late for me to withdraw." Note of M. de Bacour, inserted in Talleyrand's Mémoires by Duke de Broglie, I, 23.

[69] Guizot, Mémoires, I, 37.

[70] On Talleyrand's conversion shortly before his death, see Lagrange, Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, I, 234–58. Cf. Baron de Nervo, La conversion de Talleyrand, and the Mémoires de Talleyrand (edited by Duke de Broglie), V, 482–84.

regime now appeared to him to be lost. Having nothing to hope from it, he separated from it with a grand flourish and gave himself unreservedly to the movement of the future. The more his antecedents made him an object of suspicion, the more striking must now be his pledge to the victorious party.

On October 10 the Bishop of Autun, with that slow and jerky step which lost nothing of its distinction because of a slight lameness, mounted the parliamentary rostrum. He then read a bill directing the sale of all the landed property of the clergy for the benefit of the state, the state being charged with assuring the subsistence of the pillaged ecclesiastics. As we learn from contemporary witnesses, the gentleman prelate with a flexible and almost caressing voice, delivered a fatal blow to the Church, of which he was one of the high dignitaries.

His arguments were chiefly of a financial sort; the economic situation of France was indeed almost desperate. In spite of Mirabeau's eloquent apostrophe: "Bankruptcy is at your gate . . . and still you deliberate," two loans, one of 30,000,000 francs and the other of 80,000,000 had not been subscribed; the "patriotic contribution of a fourth" of the revenue had produced nothing. But the debt rose to a billion and a half francs. After enumerating the resources that seemed to him insufficient, the Bishop of Autun added:

> An immense resource remains, one that does not violate rights of ownership; the property of the clergy. . . . The clergy are not owners after the manner of other owners. . . . The portion of these goods required for the decent sustenance of the clergy is all that belongs to them; the rest is the property of the temples and the poor. If, then, the nation reserves an honorable subsistence to each holder of a benefice, of whatever nature, this policy is sure not to infringe any true ownership. By assuming responsibility for administering the rest, and by fulfilling the obligations attached to it—such as the support of hospitals and of charitable workshops, the repair of church edifices—the intentions of the founders will be carried out, and every demand of justice will be strictly observed.

The Assembly seemed to be impressed by this clever sophism. Then De Boisgelin arose. In less elegant language but in a graver tone and loftier attitude, he rightly noted that the goods had been given, not to the Church, but to various institutions —abbeys, curacies, hospitals, colleges—for precise purposes. A few days later the Archbishop of Aix again mounted the rostrum to offer, in the name of his order, a sum of 400,000,000 francs to hypothecate on the ecclesiastical property. The financial argument fell of itself, and all the prejudices against the so-called selfishness of the clergy should have fallen at the same time.

A deputy from Rennes, La Chapelier by name, then resolutely placed the question on the political terrain. According to him, the important thing was not so much to balance the finances of France, but rather to prevent the political preponderance of the clergy. "You wished to destroy the orders," he declared, "because their destruction was necessary for the security of the state. If the clergy keeps its property, the clerical order is not destroyed. The clergy offer gifts. Be suspicious of this pledge. The clergy wish to rise from their ashes that they may again form themselves into an order." To cut short this so-called peril, Mirabeau for a moment entertained the idea of having the nation proclaimed the proprietor of the goods of the clergy. But the step was too radical. It stirred lively protests.

Abbé Maury

The most eloquent objection was that of Abbé Maury. Disclosing the secret influences that were affecting many of his fellow deputies, he showed that the proposed measure would be the triumph of the speculators. He pointed out that these men were accustomed to profit from the ills of the state, "speculating on the ruin of the clergy, silently waiting for this rich prey that was being prepared for them, devouring these properties in advance, watching impatiently for the time when the sale of Church property, by raising the value of the government securities, would thereupon suddenly increase their fortune." [71]

Maury next denounced the harmful consequences, social, religious, and political, that would follow the spoliation of the clergy. He said:

> We have usurped nobody's possessions. Our possessions belong to us because we have acquired them or because they have been given to us. . . . But ownership is one, and is as sacred for us as it is for you. Our right of ownership guarantees yours. We can produce the titles of our acquisitions. We came into them under the express authorization of the laws. . . . If the nation can go back to the origin of society to strip us of our possessions, recognized and protected by the laws for fourteen centuries, this new metaphysical principle will lead to all the insurrections of the agrarian law; the people will take advantage of the chaos to demand the partition of your possessions.

But will not religion recover its ancient purity in consequence of this spoliation? Not at all, said the orator. "The public worship will be compromised if it depends on a declining and uncertain salary. Soon irreligion and cupidity will reduce the price of these functions and will seek the least costly worship and will finally come to the suppression of any worship at all." Maury concluded his solid and brilliant address, one of the finest masterpieces of parliamentary eloquence, by showing "the kingdom given over to anarchy and soon learning from its disasters this great truth, that political order rests on religion and that the ministers of public worship are the only ones who can truly voice the sentiments of the people." He finally pointed to the Kingdom of England, which, "after usurping the possessions of the richest dioceses and chapters of Europe, was obliged to replace the alms of the clergy by the taxation of the poor." [72]

[71] Picot, op. cit., V, 389.

The discussion was interrupted by the removal of the Assembly from Versailles to Paris, where it was resumed under more unfavorable conditions. To the disorder resulting from the large number of members, the vast size of the assembly chamber, and the general tense excitement of men's minds, were added the disorders provoked by the frequent invasion of the hall by the mob. In fact, from the time of their installation at Paris, the members of the Constituent Assembly were almost continually under the insolent control and sometimes the threatening influence of the clubs, the district committees, and the unorganized mobs, which disturbed the deliberations by their applause or their hoots, hindering or dictating the laws according to their passions or their whims.

Before dawn on November 2, the day when the discussion was to close, the Assembly hall was surrounded by a riotous populace. But Mirabeau, who was never without a clear-sighted political sense, recoiled before the rejection of his first proposal. He abandoned the hope of seeing the Assembly decree that the goods of the clergy were the property of the nation. The proposed decree said: "The National Assembly decrees that all ecclesiastical goods are at the disposal of the nation." [73] In this form the decree was passed by a vote of 368 to 346. Forty [72] Maury, Œuvres choisies, III, 380. Le Chapelier had said: "The clergy exercises but a sterile and perilous charity. The nation, on the contrary, will establish in its houses of prayer and of repose some workshops useful to the state, where the poor man will find his subsistence by work. No longer will we have wretches except those who wish to be so."

[73] These goods were placed at the disposal of the nation, which assumed the following obligations: 1. that suitable provision be made for the expenses of public worship, the support of its ministers, and the relief of the poor, under the watchfulness and according to the instructions of the parishes; 2. that, in the arrangements for providing suitable support of the ministers of religion, no pastor of souls shall be allotted less than 1,200 livres a year, besides living accommodations and the gardens attached thereto."

members present abstained from voting. Three hundred deputies, almost the whole right and center, frightened by the uprising, did not attend the session.

The new wording of the measure removed much of the opposition. The next day one of the most intelligent members of the minority, Boisgelin, wrote as follows to the Countess de Gramont: "I have won three points: 1. The law does not state that the property belongs to the nation, but merely that the goods of the clergy are at the disposal of the nation; 2. in the views expressed, the idea of alienation was given up; 3. and also the idea of government administration of this property." Yet in the same letter the Archbishop of Aix also said: "The cause of the clergy is lost." [74]

He wrote truly. Laws are of avail less by their wording than by the spirit in which those words are applied. In fact, Mirabeau's second formula was considered equivalent to the first.

The decree of November 2, by placing the ecclesiastical possessions "at the disposal of the nation," did not regulate the measures the government would take in the matter. From November 19, 1790, to March 19, 1793, a series of decrees would mark the progress of the most brutal and complete spoliation.

The simple enumeration of these legislative acts is sadly eloquent. On November 19, the property valued at 400,000,000 francs was put on sale. Two decrees (April 14 and 16) transferred the administration of these properties from the clergy to the departments or the districts. A month later the procedure to be followed was made precise: with a view to facilitating the operations, the purchasers could enter into possession after a down payment which, in the case of rural real estate, must be merely one-twelfth.

But this alienation of 400,000,000 francs' worth of property was soon judged insufficient. Subsequent decrees (June 24, 26, [74] Quoted by Mathiez, Rome et le clergé français sous la Constituante, p. 85.

29, and July 9) ordered the total sale, except of property belonging to the fabrics (church boards), colleges, seminaries, and hospitals. This exception, however, was not of long duration. The Constituent Assembly decided (May 6, 1791) on the sale of the suppressed churches. The Legislative Assembly and the Convention decreed as follows: (July 19, 1792) the sale of the episcopal palaces; (July 31 and August 7) the sale of houses occupied by the religious; (August 19) the sale of the property of the fabrics; (March 8, 1793) the sale of the possessions of all ecclesiastical establishments of public education; (March 19) the property of the hospitals. This series of enactments brought about the destruction of a large number of works of social welfare, but it did not succeed in balancing the budget. However, the men of the Revolution could tell themselves that the influence of the clergy as a political body was indeed ruined at its very foundation and that a multitude of purchasers of ecclesiastical property was henceforth closely bound to the cause of the Revolution by their own material interests.[75]

The way these decrees were applied added to their odious character. In some provinces the peasants and the bourgeois pounced upon the ecclesiastical property with scandalous avidity. The most shameful speculation became involved in the affair. The sale of these properties was combined with that of the possessions of the émigrés. A sudden drop in the price of landed property took place. Immense estates were sold at ridiculously low prices. One day someone said to Mirabeau: "You cannot sell all these lands at one time." "Very well," he replied, "we will give them away." The people, fascinated at the sight of so much property being put on sale, were the victims of almost incredible illusions. We are told that in the Aisne a [75] On January 10, Thomas Lindet wrote: "The assignats will soon be scattered. Their holders will, in spite of themselves, become defenders of the Revolution." "This operation," said the reporter of the law, "is going to bind all the citizens to the public interests." Cf. Madelin, La Révolution, p. 121.

hairdresser bought an immense domain belonging to the Abbey of Saint-Quentin-en-l'Ile; a baker purchased two large properties of Saint-Nicholas-aux-Bois. What happened then? Generally these purchasers were unable to furnish even the first payment of a twelfth as required before entering into possession. At this point the speculator slipped in. He replaced the insolvent purchaser by a second insolvent one, then by a third. By means of fictitious purchasers he continued to lower the price. Finally, at the favorable moment, he himself appeared as purchaser and profited by the depreciation of the property value. Such was a man named Marlier who, from February to December, 1791, counted no less than 197 transactions in his name. These purchases amounted to more than 2,000,000 francs.[76]

We need not say that the state finances were not benefited by these operations. Maury exclaimed: "A person does not inherit from those he murders." Yet the majority of the Constituent Assembly had instituted a "bank of extraordinary deposits" to receive the proceeds of these alienations. This bank was authorized to issue, pending the receipt of the funds, "assignats" guaranteed by the proceeds from the sale of the national properties. We know the discredit that befell these promissory notes, a debacle recalling that of Law.[77] As for the clergy, reduced to the receipt of an indemnity which Burke called "miserable," they presently felt their prestige lessened by the condition of a salaried official to which the government reduced them. Bishop Le Mintier of Tréguier declared: "The Church has fallen into servitude; its ministers are threatened with being reduced to the condition of appointed commissioners." Maury's eloquent predictions and Boisgelin's sad presentiments were fully realized.[78]

[76] Abbé Sicard, "La spoliation du clergé sous la Révolution," Correspondant (October 10, 1911). At the abbey of Dammartin, of the Premonstratensian Order, in the diocese of Aurens, a scandalous scene occurred. From the neighboring villages the peasants precipitated themselves on the place to pillage and destroy everything. At Saint-Omer the reredos of the high altar of St. Bertin's church, painted by Memling, was bought by a baker for a few cents.

[77] Cf. Pisani, op. cit., I, 136.

The Religious Orders

The Assembly had undertaken to reduce the secular clergy to the condition of salaried employees of the state. It tried to make the regular clergy simply pensioners of the state.

In attempting to regulate the religious orders, the Constituent Assembly could appeal to some precedents in the ancient regime. Apart from the measures taken against the Society of Jesus,[79] the King's Council (May 26, 1765) had appointed a commission of five prelates and five state councilors and entrusted to them the strange mission of reforming all the religious communities of men in the Kingdom. This commission prepared an ordinance (March 24, 1768) which decided: 1. that the age for vows would be set at twenty years for men, eighteen for women; 2. that all the religious must be French; 3. that not more than two houses of the same order can be in one city; 4. that each monastery must have at least fifteen religious. This commission, called the Commission of Regulars, functioned from 1768 to 1790; and the decree of March 24 was not a dead letter. In 1790 it had suppressed nine congregations,[80]

[78] The question of the sale of the national properties has been the object of an open concursus by the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. Three of the crowned mémoires appeared in 1908. They are: Marcel Marcon, La vente des biens nationaux pendant la Révolution; G. Lecarpentier, La vente des biens ecclésiastiques pendant la Révolution; A. Vialay, La vente des biens nationaux pendant la Révolution. On the same subject, see an article by M. de Lanzac de Laborie in the Correspondant (December 25, 1908); that by E. Sicard in Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine (July, 1906).

[79] Cf. Mourret, op. cit., VI, Index.

[80] C. Gérin, "Les monastères franciscains et la commission des réguliers," Revue des questions historiques, XVIII (1875), 88. Cf. Prat, Essai historique sur la destruction des ordres religieux en France au XVIII^e siècle.

and the four orders that followed the rule of St. Francis of Assisi had lost 3,756 professed members.[81]

In some monasteries where regular observance had become lax, the religious were quite agreeable to the secularization measures. On September 26, 1789, a representative read to the Assembly an amazing letter, signed by thirteen Cluny monks living in the monastery of Saint-Martin-des-Champs at Paris. After offering to transfer the property of their monastery to the possession of the state in return for the assurance of an annual pension of 1,500 francs, they expressed "their desire for liberty, which they wished to enjoy like other Frenchmen." The official account of this session of the Assembly states that the Assembly "has gratefully received these proofs of patriotism." [82] A month later (October 25) a committee reported to the Assembly about letters written by two monks and by one nun, protesting against perpetual vows. Then a law was passed declaring that "all taking of vows should be suspended in all monasteries and convents." As the clergy noted at the time, this suspension was tantamount to utter suppression of vows.[83]

One of the chief concerns of the ecclesiastical committee, which (1790) took up the work of the commission on regulars,[84] was to open an inquiry about the situation of the religious orders in France. The calculations of several historians tend to establish the fact that France then counted 60,000 religious of both sexes,[85] with 4,000 religious houses.[86] We find difficulty in expressing with a single phrase the spirit that prevailed in these houses. In one place would be found the most [81] Gérin, op. cit., p. 135.

[82] Picot, Mémoires, V, 381.

[83] Ibid., p. 391.

[84] This had been suppressed by Louis XVI.

[85] De La Gorce, op. cit., I, 168; Taine, Les origines, I, 321. The men religious were about 25,000; the nuns were about 37,000. We may estimate the secular clergy at about 70,000. France then counted a population of 24,000,000.

[86] Of these houses, 2,489 were for men, 1,500 for women. Taine, ibid.

rigorous fervor, as in the Benedictine abbey of Marolles in the diocese of Cambrai. There, upon receiving word that the magistrates would come to question them, the monks solemnly met together, read their formula of profession, and again vowed to live and die in the life they had freely embraced.[87]

In a few monasteries the laxity was scandalous. Such was the Preuilly abbey, where the prior, upon learning of the decree suppressing religious vows, wrote, in the name of his ten monks: "As my fellow monks and I are all zealous partisans of the present Revolution, we await merely the first signal to depart from this house." [88] In many places the good religious were equally without the heroic ardor that is ready to face martyrdom and without the laxity that is ready to desert the cloister. An old monk of Tarascon wished "to end his career in peace." Some, in the style of the time, expressed their "deep concern over being separated from their beloved confreres." As a whole the monks of the ancient regime at first gave an example neither of heroism nor of laxity. But, as though suddenly awakened from their lukewarm tranquillity, many of these religious, who had entered the cloister with a doubtful or unreflecting vocation, showed regrettable hesitation. Soon, in the presence of open persecution, they would feel an awakening of their former languid faith and would then resist even to exile, even to martyrdom. The nuns especially would rise to a degree of heroism worthy of the finest ages of faith.[89]

However, the left wing of the Assembly became impatient with the slowness of the ecclesiastical committee. The fiery opposition of Lanjuinais, Durand de Maillane, and Treilhard against the religious was vigorously countered by the bishops of Clermont and Luçon in the committee. On February 4, 1790, on the pretext that the fifteen members of the committee were overburdened with work, Treilhard proposed that the number should be doubled. The fifteen new members, appointed three days later, were almost entirely from the left. The Jacobite spirit was then in the majority.[90] After this manner the right refused to collaborate any longer in the work of the committee. The bishops of Clermont and Luçon withdrew from it. Treilhard, whose determined aim had long been to have the religious orders suppressed, then had free rein. On December 17, during the discussion of the decree applying the 400,000,000 francs' worth of property of the clergy to pay the debts of the state, he proposed that religious vows be no longer recognized, that the monasteries be suppressed, and that pensions be granted to the religious who should wish to leave their monasteries. About a month later he succeeded in having his proposal advanced to its second reading.

[87] Documents of the ecclesiastical committee. Quoted by De La Gorce, op. cit., I, 171.

[88] Ibid.

[89] This judgment regarding the monastic spirit at the close of the eighteenth century is founded on investigations made by De La Gorce in the National Archives, in the documents of the ecclesiastical committee. See De La Gorce, op. cit., I, 160–79.

The debate was most spirited. Amid murmurs, laughter, and even hooting, Bishop de Bonal of Clermont and Bishop de La Fare of Nancy offered the Assembly the most judicious and lofty reflections. The Bishop of Clermont declared: "The religious who would take advantage of your decree before being authorized to do so by the spiritual authority would be failing in their most sacred obligations. Your decree would be a temptation that is unworthy of you to offer them. . . . A sad philosophy indeed, that would regard as contrary to the rights of man for him to be able to offer his liberty in homage to Him to whom we owe everything. . . . Ought we to cut down a tree that has borne such excellent fruits, on account of a few parasitic branches?" The Bishop of Nancy pointed out that a project which would ultimately increase the financial burden of the state and would disturb the divine worship was condemned both by sound politics and by religion.

[90] Mathiez, Rome et le clergé, p. 98.

But the most violent passions were let loose. In the name of the left, Barnave arose and declared that he considered the committee's project too moderate. He proposed to suppress, without reservation or delay, all the monastic orders.[91] In a thundering voice Garat shouted: "I swear that I have never conceived how God can wish to repress in man the first of the goods He has bestowed on him, namely, liberty." [92] These words stirred up a tumult. The right, through the Bishop of Nancy, Count de Cazales, and several others, demanded that "the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion be declared the national religion." "Such a proposal," declared Charles de Lameth, "is a conspiracy against the tranquillity of the people." [93] M. de Menon added that the motion by the Bishop of Nancy tended to nothing less than a revival of the wars of religion.[94] Two hours and a half passed in this turmoil. Twice the president's bell was broken.[95]

The decree was passed. It began thus: "Article 1. The National Assembly decrees, as a constitutional article, that the law no longer recognizes solemn monastic vows for either sex. Hence it declares that the orders in which such vows are made are and shall remain suppressed in France, without any such being allowed to be established in the future. Article 2. All individuals of either sex residing in the religious houses will be free to leave them upon making their declaration before the municipal authority of the place." To each mendicant religious that should depart from the cloister was granted 700 francs, 800 francs, or 1,000 francs according to his age. Abbé de Montesquieu had an amendment adopted, which included the Jesuits among the religious of mendicant orders for the purpose

[91] Moniteur (February 14, 1790), p. 181.
[92] Ibid., p. 182.
[93] Ibid.
[94] Ibid., p. 186.
[95] Mercure de France (February 20, 1790). Cf. Aulard, La Révolution française et les Congregations, p. 16.

of this decree. He said: "You will not refuse your justice to this famous congregation, whose faults have been a problem and whose misfortunes are not a problem." [96] Moreover, religious who should leave their religious house were declared incapable of benefiting by any testamentary provisions; they could receive only pensions or life annuities.[97] This perfidious provision resulted in making the former religious closely dependent on the state. Shortly afterward a new decree showed still more plainly the intentions of the authors of the law. Such former religious as should refuse to take the constitutional oath or who should retract it after taking it, would be deprived of their pension. Thus the lawmaker, after offering a premium for the violation of the oaths which the religious had taken to God and to the Church, penalized, by the privation of their last means of subsistence, the violation of the oaths which they had been obliged to take to the Revolution.

Under these liberal appearances, the law by which the state no longer recognized monastic vows did in fact provoke the ruin of the religious life in France. Of course, the voluntary departure of monks without vocation, for whom the monastic discipline was an ill-tolerated yoke, and the exodus of those who were disturbed by the revolutionary utopias would not have been an evil for the Church of France. But other causes determined the dispersion of the religious. The decree of February 13 had dried up the recruiting of the monasteries. Subsequent decrees (March 20 and 26, 1790, and January 2 and 4, 1791) enacted that the collective properties of the congregations must be absorbed in the national patrimony since these congregations had ceased legally to exist. It was also decided (February 8 and 12, 1791) that all the subjects belonging to any one order should be gathered together in a single house. This last provision of itself led to several departures, since the houses thus combined by legislative authority had often not the same rules and the same customs. But especially the uncertainty of the future and the evidently provisional character of the asylum offered to the persevering monks prompted several religious to withdraw to their families or to the homes of trustworthy friends, not with a view of abjuring their promises, but, on the contrary, to lead there a life more in conformity with their vows. A certain number resolved to join that courageous party of the clergy which, after refusing to take the oath, exercised their ministry in secret amid continual perils. This existence, which became more and more dangerous, necessitated a wandering life at the mercy of spies and informers.[98] The statistics of the dispersed religious, if interpreted in a sense of a total defection, would be misleading.[99] Thus we might wrongly take as apostates those who were in reality most courageous apostles.

[96] Mercure de France (February 27, 1790).

[97] Picot, op. cit., V, 412. Before the vote was taken, Garat obtained the floor and said: "I declare myself as good a Catholic Apostolic Christian as anyone. . . . And I joyously approve the desire to suppress the religious orders." Moniteur (February 15), p. 186.

Church and State

But the ecclesiastical committee, under the inspiration of Treilhard, had not yet spoken its last word. A certain historian, who had made himself the defender of the religious policy of the Constituent Assembly, says so directly:

Nobody can doubt that one of the chief aims of this legislation was to give the Church of France a life independent of Rome. To dispute the pronounced Gallicanism of the Constituent Assembly would be a childish undertaking. Certainly the members, with much sincerity and persistence, intended to bring the Church and state together as closely [98] Pisani, op. cit., I, 146–48.

[99] A table which appears to date from 1790 indicates, for the city of Paris, 451 secularizations out of 943 religious. Pisani, op. cit., I, 146. Encouragements for defection were not lacking. On February 20, 1790, Prudhomme wrote in his journal: "The first person who marries one of these former nuns would, in our opinion, deserve a civic crown." Révolutions de Paris, no. 30.

as possible, and even to merge one with the other. . . . On the one hand, to free the Church of France from subjection to Rome; on the other hand, to nationalize that Church and make it the moral tutor and safeguard of the new political regime: such was their profound intent.[100]

The decree of November, 1789, on ecclesiastical property, and the decree of February 13, 1790, on religious vows, were the first acts of this policy. The Civil Constitution of the Clergy was its complete realization.

On the regulations of the relations of Church and state, understood in the Gallican sense, the men of the ecclesiastical committee found more than mere indications in the ancient regime. They found there a whole code of regulations, which was the collection of the famous articles of Pierre Pithou.[101] Durand de Maillane had written a learned commentary on them in five big volumes. More recently, in 1786, the Synod of Pistoia had formulated, with regard to the civil power in Church affairs, certain reckless maxims continually applauded in the Jansenist paper, Les nouvelles ecclésiastiques. Several of the eighteenth-century philosophers had surpassed the Gallican and Jansenist doctrines about ecclesiastical law. Voltaire, their spokesman, wrote to the Russian Schowalof: "Only your illustrious sovereign is right: she pays the priests; she opens their mouth and closes it; they are under her orders; and everything is tranquil." [102]

Ever since Treilhard's clever maneuver assured a powerful majority of the left in the ecclesiastical committee, the jurists

[100] Mathiez, Rome et le clergé français sous la Constituante, p. 78.

[101] Cf. Mourret, op. cit., VI, 325.

[102] Letter of December 3, 1768. The context is significant. "The time has come for the monster of superstition to be chained. The Catholic princes are beginning to repress its undertakings to some extent. But instead of cutting off the hydra's heads, they merely bite its tail. They still recognize two powers, or at least feign to do so, and they are not daring enough to declare that the Church must depend solely on the laws of the sovereign. . . . Only your august ruler is right." Voltaire, Œuvres (Beuchot ed., 1883), LXV, 250.

and canonists composing it had patiently worked out a whole series of laws on the organization of the clergy and the administration of their property. In this labor the canonist Durand de Maillane had been actively seconded by two men who would soon play an important part in the wording and application of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy: one was a Parisian lawyer, Martineau; the other would be the principal author of the Civil Constitution. Expilly would be the first of the constitutional prelates to receive episcopal consecration.

Divided into three sections, the members of the committee, because of a work assiduously and methodically carried out, were able, between the middle of February and the beginning of April, to sketch the general lines of their project. About the end of May three reports were presented to the Assembly: the first, on the constitution to be given the clergy, by Martineau; the second, on the salaries to be granted the ministers of worship, by Abbé Expilly; the third, on foundations and patronage,[103] by Durand de Maillane. The first of these was unquestionably the most important.

The report started with a magnificent eulogy of "the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion, handed down to our fathers by the first successors of the apostles, itself incorruptible, which still teaches what it always taught from its birth and will always teach."[104] After this hymn to Catholicism, Martineau called upon the reforming hand of the lawmaker to regulate the external discipline of the Church. He said: "The plan of regeneration that we have the honor to propose to you will consist solely in a return to the discipline of the primitive Church." [105]

[103] In the matter of benefices, patronage consisted in the right to nominate or present a candidate to a vacant benefice. A distinction was made between ecclesiastical, lay, and mixed patronage. See Thomassin, Ancienne et nouvelle discipline, Part II, Bk. I, chaps. 29–34.

[104] Nouvelles ecclésiastiques (1790), p. 117. We do not understand how Mathiez, who paid his respects to Martineau's sincerity (Rome et le clergé, p. 155), can hold that Martineau was a philosopher (in the sense of the eighteenth century), and by no means a Jansenist (ibid., p. 92).

As a consequence of these principles, in which parliamentary Gallicanism and Jansenism were so well combined, namely, that the civil lawmaker has the right to regulate the external discipline of the Church and that he has the duty to do so by a return to the primitive Church, Martineau, entering into the details of the reform to be made, reduced them to three chief heads: 1. ecclesiastical titles, offices, and functions which should be preserved or suppressed; 2. the way to provide for the offices and functions that may be judged proper to keep or to reestablish; 3. the salary that should be paid to the ministers of religion.

On the first of these topics, the report lays down the following rules: 1. that the civil power has the right to suppress, by its own authority, whatever ecclesiastical office it judges useless; [106] 2. that the only useful functions are external functions whose object is the instruction of the people and the administration of spiritual aid. "Every other function," said Martineau, "is a parasitic function, an abuse in the order of nature and of religion. We must promptly extirpate it." [107]

Hence he proposed not only the suppression of the simple benefices,[108] which he called benefices without duties and offices without functions, but also the suppression of all the canonical prebends and even of chapters, whose members have "no function but to recite prayers either in public or in private."

[105] Ibid.

[106] Martineau, Rapport fait à l'Assemblée nationale au nom du Comité ecclésiastique sur la Constitution du clergé, p. 17.

[107] Ibid., p. 8.

[108] Ibid. A simple benefice was one in which the holder of the benefice did not have the care of souls or the obligation of going to choir. Such were the priors and abbots in commendam, and chaplains whose only obligation was the celebration of a few Masses, which they could have said by others. A double benefice was one that had some administration attached to it.

Thus, he said, we would return "to the uniform discipline of the Church in the days of its glory." The aged or infirm curés "will be given, at the expense of the nation, a substitute that, while solacing their burden, will not break their earlier habits but will permit them to remain in the midst of their flock. . . . What more delightful retirement than that of this good curé, this aged man, who has been made still more venerable by his long services! His age and infirmities do not let him fly to his parishioners, but they will be able to come to him."

By such utopias and idyllic fancies Martineau settled the first question. Then he introduced the second: how to provide for the functions preserved or restored. An abstract principle and a pretended return to the primitive Church would supply the answer. Said Martineau in his report: "Whoever must be obeyed by all must be chosen by all." Thus, he declared, the Church of the first centuries understood it. "No one was then raised to the episcopacy, no one was even advanced to the order of priesthood, except by the votes of the people. Our Pontificales even yet contain traces of that practice. A bishop never confers sacred orders until he has asked the approval of the people."

Concerning the support needed by the ministers of worship, Martineau declared his confidence in the nation, saying that it would fulfill candidly and loyally the duties incumbent on it toward those who, "engaged in maintaining peace in the families, no longer have time to be occupied with the question of means to provide for their subsistence. The nation would assure what is necessary for a frugal and temperate man." [109]

The Civil Constitution of the Clergy

Nothing was better calculated to win the hearts of that time than such abstractions and such appeals to a vague tenderness. On May 29, the day fixed for the general discussion of the project, the case for the ecclesiastical committee seemed to everyone something won.

[109] For all the details here enumerated, see Martineau, op. cit., pp. 8–18.

Treilhard was insolent. In a speech, interrupted again and again by applause, he declared: "When a sovereign believes that a reform is necessary, nothing can stand in his way. A state can admit a religion or not admit it." Another representative, who was not a member of the committee, but was familiar with canon law, would find a way to surpass even Treilhard's insolence. This man was Armand Camus, deputy of the Third Estate of Paris. His extensive erudition had won him the position of advocate of the clergy of France.[110] He had played an important part on the day of the Tennis Court Oath and, at the time of the debate on the Declaration of the Rights of Man, he had, like Mirabeau, called for a Declaration of the Duties of Man. At the time we are speaking of, he held the office of archivist of the Assembly. "We are a National Convention," he exclaimed. "Assuredly we have the power to change the religion." He did at once add: "But we will not do so; we could not abandon it without committing a crime." [111]

The right had scarcely any illusions about the outcome of the debate. We do not see them renew, against a majority whose minds were already made up, the earnest struggle they had attempted in the debate about monastic vows. The Archbishop of Aix, who was the spokesman of the right, simply delivered a calm and noble protest:

The Committee wishes to remind the clergy of the purity of the primitive Church. The bishops, successors of the apostles, and the [110] The office of advocate of the clergy did not become an organized institution until about the end of the sixteenth century. The advocates of the clergy not only pleaded their case when as a body they were a party in litigation, but also and especially upon request they gave counsel to all ecclesiastics and holders of benefices. Ordinarily these advocates met at the house of the senior among them. During the assemblies of the clergy, the place was the Grands-Augustins. On the advocates of the clergy, see L. Serbat, Les assemblées du clergé de France, p. 188.

[111] Moniteur (June 2, 1790), p. 622.

pastors charged with preaching the gospel, are not the ones who can reject this truth. But, since the Committee reminds us of our duty, it will permit us to remind it of our rights and of the sacred principles of the ecclesiastical power. . . . Christ gave His mission to the apostles and their successors for the salvation of the faithful. He entrusted this mission neither to the magistrates nor to the king. We are in this matter concerned with an order of things in which the magistrates and the kings have the duty of obedience.

At these words, as the Moniteur notes, murmurs were heard. The prelate continued: "I ought to point out that the question is one of purely spiritual jurisdiction. Abuses have crept in. This I do not pretend to deny. I grieve over these as others do. . . . Retrenchments can be made in the Church. But the Church must be consulted. To deprive her of her administration would be to lay sacrilegious hands upon her." A curé of Roanne, Father Goulard, made the closing remark of Archbishop de Boisgelin more precise by saying: "If the Assembly wishes to follow up the project, it should ask the King to send it to the Supreme Pontiff with a request for him to examine it. This method is the only means of avoiding a schism." Unfortunately Goulard afterward expressed adherence to the doctrines of Camus.

Whereas the leading defenders of the project based their case mostly on the principles of Gallicanism and Jansenism, a lawyer of Arras, whose name would later become sadly famous, in his plea for passage of the law invoked the theories of the Contrat social. This man was Robespierre. Starting from the principle that the priests are merely government officers, with no reason for existence except their social usefulness, he deduced logically, not merely that they depended completely on the civil authority, but also "that they should be joined to that society by all the bonds which [112] . . ." At these words he was interrupted by loud objections. The Assembly understood that he was about to ask for the marriage of priests. The Jansenist austerity was startled. The authors of the project desired to pose as defenders of the purest Catholicism. At the very time the committee was elaborating its project, a strange thing happened. On April 12, 1790, the deputy Dom Gerle—the former prior of the Carthusian monastery of Pont-Sainte-Marie, who sat on the extreme left wearing the habit of his order and who soon became involved in the foolish enterprises of a visionary, Catherine Théot—suddenly proposed to the Assembly that it declare Catholicism the religion of the state. Thereupon those very deputies who, on February 15, had contemptuously rejected an identical proposal made by the Bishop of Nancy, all rose up to acclaim the proposal, now being put forward by a monk-philosopher. If the president had not hesitated for a moment to put the question to a vote, if he had not given the Assembly time to recover its calm, the measure would have been passed unanimously.

[112] For these various speeches, see Moniteur (May 30 and June 1, 1790), pp. 610–18.

Final Appeal

The general debate came to a close on May 31. Before passing to the discussion of the articles, the authorized leaders of the clergy, whose spirit of moderation did not falter for an instant, made a final appeal to the wisdom of the Assembly. Bishop de Bonal of Clermont repeated a proposal already made by Archbishop de Boisgelin during the general debate. He asked, as a preliminary condition for any deliberation on the subject, that a national council be convoked. The holy Archbishop du Lau of Arles gave his support to this proposal. Father Guégan, a priest of Brittany and rector of Pontivy, offered a measure drawn up in the same spirit. He asked that "the King should be petitioned to take all steps judged necessary and conformable to the holy canons and the liberties of the Gallican Church to assure the full and entire execution of the present decree." [113] Both formulas offered a terrain acceptable to the Catholics, even those most prejudiced with Jansenist or Gallican ideas. According to a statement of Durand de Maillane, the committee decided to advise the adoption of this proposal.[114] But Camus' intervention turned the Assembly from this path. Using the subtle argumentation of a lawyer experienced in juridical discussion and making use of the undeniable canonical erudition which the exercise of his office had given him, the former advocate of the clergy tried to show that the spiritual authority had no place in the present discussion. Citing the Gospel, the Council of Trent, and the Pontificale, he maintained that ordination itself confers on priests and bishops the power to exercise their office anywhere in the world. Of course, he added, for the sake of good order the jurisdiction of both bishops and priests should be limited to a determined territory; but who is competent to make this delimitation? The Church, which has no territory will not do it but the state, which alone has competence and authority in this matter. Hence the whole jurisdictional organization of the Church practically comes within the competence of the state.[115]

The members of the clergy may have thought that, in the eyes of a prejudiced assembly, considerable difficulty would be experienced in refuting the sophisms of the clever canonist.[116] Perhaps they judged any opposition futile. At any rate, once again the skill of these lay jurists, whom the Church had al-

[113] Moniteur (June 2, 1790), p. 622.

[114] Durand de Maillane, Histoire apologétique du Comité ecclésiastique, p. 79.

[115] Moniteur, loc. cit.

[116] An experienced canonist would have found in Suarez, Thomassin, and Bossuet the means of peremptorily refuting this fundamental sophism of Camus. In the beginning the Church did indeed ordain priests and bishops without other limits of jurisdiction than those of the peoples they converted. But, subsequently, she was obliged to limit that jurisdiction. And then she herself assumed the right to regulate this jurisdiction. See Suarez, De legibus, Bk. IV, chap. 42, no. 11, and Bk. VIII, no. 8; Thomassin, Anc. et nouv. discip., Part II, Bk. I, chap. 42, no. 8; Bossuet, Variations, Bk. VII, nos. 42 ff.; Brugère, De ecclesia Christi, pp. 81, 219–22.

lowed to inject themselves into the handling of her affairs, turned against the Church. The Assembly rejected, even in the moderate form in which they were proposed, the projects of De Bonal and De Guégan, which would have safeguarded the essential rights of spiritual authority. Then, as he had foreseen, the Bishop of Clermont, followed by a certain number of those who usually voted with him, declared that he would no longer take part in the deliberations of an assembly that he considered radically incompetent.[117] From that moment the discussion was speedy and almost without interest.

The Civil Constitution of the Clergy

The Civil Constitution was passed on July 12, 1790. Its aim was clear: to constitute a national Church in France. The chief provisions of the Civil Constitution had for their purpose to regulate the relations of this national Church with the pope, the civil authority, and the people.

As regards the relations of the Church with the pope, article 4 of Title I "forbade every church and parish of France, as well as every French citizen, to acknowledge in any case and under any pretext the authority of an ordinary bishop or metropolitan whose see should be established by designation of a foreign power." The allusion to the Supreme Pontiff was evident. Lanjuinais, whenever he was addressing the Assembly from the tribune, affected always to speak of "the bishop of Rome." Camus had said: "What is the pope? He is a bishop like the others. . . . The time has come for the Church of France to be freed from this servitude." Moreover, article 19 of Title II was explicit, declaring that the bishop-elect "must not address himself to the pope to obtain any confirmation, but should write to him as to the visible head of the universal Church, in testimony of the unity of faith and of the communion that he should maintain with him."

[117] Archbishop de Boisgelin of Aix did not imitate the Bishop of Clermont. Though not taking an active part in the deliberations, he followed them closely, still counting on the eventuality of some arrangement.

The relations with the civil government, on the contrary, were most exactly determined. Article 1 of Title I established that "each diocese would have the same limits as the department." Article 17 of Title II indicated, in case of disagreement between a bishop and his metropolitan about canonical institution, as final recourse "the appeal against an abuse of power." A decree of November 15, 1790, specified that this appeal would be taken before the civil court of the district, which would pass judgment on it as the court of last resort. Articles 2 and 3 of Title III decided that the bishops and the curés are not allowed to be absent from their place of residence longer than fifteen days without permission of the directory of their department or of their district.

Lastly, the Constitution determined the relations of the bishops and the curés with the people, by regulating (articles 1, 2, and 3 of Title II) that both bishops and curés would be chosen by election, in the same forms as the deputies and other officials, according to the decree of December 22, 1789. Abbé Gregoire in vain asked that non-Catholics should not be included in the number of the electors. But the Assembly decided that it had no need to debate the amendment of Abbé Gregoire.[118]

Two of the articles of this famous Constitution became, for a large number of priests, an occasion of deep anxiety of conscience: these were articles 21 and 38, referring to the oath. But for a better appreciation of these anxieties, we must examine, in chronological order, the succession of decrees issued on this subject by the Constituent Assembly.

On February 4, 1790, the Assembly, taking advantage of a visit by the King, who had just promised to favor the new order of things with all his power, had at once voted, in a movement of enthusiasm, a form of oath which each of the representatives, as his name was called, took solemnly in the tribune: "I swear to be faithful to the nation, to the law, and to the king, and with all my power to maintain the Constitution decreed by the National Assembly and accepted by the King." [119] A few deputies who were absent or who withdrew at the moment of the taking of the oath, declared a few days later that they reserved the right to examine and to endeavor to modify a Constitution that was not yet completed and that contained several provisions which seemed to them to be regrettable. Notwithstanding the murmurs of a certain number, the Assembly accepted these reservations as something implied in the principle of "freedom of writing" and in the right inherent in the nation to revise the Constitution that it gave itself.[120]

[118] Moniteur, June 10, 1790, p. 658.

Article 21 and article 38 of Title II of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy obliged bishops-elect and curés-elect, before entering upon their office, to take the oath prescribed by the decree of February 4. On July 9, during the preparations for the great feast of the Federation that was to take place five days later at the Field of Mars, the deputy Target returned to the question and proposed that before the altars on July 14 the King, the Assembly, and the whole nation should renew the oath of loyalty to the Constitution, according to the formula passed on February 4. Bishop de Bonal of Clermont then spoke:

Permit me to make a remark. In some matters honor and religion do not leave the slightest doubt. We are about to renew the oath of loyalty to the nation, to the law, and to the king. What Frenchman, what Christian, would hesitate to participate in a movement of patriotic enthusiasm? . . . But, while recalling what I owe to Caesar, I cannot forget what I owe to God. In this matter any dissimulation would be a crime. I except from my oath whatever concerns spiritual things. This exception, which my conscience exacts of me, ought to prove to you the loyalty with which I shall carry out all the other parts of my oath.

[119] Moniteur, February 6, 1790, p. 150.

[120] Ibid., February 8, 1790, p. 157; Picot, Mémoires, V, 405.

The Assembly, after hearing this declaration, adopted without change the project that had been presented to it.[121]

Three months later (November 27) the deputy Voidel had them extend the obligation of the oath to all the clergy of the realm, under pain of being deprived of their office, of losing their rights of citizens, and, in case of meddling in their functions, of being prosecuted as disturbers of the public peace.[122] Some disagreements then appeared among the clergy. The consciences of several revolted. In spite of its general terms, the oath seemed to have the Civil Constitution in mind. Only one authority could solve the distressing question, the authority of the Supreme Pontiff; but the Pope had not yet issued any firm and public judgment on the religious situation of France. On March 29, 1790, in an allocution delivered in secret consistory, he had, so it was reported, deplored the French laws that had ended in the spoliation of Church property, in the suppression of monasteries, and in the ruin of public worship. Then, recalling Isaias' self-reproach, "Woe is me, because I have held my peace" (Isa. 6:5), he added: "To whom should I address my words? To the bishops, who are deprived of all authority? To the clergy, who are dispersed and humbled? To the Most Christian King, from whom authority has been taken?"[123] But this allocution was never officially published. Many persons were unaware of it or questioned its authenticity.

[121] Moniteur, July 11, 1790, p. 788.

[122] Ibid., November 28, 1790, p. 1378.

[123] Hulot, Collection des Brefs de Pie VI, p. 1. This allocution was not published in the Roman Bullarium. The chief extracts from it will be found in Picot, op. cit., V, 421 f.

Pope Pius VI in this address gave some of the reasons that had thus far imposed silence on him. To better grasp and judge his attitude, we must cast a rapid glance over Europe.

Foreign Views of the Revolution

When the members of the Constituent Assembly had set forth the principles of the Revolution, they had not pretended to legislate merely for Frenchmen, but for all men. The most eloquent witness of the period, André Chénier, wrote as follows: "The Revolution which has taken place among us is, so to speak, big with the destinies of the world." [124]

In this sense, indeed, the peoples and rulers had accepted the taking of the Bastille and the Declaration of the Rights of Man. The former of these events was everywhere considered the symbol of the fall of the ancient regime.[125]

Johannes von Müller, the historian of Switzerland, regarded this victory of the people as "the most beautiful day that has been seen since the fall of the Roman Empire." Some German thinkers, upon reading the Declaration of the Rights of Man, thought they perceived the realization of the abstract ideal which they were pursuing in the footsteps of Puffendorf and Wolf. . . . Kant admired it as the triumph of Reason.[126]

In the palaces of St. Petersburg and Moscow they amused themselves in talking about the abuses of the feudal regime and the virtues of liberty. "True, indeed, the tone changed as soon as the thoroughly democratic character of the Revolution became manifest to these gentlemen." [127] In northern Italy some poets (Pietro Verri and Pindemonte) sang of the coming of a new era.[128] At Vienna, where the reforms of Joseph II had [124] André Chénier, Œuvres en prose, 1872; Avis aux Français, August 28, 1890.

[125] A. Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, II, 10.

[126] Ibid., p. 11.

[127] Ibid., p. 16. Cf. Pingaud, Les Français en Russie, p. 165.

[128] Franchetti, Storia d'Italia, chap. 2: Primi effetti della Rivoluzione francese, p. 48.

undermined the ancient regime, the first events of the French Revolution aroused excitement in all minds. The streets, as also the churches, were filled with handbills on which was written: "Here as at Paris." [129]

Let us note that, although the principles proclaimed in the Constituent Assembly stirred the enthusiasm of the populace, the weaknesses and the errors of the politicians who were directing France aroused the contempt of the governments. The minister of the United States in France, Gouverneur Morris, in the early days of the Assembly announced the utter failure of the French Revolution.[130] Baron de Staël, minister of the king of Sweden, Mercy, ambassador of Austria, and Florida Blanca, minister of Spain, all clearly declared they foresaw the ruin of France. As Hertzberg wrote to the King of Prussia, "the prestige of royalty is annihilated in France." Catherine of Russia did not refrain from denouncing the National Assembly, calling it a hydra with twelve hundred heads. Emperor Joseph II, brother of Marie Antoinette, declared that he could no longer draw from the Kingdom of France either men or money. In short, the European governments saw nothing but the total eclipse of the French power in the world; and, according as they were hostile or friendly to France, they condemned the Revolution or rejoiced over it.[131]

What was the Pope's impression? Pius VI, at first glance, undoubtedly did not see the real import of the events that were taking place in France. In this respect he was like most men of his time. But the common father of the faithful shared neither the enthusiastic optimism of the people with regard to the first manifestations of the Revolution nor the contemptuous pessimism of the statesmen regarding the government of France. As he had done in the affairs of Russia, Austria, and [129] Sorel, op. cit., II, 20.

[130] G. Morris, Memorial and Correspondence. See especially the notes written on July 1, 1789, and January 24, 1790.

[131] A. Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution, II, 22.

Tuscany, he temporized; more than in Joseph II, in Leopold, or in Catherine II, he had confidence in Louis XVI. If the future deceived him, the blame can be laid to lack of perspicacity, a too naive kindness of heart, or the fatal nature of the circumstances. But we have no right to see in his attitude the calculations of a selfish and low policy.[132]

Pius VI's Inaction

Can we endorse the view of one historian, who says that the mind of Pius VI was not suited to comprehend the Revolution?[133] But what should we understand by "The Revolution"? Does it mean the totality of that historic event, "perhaps the most complex that ever occurred"?[134] Who at that time understood it in this sense? Does the expression mean the philosophical spirit which inspired the Declaration of the Rights of Man? Pius VI had pointed to it and described it in the first of his encyclicals, with wonderful exactness; or does it mean the Jansenist and Gallican spirit, which dictated the Civil Constitution of the Clergy? The Pope in his disputes with Emperor Joseph II and Leopold of Tuscany had sufficient experience to make him acquainted with the proceedings of that spirit.

In 1789 Pius VI, abandoned or threatened by all the Catholic powers, had no longer any hope except in France and its King.

[132] According to Mathiez, Pius VI's condemnation of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy was a question of temporal interest. The Avignon affair decided the whole thing. He says: "The Pope saw himself threatened at the same time as pontiff by the Constituent Assembly and as chief of State by his temporal subjects. If the pontiff yielded at first, the chief of State did not hesitate . . . heeding only his pride of sovereign and his liberty. . . . The reasons of his policy are explained easily enough. He waits . . . because he does not wish to sacrifice his temporal interests to his spiritual interests. . . . His calculation proved false, his delay was to no purpose. He compromised only his own interests, and he threw France into schism and civil war." A. Mathiez, Rome et le clergé sous la Constituante, pp. 62, 300.

[133] L. Madelin, "Pie VI et la première coalition," Revue historique, LXXXI, vi.

[134] This is the expression of Albert Vandal, quoted and made his own by Madelin, La Révolution, p. vi.

If France alarmed him by its philosophers, it reassured him by its traditions of native generosity, and especially by its sovereign, so pious and of such pure morals. One day the Pope, speaking to Cardinal Bernis, said: "My entire hope rests on His Majesty's love for religion, on his attachment to the Holy See, and on his wise policy." Would Louis XVI, whose conciliatory character and kindness were not unlike those of Pius VI, consent to enter upon the way opened by his brothers-in-law, the Emperor of Germany and the Grand Duke of Tuscany? This hypothesis seemed unlikely. Therefore the policy of the Holy See would remain most benevolent toward the King of France. The National Assembly was indeed much agitated, and its power over the sovereign was great; but, so far as Rome was concerned, any sharpness of language would be avoided, any words that might provoke a formally schismatic declaration. They would await the inevitable appeasement. "How much I would lose," said the Pope to Bernis, "if I should lose the support of France!" [135]

On the side of Pius VI everything seemed combined to sustain his optimism. The French ambassador, Cardinal Bernis, so it seems, could, by his numerous relations with Paris, have kept the Pope informed about the events that were taking place. But the people at Paris who could have kept Bernis posted, did not do so, either because they feared the tampering with the mail or because they hesitated to disturb the quiet of the aged ambassador. Thus they failed to acquaint him with these affairs of the gravest significance.[136] Montmorin, the minister of foreign affairs, a grand seigneur and philosopher, a shifty politician, and a skeptical spirit, whose whole ambition was to maintain himself in power,[137] was careful not to have Bernis informed of the course of religious affairs in France. In fact, [135] P. de la Gorce, Hist. rel. de la Révol., I, 371.

[136] Masson, Bernis, p. 450.
[137] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 14.

Bernis was kept quite out of touch with events.[138] If by chance he asked a precise question, he was answered with words like these: "Our internal difficulties are not of a sort that are viewed from outside. In a very short time they will be calmed." [139] On other occasions, by way of reply, he was presented with a stupid comparison between the pope and the sultan.[140] Bernis, whose frivolous youth was spent amid philosophers and courtiers,[141] and who in his wise old age returned to the traditional beliefs and the old fidelities, was not at times without the sad presentiment of a great catastrophe. He wrote on December 5, 1785: "I am old and I should like to end my life without being a witness of the Revolution that threatens the clergy and religion itself." [142] But Montmorin took such pains to lull the old cardinal's vigilance and, at need, to distort the events that a sense of security prevailed in Bernis' mind. Moreover, everything was so calm in the Eternal City, where, as dean of the diplomatic corps, surrounded with honors and respect, he was fond of hearing himself called "the second personage of Rome." In that capital of the Christian world the feasts were still so beautiful! The magnificence of the public worship hid the decadence of the faith.[143]

Besides Bernis, whose diplomatic office did not permit him to tell everything to the Pope, the Holy See had at Paris a nuncio, Dugnani, and an auditor, Quarantotti. But "evidently they were lacking in sharpness, for they did not warn the Secretary of State that affairs were taking a turn quite different from that which they had expected. Their dispatches were most precisely drawn up when they concerned simple facts; but the [138] Masson, loc. cit.

[139] Ibid., p. 451.

[140] Ibid., p. 450.

[141] Bernis' worldly youth is well known. On his close relations with Voltaire and his important part in the suppression of the Jesuits, see Masson, Le Cardinal de Bernis, and Sainte-Beuve, Causeries du Lundi, Vol. VIII.

[142] Ibid., p. 452.

[143] P. de La Gorce, op. cit., p. 263.

Secretary of State was quite uninformed about the new ideas." [144]

Such being the condition of affairs, the report of the first outrages committed by the French Revolution against the Church reached Rome only as an echo, softened and, as it were, muffled. Furthermore, in reply to the apprehensions which Pius VI had expressed to Louis XVI, the King wrote a letter full of the most religious veneration, saying that he would be watchful, with the attention of a Christian and of an elder son of the Church, to prevent any injury being inflicted upon the religion of his fathers, the union with the Roman Church, and the respect due to the ministers of religion.[145] The Pope then charged Bernis with the duty of thanking the King "for his edifying and gracious letter and of expressing the Pope's heartfelt and most sincere gratitude." [146] The abrupt suppression of the annates, decreed in spite of the Concordat of 1516, keenly pained the Supreme Pontiff; but, Montmorin having assured him that the measure had been decided on only by urgent financial necessities and that it left intact the respect due to the solemn treaties and the rights of the Holy See, the Pope condescendingly informed the French court that "his heart was always disposed, in the presence of these cruel circumstances, to grant as a favor, in particular cases, the suppression of the payment of the annates." [147]

A short time afterwards the decree that placed "the possessions of the clergy at the disposal of the nation" revived the Pontiff's alarms. But the astute Montmorin hastened to make known to the Pope that the question was not definitively terminated, that some expedients would be able to conciliate every-[144] Pisani, op. cit., p. 167. Cf. Theiner, Documents inédits relatifs aux affaires de France, I, 264, and Gobbio, La Chiesa e lo stato in Francia durante la Rivoluzione, 1905, p. 73.

[145] Archiv. Vat., carte sciolte, quoted by Gendry, II, 112.

[146] Mathiez, Rome et le clergé, p. 42.

[147] On the conciliatory attitude of the Pope in the affair of the annates, see Masson, Bernis, pp. 460–65.

thing.[148] The fact that the ministry included Champion de Cicé, archbishop of Bordeaux, and especially Le Franc de Pompignan, former archbishop of Vienne,[149] reassured the Pope. Could the devout and courageous prelate, who had so vigorously unmasked the philosophers, give his approval to the maneuvers of the enemies of the Church? The Pontiff's anxiety was the more easily calmed since he now had at his side, as chief minister, in place of Cardinal Buoncompagni, the peaceful Cardinal Zelada, an old man of seventy-two, "a friend of repose, an enemy of rigorous measures, and altogether devoted to France." [150]

The suppression of monastic vows, news of which reached Rome at the beginning of March, 1790, was a most cruel blow for the heart of Pius VI. Montmorin, fearing an outburst, went to see the nuncio. He urged Bernis to obtain the Pope's silence. But certain influences were being exercised in the opposite direction. Several persons of the French court who had been driven from Versailles by the events had emigrated to Rome. There they even formed a sort of elegant and polite society, in which the most conspicuous personages were the Polignacs, the Vaudreuils, and the Choiseuls; the heart of this group was Cardinal Bernis' palace.[151]

From this circle came the most urgent suggestions to persuade the Pope to condemn the new government of France. Pius VI hesitated. He had begun working on an encyclical when the intervention of Bernis, ambassador of France, and of Azara, minister of Spain, prompted him once again to delay. He was afraid that a public manifestation on his part might precipitate events by way of a violent persecution. He felt that he would satisfy his duty of conscience by protesting against the new [148] P. de la Gorce, op. cit., I, 272.

[149] Pompignan had resigned his office of archbishop upon entering into the ministry, August 4, 1789. See Bouvier, Le Franc de Pompignan, p. 88.

[150] P. de la Gorce, op. cit., I, 278.

[151] Masson, op. cit., pp. 468–70.

law in a secret consistory. No word of the allocution was to be transmitted to the chanceries, which would thus be supposed to be entirely ignorant of it. The Pope's protest took place on March 29. In it the Pontiff condemned in energetic terms, not only the law suppressing monastic vows, but also the abolition of the tithes, the nationalization of Church property, and the admission of non-Catholics to all civil offices. The French government took every possible precaution to keep this document from receiving any publicity.

However, as Montmorin wrote, a moment came when every clever attempt failed.[152] "If the Church of France," wrote Bernis, "continues to be treated so harshly, I cannot answer for the patience of the head of the Catholic Church." [153]

The Pope and the Civil Constitution of the Clergy

The Civil Constitution of the Clergy was the event that obliged the Pope to make a solemn pronouncement on the religious affairs of France.

Articles 21 and 38 of Title II of this law obliged bishops and priests to take an oath of loyalty to the Constitution. Hence arose distress of conscience for a large number of the clergy, for they were not certain whether this oath had in view the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. If such was, in fact, the case, was the Constitution manifestly schismatical?

Today we answer "yes" without hesitation. But the fact was less clear to the faithful and the priests who asked themselves these questions in 1790. Had not the Assembly recognized that a person could take the oath to a Constitution while retaining the right to examine it and to oppose it by legal methods? [154] Had not the Assembly accepted the reservation

[152] Ibid., p. 478.
[153] P. de La Gorce, op. cit., I, 276.
[154] See supra, p. 123.

made in open session by the Bishop of Clermont, with regard to the spiritual power of the Church?[155] Was the Civil Constitution of the Clergy incurably bad? Abbé Barruel wrote in his Journal ecclésiastique: "I was the first to remark how various articles . . . could become legitimate by the approbation of the Holy See and of the bishops."[156] Moreover, the proposed Constitution contained a final article as follows: "The king will be begged to take all measures judged necessary to carry out the full and entire execution of the present decree." Was this statement not an indication that the King would receive a commission to negotiate with Pius VI? Furthermore, this last article had indeed not been submitted to the vote of the Assembly; but the reason for this suppression was well known. Treilhard explained it in the tribune: following some disturbances in Avignon, the relations between Rome and Versailles had become so strained that the two courts were no longer able to treat freely with each other. Meanwhile the word was circulated that Rome was disposed to enter upon a negotiation.[157] Thirty bishops, deputies in the National Assembly, published an Exposition des principes sur la Constitution du clergé, which was drawn up by Boisgelin. This statement, in beautiful and firm language, pointed out four points of the Civil Constitution sharply opposed to the canon law: 1. the suppression of fifty-one episcopal sees; 2. the election of bishops and curés by electoral colleges open to non-Catholics; 3. the granting to metropolitans the canonical institution of bishops; 4. the suppression of the relations of obedience with the pope. But this document itself, which was signed by all the bishops of France except four,[158] expressly recognized that the schism was not yet accomplished, and that negotiation with the pope could still [156] Journal ecclésiastique, December, 1790.

[155] Ibid.

[157] Pisani, op. cit., p. 163.

[158] Brienne of Sens, Talleyrand of Autun, Jarente of Orléans, and Savine of Viviers.

remedy everything. The bishops said: "We wish to avoid a schism. Why has the Assembly not declared the incompetence of the authority to which we appeal? . . . Because the Assembly has the feeling of the rights of the Church, although it does not mention the Church. Its silence is the avowal of the justice and of the necessity of our demands." [159]

Of course the Jansenists advanced arguments more decisive in their eyes. We read in the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques:

> You say that the Constitution is in opposition to the Council of Trent. But this Council has not been received in France; and the secular authority that rejected it, against the wish of the bishops, was indeed less legitimate than the authority which today opposes it in a number of provisions. Yet all the French monarchs who have died since the Council of Trent have died in the peace and communion of the Church. In vain does anyone allege that the new Constitution contains some abuses. It does not contain so many as the Constitution under which we were living.[160]

Yet the Pope, always ill informed about the character of Louis XVI, and sincerely believing that this prince would never sanction the Constitution so long as it had not been submitted to the Holy See, had abstained from intervening officially that he might leave the freedom of initiative to the French government. The Pope merely wrote to the King [161] and to the two archbishops who were members of the council of ministers (Champion de Cicé and Le Franc de Pompignan), counting on them to prevent the promulgation of the decree. The former archbishop of Vienne did not attend the meetings of the Council on August 24, 1790, when the King of France decided, with [159] Exposition des principes, p. 12. Cf. Picot, Mémoires, VI, 34.

[160] Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, February 1, 1791, p. 19. This number of the Nouvelles is devoted almost entirely to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. We scarcely need to note the difference between the attitude of the kings of France and that of the Constituent Assembly. These kings had delayed making the decrees of Trent laws of the state; the Assembly made laws of the state containing provisions contrary to the Council.

[161] Roskovany, Monumenta, I, 434.

death in his soul, to approve the Civil Constitution;[162] but the Archbishop of Bordeaux had the lamentable courage to overcome the King's hesitation. If the sincere repentance of Champion de Cicé has won his pardon before God, history has only one word to characterize his act: treason.

The deed was done. In spite of the Pope's brief Intimo ingemiscimus corde,[163] which implored the King to exercise in-[162] Abbé Barruel, in his Journal ecclésiastique of February, 1791, p. 280, then in his Histoire du clergé pendant la Révolution française, p. 58, sharply attacked the memory of Le Franc de Pompignan, whom he charged as follows: 1. with being associated (August 24) with Cicé's steps to induce the King to approve the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; 2. with having kept secret the letter which the Pope had written him on July 10 and which clearly disapproved the Civil Constitution. Feller, in his Biographie universelle, art. Pompignan; Guillon, in the Collection des Brefs du Saint-Siège, I, 38; Royou, in the journal, L'Ami du Roi, and some others repeat the same charges. But Emery, in his note inserted at the beginning of the works of Le Franc de Pompignan (ed. Migne, I, 15), refutes Barruel's accusations, saying that Barruel was ill informed. With regard to the supposed part taken by the Archbishop of Vienne at the Council meeting of August 24, the library of St. Sulpice (Emery documents) contains testimony which seems to us conclusive. Abbé Pichot, who belonged to the clergy of St. Sulpice in 1790 and who died as canon of Lyons in 1814, wrote to Father Emery (March 8, 1802): "No one can charge Pompignan with having cooperated in the Civil Constitution of the clergy, since he was not at the Council meeting. In fact, he fell ill on August 17, 1790, and left his apartment only to be carried to the grave. But the approval did not take place until August 24. I call Saint-Priest, Minister of the Interior, to bear witness to this fact. That same day he came to Pompignan to inform him of what had taken place. I myself witnessed the tears shed by both of them. The next day certain business brought me to the Marchioness de Gramont. As I concluded this matter of business with her, three bishops entered (of Bourges, of Dijon, and of Castres). The Marchioness asked them news of the Assembly. They replied that at the King's Council the members had taken advantage of the illness of the Archbishop of Vienne so as to have the Constitution approved and that they were persuaded it would not have taken place if the Archbishop had been present. They had the King's explicit promise to this effect." As to the Pope's letter not being made known, the Archbishop of Vienne should not be held responsible. The letter, by its very nature, was a document not intended for publication. Says Father Emery: "Three or four days after the death of the Archbishop of Vienne, when the brief was found among his papers and was communicated to the most zealous bishops of the Assembly, such as the Bishop of Clermont, these judged, in accordance with the tenor of the letter, that its publication would be imprudent." Migne, I, 16. We can, moreover, note this by the text of the letter, published by Theiner, Documents inédits relatifs aux affaires religieuses de France, I, 9. Cf. C. Bouvier, Le Franc de Pompignan, pp. 89–101.

[163] September 22, 1790. Roskovany, I, 437.

vincible opposition to the law, the weak Louis XVI went to the very limit in yielding. In December, 1790, he confirmed the decree which imposed on the bishops and curés the obligation of taking the oath to the Constitution, under pain of being deprived of office.[164]

This decree opens a new phase. By the laws referring to the goods of the clergy, and to monastic vows, and by the Civil Constitution of July 12, 1790, the Church had been stripped of her patrimony and the most essential of her rights. The decree of November 27 inaugurated a new era of persecution.

[164] This act of Louis XVI was his first juridical act of cooperation in the Civil Constitution. To speak of a sanction given to this law by Louis XVI is incorrect. According to the principles laid down on October 1, 1789, the Constitutional laws had no need of the royal sanction. Yet the approbation given by the King on August 24 was a pledge of his cooperation for the application of the law.

CHAPTER V

The Persecution (1790–99)

IN THE words of a certain historian devoted to the revolutionary ideas, "The Civil Constitution of the Clergy was the chief error of the Revolution." [1] The philosophers had fancied a "citizen-clergy," [2] as they said, professing the faith of the Savoy vicar; the Gallicans had dreamed of a Church subordinate to the state; the Jensenists, of a return to the purity of morals of the first centuries. Never were expectations more brutally contradicted by the facts. A few months after the promulgation of the celebrated Constitution, the majority of Catholic France, taking their stand about the Pope, cursed the Revolution. The clergy faithful to the Church were forced to refuse their obedience to the state, and the clergy loyal to the Constitution, who were often centers of intrigues, ambitions, and greed, were far from recalling the austere virtues of the primitive Church. The consequences of the Civil Constitution would extend farther: the exiles and massacres, and the civil and foreign wars, which desolated France during the last years of the eighteenth century, were, as the subsequent pages of this history will show, connected with that important act of the Constituent Assembly.[3]

[1] Debidour, Histoire des rapports de l'Eglise et de l'Etat, de 1789 à 1870, p. 68.

[2] Adresse de l'Assemblée au peuple français, drawn up by Talleyrand, February 11, 1790.

[3] Cf. Albert Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française (7th ed.), II, 115. "The scaffolds of the Terror are to be found in germ in the decrees of 1790." Leclercq, Les martyrs, VI, 18.

The Taking of the Oath by the Clergy

The days that followed the promulgation of the law seemed to justify its authors. About half of the parish clergy, which was a third of the secular clergy, considered as a whole, took the required oath.[4] Most of the jurors (those taking the oath) retracted later on; but at the outset only one expert canonist saw the schismatical depth of the Constitution, only one experienced statesman foresaw the remote consequences of it. Let us imagine the country pastor, confronted by an oath of obedience to the laws, which had been passed by the assembly of the people's representatives and which had been approved by the Most Christian King. Such a pastor is under the necessity of taking this oath under penalty of abandoning his church, his rectory, his flock, and even of being prosecuted as a disturber of the public peace. In many parishes the good curé did not hesitate; he took the oath without any qualms of conscience. His error was the more excusable since, by various reports, he was able to know that, even after the passage of the law, negotiations were being carried on between the court of Rome and that of France. He was, indeed, well aware that the dependence of the clergy on the civil power was not something new in the land of France.

Most assuredly the bishops and even the Pope were exceedingly slow in giving up hope of an understanding[5] with the French government. Louis XVI, in his somewhat misty policy, had made known that his acceptance of the law was in a way conditional and that he would wait for the Pontiff to regularize, by a brief, the provisions of the law which were not in accord with the common law of the Church.[6] And, after all, everyone saw especially in the new law, the abolition of a worn-out regime which had too long weighed on all. Lastly, with that optimism in the future which then filled all men's souls, many better-minded people persisted in counting on the goodness of men and on the providence of God, to smooth out the difficulties that still remained to be resolved.

[4] Such are the results of the labors of Sagnac, "Essai statistique sur le clergé constitutionnel et le clergé refractaire," in the Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine, November, 1906, pp. 97–115, and of Pisani, L'Eglise de Paris et la Révolution, I, 184–89.

[5] See Bridier, Mémoires inédits de M. de Salamon, internonce à Paris de 1790 à 1802, documents, no. 6. Pius VI in his correspondence often alludes to these delays and to the astonishment they must cause. Cf. Theiner, Documents, I, 15, 34, 76.

Little by little we see these illusions disappear. Soon the game of Montmorin, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, became evident: to play both the Pope and the King. The negotiations begun were continued in useless parleys. Evidently the Assembly had decided to apply the law in its full scope, whatever might be the reply of the Holy See. The French ambassador at Rome, Cardinal Bernis, was instructed to notify Pius VI that the new conversations did not have in mind an examination of the Constitution, far less its amendment, but simply its application. Before applying the law, they did not even wait for the Pope's reply. Upon the death of the Bishop of Quimper on September 30, the president of the ecclesiastical committee, Abbé Expilly, was elected in his place as bishop of Finistère, according to the form established by the Constitution.[7] At the same time Archbishop Loménie de Brienne of Sens organized the episcopal council according to the new regulations. Public opinion was not deceived about the personal dispositions of such prelates; according to Mirabeau's expression, it regarded them merely as "officials of morality." Addressing the bishops on November 20, Prudhomme wrote the following in his journal: "Gentlemen, no other restraint is needed than that of a national code." [8] Thereafter one of the most obsessing passions of the members of the Constituent Assembly was evidently the anti-religious passion.[9]

[6] See the letter of Louis XVI, under date of September 6, 1790. (Archives des affaires étrangères, corresp. de Rome, reg. 913.)

[7] Four hundred electors met at the cathedral and, on the third ballot, Abbé Expilly was elected by 233 votes. On November 23 Montmorin wrote to Bernis: "We think that His Holiness should be able to find some means of validating the election of Quimper. . . . Having emerged from this series of difficulties, we would seek some suitable solutions whenever new difficulties come up." Expilly's election took place on October 31. [Quimper had been the episcopal see in the department of Finistère—Tr.]

The Pope, however, continued to preserve silence. This silence lasted until March 13, 1791. Faithful to the policy he had followed with regard to Joseph II, Catherine II, and Leopold of Tuscany, the Holy Father did not wish to destroy anything. His desire was to make every effort to avoid a schism. Pius VI would be the last to cling to belief in Louis XVI's energy. Perhaps he also feared—and he would have had good reasons for doing so—that a considerable number of bishops, still influenced by their desire of reconciliation, and a large number of priests, still too ignorant of the real situation, would not heed the counsels of a wise intransigeance.[10] Later on, when the Pope found himself in the presence of precise facts, testifying to the schismatical and revolutionary nature of the law, he made the voice of his authority heard with mighty force; and the events showed that his prudence was sound: the large majority of the priests obeyed him without hesitation, resisting the persecutors with a heroism worthy of the early centuries.

Aim of the Assembly

The events following one another from the end of November, 1790, to the beginning of March, 1791, show that the enthrone-

[8] Les Révolutions de Paris, VI, 303 (November 13–20, 1790). Expilly, consecrated on February 24 next, conformable to the rubrics of the Pontificale, by Talleyrand, was a true bishop. See, in the Vie de M. Emery (I, 256), the precautions which the superior of St. Sulpice took to assure himself of the validity of this consecration. Therefore no one has ever seriously denied the episcopal character of the constitutional prelates and the validity of the ordinations which they subsequently performed.

[9] Sorel, op. cit., II, 115.

[10] In his dispatch of August 18, 1790, Bernis wrote to Montmorin: "The royal sanction takes from the Pope many of the means which he would have been able to ment of Expilly at Quimper and the new regulations issued at Sens by Loménie de Brienne were not isolated instances, but belonged to a plan systematically conceived and methodically pursued. The manifest design of the fanatics who dominated the Assembly was to apply the Constitution as promptly as possible, in the most brutal manner, and without regard for the authority of the pope.

On November 5 the deputy Duquesnoy, one of the men devoted to Montmorin's policy, speaking from the rostrum, said: "You have published a decree on the Constitution of the Clergy. The Assembly should know that it is being carried out. . . . I ask that, within two weeks, the ecclesiastical committee make a report on the execution of the decrees relative to the Constitution of the Clergy." Lanjuinais, speaking in the name of the committee, made a reply by adducing the election of Abbé Expilly, which had just taken place in the city of Quimper, and by announcing that preparations were made in the other departments.[11] This promise was not long in being carried out.

The first victims of the law were the canons. Undoubtedly it was thought that this procedure would stir less feeling among the faithful. The possessions of the chapters were inventoried, and the members of the chapter were forbidden henceforth to meet together. The chapter of Montpellier had already been suppressed (October 16). The suppression of the chapter of Bourges took place on January 11, 1791; that of Saint-Pons on February 8. The same measures soon occurred at Mirepoix, Tréguier, Saint-Omer, and generally in the provinces.

In certain old cities, where the cathedral or collegiate church was the traditional center of religious celebrations, this first outrage was grievously felt. At Noyon, at Saint-Omer, at Agde, employ usefully. In fact, he said to me: 'Any papal decision in the midst of the troubles with which France is agitated may become infinitely dangerous and may lead, by the division of the parties, to schism and fatal decisions that we wish to avoid.'" at Tréguier, and at Saint-Pol-de-Léon the impression was very deep.

[11] Moniteur, November 6, 1790, p. 1282.

When the church bells ceased to announce the daily psalmodies; when the silver lamp, burning night and day before the altar, had been taken down; when, in the streets overgrown with moss, people's steps were more rare; when the people saw the little ribbon of the seals come loose from the entrance of the chapter hall, from the sacristry door, from the choir grilles, they understood that the same Revolution as wiped out so many ancient traces would leave deserted the places where all that life had developed. The bishop's palace, disappearing with the chapter, would complete the decadence.[12]

In more than one place the beginning of a resistance occurred. At Laon the people demanded and obtained the reopening of the cathedral; at Cambrai a tumultuous crowd forced the withdrawal of the commissioners who came to affix the seals.[13]

A certain number of bishops (e.g., those of Mirepoix, Verdun, Soissons, and La Rochelle) published official protests.[14] The local authorities then had the protests seized and denounced the prelates to the Constituent Assembly. Some department directories, those of the Jura and the Corrèze, suppressed the salaries of the rebellious bishops. The directory of the Haute-Marne, by its own authority, closed the cathedral of Langres. These measures gradually became general, while the audacity of the fanatics increased daily. Prudhomme in his diary wrote: "Woe to the prelates who persist in keeping some relics of the old regime! They will merely hasten the Revolution that is preparing in the realm of religious ideas." [15] No illusion was any longer possible. The Civil Constitution of the Clergy was regarded by the anticlericals as a minimum, an insufficient minimum, a makeshift. The Constitutional leaders demanded the [12] P. de La Gorce, I, 313.

[13] Ibid., p. 314.

[14] See the list of these protests in a report by Voidel, Moniteur, November 28, 1790, pp. 1370–72.

[15] Les Révolutions de Paris, VI, 303.

marriage of priests, the suppression of the episcopacy, the removal of the barrier separating the clerics from the laity, and so on.[16]

In the Assembly the deputies of the left finally cast off the mask. Henceforth there was no question of respecting the authority of the Holy See or the regulations of ecclesiastical law. Voidel (November 26) declared: "You invoke the canonical forms. Who can be unaware that these canonical forms were, in the hands of the despots and of their base courtiers, a poisoned weapon with which they increase or perpetuate their abuses?" After Abbé Maury had spoken about the pope, the Jansenist Camus said: "The pope holds a position of authority; but he has not the right to give orders to the bishops." [17] Following this discussion, the Assembly (November 27, 1790) decided that within eight days from the publication of the present decree all the bishops and curés should take the oath on Sunday at the close of the Mass and in the presence of the municipal authorities. Failure to comply with this order would deprive them of their office and of their rights as French citizens. Furthermore, if thereafter the bishops and curés should exercise their ministry, they would be prosecuted as disturbers of the public peace. This same penalty was imposed on all persons who "should combine or conspire to arouse opposition to the decrees of the Assembly." [18]

After such declarations and such a vote, Rome could not think of carrying on effective negotiations with France. Every hope of agreement was finally lost. The law of November 27, according to the expression of a contemporary, Montlosier, "had destroyed all the bridges." But this declaration of war, by enlightening the Catholics, awakened their sluggish courage. In the Assembly the left could not restrain an emotion when [16] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 386.

[17] Moniteur, November 29, 1790, p. 1378.
[18] Ibid., p. 1372.

Maury addressed these words to them. "Take care: it is not good to make martyrs." [19]

Louis XVI and Pius VI

The law did indeed still lack an element essential for its being put into execution; namely, the King's sanction. But that sanction was not doubtful to anyone's mind. Louis XVI made one last effort to obtain from the Pope a reply that would rescue his conscience from remorse. On December 3 he wrote to Pius VI, begging him to approve the new division of the metropolitan sees and of the bishoprics, such as the Constitution had established. In this letter the King wrote: "Your Holiness' silence or refusal will most certainly bring on a schism. . . . I implore Your Holiness to give me the promptest and most satisfactory reply." [20] The Pope, relying on the movement of opinion that was forming in France, on the 14th replied to Bernis, that, by approving the Civil Constitution of the Clergy he would incur the disapprobation, not only of the universal Church, but also of the Gallican Church. All he could do was to defer his decision.

But in France events happened with precipitation. The local authorities continued to fill the episcopal sees according to the new regulations. A bishop was elected in the Ardennes on November 23; another, in Mayenne on December 12. On the 20th of December the Assembly called on the King to sanction its decree. Louis XVI experienced hours of frightful anguish. He turned to Boisgelin. This prelate, who soon would refuse courageously to take the oath, was touched with pity. He tried to calm the King's conscience, saying to him that from the moment his acceptance was and appeared to be indeed a forced acceptance, he could rest with a calm conscience. An old friend of the King, Saint-Priest, the former intransigeant minister, had the same pity for the poor monarch. Neither had the courage to urge Louis XVI to a resistance which they felt was beyond his strength.[21]

[19] Moniteur, November 29, 1790, p. 1378.

[20] Archives des affaires étrangères, quoted by Masson, Bernis, p. 489.

On the 26th, with broken heart, the King gave the required sanction. His message was received in the Assembly with applause which, according to the diary of Camille Desmoulins, continued ten minutes.[22] The left acclaimed, as someone has said, not the King, but its own victory.[23]

"I should prefer to be king of Metz," Louis XVI said when signing the decree, "than remain king of France in a situation like this; but it will end soon." [24] He was thinking of the help he hoped for from Europe.

On November 26, the day before the passing of the decree, which now seemed to him inevitable, he wrote to Breteuil, asking him to open negotiations with the friendly courts. He said: "I approve whatever you do to attain the end I have in mind, which is the re-establishment of my lawful authority and the happiness of my people." [25] What the King was thinking of, however, was not a foreign invasion, but a display of force at the frontiers, where the Emperor would mass troops, thus showing that "he regarded as evil the way they were treating the King." [26] The powers did not lend themselves to this chimerical project. No doubt, the situation of Europe with regard to [21] Documents found in the Tuileries, third collection, no. 175.

[22] Révolutions de France et de Brabant, no. 57.

[23] De La Gorce, I, 346.

[24] Marquis de Bouille, Souvenirs, I, 185.

[25] Flammermont, Négociations secrètes de Louis XVI et du baron de Breteuil (1885), p. 8. Madelin wrote: "Let us not condemn this step too quickly. The appeal to the foreigner, which appears odious to us today, was traditional. . . . Coligny, the League, and the great Condé had provided examples of it. Moreover, we should not consider abnormal the fact that Louis XVI had with the cabinets relations quite different from those which the diplomatic corps engaged in. At Versailles a Secret of the King always existed. Louis XVI should surprise us only by his prolonged scruples." Madelin, La Révolution (1911), p. 156.

[26] Ibid., p. 157.

the religious questions was no longer the same as ten years earlier. The time had passed when the Bourbon courts agreed together to wrench from the Holy See the suppression of the Society of Jesus. The King of Naples was reconciled with Rome; the Emperor showed himself full of regard for the Supreme Pontiff; the ambassador of Spain, Florida Blanca, put in touch with the emissaries of the Count of Artois, seemed to be more and more unfavorable to the anti-Roman policy which he had formerly championed; at Rome, at Brussels, at Turin, and at Coblenz the French émigrés stirred themselves, demanding, if not a serious invasion, as the Count of Artois desired, at least the military display desired by Louis XVI. Some have supposed that Pius VI himself favored, in some way, an intervention of the powers,[27] or at least let himself be influenced by a diplomatic movement in this direction. These guesses, which rest on no historic document, seem to be belied by the very character of the Pontiff.[28] If any power ever tried to ally its cause to that of Pius VI, the action was taken only when the powers' interests were at stake. Thus, as Albert Sorel remarks, the Europe of 1790 was incapable of risking itself for the cause of the kings, still less for the cause of the Church. Christendom no longer was, and, strictly speaking, Europe no longer existed. Nor did the question of right any longer exist; might held the first place. The states, moreover, appeared not more alarmed by the French Revolution than they were scandalized by it. They viewed the Revolution as "a revolt that weak-

[27] The nuncio Dugnani wrote to the Secretary of State as follows: "In the cafes and public squares people speak more than ever of Rome. They say that the Pope is stirring the courts of Europe to send troops against France, and other like calumnies. I believe that the enraged people of Avignon and our other capital enemies are spreading these rumors and are trying to have the reports accepted, rumors tending to exasperate the population and to make them regard the Holy Father as the chief enemy of the Constitution." Archives vaticanes, August 23, 1790, quoted by Gendry, op. cit., II, 130.

[28] Mathiez, who credited a movement attempted in this sense, adds: "Yet it is not likely that this diplomatic action, which a person surmises rather than knows, had carried great weight in Pius VI's decision." Mathiez, op. cit., p. 291.

ened a country they feared: France. They did not at all foresee the power of expansion which the French movement would take. . . . When, two years later, Europe decided to march against the Revolution, the movement was not prompted by a monarchical solidarity (even less to defend the cause of the Church), but in the hope of finding, this side of the Rhine, another Poland to dismember." [29]

The Pope, then, could count neither on the King of France nor on Europe to sustain him in his campaign against the schismatical undertakings of the Assembly. But, more and more attentively and hopefully, he followed the movement of protest which became more pronounced in the clergy and the people. On October 23, 1790, he had sent a brief of praise to the abbess of Remiremont, Adelaide de Bourbon-Condé, who had just protested against the decrees of the Assembly, and on November 11 he wrote to the Bishop of Basel, preoccupied with the question of his see, that, as pope, he would never confide the flock of that bishop to other hands, and that any newcomer would, in his eyes, be an intruder.[30]

Two new facts, throwing still more light on the growing hostility of the Assembly and on the increasing fidelity of the French episcopate, finally moved the Pope to issue a definitive and solemn condemnation of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. These facts were first the ensemble of the measures taken by the French government in the affair of Avignon, and secondly the courage which the French clergy showed when they were called upon to take the oath.

The Avignon Affair

Among the territories belonging to the Holy See, Avignon and the Comtat Venaissin enjoyed a particular status. Acquired at different periods,[31] they had kept their old franchises and paid only light taxes, the revenue of which, devoted to the local government, did not come to the Holy Father.[32] These possessions of the Holy See, being enclaves in France, had several times served as pledges to the kings of France when these latter wished to exert pressure on the papal government. Twice, at the conflict over the regalia and at the time of the affair of the franchises, Louis XIV had seized Avignon and the Comtat. From 1768 to 1774 Louis XV, to force the pope to suppress the Jesuits, had repeated the same outrage. The Revolution, on this point as on so many others, continued and aggravated the aggressive measures of the ancient regime.

[29] Madelin, La Révolution, p. 136.
[30] Gendry, op. cit., II, 131.

From the outset of the Revolution, the enemies of the Holy See employed the tactics of spreading the new ideas in the very states of the Holy Father. Camus, who as a member of the assembly played a preponderant part in the discussion of the Civil Constitution, carried on a steady correspondence, from the first months of 1789, with one of the leaders of the Avignon movement, a man named Raphael. Circumstances favored these undertakings. The economic crisis that afflicted France during the winter of 1788 had been particularly terrible in Avignon and in the Comtat Venaissin. In the month of March some uprisings, provoked by the forced unemployment of workers and by the general wretchedness, broke out here and there. The vice-legate, Casoni, had food distributed gratis to the poor, opened for the unemployed workshops of charity, and organized patriotic subscriptions.[33] Pius VI himself furnished an expedition of wheat, and sent to the disaffected places a commissioner instructed to receive the complaints and to remedy the abuses that might have been introduced. At the same time he exhorted the people to beware of the snares that were laid for them.[34] But, as at Paris, the word "hoarder," cleverly disseminated in the populace, stirred excitement in their minds. Notwithstanding all the contrary appearances, the ringleaders made the vice-legate responsible for all the calamities. The news of the taking of the Bastille fired men's minds. "Citizen militias" were formed to put down the so-called oppressors of the people. At the instigation of some foreigners, who settled in Avignon and at Carpentras following the French occupations, and of some people of the district, captivated by the current ideas, a new party was formed, which took the name of the party of "patriots." The party grew by the accession of all the malcontents, found its officers and its means of action in the militias, which the overwhelmed vice-legate had to legalize, and soon believed itself in a position to talk big and to demand reforms.

[31] The Comtat Venaissin had been given to the Holy See by St. Louis in 1228; Avignon had been ceded to the Holy See by Queen Joanna of Naples in 1348.

[32] On the historic origin of the papal sovereignty in Avignon, on the political regime in vigor there, and on the maneuvers by which the revolutionary party attempted to arouse the country against the pope, see the discourse delivered in the Assembly by Abbé Maury. Maury, a native of the Comtat, set forth the situation with particular competence. See especially his Seconde opinion sur la souveraineté d'Avignon. Maury, Œuvres choisies, V, 237 ff.

The decrees passed by the Constituent Assembly in the night of August 4, wrote Raphael to Camus, "fired all heads; and each one in this little state desired to procure the same advantages as those provided for all Frenchmen to enjoy. They propose your decrees for their regular model." [35]

A certain Raphael, "a dangerous man, as clever at intrigue as he was crafty and deeply wicked," [36] was appointed first consul of Carpentras. At his side was a philosopher, Baron de

[33] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 54.

[34] Picot, Mémoires, VI, 141.

[35] Quoted by Mathiez, op. cit., p. 58.

[36] Passeri, Mémoires sur la révolution d'Avignon et du Comtat Venaissin (1793), I, 56. The reader should not confuse this Raphael of Carpentras with Raphael of Avignon, of whom we shall have occasion to speak presently.

Sainte-Croix. This latter was an enthusiastic man of letters, who had made a deep study of the political institutions of antiquity and who dreamed of transforming his little country on the model of ancient Greece.[37]

Whereas Raphael and Sainte-Croix merely sought to introduce independent institutions, the Avignon agitators demanded union with France. "A former schoolteacher who had become a journalist (Sabin Tournal), a notary (Lescuyer), lawyers (Peyre and Palun), innkeepers (Molin and Peytavin), a butcher (Chaussi), had behind them the laborers, accustomed to follow readily the direction of those who gave them work, and the peasants, who desired the suppression of the feudal rights and the tolls." [38] To be relieved of the burdens of the papal regime without being subjected to those of the French regime was the ideal which the leaders flashed before the eyes of the peasants of Avignon and of the Comtat Venaissin. In the Annales du comtat Venaissin we read: "In spite of the shallow sarcasms, we shall have peace, and the French laws, and we shall not have any taxes." [39] Now Pius VI did not at all oppose wise reforms. He instituted an assembly of notables whose task would be precisely to point out to him the abuses to be corrected. But Raphael and his followers wished themselves to make the reforms.[40] The peasants rose up and, as we are told by a contemporary, insurrections became a sort of fashion. One day the people of Caumont forced the monks of the Carthusian monastery of Bompas to cede part of their property to the municipality; another day the people of Bédarrides divided among them the possessions of the archbishop of Avignon. Cavaillon, Bollène, and Avignon instituted "patriotic" (that is, revolutionary) municipalities. On June 11, 1790, [37] Baron de Saint-Croix was a member of the Academy des inscriptions.

[38] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 58.

[39] Antonelle, the mayor of Arles, denounced this false expectation in his pamphlet, Quelques réflexions sur la pétition du peuple avignonnais.

[40] Passeri, op. cit., I, 64.

the districts of Avignon voted the union of their city to France, "as the sole means of withdrawing from the vengeance of the court of Rome, from the nobles, and from the aristocrats." [41] At the same time they drove out the vice-legate, who retired to Carpentras, the capital of the Comtat.

The people of the Comtat did not associate themselves with the demand of the people of Avignon; Raphael and Sainte-Croix continued their dream of an independent republic. At Carpentras a representative assembly was formed, which eagerly adopted the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the main articles of the French Constitution. Then, as the Pope refused to approve the decrees of the Assembly, it ignored him, declared its decisions executory, expelled the vice-legate, who withdrew to Savoy, and placed the executive power in the hands of three chiefs of the party of patriots. Thus was completed the rupture with the Holy See. The Pope attempted the use of mild measures, offering amnesty to the disturbers. But the leaders of the revolution haughtily refused the papal pardon.

However, the petition of the Avignon districts reached the Constituent Assembly, which (November 20) decided to send a corps of troops to Avignon. These troops were charged with maintaining order there, "in concert with the municipal officers," that is, with the insurrectionary movement.[42] This step,

[41] Ibid., I, 210.

[42] In the Assembly the debate on this question was most excited. The speech of Maury, who took up the defense of the pope, was broken by interruptions of the left. Robespierre was solemn and tragic. He exclaimed: "We have been told that Avignon was the property of the pope. Good heavens! The people, property of a man! From the very tribune of the National Assembly this blasphemy has been uttered." "At these words," says the Moniteur, "the Assembly applauded again and again" (November 20, 1790). For the exigencies of the case, this contention was distortion of the claims of the Supreme Pontiff, the principles of international law, and the facts themselves. Pisani rightly says: "Pius VI could not at the very first blow consent to let himself be stripped of Avignon and the Comtat. The papal temporal power was not like the absolute power of hereditary princes. The oath which he took at his consecration obliged him to keep intact the patrimony which he was to administer. Thus he was not free to alienate Avignon; his resistance was dictated to him by a higher duty. Moreover, the welfare of the people of Avignon did not call for their union with an open attack on the sovereignty of the Holy See, was an armed introduction of the principles of the Revolution into the States of the Church. Ten days later, under the protection of the French soldiers, the Avignon municipality ordered Archbishop Giovio of Avignon, who had retired to Villeneuve, and all the priests, to take the civil oath under pain of being deprived of their offices. This imposition of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy in the domain of the Holy See was the final outrage, which the Pope's patience no longer had a right to tolerate. The hour for denouncing the schismatical Constitution had struck.

Abbé Grégoire

While these events were happening at Avignon and in the Comtat, the attitude of some of the French people changed. A division gradually took place in France among the people and the clergy, between the men who until then had adhered to the same formulas with quite different intentions. Those whose minds inclined toward philosophism or were won over to Jansenism showed themselves ready to obey the decrees of the Assembly and to take the oath; but most of those who had attempted merely to realize a political and social reform in a Christian spirit had decided to refuse the oath energetically and to take an open stand against the Revolution.

Conspicuous in the former group was a man of marked personality. Throughout the course of the Revolution and for the defense of the worst of causes, this man continued to employ a talent of the first order and a rare energy. His name was Abbé Grégoire, curé of Ambermenil. Along with Bishop de La Fare the French monarchy. . . . So true is this fact that the large majority of the people of Avignon and of the Comtat did not ask for a union with France. On the contrary, they openly opposed the move of the "patriots." Pisani in Revue des questions historiques, October 1, 1911, p. 528.

---

of Nancy, he represented in the Assembly the clergy of Lorraine.

Abbé Grégoire was ardent for the Revolution to the point of fanaticism, devoid of the eminent gifts that make a philosopher, a statesman, or an orator, and was often subject to mistakes of judgment and to impulses. He was, nevertheless, desirous of preserving the Christian faith, thoroughly penetrated with his priestly duties, encompassed by the esteem which attached to his uprightness, courage, and regular life, and he did not approve the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; but, satisfied that the dogma of the Church would remain intact, he judged that the safest step to take was submission.[43] On December 27, the very day following that on which the King gave his sanction to the decree of November 27, Grégoire mounted the rostrum to take the civil oath.

He began by protesting his inviolable attachment to religion and the country. He said:

> Of that religion we shall be constantly the missioners; if need be, we shall be martyrs for it. . . . But, after the most mature and serious examination, we declare that we perceive nothing in the Constitution which can harm the holy truths which we must believe and teach. . . . No consideration, therefore, can defer the pronouncing of our oath. . . .
>
> I swear to watch with care over the faithful entrusted to my guidance; I swear to be faithful to the nation, to the law, and to the king; I swear to maintain to the full extent of my power the French Constitution, and notably the decrees relative to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy.

After him fifty-one ecclesiastics took the same oath. The next day (December 28) and the following Sunday (January 2, 1791) two prelates (Talleyrand, bishop of Autun, and Gobel, bishop of Lydda in partibus, coadjutor of the Bishop of Basel) went through the same legal formality. Talleyrand did so without comment, like a man eager to finish an irksome and unpleasant task, with that mysterious smile in which could be read the cold skepticism of the man for whom political success was almost all that counted, for whom conviction weighed but little. Gobel pronounced his oath with hesitation and embarrassment, encompassing his oath with prolix restrictions and speaking in a tone that seemed to retract these very restrictions.

[43] De La Gorce, op. cit., I, 351.

Bishops Boisgelin and Bonal

Two days later, the time for the taking of the oath expired. All who had been enlightened by the recent events regarding the intentions of the revolutionary party or who were confirmed in their opposition always regarded as their chiefs the Archbishop of Aix (Boisgelin) and the Bishop of Clermont (Bonal). Both of these men had wished first to exhaust the attempts at conciliation. On December 1 Archbishop de Boisgelin had written to the King, offering him the resignation of the entire episcopate if such a resignation would promote the establishing of peace; he also proposed to the King to intervene with the Pope to obtain authorization for the re-election of the bishops and a general delegation to the metropolitans giving them, in the name of the Holy See, the right of canonical institution of their suffragans.[44] On January 2, 1791, Bishop de Bonal proposed to the Assembly a formula of the oath which explicitly excepted "the objects that depend essentially on the spiritual authority."[45] But Boisgelin's proposals did not result in anything, and Bonal's motion merely provoked threats and hoots: the office of the Assembly refused to receive it.[46] Evidently the session of January 4 would be decisive. The men of the Revolution knew that a large number of the clergy had decided to refuse the oath. Therefore pressure was brought to bear on them. The preceding day pamphlets were circulated; cries of death were uttered. Well before the session the galleries were filled with rowdies and disturbers, with habitués of the clubs, who resolved to exercise intimidation on the representatives.

[44] Ami de la religion, XIII, 165.
[45] Picot, Mémoires, VI, 52.
[46] Mercure de France, January 8, 1791.

The day of signing arrived. After a preliminary debate about the meaning and consequences of the oath, during which Grégoire, Mirabeau, and Barnave spoke in succession, the president proceeded to call by name those expected to take the oath. The first one called was Bishop de Bonnac of Agen. He spoke amid an impressive silence. "I abandon my office," he said, "without regret, as likewise my fortune; but I should feel regret at the loss of your esteem. I beg you, then, to accept the avowal of the pain I experience in being unable to take the oath." A simple priest, Abbé Fournetz, curé of Puymarac, in the same diocese of Agen, followed him: "You wish to recall the first ages of the Church. With the simplicity of the first Christians, I will tell you that I glory in following my bishop, as Lawrence followed his pastor." Leclerc, curé of La Combe near Alençon, began thus: "I am a son of the Catholic Church." But clamorous shouts interrupted him. This series of refusals made the Assembly impatient.

The roll call was suspended. The president [47] declared, again and again, as though to urge the priests to take the oath pure and simple, that the Assembly did not intend to touch spiritual matters. "Let the Assembly embody this declaration in a decree," exclaimed Cazalès. But Mirabeau remarked that "perhaps the dissidents called spiritual what the Assembly called temporal," for example, "the demarkation of the dioceses." Cazalès' motion was rejected. A few ecclesiastics took the oath, but with reservations about spiritual matters; others, with references to the declarations of the Assembly. Four took the oath pure and simple. At about five o'clock the president, addressing the Assembly, said: "For the last time, I invite the ecclesiastics present to take the oath." No one rose up. In short, as we read in a journal of the time, the effect of this session was the contrary of what the majority had hoped. Out of forty-four bishops or archbishops, only two (Talleyrand and Gobel) had defected. Of the simple priests, two-thirds courageously refused the oath. As the Bishop of Uzès wrote the next day. "This day has honored religion, and we have retired, proud of our glorious poverty." [48]

[47] This was Emmery. He belonged to the religion of Israel.

The Papal Condemnation

News of the memorable session of January 4, 1791, brought great comfort to the Holy Father. Thenceforth he was assured that the French episcopate, enlightened on its duties, would not make a schism. The moment seemed at hand to make public the condemnation of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, on which Pius VI had been working for some time. This solemn condemnation would, however, not appear until two months later; but the Pontiff now profited by every occasion to manifest his sentiment. Thus, when Cardinal Loménie de Brienne informed him by letter (January 30) of his taking the oath, the Pope replied by a severe brief, threatening to deprive him of his cardinalitial dignity unless he retracted immediately.[49] On February 9 Pius VI wrote to the Bishop of Toulon to encourage him in his resistance. Lastly, by two briefs (March 10, 1791,[50] and April 13) [51] he formally condemned the Civil Constitution of the Clergy.

[48] Letter of Bishop de Béthisy of Uzès, January 5, 1791, read at the session of the Assembly, February 22, 1791.

[49] Brienne did not wait for the effect of the Pope's threat. He resigned from his cardinalitial office; and this former minister of Louis XVI passed over to Jacobinism.

[50] Brief Quod aliquantum; Guillon, Brefs des Instructions de Pie VI (1798), I, 104–262.

[51] Brief Charitas; Barberi, Bullarium, IX, 11–18.

The first brief, addressed to the bishops who were deputies of the National Assembly, examined deeply the principles and the chief provisions of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. Therein the Pope found two basic principles, which he declared equally heretical, namely: 1. that the ecclesiastical power depends on the authority of the princes; 2. that the election of the pastors of the Church belongs to the people. Replying to the objections of those who, like Grégoire, distinguished between dogma and discipline, and demanding for the latter a complete subjection to the state, the Holy Father said: "How often discipline has a close union with dogma! How often it serves to maintain the purity of dogma! Thus we see the councils pronounce anathema against those who are culpable simply of breaking the laws of discipline."

Then turning to those who had been waiting impatiently, the Pope told them that, if until then he had refrained from separating the authors of the Constitution from the Catholic unity, this delay was with a view to avoiding by patience a deplorable schism. But, after long prayer and reflection, he declared that he could not approve a law that upset all the dioceses of a great realm, adopted the error of Luther and Calvin regarding the election of pastors, gave to the civil courts the supreme jurisdiction of cases purely ecclesiastical, inflicted injury on the authority of the bishops by establishing at their side a council arbitrarily composed, and lastly debased the clergy by replacing the fixed revenues of their benefices with a money salary furnished by the state. In short, he condemned a legislation "worse than all those which princes had formerly issued."

The brief of April 13, 1791, addressed to all the faithful of France, must be regarded as one of the most solemn decisions of the Church. After recalling the reasons developed in his earlier letter, and the Exposition des principes which was signed by the whole episcopate of France, except four bishops, the Supreme Pontiff added: "Now no one of the faithful can any longer doubt that this new Constitution of the Clergy is established on heretical principles and hence heretical in several parts." [52] Consequently the Holy Father expressly forbade "all those who had been irregularly elected and unlawfully consecrated, to perform any act of jurisdiction under pain of suspension and nullity." [53] Yet, wishing to employ every indulgence that he could permit himself, and hoping by this means to remedy the evil already committed and to lead his strayed sons back to the fold, the common Father of the faithful declared that for the present moment he would withhold the more severe censures prescribed by the canons. "But," he concluded, "if, which God forbid, our paternal warning produces no fruit, let all know that our intention is to launch anathema against the unsubmissive, to denounce them to the Church as schismatics, to remove them from the bosom of the Church, and to deprive them of our communion." [54]

The Constitutional Clergy

For all who had seen clearly into the policy of the Constituent Assembly, these two briefs were a solace; for most of the others, they were a light. Many priests who had taken the oath, retracted. The fear of a general apostasy, which had haunted the soul of Pius VI, was dissipated: France would not give the spectacle which, two centuries earlier, the England of Henry VIII had given, as a great nation passing into schism in the footsteps of its bishops and priests.

Yet the constitutional clergy organized themselves the more actively since they were composed, henceforth, solely of sectarians resolved to go to the very limit in the way of revolt, or

[52] Barberi, Bullarium, IX, 13.
[53] Ibid., p. 17.
[54] Ibid.

of minds sincerely under illusion about their duties. After Talleyrand and Gobel, three bishops had taken the constitutional oath. These were Jarente, bishop of Orléans, whom Cheverny in his Mémoires calls "a sort of fool, a villainous man";[55] Savine, bishop of Viviers, a philanthropist of the school of Rousseau, who would upset his diocese by the most fantastic reforms and incoherent philanthropic fancies;[56] and Loménie de Brienne, that atheist archbishop who soon became president of the club at Sens with a liberty cap for a hat.[57] For a return to apostolic times, this ecclesiastical scandal was a poor beginning.[58]

Archbishop Gobel

On March 13, 1791, to replace Bishop de Juigné, who had just emigrated to Savoy, an electoral assembly, consisting of 21 priests and 664 laymen, elected Gobel archbishop of Paris. The life of Jean Baptiste Gobel is perhaps the most lamentable example of the ravages that, by the seductions of a corrupt [55] Quoted by Sicard, L'ancien clergé de France, II, 51. Picot gives us the impression which the sight of this prelate made on him in 1789, a prelate "clothed in ermine and silk, draping himself like a woman for a theatrical performance, a court prelate, devoid of anything serious in his character." Quoted ibid., p. 50.

[56] On Savine, see an excellent monograph by Simon Brugal, Le schisme constitutionel dans l'Ardèche, La Font de Savine (1889). Amid his strayings, Savine always preserved a depth of generosity and kindness. After his withdrawl to Paris, he had the honor of being imprisoned for seven months at the Conciergerie for having tried to save an innocent man from death. There during his imprisonment he was touched by the grace of conversion. The conversations he had in prison with a venerated priest, André Georges Brumauld de Beauregard, former superior of the students of philosophy in the St. Sulpice Seminary, opened his eyes in the matter of his straying. At the age of seventy he retired to Embrun, to his family home, and there engaged in the severest austerities. On the fact of his conversion by Beauregard, see Bertrand, Bibliothèque sulpicienne, III, 190.

[57] Madelin, La Révolution, p. 154.

[58] Gobel, auxiliary of the Bishop of Basel for the French part of the diocese, was not reckoned among the prelates of the Church of France. Hence generally only four juring bishops are counted: Talleyrand, Jarente, Savine, and Loménie de Brienne. We must add two prelates not at the head of a diocese: Miraudot, bishop of Babylon, and Martial de Loménie, coadjutor of his brother in Sens.

aristocracy, then by the influences of an unrestrained demagoguery, can be brought about in a soul naturally upright, but vain and weak. Born September 1, 1727, at Thann in Upper Alsace, he pursued brilliant and solid studies in theology in Rome. Soon thereafter, he won the confidence of the prince-bishop of Basel, Frohberg, who obtained him for his suffragan and consecrated him bishop of Lydda in partibus.

Well educated, active, regular in his morals, irreproachable in his doctrine, the new prelate seemed at first to justify the confidence that brought him to a position of honor. But his elevation to the episcopal dignity turned his head. Sprung from plebeian stock, he was a contrast in the environment of all those bishops of the ancient regime, recruited from the highest nobility. The pomp which he thought he must indulge in led him into excessive expenses. Although pensioned by the prince-bishop and by Louis XVI, he was obliged to borrow money to meet his extravagances. His need of money and his thirst for honors soon led him to almost unbelievable depths of baseness. He intrigued to obtain the government of a diocese. He gambled; he lost foolishly large sums in brilliant company. To have himself accepted in high society, he made a show of the fashionable vices. In short, the Revolution found Jean Baptiste Gobel crushed with debts and at Paris leading the procession of the most sumptuous prelates.

Elected deputy to the States General by the bailiwick of Belfort and Huningue, he voted, until June 1, 1790, with the most intransigeant part of the clergy. Then suddenly he changed his views. The Revolution won him completely: Gobel became a revolutionary and at once went to the extreme. He joined the Jacobin club and there delivered the most hot-headed speeches. With enthusiasm he enrolled among the Assermentés and presented his candidacy for the bishoprics that would become vacant. The election (March 13) that put him at the head of the constitutional clergy of Paris intoxicated him, as had happened to him when he was chosen by the prince-bishop of Basel. On March 17, before taking possession of the church of Notre Dame, he made a tour of the city in a popular procession, composed of his electors, at the head of which marched the drummers and musicians of the National Guard.[59] This upstart Talleyrand, without complaisance and without nobility, in his last tragic moments called for the help of the Church he had denied.

Bishop Grégoire

The juring priests of Paris [60] rallied about Archbishop Gobel, but he was never the soul of the Constitutional Church. That place fell to Grégoire, bishop of Loir-et-Cher, who was imbued with adamant prejudices against the Holy See, but who had a strong and upright soul together with a consistent character. He showed as much courage in opposing the anti-Christian manifestations of the Convention and the Directory as he had shown obstinacy in defending the so-called liberties of the Gallican Church against the power of Rome.[61]

[59] Pisani, Répertoire biographique de l'épiscopate constitutionnel, pp. 53–59. Cf. G. Gautherot, Gobel.

[60] According to the most reliable calculation, the juring priests of the Paris clergy must have numbered about 800. Pisani, I, 218. Later on, many of them retracted.

[61] Henri Grégoire, born at Veho near Lunéville, on December 4, 1750, crowned at the age of twenty-three by the Academy of Nancy for his Eloge de la poésie, and shortly after by the Academy of Metz for his Essai sur la régénération des Juifs, was curé of Amberménil when the Lorraine clergy sent him to sit in the States General. Having become the chief of the Constitutional Church, Grégoire carried on an immense correspondence with his followers, bishops, priests, and laymen. The thousands of letters received by him have been saved from destruction. Classified methodically by departments, they are today in the possession of M. Gazier, professor at the Sorbonne. (Thanks to the communication of these letters, Pisani has been able, in his Répertoire biographique de l'épiscopat constitutionnel, and again in his four volumes on L'Eglise de Paris et la Révolution, to compose the biographies of more than one prelate of that period and the history of more than one event.) Grégoire was a revolutionary, and he seldom lost an occasion of saying so; but, being a philosopher only after the manner of Voltaire, of Rousseau, and of the Encyclopedists, he was never a philosopher in the strict sense of the word. No one has more indignantly denounced

Soon, not only Loir-et-Cher, but also other departments of France had their Constitutional prelates. As at Paris, their enthronement took place amid much civil pomp. Drums were played in the fields, cannons thundered, and the National Guard formed the bishop's escort. At Le Mans, Saint-Claude, and Meaux, the municipal musicians filled the cathedral with the air of the Ça ira. At Laval, Grenoble, and Tulle, one of the first acts of the new bishops was to preside at a meeting of the clubs of the city.[62] These newly elected Constitutional prelates made little change in the religious ceremonies. The people maliciously remarked that these bishops did not abandon any of the luxurious adornments for which the prelates of the ancient regime had been reproached: neither the glittering ring nor the rich pectoral cross nor the rochet ornamented with fine lace. The title of Monseigneur, which became the style in the eighteenth century,[63] was pleasing to these new dignitaries of the Church; so much so that, among the ruins of so many abolished titles, this one, thanks to them, has been fixed in the usage of contemporary French.[64]

We would by no means assert that these Constitutional prelates were entirely without moral worth. One well-informed historian says: the moral and religious doctrine of those men. In his Mémoires he wrote: "I have seen that these philosophers, ever ready with the big words 'humanity' and 'probity,' had two different doctrines, one for theory, the other for practice. Jean Jacques produced his Confessions and his hypocrite the Vicaire savoyard; the author of the Dictionnaire philosophique is also that of the Pucelle; Diderot wrote impieties and an indecent romance; Wilkes and Lewis were unbelievers; Paray, in one and the same work, combined what is worst in impiety and in crime against nature." Grégoire, Mémoires, II, 3.

---

[62] P. de La Gorce, op. cit., I, 410.

[63] Voltaire made fun of the recent practice of the prelates of his time, who, he said, began to "monseigneurize" themselves.

[64] But under the Consulate we see that the Constitutional bishops no longer receive the title of Monseigneur, but that of Reverendissimus. Bishop D'Orlodot of Laval thus entitles one of his charges to the clergy: Charge of the Reverendissimus bishop of Laval. Priests were then designated by the title of "venerable"; thus, the venerable Coisnard. Isidore Boullier, Mémoires ecclésiastiques, p. 357.

Often they have been represented as disreputable priests, the scum of the clergy, lacking both faith and morals. Such an absolute judgment would be unjust. Some Constitutional bishops were priests who never had the faith, such as Minée of Nantes or Pelletier of Anger; some were dissolute men, such as Dunouchel of Nimes and Porion of Arras; [65] some were avaricious men, such as Deville or Rodrigue: [66] but those whom a detestable and public vice rendered despicable were scarcely a dozen. We do meet with scholarly men of weak faith, like Lalande or Villar,[67] who made a career of the priesthood; revolutionary orators like Fauchet or Huguet; unscrupulous "arrivists" like Joubert or Mestadier; but of these we do not count more than ten.[68]

The rest [69] were divided into two almost equal parts. On one hand, we see sincerely pious priests, but men whose piety was sentimental and vague. These were virtuous officials, but men of poor judgment. Intoxicated by the grand words of the Revolution or seduced by the honors of the episcopate, they gladly let themselves be elected and in the episcopate continued the relatively upright lives they had formerly led. For instance, Bonnet of Chartres was a zealous bishop, charitable and pious. The influence of his surroundings had drawn him into the revolutionary party. He died in 1793, just when the persecution was about to reach even the Constitutionals.[70] Likewise Avoine of Versailles was always conscious of the dignity of the priest-

[65] See Pisani, Répertoire biographique, pp. 335–37. Porion, bishop of Pas-de-Calais, former curé of Saint-Nicolas, apostatized, gave up the priesthood, and married. He was succeeded in 1797 by Asselin, curé of Saint-Sépulchre at Saint-Omer, who was consecrated at Paris, October 8. Asselin used to make his journeys on an ass, to distinguish himself from the pompous bishops of the ancient regime. This patriarchal mode of travel won him the epithet of "donkey bishop." Information communicated by Canon Bled of Saint-Omer. Cf. Deramecourt, Le clergé du diocèse d'Arras pendant la Révolution, IV, 164–77, 200–74.

[66] Deville was bishop of the Eastern Pyrenees (diocese of Aleth); Rodrigue, of the Vendée.

[67] On Villar, see Boullier, op. cit., pp. 60, 319.

[68] Pisani, op. cit., p. 25.

[69] The number of Constitutional bishops was the same as that of the departments, eighty-three.

[70] Pisani, op. cit., p. 70.

hood. He protested against the suppression of the church bells and was denounced to the Convention for having refused institution to a married priest. He died in the same year as Bonnet, 1793.

The second category of Constitutional prelates was that of fighting men. Examples will again clarify the point. Grégoire and Expilly (whom we have already met), Le Coz of Ille-et-Vilaine, and Lamourette of Lyons engaged in striving against the abuses of the ancient regime and of promoting the triumph of the Revolution. Lamourette was a scholarly and pious Vincentian, but a man wholly won over to the sentimentalism of the time. He was seduced by the abstract theories of the philosophers, and at an early hour he became a friend of Mirabeau. He quit his diocese, leaving the administration of it to his vicars, and took his seat in the Legislative Assembly, where he preached union and fraternity. He is famous in history for having provoked the doleful comedy that was called "the Lamourette kiss." He perished on the scaffold in 1794 after retracting his errors.[71]

Other aggressive spirits became rather defenders of Gallicanism and, to some extent, of Jansenism so far as Jansenism preached a return to the primitive Church and limited the powers of the pope.[72]

Périer of Clermont was an Oratorian, of blameless morals and of great worth in education. He was brought to the Constitutional Church by his Gallican theories, by the exaggerated notion he had of the rights of the state. Persecuted under the Terror, he withdrew to Grenoble, where he tried to assemble the Constitutional clergy. Later he returned to Clermont and there labored energetically in the organization of public worship. Appointed bishop of Avignon after the Concordat, he would show under the restoration the same servile devotion to the civil power.

[71] Ibid., pp. 377–82.

[72] Several Jansenists opposed the Civil Constitution: such were Jubineau and Maultrot. Certain others (e.g., Bishop de Noël of Lescar, the Oratorian Father Tabarand, the Dominican Father Lambert) opposed the Revolution itself. Dufraisse and Volfius, both former Jesuits, continued to be adversaries of the Jansenists, even when they became full adherents of the Revolution and entered into the Constitutional episcopate: the former as bishop of Le Cher, the latter as bishop of the Côte-d'Or. Resting his view on these facts, the Constitutional J. J. Mounier maintained that Jansenism had no influence on the Revolution. Mounier, De l'influence attribuée aux philosophes, aux franc-maçons et aux illuminés sur la Révolution de France, p. 63. Mounier's conclusion is not correct.

Bertier of Rodez, whose stern bearing and melancholy air always inspired the respect of those who approached him, was not only a man of duty in his private life, but also a man of combat in his public life. He had always professed a moderate Gallicanism, which he defended with grim and uncompromising firmness. He too faced persecution under the Terror. He affirmed his Catholic faith openly, but throughout his life refused to recognize in the pope any primacy other than "one of honor and of jurisdiction regulated by the canons." Such are the very words he used in his last will.[73]

Each department had its Constitutional bishop. But not each parish had its Constitutional curé. We may say that, from this point of view, France was divided into two parts. The regions where the new ideas had penetrated [74] received without ceremony and with a sort of indifference the new curé who was sent to them by order of the district, and who officiated, baptized, and administered the sacraments like his predecessors. His church, however, already not frequented, now became more and more empty according as the conscience of the faithful became enlightened. As for the religious populations of Flanders, Artois, Alsace, Rouergue, Velay, and the whole region of the northwest, they presented an altogether different spectacle, but at first everything passed in a manner equally calm. The faithful priest who had refused to take the oath sought refuge in the house of some friend. Almost everywhere he refused to use the faculty, which was granted him, to celebrate Mass in the church after the juring priest had completed his service. The faithful for the most part did not attend the church services of the new worship and gathered about the non-juring priest. On Sunday, around the barn or the chapel of the château where the faithful priest officiated, an overflowing crowd openly participated in the holy mysteries. The decrees forbidding a non-juring priest to exercise the functions of his ministry were practically regarded as null and void. For the celebration of baptisms the faithful contrived, by more or less subtle proceedings, to evade the regulations and to avoid the ministry of the priest sent by the district. For example, for funerals they left to him the removal of the body, but they did not enter the church, and afterward they asked the prayers of the non-juring priest.

[73] Pisani, op. cit., pp. 377–82. Pisani quotes in extenso Bertier's curious will. Pisani's Répertoire biographique is the basis for all study of the Constitutional episcopate. Each item is accompanied with an abundant and reliable bibliography.

[74] Ile-de-France, Picardy, the Orléans district, Burgundy, Berry, Touraine, Provence, and the Dauphiny.

The misfortune of these faithful clergy was the departure of their bishops. Many prelates, like Bishop de Juigné, had emigrated. These men generally retained an irreproachable orthodoxy.[75] Among them were some noble and lofty-minded bishops. Several, like Aviau, returned to France at a time when the danger was still great.[76] From these bishops came the most vigorous protests against the Revolution's laws of persecution. "We may, however, believe that many of them, if they had remained in their dioceses, instead of departing to a foreign land, would have more effectively combated the Constitutional schism; and if they had lost their lives there, as did Le Lan, Le Rochefoucauld, Castellane, Sandicourt, and Breteuil, they would have better served the Church than by withdrawing from their flock and losing all contact with it. The good done by the [75] Yet we find some of these émigré prelates later refuse to accept the Concordat or refuse to send the pope the resignation which was asked of them.

[76] Bishop Aviau was the first bishop to return to France.

bishops who remained at their post,[77] shows that staying in France was not impossible.[78]

On the other hand, we cannot pronounce peremptorily on this grave question. As émigrés, these bishops remained in communication with their clergy by letters. Moreover, if they had remained in France, a great number of them would perhaps have been deported, thrown into old hulks, guillotined, and many dioceses would thus have lost their shepherds. Whatever the case, the curés and their faithful, under the direction of the vicars-general to whom the emigrant bishops had confided their powers of administration, continued this regime for a while in comparative tranquillity, until the day when the authorities decided to impose the juring priests by force and to drag the refractory priests off to prison.

The Legislative Assembly

The Legislative Assembly would commit this new fault. The Constituent Assembly had deliberated under the influence of the ideologists whose spirit is well summed up in the utopias of Abbé Sieyès: the Legislative Assembly would now see the reign of the Jacobins, which was personified by Danton. Says Taine:

> The Jacobin is like a shepherd who of a sudden, in a corner of his cottage, discovers some parchments that call him to the crown. . . . He fills his imagination with their contents and at once takes on the tone that belongs to his new dignity. Nothing could be haughtier or more arrogant than this tone. "Know that you are kings and more than kings," exclaimed Chalier. "Do you not feel the sovereignty circulating in your veins?" . . . The Jacobin is virtue; no one can resist him without the act being a crime. Consequently nothing is clearer [77] Such as the bishops of Alaid, Bazas, Lectoure, Dijon, Mâcon, Cavaillon, St. Brieuc, St. Papoul, and Senlis.

[78] Pisani, op. cit., p. 17. In spite of solicitations by their friends and in spite of the extreme dangers of the situation, fifteen bishops refused to abandon their dioceses.

than the object of the government: to subject the wicked to the good, or, what is simpler, to suppress the wicked; for this purpose they will employ deportation, drowning, the guillotine. The Jacobin canonizes his murderers. . . . Whoever follows logic is a fool; whoever believes in conscience is a monster.[79]

The ideologist had dreamed endlessly of the original freedom, of the perpetual equality, of the purity of the primitive Church. The Jacobin seeks to realize these dreams brutally. The fields of action on which the daring of the Jacobins would be exercised was plainly indicated: the Declaration of the Rights of Man and especially the Civil Constitution of the Clergy offered these fields to them.

The Declaration proclaimed the inalienable freedom of man. One of the first acts of the Legislative Assembly was to give freedom to the Negroes of the colonies. No thought was given to the question whether these slaves were prepared to make use of it. In fact, they were not; from the end of October, on the far shore of the Atlantic immense columns of smoke and flames suddenly shot upward; and from week to week the civil war at Santo Domingo increased, wild beasts let loose against their guardians, 50,000 Blacks on the rampage. At the very outset 1,000 persons were assassinated, 15,000 Negroes were killed, 200 sugar factories were destroyed, the damage being estimated at 600,000,000 francs; a colony which was equivalent to ten French provinces was almost wiped out.[80] In the name of liberty, the Assembly abolished the indissolubility of marriage.[81] The result of this decree was more than 20,000 cases of divorce in France in the course of the five years that followed, more than 6,000 in Paris in less than three years.

[79] Taine, Les origines, V, 34–38.

[80] Ibid., V, 147.

[81] The decree of November 20, 1792, establishing divorce, began thus: "The National Assembly, considering the importance of allowing to all Frenchmen the right of divorce, resulting from individual liberty, which would be lost by an indissoluble agreement, decrees: 1. Marriage is dissolved by divorce; 2. divorce takes place by the mutual consent of the parties."

The Declaration proclaimed the perpetual equality of men. In the name of equality the Legislative Assembly suppressed all seigneurial rights that the Constituent Assembly had declared lawful,[82] and it ordered the burning in the public depositories of all genealogical titles of nobility.[83] In the name of equality some representatives of the people proposed, amid the applause of the Assembly, the equalizing of fortunes. Lamarque, in the session of June 23, declared: "The equality of rights cannot be maintained except by a continual tendency toward equalization of fortunes." "Divide the common goods," said François de Nantes, "among the citizens of the neighboring villages, in inverse ratio to their fortunes, so that he who has less patrimonial property may have the greater part in the division." [84]

The ideologists of the Constituent Assembly, in their famous Declaration of Rights, had proclaimed the sovereignty of the nation; but, for the Jacobins of the Legislative Assembly, the nation was solely the popular classes. "Only in the citizens that are contemptuously called the people," exclaimed Lamargue, "do we find pure souls, ardent souls, truly worthy of liberty." [85] Whoever has suffered from the social institutions, whether as a convict or as a bandit, belongs to the true people; and for the Jacobin the people has all rights. The Assembly rehabilitated all the deserters who had quit their standards before 1789,[86] it invited to the honors of its sessions forty Swiss of Châteauvieux taken from prison; [87] it granted amnesty to the band of con-

[82] Decrees of June 18 and August 25, 1792.

[83] Decree of June 19, 1792.

[84] Quoted by Taine, op. cit., V, 157.

[85] Moniteur, session of June 22, 1792.

[86] Ibid., decree of February 8.

[87] At the club of the Girondists on April 9, the president Vergniaud welcomed and complimented these convicts.

dottieri of all countries and also old offenders who terrorized Avignon and the Comtat, and it allowed them to return as conquerors. Said the president Daverhoult: "Under the reign of liberty, the people has the right to claim not only subsistence but also abundance and happiness." [88] Even when the law is silent, the people can act to express its sovereign power. "Yes," declared Isnard, "the wrath of the people, like the wrath of God, is often merely the terrible supplement of the silence of the laws." [89]

Did the men who spoke thus see the dreadful danger of such excitations? Did they understand that the unleashing of popular fury would turn against that Church which the chief orators in the Constituent Assembly had proclaimed as having a divine character, and the later orators had solemnly declared to have spiritual independence? The fact is that their words, while stirring the anger of the people, at the same time pointed to the priest as their chief enemy. Said Isnard: "The priest is as lax as he is vindictive. . . . Send these pestiferous men to the lazaretto of Rome." [90] François de Nantes denounced the priests as being men who insinuate into the minds of children the poison of aristocracy and fanaticism.[91] The priests were referred to as the accomplices of the aristocrats and also as rebels against the Civil Constitution of the Clergy.

The retractions of the juring priests became increasingly numerous. Nothing contributed more to speed this movement than such invectives, which showed the hostile character of the government and the hateful interpretation it was ready to give to the Constitution. According as the men of the Revolution, departing from vague idealism, from the dubious Christianity that had presided over its beginning, took a clearly anti-Catholic attitude, the Christianity that had been slumbering in many [88] Moniteur, session of January 14, 1792.

[89] Ibid., November 2, session of October 31, 1792.
[90] Moniteur, session of January 5, 1792.
[91] Ibid., April 3, August 26, and November 13.

priestly souls of the ancient regime again recovered its strong vitality. At the same time the power, falling from Sieyès to Danton, went on declining still more, from Danton to Marat. Many a prelate, previously luxury-loving and indolent, found in his destitution the austere virtues of his state, and the faithful people gathered closer about their persecuted priests. The Supreme Pontiff, following the march of events with attention and solicitude, raised his soul to the height of the great duties imposed on him by his apostolic responsibility.

Cardinal Bernis

Among the prelates whose worldly life had dazzled the court and the city, none had been more conspicuous than Cardinal Bernis. His light verses had gone the round of the salons; his relations of friendship with Voltaire and Madame Pompadour were known to all.[92] The important diplomatic missions that had been assigned to him at Venice and at Rome, the experience of life that his great age gave him, all these had undoubtedly matured his ideas. But even at the age of seventy-six, this old man was still the great lord, living in grand style in the splendid palace he occupied at Rome. When, in the spring of 1791, the aunts of the King of France, Madame Victoire and Madame Adelaide, sought in the capital of the Christian world liberty to practice their religion, the Cardinal placed at their disposal his twelve carriages, his fifteen horses, his ten mules, and the silver service with which he was able to entertain at his table fifty persons at one time.[93] But the day when the prelate saw obviously that the government which he represented at the Holy See required of him an attitude incompatible with his religion, he resisted nobly, prepared for any sacrifice. When called upon [92] Like Sieyès, Bernis had entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice and had been invited by his teachers to leave.

[93] Gendry, Pie VI, II, 152.

(January 5, 1791) to take the oath to the Constitution, he did so with the following restriction: "Without prejudice to what I owe to God and religion." Montmorin informed him that, unless he sent a formula of oath pure and simple, the King would not be able to let him continue his diplomatic office. He replied with a formal refusal. His letter of recall was transmitted to him almost immediately.

The government, not satisfied with this deprivation, which withdrew from the Cardinal an important salary, shortly afterward refused him the allotment to which he had a right as a resigned bishop.[94] Later, when the Minister of the Interior placed him in the category of émigrés, his furniture was inventoried and sold.[95] A pension, which ambassador Azara obtained for him from the King of Spain, was all that kept him from the direst poverty. The noble prelate with Christian dignity endured his trials, which he had clearly foreseen upon refusing the oath pure and simple. He wrote: "I am far from regretting the loss of a fortune acquired by long and useful services. I have sacrificed all to the faith of my fathers and to the honor which they were always jealous of." [96] The historian who had before his eyes Bernis' most intimate documents and who analyzed them thoroughly has written: "As Bernis accepted ruin and almost poverty, we may be sure that he would have accepted prison and the guillotine." [97]

The Provinces

In the lower grades of the hierarchy we meet with the same examples of courage. In July, 1791, some priests of Le Finistère, rather than take the oath, let themselves be imprisoned at Brest, by order of the directory of the department. Bishop [94] This allotment was due him by the terms of article 3 of the decree of July 24, 1790.

[95] Masson, Bernis, p. 504.
[96] Gendry, op. cit., II, 154.
[97] Masson, Bernis, p. 560.

Expilly was a member of this directory. Soon, when the directory of Maine-et-Loire arrogated to itself the same right of throwing the refractory into prison, the latter sought hiding on farms. But the soldiers of the National Guard tracked them down in their retreats and finally carried off 300 of them to the premises of the former minor seminary; there, deprived of everything, they had to undergo atrocious sufferings. Similar scenes were repeated at Laval, where several priests had sought refuge and, protected by the devotion of a deeply religious population, were celebrating Mass and administering the sacraments to the faithful in private houses. Domiciliary visits, threats, arrests, and fines failed to overcome their courage. But a decree of the directory of the department (June, 1792) had them imprisoned in the former monasteries of the Cordeliers and Capuchins; from there these valiant servants of the Church wrote to the Supreme Pontiff an address vibrant with the purest heroism.[98] At Le Mans, Nantes, and Luçon the priests opposed the chicanery of the local powers and the attacks of the clubs with the same courage. At Luçon a decree of the municipality (January 28, 1792) forbade all assemblies. The faithful did not suppose that the prohibition concerned them. The next Sunday 1,500 persons, men, women, and children, met in the public square and knelt piously while a Mass was being celebrated in the near-by chapel. Nothing less than the proclamation of martial law and the arrival of a considerable armed force was required to disperse the gathering.[99]

In several departments—Cantal, Rhône, Haute-Garonne, Basse-Pyrénées, and others—like scenes took place. Minister Roland, in a report to the Legislative Assembly (April 24, 1792), testified that neither violent expulsions nor imprison-

[98] This letter, printed in Barruel's Journal ecclésiastique (June, 1792), undoubtedly did not reach the Holy Father. See Picot, Mémoires, VI, 173–75, and Isidore Boullier, Mémoires ecclésiastiques concernant le clergé de Laval, pp. 103–5.

[99] See Picot, op. cit., VI, 176, who depends on a pamphlet entitled, Exposé sincère de la situation des catholiques à Luçon.

ments were able to bring the non-juring priests to submission. His conclusion was that these measures would have to be generalized and that new rigors would have to be decreed against the insubmissive ecclesiastics.[100]

These rigors did but arouse new acts of heroism. The clergy now knew what position they should take regarding the wish of the Holy Father. They knew that, deeply pained by the misfortune of Bernis, Pius VI persistently declined to receive his successor, Philip de Ségur, for the simple reason that the new ambassador had taken the Constitutional oath.[101] Furthermore, the Pontiff seized every occasion to sustain the courage of the oppressed. Writing to the Bishop of Puy (January 28, 1792), he said: "I know nothing nobler and more edifying than the conduct of nearly all the bishops of France, so that we may say that the Gallican Church never shone with more radiant light." [102] On March 24 he felicitated the Bishop of Senez, imprisoned for the faith, on having suffered with constancy "the most unworthy treatment, even prison, thus following the luminous footsteps of the most illustrious confessors of the Church." [103]

New Laws of Persecution

The Assembly was eager to follow the wishes of Roland. On April 26, Anastase Torné, Constitutional bishop of Cher, whose age of sixty-five years should have preserved him from the revolutionary delirium, asked that the Assembly forbid the wearing of religious dress except within the temples, "as being an outrage against the unity of the social contract and against equality"; for, he said, "if, after the suppression of these bodies, we should see religious garbs on the streets of our cities or [100] Nouveau compte-rendu au roi, a 32-page pamphlet. Moniteur, April 26, 1792.

[101] On this point, see Gendry, op. cit., II, 155–57.
[102] Ibid., II, 181.
[103] Ibid., II, 182.

in the country, who would not suppose he was beholding roaming ghosts?" Two days later this same Torné, seized with a sort of rage against the religion from which he had apostatized,[104] asked that they should even "forbid all obedience to vows that had been taken." [105] On May 2 the Assembly ordered, in the name of liberty, the suppression of all the confraternities and even of all associations of piety and charity. "Thus," says an annalist reporting this decree, "conspiracy was allowed in the clubs against the safety of the state and the liberty of persons, but gathering to pray to God and to solace one's brethren was forbidden." [106] The odiousness of all these measures was now surpassed, on May 27, by the passing of a decree which condemned to deportation the non-juring priests and, as it were, making them outlaws. After a confused discussion that turned almost exclusively on the choice to be made between thirty projects more or less tyrannical, the following proposal was passed:

The National Assembly, considering that the efforts in which the non-juring clergy are continually engaged to overthrow the Constitution, do not allow us to suppose in these clergy the willingness to join in a social pact; considering that the penal laws are without force against these men, who work on consciences to lead them astray; after declaring a state of emergency, decrees as follows: Art. III, When twenty active citizens of any one canton join together to demand the deportation of a nonjuring ecclesiastic, the directory of the department shall be obliged to pronounce the deportation if the view of the district of the department is in accord with the petition.[107]

[104] Torné was a former doctrinaire. On February 5, 1792, we find under the pen of Prudhomme, who was, however, an educated man, this stupidity: "Christ did not wear a religious habit. Do you want proof of it? Go and see the paintings of Jouvenet at Saint-Martin-des-Champs."

[105] Picot, op. cit., VI, 183.

[106] Ibid.

[107] According to the law of December 22, 1789, the members of the department and district directories were chosen by election in two steps, by secret ballot and by a majority of votes. The law of June 27, 1792, was surpassed in rigor by the law of August 26 of the same year.

No voice arose, either from the benches of the Girondists, who pretended to defend against the Jacobins the cause of moderation and liberty, or from the Constitutional bishops, or from the lawyers, to protest against such a decree, which outraged both liberty and religion, which introduced anarchy in the administration of justice. A writing of Boisgelin, Observations sur le décret de déportation, points out what in this law rendered it incompatible with the principles of the French Constitution; the pious Archbishop de Lau of Arles published an address to the King, begging him not to sanction the decree. But Roland was insistent on obtaining the royal sanction.

We know the tragic sequence of the conflict that arose on this subject: the King's resistance, Roland's insolent letter, read in the open Assembly: "Sire, if this law is not put in force, the departments will be obliged, as they have already done, to substitute violent measures for it"; the dismissal of the factious minister; the excitation of the people, aroused by the clubs; the invasion of the Tuileries during the day of June 20; the Assembly's declaration that the country was in danger; the Assembly itself invaded by the Federates; the Brunswick manifesto heating men's heads; a new power rising up, dominating Paris and France, that of the insurrectionary Commune; the massacres of August 10; the King deprived of his functions on August 12 at the Commune, which interned him and his family in the Temple.

Execution of Priests

Such commotions could not but precipitate religious persecution. This persecution was about to have its terrible days, early in September, by the assassination of more than 1,600 victims, among whom were more than 200 priests;[108] but many a murder had preceded this great massacre.

[108] According to one estimate, more than 1,600 persons perished at Paris alone.

The first in date was that of Abbé Raynau, archdeacon and vicar general of Senez. Arrested at Entrevaux, near Nice, on June 6, 1792, at the very moment when he was escaping from the persecution, along with two canons of his diocese, Father Michel and Father Langin, he was showered with blows by the soldiers of the garrison, and died the same evening, after pronouncing these last words: "I pardon you all the evil you are doing me." [109] A month later, a vicar-general of Bordeaux, Jean Langoiran, and one of his companions, Louis Dupuy, beneficiary of Saint-Michel parish, were arrested by a group of armed men. The next day these priests were slain in the courtyard of the archbishop's residence, where the department administration fixed the place of its meetings.[110] On that same day a band of furious revolutionaries at Les Vans forced their way into a prison where nine refractory priests were confined. The priests were dragged to the bank of the river and, under the threat of raised swords, they were ordered to choose between the oath and death. "Death," replied a firm and solemn voice. It was that of Father Bravard, a priest of St. Sulpice, former director in the major seminary of Avignon. At this word the nine confessors of the faith fell to their knees and were horribly mutilated with blows of swords and hatchets.[111] On July 12, at Clairac in the diocese of Agen a venerable priest, Pierre de Lartigues, who generously used his large fortune in good works, was put to death by the unbridled populace after [110] On the occasion of this tragic event, Champion de Cicé, archbishop of Bordeaux, published (August 10, 1792) a touching pastoral instruction. Therein he bitterly deplores the fault he committed in affixing the royal seal to the Civil Constitution. See some passages of this instruction in Jager, Histoire de l'Eglise de France pendant la Révolution, Vol. III.

---

Of this number, 217 were ecclesiastics, divided thus: 113 at the Carmelite monastery, 76 at St. Firmin, 24 at the Abbaye, 4 at La Force, 2 elsewhere. Lenôtre (Massacres de septembre, p. 283) proposes the figure of 1,614 victims.

[109] Caron, Les confesseurs de la foi, I, 1.

[111] Mollier, Saints et pieux personnages du Vivarais (1895), p. 197; Mourret, La vénérable Marie Rivier (1898), p. 67.

he had suffered a long agony with wonderful patience.[112] Three days later at Marseilles, two Minims, Father Miratte and Father Tassy, were surprised in the retreat where they had sought refuge to exercise their holy ministry. They were summoned to take the Constitutional oath. Upon their refusal they were struck with the sword and then hanged to the two lamposts at the entrance of the city hall.[113] On August 4 at Manosque in the Basses-Alpes, a Franciscan, Father Ponthion, and three secular priests (Fathers Pochet, Vial, and Reyra) were dragged by the populace into an almond orchard and there were hanged on trees.[114] About the same period in Le Perche, Father Duportail de la Binardière was assassinated in the public square of Belesme by revolutionaries of the place, who wished to force him to take the oath; in Normandy, Father Guillaume de Saint-Martin was shot to death at Pont-Ecrepin by patriots who ordered him to renounce his religion and the pope.

During these times at Paris the efforts of the factions were particularly directed against the royalty, and the priests seem to have been forgotten. We have evidence of the murder of only one priest there, Father Chaudet, a former curé of Rouen. He was arrested, then released, and after a few days was assaulted in his house, thrown out of the window, and beaten to death in the street.[115] But the leaders of the Jacobin party had not disarmed against the priests. Soon scenes of murder would be multiplied in Paris, with circumstances more frightful than anywhere else.

On the evening of August 10, in that tragic session, the wretched Louis XVI might be seen attending in the reporters' lodge, to which he had taken refuge at the fall of the monarchy.

[112] Caron, op. cit., I, 155.
[113] Picot, Mémoires, VI, 191.
[114] Caron, op. cit., I, 25; Guillon, op. cit., under the word "Pochet."
[115] Picot, Mémoires, VI, 192; Guillon, op. cit., under the word "Chaudet."

The Legislative Assembly, under the pressure of the delegates of the Commune, passed the convoking of a National Convention and the suspension of the royal power until the Convention should pronounce upon it. By a vote of 222 out of 285, it had elected Danton as minister of justice. This choice was the crushing of the Girondist party, the complete triumph of Jacobinism.

Danton

Jacques Danton, who thus attained to the post of minister in the French government, "like a cannon ball," to use his own expression, was the son of a country attorney. The favor of the Duke of Orléans, whose agent he had perhaps been,[116] the backing of the Masonic lodges, which he had frequented at an early date,[117] and the recommendation of the most extreme clubs, where he used to make speeches, began his reputation. A real power of work, in spite of intervals of almost incredible indifference, a fierce patriotism, a strange mixture of violence and weakness, even the expression of his face, which was that of a lion and that of a bull-dog, features reflecting the brutal fire of his passions, gave this "vulgar Mirabeau," this "monster of patriotism," as he has been called, a place of his own from which he soon dominated both Vergniaud and Robespierre.

Jacobinism had found its leader; the Assembly provided him with the work for him to perform. In the session at which it elected Danton minister of justice, it declared that the decrees which had not received royal sanction would have the force of law. The principal decree that they had in mind was evidently the one aimed at the deportation of non-juring priests. The Commune of Paris, the center of the most rabid Jacobinism, which had just become aware of its might and which assumed the government of Paris, did not delay in acting.[118] On August 11 about fifty ecclesiastics, guilty of not taking the Constitutional oath, were brought before the committee of the Luxemburg section, which met in a hall of the Seminary of St. Sulpice. After a short questioning, they were taken to the former monastery of the Carmelites that would be their prison. The Carmelites themselves who lived there received orders (August 1) to disperse before October 1. The Commune advanced this date. It obliged the religious to withdraw to the inner portion of the monastery, and set apart the church and adjoining premises for the internment of the prisoners. Among the imprisoned ecclesiastics we find three bishops: Le Lau archbishop of Arles, whom we have seen taking a courageous attitude in the Assembly, and two brothers belonging to the illustrious family of the La Rochefoucauld: one was bishop of Beauvais, the other of Saintes. In the same prison was also Father Savine, superior of the seminarians of St. Sulpice, with two of his confreres.[119]

[116] Madelin, op. cit., p. 246.
[117] Ibid.

Imprisonments

On August 15 further arrests were made. Armed bands invaded the Issy seminary,[120] and the near-by house that served

[118] The Directory of Paris, suspected of moderation, was obliged to resign on July 23. The Jacobins, whose influence was all-powerful over the forty-eight sections, brought about the decision that each section should nominate one or more commissioners to help in the government of Paris. On August 9 these commissioners formed themselves into an assembly which, under the name of the Commune of Paris, assumed a position above that of the Legislative Assembly, seized the executive power, and organized the persecution and the massacres. Marat reigned supreme in the Commune. Danton, who liked neither Marat nor the Commune, both of which were a hindrance to his power, felt himself left behind; he publicly favored the Commune and Marat, became their willing accomplice, and gloried in this association with them. Cf. Madelin, op. cit., pp. 253–55, 259. On Danton, see Hilaire Belloc, Danton, 1928. [Tr.]

[119] Regarding Father Savine and his arrest, see Gosselin, Vie de M. Emery, I, 190, 285. On the community of clerics of St. Sulpice, cf. Leclercq, Les martyrs, XI, 46–48.

[120] On the invasion of the Issy seminary, see Gosselin, I, 288–94.

as a place of retirement for aged and infirm priests. The invaders did not hesitate to arrest these venerable priests and lead them, with the beating of drums, escorted by the National Guard, to the church of the Carmelites. An eyewitness, Father de la Pannonie, has left us an account of the scene: "Words cannot describe the feelings we experienced at the sight of these respectable old men. Several of them could scarcely stand up. The treatment they endured during this journey made me tremble with horror. One of them especially was prevented by his infirmities from following his cruel guides with equal step; they bruised him all over by striking him with the butts of their rifles to make him walk." [121] The next day Father Gallais, a priest of St. Sulpice and superior of the seminary of the Robertines [122] and twelve of his companions were added to the number of their confreres imprisoned in the Carmelite monastery.

The condition of the prisoners in the restricted quarters reserved for them was lamentable. They had to pass the first nights on the stone floor of the church. At the end of a few days mattresses were brought in. These were set down on the floor of the nave, one against the other. However, the doctors, fearing the consequence that might follow from the closeness of almost 200 persons in a narrow and poorly ventilated space, obtained for the prisoners permission to walk for an hour in the morning and the same in the evening in the monastery garden.

The imprisoned priests had no illusion about the lot reserved for them. Father de Cussac, a priest of St. Sulpice, had the Acts of the Martyrs brought to them. From this they made their spiritual reading. Some friends, authorized to visit them for the purpose of bringing them food, kept them acquainted with news from the outside. Thus they learned that a guillotine had been erected in the Place de Carrousel and that a military court, established August 17, every day pronounced terrible sentences, which were followed by prompt execution.[123] On August 26 the Assembly seemed to intend to save the lives of the non-juring priests, by decreeing against them the penalty of deportation. But the very ones that passed this law were not fooled by this pretended moderation. Says Michelet: "No one was in doubt about the massacre." [124] On August 28 Danton obtained authorization for domiciliary visits. These visits resulted in new imprisonments at the Abbaye, the Carmelites, and La Force. The populace milled about these prisons, with cries of death. At midnight on September 1, a commissaire, escorted by gendarmes, came and notified the prisoners of the decree of deportation passed by the Assembly and he attempted to assure them that no danger of death threatened them. But the previous evening the Commune had irrevocably determined their fate. It had instituted a committee of execution, charged with providing all the details of the bloody work that was about to be done. A significant letter issued from this committee, written to citizen Maillard. He was there directed to "dispose his band in a useful and sure manner, to take precautions so as to prevent the cries of the dying, . . . to have a provision of brooms to sweep away the blood." [125]

[121] Quoted by Jager, Histoire de l'Eglise catholique en France (ed. of 1873), XIX, 512.

[122] This seminary took its name from one of its superiors, Father Robert. See Faillon, Vie de M. Olier, III, 100, and Gosselin, I, 58. On the arrest of Father Gallais, cf. I, 295–98.

The Taking of Verdun

In spite of the guarded secret of these preparations, most of the prisoners had not changed their conviction that they were soon to be put to death. The successive taking of Longwy and Verdun stirred up the populace. The Legislative Assembly, where scarcely 260 out of 750 members were in attendance at the sessions, was aware of its political powerlessness. The Commune was now more insolent than ever. Danton, in the presence of the German invader, urgently appealed for concord. But on what ground was concord to be made? In connection with an enrollment of volunteers, that was to take place on September 2 at the Champs de Mars, Danton declared: "The tocsin that is about to be rung is not a signal of alarm: it is the charge upon the enemies of the country. To overcome them we have need of audacity, and still audacity."

[123] Picot, op. cit., VI, 213; Madelin, op. cit., p. 253.

[124] Michelet, Histoire de la Révolution, IV, 121.

[125] Senar, Relations puisées dans les cartons des comités de salut publique et de sûreté générale, chap. 7; Guillon, Les martyrs de la foi, I, 169.

What was the real import of these last words? Men could recall that recently in the Jacobin club Danton had exclaimed: "Let the Confederates not separate before the traitors have been punished." [126] On August 31, at the vigilance committee of the Assembly, he said: "We cannot remain exposed to the fire of the enemy and to that of the royalists. . . . We must put fear into the hearts of the royalists. . . . Yes, fill them with fear." And a gesture of a death stroke completed his thought. So, when (September 1) Letourneur tried to reassure the prisoners by giving them a false glimpse of the possibility of liberation, one of them (Tessier) replied: "No, my son, we shall not go forth from here." [127] As we learn from the account of an eyewitness, "soon someone came to ask the old men to what place they wished to be taken upon leaving the Carmelite monastery. Everyone went to confession. The question was discussed whether they could offer to take the oath in the event that such an act might lead to their being released, or to accept it if it were proposed to them. It was decided that they would have to refuse it." [128] The executioners could come; the martyrs were ready.

[126] Journal des Jacobins, no. 201.

[127] Souvenirs inédits de M. Letourneur, quoted by Alexander Sorel, Le Couvent des Carmes, p. 78.

The September Massacres

At noon on September 2 the alarm cannon at the Pont Neuf thundered: a large black flag was raised on the city hall. According to the announcement, all this had for its purpose to arouse some legions of heroes against the enemy; what the signal actually did was especially to set in motion a band of assassins against the prisoners of the Commune.

The number of men in this band has been exactly computed; they were not more than 150.[129] But for six days they terrorized Paris and governed as masters. At their head was a young man twenty-nine years old, married three months before, Stanislas Maillard by name. Presently he received a confidential mission from the Commune. He was the son of a merchant of Gournay, and worked as receptionist clerk in the office of his brother, Thomas Maillard. Tall, thin, elegant in his dress, a good talker, fond of appearing and orating, he was to be seen in the first ranks of the agitators in most of the revolutionary manifestations. The Moniteur listed him among the vanquishers of the Bastille; on October 5 he placed himself at the head of the Parisian women and returned in a carriage of the court to receive the compliments of the members of the municipality. Maillard was cruel by pose, as Danton was by passion, Robespierre by cold logic, and Carrier by bestial instinct. In the massacre at the Carmelites, was he the knowing agent of Marat and of the Commune? The collection of testimonies and documents scarcely admit of any doubt about this fact. The role of secret emissary was that of his whole life. His existence is full of suspicious dealings and dubious missions. A striking fact is that, continually regarded with jealousy by his accomplices, denounced by his enemies, several times imprisoned, Maillard always found powerful protectors to defend him or to release him.[130] Though weakened and spitting blood, he is seen, even to the time of his death (1794), spying, examining, and directing a band of spies enrolled by him and paid by the Surété générale,[131] engaged in hunting "the game of the guillotine."

[128] Report of Abbé Montifleury (archives du Séminaire de Saint-Sulpice, Papiers Emery, III, 3).

[129] G. Lenôtre, Les massacres de septembre (1907), p. 9.

Massacres at the Abbaye

Most of the arrested priests had been directed either to the prison of the abbaye of Saint-Germain or to the prison of the Carmelite monastery. The abbey of Saint-Germain then consisted of immense structures, chapels, cloisters, assembly halls, cellars, and kitchens, all opening on a courtyard almost square in shape, at the side of the church of Saint-Germain-des-Pres.[132]

About two hours had passed since the ringing of the tocsin. A band of cutthroats, with Maillard at its head, had gathered in the courtyard of the monastery, awaiting the arrival of the prisoners whom Billaud-Varenne had promised to bring there.

Regarding the scenes of savagery that took place that evening, we possess two important documents, independent of each other, each of them coming from an eyewitness of the events: the report of Méhée de Latouche, secretary of the Commune, and that of Father Sicard, the renowned teacher of the deaf-mutes, saved from the massacre by the courage of a citizen, who recalled this priest's services to humanity.

The time was about half-past two.[133] Father Sicard writes:

[130] Ibid., p. 331.

[131] Cf. ibid.

[132] Some important fragments and a complete façade remain. These can be seen by anyone entering into the court of the house which bears the number 14 bis of rue de l'Abbaye.

[133] Méhée, in Lenôtre, op. cit., p. 177.

We arrived at the Abbaye. The courtyard was filled with an immense throng.[134] Our carriages were at once surrounded; one of our comrades thought he could escape; he opened the door of the carriage, jumped into the midst of the crowd, and was at once butchered. A second person made a like attempt; he squeezed his way through the crowd and proceeded to escape; but the assassins fell upon this new victim, and blood flowed again. A third met the same fate. The carriage went ahead toward the hall of the committee; a fourth prisoner then sought to escape; he received a stroke with a sword . . . With the same rage the murderers turned on the second carriage.[135]

Says Méhée:

I saw blood gushing in streams. "We must kill them all, they are knaves," shouted the crowd. The fourth carriage contained only corpses. . . . The bodies of the dead were thrown into the courtyard. The twelve prisoners who were still alive stepped out of the carriages to enter the hall of the civil committee; two of them were slain as soon as they set foot on the ground. The committee did not have the time to proceed even to the briefest examination. A multitude armed with knives and swords poured in, snatched the prisoners and slaughtered them. . . . It was now five o'clock in the evening. Billaud-Varenne, the substitute for the procurator of the Commune, arrived. He stepped over the dead bodies, made a short harangue to the people, ending thus: "People, you are slaying your enemies; you do your duty." [136]

Twenty-one prisoners thus perished upon arriving in the courtyard of the Abbaye. Of a sudden, at the side of Billaud-Varenne, a voice called out, the voice of Maillard: "Nothing more is left to be done here. Let us go to the Carmelites." [137]

[134] According to the documents published by Granier de Cassagnac in his Histoire des massacres de septembre, it was supposed until recent years that the massacre took place on the very threshold of the prison. Father Bridier's publication in 1896 of the Mémoires de M. de Salamon, internuncio, who was likewise a witness of the assassinations, has proved that they took place in the heart of the Abbaye, in the court of the garden, under the windows of the guest house. See the plan in Lenôtre, pp. 168.

[135] Relation de l'abbé Sicard, quoted by Leclercq, Les martyrs, XI, 70.

[136] Relation de Méhée de Latouche, quoted by Lenôtre, pp. 178–82.

[137] Méhée, op. cit., cf. Lenôtre, p. 182.

The Massacres at the Carmelite Monastery

At the Carmelites, after noon, the guards had been relieved. The new guards were men of sinister appearance, wearing the red cap and armed with pikes. At two o'clock the commissaire of the committee of the section had ordered the prisoners to go to the garden for their daily walk. Even the aged and the sick were forced to go out. We have the following report from one of these prisoners. He says: "We withdrew to the far end of the garden, behind a hedge; others sought refuge in a little oratory situated in a corner of the garden, where they began to recite their Vespers." [138] Suddenly cries were heard from rue Vaugirard. "Now, Monseigneur," cried out Father de la Pannonie, turning to Archbishop du Lau of Arles, "I believe they are going to assassinate us." To this the Archbishop replied: "My dear Father, if it is the moment of our sacrifice, let us thank God that we can offer Him our blood for so fine a cause."

The prisoners were not mistaken. A few moments before, in the church of St. Sulpice, transformed into the assembly hall of the Luxemburg section, a wine merchant, Louis Pirère, after leaping into the pulpit, which thus became his rostrum, there declared that he would not budge so long as they had not yet freed themselves of the prisoners and especially of the priests detained in the monastery of the Carmelites. Thereupon the Assembly decided "to purge the prisons by pouring out the blood of all those detained." [139] A band of raging men set out from the church in disorder and turned toward rue de Vaugirard. Upon reaching rue Cassette, this group met another band armed with swords and pikes dripping with blood. This was [139] The original of the official report of this session has been found in the archives of the palace of justice by Dom Leclercq and has been published by him for the first time in 1912 in Les martyrs, XI, 67.

[138] Relation de l'abbé Berthelet de Barbot.

Maillard and his band, who were coming from the Abbaye. The two troops merged and irrupted into the monastery of the Carmelites.

Father Berthelet wrote: "At first we saw enter in fury seven or eight young men. Each of them wore a belt carrying pistols, besides the one he held in his left hand, and at the same time, with his right hand, he brandished a sword." [140] The assassins first, with strokes of the sword, struck down Father de Salins, who was absorbed in some reading; then, wounding or killing those they met on their way, they rushed to the end of the garden, crying out: "The Archbishop of Arles! The Archbishop of Arles!" Archbishop du Lau, who was kneeling before the oratory, arose and turned toward the assailants, saying: "I am he whom you seek." A violent blow of a sword was dealt him on the forehead. A second stroke from behind opened his skull. Three other blows brought him to the ground, where he lay unconscious. Then a pike was thrust into his breast, and the assassins trampled him underfoot.[141]

While a hunt was organized in the garden by the murderers, a good number of prisoners entered the church. They took their stand before the altar, giving absolution to one another and reciting the prayers of the dying.

Meanwhile one of the leaders, on whose identity the accounts do not agree but who seems to have been Maillard himself,[142] installed himself before a little table near the door opening on the garden. He had brought to him the list of the imprisoned priests, proceeded to the calling of the prisoners, asked each one whether he persevered in refusing the oath, and, upon an affirmative answer, sent him back to the garden, where the prisoner was immediately massacred amid furious outcries, [140] Relation de l'abbé Berthelet de Barbot, quoted by Lenôtre, p. 253.

[141] Guillon, Les martyrs de la foi, III, 39.

[142] This is the opinion of Alexander Sorel, in his Le couvent des Carmes, p. 132. We note a striking similarity between the procedure used at the Carmelites and that which Maillard carried out two hours later at the Abbaye. Cf. Leclercq, p. 77.

among which could be distinguished the cry of, "Long live the nation!"

Thanks to the disorder, several managed to escape by crossing the garden and climbing over the wall of the enclosure. Almost 120 priests lost their lives in less than two hours. In the annals of Christianity the date of September 2, 1792, shines with a halo equal to that of its most glorious days. The prison of the Abbaye "has almost entirely disappeared today; but the monastery of the Carmelites, which still stands, with its church, the gloomy corridor where most were massacred, the oratory where the holy Archbishop of Arles fell, remains one of the most venerable monuments of the Church of France.

Further Massacres

These memories cannot make us forget the seventy-six priests who perished the next day at the seminary of St. Firmin, the three priests who were slaughtered in the prison of La Force,[143] and those who, on the night of September 2, met death at the Abbaye. After the massacre at the Carmelites, Maillard returned to the Abbaye and there, with a similar procedure, he organized a slaughter. Among the prisoners who were made to appear before him, Maillard found himself faced by the former minister of foreign affairs, whose wily policy had been long engaged in deceiving the vigilance of the Holy Father: this was Count de Montmorin. Says Méhée: "The ex-minister declared that he did not accept the members of the commission as his judges, that they did not hold the office of judges." In the presence of this accused man, who spoke so haughtily, Maillard exercised a cruel irony. A moment before, an agreement had been made that, "to avoid any scene of violence in the interior of the prison, the word 'death' was not to be pronounced in the presence of the condemned; merely 'To La Force' would be said.'" [144] "Since you hold that your affair does not fall under our jurisdiction," said the president, "you are going to be sent to La Force." Montmorin thought he had won his case and, in a mounting tone of contempt, he replied: "Mr. President, since you are so called, I beg you to provide me with a carriage." "You will have it," replied Maillard coldly. Montmorin went forth from the hall and was at once massacred.[145]

[143] At La Force was slain Father Jean-Baptiste Bottex. Dementhon has written a most interesting life of him. Dementhon, Vie de l'abbé J.-B. Bottex.

Scenes no less horrible occurred in the other prisons of Paris, at Le Châtelet, the Conciergerie, the Tour Saint-Bernard, the Seminary of St. Firmin, at Bicêtre, and the Salpêtrière.[146]

While the blood was thus flowing in Paris, on September 3 the Commune's committee of execution and vigilance sent to all the municipalities of France the following circular, signed, among others, by "Marat, the friend of the people"—thus he called himself in the document itself—and countersigned by the minister of justice, Danton.[147] "The Commune of Paris eagerly [144] Relation de Méhée, in Lenôtre, p. 187.

[145] Cf. Lenôtre, p. 191.

[146] Cf. Taine, Les origines, VI, 56; Mortimer-Ternaun, Histoire de la Terreur, III, 399, 592, 602–6. An informative process was undertaken in 1901 by order of Cardinal Richard for the canonization of the priests put to death for the faith during the days of September, 1792. The investigations of Bishop de Teil have resulted in the presentation of a list of 217 martyrs. See this list in Leclercq, op. cit., pp. 137. The discoveries made by Bishop de Teil in the National Archives enabled him to point out several inexactitudes that escaped the patient studies of Alexander Sorel. The learned prelate, in an interesting report (July 5, 1904) remarks that the martyrs of September appeared like a representation of ecclesiastical France. They belonged to all the ranks of the hierarchy; the secular clergy were there associated with the religious orders; Bayonne and Nancy, Brest and Lyons, Boulogne-sur-Mer and Embrun are there likewise represented. See A. C. Sabtié, Les massacres de septembre: les martyrs du clergé.

[147] Danton's responsibility in the September massacres, a responsibility denied by Aulard, Histoire générale, VIII, 152, 155, has been long studied by Seligman, in a memoir read at the session of January 27, 1912, of the Academy des sciences morales et politiques. From documents indicated by Seligman, it appears that Danton, as also Roland, at first held aloof from the affair. He took part only when he saw the Girondins threatened with being affected. His intervention with Robespierre then brought an end to the massacres, which ceased on September 6. In any event, as informs its brethren of all the departments that a party of ferocious conspirators detained in the prisons has been put to death by the people; acts of justice which seemed to them indispensable to restrain by terror the legions of traitors enclosed within its walls, at the very moment when it was about to march against the enemy: without doubt the nation will hasten to adopt this means, so useful and so necessary." [148]

Not fully satisfied with this bloody mission, the Commune had sent into the departments emissaries charged with the execution of its wishes. On September 3, Paris revolutionists arrived at Reims and there arrested four priests, who were soon massacred by the populace.[149] The next day, at Meaux, seven priests were put to death under the same circumstances.[150] On September 3 a certain Fournier, an atrocious fellow, called "the American," who had taken part in the massacres of September, decided on the execution of forty-four priests at Versailles. Among these was Bishop de Castellane of Mende who, it was said, received the confession of all the prisoners.[151] On all the roads groups of priests who, to escape from the fury of the assassins, were making their way toward the frontiers, were assaulted, maltreated, stabbed, attacked with stones or clubs, thrown into the rivers.[152]

Says Taine:

Welschinger remarked in the same session, too much insistence cannot be stressed on Danton's personal responsibility as minister of justice.

[148] Quoted by Papon, Histoire de la Révolution, VI, 277.

[149] Picot, op. cit., VI, 220.

[150] Ibid., p. 221.

[151] Ibid., p. 222.

[152] See Picot, op. cit., VI, 223. At Gacé in Normandy, four priests on their way to Le Havre were slain; Father Valframbert, a Capuchin, was put to death at Alençon, with atrocious refinements of cruelty; Father Loiseau was cast into a river and was held under water until he expired; four priests of St. Sulpice who were making their way toward the frontier were slain at Couches, near Autun; Father Cartier, vicar of St. Madeleine at Aix, was massacred at Antibes while on his way to Italy. Many other names might be added to this list. On the murder of Father Valframbert, see Piolin, L'Eglise du Mans pendant la Révolution, II, 144, and Leclercq, Les martyrs, XI, 151.

In the departments we count by hundreds the days similar to that of September 2. On all sides the same fever, the same delirium indicating the presence of the same virus; and that virus was the Jacobin dogma. Thanks to that dogma assassination clothed itself in the garb of political philosophy; the most outrageous attacks became lawful, for they were the acts of the lawful sovereign, charged with providing for the public safety.[153]

The Oath of Liberty and Equality

Two legislative acts, passed in the course of the events we have just narrated, should evidently have halted the massacre of non-juring priests. On August 10, 1792, the Legislative Assembly, with a view to suppressing mention of the king in the formula of an oath which it had been the first to violate, prescribed the taking of a new oath worded thus: "I swear to maintain with all my strength liberty and equality, or to die in their defense." The new formula not only passed over any mention of fidelity to the king, but it made no allusion whatever to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. Moreover, on August 26 the Assembly passed a law subjecting the non-juring priests to deportation. This law, by its severe provisions, aggravated the former law of deportation (May 27); but, as it carried precise penalties against a refusal to take the oath, this new law should logically have put an end to the arbitrary proceedings and penalties which the municipalities introduced regarding refractory priests. We may even suppose that many of those who voted for the August law of deportation had in view a restraint on deeds of popular fury, whose terrible outbursts might easily be foreseen. A return to pity is understandable even in the soul of a Jacobin. Men are never as good or as bad as their principles.[154]

[153] Taine, op. cit., VI, 65.

[154] During the September massacres, Danton had saved the life of Father Lhomond, his former professor; Robespierre, former pupil of Father Bérardier, snatched him

However that may be, nothing now stopped the course of the massacres, and the new oath of liberty and equality—the little oath, as it was called—had as its particular effect the provoking of painful differences and grievous discussions among the Catholics; the refusal of the oath to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy had united faithful priests into a compact and disciplined batallion; that union was now broken.

The fifteen bishops remaining in France and also a few émigré bishops, such as Boisgelin and Barral, authorized their priests to take the oath; most of the prelates residing abroad declared such an act illicit. Almost all the clergy of Paris, the members of the congregations of the Oratory, of St. Lazare, and of St. Sulpice, some houses of the Sorbonne and of Navarre, took it.[155] Father Emery, the superior of St. Sulpice, wrote: "The equality, as we understand the term, can be quite innocently promised because, 1. the clergy and the nobility have given up all their pecuniary privileges; 2. all our criminal laws make no distinction, based on diversity of rank, among various convicted persons; 3. the admission of all subjects to all offices and employments has been recognized and accorded by the King, to whom the clergy and the nobility have fully acquiesced." [156] Worthy prelates, like Bausset and La Luzerne, saw, moreover, an interest of the first order for the clergy in not appearing to be the adversary of a political liberty wisely understood, in not crediting the calumny of those who loudly proclaimed the incompatibility of Catholicism with liberty. On the other hand, some ecclesiastics, no less commendable for from death; Maillard himself, by a semblance of improvised tribunal, contributed to saving the lives of several prisoners. Lenôtre, Les massacres de septembre, p. 331. Robespierre used to give alms to the poor. Lenôtre, Vieilles maisons, II, 62. Hébert used to write Le Père Duchesne at the side of his wife, who was kneeling in prayer (ibid., II, 377), and Fourquier-Tinville wore about his neck a medal of the Blessed Virgin (ibid., II, 289). Regarding this last mentioned, see A. Dunoyer, Fouquier-Tinville.

[155] Annales catholiques, I, 466.

[156] Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, I, 273.

their intelligence and their virtue, saw in the oath of liberty and equality a formula at least captious. Every profession of faith, they said, must be interpreted in the sense intended by him who imposes it. But, if we are to interpret the words "liberty and equality" by the acts of those who apply them under the egis of the government, these words signify only a revolutionary liberty and equality, destructive of the legitimate government and the Catholic religion.

Maury, who was then living in Rome, where he had been consecrated archbishop of Nicaea and where he was in close touch with the émigrés, became the vigorous spokesman of this latter opinion. He wrote: "This oath seems to me more perfidious and impious than the first. The first was merely heretical; this one consecrates rebellion. . . . As to its perfidy, that is well proved, since this formula has seduced so many people of good will and of good minds." [157] And the fiery prelate, who later so gravely disobeyed the Holy Father, let it be known that the attitude he was attacking was perhaps prompted by a lack of courage or a lack of loyalty to the Holy See. The superior of St. Sulpice replied, with the pride of a father who could appeal to the testimony of the blood shed by his children: "Monseigneur, the living members of my Company are nearly all dispersed in different parts of Christendom and are not involved in the matter of the oath. I say 'the living members'; for thirteen have been massacred; and I have the consolation of seeing my Company, though the smallest of all, give more martyrs in this cause of the Church and of the Holy See than all the other secular companies together.[158] But some remain about me, [157] Méric, op. cit., I, 272.

[158] The Company of St. Sulpice counted, in 1791, about 500 members. From 1792 to 1794, eighteen of them poured out their blood for the faith. See Gosselin, Vie de M. Emery, II, 451. Almost all the religious communities were represented in the bloody martyrology. The Jesuits, dispersed since twenty-five years before, were present at the moment when they would have to offer their lives in the cause of God and the Church. Out of the 217 martyrs at the Carmelites on September 2, we count twenty-four Jesuits, that is, an eighth of the victims.

and we are neglecting nothing to show the Holy See our boundless attachment." [159]

Father Emery had in mind to suspend his judgment and to determine his opinion on the basis of authority; but communications with Rome, too slow and difficult, did not allow him to receive in time an effective direction from the Holy See. In these circumstances the priests of France, reduced to the necessity of taking counsel only with themselves, experienced that torment of delicate and courageous souls that would not hesitate to die in the performance of their duty, but that do not know precisely where that duty lies. Father Emery, wishing to reply to the chief objection of his adversaries, placed himself in relation with Gersonné, the reporter of the decree on the "little oath" and submitted to him the commentary he had drawn up on it. Gersonné fully approved this commentary. At length a reply from Rome arrived. It was dated October, 1792. The Pope, faithful to his prudent and patient policy, declared that, before deciding about the oath in question, he wished to know what was the exact meaning attributed to the words "liberty and equality." In the month of May, 1793, Cardinal Zelada, the Pope's minister, who was consulted by Father Emery, replied: "The Pope has made no pronouncement on the oath in question; if it is purely civic, it may be taken." In various briefs (October 5, 1793; April 1 and July 29, 1794; April 22, 1795) the Pope merely makes the same reply, with some precise details, namely: 1. that he does not pronounce a decision on the oath; 2. that he does not require any retractation by those who have taken it.[160] This waiting attitude, conformable to the general policy

[159] Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, I, 326.

[160] Dom Piolin, in his L'Eglise du Mans pendant la Révolution, II, 93, maintains that Pius VI had, "by a decision addressed to the Chambery chapter, condemned the oath of liberty and equality as formally culpable." Misermont, in an article in the Revue des études historiques (January–February, 1910), published the text of this decision and, abandoning Piolin's opinion, concludes simply that the Pope, while respecting the persons of those who have sworn, is clearly opposed to the oath itself. We cannot share this conclusion. The Pope declared merely: 1. that the oath will of Pius VI, now appears to us as the wisest that could be taken by him who had the formidable responsibility of the supreme government of the Church; but the anguish of souls, called upon to form their conscience by themselves, continued to remain painful.[161] Soon it would be renewed in connection with new oaths, but then the question will be placed on a clearer terrain, and the Holy See's reply will be a categorical condemnation.

The Convention (1792–95)

While the Catholics were greatly disturbed in conscience over these grave problems, the Legislative Assembly was succeeded by the Convention. The newly elected deputies were have to be regarded as evil "if, from the circumstances, it is found to be according to the other heretical and schismatical decrees that purposed destroying the Church"; 2. that those who have taken the oath with a doubtful conscience will have to put themselves in line with their conscience. These are the two particular solutions of cases of conscience which Father Emery undoubtedly had in mind to bring into question, for they are merely the application of the most general principles of moral theology. See St. Alphonsus Liguori, Theologia moralis, Vol. III, no. 148. On the question of the oath, see, besides the works already cited, J. Meilloc, Les serments pendant la Révolution.

---

[161] We have before us a paper that circulated among the faithful at this period. It says: "The bark of Peter is violently stirred, and the tempest spreads such a darkness that we can hardly see to guide ourselves. . . . Peter and Andrew are rowing on one side, James and John on the other; all four of them undoubtedly intend to save the bark, but they may be putting it in great peril. Where shall we find our safety? No doubt, in the middle. Let us remain between the four rowers; let us not create a schism with anyone. Let us hold to the middle, at the feet of Christ who seems to be sleeping. Let us awaken Him by our prayers. Let us cry out to Him: 'Lord, save us, we perish,' so that He may arise and command the tempest and He may restore the calm." Thus did the Catholics pray. The Freemasons did not suffer the same anxieties. In an undated address, composed on the occasion of the feast of the Federation, the Draguignan lodge thus expressed itself: "We swear, on the word of Masons, to maintain the Constitution with all our means and, if need be, to combat with the flaming sword the aristocracy, despotism, and all the tyrants of the earth. . . . In our vast republic of brethren, our ties can become the conductors of that civic electricity which ought to establish, in the machine of the world, an equilibrium of happiness." Archives nationales, C. 123, no. 398, quoted in the Revue des questions historiques, LXXXVIII (1910), 532–34.

divided into three hostile groups, suspicious, ready to devour one another: the Gironde (Girondists), the Plain, and the Mountain. Two passions, however, dominated these internal hatreds: an almost delirious patriotism, intoxicated by the recent victories in which the Republic's "volunteers in sabots" had repulsed the old armies of the European coalition; and the rage to make an end of the two secular powers, only half overcome, whose bloody debris still barred the way to the triumphant Revolution: the Church and the monarchy.

In this history of the Church, our task does not require us to relate in detail the political work of the Convention: the proclamation of the Republic (September 21, 1792); the strife between the Mountain and the Gironde; the trial and condemnation of the King; the first coalition, formed against France by William Pitt; the treason of Dumouriez; the fall of the Gironde; the uprisings in the provinces; the war, becoming the pretext for a Jacobin dictatorship; Lazare Carnot "organizing the victory," while Marat organizes the Terror; the guillotine permanently established; Marat, Hébert, and Danton put to death; the Revolution "devouring its children like Saturn"; Robespierre alone remaining unscathed and, amid the military triumphs of France, victorious beyond her borders, dreaming of founding, under the egis of the Supreme Being and of Reason, some sort of bloody Salian priesthood; the new dictator himself falling; the subsequent reaction; the "gilded Youth" gathered about Talien, drunk with pleasures as well as with vengeance; lastly, the "giant Assembly" tired and discredited, despite its important financial and administrative reforms,[162] declaring (October, 1795) its mission terminated, at the very moment when the political scene witnessed the appearance of the young general who would become master of the French Revolution, Napoleon Bonaparte.

[162] To the Convention must be credited the uniformity of weights and measures, the creation of the Institute and the Normal School, the Polytechnic School, the Central School of public works, the Conservatory of arts and trades, the National Institute (Conservatory of Music), and the Bureau of Longitudes, the final organization of the Institute of blind youth, and the opening of the Museum of the Louvre.

The policy of the Convention remain unchanged on one point, the religious persecution. One of the first concerns of the Assembly was to assure the execution of the deportation decree against the non-juring priests; the last of its acts was the proclamation of general amnesty, from which the refractory ecclesiastics were expressly excepted.

Under the Legislative Assembly the situation of the faithful priests had grown daily worse; their security became more and more endangered. Most of them, separated from their bishops who, after the example of Bishop de Juigné, had chosen to expatriate themselves, leaving their powers in the hands of vicars general; not finding in these vicars the authority, promptness, and firmness of decision which the pending difficulties required; pursued by bitterly hostile municipalities; and, in many places, given over to the mercy of the popular movements, at every moment stirred up by some impromptu agitators; many priests, among the better ones, judged that the moment had come for them to follow the counsel of the Master: "When they shall persecute you in this city, flee into another." [163] After the emigration of the nobility, that of the clergy began.

These two emigrations do not deserve the same judgment of history. The emigration of the nobility, especially that of 1789, which one lawmaker called "the emigration of pride," has been the subject of well-founded criticism. We would do them an injustice if we regarded these noble émigrés as accomplices of the foreigner. They were French after their own manner. If several of them asked Europe to intervene in the affairs of France, by way of monarchical solidarity, "these very men would have throttled the first person that spoke of paying for the intervention with a single fortress of the kingdom." [164] But when at Brussels, Turin, Mainz, and Coblenz certain wealthy lords, who smiling departed from France "until the squall should pass over," scandalized their hosts by the frivolity of their manners and the skepticism of their spirit. They deserved the severe blame which the venerable Cardinal Pacca indignantly expressed in a celebrated memorial.[165]

[163] Matth. 10:23.

Quite different was the attitude of the émigré clergy and, we must acknowledge, also of that part of the nobility which became voluntary exiles only in the last extremity, when the ruin of their châteaux and the organization of a regime of exception in their regard, had rendered their situation intolerable in France. Toward the end of 1792 the emigration of the clergy took on considerable proportions. The latest biographer of Pius VI says: "The numerous stagecoaches no longer were enough to transport the fugitives. All the roads leading from France to Spain, England, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, and especially to Italy were jammed with ecclesiastics and monks who were fleeing from prison and death." [166]

The Emigré Priests

The priests of Languedoc turned their steps toward Spain. The Catholic peninsula seemed to them to be a sure asylum. There, however, they met with many disappointments on the part of the civil authorities. Indeed, few statesmen were more opposed to the Revolution than Florida Blanca, the prime minister of Charles IV; but this opposition extended to France herself. "Florida Blanca had such a horror of the French ideas that the émigrés themselves appeared to him to be dangerous people. In July, 1791, a royal edict subjected foreigners residing in Spain to the closest and most humiliating surveillance of the police. . . . The edict was drawn up in general terms; but in reality it was directed against 13,000 Frenchmen who had become established in the peninsula." [167] Count Aranda, who succeeded Blanca at the beginning of 1792, effected an altogether opposite policy. Aranda had been known by his campaign against the Jesuits. He had lived in Paris for seven years and had introduced Freemasonry into Spain.[168] His ministry was even less favorable to the émigré priests. However, this ministry was of short duration. The too famous Godoy, who replaced Aranda in August, 1792, had a vain and vile soul with only one ambition: to hold on to the power at any price. He cynically declared that he longed to come to a good understanding with the Jacobins, provided his own security was assured.[169] Nothing good was to be expected from the initiative of such a man. But an energetic action in favor of the émigrés did not seem impossible.

[164] L. Madelin, op. cit., p. 159. Chateaubriand has strikingly set forth the case of conscience which the patriotism of the émigrés asked itself, and the replies that they gave to their doubts. See Chateaubriand, Mémoires d'outre-tombe (ed. Edmond Biré), II, 33–35; and Essai sur les Révolutions, pp. 428–34.

[165] Pacca, Œuvres, II, 261.

[166] Gendry, Pie VI, II, 195. All of chapter 30 of this work, based solely on archival documents, is devoted to this emigration of the clergy and the measures taken by Pius VI on that occasion.

A noble gentleman of Languedoc, Count Antraigues, and his worthy mother, Madame Sophie d'Antraigues, generously took up the defense of the French priests who had sought refuge in Spain. They stirred to action the Spanish ambassador to Venice and Cardinal Bernis; then, having obtained the assurance that a suggestion from His Holiness would be received with satisfaction by His Catholic Majesty,[170] they begged the Pope to intervene. Pius VI gladly acquiesced to this desire, and the King of Spain declared his readiness to accord hospitality to the French ecclesiastics, "provided they should not gather in large numbers [167] Desdevises du Dezert, in Lavisse and Rambaud, Histoire générale, VIII, 727.

[168] Ibid., p. 278.
[169] Ibid., p. 729.
[170] Archives vaticanes, Nunziat di Madrid, quoted by Gendry, op. cit., II, 196.

and that they should faithfully observe the laws of the country." [171] The welcome accorded to the proscribed priests by the Spanish clergy was admirable. Montserrat Abbey in Catalonia opened its doors wide to the persecuted. The archbishop of Toledo, Cardinal Lorenzana, and Bishop Quevedo of Orense in Galicia were conspicuous for their liberal hospitality.[172] According to one calculation, Spain received about 7,000 French priests.[173]

England received the émigré priests of Normandy, Brittany, and the border provinces. On September 16, 1792, it already counted 3,000 of them and, about the middle of the next year, almost 8,000. The general enthusiastic good will which Great Britain showed in these circumstances is one of her most beautiful titles to the gratitude of the French nation.

Moreover, beginning fifteen years earlier, the situation of Catholicism in England had improved. The preoccupations caused by the war which resulted in the independence of the United States had led the government of George III to desire no enemies on the side of the Roman Church. The two rival statesmen who contested for the power, Pitt and Fox, took the same view of this matter. Laws passed in 1775 and in 1780 gave to English Catholics reliable guaranties for their ownership of property, their worship, and their teaching. The Catholics of Ireland and Scotland were in the way of obtaining, with the same guaranties, access to all judicial careers and to almost all the honors previously reserved to the Protestants. Yet the attitude of public opinion toward the French Revolution was wavering. No one is unaware of the deep influence exercised by the English philosophers on the men who had just given a new constitution to France, and many gloried in that influence.

[171] Dispatch of the Spanish nuncio; cf. Ibid., p. 197.

[172] See the testimony of Father Nicard in L'ami de la religion (1814), Vol. II. Cf. Barruel, Histoire du clergé, p. 342.

[173] This is the figure given by Father Contrasty in his interesting study, Le clergé français exilé en Espagne (1792–1802), published in 1910.

Mackintosh in his Vindiciae gallicae, composed in 1791, praised the work of the Constituent Assembly; Thomas Paine, more radical, in his Rights of Man, made of 1791 and 1792 a parallel between the two revolutions, the English and the French; Fox, the adversary of the house of Bourbon, declared himself a friend of the new France. Conformable to these ideas, the "Society of the Revolution" called for the suppression of the tithes; the "Society for the Development of Constitutional Knowledge" undertook a campaign for universal suffrage; the "Corresponding Societies," with their center in London, had continual relations with the clubs of Paris and inclined toward the Republic.[174] But, on the other hand, the excesses of the Revolution alarmed the reflecting and industrious people of Great Britain. From the end of 1790 one of its most powerful thinkers, Edmund Burke, was the eloquent spokesman of this apprehension in his Reflections on the French Revolution, in which he pointed unerringly, as the end of an unexampled anarchy, to the most absolute despotism which has ever appeared under heaven.[175] Pitt, the eminent statesman, whose clear, practical, and always calm mind seemed to embody the best qualities of the Anglo-Saxon race, openly declared himself against Jacobinism. Yet on one point the liberalism of Fox, the wisdom of Burke, and the conservative policy of Pitt met: a breath of sincere humaneness animated these men, as well as the whole British nation, whose illustrious representatives they were, and as it did also the King, whom they purposed serving with different opinions; and this sentiment made them sympathetic to the misfortunes of the French émigrés.

A first group of proscribed priests set foot on the shores of England in August, 1791.[176] They received a hearty welcome.

[174] Sayous in Histoire générale, VIII, 644.

[175] See also his Letters on a Regicide Peace. [Tr.]

[176] The Bishop of Saint-Pol-de-Léon, harassed by the government police, fled to England in 1791 and settled in London. There he remained almost alone until

We let one of these exiles comment on the event. Says Father Barruel:

A person must have been three years in France amid the Constitutionalists, Girondists, Maratists, and Jacobins of all sorts, to experience fully how much restfulness and delight that first welcome of the English brought to each of these priests. It was like the sweet awakening of the soul which, after being long tormented with the image of monsters and furies, comes out of that frightful dream and finds about it only reassuring and peaceful objects. I know this from my own experience and from that of my brethren deported along with me.[177]

Bishop Lamarche of Saint-Pol-de-Léon, who was living in London since the previous year, sought to obtain help for his unfortunate compatriots. Wilmot, a member of Parliament, placed himself at the head of a committee of initiative that made an appeal to the public. Edmund Burke eagerly espoused the cause of the proscribed; he even drew up an address, that was inserted in all the newspapers and that brought in more than 84,000 francs. The next year Parliament voted a sum of money intended for the succor of the émigré priests and nobles; this appropriation was repeated every year, and, according to one calculation, up to 1806 a total of 42,620,000 francs, had been distributed.[178] Father Carron, a holy priest of Rennes whose devotedness to the popular classes had not saved him from the persecution of the Jacobins, in 1792 founded in Jersey two schools for the instruction of the émigré youth, a chapel for the exercise of Catholic worship, pious associations, and a library for the priests. Four years later at London, aided by the Bishop of Saint-Pol-de-Léon and sustained by the personal benevolence of King George III, he was able to extend his good works.

August, 1792. Father de Lubersac, Journal historique et religieux de l'émigration et de la déportation du clergé de France en Angleterre, p. 1.

[177] Barruel, Histoire du clergé pendant la Révolution française, p. 349.

[178] Picot, VI, 241. For the details, see Lubersac, Journal de l'émigration, pp. 16–30; Barruel, op. cit., pp. 351–55.

Establishments of benevolence and chapels were erected, thanks to him, in several quarters of London,[179] and Chateaubriand is the genuine and eloquent echo of the general opinion of his time, when he calls Father Charron "the Francis of Paula of the exile, whose renown, revealed by the afflicted, penetrated even through the fame of Napoleon." [180] England became as it were the heart of the emigration. London received the larger part of the men whose talent was an honor to France.[181] At London, Archbishop Boisgelin of Aix published his metrical translation of the Psalter, Father Barruel his Histoire du clergé de France pendant la Révolution and his Mémoires sur le jacobinisme, Delille his poem, La pitié, and Chateaubriand began his Essai historique sur les révolutions.[182] The French priests did not limit their activity to their ministry in favor of their fellow countrymen. We quote the following tribute of Father Madaune.

Our confessors of the faith spread into the different counties. Some became tutors in rich families; others opened schools; some founded missions. Of these missions the district of London alone, including the present dioceses of Westminster and Southwark, counted thirty. The most important were at Chelsea, Kennington, and Hommersmith. High Mass became a general practice in the London chapels. English and Irish priests profited from the help brought by these foreigners to engage more actively in the care of their scattered flocks. At the same time many of the anti-Catholic prejudices disappeared from the spirit of the Protestant people when they found themselves in contact with the life and the example of these confessors of the faith, as pious as they were resigned. We may well believe that the admirable British [179] One of the chapels then erected in London was founded by Francis Emmanuel Bourret, a priest of St. Sulpice, under the title of Our Lady of the Annunciation. See Lubersac, op. cit., p. 46.

[180] Chateaubriand, Mémoires d'outre-tombe, I, 178. On Father Charron, see ibid.

[181] Antonin de Saint-Gervais, Histoire des émigrés français, II, 9, 13.

[182] Chateaubriand, op. cit., II, 190. Father de Lubersac in his Journal de l'émigration has a long chapter entitled, "Liste des principaux ecclésiastiques français qui, pendant leur émigration à Londres, ont publié des ouvrages sur la religion ou qui y ont quelque rapport; courtes analyses de ces ouvrages," pp. 188–271.

charity was pleasing to Him who promised a reward for a cup of water given in His name and that, from that hour, England rewon her rights to religious truth.[183]

The Emigrés in Germany

Pius VI, upon learning of the charitable welcome given by the English nation to the persecuted priests, at once sent to King George III a brief of felicitations.[184] Soon his attention was especially drawn to the situation of the émigré priests in Germany.

In Germany the reaction to the revolutionary movement divided the people of the country. Nowhere perhaps had the principles of the Revolution aroused a greater sympathy among intellectual men; but also nowhere did the progress of the Revolution provoke a firmer opposition among statesmen. Kant recognized in the Declaration of the Rights of Man the principles of right, autonomy, and liberty, which he had made the basis of his moral system. With still warmer passion, Fichte had taken up the defense of Jacobinism itself.[185] The "friends of lights," continuing Lessing's work, spread the ideas of liberty and of political renovation. A group of young poets, taking their inspiration from Klopstock,[186] celebrated, in the French Revolution, the rationalist and mystical character of its inspiration. Those who, gathered about Jacobi, were reacting by the cult of sentiment against the followers of an excessively dry intellectualism, united with them in admiration of the new ideas, and the Illuminati of Weishaupt's school surpassed all [183] Madaune, La Renaissance du catholicisme en Angleterre, p. 7.

[184] Gendry, Pie VI, II, 197. Gendry quotes several other briefs sent to Bishop Lamarche, Edmund Burke, Andrew Stuart, and others.

[185] In 1793 Fichte published the Zurückforderung der Denkfreiheit von den Fürsten Europas; in 1794, his Beiträge zur Berichtigung der Urtheile des Publicums über die französische Revolution.

[186] Klopstock, the author of the Messiade, had glorified in verse the States General of France with the same pen that had just celebrated the advent of Christ.

in the admiration they professed for the new principles.[187]

All the currents of German thought seemed to merge in the glorification of the Revolution and in its work; but all the political interests appeared to be menaced by it. In fact, as Cardinal Pacca, then nuncio at Cologne, remarks in his Memoirs, "the first objects that infuriated the French philosophers and revolutionists were the aristocracy, the feudal system, the clergy's power and wealth. But all that was in full vigor in Germany, a country essentially aristocratic and feudal, where the clergy was sovereign over a great part of the country." [188] Furthermore, many of the German nobility had considerable possessions in Alsace, in Lorraine, and in Burgundy. The decrees passed on the night of August 4 had injured these lords in their feudal rights. The Emperor of Germany and the King of Prussia, at the instigation of the deputies of the Upper Rhine district, intervened with Louis XVI to ask of him the re-establishment of the former state of affairs. Besides, the statesmen of Germany no longer were blind to the significance of the French Revolution. Cardinal Pacca reports two statements by Kaunitz, minister of the court of Austria, and by Hertzberg, minister of the court of Prussia. The former was asked how long the movement begun in France would last. "A long time, perhaps without end," answered the aged minister. Count Hertzberg used to repeat to anyone willing to listen: "The Revolution will make the tour of Europe." [189]

The arrival of the first émigrés did but increase the confusion of ideas and feelings in the midst of which Germany was struggling. The historian of the French émigrés does not hesi-

[187] Albert Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, I, 175, 177–81; G. Blondel in Histoire générale, VIII, 715–22. On the movement of political and social philosophy in Germany of that period, see Paul Janet, Histoire de la science politique dans ses rapports avec la morale (2nd ed.), II, 620–84; Harald Höffding, History of Modern Philosophy.

[188] Pacca, Relation sur sa nonciature de Cologne in his Œuvres complètes (French tr., 1845), II, 250.

[189] Pacca, op. cit., II, 250.

tate to acknowledge that the nobility "displayed too much luxury at Coblenz," that they had not "the grave and austere tone suitable to proscribed men," and "that such an attitude was able to lead to that principle of indifference of which the sovereigns had given many proofs." [190] Cardinal Pacca says without evasion:

> The close relations I had with the émigré nobles almost made me lose hope of seeing an end to the evils that desolate France. Most of these nobles, especially the great lords of the court, practice no act of religion; furthermore, they publicly affect a complete indifference for all religious principle. The city of Coblenz has, so to speak, become a new Versailles; the same cabals prevailed, the same court intrigues, the same dissoluteness, without concern for the public. These examples gravely scandalized the Germans and did much harm to the Catholic religion in Germany.[191]

The documents recently published by Vaissière fully confirm this appraisal by the papal nuncio.[192] The conduct of some émigré bishops was unfortunately subject to similar criticism. Says Pacca: "It is known that the great majority of the French bishops were an edification for all Europe; but I must confess with bitterness that the conduct of a small number of them was far from corresponding to the high opinion which had been entertained of them. Some pious ladies of Cologne, who were expecting to venerate in them Hilarys and Eusebiuses, were astonished at seeing their uncanonical manner of dress and the frivolity of their conversations in the world of high society." [193] The lower clergy saved the honor of the Church of France. Says Pacca: "The priests belonged mostly to the venerable class of curés. They maintained a conduct truly edifying and fully justified the good repute which had preceded them." [194]

[190] Antonin de Saint-Gervais, Histoire des émigrés français, I, 112.
[191] Pacca, Œuvres complètes, II, 262.
[192] P. de Vaissière, Lettres d'aristocrates (1907).
[193] Pacca, op. cit., p. 261.
[194] Ibid.

Bishops and priests had received a generous hospitality in Germany, both from the princes and from the people. But the invasion of Savoy in September, 1792, by General Montesquiou, and that of Belgium in November by Dumouriez drove into Germany a still greater number of fugitive priests. New efforts and sacrifices became necessary. On September 21, 1792, after the invasion of Savoy, Pius VI wrote a brief to the entire clergy of Germany, recommending to their charity the persecuted priests of France.[195] The German people responded to this appeal in a noble manner. Thanks to the zeal of Cardinal Caprara, nuncio at Vienna, several Austrian monasteries opened their doors to the unfortunate exiles. Relief funds were organized and associations were founded to provide help for their needs. The city of Munster and its bishop, Maximilian, elector of Cologne, were particularly outstanding by their zeal and generosity.[196] Some nuns exiled from France were placed in various houses and by their virtues edified the persons who gave them hospitality.

The Swiss cantons showed themselves worthy of their old renown for hospitality. As Barruel says:

> The Swiss could not offer the same help as the opulent nations; but they had the heart of benevolent people. At sight of these homeless priests they sheltered them under their rustic roofs. The peasants went out to wait for them along the highways to offer them lodging. . . . A just gratitude then inspired in these priests the desire to make themselves useful to these patriarchal families. They gave lessons to the children. Some of them even helped in domestic labors. Father Dubois, professor in the Orléans college, writes: "I have seen several of these priests mowing hay with as much assiduity as the peasants who had received them in hospitality." [197]

[195] Gendry, II, 199.

[196] Picot, VI, 237, according to a manuscript memoir of Father de Sagey, vicar general of Mans, an eyewitness of the facts related by him.

[197] Barruel, Histoire du clergé pendant la Révolution française, pp. 343, 345.

The Holy Father sent (April 20, 1795) the avoyer and the council of the canton of Fribourg a brief of felicitation praising the charity of all Switzerland.

The Emigré Priests in Italy

From the southeast part of France more than 3,000 priests took the road to Italy. As in Spain, England, Germany, and Switzerland,[198] the austere life of most of these priests and the example of their virtues gave edification to the people. To a considerable extent this edification compensated for the scandals given to the foreigner by the writings of the French philosophers and by a large number of the émigré lords. In all Europe the French clergy, providentially scattered by the storm, were preparing, in suffering and humiliation, for the Catholic revival that would follow the Revolution.

The propagation of the revolutionary ideas had found in Italy both great obstacles and earnest accomplices. The obstacles came not only from the government and the privileged classes of the peninsula, who were not less mistrustful of the new ideas than were those of the great states, but also the common people. These found themselves more bound to the life of the local aristocracy, less weighed down by taxes, more inclined perhaps than people elsewhere to prefer to the abstract freedom preached by the Revolution the concrete and tangible freedom which their local rulers granted them. They valued the ease which the oligarchies of Venice and Genoa and the paternal administration of the papal court procured for them. A favorable reception of the revolutionary ideas was to be found in the survival of that republican spirit which had agitated Italy of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, and in the excessive individualist temperament referred to by Tasso when he wrote:

[198] A certain number of priests took refuge also in Belgium, Holland, and Russia.

Alla virtu latina
O nulla manca, o sol la disciplina.[199]

The same spirit was likewise met with in the emotionalism which may be explained by the climate, and especially in that "fondness for conspiracies, the habit of secret societies," [200] which were then being perpetuated at Naples, Venice, Milan, and Rome, in the lodges of the Freemasons and the Illuminati.[201] However, in the Italian people habits of a sincere and deep faith persisted.

The crimes of the Convention divided the various currents that were mingled in Italy. The princes, one after the other, entered the coalition that was formed against the French Revolution; the wild enthusiasts and the Freemasons organized into clubs, which maintained continual relations with the Committee of Public Safety.[202] Persons of deep faith were moved to pity at seeing the French priests, arriving daily in larger numbers, who, to follow their conscience, left their own country and resigned themselves to beg their daily bread from the charity of their brethren. Cardinal Costa, archbishop of Turin, in a pastoral letter (October 5, 1792) recommended these exiles to the charity of his faithful. The other prelates followed this example. Chapels, houses of hospitality, and provisions of clothing were placed at the disposal of the unfortunate fugitives, who lacked everything. The nobility and rich persons were admirable in their devotion.[203]

The influx of the French priests into Italy, principally into [199] During a journey in Italy, Kant complained of not finding the French spirit of sociability and society. Cf. A. Fouillée, Esquisse psychologique des peuples européens (1903), p. 93. The Italian historian Ferrero says: "A single Italian is worth more than a German, but four Germans together are worth more than twelve Italians" (L'Europa giovane, p. 376).

[200] Fouillée, op. cit., p. 89.

[201] C. Cantu, Gli eretici in Italia.

[202] Pingaud in Histoire générale, VIII, 762.

[203] For details, see Auribeau, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la persécution (1794), Part IV.

the Papal States, suggested to Pius VI the thought of creating "the pious work of French hospitality." In fact, this work existed from the very beginning of the emigration; but it was fully organized only at the end of September, 1792. Its president was the Secretary of State, who was admirably seconded by Monsignor Caleppi, former auditor of the nunciature at Vienna.[204] The émigrés were distributed in four large cities: Bologna, Ferrara, Perugia, and Viterbo. On October 10, 20, and 30, 1792, circular letters were sent out by the Secretary of State to all the monasteries of Italy, recommending the French priests to them. To maintain discipline among the numerous émigrés, two important regulations were published by the Pope: one on January 26, 1793, the other on January 25, 1794.[205] Twenty-four exiled prelates were gathered about the Pope. Among them was to be seen Philippe Casone, count of Villeneuve, vice-legate of Avignon, whom the Revolution had forced to flee successively from Avignon to Carpentras, from Carpentras to Chambery, from Chambery to Rome; Archbishop Giovio of Avignon, who had experienced almost the same vicissitudes; the bishops of Sisteron, of Vaison, and of Carpentras. This last, who had come on foot from Savoy to Rome (October, 1792), had been preceded by one of his diocesans, Father Jean Siffrein Maury, the mighty orator whose eloquence had held its own in the face of that of Mirabeau. The Pope, wishing to recompense the services rendered to the Catholic cause by this courageous priest, made him titular archbishop of Nicaea. Maury merited the gratitude of the Church. In difficult times his unruffled composure, the vivacity of his repartees, and the flexibility of his logic, had, in the face of the revolutionists, made him a formidable champion. But the greatness of his talent was not equaled by nobility of character.

[204] Gendry, II, 198.
[205] Cf. ibid., II, 200 ff.

The new prelate in 1792, in the name of the Pope, performed some useful missions;[206] but he shared too intimately the grudges of the lay émigrés, intervened too haughtily in the question of the oath, and finally compelled the Pope to suspend him from his functions of bishop. A greater figure was that of François d'Aviau, archbishop of Vienne, who, driven from his diocese by the persecution, reached Rome, after various wanderings, at the beginning of 1794. Pius VI valued the holy prelate, who in 1795 directed from Rome the three dioceses of Vienne, Viviers, and Die. In 1797, disguised as a peasant, he evangelized, at peril of his life, the mountains of Vivarais and Forez. Finally, in the archiepiscopal see of Bordeaux, he gave the example of the loftiest virtues.[207] Like this pious bishop, most of the émigré ecclesiastics at Rome there showed a new zeal for the spread of the gospel. In times of persecution as in those of prosperity, the Eternal City always showed itself the center and head of the Catholic Church.

The emigration extended outside the limits of Europe, reaching beyond the ocean to America; in the New World, as in the Old, it sowed the seed of future harvests.

The Emigré Priests in America

The American Revolution, although starting with a Declaration of Rights similar, from the political point of view, to that which the French Revolution adopted later, did not have the same antireligious character. The first amendment of the American Constitution forbids Congress to prohibit the free exercise of religion. The appointment (1789) of Bishop Carroll, a personal friend of Washington, to the see of Baltimore, did more than found the Catholic hierarchy in the United States; it appeared to all as a pledge of fruitful peace between the Church and the state. But, in the vast extent of the apostolate which then opened out, the needed apostolic workers were lacking. The number of Catholics scattered in the different states of the Union has been estimated at 24,000; and the clergy amounted to only twenty-two priests.[208] A college founded by the Jesuits at Georgetown in 1786 was the only institution which the Church possessed; it had neither parish schools properly so called, nor girls' boarding schools, nor seminaries, nor hospitals, nor charitable institutions.[209]

[206] Gendry, II, 206.

[207] Lyofnet, Vie de Mgr d'Aviau.

But in 1791 Father Emery, the superior of St. Sulpice, alarmed at the progress of the Revolution and inspired by the spirit of the venerable founder of his Company, Father Olier, resolved to send some priests of his Congregation to that foreign and free land. These new missioners devoted themselves in a special manner to the formation of a native clergy, destined to spread amid the Protestants and the Indian tribes the love of the Catholic Church. Upon accomplishing this work, they would return to a freed and peaceful France, there to resume the direction of seminaries and to raise up the Church again from its ruins.[210]

No proposal could have been more welcome to Bishop Carroll of Baltimore, who joyfully accepted Father Emery's offer. On April 8, 1791, four Sulpicians (Fathers Nagot, Levadoux, Tessier, and Garnier), accompanied by five seminarians, embarked at Saint-Malo on a ship that was chartered for them. A few laymen were permitted to join them. Among these was Vicomte Chateaubriand, who in the introduction of his Voyage en Amérique and in his Mémoires d'outre-tombe, has left us a brilliant account of this voyage.[211]

[208] A. Guasco in Missions catholiques, I, 165.

[209] G. André in Dictionnaire de théologie (Vacant), under the word "Amérique," I, 1054. Guasco (loc. cit.) also mentions a convent of Carmelites.

[210] Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, I, 104.

[211] Biré ed., I, 310. Another account of this voyage, drawn up by Father Mondésir, one of Father Nagot's companions, and preserved among the manuscripts of the

On July 10, 1791, the little group of Sulpicians landed at Baltimore. Other priests, driven from Santo Domingo by the bloody insurrection of the Negroes, soon joined them. In short, from 1791 to 1799, twenty-seven French missioners, twelve of them Sulpicians, took their place among the clergy of the United States. Of these priests six became bishops: Flaget at Bardstown, then at Louisville; Cheverus at Boston; Dubourg at New Orleans; Maréchal at Baltimore; Dubois at New York; David, as coadjutor, at Bardstown and at Louisville. Of Bishop Flaget, whose life and vigor were prolonged beyond the common limits, it was said that, in his apostolic journeys, he marked an episcopal see by each of his principal stops.[212] Under the direction of such valiant bishops, the émigré priests performed wonders. Stephen Theodore Badin founded the mission of Kentucky; his brother Vincent that of Michigan, among the savage tribes of the Algonquins, the Ottawas, and the Sioux. Gabriel Richard, sent to Detroit, there preached the faith over a district vaster than France and Spain; he was later elected a representative to Congress.[213] The young Catholic centers of the United States began the course of their brilliant destinies. Once more God manifested the fruitful vitality of His Church.

The first apostles of Greece and Rome were victims of Jewish persecution. The early spread of the gospel among the barbarians had been owing to the bishops who were proscribed by the Roman Empire. The conquests of St. Francis Xavier in Asia had closely followed in the sixteenth century the ravages of Protestantism in Europe. So too, the end of the eighteenth century, which witnessed the efforts of impiety to destroy the Church in the European nations, saw the birth of a new Church St. Sulpice Seminary, has been published by Victor Giraud in his Nouvelles études sur Chateaubriand (1912), pp. 156–74.

[212] G. Moreau, Les prêtres français émigrés aux Etats-Unis (1856), pp. 81–87.

[213] On Gabriel Richard, a Sulpician, born at Saintes in 1767, of Francis Richard and of Marie Geneviève Bossuet, see Bertrand, Bibliotheque sulpicienne, II, 107. The city of Detroit has erected a statue to Gabriel Richard, as one of the most eminent men of the state of Michigan.

beyond the Ocean; and France, the heart of the revolutionary agitation, prepared the cradle of this new birth.

Fresh Outbreak of Revolutionary Persecution

The news he received from the young Church of America cheered the heart of the Supreme Pontiff. But two tragic events deeply afflicted him. We refer to the murder of the French agent at Rome, Bassville (January 13, 1793), and the execution of King Louis XVI at Paris (January 21). The former of these events let loose new hatreds against the papacy. The death of Louis XVI, by becoming the pretext for a revival of the foreign war, became the starting point of a more bloody, general, and methodically organized persecution, one that was more terrible than what had been suffered up to then: for the priests, for the religious, for all the peaceful citizens of France, it was the Terror.

Since the withdrawal of Bernis and the Pope's refusal to receive Count de Ségur,[214] the diplomatic relations were broken between the Holy See and France. But neither the Legislative Assembly nor the Convention was resigned to remain apart from the important movement of relations and ideas that was centered in Rome. Not only did the clubs of Paris maintain about the Holy See emissaries charged with exercising a surveillance over the so-called plots of the counterrevolution; but, when the Pope decided to proceed with rigor against the agitators, the French minister at Naples, Mackau, determined to intervene to protect them.[215] This Mackau, an intriguing and ambitious person, desirous of succeeding Bernis at Rome, was seconded, after August 12, 1792, by a no less disturbing secretary, whom the favor of Lebrun, the minister of foreign affairs, [214] Gendry, II, 156. The memoir sent by the Pope to all the nuncios on this subject is dated May 29, 1791.

[215] For instance, in the affair of Ratter and Chinard, see Gendry, II, 222. Mackau had been sent to Naples by Dumouriez as minister plenipotentiary on April 30, 1792.

had raised to that post. The name of this son of an Abbeville dyer, was Nicholas Jean Hugon, but he was more commonly known as Bassville. He was said to have been a deacon, secularized since the Revolution.[216]

On November 13, 1792, Bassville arrived in Rome, installed himself there, and presented himself to the Secretary of State as a simple traveler. He soon assumed the attitude of an accredited diplomat, seized upon every circumstance to take the defense of the French nationals, gave banquets to his countrymen, organized investigations, informed minister Lebrun of the military forces at the disposal of the Papal States. The revolutionary press then clamored for the invasion of Rome and the deportation of the Pope.[217] Bassville boasted of obtaining from the Secretary of State, who feared him, whatever he wished. In the month of December he installed himself with his wife and child in the palace of the Academy of France.

Bassville had not reached the term of his insolences. A circular issued by Monge, minister of the navy, dated November 28, 1792, directed all consuls to replace, over their entrances of the consulates, the fleur-de-lis escutcheon by the monogram of the Republic, adding, however, that "the substitution should be subordinated to times and circumstances." Taking no account of this last clause, Bassville, accompanied by Charles de Flotte, a young naval officer of the old nobility who had bowed to the new ideas, notified the Holy See of the circular of Monge; then, without waiting for the Pope's reply, on the night of January 1, 1793, he had the fleur-de-lis escutcheons taken down from the palace of the Academy and the residence of the consul. He then prompted the students to pull down the statue of Louis XIV, the founder of the Academy. A few days later, in that same palace, a statue of Brutus was installed, and about it speeches were delivered. Following these agitations, the mob dragged through the streets the statue of Louis XIV and the statues of several popes and cardinals.

[216] Ibid., pp. 184, 223.

[217] F. Masson, Les diplomates de la Révolution.

But the Pope replied (January 8) to the request of France by a letter addressed to the consul. Pius VI opposed to the demands of the French government an explicit refusal, giving his reasons for the refusal. The Republic, he said, by withdrawing its ambassador, broke all diplomatic relations with the Holy See; why should the Holy See recognize the Republic? The new government of France was not yet recognized by any cabinet. The act requested of the Pope seemed to be a tacit approval of all that had been done in France against religion. The Pontiff could not forget that in France, on March 3, 1791, they had burned his briefs and also an effigy of him; that at Avignon they had driven out his nuncio; that at Marseilles they had torn down his coat of arms from the house of his consul, and had hung it at a lamp-post and broken it in pieces; and that, when the Holy See protested against these acts and demanded the replacing of the coat of arms, the French government replied that the circumstances did not permit it to satisfy the claims of the Holy See.[218]

As soon as the Pope's reply was communicated to him, Mackau broke out in bitter denunciations and directed Flotte to express his protestation to the Pope. Flotte executed his mission brutally. He transmitted his dispatch to the Secretary of State, threatening him with the destruction of Rome if the Pope persisted in his refusal.

Such events could not occur without deeply arousing public opinion. That Bassville who, without any official title, so insolently lorded it over the consulate, the Pope, and the Roman state, became odious. If we are to credit the report of Digne (the French consul), Flotte and Bassville, when coming down the steps of the Vatican after the accomplishment of Flotte's last mission, expressed their dissatisfaction so clamorously that the report of it spread rapidly among the people.

[218] Gendry, Pie VI, II, 226; Artaud de Montor, The Lives and Times of the Popes, VII, 233 ff.; Moniteur, February 4, 1792, p. 166.

On Saturday, January 12, the rumor spread that, on the following day, the coat of arms of the Republic, that is, a Minerva wearing a Phrygian cap and holding a spear in her hand, would be set up at the consulate. The papal government, foreseeing an outburst of popular wrath on that occasion, reinforced the police with a body of soldiers.

These precautions, however, proved to be in vain. On Sunday, January 13, at four o'clock in the afternoon, the very hour when the streets were filled with unusually large throngs of people, Flotte, Madame Bassville, and her son, were crossing the city in a carriage, the coachmen and footmen wearing the Republican cockade, the young Bassville waving a tricolor flag. The Roman people supposed all this was an expression of defiance of them. Stones were thrown at the carriage. Someone cried out: "Down with the cockades!" A shot, fired from the carriage, increased the irritation. Flotte was surrounded by the crowd as he tried to flee into the house of a French banker, where Bassville then was. Bassville appeared, with a pistol in each hand. He had taken these pistols from Flotte to prevent his using them. The assailants thought that Bassville meant to make use of these arms. Someone of the throng, who has remained unknown, struck him in the stomach with a dagger. Flotte succeeded in fleeing by way of the roof of a neighboring house; but Bassville could not be saved. He died, after repudiating all the oaths he had taken in opposition to the laws of the Church, and received the sacraments, declaring that he had been the victim of Flotte's imprudences.[219]

At the first reports of the disturbance, the Pope gave orders to General Caprara to direct his forces against the disturbers.

[219] Gendry, II, 228–32. The Moniteur of February 4, 1793, published the report of Digne, French consul at Rome, which substantially agrees with the account given above.

The soldiers arrived in time to protect the Academy of France and the houses of some friends of Bassville, that were assaulted or threatened. Some priests were appointed to preach the restoration of peace and calm in the public squares. Pius VI, not satisfied with sending his own physician for the care of the wounded man, personally made arrangements for the obsequies of Bassville, facilitated the departure of Flotte, as also of Bassville's wife and son, and had a detailed report of the incidents sent to all his nuncios.

But Flotte reached Paris and related after his own manner the events of January 13. The Convention made common cause with him, adopted the son of Bassville, and drew up a whole plan of campaign against the Pope, unless he would subscribe to the following conditions: public apology, immediate acceptance of the Republic's coat of arms, expulsion of the émigrés from the Papal States, and an indemnity to the Frenchmen who suffered from the uprising.

Execution of Louis XVI

While the Convention was thus threatening the Pope, events of utmost gravity were being precipitated in France. On December 11 the Convention had made Louis XVI appear at its bar to undergo a humiliating examination. He was obliged to return on the 26th, accompanied by his defense attorneys, Malesherbes, Tronchet, and de Sèze, who tried in vain to exculpate him from the charges brought against him and to stir the pity of the Assembly in his favor. The party of the Mountain had already decided: they intended "to defy Europe by throwing at it the head of a king." The Girondists were divided. A formidable pressure was exercised on the hesitants. On January 15 the Assembly unanimously declared the King "culpable of conspiracy against the liberty of the nation and of attempts against the safety of the state." On the next day, out of 721 members voting, 337 decided for the penalty of death without condition, against 334 who favored conditional death or imprisonment. Among the 17 Constitutional bishops present at the session, five condemned Louis XVI to the penalty of death; 18 Constitutional priests out of 25 took the same stand.[220] On January 21, in the public square, "formerly called Place Louis XV," the King of France died on the scaffold with a nobility of attitude, a courage, a piety, a forgetfulness of the outrages received, a self-abnegation, and a confidence in the eternal justice which make of his last moments one of the greatest examples of virtues that can be proposed to men. Says one historian: "For the first time since he began to reign, Louis appeared to be master of his role. The Convention, by stripping him of the royal mantle and the crown, which weighed him down, disclosed in him the man, who possessed the most touching virtues of mankind." [221]

Pius VI, who had always nourished a tender esteem for the King of France, at news of his death showed a deep impression of sadness and indignation. Five months later, at the secret consistory of June 17, his emotion had not lessened. He went so far as to give Louis XVI the title of martyr, for, he said, "who can doubt that this king was slain principally out of hatred for the faith and because of his fidelity to Catholic dogmas?" But the hope which the Pontiff had kept in France was now deeply shaken. "O France, France!" he exclaimed, "you who in the fervor of your faith and devotion to the Apostolic See, did not follow others, but always went ahead of them, know that the faith is what makes the firmness of kingdoms, because it is the faith that suppresses the abuses of governments and the unrestrained license of the people." [222]

[220] Their names may be found in Picot, Mémoires, VI, 265.

[221] Albert Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, III, 269.

[222] Theiner, Documents inédits relatifs aux affaires religieuses de France, 1790–1800 (1857), I, 177–91.

Consequences of the King's Execution

The grief of the common father of the faithful was fully justified. The execution of Louis XVI would be the pretext, for the European coalition, of a fierce war against France; and the foreign war would become the occasion of an unprecedented revival of persecution by the Convention.

The desire to avenge the death of Louis XVI was merely the sentimental pretext of the great coalition that combined against France, under the direction of William Pitt: England, Holland, Spain, Austria, Germany, Prussia, Naples, and Piedmont. The bravado of Danton, setting the natural limits of France at the ocean, the banks of the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees, was a more genuine reason; but the chief motive was the hope of sharing the provinces of France, which was thought to be unable to withstand the allied nations. France would, however, inflict on them a brilliant defeat and, though deprived of her king and even subject to the most revolutionary authority, would defend the integrity of her soil with unconquerable energy.

But the necessity of national defense favored the establishment of a dictatorship, which was exercised especially against the priests and the Catholic religion.

The first act of this dictatorship was the establishment of a revolutionary tribunal. In the midst of the violent excitement produced by the defeat of Aix-la-Chapelle and by the taking of Liége, Barère exclaimed (March 10): "For the saving of our country, the question is not one of dying for it, but of living to disclose the traitors."[223] Robespierre added: "I say that so long as the traitors remain unpunished, the nation will always be betrayed."[224] Following these discussions, the Convention issued a decree. Article 1 was thus worded: "There will be established at Paris an extraordinary criminal tribunal, which will take cognizance of every revolutionary undertaking." [225] Article 6 attached to the tribunal a public prosecutor. He would be Fouquier-Tinville. Article 16 provided that the decisions of this court would be final, without appeal to the Court of Cassation.[226] A few days afterwards, the creation of a revolutionary committee in each commune,[227] then the establishment of the famous Committee of Public Safety "whose duty should be to exercise vigilance over the executive power, to suspend the decrees, and, in urgent circumstances, to take measures of general internal and external defense," completed the organization of the dictatorship. The Convention was armed to act against its enemies, against all that it suspected of being so.

[223] Moniteur, March 12, p. 324.
[224] Ibid., p. 325.

These enemies were especially the refractory priests. On March 18, 1793, the Convention decided that "any citizen who knows of a priest or émigré refractory to the law of deportation, is authorized to arrest him," and that the priest or émigré found guilty shall be put to death within twenty-four hours.[228] This provision was a notable aggravation of the penalties imposed by the law of August 26, 1792, which punished with ten years of imprisonment a deported person who returned to France. But up to this time only the priests were aimed at. A decree of April 21–23, 1793, extended the obligation of the oath and the penalties attached to refusal to take it, "to all ecclesiastics without exception, regulars, seculars, and lay brothers." [229] From archbishop and abbot to the lowliest of [225] The complete text of the decree may be seen in the Moniteur of March 12, p. 326.

[226] Ibid.

[227] Ibid., p. 368.

[228] Moniteur, March 20, 1793, p. 357.

[229] Ludovic Sciout, Histoire de la Constitution civile du clergé, III, 378.

the brother porters, the entire faithful clergy of France was ostracized and threatened with death.

The decree of October 21, 1793 (30 Vendémiaire) further augmented the rigor of these laws. It punished with death not only the émigré priests who should again set foot on French territory and those who should not leave the country within ten days, but also every non-juring priest found having arms (Articles 1, 15, 17). Every citizen was invited to denounce, arrest, or have arrested any priest subject to deportation, with a promise of a reward of 100 livres (Article 18).[230]

Throughout France they began to arrest the priests en masse. When the prisons could hold no more, they loaded these wretched priests by hundreds on carts and brought them to Bordeaux, Blaye, Lorient, Nantes, and Rochefort. The presence of the English fleet prevented the deportation of these priests to America. But it was rightly considered that a ship's hold would be the harshest prison. At Rochefort the priests were at first put in an old ship that was serving as a hospital for the galleys. There the priests were mingled with the galley convicts. Later two other ships, the Washington and the Deux-Associés, were assigned them as their prison. For a great number, these ships became their tomb.[231]

These various laws were executed in a terrible manner. In the last of these ships 440 priests, crowded into a narrow space, facing four cannons loaded with grapeshot, could neither stir nor sit down, forced to remain standing all day long. At night they were literally heaped together below deck where each was allowed a space of less than half a square foot. One of these prisoners, Father De La Briche, wrote: "Beyond imagination was the foul and corrupt air, the vileness that emanated from this stinking place and that at the doorway lays hold on you and presses your heart. . . . Often at daybreak two or three of the prisoners were found dead, who had expired during the night. On one occasion as many as fourteen died in twenty-four hours on the Washington and the Deux-Associés."[232] Out of 825 clerics taken to Rochefort, 542 perished amid these horrible tortures.[233]

[230] Moniteur of 2 Brumaire of year II (October 23, 1793), p. 128.
[231] Sciout, loc. cit.

The persons threatened and pursued were no longer merely the clergy, but all their helpers, all the faithful, all persons under suspicion of loyalty. The decree of October 21 applied the penalties pronounced against the non-juring clergy to "the public school teachers, lay brothers, and laymen" (Art. 10);[234] and the decrees declared liable to deportation any citizen guilty of harboring a refractory priest (Art. 19).[235] The law of September 17, called the "law of suspects," declared suspect whoever showed himself in any way "an enemy of liberty" or who should not show his "attachment to the Revolution" (Art. 2) and it ordered that every suspect be placed under arrest (Art. 1).[236] The law of Prairial of the year II (May 10, 1794), in the organizing of the revolutionary tribunal, seemed to express the last word of arbitrary procedure and ferocity. Article 4 says: "The revolutionary tribunal is instituted to punish the enemies of the people." "Enemies of the people," declares Article 6, "are those who attempt to change the purity of the revolutionary principles." Article 7 was worded as follows: "The penalty for crimes which fall within the competence of the revolutionary tribunal is death." Article 13 decides that, "if material or moral proofs exist, witnesses' testimony will not be required." Article 16 adds that the law "grants legal defense to patriots, not to conspirators."[237] Revolutionary tri-

[232] Quoted by Sciout, op. cit., III, 279–382.

[233] Manseau, Les prêtres et religieux déportés dans la Charente-Inférieure (1886). Cf. E. Sevestre, La déportation du clergé orthodoxe pendant la Révolution. Register of the non-juring clergy embarked at the principal ports of France, 1792–1793 (1913).

[234] Moniteur of 2 Brumaire of the year II (October 23, 1793), p. 129.

[235] Ibid.

[236] Ibid., September 19, 1793, p. 1111.

[237] Bulletin des lois, I, 1–7.

bunals to the number of 178 were established in France. From April 16, 1793 to July 27, 1794 (9 Thermidor, year II), the Paris tribunal sent to the guillotine 2,628 persons. Marat had said: "Violence is the means by which we must establish liberty."

Likewise by violence Jacobinism, not satisfied with persecuting persons, made an attack on all religious monuments. Bands of "patriots" overran France, sacking churches, profaning them, sometimes even demolishing them. The revolutionary vandalism seized on thousands of statues and paintings of great value. In his report on the vandalism, presented at the session of 14 Fructidor of year II (August 31, 1794), Grégoire declared: "In the realm of the arts, the mere list of objects stolen, destroyed, or defiled would fill several volumes." [238] Church bells valued at 80,000,000 francs, were turned into cannons; the silver articles of the churches were melted down and made into coins. The reliquary of St. Genevieve, with an estimated value of 1,500,000 francs, was taken to the mint on the night of December 6, 1792.[239] At about the same time "at Dijon we see the ten or twelve Hercules of patriotism traversing the town, each with a chalice under his arm." [240] All the ecclesiastical buildings were likewise sequestrated, along with their furniture. Had not the people been told that these possessions form "the patrimony of the sans-culottes"? [241] This property would be "the reward of their valor." [242] The most beautiful reliquaries were the booty of these bandits, and the relics were burned or scattered.[243]

[238] Grégoire, Rapport sur les destructions opérées par le vandalisme, session of 14 Fructidor of the year II, reprinted at Caen in 1867. See especially p. 44.

[239] Picot, op. cit., VI, 311.

[240] Taine, French Revolution, III, 261.

[241] Ibid., III, 271.

[242] Ibid. These words were the declaration of Desmoulins.

[243] On the vandalism of the Convention, see the details given in the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques of November 25, 1793; see also Picot, Mémoires, VI, 314–17; Gosselin, in his Notice sur les instruments de la passion qui se conservent a l'église

The Liturgy

To drive out the priests, to close the churches, to smash the sacred vessels, and to scatter the remains of the saints did not satisfy the fury of those who, with Holbach, thought that, "when you wish to be occupied usefully with the welfare of men, you must begin with the gods of heaven." [244] The people, deprived of their public worship and of their priests, kept the memory of their saints in the calendar of the civil year. The order of the weeks and months always gravitated about those two great feasts, Christmas and Easter, one of them celebrating the coming of our Lord into this world here to serve us as our model, the other celebrating His resurrection to life eternal to draw us after Him. These two feasts summed up well the whole of religion. The day of rest for working men was always based on a division of time that recalled the creation of the world and periodically brought around the Lord's Day. After being driven out of the churches, Christian piety would have continued to be nourished on the remembrance and the symbols of the liturgical life. In that reminder the Revolution decided to extinguish it. The instincts of destruction are often as unerring as those of preservation.

On October 5, 1793, Fabre d'Eglantine, in a report presented to the Convention, spoke as follows: "The priests had assigned to each day of the year the commemoration of a so-called saint. That catalogue was a collection of lies. We have thought that the nation, after removing this list of the canonized from its calendar, ought to put in their place objects worthy, if not of its worship, at least of its culture, the useful products of the earth, domestic animals, and so on." Consequently a new era, dating from September 22, 1792, the date of the proclamation métropolitaine, relates how the relics of the true cross and of the holy crown of thorns, venerated at Notre Dame, were taken by the profaners.

---

[244] Holbach, Système de la nature, Vol. II, chap. 13.

of the Republic, was decreed. The twelve months of the year were made exactly equal; each was divided into three decades, of ten days each, the last day of each decade being consecrated to rest. Thus the Sunday disappeared. In place of the names of the saints, whose memory was attached to the different days of the year, were substituted names of flowers, plants, animals, and farm implements. Such was the basis of the republican calendar which would remain officially in use in France until January 1, 1806. This reform, besides outraging religion, did not possess the merit of having social usefulness. As a certain historian of the Revolution remarks:

Whereas by the metric system the Convention offered the nations a basis on which all could unite, by its calendar it suppressed an existing accord; it broke not only with the past but also with the present; it isolated itself in the world; for it could not expect to have the world adopt the era of the French Revolution or to vanquish the universe by imposing this reform on it. The naming of the new months, which Fabre d'Eglantine was so proud of, was hardly exact in its relation to the climate in the two extremities of France. What would have been their unfitness if it had to include, we do not say the antipodes, but merely the northern and southern extremities of Europe, from Sweden to Spain? [245]

[245] Henri Wallon, La Terreur, critical studies on the history of the French Revolution (1881), II, 183. The republican calendar was the work of the mathematician Romme and the poet Fabre d'Eglantine. The first year was to begin on September 22, 1792, the day of the proclamation of the Republic. A volume was published with the title, Manuel pour la concordance des calendriers républicains et grégoriens, 1806. The following is a summary:

AUTUMN	SPRING
Vendémaire (September–October)	Germinal (March–April)
Brumaire (October–November)	Floréal (April–May)
Frimaire (November–December)	Prairial (May–June)
WINTER	SUMMER
Nivôse (December–January)	Messidor (June–July)
Pluviôse (January–February)	Thermidor (July–August)
Ventôse (February–March)	Fructidor (August–September)

At the end of each year, five supplementary days, or épogomènes, were added.

The Constitutional Clergy

The revolutionary ideas had advanced. No longer, as under the Constituent Assembly, was the question that of "returning to the traditions of the early Church," but quite simply of reviving paganism. This attitude of the Convention dissolved the constitutional clergy. Some persons, following Gobel, advocated the abolition of every priestly function and the adoption of the single worship of Reason; others, like Grégoire, protested in the name of Christianity, whose faithful disciples they wished to remain, and strove with all their might against the reborn paganism; some even courageously suffered death for their religious convictions.

We have seen how the constitutional clergy was recruited without great difficulty, at first from the ranks of unworthy priests, then among the Gallicans and the convinced Jansenists. The constitutional Church, if we can apply that name to a body of pastors that had neither unity of belief nor unity of hierarchy, about the beginning of 1793 counted 30,000 pastors or curates.[246] At Paris, Gobel was at the head of 600 cooperators, 500 of them being employed in the parishes.

On November 6, 1793, a simple incident at one of the sessions ended in a result of exceptional seriousness. The constitutional pastor of the parish of Mennecy, whose private conduct had become a public scandal, induced his parishioners to close the church and suppress the public worship. Was such a step legal? The Assembly promptly replied in the affirmative, and the incident was closed.[247] But it was suggestive for those who, like Robespierre, had from the outset of the Revolution dreamed of abolishing in France all positive religion and found-

[246] The figure given by Pisani, op. cit., p. 28.

[247] Moniteur, November 8, 1793, p. 195. On this matter, the reporter declared that "the lawmaker did not recognize any cult but that of liberty, no altar but that of the fatherland, no pontiffs but the magistrates of the people" (ibid.). The Moniteur said: "These words were applauded by the Assembly."

ing there a natural, civic religion, following the principles of Rousseau. The people were apparently not disposed to accept such an innovation on the part of the government. Would they accept it if, as at Mennecy, it were presented to them on the initiative of their priests?

On the evening of that day (November 6) a deputation of the sections and of the central committee of the popular societies came to the house of Gobel, the metropolitan bishop of Paris. By his situation, by the profession of a religious faith, watered down and false but sincere, Gobel enjoyed a certain consideration among the constitutional clergy. However, he was known to be weak enough to yield to a summons of the committee. Yet a long struggle was needed to bring Gobel to abjure his faith, or at least to annul his ecclesiastical functions and thus to give place to the sole worship of the Supreme Being and of Reason. "I do not know of any errors in my religion," objected the wretched man; "I have nothing to abjure." He was attacked on his weak side. He was told: "The question is simply of sacrificing yourself to the public welfare, to yield to the wish of the people by abdicating functions which they no longer desire." Gobel yielded. "If such is the wish of the people," he said, "very well. The people have elected me; the people dismiss me." [248] The next day Gobel, accompanied by eleven of his vicars, presented himself at the bar of the Convention and there pronounced a discourse which ended thus: "Since no other worship must be but that of Liberty and of holy Equality, since the Sovereign thus wills it, in accord with my principles I submit to its will. From today I give up the exercise of my functions of minister of Catholic worship." In reality, this [248] We possess three accounts of the events that occurred on that tragic night: that of Gobel himself, that of Father Grégoire, and that of Gobel's vicar general, Amable Lambert. For the account of this last, see Ami de la religion, CXXXVI, 239–42. These three accounts differ in certain details, but they agree in stating that Gobel yielded only through terror to the ultimatum which was brutally presented to him.

formula was only a resignation from his functions; but the Assembly wished to see in it an abjuration. Laloy, the president of the Convention, declared: "After the abjuration he has just made, the Bishop of Paris is now merely a being of reason. But I am going to embrace Gobel." The weak Gobel did not dare to protest against this interpretation of his words. He received the accolade of the president and placed his pastoral cross on the desk and put on the red cap.[249]

Scarcely had Gobel retired when the procession of the other apostates began. Thomas Lindet, married bishop of Eure; Bourdeau, juring curé of Vaugirard; Coupé, of the Oise; Julien, of Toulouse,[250] mounted the tribune and declared, in the vague phraseology of the time, that they were giving up all the functions of worship.

At that moment Grégoire entered. He at once asked for the floor. All thought that he, too, was going to apostatize. The Bishop of Loir-et-Cher expressed himself in these terms: "People speak of sacrifice to the fatherland. I am accustomed to that. Is the question one of attachment to the cause of liberty? My proofs have been given long since. . . . But is religion the question? This article is outside your domain, and you have not the right to attack it. A Catholic by conviction and by feeling, a priest by choice, I have been designated by the people to be bishop, but not from them nor from you do I hold my mission. I have tried to do good in my diocese; I remain bishop that I may continue to do so. I appeal to the freedom of worship." [251]

[249] Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, September 11, 1793; Aulard, Le culte de la raison, p. 446; Moniteur of November 9, 1793, p. 199.

[250] Sieyès did not make his abjuration until November 9. "Citizens," he said, "ever since several years ago I have abdicated every ecclesiastical character. . . . I have no resignation to give to you; but I have an offering to make to the fatherland, that of an income of 10,000 livres which the law has granted me." Moniteur, November 11, p. 208. Julien of Toulouse was a former Protestant minister.

[251] Gazier, Etudes sur l'histoire religieuse de la Révolution, pp. 212–14. Moniteur, 19 Brumaire, p. 200, gives a different version, which Grégoire, in his Histoire des

This courageous example found few imitators. For about a month declarations like that of Gobel followed one another on the rostrum.

Despotism of the Convention

Meanwhile the cathedral of Paris had been profaned by a sacrilegious ceremony. On November 10 an actress, arrayed in a white dress and a blue cape, wearing a red cap, and symbolizing Reason, was seated on a platform in the middle of the church of Notre Dame, at the crossing of the transept,[252] amid a theatrical setting, and at her feet choirs sang the Hymn to Liberty, to which Joseph Chénier had added the following stanza:

> Descend, O Liberty, thou born of Nature!
> The people now reclaim immortal power;
> On crumbled ruins of the old imposture
> The labors of their hands raise up thy altar.

In the afternoon the goddess Reason was carried on a litter by four citizens and was brought to the Assembly, where she was invited to take her place on the platform beside the president Puis. The deputies, on the proposal of the former Capuchin Chabot, having voted that the church of Notre Dame should be called the temple of Reason, went in a body to the church sectes religieuses, calls an odious falsification. Many evidences do, in fact, show that the Moniteur, written by partisans, often falsified the discourses of the orators. The text as we quote it is that given by Grégoire. Did he revise his address when writing it? Perhaps he did so. But what is certain is that Grégoire, summoned to apostatize, energetically refused to do so. Pisani, op. cit., II, 65.

---

252 The person who represented Reason on this occasion has been identified. Probably she was a stage singer (James Guillaume, Etudes révolutionnaires, 1st ser., p. 54). Only by oratorical metaphor has she been referred to as a woman lightly clad and seated on the altar. Pisani, op. cit., II, 70. The spectacle, as it actually took place, was grievous enough without any exaggeration of the circumstances.

and there added their voices to those of the choristers. Gobel with shame joined the crowd that profaned the august sacred place.[253]

Like ceremonies were celebrated in other parts of France. The head of each departement wished to have a feast of Reason. However, this worship was only a passing crisis. After a few weeks it permanently disappeared, along with its founders, Hebert and Chaumette, who were beheaded on March 24, 1794. But the antireligious hatred, thus grotesquely manifested, survived. Chaumette had sworn to "unpriest" the clergy of France. From the outset of the Revolution the enemies of the Church understood that the surest means of accomplishing that result was to favor the marriage of priests.[254] From July 9 to November 15, 1793, the Convention passed no less than five decrees on this subject.[255] The foes of religion soon had reason to rejoice at the result of their legislation. Grégoire, in his Histoire du mariage des prêtres, gives the names of twelve married constitutional bishops and reports as two thousand the number of priests who followed their example.[256]

[253] A certain liberal historian says: "The writers most favorable to the Revolution no longer pretend to justify these eccentric proceedings. They merely appeal to attenuating circumstances. Aulard says that we should see in these events nothing more than an expedient employed by the Revolution to vanquish the Church that had risen up against the state. . . . Perhaps we would do even better to regard the feast of Reason as an enormous farce." Desdevises du Dezert, L'église et l'état en France (1598–1801), 1907, p. 313. But in fact we should consider it a horrible sacrilege.

[254] See supra, p. 118, Robespierre's address delivered during the discussion of the Civil Constitution.

[255] On July 9 the Convention declared that no law will deprive the married priests of their salary; on the 29th of the same month it decreed that the bishops who placed any obstacle in the way of the marriage of priests would be deported or replaced; on August 12 it annulled all dismissals pronounced against priests on the occasion of their marriage; on September 17 it ordered that, if a priest should be disturbed on the occasion of his marriage, he could withdraw elsewhere and receive his salary at the expense of the commune which persecuted him; the law of November 15 declared that "the ministers of Catholic worship who are married will not be subject to deportation or imprisonment even if they did not take the prescribed oaths."

[256] Cf. Picot, op. cit., VI, 320–22.

The attitude of many of these apostates was disgusting. Writes Beaulieu in his diary: "On November 22 the Bishop of Périgueux came to the Convention there to pay homage to his wife." [257] Fifteen days later, Chabot informed his colleagues of his own marriage. He said: "All know that I have been a priest, even a Capuchin. I should, therefore, explain the reasons for the resolve I have taken. As a legislator, I considered that my duty was to give an example of all the virtues." "The future wife of Chabot," says Beaulieu, "was Frey by name; she was the sister of two German bankers from whom he acknowledged having received 200,000 francs, the fruit of their fraudulent practices." [258]

We know that more than once the marriage of the constitutional priests was only a pretense; but too often these fictitious unions were changed into real ones and, in all cases, in the eyes of the Church they amounted almost to the same thing.[259] Of better inspiration were those whom the example of Gobel and his followers indignantly aroused and who, following Grégoire, had the courage to protest against the impieties of the Convention. Brongniart, constitutional curé of Saint Nicolas du Chardonnet, declared that he regarded as null the order he had received to close his church. When deprived of his salary, he replied that he had no need of being paid by the Commune for the performance of the functions of his ministry. He was [257] Quoted by Wallon, La Terreur, I, 256.

[258] Ibid. The constitutional clergy of France at that time was increased by the addition of some German priests, imbued with rationalist ideas. Cardinal Pacca, in his Mémoires, furnishes interesting details about two of these apostates whom he had known personally: Father Dereser, a discalced Carmelite, and Father Schneider, a Franciscan, at first episcopal vicar of the bishop of Strasbourg, then public prosecutor in the criminal tribunal of the Lower Rhine, who was conspicuous for the worst excesses. He was executed on April 1, 1794, convicted of being an agent of the enemy. Pacca, Œuvres complètes, French trans., II, 267–69.

[259] When, after the Concordat, Cardinal Caprara was commissioned to regularize the situation of the married priests who asked to be rehabilitated, he rightly showed himself severe toward those lax priests for having tried to save their life by a pretense of marriage.

arrested on 3 Frimaire (November 23, 1793) and was imprisoned successively at Sainte-Pelagie, Saint-Lazare, and the Conciergerie. He did not show a moment of weakness. Judged and condemned on 8 Thermidor, he courageously met his death the same day. His confrere, Bénière, curé of Chaillot, had been beheaded a few days before. Some other priests, who had taken the oath, underwent long imprisonment for disobedience to the antireligious laws. Such were the curés of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, Saint-Merry, Saint-Jacques, and Saint-Séverin.[260]

Although the conduct of a notable number of the constitutional priests was worthy and courageous in the presence of the revolutionary tyranny, the attitude of most of the non-juring priests was heroic. Father Felicité de Lamennais, recalling the scenes he had witnessed in his childhood, wrote in 1808:

> Whereas the mass of the clergy, scattered in foreign lands, there planted the seeds of Catholicism which, fertilized by time, will perhaps some day develop a large number of priests prepared for martyrdom, in France they braved all dangers to distribute to the faithful the helps of the sacraments and the consolations of hope. How many heroic deeds, what lofty traits of devotion I might recall! Never did religion appear more beautiful. If the triumphant philosophy thought up new crimes, persecuted Christianity brought forth new virtues.[261]

The fiery apologist of that day recalled Masses celebrated at midnight in an attic of his home by a non-juring priest on a table transformed into an altar and lighted only by two candles, while the aged servant was on watch outside, ready to give the alarm at the least noise.[262]

Similar scenes took place in all the provinces of France. In the Vivarais, where the lamentable defection of Savine and his pernicious advice had determined the momentary apostasy of [260] Pisani, op. cit., II, 88–91.

[261] F. de Lamennais, Réflexions sur l'état de l'Eglise en France.

[262] Boutard, Lamennais, I, 14.

a large number of priests, could be seen a simple country girl, Marie Rivier, passing from village to village that had been abandoned by their pastors, teaching catechism to the children, then preaching to the men and women, to reanimate, by all the means in her power, the slumbering faith and zeal. The decree proclaiming the heroic virtues of the servant of God declared that she "filled, as far as the condition of her sex permitted her, the ministry of an apostle." [263]

But in that country of France, where two centuries earlier the League took up arms to defend the Catholic religion against the intrusion of heresy, resistance to the Revolution would not be confined to acts of passive protest, to these attempts of religious apostolate. Already from 1790 to 1792 on the field of Jalès, on the borders of le Gard, l'Ardèche, and of la Lozère, more than 30,000 men rose up, a red cross on their breast, with the cry, "Long live the religion!" [264] In the month of September, 1793, the city of Lyons, aroused by the massacre of priests which had taken place within its walls, attempted to shake off the yoke of the Jacobins.[265] Meanwhile a man of undoubted ability and remarkable tenacity, Armand Tuffin, marquis of La Rouërie, had organized in Brittany a vast conspiracy for the purpose of overthrowing the Republic and restoring the monarchy.[266] But all these attempts had been more or less prompted by political considerations. In the spring of 1793, a movement appeared in Anjou, in Poitou, and in Brittany. This movement continued to develop and increase; its [263] Decree of the Congregation of Rites, June 13, 1890. Cf. F. Mourret, La Vénérable Marie Rivier, 1898, pp. 72, 93–95, 110, 346.

[264] Firmin Boissin, Le Camp de Jalès, p. 156. In this study Boissin shows that, of the three federations of Jalès, the first two, composed of 40,000 men, in 1790 and 1791 had an especially Catholic character. The third, composed of 2,000 men only, was undeniably a royalist movement, but it placed at the head of its program the defense of religion. Cf. Ernest Daudet, Les conspirations royalistes sous la Révolution, 1881, p. 1.

[265] Guillon, Histoire du siège de Lyon, 2 vols., 1797.

[266] Lenôtre, Le Marquis de La Rouërie et la conjuration bretonne.

leaders seemed to be guided especially by their religious convictions. Thus began the great war of the Vendée and of Brittany which a famous soldier of modern times calls "a war of giants."

Brittany and the Vendée

Like the rest of France, the people of the Vendée [267] and of Brittany had enthusiastically accepted the first reforms and the first declarations of the Constituent Assembly.[268] But the deep social unrest, which we pointed out in the other provinces, was not felt to the same degree in these regions. The peasants of the Vendée and Brittany had nothing to complain of about the arrogance of their lords except their unreasonableness in the collection of the feudal taxes. With rare exceptions, the Vendean or Breton gentleman resided on his land, in his plain manor house, located at the center of his farm land. The regime of share-cropping prevailed almost everywhere and the relations between owners and tenant farmers were frequent, necessitated by the division of the crops. The peasant received the visit of his lord in his cottage in hours of suffering and mourning; the lord himself, after the office on Sundays and feast days, came to take part in the sober and modest dance in the courtyard of his château. The Vendean clergy shared the hard and poor life of the people of the country; and if the Breton clergy were rich, they claimed no other privilege than that of devoting themselves to the service of the people confided to [267] We use the word Vendée in contradistinction to Brittany, Anjou, and Poitou. The name Vendée militaire designates a more extensive region, embracing the départements of Vendée, Deux-Sèvres, Vienne, Maine-et-Loire, Loire-Inférieure, Sarthe, Mayenne, Ille-et-Vilaine, Morbihan, Côtes-du-Nord, Orne, Calvados, and Manche (Deniau, Carte de la Vendée militaire at the head of his Histoire de la Vendée).

[268] Father Felix Deniau, Histoire de la guerre de Vendée, 3 vols., 1906–1908, I, 93 ff. The first three members of the clergy who met with the third estate (June 13, 1789) were three curés of lower Poitou. Deniau, op. cit., p. 97.

them. With greater animation in Vendée, more melancholy and grave in Brittany, the man of these districts, unspoiled and industrious, despised both pleasures and death. Respectful and proud, he willingly bowed before two masters, God and the king, but he did not readily bow his head before any other authority. The first assaults delivered by the Revolution on the monarchical institutions of France afflicted him deeply. Nevertheless, says a historian devoted to the monarchy, "we may suppose that, if this sturdy and pious district had not been attacked in its Catholic beliefs, it would have let the Revolution pass without drawing the sword." [269]

The first feelings were manifested upon a report of the passing of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, July 12, 1790; then at news of its approval by the King the following August 24. Then juring priests, the intruders as they were called, filled the people with such an aversion that many an intruder was obliged to leave his parish, being unable to endure the void he saw formed about him.[270]

At Ploughuerneau 600 men and 4 cannons were needed to install the Constitutional curé. When the authorities proceeded to use force against these recalcitrants, several skirmishes ensued between the peasants and the gendarmes. A farm worker of Lower Poitou, surrounded by a group of gendarmes and armed merely with a pitchwork, offered a desperate resistance. "Surrender," cried out the leader of the gendarmes. Upon his replying, "Give my God back to me," he fell, struck by twenty-two strokes of the sword.[271] Said a certain woman to her husband, who let his hand be cut off rather then burn his catechism: "Hold firm. Your deed is for the good God."

[269] Poujoulat, Histoire de la Révolution française, II, 43. Cf. Mortimer-Ternaux, Histoire de la Terreur, VI, 260–68.

[270] Cf. Gruget, Histoire de la Constitution civile dans l'Anjou, written in 1791 and published in the Anjou historique, Vol. III.

[271] These words, worthy of a martyr, were uttered in a battle of May 2, 1791, by a peasant of Saint-Christophe-de-Ligneron, named Guillon. They have been attested by the very gendarmes to whom they were addressed and who were deeply impressed by them. See Deniau, op. cit., I, 211.

At the very time when these events were happening in Anjou, Jean Chouan had already taken up arms in le Maine, along with his two brothers and a few brave peasants. On August 15, 1792, in the town of Saint-Ouen-des-Toits, the headquarters of one of the cantons of la Mayenne, a few miles from Laval, some members of the directory of the district, accompanied by a detachment of gendarmes, had come to enlist a body of volunteers, whose first mission was to go to Laval and there seek the newly appointed constitutional curé. Murmurs arose. The gardarmes were ordered to arrest the "rebels." An uproar of indignation arose. Someone cried: "Down with the patauts; no intruders!" Pataut was the name given to the so-called patriots; "intruder" was what they called the constitutional priests. When acts of violence were about to ensue, a man jumped into the midst of the crowd. With upraised hand he halted the first gendarme who was advancing and with the other hand imposed silence on the gathering. Then he exclaimed: "When the King calls upon us to take arms, we will march. I reply for all. But if we must set out to defend what you call liberty, do you yourselves go fight for it. We all belong to the King, and to the King alone." At once gendarmes, officers, and officials, head over heels, all scattered and fled.[272]

The man who thus took the lead owed to the King that life which he wished to consecrate to the King's cause. He was Jean Cottereau, called Jean Chouan, who, arrested as a dealer in contraband salt, had obtained his pardon from the goodness of Louis XVI.[273] Unlike that in the Vendée, the uprising in Brittany assumed from the outset the character which it kept until the end, that of a clearly royalist war.

[272] Duchemin-Descepeaux, Souvenirs de la chouannerie, 1852, pp. 45–47. This volume is the second edition of the Lettres sur l'origine de la chouannerie, published in 1825.

[273] Ibid., p. 10.

The men who held the power in France did not wait until these last manifestations to be concerned with the obstacles which the spread of the revolutionary ideas might encounter in the western provinces. The Constituent Assembly, disturbed by the disposition which the Vendée showed immediately after the promulgation of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, hastened to send there as emissaries two of its members, Gallois and Gensonne. On October 9, 1791, the two commissioners presented to the Assembly a remarkable report on the state of all the departments of the West. In this report they said: "For the people religion has become the strongest and, so to speak, the sole habit of life. . . . The people's constancy in the matter of their religious affections . . . is one of the chief elements that have agitated them and that may agitate them still more." [274] But the halting of the royalist conspiracy of La Rouërie reassured the Convention. Two high police officers, Barthe and Morillon, sent on mission in the West, wrote to the Minister of Justice: "Citizen Minister, La Rouërie dies in an outburst of rage. Its partisans are in the hands of the law. The former province of Brittany is now peaceful; nothing is to be feared from that quarter. We are now going to hunt down the priests and the nobles. . . . This work of sans-culottism will not take long to accomplish." This letter bore the date of March 5, 1793. Eight days later, the Vendée was in open rebellion.

This work of hunting down the priests and the nobles coincided with the extraordinary drafting of 300,000 men, which the Convention had decreed on February 25, 1793, to face the armies of the coalition. The effect was the exasperation of the people of the West. On March 12 the young men of Maufes, [274] Long passages of this report may be seen in Deniau, op. cit., I, 267. De Pressensé echoes impartial history when he writes: "These words of one of the leaders of the Gironde contain the most sincere condemnation of all the measures of the Revolution. They show that the civil war could have been avoided by a loyal practice of the Constitution." E. de Pressensé, L'Eglise et la Révolution, p. 9.

having been summoned to go to Saint-Florent-le-Vieil for the purpose of taking part in a lottery drawing, went there, with most of their relatives and friends, armed with pitchforks, scythes, clubs, some even with rifles, marching as to a feast, and crying out: "Long live the religion!" reciting the rosary and singing hymns. A cannon loaded with grapeshot was placed by the commissioners of the district in the public square, and appeal was made to the young men. No one answered the appeal. At some indiscreet and violent words which the republican authorities were thought to have uttered, cries of "Long live religion, long live the priests!" broke out on all sides. The military commander ordered his men to fire. A cannon shot was fired; but, aimed too high, it made few victims. This incident was the declaration of war.[275] Led by a young peasant of the village of Chanzeaux, René Forêt, the rebels routed the gendarmes and the administrators, seized the strong-box of the district, and made a bonfire of the documents of the administration.

On the next day, one of these young people, going to Pin-en-Mauges, a little village in the neighborhood, related the affray of the day before to a peddler of the country, Jacques Cathelineau. The latter was about to knead the bread for his family. Interrupting his work, in a resolute tone he said: "We are lost if we stop there. We must rise up all together and start the war today."

The humble peddler who spoke thus and who, three months later, would be named commander-in-chief of the Vendeans, was a man of tall stature, vigorous body, features full of fire and expression. Said his contemporaries: "His voice was so beautiful that to hear it was a pleasure when he used to sing at the lectern on Sundays or when, at a wedding, he intoned the joyous song that made everyone join in." He was scarcely thirty-four years old.[276] From 1785 to 1793 his frequent journeys throughout the region, where he used to go selling thread, wool, and the various objects of his trade, had made him acquainted in most of the towns and villages. The affability of his manner made him universally well liked. Because of his deep piety he was venerated by all. When religion began to be persecuted, Jacques Cathelineau, not satisfied with praying privately at home, organized pilgrimages to the chief shrines of the neighborhood, notably to Notre-Dame-de-Charité and Notre-Dame-de-Bon-Secours. "At his suggestion the parishes having an intruder as pastor wrapped in black crepe the cross that headed their procession. This mournful sight impressed everyone and added to the horror with which the schism and heresy filled this religious people."[277] His faith was so deep and his humility so great that everyone afterward called him "the Saint of Anjou."

[275] Deniau, op. cit., I, 429–31.

The First Vendean Insurgents

On the evening of March 13, Cathelineau had about him twenty-seven young men[278] ready to follow him wherever he would lead them. The impromptu leader decorated his breast with a rosary and a scapular, his men doing the same. The little band went toward Poitevinière, on their way recruiting farm hands, share-croppers, and household servants. Soon they numbered 500, armed only with implements of labor, iron pitchforks, scythes straightened and attached to poles, strong clubs, and a few hunting muskets. Jaillais, Cheuille, and Cholet fell into their hands. The movement spread into the whole Vendée. Soon 3,000 men were under arms. Cathelineau's band grew in [276] Deniau, Jacques Cathelineau, 1896.

[277] Charpentier, Jacques Cathelineau, 1911, p. 23.
[278] See their names in Deniau, I, 439.

its march, some troops raised by a game-keeper, Stofflet, others by a village surgeon, Cady, and others by a tobacco merchant, Perdriau. On March 16, the day following the seizure of Cholet, no nobleman had yet commanded this army three times victorious. But the same day as the victory of Cholet, some insurgents, who had not followed Cathelineau, went to the château of La Baronnière and proclaimed the Marquis de Bonchamp their leader. This former officer of Indian troops had served as a major of the Acquitaine regiment under the command of the bailiff of Suffren and then had abandoned his position rather than take the constitutional oath. Bonchamp was thirty-four years old. The nobility of his heart surpassed that of his ancestry. "Let us fortify ourselves with courage," he said to his young wife as he was leaving her. "Let us lift our thoughts toward heaven; but let us not count on human glory, because civil wars do not give any." [279]

While Bonchamp put himself at the head of the insurgents at Saint-Florent, D'Elbée, yielding to the wishes of those from Beaupreau, willingly became their leader. He was a simple pious man, beloved by the peasants who lived about his modest manor. After him, the people of their districts petitioned two other noblemen, Lescure and La Rochejaquelein, who came with their troops and joined the army of Cathelineau. The first was not yet twenty-seven years old. A former captain in the Royal Piedmont regiment, tall, well-built, of noble appearance, sweet disposition, and admirable piety, he became a perfect example of virtue as well as of courage for the Vendean army. La Rochejaquelein was twenty years old. Blond, with a slender and elegant figure, and of shy bearing, this young man was to be one of the most beloved leaders of the Vendean peasants. Although he seldom ventured to give a word in council, he was always seen in the first line of battle.[280] "My friends," said he to his soldiers when entering his first engagement, "I am nothing more than a child, but I wish, through my courage, to show myself worthy of being your commander. If I advance, follow me; if I fall back, kill me; if I die, avenge me."

[279] See Blachez, Bonchamp et l'insurrection vendéene, from original documents, 1902.

The combined forces of Cathelineau, Bonchamp, D'Elbée, Lescure, and La Rochejaquelein made up "the Catholic and royal army." It engaged in its first pitched battle at Chemillé on April 11, took Thouars by storm May 5, overwhelming the troops of General Chalbos nine days later at Châtaigneraie, routed the army corps of Leygonier at Concourson of June 5, on June 8 that of General Salomon, and two days later seized Saumer. As they marched into battle, the Vendean army sang hymns. Before beginning to attack, they knelt to receive the priest's blessing. At Châtaigneraie, while under fire from enemy cannon, Lescure's soldiers noticed a mission cross; they fell to their knees, sustaining grapeshot fearlessly. One of their leaders desired to start moving. "Let them pray," said Lescure; "they will only fight better." They got up as a result full of courage and dislodged the enemy from their positions. From every side new recruits flocked in with a rosary in their buttonholes and a scapular over their hearts. "The like of this has not been seen since the Crusades," wrote Barère to the Convention.

Cathelineau

Until then all the plans of the campaign had been settled in council under the moral influence of Cathelineau. On June 12, Bonchamp, D' Elbée, Lescure, La Rochejaquelein, Stofflet, all the corps leaders elected by unanimous vote as supreme general of the Vendean army the man whose influence had impressed itself on all.[281] Cathelineau was not only the one leader who knew better the habits of the Vendean soldiers and the topography of the country where they fought; he also revealed the highest qualities of a soldier: the swiftness of his glance, his skill in maneuvers, the sureness of his advice, placed him over the men whom he commanded.

[280] Deniau, op. cit., I, 625. Cf. Henri de La Rochejaquelein et la guerre de la Vendée, 1890.

While the army of Cathelineau fought in the Vendean area which is called Le Bocage, marked with hills and streams, with thorny hedges and hollows, another army fought in the flat and open country called Le Marais. The small farms there were protected by muddy swamps which were jumped over with the aid of long poles and planks hard to carry. The man who commanded the insurgents from the swamp lands was Charette. François Charette de la Contrie was not yet thirty years of age, "in no way resembling the leaders of Anjou and Upper Poitou; he was a man of easy morals; the dazzling extravagance of his dress was something theatrical; but his penetrating gaze, tight lips, and clear sharp voice showed the leader who intended to be obeyed and would be. Besides, as brave a soldier as he was a clever tactician and adroit politician, he was truly worthy of command." [282]

In June, Charette and Cathelineau combined their efforts. For the first time the wealthy and the lowly Vendeans cooperated in the same campaign. The objective was seizure of the city of Nantes, whose fall would deliver Brittany and Normandy. On June 29, while Charette, D'Elbée, Bonchamp, and the other leaders directed the attack on seven different points, Cathelineau assaulted the gates of Rennes, where after a long battle he rushed forward at the head of a devoted band of 300 men. Braving heavy fire, he had already reached the Viarme and saw that the enemy was disturbed. A bullet broke his arm and pierced his chest. All was over. He fell. His Vendeans thought only of carrying him away and fought only to retreat. Carried to Saint-Florent, the wounded general continued to issue orders to his army, but gangrene set in, and, on July 14,[283] Jacques Cathelineau died praising God. Four months had sufficed to cover his name with immortal glory. Undoubtedly in his army and especially near his army, more than one crime was committed unworthy of the noble cause he had served. Because of the intrigue of the tax-collector Souchu, who later sought to betray the Vendeans, 500 people were hatefully massacred after the capture of Machecoul. Equally deplorable deeds took place in half a score of localities.[284] But if we must stigmatize these crimes, we should also stigmatize the crimes of the revolutionary demagogue. Justice obliges us to declare that the glory of Cathelineau remained entirely free from these excesses. "Meek, modest," comments a historian devoted to the Revolution, "a true countryman with an unpretending sincere heart, uninterested in mean political passion, he had that composure which overawed and that enthusiasm which spoke to the soul of soldiers." [285] He had that deep and living faith which gained for him the surname of Saint of Anjou.

[281] Bossard, Cathelineau, generalissime de la grande armée catholique et royale, 1893.

[282] Veuillot, Guerres de la Vendée et de la Bretagne, 3rd ed., p. 55. See Napoleon's appreciation of Carette in Memoirs of the Life, Exile, and Conversations of the Emperor Napoleon, IV, 89. Cf. Bittard des Portes, Charette et la guerre de la Vendée.

His death was a major blow to the Vendean cause. As a result, wrote one of the historians of the Vendée, "as long as Cathelineau lived, the principal driving force of the fighting army of the Vendée was kept together by the words and example of this man of faith. That was the period of successive progress for the Catholic and royal cause; God blessed it. But from the time of the death of this saint of Anjou, when nobles became almost the exclusive masters in the direction of its affairs and gradually substituted the political element for its pious program, reverses followed. God withdrew His favors in proportion to the forgetfulness that they showed Him. From all reports, the death of Cathelineau was therefore a disaster for the Vendée." [286]

[283] Most historians fix the date of Cathelineau's death as July 14, 1793; a few the 19th. Célestin Port, member of the Institute, archivist of Maine-et-Loire, thinks he can fix the date as July 4. Port, Dictionnaire historique de Maine-et-Loire, s. v. Cathelineau. Deniau holds the date to be July 14 (Deniau, II, 277).

[284] Mortimer-Ternaux, Histoire de la Terreur, VI, 269–72.

[285] Port, loc. cit.

The Second Period

We are not here concerned with relating in detail the military phases of the Vendean and Brittany campaign during this second period, which had no lack of noble feats of arms and virtuous heroic acts; but, all in all, the glory of this period is less clear: division gained admission and became more pronounced among the leaders of the Vendean army; less noble sentiments prevailed; suspect men mixed their intrigues and passions in defense of the great Catholic cause.

On the first of August the Convention drew up a decree of savage extermination: "All kinds of combustible substances will be sent to the Vendée to set fire to the woods, brushwood, and broom plants. The forests will be razed, the haunts of the rebels will be destroyed, the harvest will be rooted up by companies of workmen, and the cattle seized." [287] Ten days later 18,000 men from the garrison which had just capitulated in Mainz, and from the garrisons of Condé and Valenciennes, were sent into the West. In all, 100,000 armed men were in the Vendée with the watchword the convention had given them: "We must make the Terror the order of the day." Under the leadership of D'Elbée, who had been elected commander-in-chief replacing Cathelineau, the Catholic army, irritated and impatient, answered violence with violence. Hardly any more prisoners were taken by either side. At last, on October 18, the Vendean army was defeated at Cholet. Bonchamp and Lescure were mortally wounded. Pocketed at the Loire were 80,000 men, women, and children, half-mad, without supplies. A dreadful thought struck the enraged mob, that of killing five thousand Republican prisoners whom it had not thought of taking along with it on the right bank of the river. But the dying Bonchamp heard the furious shouts of the multitude. His failing powers revived: "Spare these unfortunates," said he to those who gathered round him; "this is surely the last order that I shall issue to you; give me the assurance that it will be carried out." At these words, the attendants of the Christian hero, moved even to tears, broke out into the crowd crying: "Mercy! Mercy! Bonchamp wishes it." The Republican prisoners were set at liberty, and the crowd crossed the Loire on half a score of boats. La Rochejaquelein, elected generalissimo, reawakened new ardor in the Vendean army. On October 23, after a furious assault, he made himself master of Laval.

[286] Deniau, Histoire de la Vendée, II, 233.
[287] Moniteur, August 2, 1793, p. 914.

It was at Laval that the great Vendean army met the Chouans from Brittany. Since August 15, 1792, when Jean Chouan had made his first attack with a makeshift troop, other bands of rebels had formed. In addition to the Misdon wood, situated seven miles from Laval and having become the general headquarters of Jean Chouan and his brothers, the woods of the Gravelle, the forests of Fougères, of Pertre and Lorge, became populated with armed revolutionaries. A former cavalry officer, the Count of Puisaye, had organized these different bands. Word of the battle given to Laval warned the Chouans of the presence of the Vendeans. Five to six thousand Breton peasants and manor tenants were joined to the large army of La Rochejaquelein. They took part thereafter in all its battles, its glories, and its defeats. They were singled out by their long hair and their clothes, for the most part the untrimmed hides of goats.

But the generals recently sent to combat the uprising were warriors of great bravery: Kleber, Westermann, Vimeux, and Marceau. On the other hand division had begun in the Vendean army. After the victory at Laval its leaders hesitated on what to do. La Rochejaquelein favored a triumphant return to Poitou; but Talmont suggested marching on Paris and defended his plan tenaciously; some others wished to invade Brittany and enter Normandy. Time was lost in these fatal discussions. Soldiers and people no longer had that unlimited confidence in their leaders which they had given them at the beginning of the campaign. As a matter of fact many among them were baffled by the strangeness of their leaders' attitude.

From May 5, the date of the seizure of Thouars, the Catholic army had in its midst a priest who had presented himself to the Vendean leaders as a prelate sent by Pope Pius VI. He took the title of Bishop of Agara in partibus, officiating pontifically on feast days before the throng, exercising unquestioned authority on them by the prestige of his reputation. He was formerly pastor of Dol, named Guyot de Folleville. At last it was discovered that his behavior ill justified the honorary distinctions and confidential missions that he had taken on himself. A papal brief dated July 3, 1793 and addressed to the leaders of the Vendean army, unmasked his deceit. "We advise you," said Pius VI, "to shun this man as an impostor who is stained with sacrilege and to nullify all acts of jurisdiction which he ventured to make." Guyot de Folleville was obliged to refrain henceforth from all episcopal acts. Yet he stayed in the army. He was killed at Angers, February 5, 1794. Another priest of superior worth, whom we shall see in the Consulate under Bonaparte, played a considerable role, Father Bernier, taking part on the side of the pretended bishop of Agra in the planning of the higher council of the army. This son of a simple peasant, while still very young, on the mere strength of his merit, had obtained one of the chief pastorates of Angers. Father Bernier exercised almost limitless influence on the peasants. His activity was ceaseless, but his conduct was too often prompted by wholly human considerations,[288] and his plans were not always the best. He was the one who suggested the creation of assignats[289] like those of the Republic in order to get some money for himself. His colleagues on the higher council proved their sense of honor by refusing to issue such spurious currency. The decree of proscription against men who served the Republic and against their families, and the obligation imposed on Republicans staying in the Vendée, of giving an oath of fidelity to Louis XVII were measures of Bernier's initiative. Along with a historian of the Vendean campaign, we may make a threefold condemnation of such measures, that of injustice, untimeliness, and weakness.[290]

The check of the Vendean army before Angers and its defeat at Le Mans accentuated the discouragement. They found themselves reduced to a mere 45,000 combatants. The failure of one attempt that had been made to cross the Loire added to their confusion. Nevertheless their faith in God remained steadfast in these well-tempered souls and outlived all deceit and dissension. One day two Vendean horsemen got ready to settle their quarrel in the lists, sword in hand. A man came by and said to them: "Christ pardoned His executioners; and you, a soldier of the Christian army, wish to kill your comrade." They embraced each other. Their faith in the King, who seemed to these men the only defense of the religious cause, was never [288] "His good qualities," says Deniau, "were dimmed by an inordinate ambition, an insatiable desire to govern all, and a relish for sowing discord" (Deniau, II, 114).

[289] French paper money issued by the Republic, 1789–97.

[290] Veuillot, Guerres de la Vendée et de la Bretagne, p. 137. The decree which required Republicans to take an oath to Louis XVII was soon abolished for it ended only in the commission of perjury.

again shaken. The cry of "Long live the King" always accompanied the cry "Long live religion," when the soldier of the Catholic army entered battle or when he fell mortally wounded in the fray. But the confidence of the country folk in regard to the noblemen who directed the war had obviously sunk. Attacked and surrounded at Savenay, their last refuge, by the veteran troops of Kleber, Westermann, and Marceau, the remains of the Vendean army was not only defeated but wiped out. Only the women and a few fugitives barely succeeded in escaping by way of Guérande. Westermann wrote: "Everywhere only the grim reaper is to be seen: in the environs of Savenay alone more than 6,000 bodies have been buried." This was December 23, 1793.

"The great Catholic royalist army had perished, enshrouded in its victories and defeats; but it had saved the honor of Christian France and, in spite of the inherent weakness of human nature, was left to teach and recall by its struggle the noblest examples of heroism, uprightness, and faith." [291] These examples lived again subsequently in campaigns by Charette and La Rochejaquelein in the Vendée, and in Brittany by Cadoudal, hereafter at the head of independent troops. The Convention ended by compromising with them and granting freedom of Catholic worship to Brittany and the Vendée.

The Other Provinces

If, as in the time of the League, the insurrection had been able to carry all France, the Revolution, at least in its anti-religious action, would have been crushed. Perhaps, too, this result might have ensued if one of the princes, so ardently asked for and vainly awaited by the combatants in the West, had come as had the princes of Guise for the League in the sixteenth century to command the insurrection. The regions where religious faith was less profound or less widespread were able merely to harass here and there. The regions from Bordeaux to Toulon and from Lyons to Marseilles had a few partial uprisings which were at once strenuously repressed. But the persecutors, wherever they tried to force Christians to renounce their faith and disobey their legitimate leaders, met a heroic resistance which was worthy of the first centuries of Christianity. We cannot cite every example. Church history, however, cannot pass over in silence the martyrdom of those whom perhaps one day the Church will number among its saints. In the first rank must be placed Father Noël Pinot, put to death for the faith in the public square of Angers, February 21, 1794; Sister Marguerite Rutan, of the Daughters of Charity, executed at Dax on April 9; the thirty-two nuns guillotined at Orange between the 6th and 26th of July; and the Blessed Carmelites of Compiègne whom the Church already commemorates on July 17, the anniversary of the date of their death.

[291] Jager, Histoire de l'Eglise catholique en France, XX, 146.

On the afternoon of February 21, 1794, the population of Angers witnessed a sight unique perhaps in the annals of Christianity. A priest clothed in his sacerdotal vestments, cassock, alb, stole, and chasuble, crossed the city with his hands tied behind his back, escorted by guards and soldiers. Led by a drum, the grim procession went to the Place du Ralliement; there a scaffold was erected on the very spot where the high altar of Saint Pierre had been. This priest's name was Noël Pinot, since 1788 pastor of the parish of Louroux-Béconnais, on the banks of the Loire. Arrested March 4, 1791, for having declared from the pulpit that "he would never submit to laws enacted by the assembly on spiritual matters, even when he saw the punishment prepared for him," he had been, in accordance with the decree of September 27, 1790, adjudged stripped of his rights as an active citizen and incapable of fulfilling any public function. Yet nothing had diminished the zeal of this true pastor. Since then, hunted as a criminal, spending his days in attics and stables where he slept as he could, devoting his nights to covering the many miles and the three villages of his parish, hearing confessions, preaching, administering the sacraments, celebrating Mass in secret, changing the place of his hideout frequently in order not to compromise the courageous peasants who sheltered him, always alert for the agents of the National Guard and the searching parties, the courageous pastor of Louroux was betrayed by malcontents whom he had supported with his alms. He was arrested in the village of La Milanderie in the home of a pious widow when he was about to celebrate the Holy Sacrifice. Father Gruget who was an eyewitness relates that his judges, in order to add more pomp to his punishment, asked him if he would prefer to go there in his priestly vestments. "Yes," he replied, "that would be a great consolation to me." "Very well," his executioners answered, "you will be clothed in them and be put to death in this attire." [292]

Having come to the scaffold, the moment he placed his foot on the bottom step the saintly priest had a sublime inspiration. The sight of the priestly vestments which he wore reminded him of the Sacrifice of the Mass, in its mystic sense so like that which he was going to offer. Raising his eyes to heaven he exclaimed, Introibo ad altare Dei ("I will go to the altar of God"). At these words, the members of the military commission which had condemned him shouted out, "Long live the Republic!" which was the usual signal for the execution. The priest allowed himself to be fastened to the fatal board, and the knife fell. Father Noël Pinot had been a priest until the last.

Sister Marguerite Rutan, who died on the scaffold at Dax in Les Landes two months later (April 9), was also able to give testimony that she had been a Daughter of Charity to the end. Born at Metz in 1736, this humble daughter of St. Vincent de Paul, after many assignments in the service of the poor, was employed at the hospital in Dax when the decree of August 18, 1792, appeared suppressing "all religious congregations even those devoted solely to hospital work." Sister Rutan, spreading her spirit of determination to her companions, then organized them into an association of "The Ladies of Charity" in which the rules of the religious life were observed as well as the members were able. But her energetic refusal to take the constitutional oath which they wished to force on her under penalty of exclusion from the hospital, focused the attention of the committee of vigilance on her. She was accused, arrested, and condemned to death "as having by her lack of patriotism attempted to corrupt and diminish the revolutionary spirit, and as such was unworthy of fulfilling humane and charitable offices that are due free men."

[292] Marquis de Ségur and C. Sauvé, Un admirable martyr sous la Terreur, 1904, p. 153; Uzureau, Noël Pinot, 1912.

An eyewitness tells us that, while Sister Marguerite Rutan and the stubborn priest Jean Eutrope de Lannelongue were [293] led to the guillotine in double time and with the roll of the drum, "one of the children that the sister had seen playing in the hospital cast a curious glance into the street from the room where he found himself shut up. His eyes met those of the martyr, who smiled up at him tenderly. The child's mother was near him and in a feeling of horror she shut the window quickly and said to her son: "Fall on your knees and pray for her; the wicked men are going to kill her." The child fell into tears.[294] The biographer of Marguerite Rutan does not hesitate to say that this holy daughter of St. Vincent de Paul was truly a martyr in the most exact sense of the word.

The thirty-two sisters put to death at Orange (July 6–26, [293] Father de Lannelongue, a heroic priest, exercised his ministry at the risk of his life, still wearing the dress of a peasant as he was dressed when he was arrested.

[294] Coste, Une victime de la Révolution, Sœur Marguerite Rutan, 1904. We can also mention the four Daughters of Charity of Arras, guillotined at Cambrai by order of Le Bon. They were declared Venerable by Pius X.

1794) were martyrs, too. Of these thirty-two nuns, twenty-nine had been born at Bollène, a little town in Comtat Venaissin. They were members of two religious communities, the Sacramentines and the Ursulines. The peaceful, delightful city lamented the loss of the kindly and fatherly government of the pope. This fact was known at Avignon and even at Paris. A delegate of the Convention, the terrible Maignet, called the "executioner of the Midi," vowed that he would "chop off the heads of the proud who had not been able to humble themselves before the level of equality." He carried it out to the letter. The Sacramentines and Ursulines, expelled from their convents on October 13, endeavored to preserve the practice of the religious life in their relatives' homes or in a rented house. There the warrants for their arrest were served on each of them. On May 1, twenty-eight Sacramentines under the direction of their superior (Madame de La Fare, sister of the Bishop of Nancy) and four Ursulines who acknowledged as their mother Madame de Troquart climbed up into their carts and were led to Orange. "Poor victims led to slaughter," cried out one of the men in the crowd before the spectacle; for his outburst he was seized and led away with them. "Their wonderful piety in prison," writes one of their historians," their joyfulness at the call of the tribunal, and their stately appearance before their judges and executioners made these thirty-two religious apostles and angels of consolation in the midst of the prisoners." [295] "Arriving at the scene of their triumph," we read in the Relations of 1795, "they embraced the scaffold, thanked their judges, pardoned their executioners, and with peace in their hearts and a look of serenity on their faces consummated their sacrifice." The spectators murmured: "Religion alone could inspire so much courage and assurance." [296]

[295] Cherot, Figures de martyrs, 1907, p. 147.

[296] Redon, Trente-deux religieuses guillotinées à Orange en 1794 (1904), p. 105. At Valenciennes, eleven Ursulines were also led to the scaffold. Their cause has been introduced at Rome.

We are told that the religious of Bollène sang hymns while on their way to death. On July 17 Paris witnessed a scene no less touching. Sixteen Carmelite nuns from the convent of Compiègne with their hands tied behind their backs standing in the carts which the populace called "rolling graves," slowly crossed the city to the Palace of Justice where they had been condemned to death, and to the Place du Trone where they were executed. All sang. The streets which had so often echoed revolutionary songs sounded with the Psalmody of the Miserere and the Salve Regina. Here and there a few savage murmurs were heard, but on almost the entire length of the route the innocent victims were greeted by the respectful silence of the people who listened to them, having been won over by this new harmony. They ended with the Veni Creator and renewed aloud their baptismal promises and religious vows.

Of all the victims of the Revolution we note but few whose character of "martyrs of the faith" rests on such convincing proof. A decree of the committee of vigilance at Compiègne, dated June 21, 1794, had denounced them as "always living subject to the fanatical regulations of their cloister." [297] We know what the word "fanatical" meant on the lips of the terrorists. At the height of the trial, the public prosecutor, after presenting other motives, returned to this accusation of fanaticism. One of the religious had the presence of mind to ask for an explanation of the word. After a torrent of insults, driven to extremes the prosecutor answered: "By fanaticism I mean your adherence to childlike belief, your silly practice of religion." "My dear Mother and Sisters," replied the valiant nun, while turning toward her companions, "you have heard the prosecutor declare that it is for our attachment to religion. . . . O how fortunate! How fortunate are we to die for God!" [298]

[297] For the text of the decree, see Sorel, Carmélites de Compiègne (1878), p. 27.
[298] Pierre, Seize Carmélites de Compiègne, p. 144.

Having arrived at the foot of the scaffold, the prioress, Marie Thérèse de Saint Augustin, asked for the grace of dying last. "The youngest, Constance Meunier, novice since 1789, fell on her knees before her spiritual mother, receiving from her lips the words of blessing, and then as she would have done in the convent, asked for one last favor, the permission of dying. Then she separated from them, climbed the ladder, and presented herself to the executioner. Thus each in turn, accompanied by the chant, which kept growing weaker, the other nuns down to the mother prioress, who like the mother of the Machabees, went up last, assured of the faith of her daughters with whom she was reunited in death." [299]

While faith elevated the souls of the victims to these heavenly heights, in striking contrast the spirit of evil made those of the persecutors descend to the extremes of vileness. Of these none perhaps was more hideous than Jean Baptiste Carrier. In him, following an expression of Taine, Jacobin fury had reached "its extreme." [300] "A tall, lean man," writes Michelet, "of swarthy complexion, awkward in his walk, with sham gestures, restless eyes, bewildered and misguided, he should have been ridiculed, but he was feared." [301] Carrier's moral side was even below the physical. "This man never had a mind," writes Lamartine, "but a depraved instinct. He never had a single idea except fury. Murder was his only philosophy; blood his sole pleasure." [302] "With Carrier as with a mad dog," says Taine, "his brain was completely filled with recurring diabolical thoughts, with never-ending images of murder and death." [303] This terrorist operated at Nantes. The guillotine and the firing squad were not enough for him. One day Carrier, who chose his underlings from the most despicable dregs

[299] Pierre, op. cit., p. 152.

[300] Taine, Les origines, VII, 341.

[301] Michelet, Histoire de la Révolution, VII, 81. Compare this description with the portrait given by Lenôtre in his book, Les noyades de Nantes.

[302] Lamartine, Histoire des Girondins, Bk. LIII; Le Chevalier, op. cit., III, 281.

[303] Taine, op. cit., VII, 340.

of the people, called upon some barge-men as ruthless as himself. He ordered them to open the sea cocks of a certain number of ships. One of the barge-men asked him for a written order. "Am I not an official?" Carrier answered him. "It is not so mysterious," he added. "You will be loaded with fifty priests and you will let them fall in the water in the midst of the current." The next day he wrote to the Convention that fifty priests had perished by a "new torture." The drownings at Nantes continued for several months. Carrier often took pleasure in riding on these same ships. While he thus had a joyful time with his drinking companions, a stifled groaning informed him that the victims were drowning under his feet; and he continued his drunken bout.[304]

Somewhat like this monster were Le Bon at Arras, Collot d'Herbois at Lyons, Maignet in the Comtat Venaissin, Tallien at Bordeaux, Robespierre le Jeune at Vesul, Saint-Just in Alsace, and Fouquier-Tinville at Paris who took part in so many massacres that more than one grew pale when, at the end of so many crimes, they caught a glimpse of some inevitable punishment. Their victims, on the contrary, at the moment of their execution, thrilled with expectation. "Dear God," cried out one of sixteen Carmelites at the foot of the scaffold, "I would be only too happy if this small sacrifice of my life would appease Thy anger and lessen the number of victims." [305] Eleven days later on July 28, 1794, Robespierre and twenty-two of his accomplices were led to the scaffold. The next day sixty-two members of the Commune were executed. The Reign of Terror was over.

The Vendée and Brittany

From the religious viewpoint, the two chief results of the uprising which had just been effected were the conclusion of [304] On Carrier, see Lenôtre, op. cit.

[305] Jauffret, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la Révolution, II, 353.

the Treaty of La Jaunais with the Vendean leaders and the reopening of a large number of churches.

That the resistance of the Vendée might be ended, the commander-in-chief of the Republican troops in the Vendée, Turreau, formerly Baron of Garambouville, had organized there, since January 20, 1794, twelve mobile columns, called "infernal columns," with orders to burn whatever could be burned.[306] But the result had to be awaited. In spite of the regrettable divisions that had arisen among the Vendean leaders, the 400,000 souls still [307] remaining in the Vendée proved themselves to be irreducible. In April the Convention impatiently gave Turreau a month to finish the undertaking,[308] which ended by an understanding, especially after the death of Robespierre, that violence and terror never had any effect on the souls of the Vendeans and Bretons, as firm as the granite on which they stood. They began by speaking of forgetting grievances, of harmony. The offer which the Vendeans themselves had made to the government was rejected until the 9th of Thermidor brought matters to an end. General Hoche, placed at the head of the troops of the West, made great efforts to prevent all plunder. Liberty of worship was in a way the basis. He said: "Rebuild your cottages, pray to God as if you mean it and work in your fields." A perspicacious and understanding man, Hoche joined to his talents of generalship a genuine ability to govern. This new policy succeeded in the country. Many priests, no longer considering the cause of the Church bound to the cause of the monarchy, recommended submission to the government. Toward the end of 1795 most of the peasants, without treating Charette as an enemy, refused to serve him, and maintained scrupulous neutrality. On December 2, 1794, Carnot, as member of the Committee of Public Safety, proposed the [306] See his order of the day to General Huché, dated 2nd Ventôse, in Veuillot, op. cit., p. 265.

[307] This is the appraisal given by the Conventionist Lequinio. Ibid., p. 268.

[308] Ibid., p. 293.

following decree and had it adopted by the Convention: "All people known in the districts of the West, on the shores of Brest and Cherbourg, by the name of rebels of the Vendée or Chouans, who lay down their arms within the month following the day of publication of the present decree will neither be molested nor be investigated in the future for taking part in their rebellion."

On all sides minds were prepared for peace. On February 17, 1795, eleven members of the National Convention on one hand and twenty Vendean officers on the other signed a treaty at La Jaunais near Nantes. The first three articles of the treaty are the following: "Article 1: Every individual and all sections of citizens whatever are able freely and peaceably to exercise their religion. Article 2: Individuals and ministers of all creeds whatever will not be troubled, disturbed or investigated for the free exercise, peaceful and internal, of their religion. Article 3: Civil authorities and commanders of the army are charged with taking the execution of the present treaty in hand." Breton and Vendean blood had not been shed in vain.

"Just as the fall of Robespierre had led the Republic to the notion of humanity from which the Vendée benefited, in like manner the religious liberty granted to it would lead the Republic finally to grant liberty of religion to the nation, not only in principle but in reality." [309] Louis Veuillot could write: "The resistance of the Vendée was not a mere episode in the vast, tragic picture of the fall of the old monarchy; it was the only action which had counterbalanced, for the future of French society, the victorious events of the Revolution. Royalty, nobility, institutions, laws, and distinctions of dress had all succumbed. That which the Vendée had protected especially, that which had put armed forces in its hands, never was lost. The Vendean fought for the cross." [310]

[309] Brugere, Tableau de l'histoire et de la littérature de l'Eglise, p. 1135.
[310] Quoted by Eugene Veuillot, op. cit., p. 7.

The revolution had not in reality brought the immediate cessation of the persecution against priests. "Two months after the fall of Robespierre some priests accused of emigration were even guillotined at Paris. These were the priests last released from prison. On the margin of one writ of liberation we read these words: "Postponed since he is a priest." [311] Moderates and Jacobins found themselves in accord when the question concerned religious matters. The clearly voiced will of the rural population was in favor of the re-establishment of worship, a will manifest not only in the West, but even in part of Normandy, in the sections of the central Massif in Franche-Comté and in some parts of the Midi, which exerted the first wholesome pressure on legislation. The Treaty of La Jaunais brought the movement to a close. "The Convention," as Aulard declares, "noted that the people were always Catholic, and loudly demanded the realization of the decree on liberty of worship. The Revolution had been able neither to assimilate Catholicism nor to destroy it, but had to resign itself to living side by side with it, considering religions as peculiar societies, which had the right to exist under law without interference from the state, which remained secular." [312] Such indeed were the thoughts that inspired the law of February 21, 1795, on the freedom of worship and that of May 30 on the reopening of non-alienated churches.

"In conformity with article 7 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man," reads the first article of February's law, "the practice of any cult cannot be disturbed." The truth is that the nine articles following this one are applied to restrict the expressing of this liberty of worship. Thus article 5 forbade "appearing in public in the dress, decoration, or costume appropriate to religious ceremonies"; article 3 forbade to communities "all purchase or renting of a place for the practice of religion"; and article 9 forbade "the making of any endowment, perpetual or for life, and the establishment of any tax to pay its expenses." [313] May's law determined that "citizens of communes or sections of a commune provisionally had the free use of buildings not alienated, originally intended for the exercise of worship" (art. 1). "When citizens of the same commune or of the same section practice different religions, their place of worship will be common," each religion will have days and hours fixed by the municipality (art. 4). "No one, however, will be permitted to exercise the ministry of any religion in these aforesaid buildings without having made an act of submission to the laws of the Republic" (art. 5).[314]

[311] Pisani, L'Eglise de Paris de la Révolution, II, 153. Father Emery, superior of St. Sulpice, was not freed until October 25, 1795, and Father Duclaud, his future successor, remained in prison until January, 1795.

[312] Aulard, Etudes et leçons sur la Révolution française, II, 139.

Under what conditions did the "citizens of communes or sections of communes" obtain the free use of their former churches not alienated? The answer to this question allows almost as many distinctions as existed in the matter of opening churches.[315] This condition was seen at Paris in the parish of St. Roch where the pastor, Father Marduel, exclusively managed all the financial administration of the parish through himself or his curate; but elsewhere the secular element interfered. At St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Eustache, St. Lawrence, St. Jacques du Haut-Pas, St. Etienne-du-Mont, societies of worship were formed which took the temporal administration of the parish into their hands, displaying a true zeal in the repair of churches, the purchase of objects necessary for worship, the maintenance of the ministers and officers, but sometimes exceeding the limits of canon law by their excessive meddling in parochial government.[316]

[313] Bulletin des lois. III, no. 665.

[314] Ibid., IV, no. 150.

[315] J. Grente, Le culte catholique à Paris de la Terreur au Concordat (Paris, 1903), p. 20.

[316] Grente, op. cit., pp. 21–24; Victor Pierre, L'Eglise Saint-Thomas d'Aquin pendant la Révolution; L. Soutif, "Une société du culte catholique à Paris pendant la

In the early months of 1795, many constitutional priests retracted their errors and returned to the Church. At Paris the vicars general of De Juigné received a large number of these recantations.[317] The movement was no less marked in the provinces. Every place saw priests abjuring the schism, as the newspapers of the time attest.[318] The large number of retractions is admitted by the constitutionalists themselves in their paper. It is the subject of more than ordinary derision and complaints to be found on each page. They treat the priests who abjured the schism as cowards and self-seekers.[319] Unquestionably the conduct of those who retracted at once after the papal condemnation of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, when the government reserved its favors for those alone who took the oath, was otherwise heroic. Now the state abandoned the constitutional clergy to the common law, concurring with the Catholics loyal to the Pope. Members of the constitutional clergy whined bitterly over this situation. One anonymous petitioner declared that the law of February 21, 1795, made any religion impossible for "lack of a place of worship, lack of ministers, and lack of funds." [320] Father Adrien declared: "Your decree of February too greatly favors the non-jurors who preach royalism; it has too little protection for Republican priests." [321] The behavior of the retractants was nevertheless most meritorious because the Church, before again admitting them into the body of the hierarchy, maintained steadfastly the observance of the première séparation," excerpt from La Revue des questions historiques, 1908; A. Mathiez, "L'exercise du culte sous la première séparation," from the Revue politique et parlementaire of January 10, 1907.

[317] Michel Priot, in his Mémoires, declares that he read the long list of these retractations in a special register preserved by the Archbishop of Paris. This register was lost in the destruction of 1830. Priot noted among the names of the retractors those of the two episcopal vicars of Gobel: Gerard and Mille. Picot, Mémoires, VI, 132.

[318] See the Annales de l' Abbé de Boulogne, III, 255.

[319] Annales de la religion, II, 597; IV, 121, 145; Picot, Mémoires, VI, 433.

[320] Quoted by Gazier, Etudes sur l'histoire religieuse de la Révolution, p. 258.

[321] Ibid.

severe tests which the Pope exacted from the priests who had taken the oath.[322] Required of them were public abjuration, abdication of the usurped parish, penance proportionate to the scandal given, restitution of ecclesiastical goods unduly collected, and other conditions. The retractant also ran the risk of encouraging the dislike of administrative authorities, who on the whole remained favorable to the constitutional Church and especially continued to hate the Roman Church.

We have no need, in fact, to exaggerate the improvement brought about in the situation of the Catholic clergy by the revolution of July 27 (9 Thermidor). The July reaction was more a political reaction than a religious one. Those same ones who triumphed could not be of great assistance to the Church. The reaction personified itself and showed especially in these "golden youth" made up of Girondin and royalist young men dressed in the fashion of dandies and wearing the green cape of the Breton Chouans. They soon made themselves masters of the streets of Paris. They indulged in festive gatherings at the Palais Royal, in the salons of Madame Tallien and Madame de Staël, leaving these gatherings to attack the Jacobins in their clubs with blows of their canes and making the streets resound with revengeful songs.

> The tardy day of vengeance
> At length makes hangmen pale.

At the theater they applauded these lines of Mahomet:

> Wipe out, great God, from the earth where we are > Whoever with joy pours forth men's blood.

This was the time when the émigré princess, the Count d'Artois, the Count of Provence, and the Prince de Condé, wondered if the moment had not come to re-establish the royalty and abolish the entire work of the Revolution. Paul Thureau-Dangin in his important work on the days following July 29 tells of the series of projects, conferences, and intrigues that had led up to the proclamation of Verona and the unfortunate expedition of Quiberon.[323]

[322] See the briefs of Pius V of April 13, 1791, and June 13, 1792; Hulot, Collectio brevium Pii VI, pp. 223, 270, 315, 329, etc.

The Church could not be expected to give its approval to a frivolous and skeptical society, which fought the results of the Revolution while perpetuating its profound causes. The clearest consequences of the July reaction was the provoking of reprisals against the clergy. In the session of April 14, 1795, Rewbell called for a redoubling of persecution against priests "who were not contented with saying Mass in church, but who wished to make France a new Vendée." "We need not persecute priests as priests," he declared, "but as seditious men, as apostles of royalism." [324] On September 22 Marie Joseph Chénier, in an account abounding with attacks on the Jacobins and the Catholics, proposed the institution of civil feasts and, on 17 Pluviôse, Escasseriaux indicated the spirit of these feasts where "men of all creeds would meet to celebrate the Supreme Being, listen to charming addresses on patriotism, and forget the illusions of fanaticism." Chénier's proposal did not pass. Just when it was going to be passed by acclamation, an unexpected opponent appeared on the rostrum. "If you were in good faith," he exclaimed, "you would admit that your clearly evident purpose is to destroy Catholicism." [325] And then, to deny the supposed alliance of the Church with royalty, the orator made an effort to show the joint solidarity of Catholicism with the Republic. In this refutation of a false allegation the speaker fell into a manifest error. The assembly went on scorn-

[323] P. Thureau-Dangin, Royalistes et républicans (the question of monarchy or republic from July 27 to November 11), pp. 3–67.

[324] Moniteur of April 17, 1795, p. 846.

[325] This speaker was Grégoire. Gazier, Histoire religieuse de la Révolution, pp. 242–44, 341–65.

fully to the order of the day. Chénier's proposal would be taken up later and it would triumph.

A law of November 20 affected the use of priests' rectories (not yet sold) for school purposes. On February 2 Lecointre asked the Convention to sell all the rectories and churches. The purpose appeared more and more in evidence: in place of the dispossessed clergy to install, as a new kind of pastor, the teachers, appointed guardians of a new orthodoxy. The project about public education, reported on November 20, 1795, by Lakanal, would, according to the intentions of its authors, "exercise an influence on the spread of knowledge and the destruction of prejudices." [326]

The Constitutional Church (1795)

These trials, which came from the enemies of all belief, were increased for the Church by more intimate afflictions, occasioned by the obstinate schism of the constitutional priests and by the revival of the discussions among loyal Catholics with respect to the last formula of the oath.

In the spring of 1795 the constitutional Church was in a state of decay. "Of the eighty-two bishops holding their sees in 1792, ten were dead, six of them on the scaffold; twenty-four had apostatized, of whom six had attempted marriage; twenty-four had renounced their ecclesiastical functions; twenty-four had fled almost untouched by the crisis, or if they had given up their ecclesiastical titles, this move was only after a long and depressing imprisonment. In every case, these rare survivors of the wreck, scattered, discouraged, abandoned by their priests, scorned by the faithful, systematically ignored by the civil authorities, still trembled at the thought that the Terror might start over again.[327] The law of July, in establishing freedom of worship and in virtually abolishing as a consequence the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, seemed to have inflicted a death sentence on the constitutional Church.[328] This effect would have been the final blow but for the energy of Grégoire.

[326] Aulard, Histoire politique de la Révolution, p. 535. Cf. Albert Duruy, L'instruction publique et la Révolution; A. Perrin, "Quelques grands ancêtres de nos manuels scolaires," in the Revue pratique d'apologetique of July 15, 1911. Cf. the anonymous work published in 1817, the Génie de la Révolution considéré dans l'éducation (Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'instruction publique), 1789, by the author of the Itinéraire de Buonaparte. This work has for its author Jean Baptiste Fabry (1780–1821), founder in 1805 of the Spectateur français.

A certain historian whom we like to quote here because he had under his eyes all the papers of the Bishop of Loir-et-Cher, says:

> Grégoire appeared in the midst of these drole figures as great because of the dignified attitude he had taken during the Reign of Terror. His merits might be called into question, he might be criticized for having been a slave to his prejudices and grudges and for not having preserved in the presentation of his ideas the calmness and impartiality which are a safeguard against exaggeration and injustice. He might well be called upon for a strict accounting of the stubbornness with which he defended false and dangerous opinions until the end; but it is not less certain that in 1795 he was the man who personified, if not religion, at least the constitutional party and who, having shown great courage at the moment when so many others rivaled one another in cowardice, he was the only one who seemed able to restore his Church, if it could be restored.[329]

Grégoire devoted himself to his work with tireless perseverance. During the winter of 1794 he gathered about him four of his colleagues: Royer from l'Ain, Saurine from Les Landes, Gratien from the Seine-Inférieure, and Desbois from La

[327] Pisani, II, 190.

[328] Aulard denies that the Civil Constitution was abolished by the law of 1795 (La Révolution française, Vol. LII, January, 1907); but does he not say in his The French Revolution, III, 262, that in 1795 the constitutional clergy no longer had any legal existence?

[329] Pisani, II, 192.

Somme. Royer was an honest nobody; Saurine, an intelligent but fantastic man; Gratien, a learned man deluded by all the revolutionary prejudices; Desbois, a priest of irreproachable morals and especially a money lender.[330] At the suggestion of Grégoire the five prelates formed a permanent council, styling itself the Council of United Bishops. Its first acts were to establish a party journal which took the title of Annales de la religion, and then with money placed at its disposal by Desbois, set up on rue Saint-Jacques an imprimerie-librairie-chrétienne destined to become the chief propaganda machine of the constitutional Church.[331] Some devoted laymen placed at the service of the "United" the full ardor which they had recently employed in favor of the Civil Constitution. On March 15, 1795, ten constitutional bishops published a document entitled, Lettre encyclique de plusieurs évêques de France à leurs frères les autres évêques et aux églises vacantes. This letter contained dogmatic declarations and disciplinary decisions: the belief in all that the Church believes was proposed while making reservations on the power of the pope; then, severe measures inspired by Jansenist rigorism were laid down with respect to those who had taken part in the worship of Reason.[332] In order to bring back the faithful to "the beautiful times of the primitive Church," they decided that in all the chief towns of dioceses whose bishop had died or disappeared, the senior pastors, united in a council under the name of "presbytery," would assume the directive authority. In fulfillment of this prescription, on March 31, 1795, four Paris pastors organized the presbytery of Paris, which, though not without storms, directed the constitutional clergy of Paris until November 3, 1801.[333] Pushing their audacity further, the "united bishops" installed themselves on April 27 in the church of Saint-Médard without having bought the property or rented it or obtained any title of administration. Many other episcopal cities (e.g., Versailles and Colmar) made up presbyteries like that of Paris. Grégoire, the soul of the entire movement, spent himself on it without counting the cost.

[330] On these bishops, see Pisani, Répertoire biographique de l'épiscopat constitutionnel.

[331] The Annales de la religion lasted until 1803. For its foundation, see Gazier, Etudes sur l'histoire religieuse de la Révolution, pp. 282–88. To combat this Annales, Fathers Sicard and Jauffret founded the Annales religieuses et littéraires in February, 1796, which, under the direction of Father de Boulogne, soon became the Annales catholiques.

[332] See the text of this letter in the Annales de la religion, I, 49–58.

The leader of the constitutional Church was not satisfied with being impudent to the civil authorities: he was far too aggressive and haughty to the clergy who had not taken the oath. Strict in regard to repentent sinners, he accused those who did not take the oath of moral laxity, letting fly at them the revived epigrams of Pascal. The law of May 30, which permitted the opening of churches, was a new point of conflict between the constitutional clergy and those loyal to the pope. Here the non-jurors had to retreat before the jurors; there the two clergies continued to be separated like the hours of the day; everywhere Catholics were to suffer attacks and intrigues from the party to which Grégoire had given direction, a party few in number, but active and busy, whose several members had compromised with the men of the Revolution. Not only had Durand de Maillaine and Lanjuinais collaborated with Daunou and Boissy d'Anglas in drawing up the famous constitution of 1795, but they were always fighting their common enemy, the clergy who submitted to the pope.

During this time the loyal clergy suffered from fresh and painful divisions, born on the occasion of the promise of submission to the laws of the Republic which the law of May 30 had required from priests to allow them the use of the churches. Some spurned it with horror as apostasy, others counseled it as licit and useful. Said the former: "Religion and justice join to forbid such a step." They showed that incompatible with the most formal laws of the Church were many laws of the Republic: the laws authorizing divorce, suppressing the Sabbath repose, consecrating the Republican calendar, and authorizing the sale of Church property; and that even when the act of submission would not be contrary to religion, it would still be illicit because, in making it, priests would be recognizing the Republic, a recognition incompatible with the fidelity due to the legitimate sovereign.[334]

[333] The register of the deliberations of the "presbytery of Paris" is preserved in the archives of Grazier.

But many ecclesiastics, among others de Bausset, bishop of Alais, Father de Boulogne, director of the Annales ecclésiastiques, and in particular Father Emery, the superior of St. Sulpice, were not upset by this reasoning. To prove that the promise of submission was licit, Father Emery showed that the promised submission might be regarded simply as opposition to the revolt; but Catholics have as a principle that of non-rebellion, even against faulty laws; that submission to the laws of the state should be understood as a submission to civil and political laws; moreover, that this submission implied neither approval of these laws nor of the authority to which they submitted. To support his interpretation he called upon the text of a circular sent June 17, 1795, by the legislative committee to the directories of departments. Says the circular: "For you to point out that the Civil Constitution of the Clergy is no longer a law of the Republic, is useless for you. Besides, always recall this principle: the law purposes to assure and facilitate more and more the free practice of religion." [335] As to the usefulness of the proposed step, Father Emery saw it in the possibility of taking immediate possession of the churches, coveted by the constitutionals and threatened with disaffection or ruin, and bringing them back to the use of Catholic worship.

Meanwhile a law of September 20, 1795, stated more precisely the sense of the promise, imposing the following formula: "I recognize that the whole citizenry is the ruler, and I promise submission and obedience to the laws of the Republic." The arguments continued, urged on by one side or the other with ardent convictions, becoming more and more sharp and painful. In the mean time the labors of Daunon, Boissy d'Anglas, Durand de Maillaine, and Lanjuinais had finally resulted (August 10, 1795) in the Constitution of the year III by which an effort was made, without returning to the monarchy, to avoid the disagreeable features of the means employed by demagogues. The executive power, confined to a directory of five members elected for five years; the legislative power and the judicial power, divided between two elected councils and renewable periodically; and an ingenious system of election in two stages: all this division of powers was calculated to make any dictatorship impossible. On October 26, 1795, the Convention broke up; the next day the government was formed on a new basis, and the horizon opened on hopes for order and peace.

[334] Notice published by one part of the episcopate and quoted by Sciout, Histoire de la Constitution civile du clergé, VI, 398.

[335] Quoted by Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, I, 435.

CHAPTER VI

The Church Supplanted by Civil Religion (1795–99)

ORDER and peace were the two outstanding needs of France; but the regime of the Directory was unable to satisfy these needs. In confiding the executive power to five men and the legislative power to two different bodies, the authors of the Constitution of 1795 aimed at neutralizing tyrannical influences, but they merely stirred up conflicts, strifes, and coups d'état. This result was the more to be expected since behind these constituted powers two new influences were growing and tending toward predominance: that of the ideologists of the Institute and that of the generals of the army.

An incomplete account of the spiritual movement and even of the political movement of this period would be given if the Institute were left out. "This grand, learned body," writes Albert Vandal, "which took its existence from the Constitution, under the same title as the Directory and the two councils, almost formed a fourth power in the state. It was the guardian of doctrine." [1]

The shrewd ambition of General Bonaparte was not mistaken here. He hastened to add that "he belonged to the religion of the Institute." [2] These words were a way of expressing the cleverest compliment. Most of the members of the Institute were deeply anti-Christian. Napoleon was confronted with their impious sectarianism at the time of the Concordat. From this body, as we shall see, rose the system destined to replace the Catholic religion.

[1] Vandal, L'avènement de Bonaparte, p. 4.

[2] See Aulard, Etudes et leçons sur la Révolution française, II, 143.

On the other hand, by the same force of events, the influence of the generals made itself felt even in the political field. The momentous wars of the Convention had stirred up extreme patriotism. In the midst of heaped-up ruins the military establishment had grown in power. Such leaders as Marceau, Hoche, Kleber, and Massena, were strong with the confidence of the soldier. One still more famous would rise in the Italian campaigns and soon absorb all the others. Meanwhile everything that called itself patriotic or national was sure to find an echo among the people. If a new religion could become acclimated in France, this would have to be, seemingly, a national religion.

Until then the Revolution was a work especially of destruction; the Directory now assumed the task of rebuilding. Moreover, politicians, theorists, and generals were all imbued with that vague idealism taken from Rousseau's writings, which were an influence inspiring the entire revolutionary work. Robespierre had said, in a program of action as vast as the world: "We wish to substitute in our country morality for selfishness, truth for splendor, a high-minded and mighty people for a frivolous and wretched people, the virtues of the Republic for the vices of the monarchy. We desire that France may become the model of nations, the fear of oppressors, the consolation of the downtrodden. To see the dawn of universal happiness shining, that is our ambition, our goal." [3] The foes of Robespierre, in breaking his political power, had nothing to disown in this program. Rousseau's philosophy, on which they had all been nourished, reminded them that "the question is less of convincing men than of arousing them"; [4] that "morality reaches men only by robbing them of all their faculties"; [5] "by the passions we must make men happy." [6] They concluded that [3] Rapport du 5 fevrier, 1794, on the principles of public morals.

[4] Mirabeau, Travail sur l'éducation publique, 1791, p. 22.

[5] Talleyrand, Rapport sur l'instruction publique, 1791, p. 111.

[6] Vergniaud, in the session of November 9, 1792; Moniteur of November 11.

their action ought to be first of all a religious action. But the new religion would have to be distinct from the old one by two traits: it would be natural and civic. Grégoire had said: "The Revolution returns us to nature." [7] David added: "Men are only what the government makes them."

The foundation of a natural and civic religion was now going to be the dominant preoccupation of the men who pretended to guide public opinion under the Directory. Such an undertaking was certain to run aground, but only after it had profoundly disturbed men's souls and upset society.

One man who despised the theorists of the Directory and who scornfully called them "the ideologists," General Bonaparte, had devised a more practical project. With that positive spirit, and that sense of the real and the realizable which he would reveal later with so much clearness in the discussion of the civil code and in the negotiation of the Concordat, Bonaparte understood that the only religion to restore was the traditional religion of France, and the only way to make it a national institution was by coming to terms with the pope. In the first days of June, 1796, following the events to which we have just returned, he sent to Pius VI, through the good offices of Azara, the Spanish minister at Rome, the request for a papal bull recognizing the new Constitution. With this act they would answer for the French government's side with generous and kindly measures in regard to the Church. The Pope did not refuse to enter upon the path thus proposed and, at any rate, the draft of a brief was drawn up which corresponded with the presumed wishes of the Directory.[8] Pius VI proclaimed the recognition of the French Republic and charged Catholics to be subject to it "without allowing themselves to be misled by an ill-ordered devotion (sub pietatis colore) which would give the innovators a pretext to discredit religion." [9] Cacault,[10] the representative of France at Rome, communicated the document to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Delacroix, in August, 1796, and the Annales de la religion [11] published it as did the Annales catholiques.[12] But as the French government had never given or definitely promised the legitimate satisfactions which General Bonaparte had led to be expected, the brief was not even communicated to the bishops and the nuncios, nor was it officially promulgated in any manner.[13]

[7] Grégoire, Rapport of 12 Prairial, year I.

[8] Pisani, III, 95; Giobbio, La chiesa e lo stato in Francia durante la Rivoluzione, pp. 305, 323, 324; De Teil, Naples et le Directoire, p. 238.

This brief, which bore the date of July 5, 1796, and which began with the words Pastoralis sollicitudo, thus never had any canonical value. This circumstance, however, was not an evident matter for the people of the day. The publication of the brief stirred up tempests. While the royal émigrés asserted that it was false, that it was a pure invention and was reprobated by the Pope,[14] at the same time the Jacobins called it "a shameful recantation;" [15] while, curiously enough, the constitutionals violently attacked an act which no longer in any way gave them the exclusive privilege of submission to the laws,[16] the superior of St. Sulpice seeing in this brief, whose authenticity he did not question, the confirmation of his opinion, published a translation in a small pamphlet.[17] It appeared that the document expressed the Pope's thoughts; it was never promulgated, nor was it ever further attacked.[18]

[9] See the full Latin text in Pisani, III, 109.

[10] He had received his credentials January 19, 1793. See Gendry, II, 233.

[11] Annales de la religion, III, 489–91.

[12] Annales catholiques, II, 241–43.

[13] See a letter of the Secretary of State, published in the Annales catholiques, III, 477.

[14] Annales catholiques, III, 476.

[15] Amis des lois, cited by Pisani, III, 101.

[16] Annales de la religion, V, 529–51.

[17] Paris, printed by Guebart.

[18] The discussions, raised with respect to the brief Pastoralis among the men of the day, were perpetuated by historians. Baldassari believes in its authenticity; Méric, in his Histoire de M. Emery, places it in doubt; Gendry does not venture to

Second Encyclical of the Constitutionals

Napoleon's daring project had failed, but it would be repeated with greater success five years later. In the interim the Constitutional Church, profiting by the division of the Catholics, gained strength, claimed to be the national Church in the full force of the term, and was unwilling to share this title with any other institution.

On December 13, 1795, the four constitutional bishops who had taken the name of "United" published a second encyclical addressed "to their brethren the other bishops and to the vacant Churches." Protesting "their unshakable firmness in the faith and in the ancient discipline," they haughtily laid claim to an exclusive right of regulating the internal organization of the Gallican Church, denying this right both to the pope and to the state. They proclaimed the abolition of episcopal councils (established in 1791), abandoning, they said, "that innovation ill according with the pen of history," and replaced the councils by "presbyteries." [19] Their aim was the convoking of a national council; at this council the Church of France would receive its definitive organization. The encyclical of March 15, 1795, had clearly declared that religion was a national affair, and that the Catholic Church was nothing more than an aggregation of different national Churches united by the bonds of charity.[20] The national council then logically became the supreme authority. But the lack of safety on the highways, which were infested by bandits, and the disturbance of wars, had until now delayed the meeting of the assembly. According to the Annales de la religion, they were waiting "for the olive pronounce clearly and merely speaks of it "with utmost reserve" (Gendry, Pie VI, II, 250). Pisani is of the opinion that a simple outline of the brief was prepared, which the unwillingness of the Directory did not permit to be followed up. Pisani, III, 95–100. This last view seems to us the most likely.

[19] Encyclical letter of December 13, 1795, p. 44.

[20] Encyclical letter of March 13, 1795 (chapter 3, article 1 of the preamble).

branch of peace to cast its shadow over the soil of the fatherland." [21] This moment seemed to have arrived in the spring of 1797. A circular in the month of March gave notice that the meeting of the council was not far off.[22] A semi-official note, published in the Annales, fixed the solemn opening for August 15, the feast of the Assumption. On July 22 the Annales de la religion, at the close of negotiations with the Directory, announced that the government stated it "could only applaud such peaceful and admirable intentions" as those that have been made known to it with regard to the coming council.[23]

The assembly, opened as scheduled, was presided over by Claude Le Coz, bishop of Rennes.[24] Grégoire had cleverly remained in the background. To prevent Le Coz from taking the leadership of the opposition, Grégoire supported him for the presidency. Le Coz was an obstinate and aggressive man and accomplished in debate. For the past two years he had supplied bitter contributions to the Annales de la religion, being always ready to speak and to write, with equal self-assurance, on any subject whatever. Grégoire thought that in an assembly which was not lacking in utopians and loquacious men, Le Coz, instead of being a perpetual leader of the opposition, would make an authoritative presiding officer, and with a firm hand would be able to hold in check the nervous or calculated agitations of the malcontents and therefore to dominate them.

In turning over the journals of the period, the Annales de la religion and the Voix du Conciliateur, which praise the deeds and achievements of the conciliar fathers, the Annales catholiques and the Patriote français, which note the regrettable incidents, and especially in reading the valuable and almost un-

[21] Annales de la religion, II, 543.

[22] Ibid., V, 144.

[23] Ibid., V, 305.

[24] In their encyclical of December 13, 1795, the United Bishops had given up the name of the department of which they called themselves bishops and took the name of their episcopal city.

obtainable Journal de concile national de France,[25] we can note that important manifestation whose soul was Grégoire.

The meetings of the congregations were held in a rented house on rue des Saints-Pères; the solemn sessions were held at Notre Dame. The Journal du concile national mentions the presence of nine bishops and fifty-two priests at the first session.[26] The sixth and last session took place on November 15.

The outstanding event was the reading of a long report by Grégoire, entitled "Report of the United Bishops." [27] After giving a table of the constitutional Church,[28] he recommended the various works of propaganda undertaken under its auspices: the Annales de la religion, the Voix du conciliateur, and the Société de philosophie chrétienne, founded "to tighten the bonds which, by joining the love of religion with love of the Republic, would identify the qualities of Christians and of citizens." [29] The author of the report then enlarged on his correspondence with foreign Churches. For some time past, this widespread propaganda was his chief concern. As the Constituents at the time when they were drawing up the Declaration of the Rights of Man, as Robespierre when he was having decreed the worship of the Supreme Being and belief in the immortality of the soul, Grégoire likewise wished to exert his influence on the world. He spoke of works that he had sent to Spain, of constitutional encyclicals that had been spread abroad from Trebizond to Quebec, of the hopes he expected to be realized in Germany, where the Annales de la religion had [25] This Journal appeared from August 17 to November 15, 1797. The Voix du conciliateur appeared likewise during the sessions of the council in seven numbers of twenty-four pages each. The purpose of the latter publication was doctrinal and polemical. Pisani, following the Annales de la religion, states that he "was not able to have at his disposal the Journal du concile."

[26] Journal du concile, no. 1, pp. 20–22. The Journal gives the list of the members present.

[27] This report is found reproduced in the Annales de la religion, VI, 1–28, 29–73, 223–28.

[28] The table is not accurate. See Pisani, III, 158.

[29] Annales de la religion, VI, 17.

been translated, of General Toussaint-Louverture's request "for a dozen priests who had submitted to the laws," [30] of steps he had taken to introduce the spirit of the Constitutional Church into all the colonies, and of his hopes to see the disappearance of the temporal power of the popes and the Inquisition. To the grand inquisitor of Spain he wrote a long letter intended to make him ashamed of his office.[31]

Decrees of the Pseudo-council

Purely theological questions held little place in the acts of the council. Hardly noticeable was a timid demonstration in favor of Jansenism in the decree on faith,[32] and a trace of Gallican opinions in the decree on marriage,[33] the essence of which was in the civil contract. The decrees about worship and discipline engaged the further attention of the members of the council. To be noted also are the wise prescriptions about the conduct of the clergy and the faithful, and the measures to be taken to safeguard children from the corruptive lessons of immoral or impious teachers.[34] But what seemed to be dominant was the desire to make of the Constitutional Church a national and republican Church. The council's first decree begins with the following articles: "Article 1: Every French Catholic owes to the laws of the Republic an entire and genuine submission. Article 2: The Gallican Church admits to the ranks of its pastors only those who shall have shown their fidelity to the Republic." [35] The council at the same time endeavored to reconcile among its own members the two parties of the juring fathers: those who followed Grégoire and those who remained faithful

[30] Ibid., VI, 55–58.

[31] See this letter, ibid., pp. 373–96.

[32] Journal du concile, November 15, 1797, pp. 171–75.

[33] Ibid., pp. 162–64. Article 1 says: "The Gallican Church recognizes as legitimate marriages only those that have been contracted in accord with the civil laws."

[34] Annales de la religion, VI, 85–88.

[35] Journal du concile, September 7, 1797, p. 51.

to the ideas of Gobel; it tried a conciliation with the non-jurors and in this sense wrote a letter to the Pope; at the same time it tended to penetrate the masses, whom it invited to its grand ceremonies in the metropolitan church of Paris.

Failure of the Council

None of these goals was attained. The elections in the month of Floreal of the year V shifted the powers to the moderates. On 29 Prairial (June 17, 1797), Camille Jordan, deputy from Lyons, said what has since then been often repeated: "Give us the religion of our fathers." The Annales de la religion accused Jordan of being in accord with the non-juring priests.[36] On 7 Fructidor (August 24) the elders passed the resolution that opened the doors of France to all the exiled priests. The constitutionals saw therein a lessening of their hope to keep for themselves a privileged position in France. The coup d'état of 18 Fructidor (September 4, 1797) did not alter the situation. Three days later Le Coz vainly had the conciliar assembly take a solemn oath of submission to the Republic. The Council of the Five Hundred, upon receiving notification of this oath on September 21 (fifth complementary day of the year V), declared that "they could not recognize that religious corporation." [37] The Pope did not reply to the letter which the pseudo-council sent to him.

But Grégoire's work was not altogether futile. He reunited and reorganized the constitutional Church, which had been scattered by the Terror.

Dispersed, frightened, dishonored by the faults of their confreres, the juring priests wandered like stray sheep. The council gave them confidence. In three-fourths of the departments the constitutional

[36] Annales de la religion, V, 499.
[37] Moniteur, September 26, 1797, p. 20.

bishops resumed their functions. Grégoire's energy had accomplished this wonder: not that of a dead man brought back to life, but of a corpse which a powerful electric current made stand up on its feet. After 18 Fructidor, however, the persecution begins again, less bloody than that of 1793, but no less dangerous, often more perfidious. In the course of this trial, the corpse, momentarily galvanized, slowly fell into decomposition from which it had been drawn by the mighty but artificial effort of the council.[38]

A National Religion

Thus neither the clergy that submitted to Rome nor the constitutional clergy satisfied what had been one of the most cherished and persistent dreams of the men of the Revolution: to found a national religion, rejuvenated in its dogmas and its discipline, and to make of that religion an instrument of propaganda for the revolutionary doctrines. Such had been one of the first aims of the Constituent Assembly. Such was still the aim of the Directory.[39]

But on the morrow of the Fructidor coup d'état, while feeling the need of shaking loose from the Constitutional Church, the new government found a new religion, already organized, which seemed more in conformity with its own aspirations: this was the cult of theophilanthropy.

This new religion came forth from the initiative of a book publisher, Chemin-Dupontès, a person otherwise insignificant, who, in October, 1796, issued a Manuel des théanthropophiles. Freemason Chemin seemed to have no other purpose but to found a sort of open Freemasonry;[40] but his project was revised and broadened by a man of higher intellectual worth, the philanthropist Valentin Hauy, who was the renowned founder of the Institute of Blind Workingmen. Hauy himself seems to have belonged to Freemasonry;[41] at any rate he had enthusiastically rallied to the revolutionary ideas.

[38] Pisani, III, 177.

[39] This conclusion is what two historians, belonging to diametrically opposed views, had demonstrated: Father Sicard, in his A la recherche d'une religion civile, and Mathiez, in his second doctoral thesis, Les origines des cultes révolutionnaires.

[40] This expression is the one used by Mathiez in his learned work, La théophilanthropie et le culte decadaire, p. 82. Mathiez destroyed the legend that made Larevellière-Lépeaux the inventor of theophilanthropy.

The new religion, which Hauy called theophilanthropy instead of theanthropophily, rested on the twofold dogma of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. But these truths should not be proved by reason; they were admitted "as necessary for the preservation of society and the welfare of the individuals." Morality rested on a principle as simple as it was also vague. The Manual said: "Good is everything that tends to preserve man and to perfect him." Worship was at the same time domestic and public. Domestic worship consisted in two essential acts: an elevation of the soul each morning before the marvels of creation; an examination of conscience each evening before going to sleep. The public worship is first of all paid to God under the vault of the sky, "the only temple worthy of the Divinity"; but people were to assemble also "in temples built by the genius of men."[42] The direction of the Society of Theophilanthropists pertained to two committees, one charged with the material and financial part, the other with the religious and moral part.

The first meeting for worship was held on January 9, 1797. The new cult at first seems to have met with only indifference or hostility on the part of the towns and the government. But [41] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 89. Valentin Hauy was the brother of Father Hauy, an excellent priest, the creator of cristallography.

[42] The following are some excerpts from the prayer proposed to the theophilanthropists: "Father of nature, I do not ask of Thee the power to do good; Thou hast given me this power and with it the conscience to love the good, reason for knowing it, the freedom to choose it. . . . I will not address Thee with indiscreet prayers. . . . I beg of Thee only to correct my errors and those of others, because nearly all the evils that afflict men come from their errors. . . . Fully trusting in Thy justice and Thy goodness, my only desire is that Thy will be done" (quoted by Mathiez, op. cit., p. 96).

the crisis of the year V had a considerable influence on its development.

The Directors, until then united, were now divided. Carnot and Barthélemy desired a policy of appeasement, but Rewbell and Larevellière-Lépeaux, considering the Republic in danger, counseled violent measures. After 18 Fructidor the deportation of Barthélemy and the flight of Carnot left the power in the hands of their foes.

Larevellière-Lépeaux, the son of a Vendean middle-class father, at an early age withdrew from Catholicism, which he regarded as an instrument of oppression and corruption. At Angers, where he settled after the Constituent Assembly, he had been one of the leading orators of the revolutionary clubs. He was a clever and experienced lawyer and enjoyed a general reputation for honesty. But nothing was sacred to this man when his dominant passion spoke in him: that passion was hatred for priests. This educated bourgeois had another passion: innate contempt for the populace.[43]

The time was the moment when General Bonaparte was marching against Rome and when the days of the papacy seemed to be numbered. Larevellière, if we are to accept the Mémoires of Barras, showed for the first time his sympathy for the theophilanthropists.[44] To him this utterly simple worship seemed to be of a nature to replace advantageously the dying Christianity. At the Institute,[45] of which he was a most influential member, he delivered a discourse devoted almost wholly to the praise of theophilanthropy. Of a melancholy nature and romantic imagination, Larevellière, when speaking of the new religion, soared to lyrical heights. The replacing of a fallen Catholicism by a simple, reasonable, natural, and grand worship was his chimera. "I tell you," he said, "that man has in him a religious fiber which we must recognize. . . . Society

[43] Mathiez, op. cit., p. 131.
[44] Barras, Mémoires, II, 347.
[45] On May 1, 1797.

asks of you a God that is not the God of Catholicism." Presently adherents came to him from all the parties. Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, author of Paul et Virginie, the poet Marie-Joseph Chénier, the journalist Sébastien Mercier, the poet Andrieux, the former minister Servan, the ex-Barnabite Dubroca, who became the outstanding orator of the sect, all these flocked to theophilanthropy. Some towns raised obstacles against the ceremonies of the new worship; Larevellière and the minister of police, Sotin, overcame these oppositions.[46] "The theophilanthropists were openly favored, they received subsidies, their books were placed in the program of the official schools, Hauy was appointed a member of the board of education of the department of the Seine, the Institute itself joined the party and appointed a commission "instructed to find out means of making the speeches and the music of the national feasts heard by all those present, however numerous they might be." [47] The theophilanthropists at Paris used, concurrently with the Catholics, a large number of churches, among which were Notre Dame and St. Eustache. Grégoire has left us a description of their religious ceremonies, in which "readers" vested in a blue habit, with a rose-colored cincture and a white gown, read in turn from the Bible, Confucius, Aristotle, Voltaire, and Franklin.[48]

But division soon made its appearance among the leaders of theophilanthropy. One of the new followers, Etienne Siauve, an apostate priest and head of the philosopher theophilanthropists, complained that the religion imagined by Chemin was not sufficiently in accord with the principles of Rousseau and the republican ideal; but the people, for whose sake all the ceremonies had been provided, gave evidence of a growing dislike for these novelties. At Sainte-Marguerite, during the office, a placard was posted bearing these words: "Band of pickpockets! Watch out for your handkerchiefs." The words had a notable success. The people jokingly called the followers of the new religion the "band of pickpockets." An official report (in the month of Nivôse, year VII) said: "The number of theophilanthropists is not increasing, and their worship is without acclaim." Chemin, discouraged, asked for a pension, and Dubroca requested a place in the ministry. After the forced resignation of Larevellière (June 18, 1799), the hopeless decline followed. From that time on, theophilanthropy merely vegetated. The police decree of 11 Ventôse of the year X, explicitly banning "the practice of the natural religion called theophilanthropy," thus confirmed an accomplished fact. The religion which had the favor of the Directory and the Institute did not enjoy two years of regular functioning.

[46] Mathiez, La Révolution et l'Eglise (1910), p. 207.
[47] Ibid., p. 196.
[48] Grégoire, Histoire des sectes religieuse, I, 396.

The Weekly Holyday

The theophilanthropy had indeed met with the concurrence of another worship, that which was called the decadaire worship. This worship went back to the institution of the Republican calendar. A decree of 14 Germinal of the year VI (April 4, 1798) ordered the decadaire repose for all governmental bodies, and for all the work yards. The laws of 17 Thermidor (August 4, 1798) and 23 Fructidor (September 9) emphasized these ordinances. But soon the fact was evident that the people could not be condemned to the repose without doing something to occupy their time. Decadaire feasts were organized. The poet François Neufchâteau, who was now Minister of the Interior, with his facile and elegant pen drew up the program of national rejoicings. These included the feast of youth, that of married couples, that of old age, that of thanksgiving, and that of agriculture.[49]

At the feast of the sovereignty of the people, the old men and the fathers were to relate "their former exploits, the marvels of the Revolution, the principal traits of its history." In country districts the farmers, in the words of the program, "should gather about the wine-press and the still wet vats the active and faithful cohorts that have helped them in despoiling the mountains of their resplendent booty." [50]

[49] See Mathiez, op. cit., p. 429.

Mighty efforts were made to exploit the Republican calendar. With its sonorous, poetical, and reminiscent names, which summoned before the eyes of the people the whole cycle of the year, from the splendors of Thermidor to the sadness of Nivôse, it was expected to win acceptance by its own worth and promptly to supplant the outmoded cycle of moribund Catholicism.

The decadi, last and culminating day of the decade, would replace Sunday. Instead of the Lord's Day the people would undoubtedly prefer "the Day of the Fatherland." In fact, the decadaire worship pretended to be, contrary to the old religions, which were based on absent and mysterious realities, the worship of these two palpable and visible realities: nature and fatherland. On the day of the decadi, then, in a scene both pastoral and solemn, the officials of the canton gathered the people about an altar raised to the glory of the nation, and then, with an accompaniment of organ music and song, read the laws and commented on them, questioned the children, and recounted the traits of civic virtue.

The hollowness of these feasts soon led to their lack of esteem. Then dances and games were introduced, conducted by song leaders. But the dance itself did not possess the gift of awakening the animation of these solemnities. Even under the Directory, the admission was made that people do not have the heart to dance every day.[51]

More was to follow. Soon the decadaire worship was seen to be, in the mind of its organizers, an instrument of the destruction of the Christian worship. "The idea of elevating the national sentiment by means of spectacles suited to strike the people's imagination, undoubtedly had in itself nothing but what was lofty and praiseworthy. It corresponded to the theatrical taste of the period. The folly of the revolutionists was to set it up in opposition to the traditional beliefs. The altar of the fatherland was erected in the midst of the church, often relegating the tabernacle to a place behind the choir or to some lower place on the side. During the lay office orders were given to remove the religious emblems entirely or to cover them. Catholics were given their place and their hours. At Paris the Catholic worship had to cease on the decadi at precisely half-past eight in the morning and could not be resumed until after the civil ceremonies, "provided, however, that it was not later than six o'clock in the evening in the summer, and eight o'clock in the winter." Elsewhere a number of government officials, on the pretext that the decadi was the only day legally a holiday and that the rest of the time should belong to work, issued a prohibition against the opening of the churches on any other day, whereby public worship had to bow before the decadaire worship and be subordinate to it.[52] Thus the decadi suppressed the Sunday, with which of course it was not in accord; it suppressed the Sunday Mass, the most important act of worship, the necessary act, the act which, in the eyes of the people, expresses and marks out the religious life.[53]

[50] Boissy d'Anglas, Essai sur les fêtes, p. 53.
[51] Sicard, A la recherche d'une religion civile, p. 185.

More oppression followed. "In certain respects the anti-religious mania passed all bounds and reached the height of the absurd to supreme ridicule. By a decree of 14 Germinal of the year IV, fish markets were forbidden to open on the days formerly Fridays; at Paris the oratory in the former chapel of the Carmelites was closed because at that place had been celebrated the feast of the Kings; at Strasbourg a merchant was found guilty for having set out, in his store, more fish than ordinarily; 350 gardeners were prosecuted for having sanctified the Sunday by not taking their vegetables to market that day." [54]

[52] See the decree of the consuls (7 Nivôse, year VIII), revoking these measures. Correspondance de Napoléon, VI, 4471.

[53] Albert Vandal, L'avènement de Bonaparte (1903), p. 30.

"To ridicule for such measures was soon added the irritation of the country people, who for the most part were attached to the religion of their fathers. They were annoyed, they were disturbed in their habits, in the sale of their produce, in their way of reckoning the days and months, in all their religious convictions. So many various causes were sure to strike with sterility all the efforts of the Revolution in spite of the continually renewed attempts and a perseverance that continued for almost ten years." [55] Edgar Quinet wrote: "Feasts, anniversaries of the Revolution, where are you? The people have not kept a single one of the feasts instituted from 1789 to 1800. That immense commotion has not succeeded in removing even one village saint." [56]

Irreligion (1789–99)

From 1789 to 1799 the religious ideal of the Revolution had, as we have seen, undergone a profound decline. The authors of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy still believed in the Church, although distorting the notion of it; the constitutional fathers of Grégoire's school, even after their schism, professed their faith in the divinity of Christ; the theophilanthropists had established their worship on the basic dogmas of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul; the adherents of the decadaire cult saw in the Revolution and the fatherland a vague incarnation of the Divinity. But, under the Directory, the learned body that had the high pretention of directing the movement of ideas, the Institute, was made up of men who had lost all belief in Christ, in God, and in an immortal soul. Lalande, Naigeon, Cabanis, Volney, all these were out-and-out materialists, avowed atheists.

[54] Ibid., p. 33. For the text of the decrees, see Sciout, Histoire de la Constitution civile, III, 176, 390.

[55] Sicard, loc. cit.

[56] Quinet, Œuvres, II, 91.

"In every work that competed for the prize of the Institute," says Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, "the name of God was for them a sign of reprobation." The author of Les harmonies de la nature experienced the sentiments of his colleagues when (July 3, 1798) he was reading to them a report on the foundation of morality. Scarcely had he pronounced the name of God when a cry of rage broke out in the meeting. He was jeered at, threatened, and challenged to a duel. They asked him where he had seen God, what shape God had. Shouted Cabanis: "I swear that there is no God." Bernardin de Saint-Pierre was obliged to leave the hall. His report was not printed by the Institute: the author had to resort to the expedient of having it distributed at the door of the assembly hall.[57]

In 1796 an article in the Décade philosophique, attributed to the academician Andrieux,[58] greeted the appearance of Diderot's posthumous work, La religieuse, in which convent life was portrayed with the features most calculated to make it hated.[59] In 1798 the academician Naigeon, emphasizing his atheistic propositions by tendentious notes, brought out the complete works of Diderot. The irreligious book of Dupuis on L'origine de tous les cultes, which appeared in 1795 and was [57] See Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, Œuvres, I, 236–45. The report will be found, VII, 371–87.

[58] Diderot, Œuvres, V, 5.

[59] Some writers (e.g., Ludovic Sciout, Histoire de la Constitution civile du clergé, I, 150) have thought that Diderot's La religieuse influenced the abolition of monastic vows. True, some literary critics (e.g., Louandre in his Introduction aux Conteurs français de XVIII^e siècle) made the same mistake. La religieuse, written about 1770, was known at that time by a few friends of the author in manuscripts that circulated secretly; but it was not published until the year V. See Diderot, ibid., V, 3, 175.

published in an abridged popular edition in 1796, went to the extreme of contempt for all religion.

From such a regime, whatever the apparent moderation of its policy, nothing could be expected but vexatious measures against Catholicism. This fear became a reality. While with one hand, as we might say, the Directory sought to erect a new religion, with the other it ceaselessly struck the Catholic Church in head and members. Some historians have judged they might call this period the Little Terror or the Second Terror. The period well deserves this name. "On certain points the Directory aggravated the Great Terror itself, whether by more scholarly or more severe laws or by the privilege it assumed of executing these laws itself." [60]

The Terror under the Directory

The "Second Terror" did not begin in reality until after 18 Fructidor (September, 1797), but attacks upon the Holy See date from the first days of the Directory.

Let us recall that (February 6, 1793), after the murder of Bassville, the Convention imposed on the Pope several conditions to be carried out if he wished to avoid war with France. Whether he doubted the sincerity of the French government or found those conditions unacceptable, the Supreme Pontiff considered that he could not accept them.

This attitude which in other times would have aroused the most violent recriminations, passed almost unnoticed. The plans of the Conventionals were not in agreement: Robespierre was expressly against an invasion of Rome; the internal divisions which split the Convention turned its attention from any other affairs; furthermore, the French troops had too much to do elsewhere, and conditions were not ready for a campaign in Italy.

[60] Victor Pierre, La Terreur sous le Directoire (1887), p. viii.

One of the first concerns of the Directory was to realize the threats made by the Convention. To meet this need it had to count on the army.

Amid so many accumulated ruins, the Convention, as we have already remarked, left untouched one institution, the army. As Albert Vandal wrote: "At the time of the great spasm the accumulated energy at the basis of French generations, an energy fashioned in the virile education of the old regime, suddenly aroused by the patriotic idea, occurred in a terrifying explosion. . . . Apparently the force, the heat, and the richness of the Gallic blood took refuge in the armies that continued to defend the Republic." [61] The names of Marceau, Hoche, and Schérer eclipsed those of Larevellière-Lépeaux, Rewbell, and Letourneur. The spirit of the army was indeed republican, but among its leaders the most ambitious and most clear-sighted saw in the conflict of parties a role of regulator and arbiter to be taken. Hoche offered himself for this role; another would soon seize on it and exercise it with almost incredible daring. When (October 5, 1795) Barras needed "to sweep the rebellious sections," he chose as his assistant a young brigadier general whose energy and coolness had been manifested but lately in the siege of Toulon; this genius was General Bonaparte. A few days later Barras resigned in favor of his protégé, who thus found himself invested with the command of the army of the interior. On March 26, 1796, the Directory appointed him to replace Schérer, who had resigned, to head the command of the army in Italy.

Little by little Bonaparte's dominance effaced that of all the other generals. The Italian campaign, which is not our business to relate here, revealed in him who was destined to be the Emperor Napoleon, the most eminent qualities of tactician and statesman. A few months afterward, all echoes were repeating his glorious name; some dreading it, others placing in him all their hope. The popular imagination was obsessed with the image of the hero; and doubtless splendid visions of the future were already in his mind. On April 17, 1796, Bonaparte was indeed already speaking as a master of the world: "The French people," he said, in a proclamation, "is the friend of all peoples; come forth to meet her." The Directors wrote to him: "You have the Directory's confidence: the services that you render daily give you a right to it."

[61] Vandal, op. cit., p. vi.

To this man the Directory entrusted the task of carrying out its plan of vengeance against the Holy See. On February 3, 1796, he received a letter from the French government which "counseled" him to go and extinguish in Rome "the torch of fanaticism." [62] "This is a resolve that we have formed," the Directors wrote to him.[63] The General, who at that time was pursuing his able campaign against Austria, did not at once turn aside from his plan, which was to terrify his enemy by the rapidity of his conquests in northern Italy. When, disconcerted by his daring, the Austrian troops had carried out their retreat movement from the Adda to the Mincio, Bonaparte turned toward Rome.

On May 11 a messenger who was sent to the Secretary of State, Zelada, by the legates of Ferrara and Bologna, announced to him that 10,000 French had debouched on the plain of Piacentino and were marching against the Eternal City. All resistance was futile. Pius VI was not in a condition to sustain a war against the Republic. The States of the Church, deprived of a regular army and lacking generals, could not dream of fighting against war-hardened, disciplined soldiers, led by able officers. To purchase peace, as the King of Sardinia and the dukes of Parma and of Modena had just done, and as the King of Naples was preparing to do, was the only move possible. In the previous year, by a secret article of the treaty of 4 Thermi-dor (July 22, 1795), Spain had been recognized as intermediary between France and the Holy See. Pius VI instructed the ambassador Azara to proceed to Milan as minister plenipotentiary, there to halt the French at the very gateway of his States and to conclude an armistice with them.

[62] Madelin, La Révolution, p. 462.
[63] Gendry, Pie VI, II, 269.

Don José Nicolas de Azara, accredited to Pope Clement XIII in 1765, and since then maintained at his post, was an old career diplomat, acquainted with all the traditions of the papal chancery. For twenty years, the friend and at times the rival of Bernis (the ambassador of France), he was equally familiar with the usages of French diplomacy. Renown places him among the most expert diplomats of his time.[64] He showed himself worthy of his reputation.

General Bonaparte, who then held the city of Milan, had there abolished the authority of the pope and imprisoned Cardinal Ferrara. He haughtily declared that he would not treat with the representative of Spain except out of consideration for his court. Then he signified, without other formality, that he was demanding of Rome all that he would be able to have if he were himself master of the Capitol. To this Azara said: "Go, then, and take it yourself." At this reply, Bonaparte jumped up, stormed, swore that he would have his treaty, and, in his fury, tore to pieces with his teeth a sheet of paper which he was holding in his hand, chewing it with frenzy. He was already the crafty negotiator who later, in a celebrated interview with Pius VII, displayed all the resources of the most versatile comedian and the most vehement tragedian.

Further griefs awaited Azara. He understood that, while in these stormy conferences he was defending inch by inch the rights of the pope and the Church, defections were occurring among the protégés of the Holy See. All the cities of Romagna had made their submission to the French; treason had slipped even into the Eternal City. Bonaparte received, from a well-informed person, an inventory of everything at Rome that was most precious in gold, silver, jewels, paintings, and statues, as well as a list of the palaces and of wealthy persons.[65] When in the morning of June 27 the conferences were resumed, at Azara's first attempts to reduce the demands of the Directory, Bonaparte arrogantly replied: "What have I to do with your proposals? The peoples themselves are my superiors." General Bonaparte, consenting to reduce his demands, decided to lower from 40,000,000 francs to 21,000,000 the sum which the Pope must pay the Republic. Besides this amount, the Holy See must turn over 500 manuscripts, 100 paintings and statues, notably the bust of Brutus, open its ports to French ships, close them to the ships of powers hostile to France, and permit French armed forces to pass through his territory whenever such permission would be requested.

[64] Vicomte de Richemont, "La première rencontre du pape et de la République française," in the Correspondant of September 10, 1897, p. 803.

The Armistice of Bologna

Such were the principal conditions of the armistice signed at Bologna on June 23, 1796. Napoleon's final concessions have sometimes been attributed to the regard he had for the King of Spain and to Azara's astuteness. In a letter written to the Directory two days before the treaty, the General indicated a different motive. He says: "This armistice being concluded with the Dog Star rather than with the army of the Pope, my opinion would be that you do not urge the making of peace, so that in September, if our affairs with Germany and northern Italy go well, we may seize Rome." [66]

At any rate Rome was saved. Azara wrote to the Pope: "The treaty that I have made is iniquitous, barbarous, and outrageous; but, to excuse it, I will say that I have saved a plank from the wreck. The person of Your Holiness, the Holy See, religion, all the inhabitants of Rome, everything there both sacred and profane would have been hopelessly lost." [67]

[65] Richemont, op. cit., p. 807.

[66] Quoted by Gendry, op. cit., II, 245.

The papal government at once set to work to carry out the treaty. From Castle Sant' Angelo were brought forth the ancient treasures which the popes had amassed there and had preserved under threat of the most terrible excommunications. The churches of the Papal States were required to turn over their objects of gold and silver; the simple citizens had to send to the treasury a complete list of the precious metals they possessed. The banker Torlonia and several other emissaries appealed to the credit of the different cities of Italy.

Meanwhile an envoy of the Pope, Pieracchi, discussed at Paris with the minister Delacroix the ratification of the armistice. At the very first conference (August 12) the minister increased his claims. To the clauses stipulated by General Bonaparte he added the obligation imposed on the Pope to revoke all the bulls relative to the affairs of France since 1789. This demand set forth inadmissible conditions. Pieracchi protested, Delacroix grew angry. The discussion ended by a decree of expulsion against Pieracchi and his colleague, Evangelisti (August 14, 1796).

On the other hand the people of Rome expressed their indignation against the conditions of the armistice. One morning on the walls could be seen placards bearing these words: "Neither paintings nor manuscripts shall leave Rome." French commissioners who had come to Rome for the purpose of assuring the execution of the armistice were thronged, hissed at, and insulted. The Pope, after the outrage inflicted on his legates and the Directory's refusal to ratify the treaty, considered that he was no longer obliged to observe it.

On September 12, Pius VI assembled the Sacred College and questioned the cardinals one after the other. The opinion of all was that the Holy See could not, without being false to its duties, subscribe to the terms that were demanded of it. A memorandum, intended to be presented to the Directory, was drawn up in this sense and two days later was read to the Sacred College. It ended with these words: "Let the Directory consider the motives that have constrained the conscience of His Holiness in a refusal that he will be obliged to sustain even at the peril of his life." At these words the one who was reading the document paused, saying: "Does Your Holiness quite mean these last words?" The Pope resolutely replied: "Yes, at the peril of my life." [68]

[67] Quoted by Richemont, op. cit., p. 808.

The die had been cast; the supreme head of the Church had taken the resolution to defend the faith even to martyrdom.

Recoil of the Directory

Pius VI's energetic action gave momentary pause to the Directory. Bonaparte, then at Ferrara, called on the archbishop, Cardinal Mattei: "Your Eminence," he said, "the Directory does not desire war with Rome. I desire to be, not the destroyer, but the savior of that city." [69] We may suppose that Bonaparte, despite alliances with the revolutionists, hesitated before an attack on the Eternal City.[70] Moreover, an expedition against Rome at that moment, when he was considering the plan of [68] Richemont, op. cit., p. 332, according to the account of J. B. de Rossi, who learned the detail from his father, who was secretary of Cardinal Caleppi.

[69] Gendry, II, 268.

[70] Independently of his religious faith, which was never perhaps entirely stifled, either by his revolutionary utopias or by his own ambition, Bonaparte felt that at the close of 1796 the Catholic religion had again become a powerful social force. On December 4, 1796, Clarke wrote to him: "We have lacked our revolution in religion. In France they had again become Roman Catholic. . . . If one had been able to annihilate the Pope three years ago, Europe could have been regenerated; at the present moment, would not his abasement be to expose ourselves to a permanent alienation from the government of a crowd of Frenchmen that submits to the pope and that might rally to him?" Correspondance inédite, II, 430, quoted by A. Dufourq, Le régime jacobin en Italie (1900), p. 38.

turning his arms against Austria, would have made him lose precious time. Now he and the Pope abruptly changing their roles, he it was who for two months was urging the Pope to conclude a treaty, whereas the Pope was wisely deferring the action.

In the course of sixty-nine days, fruitless conferences were held, in which Cacault represented the Directory and Cardinal Busca, then Cardinal Mattei, defended the cause of the Holy See. In the meantime the Pope was raising troops that he placed under the command of the Austrian general, Colli. Bonaparte advanced against the little force, crushed it (February 5, 1797) on the Senio, seized Ancona and Loreto, and then at Tolentino awaited the effects of his words of clemency and his acts of terror cleverly combined.

From Tolentino, where he arrived on February 13, the General sent to Rome Father Fumé, general of the Camaldolites, with instructions to say to Pius VI that Bonaparte was not an Attila and that, should he be so, the Pope might remember that he himself is the successor of Leo. To Cardinal Mattei he wrote: "I wish to prove to all Europe the moderation of the Directory. . . . I desire, as far as may be in my power, to give a striking proof of the moderation I have for the Holy See." [71]

The Pope thought he ought to yield to demands so repeated. A deputation, made up of Cardinal Mattei, Marquis Massimi, and the prelate Caleppi, set off for Tolentino. Said Pius VI to them: "Go and make every sacrifice except in what concerns religion." At the very first interview, Bonaparte, prudent statesman that he was, understood that in the spiritual field the plenipotentiaries would be unyielding. He played his part and showed all the resources of his wonderful genius, turn and turn about caressing and terrible, in fighting on the political and financial field. On February 19, 1797, after three days of discussion, the Treaty of Tolentino was signed. It contained twenty-six articles. The Pope recognized the French Republic, abandoned his rights over Comtat Venaissin, ceded to France three rich provinces which were the legations of Bologna and Ferrara and all Romagna, and promised to remit to the French government the sum of 30,000,000 francs. "Rome is saved," Mattei wrote sadly, "as also religion, but at the price of what sacrifices!" [72]

[71] Gendry, II, 275.

The carrying out of a treaty so onerous was for the Pope the occasion of grave solicitudes. In the Papal States revolutionary plots followed one another almost without interruption. Joseph Bonaparte arrived at Rome on August 31 to "watch over the execution of the treaty concluded by his illustrious brother," as we read in his credentials. He surrounded himself with all the malcontents as well as all the partisans of the new ideas. In the month of September, Pius VI, overwhelmed with grief, fell gravely ill.

Toward the end of December, while the Pope's robust constitution seemed about to triumph over his illness, a tragical event, somewhat like the murder of Bassville, which had been the occasion of so many evils, occurred to redouble the Pontiff's anxieties.

In the afternoon of December 28, 1797, a group of rioters ran through the city of Rome, shouting: "Long live liberty! Long live the French Republic!" They were answered with: "Long live the Pope! Long live the Madonna!" A detachment of cavalry advanced to drive back the band of rioters. Some French officers, with the commandant Duphot at their head, emerged from the Corsini palace, where the representative of the Directory, Joseph Bonaparte, was lodged. These officers confronted the papal cavalry. Their move, they said, was simply for the purpose of quieting the tumult; on the contrary, they manifestly inflamed it. Duphot, sword in hand, threatened a sergeant. The latter, after vainly ordering that the sword be returned to the scabbard, fired on him, the shot entering the lung.

[72] Letter of February 19, 1797, quoted by Gendry, II, 276.

The tumult subsided; the rioters, whom Cardinal Consalvi estimated at about 500, dispersed.[73] But Joseph protested that the embassy had been violated and abruptly left Rome. "Nothing," writes Cardinal Consalvi, "could hold him back, neither the request of the Holy See nor the offer of a considerable reparation in case some wrongs had been committed."

The Taking of Rome

At Paris the news of Duphot's death violently aroused public opinion. The newspapers misrepresented the facts.[74] The Directory had Marquis Massimi arrested, confiscated his papers, and ordered a march on Rome by a body of 15,000 men, followed by other corps. On January 11, 1798, Bonaparte wrote to General Berthier, who had been put at the head of the first corps: "The speed of your march on Rome is of the utmost importance. . . . You will advance to within two days of Rome, then threaten the Pope and all members of the government who have made themselves guilty of the greatest of all crimes, in order to fill them with fear and make them flee." [75] As we are told by Consalvi, "General Berthier's army arrived with the suddenness of lightning. On the evening of February 9 it occupied Monte Mario. . . . The following morning an officer and a trumpeter presented themselves at the gate known as the Angelica. They found the gate open and lacking any preparations of resistance. The Pope had not the forces to repel the [73] Consalvi, Mémoires, p. 333.

[74] Two regrettable dispatches of the Secretary of State were exploited against the Holy See. By imprudence or excessive fear the Cardinal presented the excuses of the Holy See in such a manner that he furnished his adversaries with arms against his government. Gendry, II, 288.

[75] Correspondance de Napoléon Ier, III, 475.

invasion and he was unwilling to expose his people, who were ready to defend him. Furthermore, that defense would have been as perilous for the Romans as it would have been insufficient for the Holy Father." [76]

Consalvi, who played an active part in the events that followed, relates with much feeling the painful scenes that took place in the Castle Sant' Angelo when he was ordered to take charge of its evacuation. With admirable energy and self-control, he succeeded in preventing a popular outburst, which the Directory had perhaps anticipated and secretly desired to justify its intrusion in Rome.

The sick Pontiff considered himself thereafter a prisoner. On February 15, 1798, the anniversary of his elevation to the papacy, he decided to hold pontifical services in the Sistine Chapel. In the evening General Cervoni notified him officially of his deposition and the proclamation of the Roman Republic. The Supreme Pontiff said that he adored the impenetrable decrees of Providence. He added: "I ask most earnestly that the Catholic religion be respected and that the blood of those who have faithfully served me shall not be shed." [77]

As the general, reminding the Pope that he had become a French citizen, presented him with a tricolored cockade, the Holy Father smiled sadly and refused it, saying: "I know no other uniform but that with which the Church has honored me." On the 17th, when he was notified that he would leave Rome in three days, he expressed the desire to be taken toward Naples. This wish was not granted, but he was informed that he would take the road of Tuscany. In the account of Father Baldassari, a priest close to Pius VI, is the touching recital of the final separation.[78] The night of February 19 was wholly employed in the preparations for departure. The next morning

[76] Consalvi, Mémoires (1866), II, 60–62.
[77] Gendry, II, 229.
[78] Baldassari, Relazione de' patimenti di Pio VI.

the Pontiff took the Blessed Sacrament and placed it in a pyx which was suspended from his neck, as the custom is when the popes leave the Eternal City. Then, leaning on the arm of his chamberlain, Monsignor Carracciolo, he proceeded slowly to the carriage awaiting him. "God wills it," he said; "let us be ready to accept whatever Providence reserves for us." What the Directory had in reserve for him was death, death in exile.

The Persecution in France

In France, after the lull of Thermidor, the Directory resumed (18 Fructidor, September 4, 1797) its work of persecution. This undertaking has for a long time been too much passed over. Father Rohrbacher, in his history of the Church, there devotes hardly three lines to the subject.[79] The truth is that from September 4, 1797, to November 9, 1799, almost 300 priests were deported to Guiana, where half of them died, 1,200 others were interned in the fortress of the Ile de Ré and the Ile d'Oléron, between 8,000 and 9,000 had to undergo exile or imprisonment, and 150 persons, priests and laymen, paid with their lives for the right to live in their fatherland. Such are the figures established by Victor Pierre in his scholarly work La Terreur sous le Directoire, patiently composed according to archival documents and studies of local history.[80]

We have seen that Larevellière-Lépaux was a sentimental utopian who fancied the establishment, in France and throughout the world, of a religion of nature and the fatherland. But in him was also another man, conceited, headstrong, fanatical, who, at the opening of the National Assembly, at once went over to the extreme left, who denied to the king the right of enclosing his domains, who, in place of the motto, "the Nation, the Law, the King," wished to have inscribed on the flags, "Liberty or Death." [81] Trembling under the Terror, hiding for two years in the neighborhood of Péronne, Larevellière rose again to power as a member of the Convention, then as a member and afterward as president of the executive Directory. This small hunch-backed man, whose long, glossy hair framed a weak and silly face, became the most unyielding and fanatical of the persecutors. He personified what was most partisan in the Directory.[82]

[79] Rohrbacher, Histoire universelle de l'Eglise, XXVII, 626.
[80] Pierre, La Terreur sous le Directoire, p. xiv.

On September 6, 1798, Larevellière, in his capacity of president of the Directory, signed the following decree: "Article 1: The persons condemned to deportation by the law of 19 Fructidor of the year V, the list of whom is here annexed, will be transferred to Cayenne. Article 2: For this purpose, at the port of Rochefort a vessel of the Republic will be put in readiness and will depart for that destination as soon as they are on board." [83] The first deportation convoy, which was directed to Guiana (September 9, 1797) had in it only one priest, Father Brotier; but the second convoy (March 12, 1798) included 155; the third (August 2), 25; and the fourth (August 9), 108. Moreover, starting with the month of May, 1798, the minister of police began to send to the Ile de Ré, opposite La Rochelle, the "deportable" individuals, and eight months later (January 17, 1799) the Directory designated the Ile d'Orléron, at the mouth of the Charente, as the place of residence for the condemned persons whose health did not permit their transfer to Guiana.

Thereafter the scenes of torture and death were in four chief places: Guiana, the Ile de Ré, the Ile d'Oléron, and continental France.

[81] Ibid., p. 8.

[82] Larevellière was so brazen as to write in his Mémoires (II, 136, 141) that, beginning with 18 Fructidor, no one was disturbed and that not a single warrant was issued. But, on several thousand deportation decrees, we find his signature, written with painstaking flourishes. Cf. Pierre, op. cit., p. 408.

[83] Ibid., p. 8.

Exiles in Guiana

From the first convoy, almost entirely made up of political prisoners, 48 escaped, and only 16 reached Cayenne. Within less than a year eight of these died there. In this number was Father Brotier. Austere and reserved, Father Brotier had lavished his cares on the sick; and he won the high esteem of the blacks, who called him "father." His dying words were these: "We receive our death from the hands of the five Directors; may they enjoy this life which they are taking from us. I pardon them; may Christ likewise pardon them. May they, at their last hour, not be deprived of the presence and the consolation of their families as I am of mine." [84]

Among the 155 ecclesiastics who composed part of the second convoy, were included: 27 priests of Brittany; 13 from the Vosges, a few of whom, having taken the oath, were not legally subject to deportation, but they were actually deported; 11 from the Aisne; 8 from Cher; 10 from the Doubs, from Haute-Saône, and from the Jura (among these were three cousins, François, Denis, and Nicholas Daviot, likewise victims of the speed with which the condemned were embarked, although they were in good standing with the law); 14 from Deux-Sèvres, from the Vendée, and from Vienne; from Belgium also 14, one of them a young tonsured cleric, who was arrested and condemned in place of his brother. These ecclesiastics had as companions 38 laymen, among whom were: two members of the Council of the Five Hundred, the journalist Perlet, and the song writer Ange Pitou, who was spared by the Convention but was condemned by the Directory.

The twenty-five priests who were in the third convoy owed their freedom to an unforeseen circumstance. The ship carrying them was attacked by an English man-of-war and was forced to strike its colors; the English captain, paying homage to the innocent victims of the French Revolution, had them taken to England, where they were welcomed with warm hospitality.

[84] Barbé-Mabbois, Journal d'un deporté non jugé, I, 260; II, 17.

The last ship transporting deportees to Guiana left August 9, carrying 108 priests and 11 laymen. One of these priests, Father Brumauld de Beauregard, vicar general of Luçon, who had already seen two of his brothers put to death under the Terror, has left us some interesting memoirs of his captivity.

The climate of Guiana, the defective conditions of the lodgings assigned to the deportees, and the evil treatment inflicted on them brought about the death of a large number. "Neither table nor chair was provided in the place where they were housed. The service by the Negroes was rendered with scandalous negligence. These Negroes, as soon as they had obtained their freedom, complied with no regulation; they insulted and maltreated the sick; they bargained with the prisoners in return for money for the most indispensable cares." [85] Alas for the deceased who left no bequest! A priest of Vendée, Father Brenugat, remained three days without being buried; his fellow priests had to dig his grave with their own hands.[86]

The mortality was especially frightful beginning with the month of August, 1798, when the agent of the Directory forbade for the deportees the sojourn at Cayenne and had them distributed in the various agricultural exploitations of Guiana.

During the following six months the deportees, exposed to the inclement weather of that distant colony, to the stifling vapors of the swamps, and to the painful toil of the fields, as also to diseases that were new to them, far removed from one another, isolated in the midst of the Negroes whose language they did not understand, have a history that is an unbroken story of their sufferings and often of their death.[87]

[85] Pierre, op. cit., p. 304.
[86] See Ange Pitou, Voyage à Cayenne, II, 105.
[87] Pierre, p. 300.

That history is also the story of their zeal and their admirable virtue. In some places they had the consolation of exercising their apostolate toward the Negroes. Father Brumauld de Beauregard wrote:

> We are grouped on a little island called Les deux Flots. A number of Negroes who came to see our labors heard Mass. We instructed them, and they went to confession. I heard their confessions seated on an old log, where the insects were devouring both penitent and confessor. Several of the Negroes I united in marriage. Many I baptized. We taught them prayers, they sang hymns and went away contented. I entertain the hope that some of them have remained good Christians.[88]

Ange Pitou, notwithstanding his levity, and Barbé-Marbois, in spite of his revolutionary prejudices, did not conceal, in their Mémoires, their admiration for the good morals of the priests who were their companions of deportation. Writes Barbé-Marbois: "All those who died over there are venerated there as martyrs." Brumauld de Beauregard stresses the purity of morals which the priests preserved in an atmosphere where that virtue was but little respected. He writes:

> Amid general corruption God preserved the deportees without reproach. Not even one strayed from the laws of wisdom; more than once I had occasion to point this out to the irreligious inhabitants. Among us we had men who had not been altogether faithful to the Church; dangerous objects encompassed the deportees; but God has protected us all, and we have preached by our example the most beautiful of the virtues in a place where it is almost unknown and where the occasions of losing it are frequent.[89]

If we turn our look from the victims to the executioners, we experience a painful distress because the sight that meets our gaze is that of the most deplorable moral wretchedness.

[88] Brumauld de Beauregard, Mémoires, II, 472.
[89] Ibid., II, 493.

"Whether they were carrying out instructions or whether they blamed the climate for so many hecatombs, agents of the Directory were there on the spot; they saw the prisoners die and they adopted no means and extended no aid that might testify to their humaneness." [90] And those who, from Paris, confided their mission to them, were perhaps still more guilty, for, in the inflexibility of their decrees, in the affected indifference for so many sufferings, we are not rash in seeing the effect of a fanatical hatred.[91]

The Interned Priests

Haste, negligence, disorder: these traits are what we are obliged to note in the conduct of the Directory with the unfortunates deported to Guiana. These same traits we meet with in the way of dealing with the departees of the Ile de Ré and the Ile d'Oléron.

The fortress of the Ile de Ré, built by Vauban, was magnificent. Its massiveness was imposing, its portal majestic. Entrance was by a drawbridge of prodigious breadth and length. The interior of this fortress resembled a little town. An immense courtyard was intersected by pavillons that formed several streets. The ramparts were pleasant promenades with wide and regular slopes.[92] But the devastations by the revolutionists who, to destroy the fleurs de lis of the façade, had fired on the fortress with grapeshot, and in the course of several years, the lack of repairs had made the building almost uninhabitable. At every rainfall the water poured into most of the pavillons.

Starting in May, 1798, into this fortress the minister of police sent a large number of persons judged subject to deportation. The total number of those who were there detained has been reckoned at 1,065, of whom 697 were French priests and 222 were Belgian priests.[93] All the departements of France except eight [94] were represented.

[90] Ibid., p. 312.

[91] See in Victor Pierre the chapter entitled: "Le Directoire et les deportés," pp. 313–17.

[92] J. P. Fleury, Mémoires, published by Dom Piolin, p. 357.

As at Guiana, the Directory had not ordered preparations to be made nor had the most commonplace precautions been taken for the reception or installation of the deportees. In some of the rooms the rain came through; no furniture, no beds, not even a pallet, sometimes not even straw were provided in the room. . . . Rooms twenty feet by eighteen had to accommodate twelve, fourteen, sixteen priests. Where cots were to be found, these were so crowded together that no space at all was between them. The squalid condition bred vermin. If diseases occurred, the patient was taken to the hospital, where every requisite was lacking except the nurses who, you might say, were placed there less to care for the sick than to exploit them.[95]

This fortress, which seemed intended to be a rest resort, was in reality a prison. At every moment new vexatious regulations were issued, painful forced labor, a thousand physical and moral sufferings.

Only their piety sustained these unfortunate prisoners. They attempted to group themselves, as far as they could, by dioceses or by regions; then they decided to make their spiritual exercises in common. One day Father Cholleton, the future vicar general of Lyons, having procured some vestments and sacred vessels, put an altar in a hallway and was able to say Mass there. Soon other altars were put up in the attics and lofts. The Blessed Sacrament was reserved, and the priests instituted perpetual adoration of the Eucharist. They even organized theological and scriptural conferences.

They were without a leader: the Directory sent one to them.

[93] Pierre, pp. 339–41.
[94] Ibid., p. 341.
[95] Ibid., p. 344.

On February 28, 1799, to the Ile de Ré the police brought Bishop de Maille de la Tour Landry of Saint-Papoul. This man, after his military service, was early promoted to the office of vicar general of Bishop de Grimaldi of Le Mans, became bishop of Gap in 1777, and was transferred to Saint-Papoul in 1784. At first this cultured prelate astonished the people of his diocese by the considerable retinue of his house and his brilliant receptions. In his manner of life some thought to see a levity of conduct, which was probably a matter of outward habits (still a bit too unreserved) of his worldly and military life.[96] However this may be, he was one of those whose courage, zeal, and apostolic virtues showed themselves with the greatest luster during the revolutionary anguish. He was the only prelate who continued to exercise his episcopal functions during the Terror. In hiding at Passy, he there exercised his ministry and performed ordinations. Whereas his brother and his nephews perished at Paris on the scaffold, he was fortunate enough to escape the executioner. He was seen opposing the Jansenists under the Constituent, the constitutionals under the Legislative and the Convention, and, on the question of the oaths, to adopt the conciliatory principles of his friend Father Emery, the superior of St. Sulpice.[97] Bishop de Coucy of La Rochelle, who had occasion to oppose the ideas of Bishop de Maille regarding the oath, but who entertained lofty esteem for his virtue, eagerly confided to him all powers of jurisdiction over the deportees of the Ile and the faithful living there.

About the end of January, 1799, at the Ile de Ré the overcrowding was so great that the government designated the Ile d'Oléron to receive the new deportees. Priests to the number of 192 were transferred there. Their life, their trials, and their piety were almost the same as those of their brethren. For us to sketch the picture would be merely a repetition. The Ile de Ré and the Ile d'Oléron formed, on the coast of France, a sort of little Church, about a new kind of monastery.

[96] On Bishop de Maille, see De Broc, Un évêque de l'ancien régime, and Pisani in R. Q. H., of October, 1912.

[97] This attitude brought upon him violent opposition from the Jansenists, the Constitutionals, and a certain number of Catholics, more rigid than he was on the question of the oath, but we should note that neither the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques nor the Annales de la religion ever attacked his private conduct.

Thus, when the Revolution seemed to have destroyed all the religious communities on the soil of France,[98] the Directory, without intending to do so, raised new communities, equally fervent and austere, whose influence spread and whose prayers and sufferings ascended to God to obtain from His mercy the end of so many trials.

A decree of the Directory did indeed arouse among Catholics some disagreements that had already appeared on the occasion of the constitutional oath and the oath of Liberty-Equality; but a strong bond of love toward the Church and toward the Sovereign Pontiff never ceased to animate those who embraced divergent opinions. When, as we have just seen, the same prison held them, their emulation was only one of courage and self-abnegation before the sacrifice.

We allude to the oath of "hatred toward royalty and anarchy" which (September 5) the Directory had imposed on all members of the clergy.[99] Such a formula, if proposed without commentary, would doubtless have aroused a general reprobation and would have met with adamant opposition; but deputy Chollet, a member of the special commission deputed to elaborate the laws concerning the clergy, had declared, in the name of the unanimous opinion of the commission, > that the person of the king was not what they were called upon to hate, since the Republic day after day signed treaties of friendship with kings; the hatred was not that of a Brutus or a Cato against everything that bore the name of king; that the hatred did not include belief in a political dogma about the best form of government; but that the ecclesiastics owed this hatred for what some were trying to re-establish in France, since the social pact rejected it and since no one could be subject to a republican constitution without rejecting every idea that would tend to overthrow it.[100]

[98] Mention is made of a Trappist abbey, which the Revolution had forgotten, at Boscodon near Embrun. That was the scene of the death of De Savine, former bishop of Viviers, converted and penitent. We should recall also that on November 21, 1796, the venerable Marie Rivier had founded at Bourg-Saint-Andéol the new congregation of the Presentation of Mary and that a year later this congregation received its first ruler from a priest of St. Sulpice, Father Pontanier. Cf. F. Mourret, La vénérable Marie Rivier, pp. 106, 113.

[99] In the decree of September 5, 1797, article 25 was thus worded: "Ecclesiastics authorized to reside on the territory of the Republic will take the oath of hatred toward royalty and anarchy, of attachment and fidelity to the Republic and to the Constitution of the year III."

In the presence of these explanations men were divided in mind. In many dioceses the clergy showed themselves opposed to the oath. Archbishop de Juigné of Paris, after being of this mind, abandoned it and allowed the generality of his clergy to take it. Father Emery did not take it, and was unwilling to advise others to take it; but, after learning that a certain number of priests of Paris were resigned to it, said: "Providence has permitted that they view the question from a point of view that seems to allow it to them so as to preserve for us the possession of our churches, which the different sects would assuredly have invaded." [101] The thought that the Catholic churches might be devoted to irreligious use and that all worship might be abolished, dismayed this man of God. "I cannot become used to the idea of a country without worship." [102]

This conciliatory attitude of part of the clergy did indeed permit the exercise of worship to be continued in many parishes. But vexations of all sorts were not lacking. The hate of the fanatics who wished to destroy Christianity in France was not disarmed. To grasp the depth of the malice we must, after studying the religious policy of the Directory in its measures of repression, study it in the principles of its lawmaking.

[100] Moniteur, 21 Frimaire of the year VI.
[101] Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, I, 463.
[102] Ibid.

Deeds of the Directory

Three words, as we have seen, sum up the conduct of the Directory with regard to the deported priests: haste, negligence, and disorder; two words suffice to characterize its legislation and its internal government: arbitrariness and tyranny. To avoid "the caprices of despotism" the Constituents had decreed the separation of the three constitutional powers: they wisely thought that the prejudices and passions of the legislator might thus be counterbalanced, if not by wisdom, at least by the contrary prejudices and passions of the representatives of the judicial power and the agents of the executive power. But the Directory concentrated in the hands of the minister of police the power of judging and the power of executing his sentences. This arrangement was a return to one of the chief abuses of the absolute monarchy, without the counterpoise of personal responsibility and the dynastic interest. The individuals who had the chief direction of the police (Sotin, Dondeau, Lecarlier, and Duval) were notable for their servility to the five directors and by their cruelty toward their victims.[103]

The police service functioned in the following manner. Upon denunciation by a commissioner of the Directory or by a private person, the minister of police had the right to arrest such a priest or such a group of priests and submit their case to an inquiry. When this investigation was finished, if the priests were charged with some specific crime, their case was referred to the criminal tribunals or, as more usually happened, to a central bureau, composed of political men who sought only to give pledges of their persecuting zeal. As for the priests against whom no precise crime could be charged, but who were supposed to be disturbers of the public tranquillity, the Directory itself retained jurisdiction of the case. It was its manner to limit arbitrary acts,[104] but it limited the arbitrariness of its tribunals only by substituting its own.

[103] See Pierre, op. cit., p. 173.

One of the most revolting applications of this policy was the label of "émigré" fastened, with all its juridical consequences, upon the priests who had left France to conform to the decree of August 26, 1792. Article 1 of that decree ordered all non-juring priests "to leave the realm within fifteen days." The act of obedience to the decree was transformed into an act of rebellion. From October, 1797, to March, 1798, bureaus functioned at Paris, Nantes, Marseilles, Besançon, Nancy, Metz, and other places, commissioned to interpret the terrible prescription in this sense. By the end of 1797 the Marseilles commission had already imprisoned at the fortress Saint-Jean nine priests, among whom was an old man of eighty years, Father Donnadieu, former director of the minor seminary. On February 23, 1798, the venerable priest, condemned to death along with a former pastor of Saint-Ferréol, Father Baudin, traversed the city, walking with firm step between his guards, in prayerful recollection. We are told that at the moment of his execution his brains burst out and that a pious girl, Marie Gouverne, gathered them up and sent them to a priest as a precious relic.[105] Father Patenaille in the Jura, Father Galmiche in the Haute-Saône, Father Nicholas at Metz, in all thirty-one priests, illegally classified as émigrés,[106] underwent death in the same dispositions of courage and faith. The authorities arrested as an émigré a priest of Tours, Jean-Joseph Glatier, who had never left the country; but the publicity which he gave to the exercise of worship and his former relations with the Chouans caused him to be regarded as a man dangerous for the Directory. Condemned to death on March 23, he was executed the next day by a firing squad along with three former soldiers of the wars of Brittany, who had been arrested with him.[107]

[104] Ibid., p. 176.
[105] Ibid., p. 148.
[106] Ibid., pp. 144–61.

Victor Pierre estimates at 1,756 the number of French priests who were reached by the decree of the Directory. If we reflect that the clergy of France had just been decimated by the executions of the Terror and by exile, this figure appears considerable. Conjecture has been made that it represents a fourth of the priests then living in France.[108] Moreover, the persecution extended to all parts of the country. Out of eighty-nine departments, barely two or three were entirely exempt from it.[109]

The Persecution in Belgium

The persecution passed beyond the old frontiers into Belgium, which had been recently annexed and divided into several departements designated as "reunited departements." [110]

As soon as Belgium was turned over to the hands of the proconsuls of the Republic, at the time of the Convention, that country was administered after the manner of France. There the Committee of Public Safety organized committees of surveillance; the scaffold was paraded from city to city; the Belgian Terror even survived for six months after the death of Robespierre.

The Directory wished to oblige the Belgian clergy to take all the oaths prescribed for the French priests. The Belgian priests en masse refused to take any of these oaths. In them a feeling of national independence was joined to apprehensions which their religious faith dictated to them. Louvain, the seat of the great Catholic university, gave the signal of resistance. On [107] Piolin, L'église du Mans sous la Révolution, III, 441–50.

[108] Pierre, op. cit., p. 253.

[109] Ibid.

[110] Decree of September 30, 1795.

October 9, 1797, Cardinal Frankenberg, archbishop of Malines, was arrested and deported beyond the Rhine. On the 28th the University of Louvain was suppressed; its library, its archives, its physics laboratory, and its botanical garden, all were confiscated by the Directory; and on November 8, an order was given to the central bureaus to draw up a list of all the priests living in their jurisdiction.

The agitation began to reach the people, who resorted to all ruses to safeguard their priests and their worship. As in France, non-juring priests were forbidden to exercise their ministry. But they celebrated Mass in private houses before sunrise. In some neighborhoods people passed over the frontier, and certain localities where Catholic worship was celebrated became for the Belgians as places of pilgrimage.

Then against the priests, who were accused of being "instigators of disorder" and "sowers of discord," appeared individual and collective arrests. Soon rumblings, precursors of an approaching explosion, were heard; people spoke of a "new Vendée"; the collective arrests increased in number: on 17 Nivôse (January 6, 1798) sixty priests were arrested for having "inspired hatred toward the republican government and for having gathered their followers together during the night with a view to evade the surveillance of the constituted authorities";[111] on 14 Pluviôse (February 2), a collective decree was issued against twenty-nine priests, charging simply "their fanatical doctrine and their anti-revolutionary principles."[112] At bottom, the government was prosecuting in these priests the patriots no less than the defenders of the faith. They were endeavoring to check at the start a revolt that was ready to break forth.

The affair exploded on November 28, 1798. The city government of Brussels had given notice of the immediate call of [111] Decree of September 30, 1795.

[112] Ibid.

200,000 conscripts to the colors. The young men thus called refused to present themselves; liberty poles were cut down, and placards containing vigorous protests were posted. Soon the movement spread into the county districts. On October 17, at Remich, fifty young men armed with stout clubs cried: "Long live the king," and refused to break up. Two days later, at Saint-Vith, 1,500 in revolt, coming in three columns, seized and strangled the commissioner. On October 28, at Malmedy, the number of revolters was 3,000. The situation was like a new Vendée, but the strife did not assume the same proportions.

This struggle does not lend itself to a methodical account. It was a series of separate combats, of skirmishes, and of sudden attacks. No properly so-called battle took place nor was a plan of campaign followed. But the struggle had two marks: one, we regret to have to say, was the cruelty of the victors who often shot the conquered after the fight; the other consisted of combats apparently decisive but in reality not conclusive.[113] Finally the insurgents were unable to withstand the war-hardened troops that were sent in large numbers from France to fight them; the conclusion of this campaign was the unheard-of decree, issued on November 4, 1798, and signed by Larevellière-Lépeaux, condemning to deportation all priests who had taken the oath.[114] This monstrous proscription affected about a thousand priests. Many succeeded in eluding their persecutors at the price of countless alarms and dangers; many were deported to France and were there mingled with the French priests, from whom history can no longer distinguish them.

Motive of the Persecution

Anyone who has perused the long series of decrees passed by the Directory and the orders issued by the minister of police against the priests of France and Belgium, cannot fail to make a certain reflection. The three leading complaints appealed to against the priests are the refusal to take the oath, the so-called emigration, and the antirevolutionary propaganda. Yet we get the impression that such were not the real motives of the persecution. Whenever a priest showed a true zeal for religion, even if he had never left France and had taken all the constitutional oaths and had ostensibly separated from the royalist party, he was prosecuted, judged, and condemned. All these facts suggest the idea that the government under Larevellière-Lépeaux had but one aim: to replace the Christian religion by the natural and civic religion which this ardent disciple of Rousseau took under his protection. This conjecture becomes a certitude when we study the conduct of the Directory toward the constitutional clergy.

[113] Pierre, La Terreur sous le Directoire, p. 241.
[114] Ibid., p. 248.

The constitutional priests enthusiastically took all the oaths. Their leader, Grégoire, made their apology and was the one who inspired them. The republican ideas counted no adherents more fervent than these men, who always condemned the emigration as a laxity and a betrayal. However, they did not escape the persecutions by the Directory.

In fact, many of those who took their stand about the Bishop of Loir-et-Cher continued the exercise of the ecclesiastical office, said Mass, preached and heard confessions, with a regularity and seriousness that rendered difficult for anyone to distinguish between their ministry and that of the non-juring priests. The revolutionary utopia which lured them from the path of obedience to the pope, and the weakness or ambition which led them to bow before the civil authority, did not contaminate their Christian faith. This quality was reason enough for the Directory to hold them as suspect. They were charged "with having taken the oath only that they might conspire with the greater boldness," "with having, under the shelter of their oaths, continued their maneuvers against the safety of the Republic." Such were the headings of accusation brought against a former subprior of the Trappist monastery of Mortagne (Father Magnier), against Goury-Lay and Vaillant of Cher, and against Debeaussard and Hugues of Eure. Father Druyer, the constitutional pastor of Serville in the Eure-et-Loir, in vain offered the authentic list of his oaths and the testimonials of his parishioners in support of his fidelity to the Republic; he was judged and condemned. Father Marcepoil, the pastor of Isle-en-Dodon, published several writings in favor of the oaths; Father Zabée, a juring priest of the Ardennes, was even conspicuous by the intemperance of his republicanism. All these favorable circumstances were of no avail. Since they remained faithful to their parochial ministry, they embarrassed the policy of the Directory; they were deported.

In the eyes of Larevellière and his friends, the guilt of these priests was the greater when, in the exercise of their pastoral functions, they added the refusal to take part in the decadaire feasts. We would doubtless be exaggerating to call this attitude, as Grégoire did, "a sublime resistance" and to say that "the decadaire feasts were for the constitutional clergy the era of the martyrs." [115] Victor Pierre remarks: "If the constitutional clergy had been as numerous and as disposed for martyrdom as some would have us believe, they would have furnished more victims to the persecution; but they formed among the deportees an inconsiderable minority. . . . Only twenty constitutional priests are to be found in Guianna, eighty at the Ile de Ré." [116] Two juring bishops were prosecuted by the Directory. Mandru, of the Vosges, was charged with having spread a synodical letter of the national council of France, which appeared in September, 1797, and which criticized "the dry and bombastic teaching of the republican schools"; but he was sentenced merely to a fine of 100 francs and imprisonment for six months; the minister of the interior considered "that we should not apply to him the law of 19 Fructidor for the reason that the refractory priests, even more dangerous than the others, derived from that rigor a subject of victory." The same was not true in the case of Le Coz, constitutional bishop of Ille-et-Vilaine, charged with having, in writing, attacked the substitution of the decadi for the Sunday. The charge was dropped since it might end in a condemnation that would be a triumph for the enemies of the Directory.[117]

[115] Grégoire, Histoire des sectes religieuses, I, 323–40; II, 453; Annales de la religion, June 3, 1797.

[116] Pierre, pp. 213, 216.

Sacking of Rome

At bottom the enemy, so they considered, was especially Roman Catholicism. Toward that enemy no considerations should be entertained, no indulgence; but the law must always be interpreted in the narrowest sense, always applied in its most cruel rigor. This policy appears in the brutality of the proceedings used against the Papal States and against the very person of the Supreme Pontiff.

When Pius VI, led away by the emissaries of the Directory, had left Rome (February 20, 1798), the Eternal City was at once given over to methodical pillage. In an official memorandum of July 25, 1796, we read: "The fanaticism must be destroyed; but the popes' spiritual power rests particularly on their temporal power, on the revenues which they receive therefrom." [118] General Berthier, who needed money to pay his troops, deduced the consequences of this reasoning in seizing the goods of the Holy See. On March 25 the lands which Duke Braschi had purchased in the Pontine Marshes were confiscated; On April 6, 9, and 10, they were sold. All the furniture of Pius VI that was found in his palace of Terracina was treated in like manner. A band of commissioners invaded the Vatican and the Quirinal and pillaged them.[119] When, at Paris, the Jacobins learned that the Papal States were invaded and that the pontifical government was overthrown, they rushed there to grab a share in the booty. Berthier by means of several decrees tried to halt them, but in vain. Massens, his successor as commander of the troops, was no more successful.[120] Even the consuls, officially charged with maintaining order, with the help of the French commissioners,[121] had not been in power six months when public rumor accused them of the worst exactions. The Moniteur, in its number of September 12, gave wide publicity to these charges. Visconti pilfered the medals of the Bracciano Museum; Angelucci, who but lately did not have a franc to his name, was buying extensive properties; Matteis was speculating on the sale of the notes; Reppi was paying his debts and increasing his capital, no one knew how; Panazzi displayed for sale the precious jewels of the Bambino stolen at Ara Coeli.[122]

[117] Archives nationales, F[7] 7398.

[118] Affaires étrangères, Mem. et doc., XII, 56, cited by Albert Dufourcq, Le régime jacobin en Italie (1900), p. 567.

Amid these disturbances many Romans left the city. Several cardinals judged the situation intolerable; only thirteen of them stayed in Rome. Eight of them were arrested, imprisoned, then deported.[123] Two shamefully abandoned the Holy Father, abdicated the cardinalitial dignity, and handed it over into the hands of the commander-in-chief of the French troops. These men were cardinals Altieri and Antici. The latter had received the purple only at the pressing request of the King of Prussia and the King of Poland. Crushed with grief and for a while hesitant about what measure he should take, Pius VI, by two briefs of September 7, 1798, declared that the two cardinals

[119] Gendry, II, 329.

[120] Ibid., p. 337.

[121] The Directory (March 20, 1798) had solemnly installed on the Capitol twelve consuls. During the festival, invocation was made to the "manes of the Emilies and the Scipios." Ibid., p. 135.

[122] Ibid., p. 341.

[123] Ibid., p. 309.

had forfeited their office and that they were thereafter deprived of any active or passive voice in the future conclave.[124] These two briefs were dated from the Chartreuse of Florence, where the Pontiff had arrived on June 2, 1798, after a three months' sojourn at Sienna and after there writing for the courts of Europe a solemn protest against the outrages that had been inflicted on him.

In this retreat, where he stayed two months, Pius VI, notwithstanding the decline of his health and the hateful surveillance exercised over him, engaged actively in the general interests of the Church. Two particularly important letters were dated at the Chartreuse of Florence. One (January 30, 1799) was aimed at the professors of the Sapienza who had taken the oath of "hatred for royalty and anarchy," prescribed by article 377 of the Roman Constitution. These professors had formed their consciences on a simple declaration of the magistrate commissioned to receive this oath. This magistrate had assured them that the oath did not oblige them to anything beyond abstaining from any conspiracy against the Roman Republic. "Although we know," said the Pope, "that the words of an oath must be understood in the sense intended by the person who requires it, the verbal declaration which the said professors made before the magistrate charged with receiving their oath, could not change its substance; no one but the lawmaker is its interpreter, not the simple magistrate delegated to obtain the material execution of the law." [125]

[124] Ibid., p. 310.

[125] Picot, Mémoires, VII, 218. Father Emery in several letters and especially in an article which he published in 1800 (Annales philosophiques, I, 155) held that the lawfulness of the oath of hatred prescribed in France, if taken in the sense of Chollet's explanations, was confirmed rather than brought into doubt by the brief of January 30, 1799. For, he says, if by this brief the Pope reproved the oath taken by the professors of the Sapienza, this rebuke was because a magistrate, charged with the material execution of a law, was not qualified to give it an interpretation different from its apparent meaning. Hence, Father Emery concludes, if the explanations had been given, as in France, by the lawmaker himself, the Holy Father would probably not have taken exception to the oath. Gosselin, Vie de M. Emery, II, 414.

The other papal document, likewise dated from Florence, is more important. It is a constitution regulating the holding of the next conclave. For a long time past, this eventuality was one of the chief concerns of Pius VI. By two bulls (December 29, 1796, and February 11, 1797), with a view to assuring the tranquillity of the future conclave, he derogated from the traditional rules.[126] A constitution dated November 13, 1798, provided that at the Pontiff's death the right of election should belong to the largest group of cardinals gathered together in the states of a Catholic prince and to all those who wished to join this group. The cardinals would have the right to determine the place of the conclave and to regulate whatever concerned the future election. All the censures imposed by Paul II on those who should concern themselves with a future papal election, were abrogated.[127]

At Rome, however, the revolutionaries, not satisfied with pillaging and persecuting, tried, as in France, to replace Catholic worship with civil ceremonies. On November 17, 1798, in Piazza d'Espagna, a huge amphitheater had been erected, with these inscriptions: "Reason triumphs over pride," "humanity triumphs over tyranny," "truth rises from the ashes of superstition." In the amphitheater, in the presence of the consuls, senators, and pretors of the Roman Republic, the eldest of the Borghese princes and the prince of Santa Cruce burned the golden book of the nobility and the bull of St. Pius V creating the tribunal of the Inquisition.

This action, too violent a wound to the Catholic faith of the Italian people and their traditional attachment to their old customs, exasperated a populace already greatly irritated against the demands and the depradations of the French. In February, 1798, an uprising of the people of Trastevere had been stifled in blood. The Romans now loudly called for the [126] Gendry, II, 325, 484.

[127] Ibid., p. 327.

Neapolitan armies, hoping that these would bring deliverance. On October 28 the king of the Two Sicilies, Ferdinand IV, in answer to this appeal, addressed to the French an order to evacuate the papal territory; on November 14, from his headquarters at San Germano, he published a proclamation to the Roman people. When General Championnet, commander of the French forces at Rome, did not reply to the order of the King of Naples, General Mack, commander-in-chief of the Neapolitan troops, opened the hostilities.

Immediately the people of Rome again rose up. Championnet, not having a force large enough to fight against an internal uprising and at the same time against the army of Mack then threatening him, abandoned the city of Rome, which (November 29) opened its gates to the King of Naples. An edict of December 3 invited the inhabitants to have full confidence in His Sicilian Majesty. But the peace was of short duration. The French army, reinforced by new troops, turned back toward Rome, met the Neapolitan forces before the walls of Civita Castellana, completely routed them, and, passing through Rome at full gallop, seized Naples on January 23, 1799.

Pius VI in France

Upon learning of these events, the Pope was apprehensive. He feared that the Directory might make them a pretext for taking more severe measures against his person and against the Church.[128] He judged rightly. On March 26 two French officers came to the Chartreuse in Florence and informed him of the order that he must proceed to Parma without delay.[129] He had to leave two days later (March 28) at three o'clock in the morning. The Pontiff, whose health was notably weakened, had not yet recovered from the fatigue of the journey when (April

[128] Ibid., p. 351.
[129] Ibid., p. 406.

13) a dispatch instructed the Pope's guards to transfer him at once to Turin, where he arrived at night, exhausted. There he was informed that the goal of his journey was France. Raising his eyes to heaven, he said: "I will go wherever they purpose taking me." In the evening of the 30th, after a painful and perilous crossing of the Alps, he set foot on French soil. Perhaps he then recalled the touching words he had uttered in his allocution in the consistory of June 17, 1793: "France, France, that our predecessors called the model of Catholic unity, the unshakable prop of the faith, thou that surpassed the other nations by thy zeal and thy devotion to the Apostolic See, how different thou hast become!" [130]

The sight of the august victim along his route would awaken in many consciences sentiments of faith until then slumbering.

> In vain would anyone try to recognize in this old man, led by fifty horsemen, the majestic pontiff whom the Austrian populace had admired seventeen years before. An attack of paralysis had deprived him of the use of his legs, and his brow, under a crown of white hair, bore the weight of almost eighty-two years. Nevertheless his sufferings and the cruel infirmities to which he was condemned did not disturb the serenity of his spirit; in his captivity he had preserved the full liberty of his soul and the full energy of his heart.[131]

In a brief to the bishops of France (November 10, 1793) he wrote: "What have we to fear? Death? No, indeed. When we live only for Jesus Christ, we can merely gain by leaving this life." [132]

In the midst of his sufferings, the Pontiff had the sweetest consolations that can touch the soul of a representative of Jesus Christ. At Briançon, in the midst of a throng of people who had come from the surrounding country to greet him on his journey, with tears in his eyes he repeated the words of the Master: "Amen I say to you, I have not found so great faith in Israel." At Savine a noble lady dressed in mourning knelt at his feet, begging him to bless her and bestow on her the peace she had lost since the schism of her son. She was the marquise of Savine, mother of the former constitutional bishop of Viviers.[133] At Gap, the constitutional pastor of the cathedral, Father Escallier, begged the Pope to grant him absolution for his apostasy.

[130] Barberi, Bullarium, IX, 327.

[131] A. M. de Franclieu, Pie VI dans les prisons du Dauphiné.

[132] Guillon, Brefs et institutions de Pie VI relatifs à la Révolution française (1798), II, supplement, p. 52.

Pius VI reached Valence on July 14, 1799. As his residence he was assigned the citadel of the city. As soon as he was brought to his apartments, the outer doors were closed, and he was declared to be "in the state of arrest." [134] The citadel had a chapel where the Pope had the consolation of hearing Mass every day. "The Holy Father," says Baldassari, "each morning recited the canonical hours, ordinarily heard two Masses, made long and fervent prayers to the Holy Trinity, to our Lord, to St. Peter. . . . Toward evening he recited the Rosary with us." [135] From his prison he followed the affairs of Rome and of the whole Church. News of the victories of Suvorov gave him some hope for an amelioration of the religious situation. The contrary is what happened. The French government, concerned with the progress of the Austro-Russian army, decided (July 25, 1799) that the Pope, "regarded as a hostage," should be removed to a point remote from the frontier.[136] The executive Directory decreed, "The late Pope will be transferred from Valence to Dijon." At the foot of this decree Pius VI had the sadness to read the name of an apostate priest, Sieyès.

But the paralysis from which the Pope was suffering for a considerable time, reached the intestines; the ailment progressed rapidly. The doctors judged that his transfer would be im-

[133] M. de Savine was converted eight years later.

[134] Gendry, II, 417.

[135] Baldassari, Relation sur l'enlèvement et la captivité de Pie VI, IV, f. 212.

[136] Letter of the minister of the interior, cited by Franclieu, op. cit., p. 178.

possible. The commissioner, Curnier, wrote: "Is it not the policy of the French government to preserve this important hostage as long as it can?" [137]

On August 28, 1799, the sick man's condition was such that he received the sacrament of extreme unction. His last words, spoken with difficulty but in a fully intelligible voice, were these: "Domine, ignosce illis" ("Lord, forgive them").[138] That night, at about midnight, during the prayers for those in their last agony, the Pope, raising his arm, with a triple sign of the cross blessed the persons present; then his hand fell back lifeless, letting the crucifix which he was holding fall. Pius VI was dead. He was the most august and last victim of the French Revolution.

[137] Franclieu, op. cit., p. 185.

[138] The following words are also reported: "Recommend to my successor that he pardon the French as I pardon them with all my heart." Gendry, II, 424.

PART III

Toward a Religious Restoration

Pope Pius VI died in exile. Viewed superficially, this disaster, following so many others, marked the final fall of the papacy before the triumphant Revolution. Three years later, however, the man who had been sent to Rome "to extinguish the torch of fanaticism" did in fact treat with the Supreme Pontiff about the re-establishment of Catholic worship. The people most enamored of the subversive doctrines of the Contrat social and the Profession de foi du vicaire savoyard now had a taste of the Catholic poetry of the Genius of Christianity. The sons of the kings who had expelled the Jesuits, who had patronized the philosophers and backed the Jansenists, became champions of a Catholicism thoroughly devoted to the Roman pontiff. Shortly afterward, some philosophers, Joseph de Maistre and Bonald, Ballanche and Lamennais, though following different tendencies, were outlining the plan of a society with Christianity as its basis. Writers and artists found their inspirations in the ages of faith. This immense effort toward a religious restoration was not, moreover, limited to France; Germany and England took part in it. But the result was not without a mixture of errors, or without painful shocks. The very first quarter of the nineteenth century would see Gallicanism come to life again with Napoleon, and liberalism appear with Lamennais. In the face of these obstacles and errors, Pius VII would begin the long struggle which Gregory XVI and Pius IX zealously continued.

CHAPTER VII

The Religious Situation in 1799

CHATEAUBRIAND, on his return from exile, described France in a few picturesque lines.

> You might say that a conflagration had passed through the villages. . . . To the right and left of the highway appeared ruined castles and mansions. Of their destroyed old forests nothing remained but a few sawed-off stumps on which children were playing. You would see enclosure walls with gaps in them, abandoned churches from which the dead had been driven out, church towers without bells, cemeteries without crosses, headless and battered statues of saints in their niches. On the walls could be seen already worn-out republican inscriptions: Liberty, Equality, Fraternity or Death. In some places an attempt had been made to erase the word "Death," but the black or red letters were visible under the coat of whitewash. This nation, which at the moment seemed to be dissolving, was again beginning in the world, like people emerging from death or from the barbarism and destruction of the Middle Ages.[1]

This picture might be enlarged. The conquests of the Revolution had, indeed, extended its work of religious destruction. In the Batavian, Cisalpine, Helvetic, Roman, and Neapolitan republics, successively established between 1795 and 1799 in Holland, Milan, Switzerland, Rome, and Naples, the revolutionary oaths had been imposed under severe penalties, many faithful priests had been banished, churches had been pillaged; in places where the armies of the Revolution had not penetrated, at least its ideas were triumphant.

The revolutionary irreligion had spread even outside of [1] Mémoires d'outre-tombe, II, 235.

Europe. The ruin of the Society of Jesus, which in 1775 counted 16,000 missioners, inflicted a disastrous blow on the foreign missions; the spoliation of the possessions of the Church by the Constituent Assembly wiped out the resources of the clergy; the suppression of monasteries and the persecution of the priests dried up the sources of vocations. The attempt in 1792 and 1793 to impose the constitutional oath on the missioners of India forced a large number of them to abandon the field of their apostolate.[2] The Directory, going even beyond this, in 1796 backed the nabob of Mysore, Tippo Sahib, who was persecuting the Christians. Some Jacobins, coming to Mysore, there founded clubs in which was decreed "the destruction of all tyrants except the citizen prince Tippo the Victorious, the friend of the French Republic, its close cousin." [3]

At Rome itself, the very center of Christianity, religion was not secure. At the time of Pius VI's death, the city was evacuated by the French army, but the Sacred College had been obliged to disperse. Most of the cardinals fled to Venice. In that city of lagoons, in a Benedictine monastery on St. George island, they met in conclave to choose a new head for the Church.

What seemed to complete the decay of Catholicism was the evident favor enjoyed by its enemies: the Protestants, the Jews, the Freemasons, and the atheists.

The Protestants

During the French Revolution, Protestantism, according to the expression of one of its historians, "had gone ahead firmly and rapidly." [4] The edict of November, 1787, gave the Protestants their civil status; and for more than ten years the Hugue-

[2] In 1793 Bishop Champenois of French India was expelled for refusing to assist at the planting of a liberty tree.

[3] A. Mazon. Un missionaire vivarais aux Indes, l'abbé Dubois, p. 10.

[4] G. de Felice, Histoire des protestants de France, p. 580.

not Necker exercised a considerable influence in the conduct of political and financial affairs. The salon of his wife was the most frequented meeting place of authors, publishers, and notable foreigners. A law of December 24, 1789, assured the Protestants of the exercise of all political rights. A few months later the Constituent Assembly raised to the presidency the Protestant pastor Rabaut Saint-Etienne. After that the Assembly gave the Protestants fresh pledges of its good will.[5] By a decree of July 20, 1790, it restored to them all property confiscated from their ancestors for religious reasons. By another decree (December 16, 1790) it granted all rights of French citizenship to the descendants of the refugees on condition that they return to France and there take the civic oath. Following this last legislative act, numerous Protestants came from abroad, established themselves in France, and soon exercised a great influence there. Of this number was Benjamin Constant, then twenty-three years old. Under the different governments, even to the monarchy of Louis Philippe, he would defend, in politics and in religion, the most individualist liberalism, and he would exert a considerable influence on public opinion, as also on the progress of state affairs.

The Jews

Political favor came to the Protestants without any exertion on their part. But the Jews had to win it by main force. In August, 1789, a deputation of Alsatian Jews presented themselves at the bar of the Assembly to appeal for the emancipation of their fellow Jews. This step led to the presentation of a project rehabilitating the four classes of persons who at that time did not enjoy civil rights: the Protestants, the actors, the hangmen, and the Jews. But the Assembly merely voted the rehabilitation of the Protestants, the actors, and the hangmen. It refused the same consideration to the Jews, who it knew were organized and powerful, and whom it considered politically formidable. Rewell and Maury became the interpreters of these fears. During the discussion a deputy declared: "You are opening the doors of France, not to individuals, but to a nation."

[5] Ibid., p. 588.

The Jews, however, were not discouraged. In their number were some persons of intelligence. Henrietta Hertz, the friend of Mirabeau, was a Jew,[6] and the sect of the Martinists, made up almost exclusively of Jews, had just fused with Freemasonry. Most of the speakers in the parliamentary debate who were heard in favor of the Jews were Freemasons.[7] In 1791 the Jews of Paris resolutely took the direction of the affair. They were not numerous, hardly five hundred, who used to meet faithfully in the synagogue on rue Brisemiche.[8] But they were generally quite advanced in modern ideas and were closely connected with the philosophers. Their leader, the banker Cerfbeer, who later put his financial experience in the service of Napoleon, had made influential friends. At the session of January 18, 1791, Duke de Broglie accused him of spending large sums in Paris to win over the defenders of his cause.[9] But money was not the only means used. The Paris sections had become a power. Men made the rounds of the capital's sixty sections, suggesting petitions, stimulating steps to be taken. The result of this agitation was a popular demonstration on September 27, 1791, the day before the final adjournment of the Assembly. Under the pressure of this manifestation the members of the Assembly declared that the Jews would enjoy in France the rights of active citizens.[10]

[6] Lémann, La prépondérance juive, I, 146.
[7] Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes, Vol. II, Bk. II, chap. 6.
[8] Lémann, op. cit., p. 175.
[9] Moniteur, January 20, 1791.
[10] Ibid., September 29, 1791.

The Freemasons

At the very time when the Jews thus entered upon the enjoyment of French citizenship, the Freemasons were already influential in France. We have seen the part played by the lodges in the upper society of the ancient regime. At first the Revolution favored their cohesion. Rebold, a Freemason historian, writes: "The Revolution did more in the interest of Masonic unity than all the combined efforts of the Grand Orient." [11] In 1789, thanks to subsidies from the Duke of Orleans, the "club de propagande" was founded. This club was destined to overthrow all the established governments, paying the traveling expenses of missioners, who were called "apostles." [12] Lodges were to be found in 292 cities. Condorcet, Danton, Chénier, and Rabaut Saint-Etienne might be seen in the lodge of the "Nine Sisters"; Lafayette, Laclos, and Dr. Guillotin, in the lodge of "Candor." But the most active group was the Breton Club, which became the club of the Jacobins and set up branches throughout France. Apart from its public meetings, it held secret sessions open only to the initiated.[13]

Beginning in 1792, the Masonic influence was eclipsed. As Rebold states, the society had to act with much caution.[14] The violent factions that split the Legislative Assembly and the Convention prevented any common action, and all initiative became risky. The Duke of Orleans published (February 22, 1793) in the Journal de Paris his resignation as grand master of the order. "I joined Freemasonry," he said, "because it offered me a sort of image of equality. I have since quit the phantom for the reality." [15] Consequently three months later

[11] Rebold, Histoire des trois grandes loges, p. 88.

[12] G. Gautherot, in Dictionnaire apologetique de la foi catholique, under the word Franc-Maçonnerie, II, 106.

[13] Gautherot, op. cit., col. 107.

[14] Rebold, op. cit., p. 82.

[15] Ibid.

the office of grand master was declared vacant, and for several years the Grand Orient remained quiescent. But in 1799 Freemasonry realized a more solid direction than any that had been attempted up to that time. This improved condition was the work of an active and intelligent person, Roettiers de Montaleau, who was employed in grouping the Masonic forces into a single fasces. His efforts ended (May 23, 1799) in the agreement that united the former grand lodge of France and the Grand Orient, which thereby found itself invested with unquestioned authority.

Protestantism, Judaism, and Freemasonry had not exhausted the favors of the Directory. The "philosophy" had its share. We know what was understood by "philosophy" in 1799. From Rousseau to Cabanis the sense of this word had undergone a radical change. The author of Emile still paid homage to Christ; Mirabeau professed at least faith in God. In 1791, during the discussion on the Declaration of the Rights of Man he declared: "God is as necessary for man as liberty." But for Volney, Cabanis, Lakanal, Naigeon, and Lalande, to be a philosopher was to deny the existence of God and the spirituality of the soul, to profess atheism and materialism. These very men, all of them, were members of the Institute, founded (October 27, 1795) to gather together the most eminent persons of France.

Vitality of Catholicism

In 1799, at the time of Pius VI's death, the Catholic Church, either by the official discredit heaped on it or by the favors accorded to its adversaries, appeared condemned to inevitable decay. But the reality was quite otherwise. To the eye of a close observer, atheism, Freemasonry, Judaism, and Protestantism, outwardly triumphant, were inwardly enfeebled and their strength sapped, whereas Catholicism, officially proscribed, was animated by an intrinsic and mighty vitality.

Nowhere was the weakness of atheism more evident than at the time of the competition opened in 1796 by the Institute on the means for founding a system of morality among the people. All the competitors naturally treated the subject in the spirit of their judges. The two reports by Bernardin de Saint-Pierre (July 3, 1798) and by Guinguené (January 5, 1800) showed the void in all those programs from which the thought of God was systematically excluded. The memorial that Guinguené thought superior to all the others proposed as a basis of virtue the equality of possessions, a just balance between our needs and our possessions. The others proposed to found a journal of good deeds, to oblige everyone to cultivate the field of the widow, the aged, and the orphan, to erect in the public squares statues to the honor of virtuous men (Orestes, Pylades, Sully, Montaigne, and La Boétie), to institute a court of morals, made up of wise old men. "On reading these proposals we should remember that they came from the minds of serious men, some of whom have left a name in history, such as Destutt de Tracy and John Baptist Say. We cannot help wondering whether they needed to take the trouble to declaim so much against Christian morals, only to arrive at such a shipwreck of common sense." [16]

Freemasonry was unable to attain a higher ideal. It had reached the worship of the Supreme Being; but gradually its doctrines were fused with those of the philosophers and underwent the same evolution. Condorcet even restricted the part of Masonry to supplementing the philosophical proselytism, and basically the union which the Grand Orient had just realized between the different lodges in 1799 was more artificial than real, or at least more suited to a work of destruction than to a positive undertaking of moral and social reconstruction. The weakly servile character of this society would make it bow to the absolute power of Napoleon with such baseness that it even flattered both the aristocracy of the ancient regime and the demagogic passions of the Revolution.

[16] Sicard, A la recherche d'une religion civile, p. 270.

In their rise to power, the Jews were obliged to follow the same path. The Paris synagogue had won its influence only by its relations with the philosophers and the Jacobins; and thenceforth, by the rendering of public services, it took precedence over the other religious groups, some of which, such as that of Alsace, remained more attached to the old beliefs. Generally in the Jewish world Lessing's rationalist criticism prevailed over the sentimental deism of Mendelssohn.

The ruin of the traditional faith, like the development of the political influence, was more felt among the Protestants. Necker's daughter, Madame de Staël, and her friend Benjamin Constant, at that time represented in the intellectual domain the Protestant thought, as Lessing represented the Jewish thought. They had so greatly moderated Calvin's doctrines by those of Voltaire and Rousseau that their religion was reduced to what the Duke de Broglie called "a pietistic latitudinarianism," a vague belief which accommodated its dogmas to suit all religions and all philosophies.[17]

At bottom, if in this last year of the eighteenth century, people wished to find a real moral and religious force, they must look for it in Catholicism, flouted by the philosophers of the ancient regime, stripped of its possessions, persecuted in its ministers, and replaced in its worship by the Revolution.

Popular Feelings

No one has perceived and analyzed the elements of this force in a more penetrating way than the author of the Origins of Contemporary France. Says Taine:

[17] "Madame de Staël has the soul of Rousseau; but by the spirit of her mind she is the daughter of Voltaire; the religion of the time is her religion" (Lanson, Histoire de la littérature française, p. 864).

Thanks to the Revolution, the uneducated or uncritical Catholics had acquired the feeling of the binding force by which in their Church the liturgy, the hierarchy, and the statement of dogma were united to the inner religious life. Never did they ask themselves how orthodoxy differs from schism, or how positive religion is opposed to natural religion. The Civil Constitution of the Clergy is what makes them distinguish the non-juring pastor from the intruder, and the good Mass from the bad Mass; the prohibition of the Mass is what made them understand the importance of the Mass; the revolutionary government is what turned them into theologians and canonists.

Under the Terror they were obliged to sing and dance around the goddess of Reason, then in the temple of the Supreme Being, having been subjected, under the Directory, to the novelties of the republican calendar and the insipidity of the decadaire feasts. Thus they had measured with their own eyes the distance separating a present, personal, incarnate, redeeming, and saving God from a non-existing or vague deity and, in any event, an absent God. They saw the difference between a living, immemorial, revealed religion and an abstract, artificial religion; between their spontaneous worship, their act of faith, and the imposed religion, a mere cold, outward show. They saw their priest in surplice, vowed to continence, delegated from on high to open for them infinite perspectives of paradise or hell, and the republican celebrant, in tricolor scarf, more or less married, delegated from Paris to give them a course of lessons in Jacobin morals. By this very contrast, the people became more attached to their clergy, to all their clergy, secular and regular.

Pastors and prelates, religious men and women, the people had seen suffer for their faith, which was that of the people. In the presence of the clergy's constancy, equal to that of the traditional martyrs, the people's lukewarmness changed to an attitude of respect. . . . Seeing the clergy without bread, without a roof, imprisoned, deported, everyone at least a fugitive and hunted out, the people, during the persecutions of the year IV and the year VI, had received them, hid them, and fed them. . . . Each morning the man or the woman of the people passed some of those buildings that had been sequestered from their religious use. By their form and their name they loudly proclaimed what they had been, what today they would become again. . . . The solemnities, the big feasts, and the Sundays were lacking; and this lack was a periodic privation for their ears and their eyes; they regretted the absence of the ceremonies, candles, chants, the sound of the church bells, the morning and evening angelus. Their heart and their feelings had remained Catholic and longed for their Church of former days.[18]

We may add that their heart and soul had become more Roman. The events of the Revolution had taught them this need. They knew certain truths, that, if the sacraments necessary for their religious life must be conferred on them by a priest, this priest, marked with a unique and indelible character, had to be ordained by a lawful bishop and that this bishop was not lawful unless he himself had been instituted by the pope. Consequently without the pope, no bishops; without the bishops, no priests; without priests, no sacraments; without the sacraments, no salvation,[19] or at least, salvation rendered incomparably harder.

Hence in the districts where the non-juring priests had been able to remain or to return, the people flocked to their Mass and were unwilling to accept any other. Hence also, in places besides the Vendée, the people rose up against government agents who were depriving them of their public worship. Often, indeed, these people went beyond the bounds of lawful defense. Beginning in 1799, from Marseilles to Lyons, along both banks of the Rhone, the revolt went on for five years. Royalist bands, swollen by refractory conscripts and favored by the populace that humored them, slew and pillaged the agents of the Republic and those who acquired national properties. In August, 1799, 16,000 insurgents of Haute-Garonne and of the six neighboring departments, led by the Count de Paulo, unfurled the white flag. In more than thirty departments intermittent and scattered Vendées occurred. All the Catholic departments had their latent Vendées.[20] [18] Taine, Les origines de la France contemporaine, X, 43–49.

[19] Cf. ibid., p. 42.
[20] Ct. ibid., IX, 164–66.

Switzerland

Several of the countries conquered by the Revolution had offered similar resistance to its interference in the domain of the faith. After Belgium, the Catholic cantons of Switzerland rose up. They were to the number of seven: Schwyz, Uri, Unterwalden, Lucern, Zug, Solothurn, and Fribourg. Peopled by poor and hard-working peasants, their constitution had a more democratic character than that of the rich, Protestant cantons, such as Bern and Zurich, which were ruled by a well-to-do aristocracy. However, Church property was considerable in these cantons, and it aroused the eager cupidity of the Directory, in search of money to feed its armies and supply its arsenals. Switzerland was also regarded as a hotbed of conspiracies of royalists and English. The invasion of this country was, then, a double enterprise of revolutionary proselytism and of heavy taxation.[21]

This invasion had been prepared for in the course of many years by the sending of agents who propagated the new doctrine in Switzerland. A party was even formed, distinctly favorable to democratic institutions analogous to those of France. This party had at its head two men: Pfeffer of Lucern and Ochs of Basel; it formed plans of constitutions and stirred up insurrections here and there. We do not intend to relate the campaign which, under the direction of General Brune, resulted (April, 1798) in the proclamation of a new Swiss constitution. The Swiss confederation, made up of cantons mutually independent in domestic affairs, was followed by the Helvetic Republic, one and undivided. New cantonal boundaries were set up. The old Protestant canton of Berne was made into a fourth canton; on the other hand, the four small Catholic cantons of Schwyz, Uri, Zug, and Unterwalden formed only a single canton under the name of Waldestetten.

[21] Albert Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, V, 293.

The Catholic Cantons

Following these oppressive acts, you could see, on a more limited stage, but imposing by its memories, a sight most deserving of posterity, a strife forever memorable. Whereas the rich cantons under their aristocratic governments—Bern, Zurich, Basel, and Lucern—bowed their head beneath the yoke with humiliating weakness, the little Catholic cantons, which saw their truly democratic constitution taken from them, put up the most heroic resistance. When a proposal was made to these simple men that they send representatives to Aarau for the purpose of accepting the constitution, at first they believed that they would be allowed to make some remonstrances. The envoys whom they deputed to Bern, to the French commissioner, were ignominiously expelled. Soon afterward a proclamation by General Schassenburg, who was made military commander after the departure of Brune, declared that the priests of the five little cantons where the opposition seemed to be keener would be held responsible for whatever should disturb the public tranquillity. In fact, no one could fail to see that the movement was prompted chiefly by the religious attachments of this simple population. Did they not have to fear that, in depriving them of their hereditary liberties, the rulers would turn to take away their liberty of religion? This reasonable suspicion explains the part taken in this strife by the secular and regular clergy of the little cantons. What is certain is that these brave mountaineers, most of them unfamiliar with the use of arms, enlisted as one man and, thoughtless of the dangers, were ready to resist an experienced army four times the size of their little force.[22]

A young officer, thirty-three years old, Baron Aloys von Reding, one of whose ancestors was immortalized by a victory in 1315 over the Austrians, was asked to place himself at the head of the rebels. The new general marched on Lucern and (April, 1798) seized it almost without firing a shot. The first act of the victorious army was to go to the church, there to hear Mass and ask God's protection. In fact, the French army did come up, and the encounter gave promise of being terrible. It took place about the Morgarten, near the Lake of Zug, on May 2, a day ever since celebrated in the Swiss annals by the victory which they won there and which founded the independence of the nation. Such a memory electrified the Catholic army, which again and again repulsed the troops of Schassenburg. After two days of fighting, however, Aloys von Reding was obliged to ask for an armistice from the French general who, admiring so great courage, offered the Swiss army an honorable capitulation: provided the new constitution would be recognized, the Catholic religion would be maintained in the ancient part of Switzerland.[23]

[22] Picot, Mémoires, VIII, 156.

These conditions came near being rejected. The people hesitated to sacrifice their old liberties. But in a general assembly held in the town of Schwyz, where the entire people began by falling on their knees to implore the divine assistance, the priests begged their fellow citizens to accept the conditions offered them. Canon Schüller said to them: "You have sworn to die rather than accept the new constitution; but in uttering this oath you were convinced that this constitution threatened your faith and the freedom of your religion. Since, then, the capitulation gives assurance in these matters, your oath has ceased to exist." [24] Aloys von Reding seconded this view, which finally prevailed.

Unfortunately the article stipulating the freedom of the Catholic worship had not been set forth in writing in an official document. This regrettable omission occasioned a new uprising the next August with regard to the constitutional oath, which the Catholics were unwilling to take except with the most explicit reservations. Lower Unterwalden was the chief scene of the strife, which on both sides was fiercer than the preceding. The shepherds of Unterwalden had put on as cockades some images of the Blessed Virgin. Accompanied by their womenfolk, who dragged the cannons and passed the ammunition to the fighters, they defended themselves to desperation. Some monks exhorted them to fight well and to die well. More than one of them picked up a musket of a dead comrade to make use of it.

[23] F. de Crue in Histoire générale, VIII, 823. We know that this ancient part of Switzerland had as its center the three Catholic cantons of Schwyz (whence the word "Switzerland"), Uri, and Unterwalden.

[24] For this discourse in full, see Raoul-Rochette, Histoire de la Révolution helvétique de 1797 à 1803.

Schassenburg, in a letter published in the Moniteur of September 28, 1798, furnishes some details of these atrocious combats of the Unterwalden shepherds. He says: "We lost a large number, as was inevitable with the unbelievable obstinacy of those daring men, brave to the point of fury. They fought with clubs; they attacked with stones. . . . Several priests, and also a large number of women, remained on the spot." The victorious general could not resist showing his regrets to the victims of this heroic battle; he ordered that the children be gathered together and that a thousand rations of bread be distributed each day to the inhabitants who were left; the celebrated Lavater raised his voice in behalf of the oppressed, in a letter that he dated from "the first year of the Swiss servitude." Addressing the British Parliament, William Pitt paid a touching homage to them; and the economist and educator Pestalozzi was glad to receive in his schools a large number of the children who had been orphaned by this terrible war.

Ireland

Amid different circumstances but with equal warmth, the Catholics of Ireland also defended the freedom of their faith. Ever since Ireland, in its attachment to the Roman Church, had taken a stand against the tyrannical measures of Henry VIII, that fidelity to Catholicism had remained the characteristic trait of the Irish. The harsh regime under which Protestant England had long tried to subject Ireland is to be explained by this fact. Toward the end of the eighteenth century, however, a lull was produced. Several penal laws, but lately enacted against the Catholics, had been abrogated. Following the advice of their priests, the Irish Catholics consented to take the oath to the constitution: a law of 1793 granted them the right of voting, until then reserved to the Protestants. But the influence of the French Revolution had disturbed men's minds. The liberal party, enthusiastic for the new ideas, in the realm of its just complaints against the English tyranny had drawn to it a number of Catholics. Such was the origin of the association which later became famous as the Society of the United Irish. On the other hand, the rigid Protestants, vexed at seeing the Catholics enjoy rights that had formerly been reserved to themselves and alarmed at the projects of the new society, formed counterassociations. These, unswervingly loyal to William of Orange, took the name of "Orangemen," and their foes called themselves "Defenders." Both sides bound themselves by oaths and stirred up seditions. Blameworthy excesses were committed; blood flowed.

Priests and religious took an active part in these disturbances, allying themselves to men whose aim seemed to be the separation of Ireland and England and the establishment of a republic in the spirit of the French Revolution. One priest, Edward Murphy, even led men to battle. But the heads of the Irish Church took note of the danger. On May 22, 1798, the four Catholic archbishops, the twenty-two bishops, along with several lords and notables published a manifesto in which they proclaimed their attachment to the established order and forcefully protested against the direction given to the Society of United Irishmen.

Not all the Catholics followed these wise counsels; but the majority did so. Among the Catholics were some who freely entered the service of the government. In this number was Daniel O'Connell, who subsequently showed noble generosity in the defense of his religion and his country.

These events had two results. The English government, then in the hands of Pitt, crushed the Irish insurrection and profited by its victory to have the Parliament pass the Act of Union, which was approved by the King on July 2, 1800. In virtue of this Act, Ireland and England formed a single United Kingdom. The Irish Parliament was dissolved, and the deputies of Ireland who wished to sit in the Parliament of the united countries had to take an oath that was contrary to the Catholic faith. This requirement would, in fact, exclude them from the Parliament; such was the deplorable consequence of this Act. Moreover, of thirty-two Irish counties twenty-one protested energetically against the destruction of their parliament. Then Pitt resorted to a stratagem. To appease the resistance, he promised to emancipate the Catholics. Thus the agitation had this happy result.[25] William Pitt's request of King George for the emancipation of Irish Catholics was one of the reasons for his dismissal; all of O'Connell's efforts, crowned with success thirty years later, rested on this promise, explicitly and formally made in 1799 and stubbornly disregarded.

Napoleon

A glance at Italy, Spain, Germany, and even the Scandinavian countries would show there, more or less evidently, the awakening of Catholic vitality. All in all, the movement was undeniable. One man, whom we know well, had calculated its importance. This man was General Bonaparte. While the chief events we have just related were taking place, he was forming in Egypt the most grandiose plans, and expected to change the face of the earth.[26] Of a sudden news was received (October 9, 1799) that he had landed at Saint-Raphael near Fréjus on the coast of Provence.

[25] On this promise, see Thiers, Histoire du consulat et de l'Empire, II, 394.

He was expected, desired. The conqueror of the Pyramids, of Abukir, and of Mount Thabor had grown to the proportions of a hero in the popular imagination. In the coup d'état of 18 Brumaire (November 9, 1799), from which he emerged first consul, that is, practically the supreme head of France, Bonaparte was swept to power by the popular flood even more than by his own effort.[27] He at once appeared as being of the race destined to govern the world. His political genius was not less than his military genius. But in what direction was he going to exercise his power? By his connections with the Jacobins and by his philosophical ideas he belonged to the Revolution; by his political sense, perhaps also by a remnant of faith preserved in his Corsican soul, he was induced to take in hand the restoration of Catholicism. The Church might well fear everything from this man, and hope for everything.

His first statements were words of concord and peace. Said he: "No longer are we to have Jacobins or moderates or royalists, but everywhere Frenchmen." Some of his acts seemed to justify these words: the law of hostages was repealed, the graduated import duties were abolished. But the measures of religious pacification, which the Church hoped for, encountered obstacles in the first consul's entourage. The permission to return to France was at first granted only to such members of the clergy as had taken the constitutional oath or had given up their clerical status. The first consul even reproved the priests who in the pulpit too enthusiastically greeted the coming of the reparation regime.[28] His measures of clemency were prompted probably too much by political considerations. Little by little, however, the 3,000 priests that the revolutionary laws had forced to exile themselves were able to return to France and, provisionally put under the surveillance of police authorities, they were able to have their names removed from the list of émigrés. The bishops were not able to profit from this measure until two years later. In short, the new regime aroused some mistrust, but at the same time also some hopes.

[26] On these plans, see Albert Sorel, op. cit., V, 430–45.

[27] See Vandal, L'avènement de Bonaparte, pp. 268–403; Albert Sorel, op. cit., V, 475–89.

[28] Pisani, IV, 18.

The Conclave

The eyes of all Catholics turned anxiously toward Italy, where preparations were being made for the election of the next pope. In accord with a provision of Pius VI's will, the cardinals were allowed to meet in conclave wherever they should be found in the largest number. Emperor Francis II, through his minister Thugut, offered the cardinals the city of Venice for the purpose. Thirty-five cardinals [29] went there and (November 30, 1799) met in the Benedictine abbey of St. George. Consalvi, the future cardinal, was appointed secretary of the august gathering. In his Mémoires he has left us a vivid account of this conclave.[30]

Emperor Francis II of Austria, in taking under his protection the assembly that was going to give a pope to the Church, may have wished to make reparation for the troubles his father Leopold II and his uncle Joseph II had caused the papacy. Did he dream of taking over in the Church the old traditions of the Holy Empire? Soon his aim became evident: especially to have a candidate of his choice elected, or at least to prevent at any price the choice of a rival who might put an obstacle in the way of his policy.

[29] The total number of cardinals was forty-six. Of these, eleven, scattered in different parts of Europe, were unable to come to Venice.

[30] Consalvi, Mémoires, I, 199–291. The details given by Consalvi are confirmed and supplemented by the scholarly work of Father Van Duerm, Un peu plus de lumière sur le conclave de Venise, 1896. Cf. the bitter and exaggerated account by Maury, Mémoires, I, 183–375.

From the outset the preference of most of the cardinals centered on Cardinal Bellisomi, bishop of Cesena. But Cardinal Herzan, the representative of Austria, was instructed to maintain energetically the candidacy of Cardinal Mattei, archbishop of Ferrara. As legate of the Holy See, Mattei had signed the Treaty of Tolentino, which granted Austria the possession of the three legations of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna. Hardly would anyone suppose that, once elected pope, he would think of destroying what he had agreed to as Cardinal. Besides, Vienna knew the gentle, affable, and conciliatory character of Cardinal Mattei and hoped to exercise a political influence over him.[31] For almost two months Cardinal Bellisomi day after day had twenty-two votes, and Cardinal Mattei continued to have the thirteen votes of his followers without any of them seeming disposed to shift his vote to the majority.

Then Consalvi began to show that political character, a mixture of sound logic, coaxing shrewdness, and outspoken flattery, which won for him the esteem and confidence of diplomats of the time.[32] He let the factions wear themselves out. A few bolder spirits, impatient to conclude the affair, proposed the candidacy of the learned Cardinal Gerdil, held in high regard for his works of philosophy and scholarship no less than for his virtues. But Gerdil was born in Savoy, and Savoy had just been annexed to France. Austria took alarm. At once Cardinal Herzan uttered the exclusive[33] against Gerdil. The court of Vienna was thus using up its power, for the exclusive could be given only once. Herzan, on the other hand, had the imprudence to ask his colleagues for a delay of eleven or twelve days, saying that such delay was needed for sending a messenger to his sovereign and receiving a reply.

[31] An incident, known to the court of Vienna, showed the character of Cardinal Mattei. When Bonaparte, upon entering Ferrara in 1796, learned that the archbishop of that city had introduced the papal troops, he was enraged, ordered Mattei to his headquarters at Brescia, and declared: "Do you know, Archbishop, that I could have you shot?" "You are the master," answered the Cardinal. "All I ask is a quarter hour to prepare myself." To this Napoleon replied: "Such is not the question. How quick you are!" Mattei's words gave rise to the saying, that the Archbishop of Ferrara was better able to die well than to govern well.

[32] Artaud de Montor, Histoire du pape Pie VII, I, 84.

[33] On the origin and nature of the exclusive, see Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, VI, 443.

The move seemed offensive enough in the actual circumstances. Consalvi in his Mémoires says that it furnished grounds for a fear that a pretext would be established to revive the old abuse of petitioning the permission of Caesar before installing a new pope. This was the moment chosen by the clever secretary of the conclave to act with promptness and decision, guided solely by solicitude for the interests of the Church and the papacy. He turned to Cardinal Maury, whose word exercised a real influence over the Sacred College. Consalvi and Maury, appealing to the spirit of independence which must be safeguarded against outside interference, soon detached from the two parties a number of cardinals, jealous to affirm the freedom of their vote.

Election of Pius VII

Thus was again formed the "flying squadron," which in former elections exercised a preponderant and decisive part. The flying squadron was soon master of the ground and, under Consalvi's inspiration, chose for candidate the bishop of Imola, Cardinal Barnabas Chiaramonti. Until then his name was not even mentioned in the conclave. Chiaramonti had been the most beloved helper of the late pope; he was but fifty-eight years old, as was his predecessor at the time of his election, and tradition was against the raising of such a young man to the supreme pontificate. As Consalvi said, these conditions at first seemed to constitute "extrinsic obstacles" in the way of electing the Bishop of Imola. However, everyone appreciated his personal qualities. The cardinals at the funeral of Pius VI said to one another, when they mentioned Chiaramonti: "What a pity that this conclave is the one that must choose a successor of Pius VI! If we but had a pope between the two, in three days we would name the new one, and this is the one."

A great gentleness of character, an unsurpassed purity of morals, a constant prudence in conducting his two dioceses of Tivoli and Imola, successively entrusted to his care, recommended the person of the holy prelate to universal esteem. The whole tactics of Consalvi and Maury consisted in demolishing what the far-sighted secretary called "the extrinsic obstacles." Their combined efforts succeeded. On March 14, 1800, Barnabas Chiaramonti was elected pope and, in memory of his venerated predecessor, took the name of Pius VII.

Life of Pius VII

The new pontiff, born at Cesena in the legation of Forli on August 14, 1742, came of an illustrious family and received an education worthy of his rank. His father, Count Scipio Chiaramonti, was a man of intellectual worth. "His mother, daughter of Marchese Ghini, was indeed a lady of singular excellence, renowned in the world for every religious quality. After having completed the education of her children, when the future pontiff had reached the age of twenty-one, in 1763, she entered a convent of Carmelites at Fano, where her memory is still cherished, and where she died in 1771, at the age of sixty." [34] From his early years he who would exercise over the episcopate the greatest act of authority recorded in the history of the papacy, he who would defend the Church against the enterprises of the mightiest of potentates, showed a gentle, amiable, and peace-loving character, These traits led to his being spoken of in the biblical words describing Moses: "He was a man exceeding meek above all men that dwelt upon earth" (Num. 12:3).

[34] Wiseman, Recollections of the Last Four Popes, p. 23. Wiseman also relates that at Rome people used to say that the persistent opposition of the son, when he was raised to the supreme pontificate, was the only thing that prevented a solemn recognition, by beatification, of the extraordinary holiness of his mother.

At the age of sixteen, upon finishing his education in the college of nobles, he made a decision that surprised no one who knew him intimately: he became a novice in the Benedictine abbey of Santa Maria del Monte, near Cesena, his native city. Twenty-four years of monastic life fully trained in detachment from the world the future prisoner of Savona and Fontainebleau. There also he developed that strength, often a trait of amiable characters, which can endure without complaint and act without discouragement. Well versed in sacred and profane sciences, he was successively professor in the colleges which his order had at Parma and Rome, then in the monastery of St. Callistus, where he taught canon law. In 1782 Pius VI entrusted to him the government of the diocese of Tivoli, and three years later with that of the diocese of Imola; that same year the Pope created him cardinal. In these two posts Chiaramonti had occasion to show that gentleness and application to study were not his only virtues. Pacca wrote: "Having attentively studied his character, and well knowing his disposition, I can affirm that Pius VII was a man by no means deficient in talent, nor of a weak, pusilanimous nature; he was conspicuous for his firm resolution and the liveliness of his mind. He possessed that description of good sense that in matters of business intuitively perceives the difficulties to be overcome and sees everything in its proper light." [35]

When the legations were invaded by the French armies (February, 1797), the cardinal-bishop of Imola was not willing to present himself before the conquering general, but he did not withdraw from his diocese, as did the bishop of Ancona, Cardinal Banuzzi. This conduct was noted by Bonaparte, who was displeased with the flight of the Bishop of Ancona. To the people of the country who brought him the keys of Ancona, he said: "The Bishop of Imola, who is also a cardinal, did not flee. As I passed there, I did not see him, but he is at his post." [36]

[35] Cf. Wiseman, op. cit., p. 35.

The Bishop of Imola promptly showed that his attitude did not imply any systematic opposition to the new political forms that were being implanted in Italy, but simply reprobated any attack on the Church and against right. In a Christmas sermon (December 25, 1797), soon made public with his name, he said: "The democratic form of government is not at all repugnant to the Gospel. On the contrary, it requires all the lofty virtues that are learned only at the school of Jesus Christ. May virtue, vivified by the natural lights and strengthened by the teaching of the Gospel, be the solid foundation of our democracy." He concluded by saying: "Be Christians, and you will be excellent democrats." [37]

Pius VII and Bonaparte

This sermon would be severely criticized in Italy and France. It was received with restrictions by more than one historian. At least the pope who had thus spoken would not refuse to accept a government, whatever it might be, that would consent to treat with him on the basis of respect for the rights of the Church. The first consul, for his part, felt disposed to enter into negotiations with him whose intrepid courage and peaceful spirit he had experienced. Pius VII and Bonaparte were ready to negotiate together, between the French government and the Church, the concordat which all France was waiting for and the whole Christian world would welcome in its good results.

[36] Count d'Haussonville, L'Eglise romaine et le premier empire, I, 27.

[37] For the text of this sermon, see ibid., I, 355–71. Cf. Artaud de Montor, op. cit., Vol. I, chap. 4, and Rohrbacher, Histoire universelle de l'Eglise, Bk. 90.

CHAPTER VIII

The French Concordat of 1801

First Acts of Pius VII

MANY of the great popes, in their first encyclical, have outlined the program of their pontificate. In 1775, Pius VI, who was destined for a quarter of a century to defend the Catholic Church ceaselessly against the various attacks of the revolutionary spirit, had, with wonderful clearness, announced the two major dangers of his time: "the corruption of morals, language, and life," which was preparing the fall of the old regime, and the venturesome rashness of the philosophers who, "proclaiming that man is born free and has no need of submitting to anyone," prefaced all the utopias of the Revolution. In 1800, Pius VII, whose task during the course of twenty-five years would be to labor with rare loftiness of mind in concert with the rulers, at a work of religious restoration, declared the basic conditions of that restoration. He said:

> The decrees of kings and the military forces of the generals have been able to re-establish order, so deeply disturbed; but if the poison of bad doctrines is not removed and if it is allowed to develop, I declare to you with alarm, venerable brethren, that this poison will spread over the whole world and then neither armies nor militias nor fortifications nor munitions of war nor the armaments of mighty empires will be able to safeguard us from it. The Church with her holy laws, the virtues and piety that emanate from her, is the true remedy for the terrible poison. . . . Princes and heads of states should, then, understand that nothing can in a greater degree contribute to the welfare and glory of the nations than to let the Church live according to her own laws in the freedom of her divine constitution. Let them recall the words of our wise predecessor, St. Zeno: "A ruler can do nothing more profitable for his own interests than to bow before the authority instituted by God, whenever the cause of God is involved." [1]

At the very time when the Sovereign Pontiff was speaking thus, the attitude of the princes and the various peoples toward him was of a sort to offer him serious hopes. The Emperor of Austria, disappointed in his designs, at first showed his dissatisfaction by refusing to allow the new pontiff to be crowned in the church of St. Mark;[2] but finally he accepted the accomplished fact with good grace and sent envoys to greet the Pope. Pius VII likewise received the homage of the representatives of Sardinia, Naples, and Spain. The emperor of Russia, Paul I, delegated a special envoy to the Pope. The Holy Father at his entry into Rome (July 3, 1800), was hailed with demonstrations of universal joy.

The first acts of his government increased his prestige. The appointment of Cardinal Consalvi to the post of Secretary of State was a guaranty of a prudently progressive administration. The finances were reorganized; the shipment of grain was freed from taxation; many abuses were abolished. To wipe out the debt of 5,000,000 francs which weighed on the state following the sad events of the recent years, the new Pope gave the example of a strict economy in the management of his household. His aim was to take up again, as soon as possible, the tremendous projects of Pius VI for the relief of commerce and industry. The Roman states (unfortunately minus Beneventum and Pontecorvo, which remained in the hands of the king of Naples and the three legations which Austria still held) witnessed a rebirth of peace and relative tranquillity. But Napoleon's intervention presently upset the order of things in Italy.

At the very time when Pius VII's first encyclical appeared

[1] Encyclical of May 15, 1800, in Barberi, Bullarium, XI, 24.

[2] Van Duerm, Un peu plus de lumiere sur le conclave de Venise, p. 264.

(May, 1800), the first consul, amid difficulties of all sorts, was accomplishing that famous passage of the Alps which deserves to be counted as one of his most memorable undertakings. About four weeks later, after a series of battles, the daring general routed the army of Mélas at Marengo. In less than a month Austria lost all she had taken a year to conquer, and her army withdrew behind the line of the Mincio.

But Bonaparte amid his triumphs declared that, conformably to the unanimous wish of the peoples, he himself aspired only to establish a solid peace in the world. On the morrow of his election to the office of first consul, he wrote to the King of England: "Sire, will the war, which for ten years has ravaged the four quarters of the world, be everlasting? Surely we must feel that peace is the first of needs as it is the first of glories." A letter conveying the same sentiments was sent to the Emperor of Austria. Diplomatic negotiations had succeeded in separating from the European coalition the Emperor of Russia and the King of Spain; an army of 25,000 men held Portugal in submission, and the operations of Kleber in Egypt and of Moreau in Bavaria had, according to the assurances of the first consul, no other purpose but to impose, by terror, peace upon the belligerents.

That peace, which he desired to give Europe, Bonaparte wished also to establish about him. The cessation of wars was not enough for him; he dreamed of a final pacification of minds. To rally the republicans to him he relied on the presence of Carnot and Fouché in his ministry; on the presence of Talleyrand he counted to win royalists. Said he to his brother Joseph: "What revolutionary will fail to have confidence in an order of things where Fouché will be minister? What nobleman will not hope to find a means of livelihood under the former bishop of Autun? The one guards my left, the other my right."

But this arrangement did not yet solve the problem. Neither the pacification of the nations nor that of the parties could give the results which the first consul expected in the religious pacification. Bonaparte's deep political understanding had glimpsed this truth in 1797; he was still more impressed with it in 1800. He was convinced that nothing would be accomplished so long as the government of the French Republic had not concluded an agreement with the head of the Catholic Church.

But, after certain words and certain deeds which the Catholics could not erase from their memories, he needed to give them some pledges. On June 5, when about to leave Milan to give combat to Mélas, General Bonaparte assembled the clergy of the city and addressed these maturely weighed words to them.

I have desired to see you all gathered here that I might have the satisfaction of making known to you the sentiments that animate me with regard to the Catholic, apostolic, and Roman Church. . . . Being now in the enjoyment of full power, I have decided to put in motion all the means that I judge most suitable to assure and guarantee that religion. The modern philosophers have striven to persuade France that the Catholic religion was the implacable foe of every democratic system and of all republican government. . . . I, too, am a philosopher, and I know that in any society no man can pass for virtuous and just if he does not know whence he comes and whither he is bound. Mere reason cannot give us certainty about that. Without religion we are always walking in darkness; and the Catholic religion alone gives man certain and infallible lights on his origin and his last end. A society without religion is like a ship without a compass. . . . Let not the way the late Pope was treated inspire you with any fear. . . . When I shall be able to confer with the new Pope, I hope to have the happiness of removing all the obstacles that might still rise up to hinder the full reconciliation of France with the head of the Church.[3]

This address was printed[4] and spread in large quantity; the reverberations of it were immense and such as Napoleon had desired for it. The victory of Marengo did not divert him from his project. On the contrary, by augmenting his prestige that brilliant success enabled him to be more daring. On June 18 he decided to assist at the solemn Te Deum in the Milan cathedral, and to the two other consuls he sent the following proud dispatch: "Today, in spite of what the Paris atheists may say of it, I am going in full pomp to assist at the Te Deum which will be sung in the metropolitan church of Milan."

[3] Correspondance de Napoléon 1er, VI, 339–41.

[4] Notably in the Annales philosophiques, morales et littéraires (1800), II, 246, and in the Etrennes religieuses published by Father Courbon.

In most minds such steps effaced the sad impression left by Napoleon at the time of his first Italian campaign. The way was now prepared for a negotiation. The first consul took a further step. Among the priests gathered about him at Milan, he noticed a venerable old man, a pious and simple soul, Cardinal Martiniana, bishop of Verceil. On this man he turned his eyes to open the preliminaries with the Sovereign Pontiff. On his way to Paris, he stopped for a few hours at Verceil and took the aged bishop aside,[5] saying to him:

I wish religion in France. The intruders of the first and the second order are a mass of disgraceful bandits, whom I wish to shake loose from me. Some of the old bishops receive no consideration in their dioceses, where they almost never reside; several have emigrated merely to conspire. The question of their resignation will be taken up with them. Moreover, the dioceses are too numerous. I wish to make a clean slate of the Gallican Church.[6] I desire a new clergy. If the Pope will be reasonable, if he grasps the present situation, we will be able, the two of us together, to reconcile France with the Church. Go to Rome and tell the Holy Father that the first consul wishes to make him a present of 30,000,000 French Catholics.[7]

[5] Letter of Cardinal Martiniana to Pius VII, quoted by Cardinal Mathieu (Le concordat de 1801, p. 3). The letter was published for the first time in full by Father Rinieri, S.J., in his La diplomatie pontificale au XIX^e siècle, le concordat entre Pie VII et le premier consul (Verdier translation, pp. 16–18).

[6] Vuol far caso vergine della chiesa gallicana, wrote Martiniana. Mathieu, op. cit., p. 4.

[7] On this conversation of General Bonaparte with Cardinal Martiniana, see the Cardinal's letter to Pius VII in Mathieu, Le concordat de 1801, pp. 3–5, and Maury, Correspondance diplomatique et mémoires, I, 461.

The good, trustful soul of the pious cardinal saw in these words nothing more than the announcement of a new era of peace and holy prosperity for the Church. Incapable of perceiving in the General's authoritarian and dictatorial tone the threatening forecast of the future strifes,[8] he wrote to the Pope that, "once the idea of the first consul is accepted, everything will be easily arranged," and he begged His Holiness to authorize him to continue his dealings with "the illustrious and most distinguished principal." [9]

Roman Distrust

The proposals of "the illustrious and most distinguished principal," even when read with the benevolent interpretation of the Bishop of Verceil, inspired at the Roman court merely an admiration mingled with much reserve. Was not this Bonaparte the one who imposed the Treaty of Tolentino, so disastrous for the Holy See? Today he calls himself a good Catholic; but are we not told that only recently in Egypt he declared himself a Moslem?

This distrust was but too well justified. Of course we cannot easily weigh, in the souls of men, the allowance for generous ideas and for personal calculation. "Such a judgment belongs to a tribunal more infallible than that of history." [10] But what we know about Pius VII and about Bonaparte enable us, even at this juncture, to formulate a hypothesis that will receive a striking confirmation in the subsequent story of this period. Under similar formulas of pacification and conciliation we can readily see profound differences in the tendencies of the Pope and of the first consul. When even at Imola the future

[8] "His intentions are as pure as his mind is circumscribed," commented Ghislieri, the representative of Austria at Rome. Maury, speaking more crudely, says of him: "He has no head." Mathieu, p. 10.

[9] Mathieu, op. cit., p. 5.

[10] D'Haussonville, op. cit., I, 67.

Pius VII loyally accepted the democratic government of the legations, he was guided entirely by the thought of the salvation of souls.[11] When, with a sincerity that we have no right to question, General Bonaparte proclaimed the benefits of the Catholic religion, his correspondence and his confidences prove that he was already thinking of the empire and the coronation. Says the Count d'Haussonville: "Read through the pages of his correspondence. You will there discover on every page a ceaseless preoccupation: somewhere to strike a blow not less resounding than the one he has just delivered; the trophies of Marengo have, in his eyes, their whole value only if they mark the route that would lead to the empire." [12] Already anyone could foresee that every time some opposition arose, in the sequence of events, between the rights of absolute justice and Bonaparte's ambition, serious conflicts would have to be feared between the head of the Church and the first magistrate of the French government.

This fundamental divergence would be the chief source of the difficulties that arose in the sequel between Pius VII and Bonaparte. Other difficulties sprang up in their train.

The most intransigeant of the émigrés had their center in Rome. At the conclave they even tried to have their own candidate. On August 12, 1798, the Count of Provence, who, after the death of the dauphin, took the title of Louis XVIII, wrote to Cardinal Maury: "I should like the future head of the Church to be a man of mature age, whose hard trials have given splendor to his courage, whose eloquence should be known to all Europe. All that is lacking to this portrait is your name. You, therefore, are the one I desire to see raised to the papal [11] Recalling an earlier incident in the life of Pius VII, Cardinal Wiseman, speaking of him, notes: "The same courage in meeting an enemy face to face, and the same bold adhesion to duty, will be found blended with the same condescension and readiness to avoid useless resistance and fruitless collision" (Recollections of the Last Four Popes, p. 101).

[12] D'Haussonville, op. cit., I, 66.

throne." [13] Such a candidacy had no chance of succeeding, and the idea was given up. But the ambitious Maury, officially representing King Louis XVIII at the papal court, kept the prince acquainted with all the political and religious affairs. This unreliable man, who ten years later would grievously afflict the Pope by his exaggerated imperialism, moved heaven and earth to thwart, between Pius VII and the first consul, any accord that would consolidate the new regime to the detriment of the rights of the traditional royalty. Bishop Nicolai of Bézier had exactly the same view of the situation. "My system," he said, "is that without legitimate royalty, no Catholicity in France; likewise, without Catholicity, no royalty." [14]

In Bonaparte's entourage, from an entirely different point of view, the opposition was not less keen with regard to any understanding with Rome. The Decade philosophique, the organ of the members of the Institute, published bitter articles against the Pope and the clergy. The Ami des lois wrote: "You will see that the priests are going to resume their grasping and ambitious views. . . . Some have carried their impudence to the point of hoping that they will induce the consuls to go to Mass." [15] By Fouché the antireligious spirit entered the ranks of the police, who multiplied the investigations of the "refractory" priests and pointed to their so-called intrigues. In [13] Maury, op. cit., I, 188.

[14] Boulay de la Meurthe, Documents sur la négociation du Concordat, I, 75. This quarrel over the projects of a concordat was an appendage to a more general quarrel, stirred up in regard to the promise of "fidelity to the Constitution," which a decree of December 28, 1799, required of the priests. Maury, with the unreflecting enthusiasm of his eager imagination, hurled himself into the strife, giving forth with assurance that such an oath, opposed to the inalienable rights of the king of France, was reproved in a high place, presenting himself as interpreter of the cardinalitial congregations, taking to task Archbishop de Juigné of Paris for his lack of energy, accusing that prelate with being "intoxicated with Presbyterianism and democracy." Maury, op. cit., II, 94. Father Emery wrote: "To think like that is to imagine that we can restore the old government; this is to deceive ourselves and sacrifice religion to illusions." Letter of January 31, 1800, to Father de Romeuf. Cf. L. de Lanzac de Laborie, Paris sous Napoléon, I, 280–87.

[15] Amis des lois, January 3, 1800.

the words of one report: "Priests are actively going about to re-establish the fanaticism." In another police report we read: "Emboldened by indulgence, they redouble their efforts to destroy the most sacred institutions." [16] "The old religion," wrote Fouché himself in a circular to the prefects, "is taking up again the sway it had before the Revolution. The government places no obstacle in their way, but their intolerance is added to their domination and to their desire to destroy all the republican institutions." [17] Other reproaches seemed to reflect on the first consul himself, for the words allegedly being spoken by the priests, the minister of police regarded as injurious to the government; but they were the very words pronounced by the first consul at Milan. Said Fouché: "The priests are spreading the word that the government feels the need of a religion, that no civilized state exists which has not its religion, that in France we cannot have any other religion but the Catholic religion, and that the government is convinced of this truth, being persuaded that order and internal peace will be re-established only by the aid of religion." [18]

But neither Pius VII nor Bonaparte was ready to retreat before such opposition. Bonaparte had trust in his own strength and, as he said, in "his star." Pius VII, "as soon as he was elected, offered himself to God as an expiatory victim to obtain the end of the revolutionary strife and the return of France to the practice of religion." [19] In all these threats the Pope saw simply the occasion to realize his generous offering.

[16] According to the national archives; quoted by Pisani, L'église de Paris pendant la Révolution, IV, 26.

[17] Ibid., p. 42.

[18] Circular of 20 Thermidor, national archives, A F IV, 1329. Quoted by Pisani, IV, 44. See ibid., pp. 45–47, for the various police measures taken with regard to a teaching prospectus of the College of Navarre, in which we read a denunciation of "the antirevolutionary intrigues" of some "retrograde teachers." This prospectus is quoted by Aulard, Paris sous le Concordat, I, 506.

[19] Mathieu, op. cit., p. 9.

By a letter dated September 13, 1800, the Pope informed the French bishops about the opening of the preliminary negotiations with the first consul. Supposing that the negotiations would take place in Italy, he had sent to Verceil, to be at Martiniana's side, Spina, the archbishop of Corinth, a devout and enlightened prelate, personally known to General Bonaparte and highly esteemed by him.[20]

Louis XVIII

On both sides the expected opposition broke loose. On September 8, at the first rumors of a possible conference between the Pope and the first consul, Louis XVIII wrote to the Emperor of Russia, Paul I, the following letter:

> Dear brother and cousin, never perhaps has the cause of the French monarchy run a greater danger than at this moment; never also have I turned to Your Imperial Majesty with more confidence. To spare your time, I shall not enlarge on the proceedings of Bonaparte regarding the Pope, on the consequences it may have, and on the remedies I have tried to apply. But, imploring your support, I beg you to give the Holy Father, by your powerful intervention, the strength to resist the insidious proposals of the hypocritical usurper. I am certain of the effect that a step by Your Imperial Majesty would produce on the mind of the Pope, and I hope that Your Imperial Majesty is assured of the deep gratitude which you will arouse or rather will redouble in me.[21]

Paul I did not lend himself to a proceeding that he judged vain. Toward the end of September, Cardinal Maury, by the hand of his brother and vicar general, Father Maury, presented to the Pope a note in which were found ably set forth all the difficulties and objections that the enemies of any accord were opposing to the initiative of the first consul and to the favorable consideration by the Pope.[22] A month later (October 30, 1800) Louis XVIII addressed the following letter to Bishop de la Fare of Nancy, who was his representative at Vienna: "Bonaparte's proposals seem not such as can be accepted by the Holy Father; but if His Holiness has that weakness, the King counts on the firmness of the majority of the bishops of his realm not to submit to laws that the Pope himself, and a fortiori an illegitimate government, has not the right to impose on it." [23]

[20] Ibid., p. 10.
[21] Mathieu, Le Concordat de 1801, p. 17.

The schism of the Little Church can be seen in germ in these last lines; but they are to be explained from a purely political point of view. Bonaparte, by contributing to the re-establishment of worship, would by a single stroke win the gratitude of the mass of Catholics and would thus deprive the royalist party of its best supports.

This opposition of the royalists was sure to prompt the first consul to hasten the conclusion of an accord with the Pope. But Bonaparte would encounter from the Pope difficulties no less grave. None of the learned men and lawyers that Bonaparte liked to have about him, and none of his companions in arms, approved of the idea of restoring Catholicism. To surmount these obstacles the first consul was obliged to call upon all the prodigious resources of his facile mind. His tactics varied according to the nature of the resistances. At times his method was brutal. One annalist well situated to know the small incidents of that policy, tells us: "Bonaparte discussed the matter with Volney, having told him that he intended to re-establish the worship and to pay salaries to the clergy. Thereupon Volney was outspoken in criticism of this plan and alleged that enough would be done if they re-established freedom of worship and left to each one the care and burden of maintaining it and of paying the ministers of whatever religion he professed." "But," said Bonaparte, "France asks me to be responsible for both." To this remark, Volney replied, perhaps with that arrogance which was usual to him: "Very well, if France asked you for the Bourbons, would you give these to France?" At these words, Bonaparte, not restraining his temper any longer and giving free rein to one of those outbursts not rare with him, knocked Volney down with a kick in the stomach; then, ringing for an attendant, he cooly ordered that Volney be taken to his carriage.[24]

[22] This long Note sur les conférences de Verceil was published for the first time in full by Ricard, Correspondance diplomatique et mémoires inédits du Cardinal Maury, I, 461–79.

[23] Boulay de la Meurthe, Documents sur la négociation du Concordat, I, 105.

The most terrible opponents were not those of Volney's stripe. Other counsellors of the first consul, that they might block the negotiations, proceeded to organize a clever and cunning work; a system of deceits and intrigues hard to thwart. In the very first rank of these evil counsellors was the former bishop of Autun, who was at this time called citizen Talleyrand. After he had inaugurated the constitutional schism, "he discarded the new Church as readily as he had the old," [25] and, having returned to the lay state, he was united in matrimony to a divorced, Protestant English woman, Mrs. Gand.[26] On July 15, 1797, he was appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs. Reappointed to these same functions after a short interruption, he was officially commissioned in 1800 to treat with Rome. Talleyrand was careful to avoid clashing head-on with the first consul; and at bottom, the re-establishment of the old religion was in accord with his own mind inasmuch as he hoped to obtain an honorable place in the new organization; but as soon as he saw that such a place would be refused him, he strove continually, if not to oppose the enterprise openly, "at least to lack zeal for it, to stir up incidents, and to slow the proceedings by placing obstacles in the way of the relations of the Roman court with his principals." [27] Then, when he judged that the moment had come, he gently insinuated to Napoleon that the latter's first move had perhaps not been good; before the mind of the man whose dominant instincts he knew, he evoked the pope of Canossa and the adversary of Philip the Fair. From then on, he never neglected an occasion to hinder the negotiations, to increase the obstacles, to arouse misunderstandings, and to spread snares of all sorts. Said Caselli, one of Pius VII's representatives: "We have many enemies, of whom the most implacable and most powerful is the Bishop of Autun." [28] As Cobentzel wrote to the Emperor of Austria, "in general Talleyrand has always shown the greatest ill will for the re-establishment of the Catholic religion in France." [29]

[24] Besnard, Souvenirs d'un nonagénaire, II, 197. Besnard, a defrocked priest, was a special friend of Volney. The recollections concerning the old regime and the Revolution, says Cardinal Mathieu, "are one of the most interesting books that have been written about this period." Mathieu, op. cit., p. 84.

[25] Mathieu, op. cit., p. 35.

[26] Mrs. Gand, English by her husband's nationality, was French by birth. See Correspondant, CCXX, 659.

Back of Talleyrand, another priest of quite different manner, Grégoire, that unreformed revolutionary who recited his Breviary and defied the atheists, that obstinate champion of a Christianity more moral than that of Talleyrand, but perhaps more hostile to the authority of Rome, put to work all his dealings to influence the first consul in the direction of abandoning any project of agreement with the Pope, and utilized all the resources of his theological and canonical knowledge to point

[27] Ibid., p. 36.

[28] Letter of June 1, 1801, published ibid., p. 37.

[29] Dispatch of June 10, 1801 (ibid., p. 36). The facts mentioned above, many of which will be explicitly recalled in subsequent pages of this volume, did not prevent Talleyrand from writing in his Mémoires, when speaking of the Concordat: "This great reconciliation with the Church, to which I powerfully contributed . . ." (Talleyrand, Mémoires, I, 284). If we were to take the history of the negotiations in its aggregate, we could not affirm more clearly the contrary of the truth. Yet we would not be exact in declaring, as certain historians have done, that Talleyrand employed a systematic one-sided attitude to hinder the re-establishment of the Catholic religion. While he was able to hope for a preponderant part, he desired it. Bernard de Lacombe has proved this view by decisive documents, emanating from the most irrefutable participants or witnesses. Cf. B. de Lacombe, "Le mariage de Talleyrand," in the Correspondant, August 25 and September 10, 1905 (CCXX, 658, 853).

out the dangers of a re-establishment of Roman Catholicism in France.[30]

Bonaparte did not see his way to rid himself of these diverse influences, some of which corresponded with his own inmost sentiments. Evidences of this fact we shall see presently. But the re-establishment of Catholic worship in France was too closely bound up with the general plan of his policy and with the goal of his ambition for him to entertain the thought of abandoning the undertaking. He advanced firmly along the path he had marked out for himself.

Papal Envoys to Paris

On September 4, 1800, Bonaparte had his minister of foreign affairs, Talleyrand, write the following letter, addressed to Cardinal Martiniana. "The first consul . . . has the greatest satisfaction in seeing that the Holy Father's sentiments of concord agree with his own. He thinks he should await the arrival of Monsignor Spina at Verceil before giving me the order to reply in his name. He directs me to send you the passports necessary for this prelate's coming to Paris."

These last words utterly disconcerted the papal legates and the Holy Father himself, who were counting on having the negotiations carried on in Italy. But Bonaparte, who probably feared to have the eyes of Europe as well as those of his entourage perceive his initiative in this affair, had perhaps also hoped to exercise at Paris a more direct influence on the Italian diplomats. By one of those sudden decisions not unusual with him, he himself, without any prearrangement with the Pope, decided this serious question of the place for the negotiations. The Pope considered that he ought not raise a protest against this demand, which, moreover, accidentally procured an advantage for him. Monsignor Spina perceived that the good Cardinal Martiniana, in his desire to please the first consul, had already made excessive concessions to him, and from these Bonaparte subsequently never ceased to take advantage.[31] The transfer of the negotiations to Paris enabled Pius VII more easily to withdraw the excessively frank diplomat from the affair, in spite of his most urgent offers of service.

[30] See Mathieu, p. 44, the summary of the memorial addressed by Grégoire to the first consul in August, 1800.

The Holy Father sent with Monsignor Spina a Servite priest, Father Caselli, well known for his theological skill. The two papal envoys reached Paris on November 5, 1800,[32] and took up a modest lodging in a small furnished house, the Hôtel de Rome, on rue Saint-Dominique.

The Pope and his legates were quite aware of the difficulties of the situation. To carry on the negotiations at Paris was not only to assume the attitude of a somewhat humiliating initiative, but it was also to give the appearance of accepting the French government at the very moment when certain venerable men, such as Father Emery and Father de Boulogne, by the simple fact of their promise of fidelity to the Constitution, were the objects of the bitterest recriminations on the part of some ardent Catholics. The situation might seem to imply that the papal envoys were discussing, on a footing of equality, almost of inferiority, with the apostate or rebellious clerics who were in Bonaparte's entourage: Talleyrand, Sieyès, Fouché,[33] perhaps Grégoire, the most fanatical if not the most irreligious of all, who was charged with having presented the project of the meeting. Apparently Grégoire had an effective hand in preparing a project; but the first consul no doubt feared that the thought of treating with the head of the schismatics would make the Holy Father hold back; Bonaparte therefore declined the offers of the Bishop of Loir-et-Cher.

[31] Later on, to the objections of the Roman diplomats, Bonaparte replied: "You are going back on your word: Martiniana told me that was agreed to." Cardinal Consalvi wrote on January 11, 1801: "No one would believe the prejudice which Cardinal Martiniana has caused for the negotiation in the little he had to do with it."

[32] Annales catholiques, VI, 384.

[33] Fouché was not in holy orders, but had put on the cassock and filled the functions of professor in several colleges of the Oratory, including that of Juilly.

To obviate these grave disadvantages as far as possible, Cardinal Consalvi, Secretary of State, enjoined on Spina to avoid with utmost care whatever might give a diplomatic character to his mission. He was to consider himself and present himself merely as an envoy commissioned to hear the proposals that would be made and transmit them to the Pope, without being authorized to solve anything whatever.[34] At the outset of the negotiations the first demand to be made by Spina will be for the abolition of the promise of fidelity to the government. In other words, the able Secretary of State, the better to protect himself from the eventual complaints of the party that had Maury for its violent interpreter, insisted on noting the difference between an act of submission to persons not implying adherence to any principle, and the acceptance of laws which might amount to an acceptance of the principles.[35]

Spina and his companion were scrupulously exact in following this line of conduct. Retiring to their modest apartment, they closed the door to all, even to Father Emery, who tried in vain to reach them.[36] They saw only one diplomat, Musquiz, the Spanish ambassador, who was the only one representing at Paris any great Catholic power that was at peace with France. With regard to the men and affairs of Paris and of the consulship, Musquiz gave them indications of their complete lack of such information as would enable them to avoid proceeding as blind men and to avoid irritating or producing friction with those they needed to convince and win.

[34] Instructions of October 13, 1800, published by Boulay de la Meurthe, III, 597–637.

[35] Ibid.

[36] Gosselin, Vie de M. Emery. II, 41.

Spina and Bernier

The superior of St. Sulpice echoed the feelings of part of the Paris clergy, discreetly grieving at so mysterious a procedure. He said: "I fear the arrangements without anyone being consulted." [37] The future would show that the tactics ordered by Consalvi were the safest.[38]

On November 8, 1800, the Archbishop of Corinth saw enter his room at the Hôtel de Rome a little, thickset, squint-eyed man with features far from handsome, whose intelligent and sharp eyes, however, and clear speech, logical and earnest, had a winning quality. He presented himself in the name of the first consul, who had commissioned him to confer with the papal envoy on the pending questions.

The man thus chosen by Bonaparte was a priest [39] of blameless doctrine but one whose political life, until then greatly agitated, gave rise to quite divergent judgments of him. This man was Father Bernier, formerly pastor of Angers. Over the revolting peasants of the Vendée he exercised an almost incredible influence. He had actually taken part in the combats and entered into the councils of the Vendean leaders, at first dominating them; after strifes and intrigues in which his part had appeared suspect, he became embroiled with the principal generals of the Catholic army. At the close of 1799, after 18 Brumaire, at the very time when everyone was desiring peace, he had gone to General d'Hédouville of the republican army and abruptly said to him: "Let our peasants have their pastors, and I will undertake to withdraw them from the King." Better than anyone else he was acquainted with the rural population of Anjou and the Vendée and knew well how to manage them. He fulfilled his promise. To bend the most faithful partisans of the old monarchy, he spread the rumor that Bonaparte was a secret friend of the Bourbons and would soon bring them back into power. This deception was but one of the countless perfidies for which his enemies reproached him. After the conclusion of the peace, Bernier settled at Paris. As throughout most of his life, he there filled an enigmatic role. He received numerous Chouans, who came to consult him about the conduct they ought to follow, and he was received familiarly by the first consul, who recognized in him a force that he would make an instrument of his schemes when the suitable moment arrived.

[37] Ibid., p. 42.

[38] "I have no fear," wrote Cardinal Mathieu, "in pointing out to the young men connected with the Quai d'Orsay, Consalvi's instructions to Spina as a model for study and a masterpiece of honest and prudent diplomacy." A summary of these instructions will be found in Mathieu, Le Concordat de 1801, pp. 60–71.

[39] At this period, the priests, apart from their ecclesiastical functions, generally dressed as laymen. Even Spina was obliged to follow this practice.

That moment had come. Kept acquainted with Bonaparte's intentions, Bernier, at this first interview, broached the chief conditions set down by the first consul, especially the full renewal of the episcopate.

The next day Bonaparte received Spina at Malmaison and "spoke most respectfully of the Holy Father." [40] The papal envoy wrote to the Cardinal Secretary of State that he was satisfied with this beginning.[41]

The conferences between Spina and Bernier continued without serious incident, at least apparently, until the end of 1800, either in the little chamber of the Archbishop of Corinth at the Hôtel de Rome or in the modest apartment occupied by Bernier on the third floor of the Hôtel d'Orléans, rue des Petits-Augustins.[42] On December 21, the Gazette de France published the following note: "Announcement is made of a coming peace between the Republic and the Holy See." Father Emery wrote: "I continue to believe that we are approaching a solution." [43]

[40] Letter from Spina to Consalvi (November 12, 1800), quoted by Boulay de la Meurthe, I, 23.

[41] Ibid.

[42] The rue des Petits-Augustins is the part of the present rue Bonaparte between the Quai and the rue Jacob.

[43] Boulay de la Meurthe, I, 169.

The negotiations were not so far advanced as was imagined by those on the outside. Spina, conforming to the prudent instruction of Cardinal Consalvi, listened to Bernier's different proposals: general resignation of the bishops, legalization of all the confiscations of Church property, the first consul's right to nominate the new bishops. The representative of the Holy See made a few amendments to the first point,[44] and to the second merely offered some objections of principle; but, with regard to Bonaparte's claim to name the new bishops, he had clear instructions from the Secretary of State, and urged them strongly. "The first consul wished to inherit the right of episcopal nominations which the kings of France had possessed. But did he, like them, make public profession of the Catholic religion? Did he recognize it as the religion of the state? If not, he should be satisfied with the regime established in England, Prussia, and Russia for the ecclesiastical benefices. Those who wished to profit by the inheritance from the Bourbons, should at least accept the burdens of it."

First Proposals

The Archbishop of Corinth sent a faithful report of all these incidents to Consalvi. On the advice of the latter, in opposition to a first concordat project put forth by Bernier on November 26, he presented a counterproposal, which he communicated to Consalvi in the middle of December. To this proposal the French government replied by a second project, which, not being agreed to, gave way to a third, then to a fourth, and finally to a fifth, entirely written in Bonaparte's own hand. This last project was submitted to Spina on February 2, 1801.

But at that moment a new incident arose. Along with Bonaparte's chief claim, on which clearly he would not yield, namely, the right to appoint the bishops, was expressed another claim, equally unacceptable, of the minister of foreign affairs, Talleyrand. This former bishop of Autun had entered into a union with an English divorcée, Mrs. Gand, and plainly intended to marry her civilly and religiously. But Talleyrand did not wish a concordat that would not recognize the legality of that union. The first consul, desiring to satisfy his minister, pretended, according to his custom, to settle the question with a single stroke. In the fifth project, presented on February 2, he himself had drawn up an article in these words: "The ecclesiastics who have, since their consecration, entered into bonds of matrimony or who, by other acts, have notoriously renounced the ecclesiastical state, will enter the class of simple citizens and will, like these, be admitted to lay communion." [45] Spina made clear that the words "or who, by other acts, have notoriously renounced the ecclesiastical state" would never be accepted at Rome. On February 23 he wrote to Rome: "I do not know whether Talleyrand wishes to be included in this provision. But I have made known that neither a bishop nor anyone who is bound by solemn vows can enjoy the apostolic indulgence." [46]

[44] For the system proposed by Spina, see Pisani, IV, 112.

The two capital difficulties had been broached. How would they be solved? Neither Pius VII nor Bonaparte wished to abandon the project of a concordat. The Roman court sought to gain time. Pius VII had organized at Rome, along with the recent congregation of extraordinary affairs, a small congregation made up of four cardinals whose office was to study the questions arising at Paris. To obviate any surprise, Consalvi repeated that Spina was merely a missus ad audiendum et referendum, in other words, that he was to listen to everything, discuss everything, observe everything, but conclude nothing and to refer everything to Rome. "Bonaparte," says Albert Lorel, "saw through the game and procrastinated on his side."

[45] Boulay de la Meurthe, I, 353.
[46] Ibid., II, 63.

His temperament led him to make abrupt decisions and coups d'état; but he knew how to await the occasion.

Diplomatic Activities

That occasion was not slow in coming. The peace of Luneville (February 9, 1901), by settling the abasement of the house of Austria, gave the first consul a new prestige. To this he wished to add a title and the pope's recognition: he gave up the idea of the Roman Republic and returned to the Holy See its states such as they were in 1797, that is, diminished only by the loss of Romagna and the Legations. Then he proceeded to act with vigor.

Bonaparte was well aware that his fifth concordat project was examined at Rome by the two cardinalitial congregations. Summoning Spina, he gave him a prompt reply and, to hasten the solution, sent to Rome a cleverly chosen extraordinary agent. This man was François de Cacault, a Breton whose qualities of decision and whose abilities the first consul appreciated at the treaty of Tolentino. His sincere and solid religious faith had already made him appreciated at Rome. From the political angle he called himself "a reformed revolutionary." He held the modern ideas with the distinguished manners of a man of the ancient regime.

Cacault, reaching Rome on April 8, was well received by the Secretary of State, who communicated to him the results of the labors by the Roman Congregations. After lengthy discussions, the cardinals decided to go to the extreme limit of concessions. The Holy See would grant the first consul the right to name the bishops, who would then receive canonical institution by the Holy See; the Pope dispensed from the obligation of restitution those who had acquired ecclesiastical property. He also agreed, in concert with the government, to establish new boundaries of the French dioceses; but he required: (1) that the laws contrary to the dogmas and discipline of the Church should be abrogated, and (2) that the Catholic religion should be recognized as that of the great majority of French citizens.[47] With this project, Pius VII sent a long letter, written by his own hand, in which, with gentle and firm language, he gave the first consul the reasons why he could not sacrifice certain fundamental articles. "You will understand," he said, "that what would be re-established in France would not be the Catholic religion but a different religion if we were to sanction by our concessions any of the maxims that we must reprove." [48] On the question especially concerning priests who were married during the Revolution, the Pope explained his stand with a fatherly kindness: "As to the absolution of the married priests, and as to the absolution of those who may have withdrawn from the Church in other ways, we will provide by issuing the powers necessary so that they may be absolved according to the regulations and ecclesiastical discipline, assuring you that we consider our duty is to show them the effects of every fatherly condescension as far as it can be extended." [49]

All these labors of discussion and revision had lasted to the 12th of May. This is the date of the papal letter. On the next day a special messenger was on the way with it to Paris, where he arrived on May 23. But this messenger of peace passed on the way a messenger from Bonaparte, bearing a tempest with him.

The first consul's patience was exhausted. About him the foes of the concordat were spreading evil reports. As the delay increased, secret motives were looked for: that Rome was intriguing with Austria, England, or Russia, and trying to gain [47] See the complete text in Mathieu, pp. 145–48.

[48] The text of this letter was published for the first time by Cardinal Mathieu, op. cit., pp. 150–53.

[49] Bernard de Lacombe, "Le mariage de Talleyrand," in Le Correspondant, August 25, 1905, p. 677.

time that she might shake loose from France.[50] Grégoire insinuated his habitual suggestions on "the bad faith of the Roman court." Talleyrand, taking umbrage at Rome's refusal of the clause relative to his future marriage, urged the first consul to act with energy. On May 19, 1801, Bonaparte sent to Rome an ultimatum which may be summed up in these terms: "If, within five days, the Pope has not accepted the first consul's project, all further relations will be broken off. Cacault was to leave Rome and withdraw to Florence." [51] The ultimatum reached the Holy Father on May 29. At the same time the Pope received letters from Spina, informing him that the first consul, now incensed, threatened to make his decision without regarding the Church, charged Conslavi with treason, and spoke of invading the States of the Church and of becoming a Protestant.

The situation was critical. The Roman commission of extraordinary affairs met and declared the proposal of the first consul unacceptable. This would be the rupture with the direst consequences.

A courageous and clever inspiration of Cacault saved the situation. The French negotiator [52] had brought with him as secretary an intelligent young man, Artaud, the future historian of Pius VII, who relates the incident in his touching pages.

> This able minister requested me to visit him and, after I read the letter, he said to me: "I must obey my government; but a government must have at its head one who understands the negotiations, and ministers who advise him well, and that all this be understood. . . . We all know that the head of the state wishes a concordat; he has wished it for a long time past; for that very purpose he sent me here and he has given me as aide the very one I would desire. . . . Neither of us is a bad Christian. I have indeed seen what you have been up to the present; as for myself, I am a reformed revolutionary. . . . On the other hand, I like Bonaparte, I like the general. . . . But you know that, even though liking him very much, I call him under my breath 'the little tiger,' to describe his figure, his tenacity, his agility. . . . Well then, the little tiger has made a mistake, one that can be repaired. But I have need of everyone. . . . If you help me, you will perhaps be enough, the two of us will be enough, for no one ever corrects with impunity those who govern."

[50] Pisani, IV, 131.

[51] Boulay de la Meurthe, II, 419–22; Mathieu, p. 179.

[52] Cacault did not receive the official title of minister of France until after the signing of the concordat.

I replied to the minister that I keenly desired to see a concordat concluded, and that in all things I would follow in his steps. . . . He went at once to Cardinal Consalvi, read to him the formidable dispatch without suppressing a single word. Then he added: "Some misunderstandings are present. The first consul does not know you. Go to Paris." "When?" asked the Cardinal. "Tomorrow," I answered. "You will please him, you will understand each other; he will see what is a cardinal, a man of acuteness; you will make the concordat with him." [53]

Cacault had judged aright. Only one man was competent to overcome the formidable difficulty. That man was the eminent Secretary of State, who had, till then, so prudently directed the negotiations from a distance: he was a polished gentleman, conciliatory, cultured, whose charm Bonaparte appreciated; he was the irreproachable ecclesiastic, whose lofty dignity made an impression on everybody in the most critical moments. The expedient suggested by Cacault seemed to the Pope and to the cardinals, who were all consulted, the only remaining chance of avoiding the rupture with France and all the ills that would ensue.[54] Cacault withdrew to Florence, and Consalvi set out for Paris, while the representative of France notified Talleyrand of the coming arrival of the Cardinal Secretary of State in the French capital.

[53] Artaud de Montor, Histoire du pape Pie VII (3rd ed., 1839), I, 108. This account, written soon after the events, has been confirmed as authentic and exact by Cacault. Ibid., p. 108 note.

[54] Mathieu, p. 191.

Consalvi and Bonaparte

Consalvi reached Paris June 20 and took up lodging in the Hôtel de Rome with Spina and Caselli. The next day Bonaparte summoned him to an interview to take place the day following. Consalvi's Mémoires gives us a striking picture of this audience, in which everything was calculated by the first consul to overawe, fascinate, and disconcert the Cardinal and to wring from him a reply favorable to the wishes of the French government.

> At the appointed hour I arrived at the Tuileries. . . . I was brought into a reception room on the ground floor. There I remained alone, without anything to look at about me except a deep solitude. A few moments later, the master of ceremonies pointed to a little door. As I passed through this I experienced the same surprise as a person feels in a theater at the sudden change of scene, when from a cottage or a prison the scene changes to the dazzling sight of a magnificent court.

The day was, in fact, one of state pomp at the Tuileries. Consalvi describes the grandiose picture that struck his eye: the troops lined up on the stairs and in the halls, paying him military honors as he passed. Others present were the gentlemen and dignitaries of the palace, the generals in full uniform, the members of the Tribunate, of the Senate, and of the legislative body; then, surrounded by the ministers of state and other high officials in festive attire, the first consul in full dress. Bonaparte, profiting by the supposed amazement of the Cardinal, came up to him, majestic and courteous, haughty and cheerful. Protesting his veneration for the Pope, he repeated against the court of Rome the most injurious accusations and finally announced the presentation of a last project. He said: "I wish absolutely that you sign it within five days."

The Cardinal, at first disconcerted, had time to gain his self-control. He himself relates in his Mémoires: "By a special grace of heaven, and nowise by my own merit, I replied to each point what I might say without stirring up dissension and without letting any complaint against Rome go without a suitable justifying reply." [55] At a nod from the first consul the audience was ended, and Consalvi departed, divided between hope and fear.

At bottom the impression produced by Consalvi had been good. Bonaparte, who always esteemed, even among those who opposed him, self-possession, courage, and intelligence, recognized these qualites in the Secretary of State. On June 25 Consalvi wrote: "The government is heaping attentions on me. Yesterday the first consul invited me to dinner, at which he showed me all possible courtesy." The cause of the Holy See was half won.

On June 27 the Cardinal received the famous project already announced. But this project, the seventh,[56] did not take into account the observations already made. Out-and-out Consalvi refused to sign it; calling to his aid Spina and Caselli, during the following night he drew up a counterproject, accompanied by a long memorial, which at an early hour the next morning he sent to Bernier.

Talleyrand had left Paris for the waters of Bourbon-l'Archambault. Had Bonaparte, remembering that Pius VII had expressed to him the desire of not seeing at the bottom of the concordat the signature of a bishop who had broken away from the Church, removed his minister from the scene for the time being? Or did the latter, seeing that his attempt had failed, withdraw of his own accord? The fact is that, with the departure of Talleyrand, the largest of the difficulties seemed to be ironed out. Consalvi made known to the first consul that the question of the marriage of the apostate priests was in the [55] Consalvi, Mémoires, I, 328.

[56] A sixth project (April 17) was proposed to Spina but was dropped because of the incidents related above.

category of disciplinary matters and that the Church had as great interest as did the state in bringing peace to these unfortunates.[57]

Bonaparte no longer spoke of his ultimatum. The five days' delay had run out. A single major difficulty remained: the question of the consuls' profession of the Catholic faith, which the Pope presented as a condition for the right of nominating bishops. An eighth project, presented by Bernier, passed over this point in silence. But (July 12) each side had the impression that the end was near; a decree of the consuls fixed the morrow for the signing of the treaty. In place of the minister of foreign affairs, who was absent from Paris, it would be signed by the first consul's brother, Joseph Bonaparte, and by the Counsellor of State, Crétet. On the day following, Bonaparte would solemnly promulgate it.

But on the 13th, upon glancing over the text that he was invited to sign, Consalvi was startled. Talleyrand, whose friends kept him informed of the proceedings, had his tool, the apostate priest Hauterive, insert an article permitting the marriage of the priests who had abandoned the Church during the Revolution. Other modifications also had been introduced into the project. The Cardinal refused to affix his signature to the document. A long discussion ensued between the plenipotentiaries, which lasted without interruption from eight o'clock of the evening of July 14 until four o'clock the next afternoon. Said Consalvi: "We took merely a bite of breakfast in the morning, for which we had little fancy." The clause about the marriage of priests was removed.[58] Finally the discussion boiled

[57] Boulay de la Meurthe, III, 162; VI, 76.

[58] After the signing of the Concordat, Talleyrand returned to his charge, increased his earnest requests to obtain from the Pope the permission to marry. All he obtained was a brief (June 29, 1802) which lifted the excommunication imposed on him and granted him lay Communion. But he did not receive the permission to marry. The first consul, however, interpreted the brief in his own way: a consular decree, inserted in the Bulletin des lois. declared that it gave full effect to the papal down to two points: Would the Catholic religion be declared the religion of France; would the police regulation of public worship be in the hands of the state? Mutual concessions were made. These provided that the Catholic religion would be declared the religion of the majority of Frenchmen, and that the police regulation of worship would be in the hands of the state, but only for what concerned public peace and security. In short, agreement was reached. Then, through scrupulous concern, Joseph wished, before signing the final text, to communicate it to his brother. He went to the Tuileries. There he found the first consul exasperated by these delays. Seeing that new modifications had been made, Bonaparte, violently tearing the paper in pieces, threw them into the fire. Once again, everything seemed to be lost.

By Consalvi's self-control all was saved. The first consul had ordered for the 14th of July a national festivity, and a magnificent dinner with 250 places was prepared. At the banquet he expected to announce the great news. Upon Consalvi's arrival, he exploded, in the presence of his guests, in one of those outbursts in which no one could say whether they were calculated or spontaneous. He delivered invectives against the Pope, the cardinals, the Roman policy, even indulging in gross and brutal insult. The calmness of the Cardinal, who more than once restrained on his lips a ready and irritating reply, disarmed Bonaparte, and cooled his anger. The text of the last accord, of which a second copy had fortunately been made, was then placed before his eyes, and seemed to him not so brief, putting the minister of foreign affairs in the secular and lay state, leaving the impression that he had the right to marry. Consequently (September 10, 1802) Talleyrand married Mrs. Gand at the town hall of the tenth arrondissement of Paris. Was this civil union followed by a nuptial blessing at Epinay? Some, without positive proof, have held that it was. At any rate, the religious marriage would have been vitiated by radical nullity. On this subject, see Bernard de Lacombe, "Le mariage de Talleyrand," in the Correspondant for August 25 and September 10, 1905.

---

inadmissible as its first reading had made it appear. Yet he proposed some changes and authorized a final conference for the next day.

Not until eleven o'clock the next evening, after engaging in a long and minute examination of each word, did the plenipotentiaries reach an accord. Joseph Bonaparte had little liking for the task of going again to his brother and running into a fresh outburst of wrath. At two o'clock in the morning a happy event made him decide. Word was brought to him that he was a father for the third time. The plenipotentiaries acclaimed the happy news, and Joseph, taking courage, undertook the office of announcing to the first consul the birth of his nephew and the signing of the Concordat. Bonaparte, without objection, gave his final ratification. A new era would now open for the Church of France. A renewal was prepared for the whole Church.

The New Concordat

The treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the Holy See and those of the French government did not realize the ideal of the relations that ought to exist between the Church and the state. What human institution has ever done so? But it established a modus vivendi acceptable in the given circumstances. Unlike the concordat of 1516, that of 1801 was, in form as well as in substance, a reciprocal contract, concluded between the spiritual power and the temporal power. By the approval of the pope and of the first consul, it would become the law of the Church and the law of the state. The text contained a preamble and seventeen articles.

By the preamble "the government of the Republic recognized that the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion is that of the great majority of the French people" and particularly "that of the consuls." The seventeen articles regulated in a general way the condition of ecclesiastical persons, the status of the Church property, and the role of the state with regard to the Church. The bishops will henceforth be appointed in accordance with a new arrangement of diocesan boundaries, established by the Holy See in agreement with the government (article 2); the pastors in a new arrangement of parish boundaries, made by the bishop and approved by the government (article 9). The bishops will be named by the government and instituted by the pope "following the forms established in France before the change of government" (article 4).

"His Holiness declares that neither he nor his successors will in any way trouble those who have acquired Church property" (article 13); the government "will assure a suitable revenue for the bishops and the pastors (article 14) and will guarantee to the Catholics the freedom to make foundations in favor of their churches" (article 15).

"The first consul will enjoy with the Holy See the same rights and prerogatives as those enjoyed by the former government" (article 16); but, in the event that one of his successors should not be a Catholic, these rights and prerogatives will be regulated by a new agreement (article 17).

By virtue of a transient arrangement, the pope must ask the former bishops for their resignations and, in case they refuse, he must proceed to the appointment of new bishops (article 3).

In their general lines such were the dispositions of this diplomatic convention, one of the most important to be met with in the history of the Church. From one point of view it seemed to ratify the political results of the French Revolution, since "the papacy recognized in the first consul of the French Republic the same rights and prerogatives as were enjoyed by the former government," namely, the rights and prerogatives of that traditional monarchy whose kings had all been consecrated by the Church; and, in this first respect, the Church would arouse among some royalists defiances hard to overcome. But, in the other respect, the papacy emerged from the crisis greater than ever. The Revolution had begun by pretending to regulate at its own pleasure the discipline of the Church; brought to a stand as in an impasse, it had been obliged to recognize that it could do nothing without the pope; and for the pope it recognized a heretofore unheard-of right, or at least a right which no pontiff had previously made use of: that of removing by his own lawful authority all the bishops of France, for the purpose of re-establishing religious peace. The consequences of this act would be far-reaching, extending over the entire world. As Taine says, "an indestructible precedent was set up." [59] In the structure the corner stone was recognized to be the papacy. Since the French concordat of 1801, more than thirty concordats have been concluded between the Holy See and the different states, not only of the Old World, but also of the New, and everywhere they have the same character; wherever the revolutionary spirit, after upsetting the traditional organisms, would necessitate an ecclesiastical reorganization, it has opened paths to a more direct and unremitting action of the papacy on the reconstituted Christianities. "In this way," concludes Taine, "all the great existing churches of the Catholic universe are the work of the Pope, his latest work, his own creation attested by a positive act of contiguous date. . . . None of them can assert or even believe itself legitimate without declaring the superior authority to be legitimate which has just endowed it with life and being." [60] The Terror had made the Church more clearly aware of its faith and piety; the Concordat established its ancient hierarchy on more solid foundations.[61]

Ratification of the Concordat

The agreement, signed at Paris on July 15, 1801, by the plenipotentiaries, had to be ratified by the pope and the first consul within forty days. Pius VII's signature was put to it on August 15, that of Bonaparte on September 8, and the official exchange of ratifications took place on September 10. On August 27 the Pope designated to represent him at Paris as his legate a latere Cardinal Caprara, who had already, under Pius VI, filled the posts of nuncio at Lucerne and Vienna. There he had ably defended the Holy See against the undertakings of Kaunitz and Joseph II. But the mission entrusted to him by Pius VII presented a different sort of difficulty. Charged with watching over the execution of the Concordat, he would have to contend at the same time with the formalism of Portalis, the slippery politics of Talleyrand, and the calculated violence of Bonaparte. At no time could he count on Bernier's support, which was timid and not altogether sure.

[59] Taine, The Modern Regime, II, 48.

[60] Taine, op. cit., II, 50.

[61] For the text of the Concordat, see pp. 562–74.

Traps were set for him on all sides. Caprara could not avoid all of them. On March 30, 1802, Portalis, taking advantage of a moment of weariness and emotion in which the nuncio was placed after a long discussion with the first consul, read to him a regulation that would later be published under the title of "the organic articles." Caprara, not having the text before his eyes, listened but, as he declared in a letter, he did not grasp the exact import of the document, yet he did request that some changes be made in it. He was promised that these modifications would be made. Without further formality, on April 5, Portalis presented to the Chambers, as constituting something indivisible, the concordat followed by the organic articles.[62] The legislative body, on April 8, by 228 votes against 21, passed the new law, which, not having been attacked in the ten days in the Senate as unconstitutional, became (April 18, 1802) a law of the Republic.

Early Easter morning (April 18) the great bell of Notre Dame, which had been silent for ten years, began to ring. At the hour for High Mass, the consuls in red dress, the ministers and the ambassadors in uniform, and the general officers in full dress uniform, entered the cathedral, where the new archbishop of Tours, Archbishop de Boisgelin, preached a special sermon for the occasion. The solemnity closed with the chanting of the Te Deum. The popular emotion ran high. We are told that in the streets people wept and embraced one another and that one resident of the Ile Saint-Louis fell dead through his overwhelming impression of joy.[63]

[62] Boulay de La Meurthe, V, 276–79, 297–391, 407.

This joy extended to all of France. Most of the churches had already been reopened, but until then many of them were shared with the constitutionals; in these places Catholic worship was celebrated with timidity and apprehension, almost in hiding.[64] On the morrow of the Notre Dame solemnity the public worship resumed its ancient splendor. Again processions passed along the streets and in the public squares; again were to be seen the grand liturgical celebrations and the spontaneous manifestations of piety. The seminaries opened once more,[65] the chapters were again organized, the vestry boards were again established, foundations in favor of churches increased, priests no longer were afraid to appear in public in ecclesiastical dress,[66] hospices, prisons, and lyceums received chaplains. In an allocution delivered on May 24, 1802, the Supreme Pontiff [63] Pisani, Le clergé de Paris et la Révolution, IV, 286.

[64] L. de Lanzac de Laborie, Paris sous Napoléon, I, 292–98.

[65] The first consul (October 6, 1802) returned to its former use the seminary of St. Sulpice, at that time occupied by women of ill repute, who, on his orders, were then brought to Bicêtre (Correspondance de Napoléon 1er, VIII, 79). In 1800, profiting by the relative calm then prevailing, Father Emery had grouped together, under the direction of his confrere, Father Duclaux, a few young seminarians in a house on rue Saint-Jacques. Wearing lay dress, the seminarians took their recreations by walks along the neighboring boulevards. Dogma was taught by Father Frayssinous, moral by Father Fournier (future bishop of Montpellier), and canon law and history by Father Emery, who, more suspect than the others, did not lodge in the house with the others but on rue d'Enfer and came from there for his classes. At the beginning of 1801 the number of students was thirty; among them were two future bishops (Quelen and Feutrier) and a brilliant young man who became the founder of Stanislas College, Father Liautard.

[66] In 1801 the priests, without yet venturing to resume the cassock at Paris, had begun to wear a large black cloak. Lanzac de Laborie, op. cit., p. 296.

gave expression to the universal joy when he said: "What a new spectacle France presents to the whole world at this moment! The temples of the Host High are again open, the sheep are again restored to their lawful shepherds, the sacraments of the Church are again publicly administered, the standard of the cross is again unfurled, and the supreme head of the Church is solemnly recognized: such are the immense blessings for which we must rejoice in the Lord." [67] Consequently the Pope invited the Catholics of France to celebrate a jubilee of thanksgiving.

The Organic Articles

This joy was not unmixed, and this triumph was traversed by many a trial. The organic articles, which the first consul had rapidly communicated to Caprara in a sort of surprise ambush, were in some aspects the very negation of the concordat agreement.

Says a certain French jurist:

> We should not confuse, as was sometimes formerly done, these organic articles of the year X with the concordat itself, although they were part of the same law of the state. The concordat, agreed to between the two powers, is a law both of the Church and of the state. The organic articles, the work exclusively of the French government, were never submitted to the pope or approved by him. Bonaparte presented them as a law intended to regulate the details of the concordat and to assure its execution. In reality he sought, in a roundabout fashion, to go back on certain compromises that he had been obliged to make in his first projects. Taking his inspiration from principles formulated in the Gallican Declaration of 1682, he endeavored to re-establish to his own advantage over the new Church of France the rights which the absolute kings had formerly arrogated to themselves with regard to the Church. He used this procedure as a means of holding the clergy in his hand, in the hope of making them serve his interests.

In the promulgation of the organic articles, Bonaparte pretended to be exercising the police right which the concordat recognized with regard to public worship. He was not unaware that he was exceeding these rights. The concordat had, in fact, after long and minute negotiations, restrained this right of police to the cases in which the public tranquillity would be involved. But the organic articles started by repeating: 1. the old Gallican rules relative to the verification of the acts of the Holy See and of the decrees of synods held in other countries, "even those of general councils," which must be submitted to the placet (articles 1 and 2); 2. the bishops were forbidden to meet in council or synod in France without the authorization of the government (article 4), or to leave their dioceses, even for the purpose of going to Rome, without an express permission (article 20); 3. the old appeal as from an abuse, under the form of recourse to the Council of State (article 6). All these measures had been, in the course of the negotiations, the object of sharp opposition on the part of the papal envoys.

[67] Barberi, Bullarium, XI, 335–39.

The organic articles then proceeded to take up questions with regard to discipline, to doctrine, and even to dogma, that is, questions purely spiritual, which are outside the competence of the civil power, and with regard to which several articles were in contradiction to the canons and even to the concordat which they were supposed to apply. Such were the following: article 10, which abolished "every privilege carrying exemption from episcopal jurisdiction"; article 11, which subordinated to the authorization of the government the establishment of chapters and seminaries that the concordat authorized; articles 13, 14, 15, which determined the pastoral duties of the archbishops and bishops; article 24, imposing on seminary professors the obligation "of subscribing to the Declaration of 1682 and of teaching the doctrine therein contained"; article 29, which prescribed the adoption in France of a single catechism and a single liturgy; article 26, which, contrary to the canons, fixed the age and the conditions required for the ordination of priests. To justify the organic articles, Portalis said: "They did not introduce a new right and were but a new sanction of the old maxims of the Gallican Church." This fact was precisely what condemned them.

The organic articles were the source of further quarrels with the Holy See. In consistory (May 24, 1802) the Pope vehemently protested against the duplicity of the first consul. He then charged Caprara to protest to Talleyrand against these articles, "that His Holiness had not been invited to examine and that essentially involved the customs, discipline, rights, instruction, and jurisdiction of the Church." To Caprara's long letter (August 18, 1803) Portalis replied (September 22) by a still longer plea, in which he tried to justify Bonaparte. Another note from Cardinal Caprara, addressed to Talleyrand on the subject of Napoleon's coronation, showed to the latter that the Pope persisted in distinguishing between the concordat, which he had accepted, and "the so-called organic laws, in which several articles could not accord with the principles and maxims of the Church." This time (July 18, 1804) Talleyrand replied: "The concordat is the result of the will of the two contracting parties. The organic laws, on the contrary, are merely the manner of extension adopted by one of these two powers. The manner is susceptible of change and improvement, according to circumstances. No one can therefore, without injustice, confound the one with the other in the same expressions." Cardinal Consalvi, in the name of the Pope, made note of Talleyrand's declaration by which "the seventeen articles of the concordat agreed upon with the Holy See are utterly separate from the organic laws, to which they were attached in the decree of 18 Germinal of the year X," and which His Holiness hopes "to have His Imperial Majesty change and improve." [68] The Pope's hope was not well founded. He was able to obtain nothing from Napoleon and could do nothing more than repeat his most vigorous protests, notably in his bull Quam memorandam of June 10, 1809.[69]

Religious Situation

In the negotiations of the concordat, Pius VII had the consolation of seeing the great mass of his bishops, priests, and [68] Letter of August 28, 1804.

[69] Emile Chénon, professor in the law faculty of the University of Paris, in the Histoire générale of Lavisse and Rambaud (IX, 263–66). Cf. Gaudry, Traité de la législation des cultes, 1854; Ami de la religion (August 1, 1854); Dudon, "La réponse de Portalis à la note du cardinal Caprara sur les articles organiques," in the Revue historique de droit, 1907 (XXI), 269–309.

faithful take their stand around his sovereign authority. The abjurations of the constitutional priests were made in great number. From the documents published by Taine, we are led to suppose that the number of the faithful who remained attached to the Church of the oath did not, in 1801, exceed a tenth of the population; in other words, out of a population of 35,000,000 of Frenchmen and of 30,000,000 Catholics, 27,000,000 remained united to the pope.[70] The constitutionals who still followed the directions of Grégoire were perhaps more ardent than ever. They had begun by making a desperate opposition to the concordat; then soon, seeing the uselessness of their efforts, they accepted the treaty; but they did so in the hope of turning it to their profit. In fact, we see their activity, their cleverness, and especially their almost unbelievable tenacity, permit them to keep a part of their positions and obtain, if not all the honors of war, at least an advantageous capitulation.[71]

Bonaparte never had a taste for the constitutional Church; he called it "a comedy played by some ideologists and schemers." Nevertheless, while he was negotiating the concordat, whether because he was feeling his way or because he wished to intimidate the Pope, he allowed the constitutionals to meet in councils. Several provincial councils were held, notably at Rouen and Bourges in 1800. A national council opened its sessions on June 21, 1801, at the very time of Consalvi's arrival in Paris. It was presided over by Le Coz, metropolitan of Rennes, who had already been president of the conciliar assembly of 1797. The solemn sessions were held in Notre Dame. Thirty-nine departments were represented. This body, like a headquarters' staff, wished to give the impression that it had a large army behind [70] Taine, Les origines, X, 47 note; reports of Barbé-Marbois on Brittany, of Français de Nantes on Vaucluse and Provence, of Lacuée on Paris and the seven neighboring departments. In some departments, as in the Vosges, the constitutionals were stronger; but in others, their Church was completely reduced to nothing. Pisani, IV, 157, 185.

[71] Pisani, IV, 154.

it. But such was not at all the fact. The holding of this pseudo-council did not deeply move public opinion. The members of the assembly were well aware of this fact. They contented themselves with protesting their obedience to the established powers, writing to the Pope to beg him "to second their efforts" toward religious peace and to express to him all their earnest desires in the undertaking of a concordat "which would put an end to the religious dissensions." They did not even attempt to carry out the vast plan of reforms which they had conceived. Even had they wished to do so, their internal discussions and an order of Fouché ordering them to dissolve (August 25), would not have given them time for it.[72] The concordat had just been ratified by the Pope: Fouché no longer felt the need of shaking before him the bugbear of a schismatic council.

But a man of Grégoire's stamp was not ready to surrender without a fight. He knew that in the government he was backed by Talleyrand, who, although laicized, always had the feelings of a father for the constitutional Church and gladly became its advocate in the council of the ministers. Talleyrand soon found occasion to act thus.

The first five concordat projects contained a more or less explicit mention of the juring priests; but the text finally adopted was silent on the subject. Moreover, when (July 24, 1801) the first consul, in a conference with Consalvi, introduced the question of the rehabilitation of the constitutional bishops, the conversation became stormy. "What are you asking of these bishops," said Bonaparte, "to reconcile them with the Church?" Consalvi answered: "A retraction, that is, the acknowledgment of their errors and acceptance of the papal briefs." "They will never retract," the consul angrily replied. "A man who retracts dishonors himself. I would be the first to despise him. I wish to name eight or nine bishops drawn from the constitutional clergy, but not from those who make a retraction. Arrange for their return into the Church, but do not ask from them any act contrary to honor." [73]

[72] See the report of these provincial assemblies and of the national council in the Annales de la religion.

This attitude of the first consul was the result of Talleyrand's perfidious insinuations. The constitutionals did indeed wish to return to the Church, but to do so without bowing their heads, without abjuring anything. Bernier himself pleaded their cause. "The government," he said, "would not suffer that they should appear to abjure the results of the Revolution." [74] By the efforts of diplomacy, the Holy See succeeded in having the first consul accept the text of a brief which the Pope addressed to Spina regarding the constitutional priests. This brief, as Bernier himself avows, "was filled with a spirit of condescension and charity." But it did not have the expected success. Its import, authority, and authenticity were discussed. Then Bonaparte, who had expressed his fear of seeing the constitutional priests "dishonor themselves" by obedience to the head of the Church, did not hesitate to call on them, in the name of the state, to hand in their resignation. Portalis, after conferring with several of them, drew up the formula which almost all signed and then sent it to the Pope through Spina. They said: "We profess to the Sovereign Pontiff, lawful successor of St. Peter, obedience and submission, conformably to the canons and the holy decrees of the Church." [75] These last words offered some ambiguity, but Caprara was at pains to see each of the bishops and, by oral explanations, to give the formula an orthodox meaning.

Two constitutional bishops (Grégoire of Loir-et Cher and Moïse of the Jura) wished to give their letters of resignation some appearance of blustering manifestation. The first consul was not satisfied with these bishops and systematically removed them from the new hierarchy formed by the Concordat. He [73] This conversation is related by Consalvi in a dispatch addressed to Cardinal Doria. Boulay de la Meurthe, III, 292.

[74] Ibid., III, 313.

[75] For Caprara's letter to Consalvi, see Boulay de La Meurthe, IV, 164.

who had been the undisputed head of the constitutional Church became in retirement the center of a small group of impenitent constitutional priests. He died, himself impenitent, on April 24, 1831.

Twelve juring priests had places in the new episcopate. Two of these (Charrier de La Roche of Versailles, and Montault des Iles of Angers) humbly submitted. But the others boasted for a long time that they had nothing to retract in their past life. Those who resisted longest made their submission, more or less sincere, only in 1804, and the bulls of confirmation of their election did not arrive from Rome until June 17, 1805.[76]

Resistance of Emigré Bishops

The impenitent constitutionals unfortunately had occasion to note, among the most ardent of their political adversaries, acts of disobedience which they maliciously compared with their own revolt. In a letter signed by thirteen émigré bishops in England, we read these words:

> Most Holy Father, we are obliged to refuse to you the customary obedience. . . . The experience of the countless calamities that have been desolating our fatherland for many years makes us fear that the universal and simultaneous abandonment of all the sees will be, for the Catholic faith, only a new source of evils; and it pertains only to a general assembly of the bishops of the Gallican Church to make known to Your Holiness the surest means of avoiding these evils.[77]

Of the nineteen émigré bishops in England, only five submitted; the other fourteen showed themselves openly refractory. This example had lamentable consequences. At the end of November word had already come from Germany that four episcopal resignations had been made as against eleven refusals. As for the eleven bishops living in France, all of them, in terms of the most filial submission, gave the resignations asked of them. To cut short the problem, Pope Pius VII employed the supreme right belonging to the papacy in such events. By his bull Qui Christi Domini vices (November 29, 1801),[78] he declared that the 135 bishoprics of old France, those of Belgium, and those of the left bank of the Rhine, were suppressed; consequently, whether they handed in their resignations or not, the bishops lost all jurisdiction, since the object of that jurisdiction no longer existed.[79]

[76] Pisani, L'episcopat constitutionnel, p. 49.
[77] Annales de la religion, XIV, 412.

The greater part of the refractory bishops finally submitted. The chief motive of their insubmission had been of a political order. Being royalists, living in the atmosphere of the émigré nobility and affected by its influence, they were disinclined to lend themselves to any move that might in France sanction the Republican government.[80] But their deep Catholic spirit could not allow them to persist in their refusal in the presence of the formal expression of the Pope's will. Two among them, however, never rendered their submission, but even became the centers of a resistance which they encouraged by their official injunctions and their private letters. We are referring to Bishop Jean de Coucy of La Rochelle and particularly Bishop Alexandre de Thémines of Blois, who may be regarded as the founder of the sect of the anticoncordatists, and thereafter better known under the name of "The Little Church." Alexandre de Thémines had acquired at the court, where he was chaplain of King Louis XVI, and then was bishop of Blois, to which dignity he was raised at the age of thirty-four, the reputation for ardent piety, incorruptible virtue, and a strictness in conduct which was in striking contrast to the general morals of his surroundings. In the assembly of the clergy (1788) he alone raised his voice in favor of the parlement of Paris, which was then exiled at Troyes. Under the Revolution he had energetically refused to take any of the oaths and left his post only at the last moment (February 12, 1791) under the pressure of a peremptory injunction of the municipality and a popular uprising that put his life in danger. To the last moments of his life he would protest with all his might against the concordat concluded with Bonaparte, even refusing, in 1814, to return to France in answer to the appeal of Louis XVIII, for, as the inflexible prelate said, "to bring back a bishop into his country after so many storms, a restoration of the monarchy does not suffice; the religion of our fathers must be restored in full." Bishop Thémines had, however, before his death, the happiness of being reconciled with Rome.[81]

[78] Barberi, Bullarium, XI, 245.

[79] The number of the new bishoprics was reduced to sixty.

[80] See especially the memorial published by these bishops on June 8 and called Déclaration dur les droits du Roi.

The most compact group of the dissidents was formed in the Vendean Bocage, which belonged to the new diocese of Poitiers. Especially in Lower Poitou and the district of Lyons the name of The Little Church was given to these dissidents. Less important centers of resistance were formed in other districts. Under the various names of Clementines at Rouen, of Filochois at Tours, of Louisets at Rennes, of Enfarines at Rodez, and of Fideles in Provence, the anticoncordatists met in private oratories, refusing to participate in the ceremonies celebrated in concordatist churches or by priests who had submitted to the concordat. After Thémines' death in 1829, they no longer had any bishop at their head; in 1847 they lost their last priest. Important conversions brought about during these latter years seemed to forecast the approaching end of the sect.[82]

[81] Roussel, "Le centenaire de la Petite Eglise," in the Correspondant, March 10, 1903. The sect of foes of the concordat spread the rumor that Pius VII had ceded his spiritual rights in order to keep his temporal domain.

[82] On the Little Church, see Drochon, La Petite Eglise; Mangenot, under "Anticoncordataires" in Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie; Latreille, Après le Concordat, 1910; Latreille, La Petite Eglise de Lyon.

The Significance of the Concordat

For the zeal of Pius VII, as also for the ambition of Bonaparte, the religious pacification of France was but a starting point. What each of them desired, with different points of view, was the religious pacification of the whole world. As has been rightly said, the intentions of the two contracting parties recalled the Holy Empire more than it did the old regime. Bonaparte was thinking of Charlemagne or, if you prefer, of Barbarossa and Frederick II, rather than of Louis XIV. Pius VII was pained at seeing the Catholics increasing the obstacles to his government. One day he said to Cacault: "Alas, I have real peace only in the government of the Catholics who are subjects of the infidels or of the heretics. You know all that my predecessor had to suffer from the changes carried out in Austria by the emperors Joseph and Leopold. You are witness of the assaults that are inflicted on me every day by the courts of Spain and Naples." [83] Nor did Italy spare the Pope many trials. The formation of the Cisalpine Republic had not only created Italian nationalism,[84] but it had also favored the diffusion of the revolutionary ideas in Italy. A proclamation (February 3, 1797), addressed to all the bishops by the ministers of the Republic, said to them: "Henceforth every document coming from the court of Rome will be ipso facto regarded as null." [85] In vain had General Bonaparte said: "We have given you liberty; know how to keep it; favor the spread of the lights and respect religion." [86] The bishops were forbidden to mention, in their pastoral letters, either the Holy See or the powers received [83] Letter of Cacault to Talleyrand, quoted by Theiner, Histoire des deux Concordats, II, 25.

[84] Hazard, La Révolution française et les lettres Italiennes; Henry Cochin, "La Révolution française et l'Italie," in the Correspondant of October 25, 1911.

[85] Theiner, op. cit., p. 2.

[86] Ibid., p. 3.

therefrom. Bonaparte's celebrated discourse at Milan (June 6, 1799) had not calmed men's minds. On November 23, 1800, the first consul wrote to Talleyrand: "You will make known to citizen Jourdan and citizen Petiet (ministers of the Cisalpine Republic) that I am pained to see efforts being made to disquiet the priests." [87] To reassure the clergy, toward the end of 1801 he insinuated to the Cisalpine government the thought of accrediting a representative to the Holy See. The man chosen was the minister of France at Rome, Cacault. Then he directed Talleyrand to assemble at Lyons, by way of extraordinary consultation, the most prominent members of the Cisalpine Republic.

From that time the religious affairs of Italy entered upon a path of appeasement. But not all the obstacles had disappeared; this improvement needed the indomitable energy of the first consul, the fine considerateness of Cacault, and the unalterable patience of Pius VII to surmount them and finally to arrive at a relative pacification.

The consultative representatives of the Cisalpine Republic met at Lyons in January, 1802. Contemporary witnesses in words of admiring praise, have described the spectacle of that great assembly, in which were to be seen 452 Italian notables, among whom were venerable prelates, "wishing to be present," as they said, "at the proclamation of the independence of their country by the hero who had brought it about." Bonaparte arrived on January 13, fixed the limits of the new state, gave it a constitution like the French constitution, and was proclaimed its first president. Two weeks later, at a most imposing session, the first consul, seated on a platform and surrounded by his family and his ministers, solemnly promulgated the new constitution. "You might have supposed you were seeing Charlemagne, assisted by the bishops, the great vassals of the empire, nobles and generals, drawing up laws for the Church and the state in the assemblies of Worms or Aix-la-Chapelle." [88]

[87] Ibid., p. 5.

This ceremony was, in fact, a preparation for the proclamation of the empire. For the first time, the first consul was there acclaimed under the two names joined together of Napoleon Bonaparte. One of the principal acts that he sanctioned was an ecclesiastical legislation, presented under the name of "organic laws" of the clergy and destined to lay the basis of an Italian concordat. The first article of the Cisalpine constitution proclaimed "the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion the religion of the state," but the organic laws decided that "the bishops would be named by the government and would be instituted by the Holy See; that the pastors would be chosen and instituted by the bishop in agreement with the government; that the limits of the dioceses would be defined anew, if need be, in concert with the Holy See; that each diocese would have its seminary with endowment; that no property possessed by the Church could be sold; and that the clergy would be dispensed from all military service.[89]

The Pope expressed his satisfaction in a letter (March 18) to the first consul and appointed Cardinal Caprara for the negotiation of a concordat. But a decree (June 23, 1802) issued by the vice-president of the Cisalpine Republic, Melzi, seemed to destroy all the hopes based on the Lyons assembly. On the pretext of determining the functions of the minister of public worship, the new decree subjected to the approval of the civil power almost all the acts of the ecclesiastical minister.[90] Pius VII sent his indignant protests to Napoleon, who, passing over the decree signed by Melzi, presented (August 4) to the Holy Father a concordat project. But a formidable opposition arose among the chiefs of the Cisalpine state. Titanic outbursts were [88] Theiner, op. cit., II, 10.

[89] For the complete text of these organic laws, see Theiner, op. cit., II, 10–14.
[90] Ibid., p. 18.

to be foreseen. To avoid these, Pius VII proposed to the first consul that any concordat project be renounced. The Pope said that the Church of Italy had not undergone so profound disturbances as the Church of France. Would not the situation be met sufficiently by regulating the pending difficulties through briefs? Calmer days could be awaited for starting a negotiation. The Pope's idea was wise; but Bonaparte, impatient to level the obstacles confronting him, wished to go ahead. Negotiations, in which Consalvi and Caprara took part in the name of the Pope, Bernier and Cacault in the name of the French government, were carried on amid difficulties without number, and finally led to the writing of the concordat which was signed at Paris (September 16, 1803) and ratified (November 2) by Napoleon Bonaparte, acting as president of the Italian Republic. This concordat, drawn up in the same spirit as the French concordat, was officially published at Milan on January 26, 1804. Unfortunately it was accompanied by a decree, signed by Melzi, which once again, for the pretended purpose of assuring the execution of the law, violated several most important articles of it. Decidedly the bad will of the Italian government did not recoil before any hypocrisy. Napoleon tried to calm the Pope's alarms by a letter (April 24, 1804), professing that henceforth his protection would be more effective. The first consul was thinking of the empire, of the consecration he was going to receive, and undoubtedly also of the iron crown of the kings of Italy that he was going to assume the next year. But, on the contrary, the situation grew worse than ever. The Gallican maxims would, in 1810, be declared for all Italy the laws of the empire, and the recalcitrant bishops would be imprisoned by order of the new emperor.

The Church of Spain was destined to share the lot of that of Italy. But it had passed through different phases. Up to the proclamation of the empire, the Iberian states did not have to undergo the invasion of the French armies. In Spain, the minister Godoy was the ally of Bonaparte; in Portgual, the regent, from 1801 to 1803, had purchased peace with France at the price of repeated subsidies. But, to remain under a constitution of the old regime, the states of the Iberian peninsula were not exempt from a secret spirit of hostility toward Rome.

On October 9, 1801, Vargas, the Spanish minister in Rome, informed Cardinal Consalvi of several claims formulated by his sovereign, Charles IV. He required that the papal nuncio should have no jurisdiction at Madrid. In a diplomatic note, he said: "The king of Spain knows that those who in his states are ecclesiastics are nonetheless his subjects." [91] The Madrid court formulated other claims.

Attempts were made to put the regulars under the domination of the bishops and to withdraw them from the authority of their general superiors. The government strove to accredit the bishops with faculties for all matrimonial dispensations and desired to monopolize the collation of all the benefices and other considerably extended powers. The court of Madrid demanded the right to confer at will the ecclesiastical goods and even to confiscate several of these properties, to the evident prejudice of the clergy. In short, it demanded at one and the same time so many things and so important things that no one could credit these claims if they were here enumerated.[92]

By his prudent condescensions, the Cardinal was able to smooth out these difficulties. Cardinal de Bourbon was appointed visitator of all the religious orders of the realm; a concordat was concluded with Charles IV, to whom subsidies were granted in view of the war against the English.

Scarcely were the difficulties on the part of Spain settled, when Portugal stirred up new ones.

The court of Portugal published an edict that wounded the rights of the Holy See and several canon laws. The Holy Father, who was then in France, where he had gone to consecrate Napoleon, wrote from Paris to the prince regent of Portugal; but, owing to the ruses of the Lisbon cabinet, this effort had little success. Perhaps we would have reached a favorable conciliation if the affairs of France had not then absorbed the care of the Pope and his minister.[93]

[91] Artaud de Montor, Histoire de Pie VII, I, 207.
[92] Consalvi, Mémoires, II, 278.

This concern for the affairs of France likewise delayed the solution of the religious affairs of Germany. Catholic Germany which, like Italy, had been invaded by the armies of the Revolution, and, more than Spain and Portugal, imbued with the anti-Roman ideas that had been propagated there by Febronius and Joseph II, was perhaps, after France, the country most deeply disturbed, the country where the need of religious peace was most deeply felt. News of the conclusion of the French concordat produced an immense sensation there.

In no country was this concordat more admired than in Germany. It revived the hopes of the Catholics. With what joy they thus saw shortened the days of their griefs and the inalienable rights restored to the Church! This concordat was greeted as a happy presage of a delivery soon. The Catholic rulers, as well as the Protestant, soon saw themselves obliged to guarantee by special concordats the rights of the Church which triumphant impiety on one hand and secular intolerance on the other had so stubbornly contested and cast under foot.[94]

These tendencies reached their full realization only after the re-establishment of the empire. Unfortunately the German princes found in Napoleon's conduct a precedent that permitted them to retain several of the ancient abuses; for Napoleon had done two things which he presented as complementary and inseparable: the concordat and the organic articles. The concordat did indeed pay homage to religion, but the organic articles were a sort of trick. The German sovereigns "traced almost servilely the lines of their ecclesiastical policy upon those of Napoleon. They demanded and obtained from Rome that a structure be given to their Churches; then they proceeded to regulate without restraint the detail of those structures, even though the structure itself would have to suffer thereby." [95]

[93] Ibid., II, 282.

[94] Theiner, Histoire des deux Concordats, I, 297.

Protestantism in France

The French concordat of 1801 did more than influence the organization of the national Churches in the other Catholic states; it was the starting point of a policy of Napoleon's understanding with the other religious faiths.

The Protestants were rather numerous and influential in France in the reign of Louis XVI but they became more so in the course of the Revolution, thanks to the backing brought to them by the conquests of French armies. Under the Directory, Madame de Staël went so far as to advise the public authorities to adopt Protestantism as the state religion.[96] The proposal was not judged practicable, but "most of the men in high places extended to the Reformed religion a benevolence made up of the desire to make a show of tolerance and to plague the Catholics." [97] Under the Consulate, the Council of State, in a memorial presented to the consuls (January, 1802), thus expressed their mind: "The government, while declaring that Catholicism is the religion of the majority in France, did not intend to exclude the Protestant worship from its protection. Protestantism is a Christian communion, which has a right to protection. Its founders were the first to spread in Europe liberal maxims of government." [98] We are not surprised to see the first consul present to the legislative body, at the same time as the organic articles of Catholic worship, the organic articles of Protestant worship. This organic law of April 7, 1802, is [95] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le Catholicisme, I, 140.

[96] See the memoir published by Paul Gautier in the Revue des Deux Mondes (November 1, 1899).

[97] L. de Lanzac de Laborie, Paris sous Napoléon, I, 336.

[98] Quoted by G. de Felice, Histoire des protestants de France, p. 602.

divided into three titles, and regulates the situation, not of all the Protestant faiths, but of two only, that of the Reformed Churches (Calvinist), and that of the Churches of the Augsburg Confession (Lutheran). Title I contains general dispositions for all the Protestant communities. Napoleon's political considerations and a certain distrust of the Protestant cosmopolitanism are revealed in the following articles: in article 1, declaring that "no one can exercise the functions of public worship unless he is French; in article 2, enacting that neither "the Protestant Churches nor their ministers can have dealings with any foreign power or authority"; in articles 4 and 5, saying that "no doctrinal decision and no disciplinary change can take place without the authorization of the government." In return, by virtue of article 6, the pastors will receive support from the state.

Title II is concerned with the Calvinist worship and institutes for it pastors, consistories, and synods. The pastors will be elected by the consistories and will be confirmed by the government. The consistories will be composed of the pastors administering a district of 6,000 souls, and from 6 to 12 laymen. The synods will be composed of the pastors of five consistorial churches. They shall meet in accordance with the authorization of the government, to which they shall submit their decisions.

Title III concerns the Lutheran religion. Its organization is analogous to that of the Calvinist religion, but somewhat more complicated. It embraces pastors, local consistories, inspectors, and general consistories.

In short, the two Protestant religions found themselves placed, by the law of 18 Germinal, in a condition of rather strict dependence on the state. But neither the pastors nor the faithful complained. "They were less sensible of the sacrifice of part of their religious independence than of the advantages which they promised themselves from the payments by the state; for they found therein two major advantages: an undeniable legal recognition, and the official guaranty of a perfect equality with the Roman Catholics." [99] Rabaut-Dupuy, who was president of the Legislative Body in 1802, later, in a circular addressed to the members of the Reformed Churches of the Empire, said: "You who lived under the yoke of intolerance, look and compare. No longer in the deserts will you pay homage to the Creator, your temples are restored to you, your pastors are recognized public functionaries and are paid salaries by the government." [100]

Later, many Protestants, including some of the most prominent of them, did not hide their dissatisfaction with a law that, as they said, utterly deformed the primitive organization of Calvinist Presbyterianism. Instead of a religious society existing in itself and by itself, appointing its ministers, passing judgment on differences, and deciding all doctrinal or disciplinary questions in independent conferences, the Germinal law instituted a civil society dependent in everything on the secular power, resting its existence on a power alien to the very basis of Presbyterianism. From the Protestant point of view, that was the first evil of the new organization. Its second defect was the absolute suppression of the prime element of Protestantism, the individual Church, with its consistory and its pastor, and instead founding it in a consistorial Church, made up of assembled pastors.[101] But, once again, all this unfitness passed unperceived or was regarded as largely compensated by the advantages of an official recognition of the Protestant Churches and by the assured support of their pastors. The president of the Geneva consistory became the spokesman of all the ministers and of all the Protestants by officially addressing his thanks to Napoleon.[102]

[99] G. de Felice, op. cit., p. 604.

[100] Ibid., p. 605.

[101] Ibid., p. 607. Cf. Vinet, Essai sur la manifestation des convictions religieuses, p. 387; F. Puaux, Histoire populaire des protestants français, p. 361.

[102] Ibid., p. 610.

The first consul intended to regulate in a like manner the situation of the Jews. But in 1802 the memory of certain speculations engaged in by the Jews on the national possessions was still too vivid in the minds of the people. Napoleon thought that a law which would make the scattered Jews in France a more compact and more independent body, was a premature undertaking. The official organization of the Jewish religion was not regulated until six years later.

Meanwhile the Jews, who in large numbers had joined Freemasonry, found some compensation in the favor shown to that society. At a feast (April 10, 1801) which brought together more than 500 masons at the Grand Orient, Freemasonry acclaimed Bonaparte.[103] By Cambacérès and Dubois, already initiated, it had in the consular government powerful protectors. The first consul replied to the advances of the society. We have no proofs that he had been initiated; but the annals of Masonry relate, under date of September, 1802, the naming of General Murat, who was governor of Paris, as first guardian,[104] and, under date of December 18, 1803, the raising of General Massena to the rank of grand ruler.[105] The year 1804 became one of the most important dates in the history of Masonry by the merging of the Grand Orient with the general Grand Lodge. The agreement that consecrated this fusion is known by Masons under the name of the Concordat of 1804. As related by one who is almost an official historian of Masonry, "it was signed on December 3, 1804, in the house of Marshal Kellermann."[106] When the Empire was proclaimed, "Masonry," says Bazot, then secretary of the Grand Orient, "counted almost 1,200 lodges. At Paris, in the departments, in the colonies, in the reunited countries, and in the armies, the highest public officials, marshals, generals, magistrates, schol-

[103] Rebold, Histoire des trois grandes loges de France, 1864, p. 79.
[104] Ibid., p. 89.
[105] Ibid., p. 92.
[106] Ibid., p. 94. Rebold's work bears the Imprimatur of the Grand Orient.

ars, commerce, industry, nearly all France in its prominent men, fraternized in Masonic fashion with the Masons who were simple citizens." [107] These enthusiastic lines undoubtedly contain an exaggeration; but what seems likely is that Bonaparte, clever in seizing to his own profit all the political and social powers, tried to make use of Freemasonry for the realization of his grand projects. The eminent historian, Frederick Schlegel, who had close relations with the leaders of the rationalist and the Jewish world, wrote: "Can we find anyone who does not know or who has forgotten with what skill the man who in these latter times ruled over the world utilized that vehicle in all the vanquished countries, and used it as an organ suited to mislead and nourish all public opinion with false hopes?" [108]

Napoleon Proclaimed Emperor

In 1804 public opinion in France and in Europe seemed ready to accept the realization of the vast ambitions of Napoleon Bonaparte. By prodigies of energy he who had surmounted the prejudices of his entourage, the opposition of the constitutional clergy, the trickery of Talleyrand (Minister of Foreign Affairs), and the intrigues of Fouché (Minister of Police), in effecting the Concordat, thought that the head of the Church would not refuse him a testimonial of gratitude for so many efforts and that Pius VII would be willing to give a consecration to the coveted high dignity, which was nothing less than to place the imperial crown on the head of Napoleon Bonaparte. But for this new title of emperor, an extraordinarily solemn consecration was needed. The coronation conferred by a French bishop in the Reims cathedral, such as had been given to the [107] Bazot, Code des franc-maçons, p. 183, quoted by Gautherot under the word "Franc-Maçonnerie" in the Dictionnaire d'apologétique, II, 110.

[108] Schlegel, Philosophie de l'histoire, French tr., II, 365.

kings of the former monarchy, would not be enough. Napoleon wished a coronation at Notre Dame in Paris, in a ceremony presided over by the pope himself.

We know how, following a proposal (April 23, 1804) by the tribune Curée, the Senate proclaimed Bonaparte emperor of the French.

Officially informed by a letter of Caprara, dated May 11, 1804, that the Emperor wished to be consecrated by the pope, Pius VII fell into a great dejection.[109] The Holy Father was not unmindful that the first consul, by bringing about the religious pacification, had always sought to strengthen and increase his own power. In having himself crowned emperor by the head of the Church, one of his chief purposes was to remove the strongest supports of Louis XVIII. For the Pope to lend himself to Napoleon's plan was consequently to stir up against himself the royalist party, already decidedly aroused. Perhaps it would also be to lend himself to a new orientation of the political destinies of Europe. At the same time the Pope could easily foresee what would be the consequences of a refusal, opposed to such a man at such a moment.

Pius VII, that he might not bear alone the responsibility for the decision, assembled the Sacred College. Fifteen cardinals out of twenty declared themselves in favor of the Holy Father's journey to Paris, but with reservation of the following four conditions: a promise to reform "some organic articles that exceeded the liberties of the Gallican Church";[110] a full observance of the consecration ceremonies; refusal by the Pope to receive the constitutional bishops who have not adhered to the decisions of His Holiness regarding the ecclesiastical affairs of France; refusal by the Pope to receive Madame Talleyrand, whose marriage His Holiness would never recognize.[111] Bernier, now bishop of Orléans, in a reply made in the name of the first consul, acknowledged "that too many of the maxims of the old parlements had been mingled with our liberties," and that "four constitutional bishops unfortunately had not observed the proprieties of their state"; that this question, as also that of the consecration ceremonial, could best be decided at Paris.[112] In a clever note, Talleyrand gave almost the same guaranties and endeavored especially to imply that the contemplated step by the Pope could not create any grave difficulty for the Holy See. He said:

[109] Artaud, Histoire de Pie VII, II, 93.
[110] Ibid.
[111] Ibid., II, 99.

> The journey of His Holiness to France can inspire in the foreign courts no sort of suspicion. France did not hesitate to recognize His Holiness, although his election took place in the states of a foreign sovereign and amid enemies that France had to fight. How would those same powers, today friends or allies of France, look with an evil eye on an event by which the common father of the faithful should honor with his presence this vast and glorious empire restored to religion? . . . His Holiness has nothing to fear from the old parties that for so long a time divided France. Scarcely will he set foot on the soil of France, when he will perceive that these parties no longer exist.[113]

On August 3, 1804,[114] Napoleon himself promised the Holy Father complete satisfaction in the matter of the execution of the Italian concordat.[115] The preliminary conferences continued for more than two months longer. Ever since the preceding year, Napoleon, in view of the negotiations that he was planning and with the purpose of facilitating a conclusion favorable to his desires, sent his uncle, Cardinal Fesch, to Rome as ambassador.

This appointment did not fail to stir up keen feeling in the papal court. They regretted the loss of Cacault, whose devoted-[112] For Bernier's letter, see Artaud, II, 105.

[113] See this note in Artaud, II, 109–11.

[114] Here for the first time Napoleon did not make use of the Republican calendar.

[115] Artaud, II, 113.

ness to the Holy See had been evident by eminent services; and the antecedents of Napoleon's uncle were calculated to arouse well-founded misgivings. A priest before the Revolution, Joseph Fesch had, during the Terror, abandoned the priestly career. As partisan of the new ideas, he exercised the functions of commissioner of war, and returned to the Church only after the 18th Brumaire. The favor of his nephew rapidly advanced him to the office of archbishop of Lyons and to the dignity of cardinal. His life, which until then had been rather stormy and was dominated by preoccupations of temporal interest, became regular, and even austere and modest. He reached Rome on July 2, 1803, accompanied by a secretary whose name, already celebrated, would continue to grow, Viscount Chateaubriand. Cardinal Fesch's intelligence was not outstanding, but his activity was extraordinary and notably contributed to the success of the diplomatic mission entrusted to him.[116]

On October 29 the Pope again assembled the Sacred College and announced to it that, positively knowing the Emperor's firm determination to protect the Church more and more, he would, for the good of religion, undertake the long journey to Paris. Consalvi, his Secretary of State, would have full powers during his absence, to regulate the spiritual and temporal affairs.

Pius VII left Rome on November 2, crossed through Italy and France amid the heartiest testimonials of respect and affection. He was the object of particularly touching manifestations at Lyons. All heads bowed religiously to receive the blessing of the holy Pontiff, whose noble bearing, thin features, slightly bowed head, affable smile, and deep-set eyes breathed an air of religious majesty and fatherly kindness.[117]

[116] Lyonnet, Le cardinal Fesch, 1841; Gattet, La verité sur le cardinal Fesch, 1842.

[117] The Annales religieuses of Orleans (March 20, 1898) contains a report by an eyewitness on the occasion of Pius VII's passing through Montargis. This account contains a detailed description of the Holy Father's appearance. In reply to Fouché,

The Coronation

Everyone is acquainted with the grandiose scenes of December 2, 1804; its chief act has been popularized by David's celebrated picture. All the bells of the city and the great bell of Notre Dame pealed their mightiest; in the old cathedral, adorned with purple draperies having golden bees here and there on them, the hero advanced under a canopy, with scepter in hand, and his head crowned with the laurel of the Caesars; Napoleon swearing on the Gospel ever to render to the Church and the Roman Pontiffs the honors that are their due; Pius VII, following the traditional rite, anointing the Emperor and the Empress; then, by a sudden violation of the ceremonial, the sovereign crowning himself and Josephine with a bold gesture; the ceremony terminating by triumphal acclamations to the crowned potentate, while imperial music conducted the Pontiff back to the archiepiscopal palace as the procession repeated the Tu es Petrus.[118]

The impression left upon the people by this great religious solemnity was not the only beneficial result of the Pope's journey. His coming to Paris was the occasion for the renunciation of their schism by a large number of constitutional priests; Napoleon expressed his gratitude to the Pope by re-establishing and officially recognizing several Catholic institutes and establishments, such as the institute of the Lazarists and that of the Daughters of Charity, the Foreign Mission Seminary, and the seminary of the Holy Ghost. To a long memorial presented by Caprara, the Emperor replied in a note (March 11, 1805), drawn up by Talleyrand, marked by a great moderation and proclaiming important principles. As the note said, Napoleon recognized that, in the interest of religion, Pius VII should be who asked him on his arrival how he had found France, the Pope answered: "Heaven be praised! We have passed through the midst of a people on their knees."

[118] Isabey et Fontaine, Cérémonies et fêtes du sacre, 1805.

respected, not simply as head of the Church, "but also as an independent monarch"; the Emperor "places in the very first rank of the deeds that have cast splendor on his life the respect he has shown for the Church of Rome." [119] But these general formulas were not accompanied by any precise engagement relative to the particular requests contained in Caprara's memorial, and more than one procedure of the Emperor left a secret bitterness in the heart of the Sovereign Pontiff when he departed from Paris, April 4, 1805.

The first of these proceedings regarded Napoleon's marriage. The day before the coronation, a visit from Josephine de Beauharnais had moved the Holy Father deeply. The official wife of the Emperor [120] confided to him that she had not been married by a priest. Pius VII received the Empress with kindness, but declared to her that, following the laws of the Church, he could not proceed to the ceremony of the consecration until the Emperor should regularize the situation. Napoleon, though angry when he learned of the step taken by Josephine and the Pope's resolution, but promptly understanding how unshakable that resolution was, yielded. Cardinal Fesch, grand chamberlain of the imperial house, being informed of the decision, asked of the Pope the necessary powers and dispensations, and obtained them all to celebrate the marriage in the abnormal conditions that presented themselves. The marriage was performed on December 1 about four o'clock in the afternoon, before Fesch, without witnesses and without the presence of the proper pastor. Napoleon, who was already thinking of a divorce, believed that the lack of these formalities would some day allow the canonical rupture of his marriage. To Fesch he remarked the absence of the witnesses, but the Cardinal disregarded the [119] For further details, see Theiner, Histoire des deux concordats, II, 231–87, and Houssonville, L'église romaine et le premier empire, I, 319–54.

[120] Josephine Tascher de la Pagerie, born at Martinique in 1763, had married in 1779 the Viscount de Beauharnais, who died on the scaffold in 1794; then in 1796 she married General Bonaparte.

difficulty and blessed the marriage of December 1, 1804, which is generally regarded as a marriage canonically regular.[121]

Humiliations of the Pope

The Pontiff was likewise afflicted by other incidents, which Consalvi recalls in his Mémoires with scarcely restrained feeling. Writes the Secretary of State:

I will not speak of all the Pope had to suffer. I will refrain from relating how and why, on the day of the consecration, Napoleon made His Holiness wait an hour and a half; how the ceremony took place so differently from what had been agreed upon; how the Emperor crowned himself, after rudely seizing the crown on the altar before the Pope put out his hand to take it. I will not speak of the way Bonaparte, on all occasions when he appeared in public with the Pope, took a place at his right, and the lack of respect with which he treated him. . . . I enumerate these sufferings that you may grasp to what extent the Pope needed strength, moderation, and kindness to follow, in his humiliations, Him whose vicar he was on earth.[122]

The Pontiff was the object of ovations as he passed again through France and Italy. But these were not sufficient to dissipate the sadness of his soul. He soon learned that certain Catholics of Vienna, of Naples, and of other places were accusing him of weakness, of prevarication, and of apostasy for [121] Such is the solid conclusion of Welschinger in his work, Le divorce de Napoléon, 1889. However, Lecoy de La Marche, in a study published in the Univers (May 7, 1889) and reproduced in his La guerre aux erreurs historiques (pp. 322–45), strongly opposes this opinion. According to him, "the religious marriage of Napoleon and Josephine, celebrated on December 1, 1804, was simply a comedy." "If later on it was ruptured in a fashion not altogether regular, reasons enough were present for the annulment." These reasons were: the lack of witnesses, a defect poorly covered by the general concession of the powers given to Cardinal Fesch, and especially the defect of consent by Napoleon, who did not wish at any price to marry Josephine, and who agreed to the ceremony only because it was laid down as a condition for the consecration, and who, by requiring and expressly noting the absence of witnesses, indicated his desire to bring about canonical causes for the annulment of this fictitious marriage.

[122] Consalvi, Mémoires, II, 403.

the step that had cost him so many painful anxieties and so many deceptions.[123] He did not regret what he had done. "The venerable Pontiff, in coming to consecrate the Emperor, had shown to the French how lofty and touching was the majesty of a pope. He had proved his desire to conciliate everyone in order to favor the new rise of religion in France." [124] With Napoleon he left these grave words: "You have made us conceive a great hope; we confidently expect that you will fulfill that hope as emperor of the French." [125] But the Emperor, blinded by so many triumphs, did not heed these wise counsels; and the re-establishment of the empire was but the prelude of a new strife between the priesthood and the empire.

[123] See the sadly famous letter of Joseph de Maistre. "Here people make fun of the simple fellow. . . . The offenses of an Alexander Borgia are less revolting than this hideous apostasy. . . . With all my heart I should wish that the unfortunate Pontiff went to Santo Domingo to consecrate Dessalines." J. de Maistre, Correspondance, I, 138.

[124] Welschinger, Le Pape et l'Empereur, 1905, p. 45.

[125] Letter of August 2, 1804. For the entire text of the letter, see Theiner, op. cit., II, 288.

CHAPTER IX

The Church and the Empire (1804–1814)

THE historian of Pius VII, Artaud de Montor, whose judgments deserve particular attention because he was, as a diplomat, involved in most of the events that he relates, thus evaluates the character of Napoleon:

> In him, when he was treating of religious matters, were to be found two distinct men: first, a spirit that was exact, prompt, affable, clear, ready to ask advice on questions with which he was not well informed, receiving useful guidance with good grace; then, a restless spirit, possessed by a foolish vanity, with uncertain learning, envious of the mission of the priests, and considering himself humiliated by the fact that, in his leisure intervals between battles, the emperor was not the pontiff of the nation, as he was the supreme regulator of the operations of the army.

In the course of the negotiations preparatory to the concordat, he was heard to say, with a touch of humor: "The priests wish to take the souls and to leave me the corpses." At news of the ovations given Pius VII during his journey through France, Napoleon exclaimed bitterly: "They would walk a league to see me, but they would walk twenty to be blessed by the pope." The splendors of the consecration and the coronation did but exalt that jealous ambition.

Napoleon's Project

Directly after the ceremony at Notre Dame the Emperor seems to have conceived the project of keeping the pope in France. The thought of Philip the Fair exercising a haughty watchfulness over the pope of Avignon seemingly haunted the Emperor's mind.

> The Pope never would divulge who was the high officer that one day spoke to him of living at Avignon, or of accepting a papal palace in Paris. . . . The diplomatic corps at Rome were speaking of such rumors; these were so confidently repeated that the Pope judged he ought to make a reply to the same high official: "A report has been spread that we can be kept in France. Very well, suppose they take away our liberty; all this has been provided for. Before leaving Rome we signed a regular abdication, available. . . . When they have signed the plans which they meditate, you will have left in your hands only a miserable monk, who will call himself Barnabas Chiaramonti." [1]

This energetic reply brought an end to all the rumors. If, as Artaud hints, Napoleon intended to feel out the ground by allowing these reports to circulate, the experiment had been made; the imperial dream had to be abandoned.

The first note of the disagreement that would soon grow worse in such a tragic way between the Pope and the Emperor broke out in connection with the Italian affairs. On May 26, 1805, Napoleon crowned himself at Milan as king of Italy. Seizing the iron crown of the Lombard kings, he forcefully repeated the famous formula: "God gives it to me; let anyone who touches it beware!" A few days later (June 8) he reorganized the regular and secular clergy of Italy, re-established numerous congregations, and restored the former revenues to the bishops, the seminaries, and the fabrics.[2] The people and clergy of Milan at first greeted this act with their enthusiastic acclamations and declared Napoleon the restorer of the Church of Italy.

But Pius VII took a different view of the decree of June 8 and pointed out in it two serious encroachments on the rights of the Church: (1) this decree, issued simply by Napoleon's own authority, openly violated article 20 of the Concordat, according to which all dispositions to be taken regarding the affairs of the Church must be previously concerted between the Holy See and the president of the Italian Republic; (2) the decree embraced, along with several favorable dispositions, certain harmful measures, such as the introduction of the Napoleonic Code in Italy, thus authorizing divorce. These observations were the subject of a brief (July 11) to which Napoleon replied (August 19) in a rather sharp tone: "As I have said more than once to Your Holiness, the court of Rome is following a policy which, good in different times, is no longer adapted to the age in which we are living." [3] The closing lines of the letter, however, were milder. "I will lend my cooperation in all possible modifications," said the Emperor. Pius VII therefore did not despair of reaching an understanding and took under consideration the choosing of negotiators instructed to confer on the matter with Cardinal Fesch, the Emperor's plenipotentiary. But a new affair soon arose, which would accentuate the disagreement between Napoleon and the Holy See.

[1] Artaud, Histoire de Pie VII, II, 194.

[2] See the text of the decree in the Bolletino delle leggi del regno d'Italia, pp. 123–40. A summary of it will be found in Theiner, Histoire des deux concordats, II, 338–43.

The Marriage of Jerome Bonaparte

A brother of Napoleon, Jerome Bonaparte, the future king of Westphalia, had contracted at Baltimore (December 24, 1803) a regular marriage with Miss Patterson. But for this purpose he had asked the consent neither of his mother nor of his brother, Napoleon. The latter, with insistence and a menacing tone, called upon the Pope to declare, by a bull, the nullity of this marriage. Jerome, he said, was a minor, he had failed to get the consent of his mother, he had married a heretic, and the marriage took place without the presence of his pastor: for these three reasons the validity of the marriage could not be admitted. The Emperor added: "I could easily have this matrimonial bond annuled in Paris, as the Gallican Church regards these marriages as null. It seemed to me better that this be done at Rome, if only for the example of sovereign houses that might contract marriage with a Protestant."

[3] Correspondance de Napoléon, XI, 119.

The reason for such insistence can be explained only by the desire, with the complicity of the Holy See, to create another rupture of the conjugal bond. Ever since his coming to the imperial power, Napoleon seemed to be obsessed by the thought of breaking his own marriage with Josephine de Beauharnais. A papal bull, giving to the dissolution of Jerome's marriage a universal reverberation, would accustom the people to these annulments of lawful marriages, which public opinion was disposed to look upon in an unfavorable light.

But Pius VII, as always, on this occasion consulted in the first place the law of the Church. But according to this law (1) the lack of the parents' consent is not a diriment impediment; (2) though unions contracted with heretics are illicit, they are not consequently null; and (3) the absence of the proper pastor is an absolute impediment to the marriage only in places where the Council of Trent has been promulgated, but that council was not promulgated in Baltimore. The Pope then concludes in favor of the validity of the marriage of Jerome Bonaparte with Elizabeth Patterson and of the impossibility of dissolving it canonically.

The Emperor's unbounded wrath was expressed in terms as unworthy of a sovereign as of any son of the Church. "The Pope," he wrote to Cardinal Fesch (January 7, 1806), "has sent me a most ridiculous and senseless letter. . . . My intention is to recall you and replace you by a layman. Since these imbeciles do not find any unfitness in having a Protestant occupy the throne of France, I will send them a Protestant ambassador." [4] These threats did not scare Pius VII. On January [4] For this letter, see Correspondance de Napoléon, XI, 643.

29 he wrote as follows to the Emperor: "If the state of tribulation for which God has reserved us should reach its height, if we are to see ourselves despoiled of the friendship and benevolence of Your Majesty, the priest of Jesus Christ, who has the truth in his heart and on his lips, will support all with resignation and without fear." [5]

Evidently these last lines of the Pope's letter produced a lively impression on Napoleon.[6] But in these early days of 1806, following the great battle of Austerlitz and the treaty of Pressburg, Napoleon, intoxicated with his triumphs, had opened his soul to an unmeasured ambition. To dictate to Austria the harshest terms of peace, to suppress the Bourbons of Naples, to bring to his feet the German princes as so many vassals, to deal out principalities to his generals and crowns to his brothers, all these undertakings were not enough for him who henceforth believed himself greater than Charlemagne, mightier than the mighty emperors of the past. After fifteen days of silence, he replied to the Pope thus: "Your Holiness is sovereign of Rome, but I am its emperor. . . . Answerable to God are those who use so much zeal in protecting Protestant marriages, those who delay the expedition of the bulls of my bishops and who turn my dioceses over to anarchy." [7] On October 6, 1806, The Emperor obtained from the compliance of his diocesan court the annulment of his brother's marriage. By virtue of this decision King Jerome married (August 22, 1807) a Protestant princess, the daughter of the King of Würtemberg; and the Emperor had the effrontery to send word of it to Pius VII by an official letter. The Pope replied: "We hope that new and just motives, with which we have not been made acquainted, were presented. . . . This hope sustains us in the bitterness and forboding which we cannot shake off."

[5] Artaud, op. cit., II, 257.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Letter of February 13, 1806. See ibid., pp. 258–63.

Conflict between Napoleon and the Pope

The affair of Jerome's marriage was a mere incident of the great quarrel. Napoleon's claim or assertion, in his letter of February 13, over the government of Rome, had a general bearing which the head of the Church could not let pass without protest.

On March 21, 1806, after consulting the cardinals, Pius VII wrote to the Emperor: "Your Majesty asserts on principle that you are the emperor of Rome. With apostolic frankness we reply that the Sovereign Pontiff, sovereign of Rome, does not recognize and never has recognized in his states a power superior to his own. You are immensely renowned, but you have been chosen, consecrated, crowned, recognized as emperor of the French and not of Rome." [8] One historian remarks: "Let us note well that, at the moment when the peoples, princes, and kings bow before the dominating authority of Napoleon, only an aged pontiff, without resources and without backing, dares to confront that all-powerful and proud despot." [9]

But the Emperor had already passed from words to acts. The year before, under pretext of measures necessitated by his war against Austria, he ordered Gouvion-Saint-Cyr to seize Ancona. On the very day of his famous letter to the Pope, he wrote to Fesch: "No Swedish, English, or Russian vessels must enter a port of the Papal States, otherwise I will have them confiscated." Two months later (April 18) Cardinal Fesch was abruptly recalled, being replaced as ambassador by the regicide Alquier. The Emperor ordered Civitavecchia to be occupied and had the Moniteur announce that he disposed of the principality of Beneventum in favor of Talleyrand, and the principality of Pontecorvo in favor of Bernadotte. These were two principalities of the papal territory.

[8] Letter dated February 13, 1806. Ibid., p. 270.
[9] H. Welschinger, Le Pape et l'Empereur, p. 56.

Cardinal Fesch's last mission had been to demand from the Pope the recognition of Joseph Bonaparte as king of Naples. One of Alquier's first missions was to require the Holy Father to dismiss Cardinal Consalvi, whose knowledge and skill might be an obstacle to the Emperor's designs. Pius VII, in a spirit of peace, decided to sacrifice Consalvi, whom he replaced by a man of austere virtue, the venerable Cardinal Casoni, an old man of seventy-four, one-time vice-legate of Avignon and formerly nuncio to the court of Madrid. But the Pope declared that he could not recognize Joseph Bonaparte as king of Naples, a man who had violently invaded the states of Ferdinand VII. A fulminating note arrived from Paris, enjoining the Pope to recognize Prince Joseph without delay, under pain of seeing the Emperor cease to admit the papal sovereignty.

But the Pope was not to be frightened by any threat. To Alquier he said: "We are disposed to do everything possible for the future good relations and concord, provided the integrity of the principles is maintained. . . . This decision is a matter of our conscience. . . . Above all monarchs reigns a God who is the avenger of justice." Alquier wrote to Talleyrand: "People are strangely mistaken about the character of this sovereign if they suppose that his apparent condescension yields to every movement that is attempted to impress him." Napoleon failed to grasp the sincerity of so righteous a resistance. He thought that Pius VII was subject to the influence of certain cardinals, and the Emperor believed he would get the better of him by terror. He wrote: "I will set up at Rome a king or a senator. I will cut up his states into several duchies." After the decisive success of Friedland (Pravdinsk) and after the peace of Tilsit, Napoleon decided to put his plan into execution.

The Holy Roman Empire

We have now reached the year 1807. A year earlier an event of grave importance took place, which was of a nature to give Napoleon's authority a new brilliance and a new power. On August 6, 1806, Emperor Francis II had renounced his title of head of the Germanic Empire.[10] His act seemed to lack spontaneity. The new Augustulus, as has been said, merely foretold a new Odoacer. However this may be, the event was serious.

It was the crown of Augustus, of Constantine, of Charles, and of Maximilian that Francis of Hapsburg laid down, and a new era in the world's history was marked by the fall of its most venerable institu-ton. One thousand and six years after Pope Leo had crowned the Frankish king, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight years after Caesar had conquered at Pharsalia, the Holy Roman Empire came to its end.[11]

Up to that time, although the papacy had not, for a long time past, received any effective help from the Holy Empire, nevertheless toward it the pope had turned in moments of distress. Francis II was the one who, as Germanic Emperor,[12] had taken the conclave of Venice under his protection. With this great institution in ruins, Napoleon no longer saw any limits to his pretention to take in hand the scepter of Charlemagne.

On this ground he had already increased his interference in the religious domain. At first came countless benefactions. The goods of the fabrics that had not been sold were restored to them; the support of 30,000 chapels was assured; 24,000 burses were granted to the diocesan seminaries. The congregations of the Foreign Missions, of St. Lazare, and of the Holy Ghost were re-established.[13] The priests of St. Sulpice were reor-

[10] Histoire des traités, Vol. VIII. Corpus juris confoederationis germanicae, I, 70.

[11] James Bryce, The Holy Roman Empire, p. 359.

[12] After the abdication of August 6, 1806, Francis II remained emperor of Austria and took the name of Francis I.

[13] A. Launay, Histoire générale de la Société des Missions étrangères, III, 420.

ganized under the direction of Father Emery and took possession of many diocesan seminaries with the benevolent backing of Cardinal Fesch.[14] The Christian Brothers had obtained authorization to resume their religious garb.[15] The Emperor consented to the re-establishment of the Trappists, who had founded two houses at the very gates of Paris.[16] By these measures Napoleon affirmed the claim to take up the protective work of Charlemagne. But notable was the difference between the proceedings of Charlemagne and those of the new Emperor of the French;[17] and the Catholics could not for a long time be under any illusion on the matter. After authorizing the three congregations of the Foreign Missions, St. Lazare, and the Holy Ghost, Napoleon abrogated to himself the right to merge them into one, to be directed by a council with Cardinal Fesch at its head.[18] Napoleon combined all the religious periodicals into one, which he called Le journal des curés.[19] He instituted two new feasts: St. Napoleon (from St. Neapolysus, martyr under Diocletian), which he fixed for August 15, and the feast of the coronation, which he put on the Sunday following the day which corresponded to 11 Frimaire.[20] He undertook to impose his wishes on the archbishop of Paris, Cardinal de Belloy, a feeble and venerable old man, who was utterly devoted to him;[21] Napoleon interfered by criticism of such and such pastoral letters, such and such sermons.[22] A priest was de-

[14] Méric, Histoire de M. Emery, II, 173–75.

[15] J. Guibert, Histoire de saint J.-B. de la Salle, p. 646. In the decree of November 17, which created the imperial university, the Brothers were incorporated in the university. Guibert, ibid.

[16] Picot, Mémoires, the year 1807.

[17] Cf. Artaud, op. cit., II, 258–62.

[18] A. Launay, op. cit., III, 420–22. "This decree was not carried out. The three congregations remained in their condition unchanged. This state of affairs could scarcely be otherwise, for they were composed merely of a few scattered members; a merger would simply have pooled their wretchedness."

[19] Haussonville, L' Eglise romaine et le premier empire, II, 229.

[20] Ibid., pp. 230–34.

[21] On Cardinal de Belloy, see Lanzac de Laborie, Paris sous Napoléon, IV, 1.

[22] Ibid., pp. 222–27.

nounced to Napoleon for having made, in the pulpit or merely in conversation, an inconsiderate remark, or for having expressed some "ultramontane" doctrine; the Emperor had the priest arrested and, without investigation, had him put in a monastery or imprisoned. The dungeon of Vincennes, the prisons of Fenestrelle, Ivrée, and Ile Sainte-Marguerite received priests who were never able to surmise the reason for their arrest.[23] Lastly he ordered the printing of a catechism in which the text declared that every Christian "owed to Napoleon I love, respect, obedience, fidelity, and military service." [24]

Such encroachments and the growing ambition of Napoleon were not of a sort to reassure the Supreme Pontiff. At the beginning of 1807, he wrote: "We are still pontiff, free perhaps for a few months. Who knows but new victories in northern Europe will not be the signal of our ruin? Let us hasten to the celebration of a feast in which the tiara which an ungrateful son has given us may be able still to rest on our head." [25] Pius VII was referring to a canonization. In the preceding forty years, Rome had not seen a ceremony of this sort. Neither Clement XIV nor Pius VI had proclaimed a canonization, one of the most imposing ceremonies that a pope can celebrate. On May 24, 1807, in the Vatican Basilica, illuminated by thousands of sconces and ornamented by the banners of the new saints, Pius VII, surrounded by the cardinals and a brilliant procession, ordered to be inscribed in the number of the saints a humble young woman, reformer of the Franciscans, St. Collette; a poor Sicilian shepherd, St. Benedict the Moor; the foundress of a religious order, St. Angela Merici; a simple nun, St. Hyacinth Marescotti; and lastly a pious and charitable [23] Ibid., p. 227; Lanzac de Laborie, op. cit., p. 152.

[24] Ibid., p. 248. Apart from the political passages that Napoleon inserted, the imperial catechism had a real value. The commission which drew it up took as a basis the catechism of Meaux, composed by Bossuet, whose words were kept verbatim as far as possible. On the writing of this catechism, see Haussonville, op. cit., pp. 236–72.

[25] Artaud, op. cit., p. 296.

priest, St. Francis Caracciolo. The French ambassador, Alquier, in a diplomatic note, relates that "the canonization of five blessed servants of God had attracted a prodigious throng . . . and that people came from the depths of Bohemia and Hungary." [26] The former member of the Convention might well compare the spectacles he had witnessed at Paris with those he viewed at Rome. Before the ashes of the "great men" to whom the Revolution had dedicated its Pantheon, crowds of men had filed past, guided by banal curiosity or by a cold admiration; at the feet of the new saints whom the Church was placing on her altars, the Christian people went to their knees in veneration and love, as to the feet of so many brethren, friends, and good and powerful protectors to whom they could henceforth confidently turn with supplication and whom they could regard as models. On the morrow of the great storms just passed through, and on the eve of those that could still be feared, the majestic liturgical solemnity of May 24, 1807, was a supernatural solace for the Pope and for the Church.

New Threats

These new storms were not long delayed. On July 22, 1807, concerning a refusal, given by Casoni in the Pope's name, to institute bishops in Italy so long as the Emperor should violate the ecclesiastical immunities, Napoleon wrote to the viceroy of Italy: "Perhaps the time is not far off when I will recognize the pope merely as bishop of Rome. . . . Let all know: for the court of Rome I shall always be Charlemagne and never Louis the Pious." [27] In August, Talleyrand was unexpectedly replaced in the foreign affairs office by Count de Champagny. What mystery was hidden under this little cabinet revolution? Did Talleyrand withdraw of his own accord, with the hope of still directing foreign affairs through a subordinate in his place? Or, on the contrary, did this change indicate a new direction of the imperial policy? [28] Shortly afterward, a report spread that Napoleon intended to go to Rome. What was the purpose of this journey? The Holy Father judged that a favorable interpretation of the project was more charitable as well as more prudent. To the Emperor he offered the hospitality of the Vatican.

[26] Ibid.

[27] Artaud, op. cit., p. 306.

Napoleon's only reply was an order to General Lemarois that he should seize the duchy of Urbino, the province of Macerata, Fermo and Spoleto, and to keep Cardinal Bayane at Milan until Prince Eugene learned from him whether he had the necessary powers to settle the differences between Rome and Paris. The Pope must march in step with the French scheme; otherwise the Emperor would appeal the question to a general council, "the sole infallible organ and supreme arbiter of all religious disputes." [29]

After such threats, the Pope, with his territory violated and his cities seized, could not repeat his conciliatory proposals. The situation was open war against the Holy See. Pius VII, instead of confirming the powers already given to Cardinal Bayane to treat with Napoleon, suspended them and ordered the cardinal to return to Rome.

From that moment the Emperor no longer restrained his anger. He instructed Prince Eugene (January 10, 1808) to direct on Rome General Miollis at the head of a brigade. On February 2 the French troops, entering the city by the Porta del Popolo, disarmed the guard, occupied the Castle Sant' Angelo, and, while the Pope and the Sacred College were celebrating the solemn function of the Purification in the Quirinal chapel, a body of cavalry and infantry was stationed in the big square of the papal palace. Ten pieces of artillery were set up facing the windows of the Pope's apartment.[30] In a vigorous note, Pius VII declared that, as long as Rome should be invaded, he refused to engage in any sort of negotiation, and he ordered the papal representative at Paris, Cardinal Caprara, to ask for his passports.

[28] Welschinger, "Jugement de Villemain sur le prince de Talleyrand," in Nouvelle revue, November 15, 1894.

[29] Welschinger, op. cit., p. 65.

General Miollis distributed his forces in the different sections of Rome and, by order of his government, began that series of outrages which, as Pacca says, "would hardly be believed by anyone who had not been a witness of them." At the end of February the Neapolitan cardinals received orders to leave for Naples within twenty-four hours. The papal troops were obliged to be incorporated in the French forces; the officers who resisted were arrested and were led off to the fortresses. On March 27 Cardinal Doria, who, with the title of pro-Secretary of State, had replaced Cardinal Casoni, was hauled off from Rome by force. On April 22 Monsignor Cavalchini, governor of Rome, was seized by a detachment of soldiers and was taken to the fortress of Fenestrella. At the same time word of the imperial decree of April 22 reached Rome. By this decree Napoleon, "considering that the sovereign of Rome has continually refused to make war on the English and that the donation of Charlemagne was made for the good of Christianity and not for the benefit of the enemies of our holy religion, joined to his kingdom of Italy the provinces of Urbino, Ancona, Macerata, and Camerino." [31]

Such a reason could not fool anyone. That the Emperor's actual concern was to isolate England from the rest of the world, was known to all. Having no hope of conquering her on her island, he decreed against her (November 21, 1806) that famous continental blockade by which all commerce with England was forbidden, and he was irritated that the Pope would not, by his religious authority, give his backing to this war measure against a Protestant state. Let Miollis increase the avenging sanctions. He obeyed. On June 16, 1808, the armed force penetrated the papal palace and, near the Pope's apartment, arrested Cardinal Gabrielli, who since March 27 had replaced Cardinal Doria as pro-Secretary of State; Doria had been expelled from Rome as being a Genoese. Only one last outrage remained to be perpetrated.

[30] Pacca, Mémoires (French trans.), I, 54.

[31] Correspondance authentique de la cour de Rome, p. 25.

Pius VII foresaw it; but he maintained his attitude courageously. In the last days of August, Cardinal Pacca, called to take the place of Gabrielli at the Secretariate of State, informed the Pope that an English frigate, sent from Palermo by King Ferdinand of Sicily, was cruising before Fiumicino to take His Holiness to Sicily, should he so desire. Pius VII reflected an instant, then replied: "No, we will not quit the Holy See unless we are taken away by force." [32]

The brutal force was being secretly prepared. Miollis' instructions were that he should act "slowly and without a sudden blow." [33] The General sought to graduate his outrages. On September 6 a Piedmont officer entered Cardinal Pacca's presence and transmitted to him the order that he must leave Rome without delay. The Cardinal declared that he would not leave without the Holy Father's orders. At that very moment the Pope entered the Cardinal's apartment. After a protest, says Pacca, "he took my hand and said to me: 'Cardinal, let us go.' And, through the midst of the papal servants, who applauded him, he returned to his own apartment." [34] The officer hesitated to exercise violence on the person of the Pontiff; but the supreme outrage was merely delayed; a more favorable occasion was awaited to consummate it.

The years 1807 and 1808 were the most critical for the imperial policy. This period was the time when the peoples who [32] Pacca, Mémoires, I, 91.

[33] Ibid., p. 56.
[34] Artaud, op. cit., II, 335.

were worn out and ruined by the privations which the continental blockade imposed on them, murmured, were restless, and experienced within them an increase of the feeling of their nationalities. Little mysterious associations were formed everywhere against the potentate who closed their ports, disturbed their commerce, drove out their princes, and halted the national life. This period was the time when Spain rose up and started the momentous war which, for six years, held the Emperor's best generals in check. The princes and the oppressed peoples took the side of Spain and were on fire to imitate her. But the Emperor concentrated his troops; and he reinforced them. To the 60,000 conscripts, raised in September, 1808, he added 40,000, taken from the classes before that of 1810. By joining the Polish, the Italians, and the Germans of the Rhine Confederation to the French, he was able to put in the field 425,000 men. No more formidable army had ever appeared before. Then Napoleon marched against Vienna, the center of the resistance, and, after the victories of Thann, Abendberg, Eckmül, and Ratisbon, he made his triumphal entry for the second time (May 13, 1809) into the capital of Austria.

Now he could turn toward Rome. Four days after his entry into Vienna, he signed the two decrees that finally united the Papal States to the French Empire, declaring Rome to be a free imperial city and creating an extraordinary council to take possession of the Roman states in his name.[35] The king of Naples, Murat, was chosen to direct the occupation of the Papal States.

Sentence of Excommunication

Pius VII foresaw these decrees and the brutal application that would be made of them. In that foresight he secretly prepared two bulls: one simplified the conditions for the election of the future pope in the event that the College of Cardinals should find themselves scattered at the time of the vacancy of the Holy See; the other bull pronounced sentence of excommunication against the invaders of the Papal States.

[35] Haussonville, op. cit., III, 80.

On June 11, by order of General Miollis, the Emperor's decree joining the states of the pope to the Empire was placarded along the streets of Rome; with the sound of artillery salvos, the papal flag was lowered from the Castle Sant' Angelo, and the tricolor flag was run up. As Pacca relates, "The time was two o'clock in the afternoon. I rushed to the appartment of the Holy Father and, as we met, both of us in the same breath uttered these words of the Redeemer: Consummatum est.'" [36] Then the Holy Father went to his table and there, without saying a word, signed the bull of excommunication. However, before transmitting it to those who were to post it, he went up to the Cardinal and said: "In our place, what would you do?" "Holy Father," replied Pacca, "I would publish the bull." The Pope raised his eyes toward heaven and, after a short pause, issued the order for posting the bull of excommunication "against the violators of the patrimony of St. Peter." [37] Official notification of the excommunication was given to the Emperor by a brief dated June 12, 1809. Unlike the bull, which indicated no person by name, this second document explicitly named Napoleon I, emperor of the French, as having incurred the excommunication.[38]

Informed of the sentence of excommunication, Napoleon

[36] Pacca, op. cit., I, 112.

[37] For the entire text of the bull, see Pacca, op. cit., I, 129–48.

[38] In a consultation with Bigot de Preameneu, Napoleon was assured that he was not affected by the bull, "because, according to the rules, penalties against invaders of ecclesiastical temporal goods did not touch sovereigns unless they had been expressly named." Bigot ignored the existence of the brief of June 12, 1809. For the text of this brief, see Welschingr, op. cit., p. 84.

wrote to the King of Naples (June 20): "At this moment I have received news that the Pope has excommunicated us. It is an excommunication that the Pope has issued against himself. . . . He is a wild fool, who must be interned. Arrest Cardinal Pacca and other adherents of the Pope." [39] This letter is dated from the palace of Schömbrunn, where twenty-one years later the little King of Rome died.

Murat already had orders to arrest the Pope in the event that he should preach revolt.[40] For the execution of this order, Murat at once appointed a man known for his abundant energy, General Radet. Etienne Radet, former cavalry lieutenant, was one of the brave officers who had attempted, in 1791, to save King Louis at Varennes. In 1794 he was brought before the revolutionary tribunal and, as if by a miracle, escaped sentence to capital punishment. Upon receipt of his fatal mission, Radet had a moment of hesitation; but he thought that "his oaths and his sacred duty obliged him to carry it out," and he obeyed.[41]

Arrest of Pius VII

On the night of July 5, by Radet's order, the Quirinal was surrounded by the troops. After an hour of violent attempts, by the use of scaling ladders and the smashing of doors, the soldiers, guided by a traitor, penetrated into the papal palace, with General Radet at their head. Pius VII, vested in mozzetta, rochet, and stole, awaited the invaders in his study. Radet writes: "Finding myself with an armed force before that sacred head, an oppressive and spontaneous movement ran through all [39] Lettres inédites de Napoléon Ier, I, 317.

[40] Letter of June 19.

[41] Radet, Relation au pape Pie VII. Radet wrote: "The military have duties so painful that a person is tempted to elude them. But a righteous man is sustained in his obedience by sworn faith and by honor." Radet, Mémoires, p. 171. Radet was sincere; but the error of his reasoning is evident. No promise or oath can dispense from the observance of the higher law of justice.

my members. A holy respect filled my whole being." [42] At last the General approached and presented to the Pontiff for his signature a document that contained the removal of the excommunication. The Pope shoved it aside, saying: "In the whole affair I acted only after consulting the Holy Ghost, and you will rather tear me to pieces than make me retract what I have done." Then, after a moment of silence: "We cannot. We ought not. We will not." [43] "In that case," replied Radet, "I have orders to conduct you far from Rome."

Thereupon Pius VII stood up and, without taking anything but his breviary, which he put under his arm, advanced to the door, giving his hand to Cardinal Pacca. Radet, greatly moved, bowed and kissed the papal ring. Pius VII left his apartment. Amid the debris of smashed doors, he slowly descended the great stairs and reached the Court of Honor, where the rest of the detachment was waiting. There the Pope gave a last blessing to the city of Rome, then entered a berlin that was waiting for him, while the soldiers, impressed by this majestic tranquillity, presented arms.[44]

The most precise details of the Pope's removal have been left us by the two personages who, in different capacities, were witnesses of it: General Radet and Cardinal Pacca. In their Mémoires you may read the account of the painful journey of the Holy Father from Rome to Savona, passing by the Chartreuse of Florence, Alessandria, Mondovi, Grenoble, Valence, Avignon, Aix, and Nice. Along the route of his exile, the Pontiff had the consolation of seeing the crowds thronging about him to ask his blessing. After traveling forty-one days, he arrived (August 16, 1809) at Savona, where he was to remain until June 19, 1812.

[42] Radet, Mémoires. "At that moment," Radet later said to Artaud, "my first Communion came to my mind." Artaud, op. cit., III, 92.

[43] These words are the formula by which the parlements used to refuse the registration of the royal edicts: Nec volumus, nec possumus, nec debemus. Artaud, op. cit., II, 353.

[44] Welschinger, Le pape et l'empereur, p. 87.

The little city of Savona, located on the Gulf of Genoa and recently annexed to the French Empire, had been pointed out to Napoleon by Fouché to serve as the Pope's place of residence rather than Paris, where public opinion would have been more impressed by the Pontiff's presence. There he would be without official pomp, without insignia, for the Pope had brought with him no papal vestments, without counselor, for they separated him from Cardinal Pacca, without news, for orders were given to exercise watchful vigilance over his correspondence. Thus they hoped to wear down the Pope's patience, to obtain more easily from him what he had refused when the traditional pomp of the Quirinal and the Vatican surrounded him, giving him, as it were, the feeling of a universal empire. Fouché and Napoleon were mistaken. Isolated, without the marks of his power and without any relation with his advisers, the Pontiff "enclosed himself in a sort of immobility which was his force. Deprived of freedom, he did not budge a step, waiting to move only when freedom should be restored to him." [45]

Imprisonment of the Pope

Even more than the continental blockade, which had so deeply irritated the nations of Europe, this violent hand of the Emperor of the French laid upon the head of the Catholic Church was a threat for the peoples as well as for the rulers. Surely an imprisoned pope, never left out of sight by a sovereign, could not preserve over the Christian peoples the authority attached to his spiritual office. And might not the princes fear that the hand of the despot, not hesitating to lay hands on the highest majesty of this world, would some day descend cruelly on them? Said Pacca: "The nations shuddered at the deportation of Pius VII. Yet no protest was uttered. Not a protective voice came down from the Catholic thrones in favor of this illustrious captive." [46] From which of the European courts could a demand be expected? Austria, beaten to the earth, was still trembling from her defeat; Spain and the kingdom of Naples were a prey to the imperial tyranny; England and Portugal were at war with Napoleon; Russia, Prussia, and the little German states were indifferent to the blows struck at the Catholic Church. Of all the ruling princes, even the Catholic monarchs, the most independent and most nobly proud in the presence of the despot, was indeed the aged imprisoned Pontiff himself.[47]

[45] H. Chotard, Le pape Pie VII à Savone.

Pius VII had just reached his sixty-seventh year; fatigues and cares had seriously debilitated his physical health. Lodged, not in the Savona fortress, as some have held, but at first in the palace of Count Sanson, then soon afterward in the episcopal residence, in this latter house he occupied an apartment composed of two rooms and a loge from which he could follow the offices of the cathedral.[48] Chabrol (prefect of Montenotte), General Bertier (commander of the troops of the fortress), and Prince Borghese (governor of the departments beyond the Alps) had personally an esteem for the aged august prisoner; but letters from the Emperor, rude sometimes to coarseness, came in rapid succession to remind them of the strictness of their task. One day Bertier received orders to arrest the former confessor of the Pope, as being "a scoundrel"; another day Prince Borghese was admonished to make considerable savings on the amount assigned for the Pope's subsistence.[49]

[46] Pacca, Mémoires, X.

[47] Welschinger, op. cit., p. 100.

[48] At the bishop's house in Savona you can still see the two rooms that were occupied by Pius VII and the balcony from which each evening he blessed the city.

[49] Welschinger, Le pape et l'empereur, p. 93. See especially Mayol de Lupe, La captivité de Pie VII, according to unpublished documents, 1912.

Napoleon's Divorce

What, then, were the great plans of the potentate? Now that everything seemed to be his, the souls as well as the bodies,[50] where was his ambition leading him? Was he, like Joseph II, going to regulate by himself the details of Catholic worship, or, like Louis XIV, try to screen his pretended rights under the prestige of an assembly of the clergy, or, like Philip the Fair, attempt to frighten the Pope by some violent aggression? None of these undertakings gave him hesitation; but, for the moment, another object absorbed him: to break the childless marriage with Josephine Beauharnais, which he had entered into reluctantly on the eve of his coronation. As his power became strengthened, his desire to assure himself of a legitimate heir, by a marriage with the daughter of some sovereign, had increased at the same time. In 1807 he drew up a list of marriageable princesses in the different European courts.[51] A project of union with the Grand Duchess Anne, sister of Czar Alexander, did not succeed because of the demands of the Russian court; he then turned his choice to the Archduchess of Austria, Maria Louisa. But Emperor Francis II, knowing of the ceremony performed on the eve of Napoleon's coronation, was unwilling to give his daughter unless the religious marriage with Josephine should be dissolved.

We will not relate the moving scene of December 15, 1809, when Napoleon and Josephine, in a family council, declared that they separated voluntarily, "both of them glorious at the sacrifice made for the good of the country," nor of the solemn session that took place the next day in the Senate to receive the declaration of the two spouses and, by a decree of the Senate,

[50] Let us recall the expression of Napoleon when he was first consul: "The priests take the souls and leave me only the corpses."

[51] This document is in the national archives, containing eighteen names, ten being names of Protestant princesses.

to regulate the situation of Josephine.[52] The capital difficulty remained: to have the religious authority declare the nullity of the marriage contracted on December 1, 1804.

Napoleon had at hand an acute and crafty jurist, Cambacérès, whose learned juridical devices had more than once enabled him to succeed in similarly embarrassing cases. The archchancellor of the Emperor was not unaware that, according to the very principles of the Gallican Church and historic traditions, the marriage of princes was one of the major causes that must be referred to the Supreme Pontiff. If they could have hoped from the prisoner of Savona a reply favorable to the Emperor's desire, the solution would be simple: to request the Pontiff to sanction by his supreme authority the declaration of nullity of the marital bond contracted between the Emperor Napoleon and Josephine. But all the circumstances convinced them that the Pope, even though an isolated prisoner, would show the inflexibility which he had manifested in the case of the marriage of Jerome Bonaparte and Elizabeth Patterson. In the present case Cambacérès judged that the Gallican traditions could not be applied, that they took into account only ordinary cases and not exceptional situations such as the one in the present instance. More conformable to those traditions would be the substitution, in place of a Roman commission, whose functioning was impossible, a system of jurisdiction composed of French ecclesiastical tribunals. For the present case, therefore, they instituted a procedure in three degrees: diocesan court, metropolitan court, and the primatial court of Lyons.[53]

[52] On Napoleon's divorce, see Welschinger, Le divorce de Napoléon, 1889; Geoffroy de Grandmaison, Napoléon et les cardinaux noirs; Lecoy de la Marche, "Le mariage religieux de Napoléon et de Josephine," in La guerre aux erreurs historiques; Dudon, "Le divorce de Napoleon, lettre inédite du cardinal Fesch," in Etudes (August 25, 1901), pp. 606–22.

[53] This last, in fact, as we shall see later on, was not consulted.

On December 22, 1809, the officialis and the promoter of Paris, upon the order of Cambacérès, learned the will of the master. The archchancellor of the Empire gave them to understand that he did not expect from them any long delays and that they had no need to follow the usual forms. The promoter, Father Rudemare, though keenly affected, could not refrain from sustaining the rights of the Holy See and, to shield his responsibility, asked that his competence in the case be submitted to a higher ecclesiastical authority.

In the month of November, 1809, the Emperor, on the pretext that the Pope was disturbing the functions of the capitular vicar during the vacancy of episcopal sees,[54] had constituted, under the presidency of Cardinal Fesch, a council of eight theologians, called "The Ecclesiastical Council." In that council could be seen, at the side of men absolutely devoted to the Emperor, such as Cardinal Maury and Bishop Manny of Trier, other ecclesiastics of great learning and solid virtue, such as Father Fontana, general of the Barnabites, and Father Emery, superior of the Sulpicians. These last, having entered this council with apprehensive anxieties of conscience,[55] were obliged, on occasion, to oppose the Emperor, on more than one point, with effective resistance; and we should properly recognize that Cardinal Fesch, whose presidency of the council was owing to his relationship to the Emperor, showed a sincere will to keep the imperial policy within the limits of respect due the Roman pontiff.[56] Did he thereby wish to make reparation for the grievous wrongs of his conduct at Rome during his period as ambassador there? However this may be, the Ecclesiastical Council, consulted on the question of the competence

[54] Napoleon I, Mémoires, I, 121.

[55] Father Emery wrote on this occasion to his friend, the Bishop of Alais: "How I should bless an illness that would come to me in these circumstances, even though it would carry me off!" Meric, op. cit., II, 327.

[56] On the testimony of the chancellor Pasquier, see his Mémoires, I, 440.

of the diocesan court, answered with a favorable opinion.[57]

The inquiry began. Three witnesses, Berthier, Duroc, and Talleyrand, affirmed that "several times they heard His Majesty say that he did not intend to engage himself and did not consider himself in any way bound by an act that had neither the character nor the solemnity prescribed." Cardinal Fesch declared that two days after the marriage the Emperor declared to him that "all he had done had no other purpose than to quiet the Empress and to yield to the circumstances; that at the very moment when he was founding an empire he could not give up the prospect of offspring in the direct line." Cambacérès urged that the general powers given by the Pope to Cardinal Fesch had for their purpose only to permit him, at the most, to take the place of the proper pastor, whom they did not have time to notify, but not to dispense from all the required formalities, such as the presence of witnesses, etc.

The diocesan court took cognizance only of this second cause of nullity: the omission of the required formalities. It did not dare invoke the defect of consent; this reason it discarded, according to the expression of one of its members, "out of respect for His Majesty"; for, said Father Rudemare, "how could we urge, in favor of a man who made us all tremble, a reason for nullity which was never usefully appealed to except for a minor taken by surprise and under duress?" Consequently (January 9, 1810) the officialis of Paris, Father Boislève, rendered a decision by which, "considering the difficulty of recourse to the visible head of the Church, to whom, in fact, always belonged the cognizance and decision of these extraordinary cases," the marriage contracted between Emperor Napoleon and Empress Josephine, without the presence of the required witnesses and the proper pastor, was declared null.

[57] On the canonical reasons for this view and on the attitude of Father Emery in this affair, see Gosselin, Vie de M. Emery, II, 247–49.

Three days later the metropolitan court came to the same conclusion, but taking for the chief basis the lack of consent by the parties to the marriage. By this decision, notice of which was duly given by the French ambassador at the court of Vienna, the difficulties advanced by the Emperor of Austria fell; and, by his marriage, celebrated April 2, 1810, with Princess Maria Louisa, granddaughter of the great Queen Maria Theresa and niece of King Louis XVI, Napoleon Bonaparte not only had the hope of establishing a dynasty, but also found himself connected with the greatest sovereign houses.[58] He had reached the summit of human glory.

On April 2, in the great gallery of the Louvre, brilliantly adorned and illuminated, his proud look might have surveyed with satisfaction the long row of generals, senators, ministers, princes, and kings who formed a sort of escort for him, while he took by the hand, as wife and almost as a trophy, the descendant of the Hapsburgs.

However, on coming forth from the religious ceremony, a frown of anger darkened the face of the Emperor. His intimates had heard him murmur words that made them tremble: "Ah! the fools. . . . To protest against the legitimacy of my race! To unsettle my dynasty!" The Emperor had noted about the altar, among the reserved places, thirteen vacant seats. Out of twenty-seven cardinals whom he had brought and kept at Paris, only fourteen resigned themselves to attend the ceremony; the others, considering that the unlawfulness of the Emperor's first marriage had not been recognized by the Pope, were courageous enough to absent themselves. Pius VII, in fact, upon learning at Savona the decisions handed down by [58] The fiercest adversaries of Napoleon were at this moment much impressed by this alliance. De Maistre (February 25, 1810) wrote to King Victor Emmanuel: "This wonderful man has finally married the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. With the matter decided, I have nothing to say, and I even believe that henceforth I ought to change my style in expressing myself with regard to this personage, who at present should be treated as another sovereign."

the courts of Paris, protested against the irregularity of that procedure.[59]

The Emperor had succeeded in only half of his designs: everything gave him hope of founding a great dynasty, but the head of the Catholic Church had not bent before him.

The thirteen cardinals who had avoided appearing at the ceremony were summoned to the ministry of worship. Their pensions were suppressed; their personal goods were seized; they were ordered to withdraw two by two to cities of the provinces and to remove the cardinalitial insignia. Hence arose the name of "black cardinals," which has been preserved in history.[60] Besides, Napoleon was strengthened in the project of organizing a system of Church government apart from the Pope and the Sacred College. With this organization once assured, people would see whether the Pope himself would not be obliged to accept the situation. The formation of an ecclesiastical council, the calling of the national council of 1811, and the concordat of Fontainebleau were the steps in execution of this new plan.

The French Church

An ecclesiastical council had functioned at Paris from November, 1809, to January, 1810. We have just seen that it determined the competence of the French courts in the question of the Emperor's marriage. But questions of a more general sort had been submitted to it. At the end of November, the minister of worship proposed to it, in the name of the government, three series of questions: the first, on what concerned the affairs of Christianity in general; the second, on those of France in particular; the third, on those of Germany and Italy. In what concerned the affairs of France, the Emperor insisted upon four well determined points and called for precise replies. The questions regarded: (1) juridically fixing the rights of the Emperor over the Papal States; (2) finding the means to render useless the canonical institution of the bishops; (3) proving that the bull of excommunication was not effective, and (4) establishing, in the Emperor's favor, the right to convoke a national council without the intervention of the Pope.

[59] The Pope's protest, we may remark, never concerned anything but the irregularity of the procedure. Whether through prudence or out of respect for the rules of canon law, by virtue of which a higher tribunal takes cognizance of a case only by the appeal of one of the parties, or because the fundamental question did not appear clear to him, the Pope never pronounced on the validity of Napoleon's first marriage. According to Father Rohrbacher (Histoire universelle de l'Eglise, XII, 45), here was a genuine cause of nullity, which no one dared mention, but which determined the votes of the courts. Cf. Méric, op. cit., II, 339.

[60] G. de Grandmaison, Les cardinaux noirs.

Father Fontana, the general of the Barnabites, because of illness had unfortunately to be absent after the first sessions. Father Emery, who took part in several discussions, always used the language of a theologian devoted to the Church and to the Holy See. Such is the testimony given him particularly by Frayssinous, who was added to the commission as secretary, as also that of Father Rauzan. But his views were not successful in winning the bishops. The answers of the latter showed the embarrassment of men who feared to violate the principles too strongly and yet were primarily solicitous not to wound the vanity of an irascible man, whose iron hand was already laid so heavily on the vicar of Jesus Christ and might indulge in new deeds of violence.

With a compliance that could not be excused by a few timid reservations in favor of the pontiff imprisoned at Savona, the commission declared: "that the pope cannot, for the simple reason of temporal affairs, refuse his intervention in spiritual affairs," as if the outrages against the freedom of the head of the Church, which were the reason for refusal of the bulls to the nominated bishops, had been a purely temporal affair. On the subject of the means to be employed to supplement the defect of the bulls, the commission, after first evading a solution of this question and proposing to submit it to a national council, finally declared, upon the repeated demand of the Emperor, that the national council could, "according to the urgency of the circumstances," enact that the canonical institution would be given by the metropolitan or the eldest suffragan. Lastly, regarding the bull of excommunication, the commission declared it null and of no effect, "as having been issued only in behalf of temporal interests." [61] Father Fontana, because of illness, had not been present at most of the sessions. Father Emery, seeing in the questions presented by the Emperor a predetermination to impose his wishes, rarely came to the meetings of the Council, where he warmly defended the rights of the Holy See,[62] and refused to sign the replies. These were transmitted to the Emperor on January 11, 1810.[63]

Provided with these new arms, Napoleon lost no time in promulgating (February 17, 1810) a Senate decree which proclaimed the union of the States of Rome to the Empire, and declared that "the imperial prince would bear the title and receive the honors of king of Rome." Thus, "several weeks before the Austrian marriage and many months before the birth of a son, Napoleon decreed that this son would be an heir who would occupy the preponderant place in the city of the popes; that he would be the king and would receive royal honors." [64] The Senate decree also bore this haughty title: "On the independence of the imperial throne over all authority on earth." We know what happened to this proud dream: when barely four years old, the King of Rome no longer had a crown and, in the eyes of Europe, he was merely an Austrian prince.

[61] Gosselin, Vie de M. Emery, II, 238. The replies of the council have been given by Talleyrand with some abbreviations. Talleyrand, Mémoires, II, 52. On the Church council of 1809–1810, see the profound study by Welschinger, Le pape et l'empereur, pp. 82–138.

[62] See Gosselin, op. cit., pp. 239–43, for Father Emery's attitude.

[63] Talleyrand, Mémoires, II, 71.

[64] Welschinger, Le roi de Rome, p. 3.

Napoleon's religious marriage with the Archduchess of Austria did but exalt still more the potentate's insatiable ambition. Says the historian of the religious conflicts of this period: "From this moment Napoleon no longer observed the least consideration for the Holy Father." [65] He pictured himself master of the Eternal City, which he intended to make one of the capitals of his great empire. "This empire," he said, "will rise higher than it has ever been since the last of the Caesars. To myself I reserve the glory of appearing as its father." Providence never allowed Napoleon to realize this desire. But meanwhile the Emperor did not hide his idea: to accomplish the political ruin of the papacy and to leave it only the appearance of spiritual power. To all bishops going to Savona orders were given that they should try to wring from the Pope the surrender of all his prerogatives. "The entire decree of the Senate, and nothing but that"; [66] such was the watchword of the Emperor.

Had the Emperor of Austria, following the old traditions of the "apostolic" monarchy, wished then to take in hand the cause of Pius VII or at least to intervene in his behalf, the occasion was presented to him by the unforeseen alliance he had just contracted with the Emperor of the French. An intervention did take place, but in a way not to compromise the Austrian monarchy in a delicate negotiation. The one chosen for this negotiation was that Prince Metternich, who was not unacquainted with knotty situations and was not without ability in unraveling them. But he seemed to have for his motto the words of Walpole: Quieta non movere ("Do not stir up things that are quiet"). At Vienna he continued the Josephist traditions, full of distrust for the papal authority. No one was less suited to be a knight of the papacy in a diplomatic mission. Besides, we know today, by the publication of the Mémoires of the illustrious statesman, the basic inspiration of his measures.

[65] Ibid., p. 5.
[66] Ibid., p. 6.

Therein he sees the occasion to pursue the dominant idea of his whole policy: to raise up again and develop the Austrian supremacy. He wrote to Francis I: "If the attempt does not succeed, Your Majesty will nevertheless have played a fine role." [67] What mattered to him was this role rather than success. Napoleon made him some fine promises: he agreed "to remain faithful to the religion of St. Louis and not to raise any schism over spiritual questions." But what did Napoleon mean by "spiritual questions"? We know how singularly he limited their scope. As for the Pope, Napoleon recognized him as bishop of Rome, but expressed the hope and desire that he should reside in Paris, where he would be closer to Madrid, Lisbon, and Vienna.

Such were the declarations which satisfied the Austrian plenipotentiary. These he transmitted to his government in a report dated May 10, 1810. That very day Napoleon at Breda in Holland gave an audience to the members of the two clergies, Protestant and Catholic. The latter he upbraided insultingly, saying to them: "Bigots! If the matter depended on you, you would throw me into a monastery, like Louis the Pious. . . . God is the one who has placed me on my throne. . . . I must render account of my conduct only to God and Jesus Christ, not to a pope. . . . You have calumniated the Protestants. I have 600,000 Protestants in my empire, and never have I had occasion to complain of one of them." [68]

Ten days later the Pope wrote a brief to the Austrian ambassador, Lebzeltern. Therein he declared that he gladly renounced all the material advantages that might be offered him, but he forcibly rejected all schemes that would injure the dignity of the Church and he asked above all the opportunity to communicate with his faithful.[69]

[67] Metternich, Mémoires, II, 333–55.

[68] F. Schoell, Recueil de pieces officielles, IV, 247. Quoted by Welschinger, Le pape et l'empereur, p. 125.

[69] Chotard, Le pape Pie VII à Savone, p. 124.

The sturdy resistance of the one whom he had hoped to master by isolating him exasperated the Emperor. On July 25, 1810, he ordered Prince Eugene to have a number of religious arrested, as being guilty of expressing their sympathy for the Pope. On November 1 on his own authority he appointed to the archbishopric of Paris, Cardinal Maury, who had the weakness to accept the appointment.[70] This act brought grief to Pius VII, who at once wrote to the Cardinal: "Thus, after courageously pleading the cause of the Church in times of storm, you now abandon her who has lavished on you her dignities and favors." The unworthy prince of the Church perhaps found that the dignities and favors offered by the Emperor of the French more appreciable.

Napoleon heaped favors on him. On the other hand, in the new ecclesiastical council, which he formed in January, 1811, under the presidency of Fesch, the Emperor counted especially on Maury to defend his religious policy. The new committee included, along with Fesch and Maury, Cardinal Caselli, the archbishops of Tours and Malines, the bishops of Evreux, Treves, and Nantes. Napoleon wished also that Father Emery should be added. The anguish of the superior of St. Sulpice revived. After vainly begging the Emperor to excuse him from such a mission or, at least, to give him merely a consultative voice, he felt that he ought to accept, not having lost all hope of exercising over the members of the committee an influence favorable to the rights of the Church.

He did not suspect what low servility lay in the soul of Maury, who but recently from Rome, where he was living in the midst of the émigré nobles, had so bitterly reproached Father Emery for his so-called weakness toward the established powers, showed himself a most complacent flatterer of the despot. On the other hand, when Napoleon was irritated and wished to force from the lips of the members of the ecclesiastical council, some words of disavowal about the Supreme Pontiff, he found before him a man courageous enough to resist him to his face. This man was precisely the superior of St. Sulpice.

[70] Cardinal Fesch, to whom the Emperor turned first, had the courage to refuse.

On March 16, 1811, the Emperor had summoned the ecclesiastical council to the palace of the Tuileries, in the presence of Cambacérès, Talleyrand, and the members of the Council of State. Napoleon had a fondness for these imposing manifestations, and knew how to exploit them to his advantage. Artaud de Montor gives the details of this meeting, according to a note found in the papers of Consalvi.

The Emperor, who made them wait for two hours, said that they were blockheads. Napoleon appeared in extraordinary apparel, encompassed by his great officers, and he opened the session with a long and vehement address against the Pope. Although this discourse was a tissue of vile calumnies, none of the cardinals or bishops seem to have attempted to declare the truth against the might and power. But, for the glory of religion, a simple ecclesiastic was there who would save the honor of the state which he professed. That man was Father Emery. He had not wished to attend the assembly. Cardinal Fesch had sent two bishops to find the modest Sulpician.

After speaking with violence, Napoleon looked at all those present, and then said to Father Emery: "What do you think of the Pope's authority?" Father Emery, directly questioned, with deference turned his eyes to the bishops, as if to ask permission to be the first to express his opinion, and then answered: "Sire, I can give no other view on this point than that which is contained in the catechism taught by your orders in all the churches; to the question, 'What is the pope?' the answer is given that he is 'the head of the Church, the vicar of Jesus Christ.' " "But Jesus Christ did not give him the temporal power: it was Charlemagne who gave it to him; and I, the successor of Charlemagne, wish to take it from him, because it keeps him from exercising his spiritual functions." "Sire," Father Emery replied, "Your Majesty honors the great Bossuet and is pleased to quote him often. I will quote verbatim from him this passage, which I well remember. Sire, Bossuet speaks thus: 'To the Apostolic See were conceded the sovereignty of the city of Rome and other possessions that the Holy See, freer and more assured, might exercise its power throughout the world. . . . For this we felicitate the universal Church and we heartily pray that this sacred principality may remain safe and sound.' "

Napoleon then spoke mildly, as he always did when he was fearlessly contradicted, and he said: "I do not reject the authority of Bossuet. All that was true in his day, when Europe acknowledged several masters. At that time it was not fitting that the pope should be subject to an individual ruler; but what is unsuitable in the pope's being subject to me, now that Europe recognizes no other master but me alone?" Father Emery was at first a bit embarrassed. Yet he replied: "Sire, you know the history of revolutions as well as I do. What now exists may at some time cease to exist. The improprieties foreseen by Bossuet may reappear. An order so wisely established ought not to be changed.[71]

The date was March 16, 1811, when Father Emery dared to say: "What now exists may at some time cease to exist." Three years later Napoleon, abandoned by all, signed his abdication; and the very one of whom he said: "I will never let him enter Rome," returned there as sovereign, in spite of Napoleon.

French National Council of 1811

The words of the venerable priest produced a strong impression on the Emperor's mind. When some prelates, at the close of the meeting of March 26, sought to excuse the superior of St. Sulpice by alleging his advanced age, Napoleon replied: "I am not irritated against Father Emery. He has spoken as a man who knows his subject. I like people to speak to me thus." [72] But he did not give up his idea of convoking a national council.

[71] Artaud de Montor, op. cit., III, 14–17.
[72] Ibid., p. 18.

On June 17, 1811, ninety-five prelates, assembled at the archiepiscopal palace, celebrated the opening of this council. We will not recount the details of the council.[73] We shall merely say that, on the essential points, the council declined to bend to the imperial will. The example given by Father Emery had revived their courage. The bishops required in the first place that the Pope be set free. As for the Emperor's claim to do without papal institution of the bishops, the prelates plainly declared that they saw no means of dispensing with the papal bulls and that the council was without competence in the matter, even to give a provisional decision and in an urgent case. A report drawn up to this effect by the Bishop of Tournai put the Emperor in a state of deep irritation. On the evening of July 10 an imperial decree declared the council dissolved. Two days later, at three o'clock in the morning, the bishops of Tournai, Gand, and Troyes, these last two chaplains of the Emperor, were arrested in their beds and imprisoned at Vincennes.

Deplorable was the effect of this violence. In an attempt to allay the state of public opinion, a rumor was spread that the three bishops had entered into relations with the enemies of the state.[74] This subterfuge, which was soon abandoned, deceived no one. Moreover, the ab irato interruption of the deliberations did not bring any solution to the serious questions that had prompted the convocation of a council. Maury, who is said to have been flattered at again enjoying, in this assembly, the oratorical successes of the Constituent Assembly, and to be plotting the intrigues that he had carried on at Rome, appeared to be particularly mortified.[75] On the advice of the [73] A learned treatment of them will be found in a long chapter of Welschinger, who was the first one to consult, in the national archives, all the unpublished documents concerning the council. Welschinger, Le pape et l'empereur, pp. 197–287.

[74] Pasquier, Mémoires, I, 483.

[75] Lanzac de Laborie, Paris sous Napoléon, IV, 344.

Archbishop of Paris, the Emperor requested the dispersed bishops not to leave Paris and, when the presence of a respectable number of the prelates was assured, they were gathered in a preliminary assembly to ask for the reopening of the council. This reopening was authorized by imperial degree. On August 5, without discussion, the mutilated assembly adopted a decree which, in case of refusal or abstention by the pope, after six months gave to the metropolitan or the dean of the bishops of the province the right to confer canonical institution on the nominated bishops.[76]

After this result was obtained, most of the bishops remained at Paris to await the return of a deputation sent to Savona. On September 20, Pius VII, circumvented and deprived of complete information, being desirous of ending the widowhood of so many Churches, signed a brief which accepted the decisions of August 5, but with some important modifications. Thus the Pope required that the canonical institution given by the metropolitan must be made "in the name of the Supreme Pontiff."[77] Napoleon, not satisfied with these modifications, imperiously sent from Gorcum, where he then was, an order to all the bishops to return to their dioceses without delay and informed the Pope that he himself would institute the bishops and, if there should be need, would annul the Concordat.[78]

Even though a prisoner, even deprived of all relations with the outside, enfeebled by age and illness, the old man of Savona refused to bend before the orders of the Emperor. The latter then thought of a supreme means of overcoming what he called "the headstrong obstinacy of the Roman priest": to bring the Pope to Paris, where he would be close at hand, and there by a direct pressure of that will which nothing resisted, to induce the Pontiff to subscribe to all his claims.

[76] Welschinger, op. cit., p. 281.
[77] Ibid., p. 334.
[78] Ibid.

Pius VII at Fontainebleau

Pius VII, through M. de Chabrol, prefect of Montenotte, received (June 9, 1812) the following letter: "Most Holy Father. The known plan of the English to make a descent on the coast of Savona with a view of taking you off obliges the French government to have Your Holiness come to the capital. Consequently orders have been given that Your Holiness come first to Fontainebleau, where you will have the lodging which you already occupied. Your Holiness will remain at Fontainebleau only until the apartments are prepared at the archiepiscopal palace in Paris, where you will then live." Only a few hours was given the Pope for leaving Savona.

Haussonville relates, following an authentic report, the sad incidents of that hurried journey; the Pontiff's departure in the middle of the night, in a padlocked carriage; the grievous illness from which Pius VII was suffering in the course of the journey, at Mt. Cenis, where he nearly succumbed to atrocious pains; the arrival (June 19) at Fontainebleau, where, contrary to the promises, nothing had been prepared to receive the Pontiff, and the installation of the supreme head of the Church in a modest lodge, furnished for the porter of the château.

At that time Napoleon was far from Paris. Never perhaps did he think himself nearer the realization of his grandiose dream. On June 24, 1812, he crossed the Niemen and was threatening Russia, as he exclaimed: "The destinies are about to be fulfilled." Once conqueror of the czar, would he not be able to do what he wished with the Pope? Napoleon was reckoning without the formidable might of the Russian Empire, without the severity of the climate, and without the just decrees of divine Providence.

Everyone knows about the disasters that befell the Grand Army: the dreadful Moscow fire, the premature snowfall, the sudden upset of all the plans of campaign, discouragement replacing enthusiasm, and, notwithstanding the heroic efforts of Ney, Drouot, officers, and soldiers, the retreat from Russia transformed into a catastrophe, while in France the conspiracy of General Malet, who almost succeeded, showed that the Empire in the absence of its head was at the mercy of a surprise coup.

Napoleon returned to the Tuileries (December 18, 1812) and, after attending to urgent matters, informed the Pope (December 29) of his desire "to put an end to the differences that were dividing the state and the Church." This first overture was the preliminary of the negotiations that were carried on between the bishops of Treves and Evreux, representing the Emperor, and four Italian cardinals representing the Pope.[79]

Napoleon's plan was said to be to weary, by prolonged conferences, the spirit of the Pontiff, already much weakened, and to await, for personal intervention, the Pope's state of prostration which would leave him defenseless.[80] The conjecture is quite probable. At any rate, in the evening of January 19, 1813, the prisoner of Fontainebleau saw the Emperor abruptly enter the sitting room where he was, cast himself into the Pope's arms, kiss his face, and make a thousand expressions of friendship toward him. Says Artaud: "The Pope always liked something in Napoleon's qualities. In the boundless goodness of his heart, he had always attributed the evil treatment to which he was subjected to wicked subalterns. He seemed to be satisfied with these outward demonstrations; to the persons whom he saw habitually he recounted these expressions, and he did not forget the embrace and kiss of Napoleon." [81] At this little first evening meeting, no business matters were brought up.

These matters were introduced the next day. Five hours

[79] Cardinals Doria, Dugnani, Ruffo, and Bayane.
[80] Artaud, III, 36.
[81] Ibid.

passed in long and serious discussions. History must forego an account of the incidents. The famous scene so dramatically described by Alfred de Vigny does not rest on any authentic testimony. The words of Commediante and of Tragediante were never uttered.[82] But we know with certainty that Napoleon spoke to the august and enfeebled Pontiff with full military rudeness. The Pope, several times questioned on the fact that he was struck by the Emperor, always answered that the accusation was not true. He said: "No, the Emperor did not resort to such an indignity, and God permits that on this occasion we have not to utter a falsehood." [83]

The Concordat

Pius VII was then seventy-one years old. As we learn from Artaud, "physical ailments, a sensibility stirred by the desire of again seeing the cardinals that were being kept prisoners, the importunity of Bertalozzi who urged him to accord everything, the entreaties of certain Italian cardinals who wore him out with menacing conjectures, the absolute silence of any wise and high-minded voice coming to relieve that soul afflicted with suffering: all contributed to discourage the Pontiff." On the evening of January 25, 1813, he was presented with a project that was to serve as a basis for a final agreement, and to which he was asked to attach his name. The aged august Pontiff turned imploringly to the four cardinals present (Doria, Dugnani, Ruffo, and Bayane). Napoleon too was there, attentive and impatient. From the cardinals not a word, not a sign that could make known to the Pope what advice they had to offer. But the previous evening they had told him that his duty was to put an end to the sufferings of the Church, to the exile of his counsellors, to the imprisonment of his priests. Pius VII put his signature on the document, and at once the Emperor signed his name beside that of the Pope.

[82] Alfred de Vigny, Servitude et grandeur militaires, chap. 5.
[83] Artaud, III, 37.

Pius VII had signed the so-called concordat of 1813, which Napoleon hastened to promulgate and to make obligatory for the whole Empire. The main provisions of the treaty were the following: the pope, who would receive an income of 2,000,000 francs, would fix his see in Italy or in France; the full right to appoint bishops in the whole Empire would belong to the Emperor, with the exception of the suburbicarian sees and ten others to be determined; further, the decree of the national council would remain in force. In return for these concessions, the cardinals and the imprisoned bishops would immediately be freed.

This act was an implicit renunciation of the Papal States; it was an abandonment of the rights for which the strife had hitherto been carried on. As the "black cardinals," Gabrielli, Pietro, especially Pacca and Consalvi, arrived at Fontainebleau, the Pope's conscience, enlightened by the advice of these prudent counsellors, who had been so cruelly separated from him, awoke the most poignant regrets. His grief was profound; for several days he abstained from celebrating Mass. The opinion of the newly arrived cardinals was that the Pope ought to protest, by a letter written by his own hand, against the concordat as null and void, inasmuch as it was extorted from him by fraud and violence. This letter [84] was signed March 24, 1813. Six weeks later it was followed by a brief pronouncing null the institutions that might be given by the metropolitans, the bishops thus instituted as intruders, and the consecrating bishops as schismatic.

From this moment the Holy Father recovered his serenity. He said to his cardinals: "I feel my heart relieved of an enormous weight." However, he might well be fearful of the effects of his letter and his brief.

[84] The full text may be seen in Pacca, Mémoires, II, 131–40.

Events would have to solve the situation. On April 25 Napoleon had gone to take command of the army in Germany, counting on returning after his victory to obtain satisfaction from the unmanageable old man. The success of the battle of Lutzen (May 2) enlivened his hopes. A circular communicated the news of the victory to all the bishops of the Empire, and a letter announced it to the Pope as a happy event for religion as well as for the Empire. But the victory of Lutzen was destined to be the last smile of Napoleon's good fortune. On October 17, 18, 19, and 20, 1813, the coalition of Europe delivered to the Emperor of the French one of the bloodiest battles known in history, the famous Battle of the Nations, which saw 120,000 men fall on the fields of Leipsic. Two months later, in the night of December 31, 1813, a foreign army of 200,000 men crossed the Rhine; and almost at the same time, by the frontiers of Germany, Switzerland, and Spain, 800,000 men (Russians, Austrians, Germans, Swedes, English, and Spaniards) invaded France.

Confronted by the foreign invasion, Napoleon wished to rid himself of his prisoner. He had him taken to Savona (January 23, 1814); on March 10 he had the Pontiff set at liberty. The Pope reached Rome on May 24, after a triumphal journey. Napoleon had signed his abdication April 11, in that same palace of Fontainebleau which he had wished to make a prison for the vicar of Christ.[85]

[85] Within a short interval the people of the Midi saw two processions pass, that of the Pope and that of the Emperor. Cardinal Pacca relates that, while the Pope was crossing the Rhone on the bridge of boats from Beaucaire to Tarascon, the inhabitants of the two cities gathered together to offer him the testimony of a most tender veneration. Nothing could be heard but shouts of joy, applause, felicitations. Colonel Lagorse, charged with conducting the Pope, then said to this whole people: "What, then, would you do if the Emperor were passing?" To these words the people answered: "We would give him a drink." As the colonel became angry, one of the most violent of the crowd cried out to him: "Colonel, are you thirsty also?" Artaud, III, 81. He thus predicted what happened two months later, at Orgon, where the dethroned Emperor, according to Thiers' expression, experienced "the saddest humiliation of his life." To escape from the violence with which these ter-

Napoleon and the Protestants

"The Concordat, which in principle was a work of pacification and reconciliation, Napoleon tried little by little to turn into an instrument of personal domination." [86] An immense vanity explains the conduct of this man, whose genius was able to realize that restoration of the Church which France was waiting for after the ruins of the Revolution. That same vanity explains the policy he followed with regard to Protestantism, Judaism, and Freemasonry.

Fundamentally, we may believe, by his early education and his reason Napoleon was Catholic. The desire to make his Catholicism serve his personal ambition does not necessarily exclude the sincerity of his belief.[87] But his attitude toward the Protestants, Jews, and Freemasons seems inspired solely by political calculation.

At St. Helena, when an Irish doctor asked Napoleon if he had not encouraged the Freemasons, the prisoner replied: "A little, because they combated the Pope." [88] This reason and also the desire to seize considerable political forces for his own advantage also explains his policy toward the Protestants and Jews.

The organic law of 18 Germinal of the year X (August 8, 1802) had united the two chief Protestant religions, that which went back to Calvin and that which claimed its origin from Luther, on a footing of equality with the Catholic Church. On rible Provençals were threatening him, for they had already prepared a gallows from which to hang him, Napoleon had to put on a foreign uniform so as to appear to be one of the officers of the escort. Thiers, Histoire du consulat et de l'empire, XVII, 834.

[86] Welschinger, p. 455.

[87] On Napoleon's religion, see Mathieu, Le concordat de 1801, pp. 30–33, 346. The celebrated text on the divinity of Christ seems to be authentic beyond question. See the book entitled Sentiments de Napoléon sur le christianisme, conversations religieuses recueillies à Sainte-Hélène. The words on first Communion seem not to be apocryphal, although they have been arranged.

[88] Account by O'Meara, quoted in La correspondance de Napoléon, XXXII, 394.

the day of his consecration Napoleon, receiving the president of the Geneva Consistory, who offered him the homage of all the Protestants, told him "how satisfied he was with the fidelity and the good conduct of the pastors and faithful of the different Protestant communions," and promised to protect the free exercise of their worship.[89] As we are told by a historian of Protestantism, "the Emperor abided by his promise. No persecution of the Protestants under his regime; no acts of violence in high or low places; a full and continuous security." [90] "No important book of dogma, Church history, or sacred eloquence is known which dates from the reign of Napoleon"; [91] but in 1808–10 the Emperor, by creating a faculty of Protestant theology at Montauban, favored the movement of studies in the Reformed Church; at Paris, churches were placed at the disposition of the Protestants, such as the church of St. Thomas of the Louvre, which they already had the use of, that of the abbey of Penthemont (rue de Grenelle), that of the Visitation (rue de Saint-Antoine), and in 1811 the large and beautiful church of the Oratory (rue Saint-Honoré). Under the Empire many Protestants occupied high posts, such as Senator Sers, Pelet de la Lozère the Counsellor of State, the tribunes Jaucourt and Boissy d'Anglas, the bankers Delessert and Mallet. We have seen that in Holland in 1811 the Emperor repeated to the Protestants the assurance of satisfaction that he gave them in 1804. How completely gratified he must have been! The Protestants offered incense to his power no less than the most complacent of the Catholics and they eagerly fought the power of the pope. In 1810 Rabaut-Pommier undertook to establish, by a well-ordered demonstration, that the coming of Napoleon had been announced by the prophets.[92] Nowhere was the feast of the fifteenth of August celebrated with greater [89] G. de Felice, Histoire des protestants français, p. 610.

[90] Ibid., p. 611.
[91] Ibid., p. 612.
[92] Grégoire, Histoire des sectes religieuses, II, 109.

ardor than in the Protestant temples; and several of the pastors justified the expression of Madame de Staël, who, in her famous report to the Directory, pointed to Protestantism as "the most formidable war machine" that could be used to oppose the papacy.[93]

Napoleon and the Jews

The law of 18 Germinal of the year X, which granted legal recognition to Catholic and Protestant worship, refused it to Jewish worship, because, said Portalis, "the Jews form a religion less than they do a people."[94] That religion was therefore neither regulated nor subsidized by the state.

Since the decrees of the Constituent Assembly the Jews enjoyed personally both civil and political equality. But precisely since they "formed a people" they constituted a power that Napoleon's genius could not but reckon with; for, according to the direction which that power might take, it could be useful or injurious to his cause. During his campaign in Italy, Napoleon valued the financial services which the Jewish banks of the Michels, Cerfbeers, and Bedarrides rendered to him. True, their exactions and the rigor they exercised in the prosecution of their debtors often stirred public opinion against them. In 1805 the Jews of Alsace, by their intervention in the sale of the national goods, and by their usurious loans, had particularly drawn the attention of the Emperor, who, by a decree of May 30, 1806, obliged them to submit, at least provisionally, to a regime of exception, to suspend for a year the execution of the judgments granted in their favor.[95] But this people, active and clever, seemed at the same time desirous of attaching themselves closely to the state. In their synagogue on rue Sainte

[93] Gautier, Mme de Staël et Napoléon.

[94] Boulay de la Meurthe, op. cit., V, 387.

[95] Lemann, Napoléon Ier et les Israelites, pp. 18–24; Sagnac, "Les Juifs et Napoléon," in Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine, 1900 to 1902.

Avoye, the Parisian Jews were most exact in solemnizing all the great political events. The proclamation of the Empire and the coronation were there celebrated with Hebrew songs and speeches in French. Napoleon profited by these dispositions, which could not but flatter his ambition.

Noteworthy is the way he was affected by these dispositions. With the Catholics, who have a common doctrine and a single head, Napoleon was able to conclude a concordat. With the Protestants, who have neither, he proceeded by use of his own authority. But what was to be done in the case of the Jews? They did not have a single head, but they had a common doctrine. That doctrine was to some extent formerly safeguarded by the great Sanhedrin which had condemned Christ and St. Paul; and doubtless, if in 1806 it still had its seat at Jerusalem, Napoleon would have treated with it. But the great Sanhedrin, whose authority, moreover, had never been supreme, was now nothing but a distant remembrance. Napoleon's desire was to have before him some authority that could enlighten him on the principles professed by the Jews regarding the civil society and to assure him that none of their religious regulations were incompatible with the safety of the state. As that authority did not exist, he decided to form it.[96]

By Napoleon's order representatives of all the synagogues of the Empire were summoned to Paris and there met together under the name of Great Sanhedrin. The sessions of the assembly opened on February 10, 1807, in a hall next to the City Hall, and they continued until April 9. The imperial commissioners placed before the representatives of the Jewish religion the following questions: "Do you recognize France as your fatherland? Do you promise to obey its laws, notably the laws about the military service and monogamy? Lastly, do you admit that the rules of honesty and humanity, which you regard as obligatory with regard to your coreligionists, are likewise so regarding the French?" A decree of March 2, 1807, noted the affirmative answers that were made to these questions and registered them as "doctrinal decisions." [97] Several other decisions then regulated the legal situation of the Jews and their religious organization.

[96] Chenon, in L'histoire générale, IX, 270.

The most important of these legislative acts is the organic decree of March 17, 1808, which regulated the condition of the rabbis, synagogues, particular consistories, and the central consistory. This last was to be composed of three rabbis and two laymen, appointed the first time by the Emperor.[98]

This official recognition was welcomed by most of the Jews with triumphant gratefulness. An address by the Paris consistory (July, 1809) said: "Sire, to whom heaven has reserved the power to place man on an equality with man. . . . Thanks to your mighty genius, we are no longer strangers on the soil which has witnessed our birth." [99]

Napoleon and the Freemasons

Like the Jews, the Freemasons showed themselves quite disposed to place their undertakings under the protection of the Empire. Rebold informs us that, in 1801, at the Grand Orient they glorified "the idol of the day." [100] Did Napoleon respond fully to these advances? We may suppose so when we read the discourse delivered (June 23, 1810) in the Marie-Louise lodge at Rome by General Radet: "In this feast I proclaim the Emperor as the protector of Freemasonry, and I add this new title of glory to all those titles which have already been bestowed on him by the men whose welfare he has been." [101] The poet Arnault was doubtlessly exaggerating in [97] Theodore Reinach, Histoire des Israelites, pp. 334–37.

[98] Lanzac de Laborie, op. cit., p. 375.

[99] Lemann, op. cit., pp. 114–20; Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu, Israel chez les nations, p. 341.

[100] Rebold, Histoire des trois grandes loges, p. 89.

[101] Madelin, La Rome de Napoléon, p. 351; Bourgin, in the review, La Révolution française, I, 427.

the opposite sense when he summed up Napoleon's attitude by this expression, which the Emperor is supposed to have spoken regarding the Freemasons: "They are children amusing themselves; let them do so and watch over them." [102] The exact note seems to have been given by Portalis in a confidential report: "In France no one could destroy the meetings of men and women known under the general name of Masonic lodges. . . . The real means of preventing their degenerating into harmful assemblies has been to grant them a tacit protection by having them presided over by the chief dignitaries of the state." [103]

What we are certain of is that the reorganization of the Grand Orient, which took place toward the end of 1803, was accomplished in a way to relieve the authority of all anxiety. The Council was largely composed of generals and high officials. Masonry had a great interest in relying on the public powers. Says Rebold: "In 1803 the Grand Orient, seeing that opposition was being renewed against its power, sought a greater support with the government. It succeeded in having the duties of the order's grand administrator accepted by general Massena, who was proclaimed in that capacity on December 18." [104] The next year the convention, called "The Concordat of 1804," by which the general Grand Lodge and the Supreme Council merged with the Grand Orient, was signed (December 3) in the house of Marshal Kellermann.[105] In 1805 the grand master Roettiers de Montaleau, the great restorer of Masonry, "nobly resigned," says the Annals, "and yielded his place to the prince Joseph [102] Arnault, Souvenirs d'un sexagénaire, I, 150.

[103] Quoted by Lanzac de Laborie, Paris sous Napoléon, IV, 377. "The statement of Napoleon's supposed affiliation to Freemasonry rests only on some vague data. The Abeille maçonnique affirms it; Besuchet (1829) holds that it took place on the island of Malta at the time of the Egyptian expedition. Landry reports that Emperor Napoleon on that day, along with Duroc and Lauriston, went to a lodge of the faubourg Saint-Marcel. These declarations are gratuitous." Max Doumic, Le secret de la franc-maçonnerie, p. 199.

[104] Rebold, op. cit., p. 92.

[105] Ibid., p. 94. On the general Grand Lodge and the Supreme Council, see ibid., pp. 87, 95.

Bonaparte." [106] Rebold adds that Joseph Bonaparte had been named for the post of grand master by the Emperor himself.[107] Some of the chief officers of Masonry at this period were the following: grand master, prince Joseph Bonaparte; adjutant grand master, prince Louis Bonaparte; grand administrator, Marshal Masséna; first grand sentry, Marshal Murat; second grand sentry, Lacépède; grand orator, Lalande.[108] What was the genuine role of a society with such a staff? We know that the lodge of Neuf-Soeurs, faithful to its title, took a large share in the literary exercises. The lodge Sainte-Caroline, one of whose members was the Duchess de Carignan, mother of the future king of Sardinia, and another the former Duchess de Luynes, was distinguished by its dances and its gay banquets.

But behind these worldly celebrations, were political intrigues concocted? Were plots formed there against the Church and the papacy? The answer to such questions, according to the prudent remark of a certain historian, could be profitably looked for only in the archives of the rue Cadet.[109]

[106] Ibid., p. 99.
[107] Ibid., p. 106.
[108] Ibid., p. 98.
[109] Bourgin, in the review, La Révolution française, II (1905), 52.

CHAPTER X

Last Years of Pius VII

PIUS VII's solemn entry into Rome took place on May 24, the feast of Our Lady Help of Christians. The Church, in her offices, in the celebration of this anniversary attributes to the protection of the Blessed Virgin the deliverance of the supreme head of the Church.[1] Cardinal Pacca, who had again become the faithful companion of the Pontiff, thus recalls the joys of that day, which he himself witnessed.

> Others have spoken at considerable length of the joy, devotion, and love which the good Roman people showed in that triumphal entry. For fear of describing something above the reality, I hesitate to speak of it. I will merely say that, wherever the carriage bearing the Holy Father passed, you could see a multitude of persons whose tears of joy choked their words.[2]

Before his arrival at Rome, Pius VII had given orders that a kindly welcome should be extended to the Emperor's mother, Madame Laetitia, who, after the manner of Mesdames Adelaide and Victoire (aunts of Louis XVI), of King Charles IV of Spain, of Queen Maria Louisa, and of many other royal persons stripped of their power, came to Rome to shelter great misfortune in the Eternal City. Shortly afterwards the Pope, through the intermediary of Consalvi, recommended the family of the dethroned Emperor to the generosity of the allied rulers.[3] Pius VII had never been able to rid himself of a sympathy for Napoleon. He believed in the Emperor's Christian dispositions; throughout his life the Pope remained under the charm of the great man with whom he had signed the concordat. In 1817, moved by the sufferings of the august prisoner at the time of his banishment to St. Helena, the Pope's magnanimity went so far as to ask of the Prince Regent of England an amelioration of the treatment that was being dealt out to his former persecutor. Napoleon's mother wrote (May 27, 1818): "We find no sympathy and refuge except in the papal government. I speak in the name of a whole family of the proscribed, especially in the name of him who is dying by slow torture on a barren rock." [4] Thus did the Pope take his revenge. The Emperor, at the time of his career's approaching end, mindful perhaps of this kindness, requested of Rome a priest to receive his last confidences and to assist him to pass in a Christian manner the last years of a life so glorious and so distressed.[5]

[1] See the Roman Breviary, feast of Our Lady Help of Christians, third lesson of the second nocturn.

[2] Pacca, Mémoires, I, 407.

[3] Letter to Consalvi, October 6, 1817, quoted by Haussonville, V, 347.

European Situation

But while the merciful heart of the Pontiff turned with pity to the misfortune of his fallen enemy, his attention was sharply drawn to the new situation created in Europe on the morrow of the great Emperor's fall. This situation would impose new duties on his apostolic solicitude.

An eminent Protestant historian, Leopold von Ranke, rightly remarks that the result of the great wars of Napoleon had been to rally round the Pope, not only the descendants of the Catholic sovereigns who had the most violently driven the Jesuits from their states, such as the kings of France, Spain, and Portugal,

[4] Letter to Cardinal Fesch, May 27, 1818.

[5] On Napoleon's Christian death, see, in the Gaulois of April 6, 1912, or in the Revue du clergé français of May 1, 1912, the testimony of Countess Lapeyrouse de Bonfils, daughter of General de Montholon, who received the Emperor's last sign and who closed his eyes.

or who had most warmly sustained Jansenism, such as the sovereigns of Tuscany and Austria, but also the representatives of the Protestant or schismatic nations where the rationalism of Voltaire had found its strongest support, England, Germany, and Russia. When these nations sought to realize a political restoration, they were led to rest it on a religious restoration in agreement with the Pope, and "when the four great alliled powers, three of them anti-Catholic, met at London to regulate the international situation, one of the first questions they had to consider was the desire expressed by the Pope that he recover the possession of the whole Roman state." [6] As following the fall of the Roman Empire or of Charlemagne's Empire, the papacy remained the great moral power, standing amid the ruins.

If we would express in a word the desire of Europe in 1815, we find nothing better than the word "Restoration." As Cardinal Hergenröther wrote, "In the best minds of this period all concern seemed to be determined by a need for restoration." [7] This restoration was first desired in the political order. No one, not even Metternich, who would thenceforth for more than thirty years be the arbiter of Europe, thought of reviving the organization of the old regime. No doubt some intentional exaggeration was to be found in the word spoken at the Congress of Vienna by Cardinal Consalvi: "Between the present times and ancient times I see more differences than between the era following the Deluge and that preceding it." [8] But the Revolution and the Empire had established facts against which any reaction was futile. Statesmen's looks turned less to the absolute monarchy of Louis XIV than to the institutions of constitutional England, which acquired a new prestige from her material prosperity and her recent victories. Following the regime of repression which Emperor Napoleon had exercised over them, the nations aspired to "develop henceforth according to the specific laws of their historic traditions and their ethnic qualities, in relations regulated solely by the reciprocity of their rights and their own aspirations." [9]

[6] Ranke, Histoire de la papauté (French trans.), III, 372. This desire of the Pope, which Ranke speaks of, was expressed in a letter from Pius VII to the congress of Prague in 1813. Cf. Van Duerm, Correspondance de Consalvi avec Metternich, p. v.

[7] Hergenröther-Kirsch, Kirchengeschichte, VIII, Bk. III, Part I, chap. 7.

[8] Quoted by Goyau, "Consalvi au congrès de Vienne," in the Revue des Deux Mondes of September 1, 1906, p. 147. Cf. Madelin, La Rome de Napoléon, p. 681.

After the disturbances of the Revolution and the wars of the Empire, the restoration of economic life and of public liberties, so long fettered, was also one of the urgent needs. The tendency toward the same goal we see in Russia changing her serfs into workers, and her rich lords into manufacturers; in Prussia seeking the progress of her industry by joining tariff associations; in France replacing her old landed aristocracy with a military aristocracy of the vanished regime. Everywhere the youth, which for a long time had been thrilled at the word "glory," now was enthused at the word "liberty." Says Musset: "A man mounted the speakers' platform, holding in his hand an agreement between the king and the people; he started saying that glory is something beautiful, as also warlike ambition; but something more beautiful is liberty. At this word the children raised their heads." [10]

In this enthusiasm for a public life more industrious and more free, some revolutionary elements secretly mingled with the lawful claims. In Poland and Italy these claims aimed more and more especially at winning an individual nationality, in Germany the attainment of unity, in England an electoral reform, in France the acquisition of a national charter. But secret societies having their origin under the Empire, to some extent everywhere, for the purpose or on the pretext of resisting oppression, were carrying on their underground work after the re-establishment of peace. Of these societies the typical one was the Carbonari. This society, originating in Calabria under the government of Murat, was at first directed against foreign rule but soon affiliated with Freemasonry, from which it took its principal rites. The Carbonari would spread from Italy into Austria and France, where Saint-Simonianism developed steady relations with them.[11]

[9] Hergenröther-Kirsch, ibid.

[10] Alfred de Musset, Confession d'un enfant du siècle, chap. 2, p. 6.

The statesmen who met at the Congress of Vienna (September 22, 1814) had thus no small task before them. We are not here called upon to recount their political work, the sudden interruption of the Congress (March 11, 1815) at news of the return of Bonaparte and his march on Paris, the flight of King Louis XVIII, the Hundred Days, the catastrophe of Waterloo, then the second and final abdication of Napoleon and his exile to St. Helena, where he arrived on October 15, 1815. When Murat, taking advantage of this revolution, invaded Rome, Pius VII, following the dictates of prudence, left the Eternal City and temporarily withdrew to Genoa, but without being frightened over the future. To Jancourt, the French ambassador, he said: "Have no fear; this storm will not last three months." [12]

When the storm had passed, the Congress of Vienna again took up its labors. Consalvi, who appears as the superior diplomat even in the face of Talleyrand and Metternich, step by step argued with his colleagues for the integrity of the Papal States, which were restored to the pope, including the three legations and the principalities of Benevento and Ponte Corvo.[13]

But the rulers and the diplomats who discussed so many high

[11] On the origin and development of the Carbonari, see Cantu, Histoire de cent ans (1750–1850), II, 430–34.

[12] Artaud, Histoire de Pie VII, p. 123.

[13] Cf. the important work of Father Rinieri, Della diplomazia nel secolo XIX, Vol. IV: Il congresso di Vienna e la santa Sede; Vol. V: Corrispondenza inedita dei cardinali Consalvi e Pacca nel tempo del congresso di Vienna. Van Duerm, Correspondance de Consalvi et de Metternich. Historians had credited the good will of Russia and Prussia with the re-establishment of Pius VII in his states. Father Rinieri's work shows decisively that Consalvi's chief auxiliary was Metternich.

political problems were too well informed to close their eyes to a truth that had struck Napoleon Bonaparte at the close of the Revolution. Evidence for this truth had since then continued to increase: that no political or social restoration could be firmly organized without the help of religion. This conviction at first inspired him with the idea of the Holy Alliance, then, after the failure of this first attempt, with the more practical thought of an entente between the rulers and the Holy Father. That entente was brought about by a series of concordats, most of them in imitation of the French concordat of 1801.

The Holy Alliance

In February 1816, a diplomatic treaty was promulgated having a basis and form in singular contrast to all the acts of this sort generally known. The signatories of this treaty were Emperor Alexander I of Russia, King Ferdinand William III of Prussia, and Emperor Francis I of Austria, to whom were soon added all the kings of Europe except those of England and Saxony. They declared that, "being intimately convinced that the powers must base their advance on the sublime truths taught us by the eternal religion of God the Savior, they proclaimed before the whole world their unshakable determination to take as the rule of their conduct only the precepts of that holy religion, precepts of justice, charity, and peace." Henceforth, conformably with the words of Holy Scripture, they would regard one another as brothers and compatriots, would remain "united by bonds of a true and indissoluble brotherhood," and would offer one another "on every occasion and in all places, assistance, aid, and succor." Ever since at Mersen, in 847, the sons of Louis the Pious, concerned with the safety of their common realm, had solemnly proclaimed "the need of living in concord and union, as wished by the order of God and true brotherhood," such language had never again been spoken by kings.

The publication of this document, soon famous as the Treaty of the Holy Alliance, produced a profound feeling. While some hailed it as the dawn of an immense and favorable Christian rebirth, others cursed it as the announcement of an era of slavery for the peoples. The Treaty of the Holy Alliance deserved neither that enthusiasm nor those curses. Evidently the first idea of it came from the King of Prussia in 1813 after the Battle of Bautzen; but it was the personal work of Emperor Alexander, suggested by an enthusiastic woman, Baroness von Krüdner.

Born at Riga on the shores of the Baltic in 1766, the same year as saw the birth of Madame de Staël, she had an impressionable and mystical nature which was at first nourished by the writings of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre and Swedenborg. Afterward she mingled in the high society of Europe at the time when the tragical scenes of the Revolution and the threatening wars of the Empire were upsetting the nations. This woman, Juliana von Wietinghoff, Baroness von Krüdner, was one of those souls whose sensibility vibrated at the shock of all the events they lived through and whose imagination at once transposed the impressions into grandiose visions, into gigantic projects. At the beginning of 1815, while she was in Switzerland, some circumstance brought her into the presence of Emperor Alexander I, whose enthusiastic and visionary nature was prone to accept the strangest missions. That which Baroness von Krüdner pointed out to him consisted in nothing less than the regeneration of the world. "The black angel," whom Providence had recently banished to an island of the Ocean, would be succeeded by "the white angel," the "universal Savior," coming, as she said, "from the countries of Aquilon" (the North Wind). Presently she became the confidante of the Russian Emperor, his Egeria. The text of the famous treaty, which we have set forth in general terms, was drawn up in final form (September 26, 1815) only after it had been carefully compared with that which was its first inspiration.

This mystical pact was endorsed by Prince Metternich, who became its earnest defender because he probably saw in it the means of bolstering his monarchical policy. In spite of this noteworthy support, it soon languished, then broke completely. The English non-intervention policy, then that of Eastern Russia, the policy of England and France in favor of Greece, were its manifest contradiction. These religious flights of fancy, which did not venture to name the Church of Christ, with the idea that all beliefs could therein fraternize together, was unable to result in anything practical or to hold any of the contracting parties in a union where the bond was so vague. The Holy Alliance, under its ill-defined form, "was merely the proclamation, from the heart of the political tempest, of that disease of the nullity of faith, of modern indifference and wretchedness, which, with more or less authority and illusion, would in various ways be explored by de Maistre, Saint-Simon, Ballanche, Fourier, and Lamennais." [14]

Far better inspiration had prompted those German princes who, at the beginning of the century, strove to solve the religious question by concordats imitating that which the Pope concluded with Napoleon. In 1803 a certain ecclesiastic, devoted to the Febronian doctrines, made advances in this direction to Pius VII, in the name of Bavaria. The next year a rumor was current in the chanceries that Emperor Francis II was studying a concordat project for the whole Empire. In 1806 the nuncio (della Genga) at Ratisbon discussed the respective advantages of a concordat of the whole Empire or of a series of individual concordats. Napoleon pretended, of his own accord, to regulate the question by an imperial concordat that would consolidate his formation of a confederation of the Rhine. But this project encountered the preferences of the German rulers, naturally in favor of particular concordats for their states. This conflict indefinitely prolonged the conferences.

[14] Sainte-Beuve, Portraits de femmes, Madame de Krüdner, p. 404.

The imprisonment of the Pope rendered their continuation useless. But the fall of the Empire permitted their resumption in 1815; from that time, not only Germany but all the Catholic nations, one after the other, took up the religious policy of the concordats.[15]

We note a strange fact. Following Napoleon's fall, the first nation with which Rome negotiated a concordat was a non-Catholic one, the nation from which, since the sixteenth century, the Church had suffered the bloodiest persecutions, the country of Henry VIII, Elizabeth, and Cromwell.

The political combinations, by which His Britannic Majesty was made the chief adversary of Napoleon, made him also the defender of the rights of the pope. The King of England was the one who supported the demands of the Holy See when Pius VII presented claims to the works of art that had been taken off to Paris. We are told that George III spent 200,000 francs to have these masterpieces transported to Rome and have them again set up there. When, before the opening of the Congress of Vienna (March, 1814), Cardinal Consalvi came to London, where the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Russia then were, with a view to assuring the Holy See of the backing of the sovereigns, he there received a most friendly welcome on the part of the people, as likewise from the prime minister, Lord Castlereagh, and even from the King himself.[16] The accomplished diplomat profited by this circumstance. Not satisfied with treating the question of the full restoration of the papal domain, he broached the question of the rights of English Catholics.

We know that, ever since the reign of Elizabeth, all relations between Great Britain and Rome were severed. The Statute of Praemunire provided that any person who would receive from Rome any document whatever should be guilty of high treason. This article had never been abrogated. On the contrary, it was applied in 1792 under circumstances emphasizing its gravity. When Pius VII wrote to the King of England to thank him for the hospitality extended to the French clergy in his states, the prelate charged with carrying the papal document was notified, upon his arrival, that, according to existing laws, he could not be received. The oath of allegiance (abjuration of belief in the transubstantiation and the recognition of the supremacy of the king in the Church) was always required of all who wished to enter the military or civil service, or to sit in Parliament.

[15] On the history of these first negotiations of Germany, see Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le Catholicisme, I, 107–11.

[16] Viscount de Richemond, "A la veille du congrès de Vienne," in the Correspondant of September 25, 1905, p. 1114.

Two facts, however, had weakened the prejudice of the English people against what they called "the papist superstition." Eight thousand French ecclesiastics, proscribed by the Revolution and generously welcomed on English territory, had there won the high regard of their hosts. Besides, the novels of Walter Scott accustomed the English imagination to sympathize with Catholic personages, and the writings of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey had accomplished in England a work like that of Chateaubriand in France and of Goerres in Germany.

After Waterloo, English thought, now freed from the gigantic efforts that had absorbed it during the struggle against Napoleon, gave more attention to the religious problems. Matured by the tremendous crisis they had just passed through, rulers and subjects turned to Christianity there to find a doctrine of peace and of life, rather than an occasion of strife against Rome.

In these dispositions of mind the conference began at London between Consalvi and Lord Castlereagh. The minister at the outset clearly declared "that he could not think of requiring from the Catholics anything beyond what their principles allowed." For the abrogation of the penal laws against Catholics and the full emancipation of Catholics, he prefaced three conditions: 1. the taking of an oath of fidelity to the Constitution; 2. the intervention of the government in the nomination of bishops, either by a veto or by some other form to be considered; 3. the submitting of all documents coming from Rome to the royal exequatur. The Holy Father, to whom Consalvi referred the question, replied: 1. that he judged legitimate the oath of fidelity and that he gladly would accept the formula inserted in the French concordat or any analogous formula; 2. that the question of the nomination of bishops involved more serious considerations, because the Roman pontiffs had never granted the requested right to any sovereign belonging to another communion, but that the Holy Father, without compromising the basic principle, could heartily accept certain conciliatory forms; 3. lastly, the Pope declared that he could in no wise accept the royal exequatur for all rescripts of the Holy See. This point touched the very life of the Church, whose spiritual independence the pope must maintain at all costs.

This reply of Pius VII was evidence of his disinterestedness. "His opposition to the wishes of the English cabinet might lose at Vienna a support on which he was basing valuable hope, but he did not hesitate thus to risk his temporal power in order to safeguard the spiritual interests of the Church." [17]

Such were the foundations on which Consalvi was authorized to negotiate with the prime minister of England. Circumstances prevented the two diplomats, while they were at Vienna, from concluding the project. As remarked appositely by the historian who was the first to make public the history of this interesting attempt, "in this realm of ideas, failures are not so much defeats as they are steps preceding the victory, and every sincere effort brings the hour nearer." [18] Before Consalvi left [17] Viscount de Richemond, "Un essai de Concordat entre l'Angleterre et le Saint-Siège," in the Correspondant of October 10, 1905, p. 76.

[18] Ibid., p. 78.

Rome, Castlereagh in words of praise declared that "the cardinal's conduct gave an exact notion of what the clergy of the Roman court really is." In the course of the conferences he had proposed an exchange of diplomatic envoys between the king of England and the pope.[19] Four years later King George III accredited a minister to the Holy See. In the sequel formidable obstacles would arise against the proposed diplomatic entente and against the movement of individual conversions to Catholicism; but the advance toward Rome had begun.

The Church in France

Quite different was the situation in France. King Louis XVIII (June 4, 1814) granted a charter, in its political portion imitating the English Constitution, but declaring the Catholic religion the religion of the state. Other legislative acts soon emphasized the clearly Catholic policy of the Restoration. Before the Hundred Days, an ordinance (March 2, 1815) reestablished the Foreign Mission Seminary and the seminaries of the Holy Ghost. The Jesuits, without being the object of a special authorization, returned, relying on the guaranties which the charter contained about liberty. The "Chambre introuvable" abolished the divorce law; the bishops obtained partial direction and supervision over the educational establishments, and the observance of Sundays and feast days was prescribed by law.

But Pius VII soon perceived that this protective policy would not lack a hidden hostility to his personal authority, a hostility which showed itself both in the government and in some of the upper clergy of France.

We recall that, when in 1801 the Holy Father called for the resignation of all the bishops, thirty-six members of the episcopal body refused submission to this measure. Death reduced their number to about one-half. But the restoration of the king, whose devoted followers they had remained, strengthened their claims. Gathered round a prelate whose influence constituted their main strength, Talleyrand-Perigord, former archbishop of Reims and a personal friend of King Louis XVIII, they openly bore the title of their see even when this had been suppressed by the new diocesan boundaries in accord with the concordat. They held in disdain those whom they called "the bishops of the concordat" and they recalled that their sovereign, during his exile, had ever protested against the agreement concluded between Pius VII and Bonaparte. The revision of the concordat of 1801, the total removal of the concordat prelates, the re-establishment of all the bishoprics existing in 1789, the appointment of new titulars to the vacant sees according to the regulations of the 1516 concordat: such were their clearly defined demands. An ecclesiastical commission, appointed by the King and instructed to study the question, endorsed all these claims. These demands were sent to the French ambassador at Rome, de Pressigny, the former bishop of Saint-Malo, by the minister of foreign affairs, Prince Talleyrand.

[19] Ibid., p. 70.

At Rome, feeling ran high. The Pope appointed, to assist Consalvi, a commission of three cardinals. These replied to the proposals of the French government with the following counterproposals: 1. the bishoprics of 1801 would be maintained along with their titulars; 2. the government would bestow on the clergy a permanent endowment; 3. it would assure the submission of the former bishops who had not resigned. The pretention of the thirty-six bishops to impose their interpretation on the Church, was particularly objectionable to Consalvi. "All the Catholic Churches," he said, "those of Spain, Italy, Germany, Poland, as also the Church of America, have assented to the Holy Father's act and hold communion with the concordat bishops. How, then, can anyone dare to say that the whole Catholic Church rests in the thirty-six non-resigned bishops, now reduced to ten or twelve in number?" [20]

Long discussions ended in a "Convention of August 25, 1816," by which the concordat of 1516 would be re-established. As for the concordat of 1801, it was neither disavowed nor expressly revoked, but would cease to have its effect. In return, the organic articles were revoked. To obtain this last result was the reason why the Pope consented to abandon the concordat of 1801. Now was the turn of the French ministers to protest. What would happen to "the privileges of the Church of France"? Influenced by the Duke de Richelieu and chiefly by Duke Decazes, Louis XVIII ratified the convention, but with a reservation of "the liberties of the Gallican Church."

In the presence of this unexpected restriction and of fresh intrigues contrived by Talleyrand-Perigord, Decazes, and Richelieu, the Pope refused to ratify the treaty. The agreement of 1816, sometimes called the concordat of 1816, thus became a dead letter, and that of 1801 resumed its full force.[21]

But Louis XVIII and the bishops who followed the inspiration of Talleyrand-Perigord could not resign themselves to remain under the regime of a convention signed by Bonaparte.

Fresh negotiations were then entered upon, which finally ended in the concordat of June 11, 1817. It embraced seventeen articles. The proposals of the Pope were admitted in principle, but with vague restrictions which practically could be eluded when the king judged it well to do so. The bishoprics of 1801 were maintained, along with their titularies, but "saving some particular exceptions founded on serious and legitimate reasons" (arts. 4, 7, 9). An endowment in landed property and in revenue from the state was assured the clergy, but only when "the circumstances would permit it" (art. 8). The King did not explicitly promise to obtain the resignation of the former bishops who had not resigned, but merely "to use all means in his power to remove as soon as possible the obstacles that were opposed to the good of religion and to the execution of the laws of the Church." The ratifications were exchanged without delay and, on July 19, 1817, the Pope published the new concordat by his bull Ubi primum.

[20] Richemond, "Consalvi à Paris en 1814," in the Correspondant of October 25, 1905, p. 253.

[21] For details of the negotiations related above and the full text of the 1816 concordat, see Feret, "Le concordat de 1816 (according to the archives of the ministry of foreign affairs)" in the Revue des questions historiques, XXVI (1901), 187–240.

The accord seemed to be final. A constitutional scruple on the King's part made the whole project collapse. Some ministers (Pasquier, Decazes, and Lainé) thought that the concordat should be submitted to the approval of the Chambers. The King joined in this view, which the spirit of the charter seemed to favor. But the time was the very moment when the liberal opposition on one side and the extreme royalists on the other were conducting their most violent campaigns. The Observations d'un ancien canoniste by the former Oratorian and Essai historique sur les libertés de l'Eglise gallicane by Grégoire had reawakened the old religious quarrels against Rome. The new concordat, even cleverly made part of a legal project that revised the organic articles, stirred up a formidable opposition by the doctrinaire majority; and Count de Marcellus, in the name of the extreme right, rejected it as an attack on the rights of the Church. The project, introduced into the Chamber on November 22, 1817, was withdrawn by the ministry at the end of the following March. Fresh negotiations, which could merely exasperate, were then carried on between Paris and Rome until the hour when Pius VII, worn out by the variations of the French government and little satisfied with the rest of an agreement which he had signed with reluctance and as a last resort, declared by a motu proprio (August 23, 1819) in favor of maintaining provisionally the concordat of 1801. This provisional approval became final. A law of May, 1821, authorized the government to negotiate with Rome, on these bases, the creation of thirty new sees. All the discussions relative to this affair were ended by the publication of the bull Paternae caritatis (October 10, 1822), establishing for the dioceses in France a new circumscription, which did not subsequently undergo any important modifications. On November 19 the King of France, finally renouncing any new demand, thanked the Supreme Pontiff "for all that His Holiness had done to assure the prosperity of the Church of France." [22]

Concordats

The failure of the attempted French concordats of 1816 and 1817 was not indeed a matter of regret either for the state or for the Church. The agreement of 1801, in spite of its imperfections, offered a basis of more solid understanding. The Bavarian concordat of June 5, 1817, was drawn up on that model, "copying it almost word for word." [23] The state guaranteed to the Church the exercise of all the rights flowing from her divine constitution and the canonical prescriptions; the Pope granted to the King the right to nominate the bishops, reserving to the Pontiff the instituting of the bishops. The kingdom was divided into two ecclesiastical provinces, with six suffragan sees, and religious corporations were authorized.[24] This treaty might be called the one "most closely approaching purely Catholic maxims." [25] This judgment is true only with regard to the concordat text taken in itself; for the concordat "was almost immediately imperiled by the way the Bavarian government published it. . . . To it was applied 'an edict of religion,' which [22] See Feret, "Le concordat de 1817," in Revue des questions historiques (January, 1902, p. 201). Cf. Sagnac, "Le concordat de 1817," in Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine (December, 1905, and March, 1906).

[23] G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le Catholicisme, I, 140.

[24] For the text of this concordat, see Martens, Nouveau recueil de traités, III, 106–26, and Barberi, Bullarium, XIV, 314 ff.

[25] Cantu, Histoire de Cent Ans, II, 395.

subordinated the Church to the state. The signature given to the Pope by the King of Bavaria was revised and half withdrawn by the addition of organic articles, which made with the concordat a single block, a hybrid and incoherent charta, which required the oath of ecclesiastics and office holders." [26] After long negotiations, the King of Bavaria in 1821 promised that the concordat of itself would have the force of a law of the state and that the guaranties which it accorded to the Catholic Church could not be diminished or restricted by the stipulations of the edict of religion.[27] The jurists still found occasion to complain of this declaration; but Rome had won much by getting recognition in principle of the intrinsic legislative force of the concordat.[28]

The tireless Consalvi, simultaneously with the onerous labors involved in the affairs of England, France, and Bavaria, carried on diplomatic negotiations with Russia. These resulted (January 18, 1818) in the signing of a concordat, specifying that at Warsaw would be an archbishop and in Poland eight episcopal sees. At the same time was settled the question of fees to be paid for expediting the bulls of institution.[29]

The discussions with King Ferdinand of Naples, who, by a decision of the Congress of Vienna, was made king of the Two Sicilies, were particularly annoying; to reach an accord required all the diplomacy of Consalvi. At first the Pope, in the name of the ancient rights of the papacy, protested against the new title taken by King Ferdinand, who in return refused to recognize in the pope any supremacy beyond that of head of the Church. Consalvi proposed to Medici, the prime minister of Naples, that he should go to Terracina and there treat of the pending difficulties orally. Following these conferences (February 16, 1817), was signed a concordat which, in its first article, pro-

[26] Goyau, op. cit., p. 140.
[27] Barberi, op. cit., XV, 120.
[28] Goyau, op. cit., p. 142.
[29] Artaud, op. cit., IV, 200.

claimed the Catholic religion as the religion of the kingdom. Those persons in possession of ecclesiastical property that had been sold would not be disturbed; the religious orders would be subject to their superiors general; the bishops could convoke synods and could make a visit ad limina apostolorum; and all the faithful would have the right of appeal to the Holy See.[30]

The treaty with Piedmont contained this special item, that the Jesuits were there charged with the education of youth and that an association of secular priests, the Oblates of the Virgin, who made a special vow of obedience to the Holy See, was legally instituted.[31]

The regulation of the status of the religious was also the subject of negotiations undertaken with Switzerland. In 1814 Pius VII had given Switzerland a vicar apostolic. By the terms of the constitutional pact concluded in 1821, Fribourg received the Jesuits within its walls, and the existing religious orders were to be kept. A short time afterwards Pius VII restored the diocese of Basel and entrusted the Catholics of Geneva to the bishop of Lausanne. Shortly before his death (1823) he erected the abbey of St. Gall into an episcopal church and joined it to the bishopric of Chur. All these arrangements, however, had merely a provisional character. The final concordat with Switzerland was not concluded until 1828, under Leo XII, who promulgated it by the bull Inter praecipua. The 900,000 Swiss Catholics were thenceforth divided in five dioceses (Basel, Lausanne, Sion, Chur, and Como). St. Gall, made autonomous in 1845, would form a sixth diocese.

To his regret, Pius VII was unable to do anything for the Catholics of the Netherlands, where the stadholder laid a heavy yoke on them. Leo XII in 1827 signed with him a concordat which was not executed. From that time the violent separation of Belgium, three quarters composed of Catholics, seemed [30] Cantu, op. cit., II, 394; Barberi, op. cit., XV, 8–14.

[31] Ibid., p. 395.

inevitable. That separation did, in fact, take place in 1830.

In Germany a group of Protestant states remained to be considered, with their million and a half of Catholics, for whom the Pope wished to assure a legal status. First was Prussia, where the descendant of Albert of Brandenburg and of the king-sergeant tried in 1815 to come to an understanding with him whom his two great ancestors called the Antichrist. Frankfort also was the place where a sort of syndicate of Lutheran princes was formed to work out with the Holy See the legal status of the Catholics of Baden, Würtemberg, Hesse, and Nassau.

"The Congress of Vienna, by assuring Prussia of considerable territories along the Rhine valley, had oddly increased the number of Prussia's Catholic subjects, and the Catholic question became from day to day more lively and painful. Frederick William III was aware of this condition. . . . Prussia could no longer present herself before Germany as a power essentially Protestant." [32] The Prussian minister at Rome was then the illustrious historian Berthold Niebuhr. For this zealous Protestant, > the religion and practices of the Roman Church were displeasing, but his dislike of the papist religion did not degenerate into intolerance and, once he came to know Pius VII and Consalvi, he was almost won by these two men. In the Vatican library Pius VII had some fine manuscripts, a charm that appealed to the scholarly minister of Prussia: it paid honor to this pope who gave the minister access to the hidden records of the past. The conversation between the two men passed gently to matters of the Church. Niebuhr listened to the desires of the aged pontiff and found them just, even moderate. . . . When the patient labors of Niebuhr had advanced the question sufficiently, Chancellor Hardenberg himself came to Rome to give himself the easy honor of reaping the fruit. The result was the bull De salute animarum (July 17, 1821).[33] This bull extended to the whole kingdom of Prussia; it adjusted the old Prussian provinces to the diocesan divisions. By this bull archbishoprics and bishoprics were given boundaries such as they still are.[34]

[32] Goyau, op. cit., I, 144.

[33] Barberi, op. cit., XV, 403.

The nomination of bishops was granted to the chapters on this condition, that the candidate should be of Prussian origin. The brief Quod de fidelium (July 16, 1821) explained that the fact that the candidate was German would suffice.[35]

With regard to the group of Protestant states that, by an ecclesiastical commission, was preparing at Frankfort a project of entente with Rome, they began by clashing sharply with Cardinal Consalvi.

The sovereigns who let their Febronian advisers whisper to them that a day would come when the pope, fallen from his primacy, would be brought back to his function of preacher, requested the Vatican to mark on a map the new ecclesiastical boundaries and then leave them in peace. The Pope refused to be simply a surveyor and to sacrifice implicitly his prerogative as spiritual head of the Church. However, such were the distress of souls and the anarchy of the clergy that, to put as promptly as possible a little order in this chaos, a provisional agreement was signed in 1821. Rome created four bishoprics and an archbishopric, and the governments promised endowments for these revived Churches. But scarcely had these outlines been traced, when the lay powers, eager to dismiss the Holy See, which they thought they no longer needed, drew forth from their files two documents, one called "The Instrument of Foundation," the other "The Pragmatic of the Church." The five ecclesiastics whom they thought of making bishops, were put under the necessity of adhering to these documents. Four of the five agreed to do so. But in these acts Febronius fully revived.[36]

Rome protested. Baden invoked the help of Austria. To avoid any misunderstanding, the Pope required explicitly the free-

[34] Goyau, op. cit., I, 145.

[35] Since 1841, in Prussia, the king was presented with a list of candidates from which he rejected the names that did not please him, with the condition that he leave on the list at least three names.

[36] Goyau, op. cit., I, 151.

dom of the episcopal jurisdiction in place of the lay dominance. The powers published this bull, declaring its acceptance but adding "that no one may deduce therefrom anything that can be contrary to their rights of sovereignty." The discussions continued without either Rome or the states being willing to withdraw any of their demands. Formidable conflicts were foreseen as likely to arise in the matter of interpreting the papal bull and the postscript which the sovereigns wished to have added. But the Catholics were armed; they would enter the strife, defending themselves with the arms furnished them by the pope; they would protest and would enter these protests in the diplomatic papers.

The concern felt by the common father of the faithful over the situation of the Catholics in the old nations of Europe could not make him unmindful of the young Church of America. In 1808 Pius VII created the province of Baltimore with four suffragan sees (New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Bardstown). But in these new lands where the growth of Catholicity gave bright prospects, two dangers had to be averted. Under the influence of a revolutionary spirit and undoubtedly also by the close proximity of the Protestants, lay boards, encouraged by a few thoughtless or turbulent priests, assumed the full administration of Church property and thereby virtually of the direction of the parishes. They even pretended to have the right to choose their pastors without the approval of the bishop and even contrary to his wishes. Pius VII's brief Non sine magno condemned these assumptions.[37] An equally serious danger appeared on the horizon: the strange interference in the affairs of the American Church, mainly in the nomination of the bishops. Archbishop Marechal of Baltimore obtained from the Supreme Pontiff a brief granting exclusively to the American bishops the right of presenting the names of candidates to the episcopal office. This decision, by freeing the American [37] Viscount de Meaux, L'Eglise et la liberté aux Etats-Unis, pp. 273–91.

Church from the unwarranted control which some European states attempted to exercise over it, resulted in a stronger attachment of the clergy of the United States to the See of Rome, and at the same time to their own country.[38]

The Papal States

So many delicate negotiations would have been impossible except for the prodigious activity of him whom his contemporaries called "the great cardinal." For a quarter of a century Cardinal Hercules Consalvi was a moral force that had to be reckoned with in Europe. Confronted with Bonaparte in 1801, with Metternich and Talleyrand in 1815, he had obtained these two notable victories: the French concordat and the restoration of the Papal States to the Holy See. But his solicitude neglected nothing that could concern religion in any part of the world.

External affairs did not absorb him completely. After his triumphs at Paris, London, and Vienna, he gave attention to the care of the internal administration of the states of the pope. His administrative and judiciary reforms deserve particular attention. We know that Napoleon introduced the French civil code at Rome. Many clauses of the old law of the ancient Roman regime were outworn, but the sudden introduction of a new legal code brought on numerous troubles. Consalvi knew how, according to the words of a historian, "to establish a just equilibrium between the old juridical institutions and the new code brought in by the French."[39] He repressed the boldness of the feudal barons, who were profiting by the reaction of 1815 to invoke privileges of another age and who accepted from the French law only the provisions that experience showed were useful. He ratified the sale of Church property, but he was watchful to have returned to their former destinations, by money compensations, the episcopal residences and the monasteries needed by the religious. Perhaps his masterpiece was that commercial code, which Guizot calls "a monument of wisdom." Nor did the eminent Secretary of State neglect the protection of the fine arts. In his veneration for the grandeur of Rome, he strove to embellish its monuments and repair its ruins. To him is owing the achievement of the celebrated promenade of the Pincio. At his request, the Pope created two new chairs of archaeology and of natural history at the Sapienza and called the learned Cardinal Angelo Mai to the Vatican library. He ordered some manuscripts that enriched the treasury of Rome's antiquities and, to the end of his life, he was the friend and protector of Canova.

[38] G. André, in Dictionnaire de théologie, I, 1057.

[39] Hergenröther, Kirchengeschichte, VIII, Part II, Bk. III, chap. 7.

Besides, Consalvi was the most obliging of friends, the most charming talker in informal conversations. But what most fittingly should be held about him, is that this prince of the Church, who merits a place among the foremost statesmen, in the calculations of a worldly policy or in the charms of worldly dealings never lowered the ideal of his ministry and the majesty of the Church he represented. Napoleon, a man who was a good judge of men and who had seen the cardinal yield to no one in the most complex political questions and in the observance of the nicest rules of court etiquette, said of him: "Consalvi has not the air of a priest, but he is really one of the most priestly men I have known."

Relying on this able and faithful adviser, Pius VII, in his advanced age, worked to promote, in the center of Christianity, that religious restoration which he had encouraged in the rest of the world.

After his great struggles with the Empire, the first of his cares was the reconstitution of the religious orders and their centralization in Rome. By his bull Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum (August 7, 1814) [40] he officially reconstituted the [40] Barberi, op. cit., XIII, 323–25.

Society of Jesus, which had already founded several communities in the Papal States, Sardinia, Naples, England, Switzerland, France, and America; and when in 1815 the Jesuits were driven out of Moscow and St. Petersburg, then in 1819 out of all Russia, he favored their establishment in Austria. Pius VII showed particular benevolence toward the Academy of the Catholic Religion founded in Rome (1800) by Archbishop Coppoli of Myra. He also reopened the English, Scotch, and Germanic seminaries, and reorganized the Propaganda. Several sovereigns paid visits to him at Rome: Emperor Francis I came in the spring of 1819, with a large and brilliant suite; King Frederick William III of Prussia came in 1822. Pius VII during his last years had the joy of seeing five new countries (Russia, Prussia, The Netherlands, Hanover, and Würtemberg) establish diplomatic representatives accredited to the Holy See. At the same time he was grieved to note the developments taken by the sect of the Carbonari and he condemned this society by a special bull (September 13, 1821).[41]

On July 7, 1823, the fourteenth anniversary of the day when he was suddenly snatched away from Rome, the Pope, already much enfeebled by age, suffered a fall which involved a fracture of the leg. The consequences of this fall seemed serious to the physicians in attendance on the Pope. In the evening of August 20 he expired while praying to God and uttering a few vague words, in which "Savona" and "Fontainebleau" could be made out. He was ninety-one years old and had reigned twenty-three years, five months, and six days. During this long pontificate, marked by a few outstanding joys and by inexpressible griefs, he had tried to heal the nations of the wounds inflicted on them by the antireligious Revolution; and almost everywhere, before his death, he had the consolation of seeing, in spite of the numerous efforts of the anti-Christian sects, some germs of Catholic restoration.

[41] Ibid., XV, 446.

CHAPTER XI

The Religious Movement

WHATEVER the importance of the political events we have just been considering, whatever the genius or holiness of the men who were the chief actors, neither the greatness of those events nor the value of those men could of themselves account for the movement of religious restoration that occurred after the Revolution. That movement had its principal source in a work of interior renovation which took place in the depth of souls and which we find expressed in the writers of the period.

The most eminent of these writers, Chateaubriand, said about his work, in the pompous tone customary with him: "Napoleon would not have been what he was if the Muse had not been there: reason carried out the ideas of the poet." In fact, the poet, like the lawmaker, "far from suddenly transforming public opinion, owed his very success to what that opinion had already more or less secretly changed." [1] We have already pointed out the main causes of the change. Chateaubriand himself, speaking of a different period, which bore a certain likeness to his own, wrote:

> When the dust rising from the wreck of so many monuments settled down, when death silenced the groans of so many victims, when the noise from the fall of the colossus ceased, then a cross was seen, and at the foot of this cross a new world. A few priests, carrying the Gospel and seated on these ruins, raised up society amid the tombs, as Jesus Christ brought back to life the children of those who believed in Him.[2]

[1] Lanson, Histoire de la littérature française, p. 883.

[2] Chateaubriand, Etudes historiques, at the end of the discourse on the fall of the Roman Empire.

These lines refer to the fall of the Roman Empire. The best informed masters of historical criticism, without using this glowing language, say the same thing.[3] Following the Revolution—Chateaubriand is still speaking—"how many families torn asunder had to seek from the common Father of men the children they had lost! How many broken hearts, how many solitary souls called upon a divine hand to cure them! The victims of our distresses were saved at the altar, as shipwrecked persons cling to the rock on which they hope for safety." [4] Poets, artists, and philosophers, from Chateaubriand to La Mennais, from Overbeck to Goerres, from Walter Scott to Pusey, became the more or less faithful echo of this awakening of religious faith which had its three chief centers in France, Germany, and England.

Chateaubriand

On the very day (April 18, 1802) when a solemn Te Deum was sung at Notre Dame in Paris to celebrate the conclusion of the concordat, the Moniteur published an article by Fontanes on the Génie du christianisme, which appeared four days before. The author was that young Viscount Chateaubriand whose name we have already met several times. When an émigré in England he had there published (1797) a curious work, the Essai sur les révolutions. According to his own declaration, its essential idea was that "nothing is new under the sun and that we find in ancient and modern revolutions the personages and the principal traits of the French Revolution." [5] In this work of his youth, a work of doubt rather than of real negation, some pages evidently inspired by the doctrines of the Encyclopedia were to be found beside pages that have a [3] Mommsen and Marquard, Manuel des institutions romaines, XII, 89; G. Boissier, La religion romaine, la fin du paganisme, preface of 1826.

[4] Chateaubriand, Génie du christianisme, preface of 1826.

[5] Preface of 1826 in Œovres de Chateaubriand (1853), XIII, 9.

thoroughly religious inspiration.[6] A year later the author of the Essai, upon learning of his mother's death, felt a sudden change take place in him. He wrote: "I wept, and I believed." "From the crisis brought on by this death," says Brunetière, "he emerged a changed man. The thought of his Génie du christianisme was born from the depth of his grief." The aim of this work was to show, contrary to what was taught by the Encyclopedia and by the Essai sur les mœurs, that > of all religions (and we might say: of all doctrines of morality) that ever existed, the Christian religion is the most poetic, the most human, the most favorable to liberty, to the arts and letters; that the modern world owes everything to it; that nothing is more divine, nothing more amiable and more stately than its dogmas, its doctrine, and its worship; that it favors genius, purifies taste, develops the virtuous passions, gives vigor to thought, offers noble forms to the writer and perfect models to the artist.[7]

The original edition, in five octavo volumes (4,000 copies), was exhausted in a few months. "This newcomer spoke a language with new breadth, harmony, and majesty. Imagine the eloquence of Rousseau, the coloring of Bervordin, the winning sweetness and laguid charms of Fenelon poured together." [8]

The literary quality of the Génie du christianisme was of the highest and its apologetic value was real. The latter has often been misjudged from a failure to consider its special point of view.

At the origin of the stream of unbelief that corrupted the last years of the old regime and vitiated the whole Revolution, we have noted two main sources: the ruinous irony of Voltaire and the sentimental utopia of Rousseau. The Génie du christianisme silenced Voltaire's laughter and turned Rousseau's sentimentalism toward the Catholic religion. By showing that Catholicism is something beautiful and that we should admire it, he prepared the way for those who would demonstrate that it is true and should be believed. Thus the new apologist simply applied the apologetic method used by Pascal: "To show that religion is venerable, to pay it respect; then to present it as something likeable; to make good men wish that it were true; and then to show that it is true." [9] Voltaire had expended much wit in his desire to show that the Sacred Books, even if not apocryphal or corrupted or deceitful, were immoral, absurd, and ridiculous. Chateaubriand, proudly comparing the Bible with the poems of Homer, showed in the Holy Scripture not only the loftiest moral teaching, the most sublime views on the origin of the world and its destinies, but also the noblest, simplest, and most varied and sublimest style that men ever heard.[10] Jean Jacques Rousseau had sung hymns to conscience and had grieved at seeing men accept "so many intermediaries between God and themselves." Chateaubriand set forth the greatness and beauty not only of God and Christ, but of the Church, her priesthood, her sacraments, and her ceremonies. In celebrating the ceremonies of Corpus Christi and the greatness of the sacraments of extreme unction and penance, he employed figures so beautiful and accents so touching, in a language so harmonious, that men's hearts were stirred by them.

[6] Chateaubriand later incorporated almost all these latter pages in the Génie du christianisme.

[7] Génie du christianisme (1854 ed.), p. 7.

[8] Victor Giraud, Pages choisies de Chateaubriand, p. 84.

In truth, anyone may rightly note what makes such an apologetic incomplete and, in certain regards, suspect: "a diffuse plan with no philosophy; a style often pompous; an abuse of antitheses and drawn-out contrasts; empty and high-sounding phrases; perpetual confusion of the marvelous with [9] Pascal, Pensées (3rd ed.), p. 414. People endlessly discussed "the religion of Chateaubriand." The true solution of all the difficulties is found in this declaration by himself: "My whole life has been tossed between doubt and faith." We must unhappily recognize that these alternatives presented themselves at the very moment when Chateaubriand was writing his Génie du christianisme, or at least that his faith was not then strong enough to inspire him with conduct conformable to his beliefs.

[10] Génie du christianisme, Part II, Bk. V.

the supernatural; gaps and sophisms."[11] Such defects, we must grant, contributed to the success of this book no less than did its qualities. Its influence was far greater than it deserved. The book was less the work of a man than the work of a situation. This dazzling charmer, who wished to lead the world back to the religion of the past, entered so well into the prejudices of the men of his time and so wonderfully grasped their aspirations, tastes, and attachments!

On the closing pages of the Génie du christianisme we read:

> To investigate the influence of Christianity on laws and governments, as we have done for morals and poetry, would be the subject of a fine work. We merely point out the way. . . . Montesquieu has well demonstrated that Christianity is, by its spirit and its admonitions, opposed to arbitrary power. . . . Do not some Christian republics exist that seem to be more attached to their religion than the monarchies are? . . . The representative system springs partly from ecclesiastical institutions. Of these the Church offers the first model in her councils. . . . Christianity is especially admirable for having converted "the physical man" into "the moral man." . . . The precepts of the Gospel form the real citizen.[12]

In an important page of his preface for a new edition of the Essai sur les révolutions, Chateaubriand returned to these ideas. "I will not become an unbeliever until someone proves to me that Christianity is incompatible with liberty. . . . For me Christianity bears two proofs of its heavenly origin: by its moral teaching, it tends to free us from the passions; by its political influence, it abolished slavery. It is, then, a religion of freedom; it is mine."

These lines gave a forecast of the whole political and social movement that would fill the first half of the nineteenth century; the ideas and fancies that would stir the thoughts of La Mennais and Saint-Simon are therein already vaguely sketched; and we are not surprised to read in the Mémoires d'outre-tombe: "Since the Génie du christianisme was not yet written, I would conceive it quite differently. . . . I would show that Christianity is the thought of the future and of human freedom . . . because it places, beside equality, the need of duty, the corrective and regulator of the democratic instinct." [13]

[11] Léon Gautier, Portraits littéraires, p. 5.

[12] Génie du christianisme, Part IV, Bk. VI, chaps. 10, 11.

Joseph de Maistre

In the field of religious restoration considered from the political and social point of view, Chateaubriand was not the only Catholic whose voice was raised. When the Génie du christianisme, in its final chapters, was outlining an apologetic based on the adaptation of the doctrines of Christianity to the constitutional and democratic aspirations of the time, two religious writers had viewed the problem from an altogether opposite angle. If we had wished to conform to the succession of the works rather than the succession of the influences, we would have spoken of Joseph de Maistre and Viscount Bonald before mentioning Chateaubriand.

Six years before the appearance of the Génie du christianisme in 1796, and almost simultaneously, Joseph de Maistre brought out at Lausanne his Considérations sur la France, and [13] Mémoires d'outre-tombe, II, 200. We know the strange fancy that Chateaubriand placed in the last book of his Mémoires d'outre-tombe: "If I had been tutor of the young prince (the future Henry V), I would have striven to win his confidence. When he should recover his crown, I would have advised him to wear it only with the idea of removing it at the proper time. A beautiful and illustrious day that would be when, after raising up religion, perfecting the constitution of the state, and enlarging the rights of the citizens . . . my pupil would say to the nation solemnly convoked: Frenchmen, your education is finished along with mine. . . . I step down from the throne while freeing you from your oaths to the monarchy. Compare this end with that which the decrepit sons of Henry IV would manifest, obstinately clinging to a throne submerged in the democracy." On Chateaubriand's democratic ideas, see Charles Maurras, Trois idées politiques: Chateaubriand, Michelet, Sainte-Beuve: anarchy, democracy, organized imperialism (1912). Cf. Jules Lemaitre, Chateaubriand, 1912.

Bonald published at Constance his Théorie du pouvoir civil et religieux. But these two works, written specially for the philosophers and the statesmen, exercised their influence rather slowly; Chateaubriand's work, literary and dramatic, combining all literary forms and tones and at the same time providing precepts and models, easily surpassed them. After a while, however, the philosophical works of the two thinkers won equal public recognition. "Chateaubriand was from Brittany, Joseph de Maistre from Savoy, Louis de Bonald from Auvergne. The different provinces of France (Savoy being then French in speech and spirit) seemed to contribute to the work of renovation. All three belonged to the nobility. The frivolous aristocrats of the eighteenth century had shaken off the Christian ideas. After Viscount Chateaubriand, came Count de Maistre and Viscount Bonald, like valiant knights, to fight for the old faith."[14] By their methods and by their doctrines, Joseph de Maistre and Louis de Bonald are sharply distinct from Chateaubriand.

The method of de Maistre, as Auguste Comte remarks,[15] was essentially a positive method. No one succeeded better in showing the practical and effective advantages of religious doctrines and institutions.[16] In his book of Considerations which appeared in 1796, as in that of The Pope (1819) and in the Soirées de Saint-Petersbourg (1821, after his death), his purpose was nothing less than to show in the truths of religion certain social truths, or, as he said, "laws of the world." On this point his style, given to paradox and exaggerations, seems to embody formulas which a sound orthodoxy, careful to defend the autonomy of the supernatural, could not admit. "Theological truths," he wrote, "are merely general truths, manifested and divinized in the religious order, in such a way that no one can attack one of them without attacking a law of the world." But what is this higher law of the world, to which everything is bound? It is chiefly that "man, as a being both moral and corrupted, must necessarily be governed." Hence, when the Revolution attempted to establish or regulate authority by popular vote, it produced a work "radically evil," "Satanic in its essence";[17] for "it is a truth as certain in its realm as a mathematical proposition, and no great institution results from a deliberation."[18] Even the infallibility of the Church is merely the application "of the right common to all possible sovereignties."[19]

[14] Léon Ollé-Laprune, La vitalité chrétienne, p. 13.
[15] Politique positive, Vol. IV, appendix.
[16] C. Calippe, L'attitude sociale des catholiques français au XIX^e siècle, I, 41.

Such are the maxims which Joseph de Maistre professed, affirmed, and proclaimed, "facing the prejudices, vexing the contrary passions, and shattering resistance: haughty, biting, merciless, sententious as Montesquieu and sarcastic as Voltaire."[20] But though we must acknowledge that not all the doctrines of the Savoy philosopher can be admitted unreservedly, two merits cannot be denied him: no one better than he showed the hollowness and danger of the utopias found in Rousseau and, on the other hand, no one better showed to the readers of Voltaire what human truth is contained in Christian dogmas, what social value in Catholicism; and, from these points of view, his apologetic, freed from its excesses of language and doctrine, combined with Chateaubriand's and happily completed it.

Louis de Bonald

Like Joseph de Maistre's theory and that of Chateaubriand, the doctrine of Louis de Bonald is not without exaggeration. In Bonald's case the exaggeration consists in greatly enlarging [17] Considérations sur la France, chaps. 4, 5.

[18] Ibid., chaps. 6, 7.
[19] J. de Maistre, Du pape, chap. 1.
[20] Ollé-Laprune, op. cit., p. 10.

the influence of tradition at the expense of reason. He was the initiator of that traditionalism which later on the Church had to condemn. But his first plan was good and opportune: to revive in men's minds, disturbed by revolutionary innovations, the idea of tradition. Bonald defends his doctrine with a remarkable sharpness of observation and force of logic. Unfortunately his observation is often too restricted and his logic too rigid. He says: "If man is everywhere born the same, the same political and religious constitution ought to be suitable for all societies." [21] But the constitution which tradition indicated to Bonald as the only possible one is monarchy. Hence he concludes: "Without monarchy, no constitution. A republic is essentially an unorganized state." [22] Moreover, man exists only for society, and society forms him only for itself.[23] Bonald had an absolute confidence in legislation to alter customs. What, then, is the remedy for the greatest corruption? Perfect laws.[24] Joseph de Maistre had never believed that the strife against individualism could authorize such maxims. "Every law," he said, "is useless and even harmful, however excellent it may be in itself, if the nation is not worthy of the law or made for the law."

But on one point Bonald deserves to be unreservedly approved. With untiring energy and persistence he proclaimed that in the social organization respect for morality ought to precede solicitude for riches; man before the machine. In his own words, "the duty of a government is to improve men morally as well as physically, rather than to improve machines." [25]

[21] Théorie du pouvoir, preface.

[22] Ibid., Part I, Bk. I, chaps. 3, 6, 10; Législation primitive, Part I, Bk. II, chap. 10.

[23] Théorie du pouvoir, Part III, chap. 3; Législation primitive, Part III, chap. 5. On these exaggerations of Bonald and his desire to place a monopoly of teaching in the hands of the Jesuits, see Longhaye, XIX^e siècle (1900), pp. 250–56.

[24] Législation primitive, preliminary discourse.

[25] Obsérvations sur la Révolution française, sect. 6.

In short, with less brilliance than Chateaubriand, with less sharpness than Joseph de Maistre, Bonald brought his tribute as a thinker to the work of religious restoration. Had he done nothing more than present the great idea of tradition and that of man's dignity, he would merit a place of honor among the French thinkers of the nineteenth century.

The Clergy

The three apologists we have been speaking of were laymen. The Church had not yet seen rise up from the ranks of her clergy a doctor, prepared by Providence, as in times of crisis she always found on her path; and men looked for him who, such as an Athanasius before Arius, a St. Augustine before Pelagius, or a Cajetan before Luther, would demolish the revolutionary idol before the followers of Voltaire and Rousseau.

Since the Revolution holy priests had expended treasures of zeal and knowledge in strengthening the faithful and withstanding the enemies of religion. Several former members of the Society of Jesus, under the provisional name of Fathers of the Faith and Fathers of the Sacred Heart, had preached missions and founded colleges.[26] The history of the Church ought to commemorate the names of these brave apostles: Fathers de Clorivière, Varin, Tournely, Delpuits. This last named on February 2, 1801 (feast of the Purification) in his lowly room as a religious, with six students of law and of medicine, reconstituted a pious association, founded formerly in 1760 under the patronage of the Blessed Virgin. Lacordaire, speaking of Father Delpuits, said: "Others have acquired more glory in their relations with the youth of France, but none has greater claim to such glory." The society restored by the holy religious was none other than that celebrated Congregation which a hateful legend called a permanent conspiracy but which in fact was especially an association of pure and genuine piety, a center of charitable works. Future priests, such as Paul Teysseyrre, future bishops, such as Charles de Forbin-Janson, future teachers of science, such as René Laennec and Augustin Cauchy, were there trained in solid devotion and apostolic zeal.[27] The Society of the Missionaries of France, founded at Lyons in 1808 by Father Rauzan, had preached the gospel in cities and country districts.[28] At the beginning of the century, in a chapel of the church of St. Sulpice, Frayssinous taught youth the fundamentals and first truths of the faith.[29] La Luzerne and Combalot [30] had stirred the people with their preaching. Archbishop Aviau of Bordeaux [31] and Bishop de Miollis of Digne gave a most edifying example of virtue. The Sulpician, Father Boyer, reanimated the zeal of the clergy by his pastoral retreats, preached in all the dioceses of France. The priests of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, known as Picpus Fathers, founded by Father Condrin in 1801 at Poitiers,[32] and the Basilians, instituted at Annonay in 1801 by a country pastor, Father Lapierre, devoted themselves to the education of youth. The Brothers of the Christian Schools, incorporated in the University by a decree of November 17, 1808, exercised the apostolate with a devotedness worthy of their founder.[33] On August 5, 1804, Father Liautard, while still a deacon, inaugurated in Paris the establishment destined to render notable service to Christian youth under the name of [27] See Geoffroy de Grandmaison, La Congrégation. The chief works founded by the Congregation or revived by it were the Société des bonnes études, the Refuge des jeunes condamnés, the Association de Saint-Joseph, the Société des bonnes œuvres, the Bibliothèque catholique, the Association pour la défense de la religion.

[26] We know that Alphonse de Lamartine was a student under the Fathers of the Faith at Belley.

[28] Delaporte, Vie de H. Rauzan.

[29] A. Nettement, Histoire de la littérature sous la Restauration, pp. 155–70.

[30] A. Ricard, Le P. Combalot.

[31] Lyonnet, Vie de Mgr d'Aviau.

[32] Perron, Vie du P. Condrin.

[33] Guibert, Histoire de saint Jean-Baptiste de La Salle, p. 646.

Stanislas College.[34] Soon after the concordat, a holy priest of Marseilles, Father Allemand, founded in his native city a fine work for youth, which would serve as a model for all similar undertakings.[35] La Trappe and the Chartreuse, reconstituted in 1815 and 1816, opened new retreats for souls drawn to a life of solitude.[36] However, the ruins accumulated by the Revolution were so extensive that the work to be done appeared still a vast undertaking.

From 1800 to 1815 the number of priests was so reduced that only the cities could be cared for; the country districts had to be left unattended. Father Rohrbacher relates that, after his ordination, he was assigned seven parishes to be served by himself alone. During Father Muard's boyhood, in his district only one catechism was available for six parishes. Under the restoration, Bishop Frayssinous stated in 1820 that, "in the Most Christian Kingdom 15,000 places remained vacant owing to lack of priests to fill them." [37]

The Voltarian spirit was still dominant in the intellectual circles and in the official world, even under the restoration. In many souls Chateaubriand's influence stopped with a vague religiosity, and the works of Bonald and Joseph de Maistre, which were too philosophical, appeared to some as pleadings excessively dominated by a political thought. The generation that had reached maturity was not cured of the rationalist

[34] Liautard, Mémoires, I, 51.

[35] Gaduel, Vie et esprit de M. Allemand, p. 121.

[36] An enumeration of all the congregations founded in France after the concordat would be useless. The list of the principal ones will be found in Baunard's Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, p. 277. Let us note the Petits Frères de Marie (Marists), instituted by a priest of Lyons, Father Champagnat; the Enfants de Marie Immaculée, better known as Fathers of Chavagnes and the Sisters of Chavagnes, founded by Father Baudouin in the Vendée; the Frères de la société de Marie (Marianists), founded at Bordeaux by canon Chaminade; the Fathers of the Sacred Heart, established at Lyons in 1822 by Father Frechard, a former Benedictine; the Frères de l'instruction chrétienne, known also as Frères de Ploërruel, founded in 1819 by Father Jean de La Mennais; and we note especially the progress of the illustrious institute of Madames of the Sacred Heart, begun in 1800 at Paris by Madame Barat.

[37] Baunard, Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, p. 134.

poison, and the tyranny of human respect exercised its sway over the youth. Montalembert wrote:

I can adduce the recollection of all those who, like me, were then ending their education. At that time among us how many were Christian youth, even in the most famous colleges? Scarcely one out of twenty. If we went into a church and there met one of those college students, one of those men who today fill our temples, the meeting produced almost as much surprise and curiosity as the visit of a Christian traveler in a mosque of the Orient.

La Mennais

Such was the state of men's minds when in 1817 a book appeared with the modest title, Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion by Father de La Mennais. The name of this priest was promptly hailed as that of the doctor for whom the Church was waiting.

A hundred and fourteen years had passed over the tomb of Bossuet, a hundred and three years over that of Fenelon, seventy-six over that of Massillon. . . . After death had silenced those eloquent lips, the Church of France still had distinguished scholars, controversialists, and preachers: no longer did it have names that go far in posterity; and after that time no priest won in France the renown of a writer and lofty personality, when La Mennais appeared, the more timely as the eighteenth century had recently again taken up arms. His book was a remarkable resurrection of the old and eternal reasonings that prove to men the necessity of the faith. . . . It was received with unrestrained enthusiasm and acclaim. In one day La Mennais found himself invested with the might of Bossuet.[38]

These lines are no exaggeration. Father Teysseyrre, when announcing to a friend the proximate appearance of the Essai [38] Lacordaire, Considération sur le système philosophique de M. de La Mennais, chap. 1. The author of L'essai sur l'indifférence did not sign himself Lammenais until 1833.

sur l'indifférence, wrote: "You are going to see a work that unites the style of Jean Jacques Rousseau, the reasoning of Pascal, and the eloquence of Bossuet." [39] When the book came out, Frayssinous declared: "This man has an eloquence fit to raise the dead."

The priest who stirred such enthusiasm was a Breton, as was Chateaubriand, but in his political and religious tendencies he was closer to Joseph de Maistre and Bonald. Reaching to the heart of the question closer than was done by the author of the Génie du christianisme, who pointed out particularly the political and moral fitness of the faith, and more penetrating than the author of Le pape and the Législation primitive, who rather endeavored to discern the social fitness of the faith, the author of the Essai invited his readers merely to seek the truth. For, he said, "the most ailing age is not the one that has a passion for error, but the one that neglects and despises the truth." The first part of the Essai was devoted to opposing the various forms of indifference: indifference of the statesmen, who merely sought a belief useful to the people; indifference of the eighteenth-century philosophers, who systematically stopped at a so-called natural religion; indifference of the Protestants, who left to each individual the right to make up his own belief. All these forces, he said, end in atheism, because "every religious system based on the exclusion of authority carries atheism in its bosom, and sooner or later will give it birth." [40] The attitude of those who are satisfied with looking only to the social usefulness of religion was an attitude that aroused his indignation especially. He exclaimed: "Can what is greatest and noblest in man be the product of error? . . . Philosophers have less to say about the dignity of man, or else respect it more." The second part was devoted to showing the importance of religion to those who are indifferent through heedlessness or [39] Paguelle de Follenay, M. Teysseyrre, chap. 4.

[40] Essai, chap. 6.

sloth. This second part contained deeply touching passages, with an undying eloquence. In conclusion the author announces that, after destroying one of the foundations of dogmatic indifference, he would prove in the succeeding pages of his work "that a true religion exists, and that for all men it is the unique way of salvation." But first "it is incumbent on us to seek how, in our present condition, we arrive at a certain knowledge of the truth."

This second question, the subject of the second volume (1820),[41] came to be the author's stumbling-block over which he came to grief. The new apologist was ill prepared to take up this difficult question of the foundations of certitude. Felicité de La Mennais, of an impressionable and sickly nature,[42] brought up in the melancholy little town of Saint-Malo, amid the storms of the Revolution, left almost to himself in planning his studies, at first lost his faith after reading the works of the eighteenth-century philosophers, especially of Rousseau. Various circumstances, chief of which we must consider the example of his holy brother Jean-Marie (ordained priest in 1801), led him to the belief and practice of religion. He thought he ought to go farther and follow his brother in the priesthood. From 1809 to 1816, without passing through the regime of the seminary, he received holy orders, in the midst of strange alternatives of thrilling enthusiasm and heart-rending anguish.[43] In 1808, while still a layman, he published, in collaboration with his brother, an anonymous work, Réflexions sur l'Eglise de France, a veritable program of almost universal ecclesiastical reform, a work which Fouché, the prefect of police, was eager to suppress. In 1814 appeared a second writing, like-

[41] The third volume appeared in 1823.

[42] On La Mennais' excessive impressionability and his sickly state, see Boutard, La Mennais, I, 6, 37; Spuller, La Mennais, p. 41.

[43] Three months after his ordination to the priesthood (June 25, 1816), he wrote: "All that remains for me to do is to arrange myself as well as I can and, if possible, go to sleep at the foot of the stake to which I have been chained."

wise with his brother's collaboration and also anonymous, the Tradition de l'Eglise sur l'institution des évêques, an eloquent defense of "the full and entire authority of the Roman Pontiff" against the pretentions of Gallicanism.

In these two works, as in various articles that La Mennais contributed to the royalist papers, the Defenseur, the Conservateur, and the Drapeau blanc, readers admired the splendid figures, a rigorous dialectic, and an impetuous style that recalled the manner of Jean Jacques Rousseau. The author of Emile seemed to have communicated his emotional power to his former disciple, now his terrible adversary. But La Mennais, undoubtedly unconscious of the fact, took from Rousseau more than his fiery eloquence; and the second volume of the Essai sur l'indifférence would reveal the apologist's fundamental mistake, which was the source of all the errors into which he afterwards fell.

We know that the author of the Social Contract regarded the will of the people as the origin or at least the manifestation of all right. The author of the Essai was far from accepting such a doctrine; it is likewise true that the theory on which he based all certitude closely resembled that of Rousseau. For him the foundation of all truth cannot be the individual reason, but only the universal judgment of mankind. Though he did not say, as he later on said, that the peoples' consent produces all justice, he taught that this consent promulgates all truth. This theory would soon be condemned by Pope Gregory XVI as a "fallacious doctrine," and some of La Mennais' disciples were alarmed at seeing him maintain, "under the vague term of human race a primitive Church, prior and superior to the Jewish Church and the Christian Church." [44] Yet the error did not appear final. For, on the other hand, the author of the Tradition de l'Eglise had affirmed his belief "in a full and entire authority of the Roman Pontiff, without any limits but those it imposed on itself." [45] In case of conflict between these two rules of certitude enunciated by the new apologist (the consent of the people and the decision of the supreme head of the Church), on which side would he take his stand? The Church of France had just placed its confidence in this priest. Would he follow the path of obedience, where his Catholic and Roman faith was leading him, or would he follow the way of revolutionary spirit, a way toward which he seemed to be inclined by his restless temperament and certain hidden influences?

[44] Rohrbacher, Histoire universelle de l'Eglise, I, xlv.

The problem was complicated by another one, of a more general sort. Lamartine and Vigny had published their first works. The new literary school, regarding Chateaubriand as its father, had taken the name of romantic school; and its young leader would define romanticism as "liberalism in literature." Romanticism set out to shake off the yoke of pagan mythology and to demolish the artificial rules of the past century. But even that concealed a sharp dualism. Would the new literary school, with a more sincere, living, and Christian accent, revive the faith in souls, or, by a predominance of sentiment over reason, of fancy over order, reform and corrupt the old beliefs from which it purposed drawing its inspirations?

Germany

The same question, on a slightly different ground, arose in Germany. We should recognize that romanticism, so far as it was a revival of the medieval artistic forms and spirit, was born beyond the Rhine.[46] There it was first manifested in the fine arts. A distinguished critic relates its birth thus:

German classicism had become fixed more and more in a mechanical art. . . . At Eastertime, 1793, Vackenroder and Tieck undertook a [45] Tradition de l'Eglise, p. xxv.

[46] It entered France by the channed of the émigrés, and especially by the pen of Madame de Staël.

journey of discovery across Germany. They strayed into the churches and cemeteries, meditated near the tombs of Albert Dürer and Peter Fischer. . . . The Epanchements de cœur d'un moine ami des arts, which Vackenroder published in 1797, soon became the breviary of many young artists. Yet the best artists of Germany did not draw their inspiration from the national source; the new pilgrims set out for Rome, Nach Rom; in Christian Rome, the Rome of the catacombs and the cloisters, was the place where they sought inner counsel and pious inspirations. In 1810, in the abandoned halls of the monastery of San Isidoro on Mount Pincio four young men, excluded from the Vienna Academy for the crime of heresy, founded an association. These were Frederick Overbeck, Franz Pforr, Louis Vogel, and Hettinger. About their meetings for conversation and work others soon gathered, the greatest being Peter Cornelius. The life of these young men, marked by monastic seriousness and regularity, was divided between visits to the basilicas and other churches and personal studies. But their hearts were especially penetrated with emotion when, in the course of a journey through Tuscany, they learned to know Duccio of Siena, Fra Angelico of Fiesole, and Benozzo Gozzoli. In the frankness of their enthusiasm they thought that they had found their true teachers, though scarcely yet able to understand the lessons. By way of derision, their comrades called them "Nazarenes." [47]

The surge of patriotism which took place in Germany during the first years of the last century, on the occasion of the French victories, accentuated the movement of men's minds toward the Middle Ages, where the German fatherland found its origins. Goerres in 1810 wrote: "The German people has succumbed because it has forgotten its character, its purpose, its history, because it has forgotten itself." [48] These lines were a sort of program which Goerres and his friends brought to reality. The year of Austerlitz was the time when Germany, with Arnim [47] André Michel, in the Histoire générale, IX, 349. On the fraternity founded by Overbeck, cf. G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, I, 228–30. With the exception of Cornelius, the members of the group belonged by birth to the Protestant religion.

[48] Goerres, Politische Schriften, I, 117–32.

and Brentano for teachers, again learned to sing as it had done in the Middle Ages. The year of Jena, at the very time that saw the closing of the tomb of the Holy Empire, was the year when historic and literary romanticism, in refuge at Heidelberg, attempted to reopen the tomb of the old German people."[49]

This complexity of the origins of German romanticism was reflected in its character. In the presence of the rich and pure emotions offered by the religion of the Middle Ages, these artists and poets, who at first had been moved by a simply archaeological and aesthetic curiosity, felt themselves brought to disdain the cold religion of Luther and to love that of Rome. Tieck, in Franz Sternbold, reproached Protestantism with having produced an empty intellectualism; Novalis proclaimed the praise of Christianity, published the Hymns to the Virgin, and lauded the Jesuits.[50] On the other hand, German patriotism, by exalting itself, again found its old bitterness against the Latin genius. The intense aesthetic life of the young German romanticists, not yet free enough from the influence of Goethe and his "cult of self," often developed into a strange individualism. In Tieck's Sternbold and in Novalis' Henri d'Ofterdingen fancy overflowed into an anarchy that seemed to be the contrary of Catholicism. In a word, in the romantic singing of Germany the Los von Rom[51] resounded at the same time as the Nach Rom.[52]

In short, the movement toward Rome carried the day. In 1813 Overbeck was converted to the Catholic religion in the hands of the future Cardinal Ostini.

He still had fifty-three years to live. Except for two short spells in Germany, he passed those years in Rome. This humble and modest man, who reminded his visitors of the most emaciated figures of the Siena artists, and who seemed to step down out of an old picture of

[49] Goyau, op. cit., p. 249.
[50] Ibid., pp. 207, 208, 211.
[51] "Let us withdraw from Rome."
[52] "Let us go to Rome."

holiness, opened a baptistery at Rome, while he was also the head of a school. . . . The painters and sculptors that came down from Germany to the Eternal City felt their eyes open. Rome revealed to them, as Chateaubriand had revealed it to the French, that in Catholicism lay hidden, for the creation of art, a "genius." For nearly thirty years in the German colony at Rome, conversion to Catholicism was a sort of contagious phenomenon. The list of these neophytes would be endless. Before Overbeck, in 1807 we have the Riepenhausen brothers, talented engravers; in 1811 the painter Frederick Cramer. In 1813, at the same time as Overbeck, we have Vogel, director of the Dresden Academy, the painter Louis Schnorr of Carolsfeld, and the archaeologist Platner. After Overbeck, in 1814, came the two Schadows (William, painter and future director of the Dusseldorf Academy, and Rodolph the sculptor); they bade farewell to Luther at the very hour when their father Gottfried, also a sculptor, was finishing in Germany a monument of the reformer. Still in 1814 we have the painter Klinkowstrom, who returned from Rome to Vienna and there joined the Catholic Church at the feet of Father Hofbauer, with Frederick Schlegel as his godfather.[53]

Frederick von Schlegel, in the world of historians and philosophers, had already exercised an influence similar to that of Overbeck in the world of artists. Born in 1772 in the city of Hanover, he showed at an early age such an enthusiasm for Hellenism that Schiller bantered him on it. The Greek city, the Greek drama, the Greek temple, had at first been his absolute deal of the beautiful. In 1800, as professor at the Jena University, he delivered lectures on the religion of art before a brilliant audience. Schelling and Hegel, who were among his hearers, reported them to the learned world. Like so many others he was attracted by the romantic movement and eagerly studied the history and literature of the Middle Ages. A purer ideal of beauty, morality, and holiness was revealed to that ardent soul, no less earnest for moral purification than for aesthetic contemplation. In 1805 he abjured Protestantism at [53] Goyau, op. cit., pp. 229–33.

Cologne and thereafter, in the intellectual circles, became a most zealous apostle of the Catholic religion. His Geschichte der alten und neuen Literatur, his Ideas on Christian Art, and especially his Philosophy of History are the monuments of his learning and of his pure Catholicism.

At the side of Schlegel we see Count Frederick Leopold von Stolberg, remarkably well prepared for a work of apologetics. By his knowledge of antiquity which Schiller and Goethe might envy, he placed the ancient world at the foot of the cross by the publication of the first fifteen volumes of his Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi, which appeared from 1807 to 1819. Says Kraus: "This book opens a new era; from this cradle German theology took to its wings." [54] At the same time the tender piety of this noble Christian appeared in his Büchlein von der Liebe, a work of his last days.

Other apologists deserve mention along with these two outstanding men: the priest Sailer, whose many works of Christian instruction and piety rendered in Germany the same service as the writings of St. Francis de Sales did in France; Zacharias Werner, that ardent preacher, that combination of Augustine and Savonarola, who in 1815, while preaching at Vienna before the representatives of European diplomacy, recalled, as he struck his breast, the time when, still an unbeliever, he rendered homage to Rousseau; Adam Müller and Charles von Haller, both of them students of government and sociologists after the manner of Bonald and Joseph de Maistre, but more careful to defend the rights of individuals against absolutism; lastly, that humble teacher of youth, Bernard Overberg, son of a simple peddler, who "for half a century would plant the seeds of Christianity in all the fields of Westphalia and there bring them to fruition." [55]

But the man whose activity and renown dominated the whole

[54] Kraus, Histoire de l'Eglise (French trans.), III, 414.
[55] Ibid., p. 260.

history of Catholic Germany during this period was Joseph Goerres. Coming from pure Jacobinism to pure Catholicism, taking part in all the political and social events of his time, Joseph Goerres, a universal genius like Leibnitz, pursued his investigations into all the branches of human knowledge and everywhere shed such brilliant light that Catholic German scholarship still regards him as its initiator and guide. Goerres' writings form, as it were, the philosophy of all the social and literary events that unfolded under the Revolution, the Empire, and the Restoration.

In 1799 his enthusiasm for the Revolution fell suddenly. He went to ask the first consul, Bonaparte, to regulate the liberty of Germany; he failed. So, he said to himself, the French Revolution has not conquered the peoples in order to liberate them. And he exclaimed: "Study Suetonius, for the new Augustus has appeared." Goerres thereupon renounced all political action. Passionately he studied letters and sciences. Henceforth from intellectual culture he sought Germany's regeneration, which the French Revolution was unable to give it. His Teutschen Volksbücher, published in 1806, put the people in contact with the ancient national literature of Germany; his Mythengeschichte der Asiatischen Welt (1810) won him a place of considerable authority among scholars; the Rheinische Merkur, which he founded in 1814, spread his ideas of intellectual renovation everywhere. His Coblenz house became, as it were, a place of pilgrimage where thousands of patriots came to see and consult the great agitator. Napoleon called him "the fifth of the powers confederated against me."

After the fall of the Emperor, Goerres momentarily hoped to see triumph a policy animated by a feeling of respect of peoples and kings. Before long he had the sadness of noting that the decisions of the Congress of Vienna were dictated only by combinations of greed. He protested with his powerful voice. In his book, Teutschland und die Revolution, given to the public in 1819, he showed to the princes, with history in hand, that a restoration without God and without the Church would bring them to fresh revolutions. The hatreds that he stirred up obliged him to leave his country. In refuge at Strasbourg, he engaged more and more in religious studies. By his review, Der Katholik, and by his book on St. Francis, he prefaced the deep study that he would devote to Henry Suso, and to his great work, Die Christliche Mystik. Before his death in 1847, he said: "The revolution cannot long delay. . . . We are now at the end. . . . Pray for the peoples, who no longer count for anything."

With Goerres the romantic movement of Germany entered a new phase. More than Schlegel, Müller, and Haller, this great man sought in the Middle Ages for something besides aesthetic themes. As remarked by the historian of Catholic Germany of the nineteenth century, he had asked of the Middle Ages "lessons in political architecture, maxims of Christian social life, norms for a Christian economic order. . . . For these reasons, when later a popular opinion would have the right to exist, it will not condemn Schlegel, Müller, and Haller as accomplices of the vanquished bureaucracies; as for Goerres, it will honor him as a precursor of the victory." [56]

Unhappily this Catholic current was not the only one that took place. From the study of the Middle Ages, interpreted in the pretended light of a false mysticism and an erroneous philosophy, another current of studies arose, which resulted in ruining the faith in many souls.

Along with Novalis singing lieder in honor of the Virgin Mary and with Tieck depicting in Genovefa the ardent faith of chivalry, Amadeus Hoffman made alive again in Bruder Medardus the terrors which the devil inspired in the Germans of a former age; others devoted themselves to the study of sorcery; in such a coterie of students, they now talked of nothing but somnambulists, clairvoyants, dreams, and presentiments. Those days were the time when Schelling's philosophy, teaching that the dividing line between the conscious and the unconscious cannot be determined, spread in the university circles. The young archaeologists hurled themselves eagerly on this philosophy to find there the synthesis of their historical observations. Said one of them:

[56] Goyau, op. cit., p. 391.

> We read Schelling, who has a talent to influence young minds and easily becomes their tutor. He became our hero. . . . Later the mystical fog of that philosophy disappeared under the rays of the rising sun of Schleiermacher. . . . With Schleiermacher, God was restored, but only by losing His personality; quite the same as Christ, to be placed on His throne again, had to renounce any kind of supernatural prerogative.[57]

The writer of these lines was David Frederick Strauss. At that time he was engaged in the study of the famous Commentar über das N. T.[58] by Henry Paulus. Paulus, a disciple of Spinoza and Kant, with a view of ridding the figure and work of Christ from everything supernatural, had tried to provide a natural explanation of each miracle. "But," wrote Strauss, "the reasonings of Paulus appear to me inadmissible. I cannot grant him the right to remove their miraculous character from events while preserving their historical character. A miracle is not a superficial envelope that we can remove superficially. It can be removed only by taking away with it a bit of history." [59] But "thus to take away the whole history" of Christ is to destroy all religion. A deep study of Hegel extricated the exegete from his embarrassment. There he learned that "the Christian religion and philosophy have the same content: the former under the form of the image, the latter under the form of the idea." [60] The principle of the solution had been [57] Strauss, Essai d'histoire religieuse (French trans.), pp. 225, 248.

[58] This work came out between 1800 and 1804.

[59] Ibid., p. 69.

[60] Commentar über das N. T.

found. To safeguard Christianity, he would simply have to admit that the accounts of miraculous happenings are figures symbolizing the faith. In 1803 the learned Christian philologist Heyne had enunciated the following principle: "From myth all history and all the philosophy of the ancients derive their source." Creuzer interpreted paganism as a religious symbolism, under which was hidden an older and purer faith. Wolf, enlarging the theory, applied it to the poems of Homer. Strauss set to work and wrote the book which, published in 1836, made his name famous: Leben Jesus. It was not destined to be a durable work; but, though not yet ruined by criticism, it did accomplish in many minds the work of destruction begun by Paulus, who had denied the supernatural in the Gospel narrative. Strauss denied even its authenticity;[61] and the religion that it pretended to erect on these ruins was but a vague Christianity, without rational consistency and without historic support.

England

The study of the Middle Ages had in like manner in England been the starting point of a religious movement. The historian of La Renaissance catholique en Angleterre credits the novels of Walter Scott with an influence comparable to that of the writings of Chateaubriand in France and of Goerres in Germany.[62] The fine example given by the French émigré priests prepared England to relish the history of the Catholic heroes. From 1814 to 1824, a period when the masterpieces of the great novelist appeared, the English became exceedingly [61] On the history of the rationalist exegesis in Germany at the beginning of the nineteenth century, see Vigouroux, Les Livres Saints et la critique rationaliste, II, 436–50.

[62] Paul Thureau-Dangin, La Renaissance catholique en Angleterre, 1899, Vol. I, chap. 2. Newman and Pusey speak of the influence of Walter Scott. Cf. Life of Pusey, I, 254.

fond of those gallant knights and crusaders who prayed to the Virgin Mary, marched behind the banners of their patron saints, confessed their sins to a priest, and obeyed the pope. The Catholics described by Newman at the beginning of the century, "found in corners and alleys and cellars," trembling like a timid flock overawed "by the high Protestants, the lords of the earth," [63] now felt less weighed down by the atmosphere of contempt which formerly surrounded them. They raised their heads. Even the Anglican Church was penetrated by a gentler and more flexible spirit. The same Newman relates the deep impression made on him, in the fall of 1816, by the reading of a Church History by Joseph Bilners, an Anglican theologian of the evangelical school, in which were to be found long passages from the Fathers, and some time later, by a sermon of Doctor Hawkins, renowned Oxford preacher, on the doctrine of tradition. The preacher declared that the sacred text was never intended to teach doctrine and that, if we wish to learn the doctrine, we must have recourse to the formularities of the Church, such as the catechism and the creeds.[64]

We must not suppose, however, that this tendency led solely to Catholicism. The writers who, after Walter Scott, enjoyed public favor (Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey), those poets of quiet solitudes and peaceful woods, those Lake poets, as they were called, often turned the religious sentiment in the direction of unsubstantial dreaminess or depressing melancholy. Newman remarks that ridicule and contempt were still systematically directed against the Catholics; [65] even those who were introducing Catholic ceremonial into Anglican worship kept their prejudices against the Roman Church. You might say that in certain minds the evolution which was leading them toward Catholicism by giving them a closer view of it, by that same fact re-awakened the old antipathies and that the more conversion became logically necessary, the more they stiffened themselves against it.[66]

[63] The Second Spring, § 12; preached at Oscott, July 13, 1852.
[64] Newman, History of My Religious Opinions.
[65] Newman, op. cit.

[66] See Thureau-Dangin, op. cit.

CHAPTER XII

The Foreign Missions

As we have seen, Europe was not the only part of the world to suffer from the revolutionary distress. From one point of view the disaster that nearly everywhere afflicted the foreign missions seemed deeper and harder to repair. Already under the old regime the regrettable disputes that arose between certain religious orders had considerably disturbed their apostolic works. In 1772 the suppression of the Society of Jesus, which furnished the entire mission field 16,000 subjects, was a most baleful blow to them. The infiltration of rationalist philosophy had spread in Europe, even in Christian circles, a practical indifference that amounted to a diminution of zeal and had dried up the source of apostolic vocations.[1] Lastly, the spoliation of the clergy's possessions by the Revolution considerably lessened the resources of the missions; and, if we except the United States and Canada, where particular circumstances favored the activity of the émigré priests, everywhere else their poverty and isolation and the lack of organization and resources paralyzed their good will. In one place Christian centers succumbed under the blow of violent persecutions; in another place, deprived of priests and public worship, they slowly dissolved.

But in the first years of the Restoration three chief facts reanimated the work that seemed to be dying and to give it a new impulse. These three were: in 1814 the restoration of the Society of Jesus; in 1815 the reconstitution of the Society of the Foreign Missions; from 1815 to 1822 the founding and organization of the work of the Propagation of the Faith. Thanks to these three events, the undertaking of the missions again found workers and resources. The Church, without ceasing its strife against the disciples of Voltaire, Rousseau, Kant, and Hegel, again came into contact with the naturalist cults of China, India, and the savage tribes of America, with the metaphysical cults of the Brahman philosophers and educated Buddhists, and with the moral and social culture of Islam;[2] in civilized lands it combatted all the forms of learned unbelief, and in uncivilized countries all degrees of spontaneous superstition.

[1] Father Bucker, in Etudes of February 20, 1899, p. 551, notes that the number of missioners in 1789 probably did not exceed 300.

Interest in the Foreign Missions

Although the notable mission movement was not resumed until after the fall of the Empire, anyone would be mistaken if he were to attribute to the Emperor a systematic hostility to these religious undertakings.[3] Napoleon at an early hour understood that colonial expansion would be the principal aim of the governments in the nineteenth century, and he perfectly discerned the help which the Catholic missions would be able to supply to the development of the French colonial empire and to the revival of French prestige abroad. Thus at the peace of Amiens (1802) we see him imperiously demanding the restitution of all the colonial conquests of the French Revolution and, as soon as the peace was signed, work with feverish eagerness at reconstituting the French colonial hegemony.[4] At the same time he asked Portalis for a report on the Catholic missions.

[2] We know that the historians make a distinction between: 1. the naturalist religions; 2. the metaphysical religions; 3. the religions more specially moral and social. Cf. Carra de Vaux, "Les religions non chretiennes," in Un siècle (1900), pp. 694–729.

[3] See Baunard, Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, p. 424.

[4] Alfred Rambaud, La France coloniale (1895), p. 33.

This report, dated November 7, 1802, proposes to the first consul that he sustain and encourage the French missioners, chiefly the Vincentians and the priests of the Foreign Missions. The following reasons are adduced: 1. the Catholic missions promote the welfare of humanity, and France will be honored by contributing "to the common interest of all nations and all mankind"; 2. the Catholic missions are one of the most effective means of serving the interests and glory of the French nation; 3. France should not let herself be outstripped by England, which has grasped the usefulness of the missions in conquered countries and favors them with all her might.[5]

Public opinion showed itself favorable to the missioners. The eloquent pages that Chateaubriand devoted to them in the Génie du christianisme had produced a deep impression everywhere. Pius VII was disposed to encourage the work wholeheartedly. One of his conspicuous concerns had been the reconstitution of the College of Propaganda, founded in 1622 by Gregory XV. The establishment had been sacked in 1798, but a senate decree (April 2, 1808), which united the States of the Church to the French Empire, declared that the debts of Propaganda would become debts of the Empire and that the property and income of the establishment would be administered by a commission, in which the Marquis de Fortia was a member. This marquis, by his prudence and zeal, seconded Pius VII in his views for the re-establishment of the college. Gradually new students were able to be received there; the chapel, which had become a storehouse, was restored to the use of worship, and the institution of the Propaganda soon was in a position to continue the mission assigned to it by Gregory XV: this mission was to give to the apostolate of distant nations both resources and subjects.

Unfortunately the great wars of the Empire hindered the projects as they did so many others. This fact was the more regrettable since the Protestant nations, Holland and especially England, continued to favor their missioners. The Bible Society, founded in London in 1780, with its revenue increased in fifty years from 5,000 pounds to 200,000, was a mighty auxiliary of the Protestant missioners. According to official statistics, in one year the Bible Society, sixty years after its foundation, distributed nearly 1,700,000 Bibles besides religious tracts and in every way sustained the preachers of the Reformation.[6]

[5] Launay, Histoire de la Société des Missions étrangères, II, 356–59.

Thus we are not surprised that, with peace restored to Europe, the missions aroused considerable enthusiasm.

New Apostolic Workers

In the bull Sollicitudo (August 7, 1814), which re-established the Society of Jesus, Pius VII exhorted "all the superiors, all the provincials, all the rectors, and all the members of the re-established Society to show themselves faithful imitators of their father." In this connection a historian of the Jesuits writes: "The Society of Jesus did not abdicate its genius of evangelical conquests; it did not give up its inheritance of martyrdom and of the promotion of civilization which its predecessors bequeathed to it. Its memories of past times, the wishes of the peoples, and the needs of religion became a law for the new Jesuits to enter again the career of the missions." [7] This enthusiasm did not weaken, since, almost a century later, the Company of Jesus would by itself, furnish the various foreign missions almost 4,000 missioners.[8]

On March 2, 1815, an ordinance of King Louis XVIII re-established the Society of Foreign Missions, which had been dissolved by a decree of Napoleon (September 26, 1809).[9] The [6] William Marshall, Christian Missions, I, 12.

[7] Crétineau-Joly, Histoire de la compagnie de Jésus, VI, 351.

[8] Brucker, Etudes of February 20, 1899, p. 552.

[9] A. Launay, Histoire générale de la Société des Missions étrangères, II, 433.

glorious future of this Society could be foreseen when, in 1815, it again took the road of the Indies and of martyrdom.

Inaugurated in 1658 by the first vicars apostolic and finally founded in 1663, the Society of Foreign Missions had already existed for 157 years. Its birth had been painful; its growth, slow. At no period had the number of its priests reached sixty in number. The fact is not without some surprise; but admiration mingles with the astonishment when we consider its vast field of battle, the numerous events in which it was involved, and the success it obtained. . . . It had been obliged to strive against Portugal, which looked upon it as a foe of the spiritual power of its bishops; against the pagan governments of Siam, Cochin China, Tonkin, and China; against the Mohamedans of Sumatra; against the English Protestants of Canada and the Indies. . . . Some of its missions had given excellent results. Yunnan, Kongchow, Cambodia, and Siam were in a very sad situation; but Cochin China, Tonkin, and Su-tchuen were prosperous and solid. The native clergy, trained by the Society and always exclusively secular, were pious, able, and devoted; these had again and again saved the Churches. . . . In France the Society endured the Revolution, refusing apostasy, living in exile, buying back its seminary. Such was its past.[10]

Shortly afterwards, Bishop de Mazenod founded at Aix the congregation of Oblates of Mary Immaculate, and at Lyons Father Colin created that of the Marist Fathers. Both these societies would go at the side of the old revived congregations of Dominicans, Redemptorists, and Vincentians, to beg the honor of engaging in the most remote and most dangerous missions.[11]

The initiative of some humble women of France soon furnished to these valiant forces the resources which they needed for their apostolate.

[10] Launay, op. cit., p. 488.

[11] The institute of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny, founded in 1807 by Madame Javouhey, would be of great help for the missioners.

In 1815 Bishop Dubourg of New Orleans, on his way back from Rome, communicated to a devout widow of Lyons, Madame Petit, the idea of founding an association of popular alms, by way of one franc a year, to back up the spiritual needs of Louisiana. The few and small offerings collected by her did not form a large treasury; but it was the widow's mite. . . . In 1819 Miss Pauline Jaricot, a young woman of Lyons, received from her brother, a seminarian at St. Sulpice, a letter expressing his grief over the destitution of the foreign missions. This pious woman organized among the working people of Lyons a collection in the amount of one sou a week for the Foreign Mission Seminary. In this way 2,000 francs were collected and sent to that seminary, to be forwarded by it to that old Asia from which Lyons had received the blessing of the faith.

The two sources were merged some years later on the occasion of the visit of Bishop Dubourg's vicar general. A meeting of twelve persons of Lyons decided that the Association should be extended to all the missions of the globe and that the membership should be solicited and received without geographical limitation. The date was May 3, 1822, the feast of the Finding of the True Cross. On that day the Propagation of the Faith Society was founded.

The receipts of the first month had been 520 francs from the diocese of Lyons, those of the first year rose to 15,272 francs. In 1838 the work took in 1,343,000 francs. Two years later it gathered in more than 2,000,000, and thereafter the receipts continued to increase.[12]

Meanwhile the work had been organized. The members were asked to supply priests as well as alms. Later on, two other similar works, that of the Holy Infancy and that of the schools of the Orient, would further augment the budget of the missions and would permit every Christian, even children, to contribute, by their prayers and their sacrifices, to the glorious work of the apostolate, which has always been a marked characteristic of the true Church and a most striking sign of its vitality.

[12] Baunard, Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, pp. 426–28.

Korea

Pope Pius VII was unable to witness in this world the fruit of all this devotedness. But before he rendered his soul to God (August, 1823), if his gaze turned toward the infidel nations where the missioners would direct their steps, his heart would have been filled with most legitimate hopes. You might have said that when Providence was arousing a new zeal in the Catholic peoples, it was preparing the souls of far-off peoples to receive the blessings of that zeal.

One of the first regions to which the thought of Pius VII turned, when the events of 1815 restored peace to the world, was Korea. He recalled that in 1792, amid the distress, he received the homage of a Church founded in that country, a Church that, while he was a prisoner at Fontainebleau, had sent him a moving appeal of the Korean faithful asking for priests.

The way this Korean Church had been formed seemed to be one of the most touching miracles of the divine goodness. This instance is the only example of a country converted apart from any apostolate from the outside.

Korea, an extensive mountainous peninsula of northeast Asia, situated between the Japan Sea and the Yellow Sea, had, like China, whose vassal it was, its security in absolute isolation. At the close of the eighteenth century this closed country had never seen a priest. At that time a few wise men of the country happened upon some books of Catholic devotion, written in Chinese characters and accidentally imported along with certain scientific works. These Catholic books impressed them. One of them, Seng-Houn-i, made contact with the bishop of Peking, the illustrious Alexander de Gouvea, a Portuguese Franciscan, who instructed and baptized him. Thereafter the neophyte had but one desire: since China and Europe would not send catechists to his country, he himself became a catechist. Aided by one of his friends, the virtuous Piki, he instructed many fellow countrymen and baptized them. These in turn became apostles. Books of instruction composed by the missioners of China were translated into Korean and were circulated in the world of the educated, then in the middle class and among the common people.

The faith of these new Christians was so sturdy that when, in 1791, orders from Peking commanded them to renounce their new religion, a considerable number of them courageously underwent the tortures of the bastinado, the disjointing of the bones, and other forms of suffering. A Chinese priest, James Tsiou, was finally sent to them in 1794. The loftiest virtues, virginity, humility, charity, flourished in the young Church. Two new persecutions (1799 and 1801) were met with the same courage. Father Tsiou, after being subjected to the ordinary sufferings, was beheaded on May 31, 1801. Pius VII could do nothing for these admirable Christians of Korea except to sustain them by his paternal encouragement and to place them under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Peking. His successor, Leo XII, would organize the mission, confiding it to the Society of Foreign Missions and placing at its head as vicar apostolic Bishop Bruguière.[13]

Not far from there, another prodigy of grace, which Europe was to learn of only later on, occurred in Japan under no less wonderful circumstances. Twenty-five Christian centers, going back to St. Francis Xavier himself, thanks to the transmission of their traditions, without any sacraments but baptism, preserved the sacred fire of the true faith. They were confidently awaiting a priest to whom they would entrust themselves. This priest they would recognize by three signs: his devotion to the Blessed Virgin, his obedience to the pope, and his vow of virginity.[14]

[13] See De Gouvea, Relation de l'établissement du christianisme dans le royaume de Corée, 1800; Dallet, Histoire de l'Eglise de Corée; A. Launay, Les missionaires français en Corée, 1895.

India

We have already noted that the French Revolution had sad consequences for the Church of the Indies. In the colonies which the treaty of Versailles in 1783 restored to France,[15] two former Jesuits, a few Capuchins, and some priests of the Foreign Missions were laboring under the orders of Bishop Champenois. The combined persecutions of the Moslem sultan Tippo-Saibet and the revolutionary agents coming from France scattered priests and faithful. One of the missioners, Father Dubois of the Society of the Foreign Missions, wrote (September 15, 1798): "What will become of us? Persecuted and proscribed by the French, suspected by the English, abandoned by the Portuguese clergy, God alone will be our help." [16] In 1805 Bishop Champenois, exhausted by sickness and fatigue, in vain asked for an auxiliary. In 1813 the seminary founded at Pondichery was at the end of its resources. Three years later Father Dubois wrote: "All, as many of us as are here, are overwhelmed, some by age, the others by infirmities. Can you not send us one or two subjects to bury us?" [17]

Almost discouraged, its apparent influence over a population which the revolutionary spirit endeavored to mislead, at the same time as the Moslem fanaticism terrorized it, Father [14] Marnas, La religion de Jésus au Japon, I, 488; A. Launay, "Le Japon," in the Missions catholiques françaises au XIX^e siècle, III, 417.

[15] Pondichery, Karikal, Mahe, and Chandernagor.

[16] See the interesting pamphlet by Mazon, Un missionaire vivarois aux Indes, l'abbé Dubois (1899), p. 14.

[17] Ibid., p. 16.

Dubois devoted himself especially to works of corporal charity and to the composition of a great work on the customs of the country that he was evangelizing. But his work was not as fruitless for the apostolate as he thought. The benefactor of the poor and the scholar prepared the way for the catechist. By his charity as also by his learning he won the good will of the great and of the common people. The English governor of Madras wrote: "When Father Dubois in his journeys was on his way to a village, the Brahmans, by a spontaneous feeling of deference, made everything spic and span, and prepared everything to receive him." [18] The high council of the Company of India, at a price of 20,000 francs, bought from him his great work, Mœurs, institutions et cérémonies des peuples de l'Inde, and had it printed in English at London in 1817. The learned Max Muller, in his preface to a later edition of this work, in 1897, says that the work is that of an eyewitness and still retains all its value.[19] The 20,000 francs was used by Dubois for the reorganization of the Pondichery seminary; but especially the high regard which the zealous missioner had acquired and which later benefited his fellow workers wonderfully prepared men's minds for the great mission movement that would take place fifteen years later in the region of the French Indies.

[18] Mazon, op. cit., p. 20.

[19] For Muller's preface, see Mazon, op. cit., pp. 61–63. In 1825 Father Dubois published in French a carefully revised edition: Mœurs, institutions et cérémonies des peuples de l'Inde. This edition is now rare and can be found in the Bibliothèque nationale under the classification OK 2.149. Father Dubois was born at Saint-Remèze in the Vivarais (January 10, 1766) and died at the Foreign Mission Seminary on February 17, 1848. He published also, in English, Letters on the State of Christianity in India, 1823; and in French, Exposé de quelques-uns des principaux articles de la theologie de Brahma, 1825; Le Pancha-Tautra, fables de brahme Vichnou, 1826, re-edited in 1872, with thirteen engravings by Leonce Petit. The Tablet (May 7, 1898) commented that the celebrated book of Dubois is an encyclopedia of all that concerns Indian life; the author's political finesse and the clearness of his mind would do honor to a statesman.

China

This method of penetration by the prestige of learning was one which experience had shown as the most effective in the atmosphere of the Chinese population. It was the method employed in China, following the Jesuits, by the Vincentians and priests of the Foreign Missions, who replaced them after their dispersion.[20] From 1775 to 1823 their work of evangelization was hindered by violent persecutions; but the courage of the Christians, the martyrdom of Blessed Dufresse in 1815 and that of Blessed Clet in 1820 recalled the most heroic times of the history of the Church.

The first three Vincentians reached Peking on April 29, 1785. They were Father Raux, a distinguished astronomer and pupil of Lalande, Father Ghislain, a man of cultivated mind and one well versed in science, and Brother Paris, a clock maker whose mechanical ability was said to equal that of Vaucanson. A few former Jesuits, who had remained in China, aided them unselfishly. Father Bourgeois, former head of the mission, presented Father Raux to the Emperor; and Father Aymot ceded to the learned Vincentian his functions of imperial interpreter for the Europeans. Sons of St. Ignatius and children of St. Vincent de Paul fraternized with touching intimacy. Father Bourgeois in 1788 wrote to his confrere Father Beauregard, the renowned preacher: "No one can say whether Father Raux is living as a Jesuit, or whether we are living as Vincentians." [21] This evangelical union obtained the happiest results. The missioners succeeded in having admitted into the great library founded at Peking by Emperor Khien-Long several Christian works, among them the Tien-tchou-che-i (The True idea of God) by Father Ricci, a masterpiece that certain mandarins read and reread to train themselves in literary style. Under Khien-Long's successor, Kia-Khing, in 1800, while Catholic worship was still persecuted in France, forbidden in England, and disturbed in Italy, a solemn procession, reported in the Annales, was able to be held in the streets of Peking, on the feast of Corpus Christi.[22] In 1803 the vicar of Se-tchuen, Bishop Dufresse, of the Foreign Missions, profiting by the peace, held the first Chinese synod.

[20] The decree of Propaganda entrusting the missions of China to the Vincentians is dated December 7, 1783.

[21] Huc, Le christianisme en Chine, IV, 230.

The statutes coming from this synod are the most important act that has been published, since the Monita of 1664, to regulate the conditions of missionary life in China. The statutes are divided into ten chapters. The life of the missioner is regulated as a life of prayer, of retreat, and of interior silence. He is then advised to exercise great prudence in his outward relations, discretion in his alms collecting, in the administration of temporalities, in the imposition of public penances, for which the opportuneness must always be submitted to the judgment of the bishop. Then the statutes speak of apostolic zeal, of attempts to found Christian schools, of measures to be employed to prevent the Catholics from participating in the superstitious customs of the pagans. We quote the following comment by a historian of this mission.

By a good fortune which is not granted to all, Bishop Dufresse had time to apply the rules he had composed, to supervise their functioning, and to have them penetrate the habits of his fellow workers. No persecution, no political disturbance, was able to prevail against the vigor which the continual observance of the wise regulations gave to the mission of Se-tchuen, which thenceforth remained like those monuments that a tempest assails without being able to shake their solid foundations.

Eleven years passed in this relative tranquillity. But, toward the end of 1814, a pagan made known to the viceroy of Se-tchuen, Chang-Ming, the state of the mission, which he learned while feigning a wish to embrace Christianity. He divulged the establishment of the seminary, the number of the students and professors, and denounced by name Bishop Dufresse, who was arrested on May 18, 1815 and led to Tcheu-tou, the capital of the province.

[22] Annales, XXI, 7.

The Bishop remained in prison for four months and underwent several interrogatories. On September 14, the viceroy Chang-Min summoned him before him. The high mandarin had previously made himself acquainted with all the documents of the trial, and resolved to issue a capital sentence against the prelate and to carry it out without referring it to the Emperor.

As soon as Bishop Dufresse appeared, the viceroy at once assembled all his officers and condemned the prisoner to be beheaded. We are told that the saintly old man summoned his judge to God's tribunal and told him that his own death would come soon; this prediction was, in fact, realized.

He was stripped of his shirt, which two soldiers tore up. He was led on foot to an open place at the north gate, situated outside the city and about a mile from the palace. Thirty-three Christians were taken from their prison and were brought to the same place, surrounded by executioners and by all the apparatus of the punishment. On their arrival a mandarin ordered them to renounce Christ. In the presence of the immense crowd gathered about them, the faithful, with a single exception, protested that they were ready to die. Kneeling down, they asked the holy Bishop to absolve them from their faults, to strengthen them, and to console them by granting them his last blessing. The prelate delivered a short exhortation and gave them absolution. Then, without displaying any emotion, he turned to his executioner and bowed his head. The soldier raised and lowered his sword, and the head of the victim rolled on the ground.[23]

The next year, Pius VII in the course of an allocution spoke of this death, saying: "As we read the account, we seemed to be reading again the annals of the primitive Church." Bishop Dufresse was declared Blessed by Leo XIII in 1900.

The persecution, begun in 1815, continued for several years.

[23] A. Launay, Les missions catholiques françaises au XIX^e siècle, III, 254–57; Histoire des Missions étrangères, II, 439–47.

The most outstanding event of that period was the martyrdom of Blessed Cletus, a religious of the Congregation of St. Lazare. This seventy-two-year-old priest lived in the mountains of the province of Hong-Kang, harbored by some Christian families. A reward of 1,000 taels (about $1,500) was promised to anyone who would have him arrested. In the course of several months the holy priest evaded all attempts to find him, hiding in caves and often changing his abode. He was seized on June 6, 1819. With no regard for his old age, his executioners treated him shamefully, striking his face with leather thongs, and loading him with heavy chains. He was strangled for the faith on February 18, 1820. As in the case of Bishop Dufresse, the Church has placed him in the number of her Blessed.

Chinese priests, catechists, and simple faithful were also put to death. Others were thrown into prison, sent into exile to the depths of Tartary. Yet the work of evangelization, without gaining ground, was strengthened. The distress in which the Christians found themselves provoked admirable acts of charity. A letter, written by a missioner under date of September 16, 1820, and inserted in the Annales, says: "We are always in hiding, often with Christians who are not well off. Almost all of them are poor. Those who would have been able to help us have suffered notable losses during the persecutions." [24] Bishop Fontana, a Portuguese Vincentian, vicar apostolic of Se-tchuen, wore clothes that were in rags. In 1824, Bishop Florens, of the Foreign Mission Society, bishop of Sozopolis, former coadjutor of Bishop Dufresse, sold his spare clothes to buy rice for some Chinese dying of hunger. We see here the duplication of the first Christian communities, having but one heart and soul, giving a hopeful promise, for a time of peace, of a magnificent flowering of Catholic life.

On the other hand, the national feeling of the Chinese grew more bitter. One of the pretexts in the recent persecutions had been the seizure, on the person of a messenger, of letters and topographical data, intended for Europe. In fact, Emperor Napoleon in 1805, impressed by the influence which the prosperity of the Far East missions might exercise in favor of the French policy, had set aside special aid for them and had chosen three learned men to carry out a lay mission in China.[25] The Austrian war, then the war with England, prevented their departure. But King George wrote to the emperor of China, putting him on his guard against the undertakings of the French.[26] As might be foreseen, "Europe, penetrating China by force, would bring there a new element of power, but also, we must say, a danger to the evangelical workers." [27]

[24] Annales, I, no. 6, p. 26.

In short, the religious situation of the mission countries, during the first quarter of the nineteenth century,[28] was not without an analogy to that of the European countries at the same period. As in France, where the religious aspirations, expressed by Chateaubriand and La Mennais, offered more than one ambiguity; as in Germany, where the romantic current separated in two opposite tendencies; as in England, where the impulse that would lead Newman to Catholicism was counterbalanced by that which fixed Keble and Pusey in ritualism; everywhere mankind appeared to be raised up by a mighty movement of grace toward an era of Catholic renewal, but also to be everywhere imperiled by the spirit of evil; and fidelity to this movement of grace depended on a choice for which man's freedom would have to bear the dread responsibility.

[25] Bishop Favier, in the Missions catholiques françaises au XIX^e siècle, III, 70.
[26] Ibid.
[27] A. Launay, in the Missions catholiques françaises au XIX^e siècle, III, 258.
[28] We have merely wished here to cast a rapid glance over the principal Catholic missions having historical significance from 1775 to 1823. For many countries the preaching of the gospel dates from the middle of the nineteenth century. The most complete work on this matter is that of Louvet, Les missions catholiques au XIX^e siècle, 1898.

CHAPTER XIII

The Eastern Church

THE turmoils that accompanied what we have come to call the Period of the Revolution were not without influence on certain branches of the Eastern Church. This condition is what we are about to review in the following pages.[1]

The Non-Catholic Greek Church of Constantinople

Between 1789 and 1823 the see of Constantinople saw the passing of eleven patriarchates, but only eight patriarchs. The most remarkable was Gregory V, who occupied the see three times (1797–98, 1806–8, 1818–21). He ended the famous controversy of the colybes, accomplished numerous reforms, all of which unfortunately did not survive him, and died a martyr for the cause of Hellenic independence.

The colybes are wheaten cakes, abundantly sprinkled with sugar and variously decorated, which are blessed in church, according to the Eastern rite, on the occasion of funeral anniversaries or on the feasts of saints. They are a Christian survival of the use of funeral repasts by the ancients. That is all, however, that we can scientifically say about their origin. The colybes are used chiefly in the commemorative services taking place on the third and the fortieth day after death.[2]

In the Greek monastic liturgy Saturday is a day particularly

[1] This chapter comes from the pen of Father Cyril Karalevsky, a priest of the Greco-Slavic rite.

[2] The reader will note a slight difference from the Western usage of the third, seventh, and thirtieth days.

consecrated to services of this kind for all the dead, especially for the deceased benefactors of the monastery. Around the year 1754, the construction of a new church for a skyte, or secondary convent, of Mount Athos caused donations to flow in and consequently many requiem services to be celebrated. The monks of Athos, who went to the market of Karyes on Saturday to sell the products of their small industry (ikons, sculptured wood, and so on),[3] got the idea of transposing a good number of the services for the dead to Sunday.

We can hardly imagine the uproar this innovation excited on the "Holy Mountain" and in the ecclesiastical world, the mass of pamphlets, petitions, and appeals to the Ecumenical Patriarch, besides the forcible expulsions wrought now by one party and presently by the other, or the death of those monks whom their adversaries cast into the sea by way of argument. This fact would be unbelievable if the accounts of the contemporaries did not attest it.[4] We find therein all the names of Greek theology of the time: Athanasius of Paros, Nicodemus the Hagiographer, Agapios Leonardos—all for the conservative position which sought to keep the observances on Saturday. Nevertheless Patriarch Theodosius II left to all the liberty to do as they wished, and prevented the two parties from excommunicating each other and from deviating from the usages of the principal convents. In 1776, Sophron II excommunicated the advocates of Saturday alone and effected the return of peace for a time. In 1800, the monk Theodoret, commissioned to revise the essays of the famous Pidalion (of which we shall speak later on), introduced into it a long note which was contrary to the opinions of Agapios and Nicodemus, and Patriarch Neophytus VII had to issue a special encyclical to point out the corrections that must be included in the text. The conflict, which had involved the whole Greek world, became localized on Mount Athos, and, in 1807 and 1819, Gregory V renewed the right for everyone to do as he was accustomed. Today, curiously enough, the commemorative services are almost always on Sunday, and this practice for the same reason had caused the monks of Athos to introduce the innovation: it is the day when everyone is free.

[3] Karyes is the village where the quaimaqam, or Turkish subprefect, resides; it is also the place where all visitors are obliged to halt. See the interesting account of the journey of Father Placid de Mester, O.S.B.: Voyage de deux Bénedictins au monastère du Mont Athos (1908), pp. 43 ff. This book is a good popularization of what should be known about Athos. I have only one fault to find with it: it gives too roseate a picture of the holy mountain of the Orthodox world and it suppresses too much the deep wretchedness.

[4] See L. Petit, "La grande controverse des colybes," in the Echos d'Orient, II (1899), 321–31; the principal documents in Mansi, XXXVIII, 937–40, 945; XL, 39–44, 79–82.

Another equally childish quarrel deserves mention only because it exemplifies the exaggerated attachment that was held for certain customary rituals in the Greco-Slavic countries. It recalls certain aspects of the schism of the Starovier Russians and that of the Utraquists of Bohemia. Patriarch Gregory V had one other merit: his reforming views occasioned his first downfall, after only a year and a half in the patriarchate, at the end of 1798. Re-elected in October, 1806, he at once resumed the same line of conduct: acts regulating the affairs of the bishops absent from the capital, the meetings of the Holy Synod, the regular collection of the taxes, and clerical and monastic discipline, appeared one after another.[5] The following year he made a tour for the administration of the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist.[6] Deposed at the end of September, 1808, Gregory remounted the patriarchal throne at the end of 1818, at the time when the Hetaeria, formed in Walachia with a view to rendering liberty to Greece, caused more and more discussion of that subject. He had time to terminate the controversy over the colybes, as we have seen, and to proclaim afresh the canonical law which prevented clerics in major orders from contracting second marriages after the death of their first wife.[7]

[5] See these documents in Mansi, XL, 3–26.

[6] Mansi, XL, 27–38.

When the Greek revolution burst into the open, the Turks, as might be expected, laid the blame on the higher clergy as a consequence of their civil privileges, which made them the leaders of the nation. Gregory, evidently as a matter of form, had to launch excommunication against the chiefs of the movement.[8] Nevertheless he was seized at the beginning of the Easter ceremonies of April 10–23, 1821, and was strangled, and his corpse was hung at the gate of the patriarchal palace, where it remained exposed for three days before being delivered to the Jews. The members of the Holy Synod were given over to torture. The Greeks considered Gregory a martyr for the national cause rather than for the Orthodox faith, and his benediction cross is preserved at the Phanar as a relic which is shown to the people on tragic occasions.[9]

On the very day which saw the execution of Gregory, the Turks caused Eugenius, the metropolitan of Pisidia, to be elected in his place.[10] This election, however, did not prevent the sack of several churches, and in vain Eugenius renewed the excommunication that had been rigorously pronounced by Gregory, thereby smiting seven bishops of continental Greece.[11] The reaction to this sentence was the proclamation of the Assembly of Epidaurus (1822), which declared Greece independent, religiously as well as politically. This move was the beginning of the effective emancipation of the Church of Greece which we shall see proclaimed again later on and finally recognized by the patriarch of Constantinople, though not until 1850.

[7] Mansi, XL, 83–86.

[8] The text in Mansi, XL, 151–55.

[9] For example, at the end of August, 1911, at the time of the manifestations that took place at Constantinople following the assassination, probably perpetrated by emissaries of the "Union and Progress" Committee of Emilien, metropolitan of Grevena.

[10] Mansi, XL, 91.

[11] The text in Mansi, XL, 155–58.

Eugenius II, chosen in the midst of these tragic circumstances, was mercilessly beaten by the Turkish populace and died of exhaustion and sorrow in the following year (1822).

Several other patriarchs followed rapidly in the see of Constantinople, always the butt of the Turks' vexations until the time when the Greek independence was at last recognized by the Porte under pressure of the Powers.

The second patriarchate of Neopytus VII (1789–1801) saw the appearance of a work that has remained famous in the history of the canon law of the Orthodox Church: the Pidalion (the helm, or rudder), a large folio of 556 pages, published at Leipzig in 1800. This collection contains the original texts of the monuments of the ancient law of the Greek Church, that is, the so-called canons of the apostles, those of the first seven ecumenical councils, those of the particular councils received within the body of the Byzantine law, the decisions of certain Fathers arranged under the same title, a treatise on the degrees of kindred, some formulas for official acts, and the plan of a church constructed according to canonical regulations.

The texts are accompanied with an explanation gathered by the authorized commentators of the Greek ecclesiastical law: Balsamon (patriarch of Antioch), Zonaras, Alexis Aristenus, and others. This explanation is translated into vulgar Greek. At the bottom of the pages are long notes, likewise in vulgar Greek, which form a second commentary. They are the work of two monks of Athos, Agapios Leonardos (1741–1815) and Nicodemus the Hagiographer (1749–1809).[12] These notes are most curious. They are not remarkable for great canonical erudition, but by way of compensation they contain many childish trifles, traditions of uncertain value, and especially an arsenal of prejudices against the Catholic Church. The first edition has a particular value because it lacks the corrections introduced in the later reprinting. The Pidalion, completed by the synodal decisions of the patirarch of Constantinople and in the Kingdom of Greece by the Holy Synod, and by the civil laws on religious matters, forms even today the great source of modern Greek canon law. We need scarcely say that, produced by the Orthodox, this collection has next to no authority for Catholics outside of the personal skill of Agapios and Nicodemus, which was just as meager.

[12] On Agapios Leonardos, see the article of Petit in the Echos d'Orient, II (1899), 204–6.

From the theological point of view, the Greek Church, properly speaking, did not produce a single name during the period which we are now studying, with the exception of Eugenius Bulgaris, to be compared with those of the preceding age. Its minds were unfortunately too much occupied by the question of the colybes. We must mention, however, that Christodulus of Acarnania, after traveling extensively in Europe and visiting some philosophers of every opinion, embraced the doctrines of Spinoza. He was accordingly condemned some months after his death by the patriarch Neophytus VII during his first patriarchate.[13]

However, general instruction did not develop among the Greeks of that time. In 1765, in the Peloponnesus, Agapios Leonardos and his confrere Gerasimus founded the school of Dimitsana, which has become lastingly famous. That of the Convent of St. John the Evangelist at Patmos continued to prosper until the death of Daniel Kerameus (1801) and the Greek insurrection. The theological school of Athos, opened in 1758 at the monastery of Vatopedi by Eugenius Bulgaris, maintained itself intact until the beginning of the nineteenth century. The spread of education prepared the affranchisement of Greece.

Nicodemus the Hagiographer, whose name we have seen in connection with the Pidalion, was also a prolific writer. He translated into the vulgar tongue the liturgical works of Simeon of Thessalonica and, what is less praiseworthy, those of the protagonist of Hesyphasm, Gregory Palamas. A special mention must also be made of the founder of the Academy of Athos, Eugenius Bulgaris. He was born at Corfu in 1716, studied principally at the University of Padua, was preacher of the Church of St. George of the Greeks at Venice, founded, before that of Athos, the School of Janina at Epirus (1742), set out once more for Europe after Cyril V forced him to quit Athos, was recommended by Frederick of Prussia to Catherine II of Russia, was promoted by her to the archbishopric of Kherson in Taurida (which he soon resigned that he might continue his studies), and died at St. Petersburg in 1806. Theologian, exegete, and polemist, Bulgaris was one of the most learned Greeks of the eighteenth century. In his Theologicon he follows the scholastic method and places Tournely under contribution, but he is far from drawing nearer to the theology of the Catholic Church. Several of his writings are directed against her, and he had the patience to translate into Greek the enormous and indigestible patristic compilation of the Lutheran Adam Zoernidav on the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone. Many of his works are yet unpublished.[14]

[13] The text of the sentence in Mansi, XXXIX, 983–98.

We have almost nothing to say about the three Greek patriarchates of the South during the period we are considering. The see of Alexandria continued to be semititular, its occupants passing the greater part of their time on the Bosphorus: it would not resume activity until a later time, under Mohammet Ali. At Jerusalem it tried to signalize a period of acuteness in the secular struggle between the Greeks and the Latins for the exclusive possession of the holy places. In 1809 the Franciscans were still masters of the shrine of the Holy Sepulcher within the basilica. When the church was damaged by fire, the Greeks rebuilt it; not until 1852 did it again become a common sanctuary. In the patriarchate of Antioch the Greeks, installed to the detriment of the native Melchites by Sylvester of Cyprus (d. 1766), placed themselves on the patriarchal throne and in most of the episcopal sees, without any striking results. The Patriarch Seraphim (1813–23) was, as we are about to see, a persecutor of the Catholic Melchites.

[14] See the article by Father Aurelio Palmieri, O.S.A., in the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, II, 1236–41.

The Melchite Catholic Church of Antioch

From 1816 to 1833 the patriarchal see of the Catholic Melchites was occupied by Ignatius V Qattan, who, contrary to the customs inaugurated with Cyril VI Tanas in 1724, came from the secular clergy. From being pastor of the village of Zoug-Mikhail in the Lebanon, he passed directly to the patriarchal throne. This election seems to have been owing to a compromise between the two rival congregations of Basilians, the Salvatorians and the Chouerites, which comprised almost the entire hierarchy. This, in turn, had been reduced to four bishops at the time of the election of Ignatius Qattan.

Aleppo remained the most important center of Catholic activity. In 1817 the Orthodox metropolitan, Gerasimus, obtained a decree from Sultan Mahmud which prohibited all missionary endeavors, forbade the Catholics to visit the Latin missioners, and ordered all Melchites to return to the Orthodox obedience. The robbery was complete: the archiepiscopal church, the residence attached to it, and all the property of the diocese passed into Orthodox hands. The Catholic clergy of the Greek rite were condemned to exile. The pasha tried to persuade the people to submit but was not able to obtain anything. Then, influenced by a considerable bribe from Gerasimus, he caused nine young Melchites, a Syrian, and a Maronite to be seized, and all were put to death. These were, however, the only victims. On the other hand, many of the Aleppians emigrated either to the Lebanon, Constantinople, Leghorn, or Marseilles. The Catholic Melchite clergy were unable to return until much later, when the Egyptian invasion of 1831 and the emancipation of all the Catholic Orientals in the Empire wrested from the Sultan by France, put an end to the violent persecutions.

Gerasimus of Aleppo soon joined Zachary, the Orthodox bishop of Akkar, near Tripoli, and together they journeyed to Damascus to execute their decree. Not much effort was needed to uproot the Melchites there. They had already been despoiled in 1724, and their priests were forced to celebrate Mass in private houses. A decree similar to the first gave the Orthodox patriarch, Seraphin, the same rights over the Catholics of Damascus as Gerasimus of Aleppo had over those of that city.

The procedure followed was the same as at Aleppo: when the judicial decisions were against the Orthodox party, the patriarch obtained with money the degradation and exile of two priests, and a deacon and six notables were condemned to drubbing. Only four survived it; two died under the blows. Large contributions were levied on the Catholics, several of whom apostatized. The priests were at the same time exiled, as at Aleppo. But the isle of Rouad, which is not far from Tripoli and which was designated as the place of their deportation, was subject to the pasha of Acre, who had many Catholic Melchites in his service; they persuaded him to allow the escape of the priests, who were able to take refuge at the convent of the Holy Savior in the Lebanon, where they were in safety. They returned to Damascus only secretly and were not able to resume their ministry until after the death of Seraphin in 1823. Only the Egyptian invasion gave them complete liberty.

From an internal point of view, the Melchite Church continually suffered from the troubled state in which the Jansenist and Gallican doctrines of Germanos Adam had put it. The seminary of Ain-Traz, founded in 1811 by Patriarch Agapius III Matar, had no success. Propaganda closed it in 1815 because the superior, Maximus Mazloum, intruding into the diocese of Aleppo, was too compromising in the affair of the synod of Qarqafe and too favorable to the ideas of Adam. The Basilian congregations, which had rendered so many services during the period of the great persecution of Sylvester, were now exhausted from the troubles that were caused by the repeated intrusions of Ignatius Jauhar in the patriarchal see. The Chouerites in particular had lost their first fervor. Ignatius Sarrouf, the metropolitan of Beirut from 1778 to 1812, had tried to reform them: when nothing came of his efforts, he desired to start a new congregation, but Rome suppressed it for fear that it would merely add to the confusion. The local disputes, which became intense among the Chouerites, had to be settled by a compromise: the Aleppine element separated from the Lebanese element and became another congregation. Propaganda sanctioned the arrangement in 1819. The secular clergy had dwindled to several married priests who were without any sort of education. Nonetheless no attempts to rehabilitate them were made until the following period, but then it was with a celibate clergy.

A division in the congregation of the Antonians among the Maronites had the same causes as that between the Lebanese and Aleppian Chouerites. This separation was not recognized by Benedict XIV, but was finally sanctioned by Clement XIV in 1770. The troubles introduced by the affair of the visionary Hendyye and the lack of observation in the dispositions of the Lebanese synod of 1736 rendered the effects of that assembly little more than nothing, instead of what might have been expected. At last, the patriarch, John Helo, convoked a new synod at the monastery of Louaise, near Beirut, in April, 1818.[15] There the deplorable usage of mixed monasteries of monks and nuns was definitely abolished, and each bishop was assigned a fixed residence. The patriarchal simplicity in which the [15] See the acts in Mansi, XXXIX, 247–52.

Maronite people lived, as well as the firm hand of the Emir Bechir Checab, prince of Lebanon, lessened the disadvantages of this legislative anarchy which had caused the worst consequences in other countries.

The Syrian Church also went through a troubled period. The Patriarch Michael Jaroué died in 1800; his successor, Michael Daher, a priest of Aleppo, was not elected until 1803, and he resigned eight years later. His successor, Gregory Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, was elected in 1814 and likewise resigned. Rome nominated the archbishop of Aleppo, Denis Hadaia, as the administrator of the patriarchate. Not till 1820 was Gregory Peter Jaroué proclaimed patriarch. He was the bishop of Jerusalem, and under his patriarchate several brilliant conversions took place which gave a new development to this small but heroic Church.

The cause of this eclipse of the real Oriental Churches must be looked for partly in the suppression of the Jesuits. The French government, which had contributed so much to this end, attempted to assign their missions in the Lebanon to the Vincentians, but these were not able to undertake the task, mainly because the Revolution had hindered their growth. The vigor of Catholic life within the Ottoman Empire did not take hold until after the great emancipation of 1931.

The Churches of Eastern Europe

Since Europe had experienced in a special way the effects of the French revolution, we are about to see a whole series of transformations brought about by the new order of things.

At Rome, first of all, the establishment of the Republic in February, 1797, although lasting only a few months, considerably disturbed the administration of Propaganda. The revenues of most of the colleges dependent on it were confiscated, and these colleges remained closed; such was notably the lot of the Greek College and that of Propaganda itself. Cardinal Gerdil, prefect of the congregation, took refuge at Turin, and Cardinal Stefen Borgia, the proprefect, at Padua, in the house of Bishop Speroni of Adria. Both continued to do their best to direct the missions, often in critical circumstances: Borgia was so short of resources that he did not have the means to employ a secretary. This state of affairs continued until the return to Rome, after the Conclave of Venice in 1800. The missions could not remain without a protector in the Ottoman Empire, and as early as 1792 the Holy See turned to Austria, which gladly accepted the function. The situation remained thus until 1803. Moreover, in the past, Propaganda had willingly turned to the emperor for the protectorate over the Catholic Ottoman subjects as often as to France.

Everywhere that the armies of the Directory penetrated, freedom of religion was proclaimed. At Venice, at the time of the Conclave of 1800, the Greeks of St. George, who were Catholics only outwardly, refused to ring their bells, and thus quit the Roman communion. At Ancona the schismatics took possession of the Greek Catholic church and did not give it up until much later, after the restoration of the papal power.

Dalmatia, where the simplicity of a completely patriarchal life preserved the customs of the Middle Ages, contained around 50,000 Orthodox of the Serbian race and nearly five times as many Latin Catholics. The Venetian government, on which the region was dependent, held tightly to the principle of the state religion; the Greeks, as they were called, were considered Catholics, but they paid dues to the Latin clergy, and their rite was regarded as inferior. Propaganda undertook to unite them in a more sincere union, and in 1742 the Bishop of Ossero, who was sufficiently acquainted with literary Slavonic and the Eastern ceremonies, received the privilege of pontifi-cating in that rite in order to perform necessary ordinations.[16] Catholics were ordered to preserve their own rite whenever they had a priest available.

But the Russian influence was large among them; as early as 1759, Maria Theresa authorized, upon the Russian demand, an openly schismatic Church at Trieste.[17] When (May, 1797) Dalmatia was given to Austria after the fall of the Republic of Venice, the Serbs determined to free themselves completely; they were encouraged in this resolve by the metropolitan of Montenegro, Peter Petrovich. After the preliminaries at Leoben and then the Treaty of Campo Formio (October, 1797) had confirmed the existence of Austrian rule, they elected the archimandrite Simeon Ivkovich as bishop, but the new governor, Count von Thurn, let the affair drag on, and the consecration never took place.[18] In February, 1806, the French, after Austerlitz, entered Dalmatia, and the country became part of the Kingdom of Italy. Under the imperial provincial, Vincenzo Dandolo, the most noted personage among the Serbs was the archimandrite Gerasimus Zellich; he was made an equal to the Latin bishops, and by the decree of Saint-Cloud (September 8, 1808) provision was made for the establishment of an Orthodox bishopric, which the synod of Zara organized under the presidency of Dandolo. But Zellich had certain deplorable habits—for instance, he might be found in the street in a drunken state—and he could not be nominated; not until 1810 did the consecration of Bishop Benedict Kraljevich take place. He resided first at Sebenico, then at Castelnuovo, with [16] See the text of the brief in Raffaele de Martinis, Ius pontificium de Propaganda Fide, III, 82.

[17] The documents are in the archives of Propaganda, Scritture riferite nei Congressi: Greci di Croazia, Vol. I.

[18] On Dalmatia at this period, consult the excellent work of Father Pisani, La Dalmatie de 1797 à 1815; Episode des conquêtes napoléoniennes (1893). The affairs of the Orthodox Serbs occupy pages 84–85, 236–38, 374. See also A. Ratel, "L'Eglise orthodoxe de Dalmatie," in the Echos d'Orient, V (1902), 362–75.

the title of Zadar. In 1815, Dalmatia was returned to Austria, and the Orthodox bishopric continued to exist, but not until 1870 was it divided and a new eparchy erected at Kotor (Cattaro).[19]

I have just mentioned Peter of Montenegro. This tiny Church arose out of the patriarchate of Ipek, and later, from the time of Daniel Petrovich, elected in 1697, out of the archdiocese of Karlovitz, which included various lands of the Ottoman Empire. From uncle to nephew, the metropolitan's see remained hereditary in the Petrovich family till 1858; at that time Daniel Petrovich was secularized and he named as metropolitan Nicanor the archimandrite. Furthermore, after 1830 the Church of Montenegro made itself completely independent of the archbishop of Karlovitz; and its titulars in Belgrade, Dalmatia, and St. Petersburg petitioned for episcopal consecration.

Although the Serbian revolution began in 1806, Serbia proper did not obtain semi-independence until 1830, but the Orthodox Church in that country remained subject to the patriarch of Constantinople until 1879. The Church of the Kingdom of Hungary, fully emancipated, received absolutely complete freedom of worship through the edict of toleration of Joseph II on October 25, 1782. But the obligation which he imposed on all the officials of the Empire in the next year, requiring them to be able to speak and write German fluently within three years, turned everyone against him, the Serbs as well as the Hungarians. The latter, by way of reprisal, suppressed the [19] Bishop Benedict Kraljevich was well disposed in favor of the Union. The Austrian imperial government seconded his views: to train a serious clergy, Kraljevich opened a seminary that he entrusted to four Ruthenian priests of Galicia. But the opposition on the part of the Orthodox party was stronger than he. The victim of an attempted assassination, he had to resign his see in 1829. A decree of that year (March 19) placed the bishopric of Dalmatia subject to the Serbian metropolitan of Karlovitz. Uuder the new bishop, Joseph Rajatchich, three villages passed to the Union in 1831: a violent persecution so lessened the number of the faithful that now they number not more than fifty.

Latin language little by little in all their public acts and replaced it with Hungarian (Magyar), but they were wrong in the attempt to impose their own tongue on all the races inhabiting the same territory as themselves. In 1790–91, the emperor, Leopold II, granted the Serbs civil rights. This was the time when the Serbian monk, Dositheos Obradovich (1739–1811), gave the impulse to modern Serbian literature. Until that time the ecclesiastical idiom, Old Slavonic, was the only one in literary use. In 1792 the archbishop of Karlovitz and his suffragan bishops, as representatives of the Serbian nation, obtained the right to sit in the Hungarian diet, but almost forty years passed before that right came into practical use. In fact, the opposition to this point and to several others was much more political than religious.[20]

Bukovina, reunited to the Austrian Empire in 1775, following the Treaty of Kutchuk-Kainardji of July 21, 1774, had previously formed an Orthodox diocese carved out of the archdiocese of Iassi and Suceava, having the town of Radautz for its see. The change in political rule necessitated the introduction of a change in religious alliance: in 1781 the bishop of Radautz obtained his independence and moved his residence to Tchernovitz. An imperial decree in 1785 placed the bishop of Tchernovitz under the Serbian metropolitan of Karlovitz. This arrangement endured until the emancipation of 1873. But the members of his flock were not Serbian in race or language: a minority were Ruthenian and the majority were Rumanian—a confusion that was matched everywhere in Austria.[21]

[20] On the Serbs of Hungary, a good work exists in French, based on Serbian sources and written by Picot, former French consul at Temesvar: Les Serbes de Hongrie, leur histoire, leurs privilèges, leur état politique et social (1873). The chief documents touching the privileges of the Serbs of Hungary have been published by P. L. Petit in Mansi, XXXIX. Picot uses especially Orthodox writings and is influenced by his liberal ideas in matters of religion. In his political views he is unfriendly to the Hungarians, and rightly so.

[21] See an article by A. Ratel in the Echos d'Orient, V (1902), 232–36, entitled "L'Eglise orthodoxe de Bukovine."

At the head of the Rumanian Church of Transylvania from 1783 to 1830 was John Bobu, born in 1739 at Ormany, in the country of Szolnok in Hungary. Having at first joined the Basilians of Balaszfalva, he abandoned them before his profession, dismayed by the rigorous fasts to which the bishop, Athanasius Rednik, subjected the novices. A secular priest in 1778, he was named bishop of Fagaras by Joseph II in 1782, was confirmed in the appointment by Rome in the following year, and was consecrated by his resigned predecessor, Gregory Major, in 1784. He had some serious difficulties with the Basilians, Gabriel Sinkai, Paul Major, and Samuel Klein, who were the most noted representatives of the Rumanian literary Renaissance of the age. In 1807 he founded a cathedral chapter at Fagaras with the approval of Rome and, after the close of the Napoleonic wars, he convened a diocesan synod at Blas in 1821, which was preparatory to the plenary council of Hungary convoked by the primate of Strigonia, Alexander Rudnay, in 1822. He died (October 2, 1830) at the age of ninety-one after forty-seven years in the episcopate.

The see of Fagaras, erected by Innocent XIII in 1721, comprised all Transylvania, but nothing more. In the Latin diocese of Nagy-Varad (or Gran-Varadin), in Rumanian Oradea-Mare, were also many Rumanians. The zeal of the Latin bishop, Paul Laszlo, led seventy parishes into union with Rome. Bishop Csaky's request that Rome give him an auxiliary of the Greek rite was granted by Benedict XIV to his successor, Paul Forgach of Ghymes, in the person of Melece Kovacs, originally from Macedonia. Kovacs was appointed titular bishop of Tegea by a decree of the Consistory (July 12, 1748). He died in 1770, and Maria Theresa decided upon the erection of an independent Rumanian diocese. She named Moses Dragossy for it on July 26, 1776. At first, Pius VI refused to confirm this measure; but all the difficulties were settled, and the bull Indefessum personarum (July 16, 1777) accorded the canonical erection of the see. The new bishop had ordinary jurisdiction over all Rumanians in Hungary living outside of Transylvania, and his metropolitan was the Latin archbishop-primate of Strigonia or Esztergom.

In 1781, Joseph II confirmed the endowment of the see made by Maria Theresa. Moses Dragossy (d. 1787) was succeeded by Ignatius Darabanth (1788–1805), and Samuel Vulcan (1806–39), under whom the see acquired seventy-two parishes which were detached from the Ruthenian eparchy of Munkas by Pius VII. In 1836 Samuel Vulcan opened the still flourishing episcopal gymnasium or college of Belenyes. Under Bishop Basil, baron of Erdelyi (1842–62), numerous conversions seemed to compensate for certain losses caused by the Revolution of 1848. The erection of the Rumanian ecclesiastical province in 1853 brought about some changes once again.[22]

In this review of the Churches of eastern Europe subject to Austria-Hungary, we should not overlook two groups of Latin rite Catholics who were, for the time, either directly or indirectly under the domination of the Turks and who, in our own day, served as a point of support for Catholic propaganda in the Oriental rite. These two groups are the Bulgaro-Walachian mission and the diocese of Bacau in Mildavia.

The Latin Catholics of Bulgaria, or the Pavlikans, are the descendants of ancient Manichaean heretics who were deported into these regions by the Byzantine emperors of the Middle Ages. Those of Philippopolis, for instance, came from Asia Minor. From Bulgaria their doctrines spread throughout eastern Europe and gave birth to the sects known as the Cathari, Albigenses, and so on, quite familiar to the pages of history.

The sect of those called Bogomiles, from the name of a Greek priest who had been their teacher in the tenth century, was condemned by the Bulgarian councils of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. After the Moslem conquest most of them embraced Mohammedanism. Those who remained were converted to Catholicism, but no one knows how or when. In the sixteenth century the popes made them a visitation through the archbishops of Antivari, and later confided them to the Franciscans of Bosnia. The Franciscans also founded the Custody of Bulgaria in their midst, which lasted from 1624 to 1763. From that date till 1781 the Baptistines of Genoa replaced the Bosnian Franciscans within the whole area outside of Walachia itself. In 1781, Pius VI entrusted the diocese of Nicopolis (Rouchtchouk), on the right shore of the Danube, today on the Bulgarian side, to the Passionists. In 1688, the Turks destroyed Chiprovatz, which was the bishop's residence, and a considerable migration set out across the lands of the Empire; it was followed by another in 1724. A third came about in 1812, after an outbreak of the plague; the emigrants crossed the Danube and founded the village of Cioplea in Walachia, close to Bucharest. The Passionist bishop, who had followed the faithful, also decided to reside at Bucharest after 1847. In 1833 Bucharest had been elevated to a Latin archbishopric, and Rouchtchouk became a separate diocese directly dependent on the Holy See.

[22] These details are taken from the long and interesting introduction of Schematismus historicus Venerabilis Cleri Dioecesis Magno-Varadinensis graeci ritus catholicorum pro anno 1900.

The see of Sofia, detached in 1610 from the Bosnian Franciscans' mission, became an archdiocese in 1643, but the persecutions of the Turks laid it waste during the eighteenth century. In 1835 the Redemptorists established there a prefecture apostolic, which was transformed into a vicariate in 1848, with Italian and Austrian Capuchins after 1841.

In Moldavia, upon the requests of the Franciscans and the Dominicans, Urban V erected a diocese at Sereth in 1370, which was transferred to Bacau after the end of the fifteenth century. It was abandoned in 1497 following the Turkish persecutions, but was re-established at the end of the seventeenth century. As a result of diverse political situations, the right of nomination belonged to the king of Poland; the bishops, all Poles, hardly ever resided in their diocese. In 1818 the see was suppressed, and the Latin Catholics, consisting mostly of Rumanized colonies from Hungary, were confided to the care of regulars. This state of affairs lasted until the establishment of the see of Iassi by Leo XIII in 1884.

The Latin Church within the kingdoms of Bulgaria and Rumania today is represented by four dioceses which are independent of one another: in Bulgaria, the diocese of Bouchtchouk and the vicariate of Sofia; in Rumania, the archdiocese of Bucharest and the privileged diocese of Iassi. In 1823, at the time when this volume closes, the Greek patriarch of Constantinople still extended his jurisdiction over the whole Balkan peninsula, and the Turkish power held sway everywhere either directly or indirectly through the limited vassalage of the principality of Moldavia-Walachia.[23]

The Ruthenian Catholic Church

The Church that was most tried by the transformations of the era we are now studying was the Ruthenian Church.[24]

[23] On the Latin Church in Bulgaria, see the article "Bulgarie" in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, II, 1231–36; on the Bogomiles, see the article "Bogomiles," II, 926–30. On the Latin Church of Rumania, see the article under the same title in the Echos d'Orient, VI (1903), 42–50, with the important corrections of page 224.

[24] For the history of the Ruthenian Church at this period, see Harasiewicz, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenicae (1862), pp. 497 ff.; Julian Pelesz, Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom (1880), II, 495 ff.; Lescœur, L'Eglise catholique en Pologne sous le gouvernement russe (1772–1875), I, 1–126; Pierling, La Russie et le Saint-Siège (1902), Vol. V. The last work is of the highest value and abundantly indicates the bibliography of the subject, but it is confined to the relations with Rome. Harasiewicz, a Ruthenian author of doubtful erudition, is animated by an excessively anti-Polish spirit; Pelesz, also Ruthenian, is too Polish. In these questions to maintain a just middle course is indeed hard. In truth, the history of the Ruthenian Church is still to be written. Consult also the work of Father Theiner, Die Neusten Zustande der katholischen Kirche beider Ritus in Polen und Russland seit Katharine II bis auf unsere Tage (1847); this work has been translated into

On the eve of the partition of Poland in 1772, the Ruthenian hierarchy included eight eparchies or effective dioceses: Kiev, the theoretical seat of the metropolitan, although, after the return of that city to Russia in 1667, he resided by turns at Vilna, Novgorod, and finally at Radomychl in Ukrainia; Polotsk, Vladimir in Volynia, Loutsk, Lvov or Leopol (Lemburg), Peremychl, Kholm, and Pinsk. These eight dioceses counted around 13,000 parishes, large and small, and a Catholic Ruthenian population which amounted to about 5,000,000 souls.[25]

The first partition of Poland (1772) placed a part of White Russia and a good piece of the archdiocese of Polotsk under the scepter of Catherine II of Russia; under that of Austria went the eparchies of Peremychl and Lvov, except the district of Kamenietz-Podolsk. The sections taken by Russia were within the solidly Polish region of the kingdom.

The second partition (1793) gave Russia almost the whole metropolitan eparchy, the district of Kamenietz-Podolsk from Lvov on, the eastern part of the diocese of Loutsk, the city of Pinsk with nearly all the territory of the diocese, and finally the remainder of the eparchy of Podolsk. At the third partition (1795), which was only a continuation of the first, Russia received the rest of the eparchies of Loutsk and Pinsk and the whole eparchy of Vladimir in Volynia. Likewise, in 1795, Austria received the territory of Kholm. In 1793 Russia had taken over Great Poland, a completely Polish district, but in French and Italian, but the German edition is the best because it contains documents that are lacking in the translations. See also, though with caution in what concerns the Jesuits, L'histoire de Clement XIV, by the same author.

---

[25] Each bishop could have one or more coadjutors, who were then decorated with the title of some city in the eparchy, sometimes itself a former episcopal see: this institution is to be found in the Russian non-Catholic Church and in the Rumanian Church. To Polotsk were thus attached the ancient sees of Vitebsk, Mscislav, Orcha, and Moghilev; to Vladimir, Brest-Litovskij; to Loutsk, Ostrog; to Leopol, Galitch and Mamenietz-Podolskij; to Peremychl, Sanok and Sambor; to Kholm, Belz; to Pinsk, Tourov.

1795 she added Mozaria and a part of Lithuania with it: a good many Ruthenians who were thus left without their bishop (of Vladimir and Brest) might be found in the latter region.

The Treaty of Tilsit in 1807 set up the Grand Duchy of Warsaw, which lasted under a form of independence until the treaties of 1815. The eparchy of Kholm was included therein, even though the Lithuanian portion was ceded to Russia in 1795. In 1815 Kholm passed to Russia. The Ruthenian Church then found itself placed under the authority of two sovereigns: the czar of Russia and the emperor of Austria. Except for Red Russia, of which Galicia is a part, the czar regained possession of all the domains over which the old Russian princes of Riourik had ruled.

The political causes for the fall of the Polish kingdom are well known. The nation perished a victim of its anarchical constitution [26] and the unscrupulous ambition of King Frederick II of Prussia. Together these two things forced the hand of Maria Theresa.

From a religious point of view, divorce had reached an unheard-of frequency in Poland—to such an extent that various ambiguous clauses which made separation on the plea of nullity very easy were inserted into the marriage contract. The clergy, unfortunately, too often approved of these maneuvers. The population was once again reduced to a servile state, and the Ruthenians, who formed nearly half of the population, were continually victims of various incurable prejudices that retarded their progress. The children of Ruthenian priests were legally no better than serfs. The Catholic bishops of the Greek rite could not take a seat in the Senate, where the Latin prelates were admitted by law—the metropolitan himself did not obtain a seat until the close of the Republic in 1789. Transfer to the Latin rite became more and more frequent in the upper classes owing to the lack of legislation which Rome had desired to enforce ever since 1624, but which had been refrained from because of opposition from the king and the ecclesiastical authorities.

[26] Poland was an elective and representative monarchy. Between one reign and another, the power was exercised by the archbishop primate of Gnesen until the electoral diet. Often the period was one of anarchy. The laws were voted by the diet, but the principle of the liberum veto could prevent their application: a protest of a few nobles, publicly recorded, was enough to halt everything. The king had merely the executive power.

From an internal point of view, the whole effectiveness of the Ruthenian Church rested with the Basilians. They alone were educated since they alone had theological schools and were free from the dominance of the landed nobility. All the bishops were recruited from their ranks, and the Council of Zamosc in 1720 passed a law requiring every secular priest who was called to the episcopate to make monastic profession before his consecration.[27] Since a general belief prevailed at that time that such was the true discipline of the Eastern Church, Rome had confirmed the measure. The religious were everything: they occupied the important positions in the diocesan curias and cathedral chapters—an institution evidently of Latin origin but one which had been firmly established since before the Union of Brest in 1595.

As for the secular clergy, they were almost all married, deprived of seminaries in spite of all the efforts to remedy that need, chained to the soil which they often worked with their own hands, and regarded as low and commonplace by the upper classes. The best secular clergy, and the only ones that were generally celibate, were students of the pontifical colleges of Lvov and Vilna. But often they would despair of improving their lot and entered the Basilians upon completing their studies.

This preponderance of the Basilians, which was abnormal in a country where the secular clergy had been at the peak of its task, was the cause of a good many of the troubles, especially after the middle of the eighteenth century, that beset this Church.

[27] When the rule finally became the exception, the Council of Leopol in 1891 abolished the decree of Zamosc.

To improve the secular clergy, they needed to be assured of equality with the Latin clergy before the civil law of the state, to be given seminaries, and to be rendered celibate little by little. This change supposed a compromise between different factors that could not or would not support any reforms.

Not only through corrupt morals and the frequency of divorce had the Polish nobility been infected, but the skepticism introduced by the circulation of the writings of the French philosophers caused ravages among the members of that group along with the others. Freemasonry had also been introduced into the kingdom, and, if some of the bishops did perhaps stand up against it, they did not always do their duty in this regard. Finally, the bishop of Vilna, Ignatius Massalski, was responsible for having placed in the upper hierarchy a Calvinist of imperfect conversion, Stanislas Siestrzencewicz of Bohusz, who would be at the head of the Latin rite in Russia for half a century and who would conduct himself in all matters in accord with the principles of purest Febronianism.

The pretext invented by Frederick II of Prussia and Catherine of Russia for intervening in Polish affairs and preparing the partition of the country was the question of the dissidents, the Protestants and the Ruthenian schismatics. In the sixteenth century, the Jesuits, working with a less corrupt society, had been able to check the former and they converted a large number. Unfortunately, to continue this work took all their effort.

With regard to the Ruthenians who had not yet embraced the Union, the ease with which Ukrania, the citadel of schism in the old days, had been won by Catholicism indicated that the same procedure would have been used in White Russia, if the fault of permitting the establishment of the diocese of Moghilev, which became the center of ceaseless agitation for Russian intervention, had not been committed. The abandonment of the Ruthenian Church by the Polish people was one of the chief causes for the fall of their nation.

At the time of the first partition, the metropolitan of Kiev was Felician Volodkovitch (1762–78). A projected synod could not be held, and various accusations which have not been made clear even in our own time caused the metropolitan to resign all jurisdiction over his own eparchy and over the eparchy of Vladimir, which he governed as administrator. The former was entrusted to the care of Leo Cheptitskij, the bishop of Lvov, and the latter to Anthony Mlodovskij, the bishop of Brest and coadjutor of the diocese of Vladimir. The king of Poland, Stanislas Augustus Poniatowski, was very active in having the arrangement confirmed by Rome, and the Holy See, after learning all the details of the affair, gave its approval. This affair was not ended until 1774—Volodkovitch died in 1778. His successor was Leo Cheptitskij, bishop of Lvov, but only for the space of one year, for he died at the end of 1780. Jason Smogorjevskij, archbishop of Polotsk, was elected in his place and passed again under Polish domination in order to take possession of his see. Dead in 1786, he had Theodosius Rostotskij, the bishop of Kholm and his coadjutor, for his successor. Around the time of the third partition of Poland, he was held in semi-captivity at St. Petersburg, where he died in 1805. The Ruthenian Church was, except for the ancient eparchies, established in Hungary, which had always had a separate existence, divided into three parts, between Prussia, Russia, and Austria.

In Prussia, first of all, the division of the eparchy of Brest-Vladimir, which had fallen under that power, reinforced the archimandrate of Suprasl which dated from a foundation of the metropolitan of Kiev, Joseph Soltan, in 1553. On March 4, 1798, Pius VI elevated Suprasl to a Ruthenian diocese and named Theodosius Vitotskij, the archimandrite of the monastery, as its first bishop, from the Carthusian monastery in Florence where the Roman Republic had forced the pope to take refuge.

The king of Prussia assured the new bishop and also his cathedral chapter of a considerable endowment. Vitotskij died around 1805, and his successor, Douchnovskij, followed him to the grave before being able to obtain episcopal consecration. In 1807, by the Treaty of Tilsit, the territory of this short-lived eparchy passed to Russia, and no Ruthenians were any longer left in Prussia.

The Catholic Church in Russia

In Russia the treaty signed by Catherine II in 1793 following the first partition of Poland granted expressly the exercise of their religion to the Catholics of both rites. But Catherine did not respect this article of the treaty any more than she did the others.

Already since 1766 she had been intervening in the affairs of the Latin Catholic community in St. Petersburg at the request of some of its members. Formerly this community had been dependent on Propaganda through the intermediary of the nuncio of Warsaw or Vienna, but after this time, on account of the many law suits between the clergy and the faithful —and the divisions between them had not a little to do with the affair—it was to be dependent on the College at St. Petersburg and, in a way, on the Ministry of Justice. The regulations of 1769, never approved by the Holy See, were the embodiment of all the legislation that regulated the Catholic Church of both rites in Russia.

The Latin dioceses of Poland had been dismembered just as the Ruthenian eparchies were after the partitions.[28] In 1772, [28] The Latin dioceses in Poland comprise seventeen sees: Gnesen (primatial see), Leopol (archbishopric), Kamenietz, Chelm (Kholm), Cujavie, Culm, Kiev, Cracow, Luck (Loutsk), Plock, Posen, Peremychl, Samogitie, Smolensk, Varmie, Pilten, and Vilna. Each can have a coadjutor, who is called suffragan.

an imperial decree of December 14 determined the lot of Latin and Ruthenian Catholics without the least taking note of the authority of the Holy See. As it was, Catherine applied the principles of Febronianism in all cases and the archbishop whom she herself installed and whom Rome was forced to recognize was not one to turn her from its maxims.

After this decree all communication with the Holy See was forbidden unless it passed through government channels. The whole Empire would have but one Latin diocese, and all religious without exception would be subject to it: legislation from St. Petersburg in 1769 rendered it exactly thus. As for the titular of this immense diocese which included all European and Asiatic Russia, he was not named for some time. With regard to the Ruthenians, since the archbishop of Polotsk, at that time Jason Smogorjevskij, had his residence in Russian territory, the decree conferred on him the same authority for his own rite as it had on the Latin bishop.

Massalski's protégé, Siestrzencewicz,[29] obtained the necessary bulls from Rome to become the suffragan of Vilna within Russian territory through his donor's influence—Massalski always tried to be persona grata to Catherine. Consecrated titular bishop of Mallo on October 1, 1773, he departed almost immediately for St. Petersburg. He had the confidence of the Polish nuncio, Garampi, as well as that of Massalski and Catherine II, and not long afterward his true feelings were discovered at Rome. Since Catherine did not wish to deal with the pope personally, she charged Siestrzencewicz with all negotiations with the Holy See, and, without giving more attention to the matter, named him bishop of Moghilev in White Russia by decree of November 22, 1773. Having the welfare of souls in mind and not suspecting anything, Clement XIV recognized the usurper of the powers binding upon all the Latin Catholics in the Empire.

[29] This unlucky man, who governed the Latin Church in Russia from 1774 to 1826, that is, for half a century, was a Lithuanian of the lower nobility, born a Calvinist, became a volunteer in the Prussian army, was wounded either in war or in a duel; he was converted at Berlin after his wound—according to some, following a love romance; at the home of the Radziwills, say others. He was a student at Berlin and at Frankfort, then tutor of the children of Martin Radziwill and was named an officer in the Lithuanian guards. Ignace Massalski, his protector, bishop of Vilna, was a worldly prelate, such as many were in Poland of that time. He was a passionate gambler, always short of funds in spite of an immense fortune, a great builder of churches, and concerned with spreading instruction in the popular masses. He is the one who pushed Siestrzencewicz into holy orders about 1764, and then made him canon of Vilna, pastor of Bobruisk, and ad interim administrator of the diocese. At the time of the 1794 revolution, Massalski was massacred by the populace because of his Russophile tendencies. Stanislas Siestrzencewicz died December 1, 1826, at the age of ninety-six.

At Rome no way out of this inextricable situation could be found. Between times, hundreds of parishes in Ukrainia had been snatched from union by measures in which violence played a great part. Later, four schismatic eparchies were erected in the territories obtained at the second and third partitions of Poland. An attempt at mediation by Maria Theresa met with no success whatever. Jason Smogorjevskij was elected metropolitan in 1780, and just as he resided in Poland, his successor, Bishop Maximilian Ryllo of Kholm, preferred to live in Austria. Therefore Catherine entrusted the administration of the see to a consistory. Thus the Ruthenians no longer had any hierarchy, and the Latins had a bishop who was only canonically supplied with binding faculties.

In 1780 Pius VI himself wrote to Catherine to ask for the nomination of a Ruthenian bishop. Catherine answered him by calling in turn for the erection of Moghilev into an archdiocese and the pallium for Siestrzencewicz, with a coadjutor in addition. Since the Pope delayed on account of an injuction which Siestrzencewicz had issued and which the Pope wished him to retract, Catherine named her protégé archbishop of Moghilev by a decree of January 17–28, 1782, illegally conferred on him ample powers over the religious, and gave him the former Jesuit, Benislawski, for coadjutor. The organization of the archdiocese and the installation followed at once, and Siestrzencewicz consented to it all.

This period in the history of the Catholic Church in Russia is linked too much with that of the Jesuits not to say a short word about it here. The brief of Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, had to be published in each diocese in order to accomplish its purpose. Catherine, who needed the Jesuits for the education of the nation's youth and who was well acquainted with their superior methods, formally forbade Siestrzencewicz to publish the brief. The Jesuits in White Russia, where their college at Polotsk had been famous for a long time, were thus held together. The ill will of the Bishop of Mallo toward the Society gave way before the will of the Empress, but at the Vatican the publication of the brief was insisted on under pressure from the Bourbon courts. In reality, Pius VI had desired to save the Jesuits and he was delighted from the first by the opening of a novitiate at Polotsk—with the consent of Siestrzencewicz, but forced by the Empress in the meantime. The Pope indicated this fact to Benislawski in several significant conversations when the latter came to Rome to hasten the negotiations while the Russian ambassador at Warsaw, Stackelburg, pressed the nuncio, Archetti, more and more.

Moreover, Archetti desired the mission to Catherine with which he was entrusted at the end of 1783. He arrived in St. Petersburg in July, and was well received there by the Empress, who flattered herself with having vanquished the pope. Actually, the desire to save the 12,000,000 Catholics of both rites in Russia from the evident menace of the autocracy had caused Pius VI to overlook the repeated and pressing demands for the suppression of the Jesuits from the Bourbon courts.

At the end of December, 1783, Archetti canonically erected the archdiocese of Moghilev by means of cleverly drawn-up official acts in a way to safeguard the pope's rights, and shortly afterward Heraclius Lissovskij was lawfully enthroned in the Ruthenian see of Polotsk. After a stay of eleven months in Russia, Archetti returned to Poland in order to receive the red hat, which his Russian mission and the renewed esteem of Catherine for the Pope had earned for him. The Empress had desired the same favor for Siestrzencewicz, but this time Pius VI was immovable.

After the third partition of Poland, Catherine erected three new Latin dioceses in her own domains, at Livonia, Pinsk, and Latychev, upon the ruins of the former sees without referring to the Pope, and she placed all the Ruthenians under the archbishop of Polotsk. Her purpose was to destroy the united Church bit by bit. She would undoubtedly have accomplished this purpose if death had not carried her off in 1796.

Her son, Paul I, was as tolerant as his mother was intolerant. A stay at Rome in 1782 filled him with veneration for the Pope, Pius VI, and he protected the Jesuits and held them in high regard. The coronation of the new emperor and his good disposition greatly facilitated the mission to St. Petersburg of Msgr. Lorenzo Litta, the nuncio at Warsaw in 1797. The following year, after some negotiations which had at times been rather difficult because Paul held strongly to his autocratic power in spite of his benevolence, a series of decrees from Litta organized the Catholic Church in Russia on a regular basis. The diocese of Moghilev retained its vast territory, but it was given two suffragans: one at St. Petersburg and one at Moghilev. Siestrzencewicz became the metropolitan of all the Latin Churches in the Empire, and for himself and his successors obtained the privilege of wearing red garb. Within the recently annexed provinces, five bishoprics were either confirmed or established: Vilna (with four suffragans), Loutsk-Jitomir, Kamenietz-Podolsk, and Minsk. None of Litta's decrees provided for the Ruthenians, still he did not overlook them entirely, for he obtained two new sees in their favor: Loutsk and Brest Litovsk. Unfortunately the affair at Malta, too complicated to be recounted here,[30] caused Msgr. Litta's disgrace at the court and he had to quit Russia in 1799.

Yet his achievements endured. Paul I continued to protect the Jesuits, and asked the pope to formally recognize them at the very time when negotiations for uniting the Russian and Roman Churches were being opened by Father Gruber as intermediary. Paul's assassination during a palace revolution (March 11–23, 1801) put an end to everything. In spite of his fanciful character, great things might have been expected from an emperor who had enough insight to banish the unworthy Siestrzencewicz and replace him with Benislawski.

Alexander I

Siestrzencewicz returned with the accession of Alexander I. The new czar, an adherent of liberal ideas, showed himself well disposed toward the Jesuits, but he let himself be taken in by the cleverness of the metropolitan archbishop of Moghilev, who had resigned his see. The Emperor showed that he was being influenced at the creation of the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical College in 1801. This college replaced the former department in the Ministry of Justice and had the last word in the administration of the Catholic Church in Russia. It consisted of nine ecclesiastical members, three of whom were permanent (the archbishop of Moghilev and two assistants named by the college with imperial approval), and six others who were named for a term of three years by each of the six Latin dioceses. The arrangement had nothing to do with the Ruthenians.

This disastrous influence of Siestrzencewicz also served to hinder Msgr. Arezzo's mission to St. Petersburg in 1803. He was interested in settling the question over the right to nominate the bishops, a thing which Litta had not been able to decide, and in regulating the status of the Ruthenians. They had obtained four sees with double representation in the College in 1802, but with a direct right of appeal to the Senate, a solidly schismatic body of legislators—a right which was not without some danger. The deplorable Vernegues affair,[31] which had the air of placing the Holy See in conflict with Russia over a question having to do with a French conspirator, put an end to Msgr. Arezzo's mission in 1804. With such a man as Siestrzencewicz as head of the Catholic College, correspondence with Rome necessarily became more and more difficult. At any rate, soon after Arezzo's departure, the bishops were again forbidden to contact Rome unless through government channels.

[30] Cf. Pierling, pp. 255 ff.

The last metropolitan of Kiev, Theodosius Rostotskij, died at St. Petersburg on January 25, 1805, after obtaining, in his last days, permission to resume his metropolitan jurisdiction. On July 24, 1806, Alexander I named Heraclius Lissovskij metropolitan of the Uniate Churches of Russia, just as Siestrzencewicz was of the Latin Churches. Of course, Rome had no voice in the affair. Since the treaty of Tilsit had reunited the eparchy of Suprasl to Russia, it was returned to the eparchy of Brest, and Leo Javoroskij was consecrated suffragan of Brest with the title of bishop of Vladimir in Volynia at a later date. Lissovskij fixed his residence at Vilna and he had a suffragan in the person of Adrian Golovnia, with the title of bishop of Orcha. At his death (August 30, 1809) he was succeeded by Gregory Kokhanovitch (1809–15), bishop of Loutsk.

The Ruthenian hierarchy in Russia, therefore, comprised the metropolitan see of Vilna with a suffragan at Orcha, the see of Polotsk with the rank of an archbishopric, the diocese of [31] Cf. ibid., pp. 401 ff.

Loutsk, and the diocese of Brest with a suffragan at Vladimir. Lissovskij had no papal confirmation for his elevation to the dignity of metropolitan, nor did Kokhanovitch, and without this confirmation they were not able to consecrate new bishops. Since recourse to Rome was not possible for definite reasons, Kokhanovitch made use of epikeia. A written declaration recognizing all the rights of the Roman Pontiff was sent to Rome through the nuncio at Vienna, and three new bishops were consecrated. This same procedure was followed in 1817, after the death of Kokhanovitch, when Josaphat Boulghak succeeded him. Circumstances forced matters to be arranged as best they could. At the death of Alexander in 1825, Catholic Ruthenians along the frontiers of the Empire officially numbered 1,427,559. Thanks to the tolerance of Paul I, of Alexander, and of Nicholas I during the first years of his reign, the Ruthenians counted a million and a half ten years later.

In 1815, several conversions made by the Jesuits in high Russian society led to their expulsion from the Empire. But henceforth the storms against the Society were a thing of the past: miraculously preserved in Russia, they went forth from there and established themselves anew throughout the world.[32]

Alexander passed his last few days (November 19 to December 1, 1825) at Taganrog on the Sea of Azov. Ever since 1812 some mysterious attachment had been bringing him closer and closer to the Catholic Church. He showed himself so sincere that he entered into relations with Pope Leo XII the very year of his death and petitioned the papal envoy in Russia for a priest appointed by the Pope, who would prepare the way for his conversion. We are almost absolutely certain that Alexander I died desiring in his heart communion with the Church of Rome, if he did not have the ministrations of a Catholic priest at his deathbed.[33]

[32] On the Jesuits of Russia, the most accessible work is that of Father Stanislas Zalenski, Les Jésuites de la Russie Blanche. On the conversions that brought about their expulsion, see the interesting Vie du P. Marc Folloppe by Father Gagrine (1877), pp. 34 ff.

We must say a few words about the part of the Ruthenian Church that passed under Austrian rule. Here, at least, was no fear of violence. Maria Theresa was full of good will toward the Ruthenians. In 1774 she erected a central seminary at Vienna, close to the Ruthenian church of St. Barbara, which was intended for subjects from the Galacian eparchies. At the same time the Ruthenian clergy were put on an equal footing with the Latin clergy. The queer ideas entertained by Joseph II (1780–90) were felt as much in Galacia as anywhere else: the magnificent pontifical college at Leopol for Ruthenians and Armenians was closed down and replaced by one of the Emperor's notorious general seminaries, which, in this case, cast Latins, Ruthenians, Armenians, Rumanians, and Serbs together into one confused lot. Political changes caused the addition of new districts to the eparchies of Leopol and Peremychl, but everything was done with the regular approval of the lawful metropolitan, Jason Smogorjevskij. Francis II (1792–1835) likewise respected Theodosius Rostotskij's authority over the eparchies of Leopol, Peremychl, and Kholm, after the partition of 1795. In 1802, Pius VII once again most explicitly forbade the passage from one rite to another without the permission of the Holy See, as a consequence of new quarrels caused by a movement to the contrary which had been undertaken by the Polish clergy. This body proved itself to be no more broadminded in regard to the Greek rite in Russia or Austria than it had been in what had once been Poland.

In 1805 the Ruthenian procurator at Rome, Father Jourdan Mitskievitch, took steps toward the restoration of the former metropolitan see of Galitch. Following the death of the bishops of Peremychl and Kholm, the new bishop of Peremychl remained a sole administrator of the Ruthenians in Austria. Eight days before the calends of March, 1807, Pius VII issued the bull In universalis ecclesiae, restoring the metropolitan diocese of Galitch. Situated in territory belonging to the eparchy of Leopol, Galitch was united with that archbishopric, and Peremychl and Kholm became its suffragans. Anthony Anghelovitch became the first metropolitan of Galacia.

[33] This question is studied in all its details by Father Pierling in an interesting pamphlet, Empereur Alexandre Ier est-il mort catholique? (1901).

The treaties of 1815 passed Kholm over to Russia. Anthony Anghelovitch had died in the previous year and was succeeded in 1818 by Michael Levitskij, who would die a cardinal. His story belongs to the following period.[34] [34] The Ruthenians of Austria at this period might have amounted to two million. Their number is now more that double that number.

Appendixes

APPENDIX I

Declaration of the Rights of Man (at the head of the Constitution of 1791)

THE representatives of the French people, constituted in national assembly, considering that ignorance, forgetfulness, or contempt of the rights of man are the only cause of public evils and the corruption of governments, have resolved to set forth, in a solemn declaration, the natural, inalienable, and sacred rights of man to the end that this declaration, perpetually present to all the members of the social body, will ceaselessly remind them of their rights and duties; that the acts of the legislative power and those of the executive power may be at all times compared with the demands of the citizens and henceforth based on simple and incontestable principles, may always be directed to the maintenance of the Constitution and the welfare of all.

Hence the National Assembly acknowledges and declares, in the presence of and under the auspices of the Supreme Being, the following rights of man and of the citizen.

Article 1. Men are born and remain free and equal in rights. Social distinctions can be based only on the common usefulness.

Article 2. The purpose of every political association is the preservation of the natural and inalienable rights of man. These rights are liberty, ownership of property, safety, and resistance to oppression.

Article 3. The principle of all sovereignty resides essentially in the nation; no body and no individual can exercise any authority which does not expressly emanate therefrom.

Article 4. Liberty consists in being able to do whatever does not injure another: thus the exercise of each man's natural rights has no bounds but those which assure to the other members of society the enjoyment of these same rights. These bounds can be determined only by the law.

Article 5. The law has the right to forbid only actions that are harmful to society. Whatever is not forbidden by law may not be hindered and no one may be constrained to do what the law does not ordain.

Article 6. The law is the expression of the general will. All the citizens have the right to participate in its formation either personally or through their representatives. This law must be the same for all, whether it protects or punishes. All citizens, being equal in its eyes, are likewise eligible to all public offices, places, and employments, according to their capacity, with no distinctions but their virtues and talents.

Article 7. No one may be accused, arrested, or detained except in the cases determined by the law and in accordance with the forms it has prescribed. Those who solicit, dispatch, execute or have executed arbitrary orders should be punished; but every citizen summoned or seized in virtue of the law must promptly obey: by resistance he renders himself culpable.

Article 8. The law should establish only penalties that are strictly and evidently necessary, and no one may be punished except in virtue of a law established and promulgated previous to the offense and legally applied.

Article 9. Everyone being presumed innocent until he has been declared guilty, if it is judged indispensable to arrest him, all rigor not necessary for assuring his person must be severely repressed by the law.

Article 10. No one is to be troubled for his opinions, even religious opinions, provided their manifestation does not disturb the public order established by law.

Article 11. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of man's most precious rights; every citizen, therefore, may speak, write, and print freely, except that he must be held responsible for the abuse of this freedom in the cases determined by the law.

Article 12. The guaranty of the rights of man and the citizen requires a public force: this force, then, is instituted for the benefit of all, and not for the particular advantage of those to whom it is entrusted.

Article 13. For the maintenance of the public forces and for the expenses of administration, a common contribution is indispensable; it should be shared equally by all the citizens, on the basis of their ability to contribute to it.

Article 14. All citizens have the right to determine, by themselves or through their representatives, the need of the public contribution, freely to agree to it, to watch over its collection, and to determine its amount, its assessment, its collection, and its duration.

Article 15. Society has the right to require from every public agent an accounting of his administration.

Article 16. Every society in which the guaranty of rights is not assured and the separation of powers is not determined is to be regarded as not constituted.

Article 17. Ownership being an inviolable and sacred right, no one can be deprived of it except when public necessity, lawfully established, evidently so requires, and under the condition of a just and previous indemnity.

APPENDIX II

The French Concordat of 1801

THE government of the Republic recognizes that the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion is the religion of the great majority of French citizens.

His Holiness recognizes that this same religion has derived and expects even more at this time the greatest splendor from the establishment of Catholic worship in France and from the special profession of that religion by the consuls of the Republic.

Wherefore, in accordance with this mutual recognition, for the good of religion as also for the maintenance of internal tranquillity, they have covenanted as follows:

Article 1. The Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion will be freely exercised in France. Its worship will be public, in conformity with the police regulations that the government will judge necessary for public tranquillity.

Article 2. In concert with the government, the Holy See will make a new circumscription of the French dioceses.

Article 3. The Supreme Pontiff will declare to the titulars of the Churches of France that he expects from them, with firm confidence, for the sake of peace and unity, every kind of sacrifice, even that of their episcopal sees.

If, after this exhortation, they refuse to make this sacrifice sought for the good of the Church (a refusal which, however, His Holiness does not expect), provision will be made, by new titulars, for the government of the bishoprics of the new circumscription, in the following manner.

Article 4. The first consul of the Republic, within three months following the publication of the bull of His Holiness, will nominate to the archbishoprics and bishoprics of the new circumscription. His Holiness will confer canonical institution according to the forms established in relation to France before the change of government.

Article 5. Nominations to the bishoprics that will become vacant subsequently will likewise be made by the first consul, and the canonical institution will be given by the Holy See, in conformity with the preceding article.

Article 6. Before entering upon their office, the bishops shall make directly into the hands of the first consul the oath of fidelity that was in use before the change of government, expressed in the following terms.

"I swear and promise to God, upon the holy Gospels, to keep obedience and fidelity to the government established by the Constitution of the French Republic. I promise also to entertain no knowledge, to participate in no counsel, to enter into no league, whether internal or external, which may be contrary to the public tranquillity; and if, in my diocese or elsewhere, I learn that anything is being contrived to the prejudice of the State, I will make the same known to the government."

Article 7. The ecclesiastics of the second order will take the same oath in the hands of the civil authorities designated by the government.

Article 8. At the end of the divine office the following prayer will be recited in all the Catholic churches of France:

"Domine, salvam fac Rempublicam; Domine, salvos fac Consules."

Article 9. The bishops will make a new circumscription of the parishes of their dioceses, which will go into effect only after the consent of the government.

Article 10. The bishops will appoint the curés. Their choice will designate only persons approved by the government.

Article 11. The bishops may have a chapter in their cathedral and a seminary for their diocese, without the government being obliged to endow these.

Article 12. All metropolitan churches, cathedrals, parish churches, and others, not alienated, will be put at the disposition of the bishops.

Article 13. His Holiness, for the sake of peace and the happy re-establishment of the Catholic religion, declares that neither he nor his successors will in any way disturb those who have acquired alienated ecclesiastical property; consequently the ownership of these same properties, together with the rights and revenues attached thereto, will remain indefeasible in their hands and those of their assigns.

Article 14. The government will assure a suitable support (salary) to the bishops and the curés whose dioceses and parishes will be embraced in the new circumscription.

Article 15. The government will likewise adopt measures so that French Catholics, if they so wish, may make foundations in favor of the churches.

Article 16. His Holiness recognizes in the first consul of the French Republic the same rights and prerogatives as those enjoyed in relation to him by the former government.

Article 17. It is agreed between the contracting parties that, in the event that any of the successors of the first consul should not be Catholic, the rights and prerogatives mentioned in the foregoing article and the appointment to the bishoprics, will be regulated with regard to him by a new convention.

Organic Articles of the Concordat of 1801

Title I

Of the governance of the Catholic Church in its general relations with the rights and police of the State

1. No bull, brief, decree, mandate, appointment, signature in lieu of appointment, nor other dispatches from the court of Rome, even concerning merely individuals, can be received, published, printed, or otherwise put into execution without the authorization of the government.

2. No individual calling himself nuncio, legate, apostolic vicar or commissioner, or availing himself of any other title, may, without the same authorization, exercise on French soil or elsewhere any function relative to the affairs of the Gallican Church.

3. The decrees of foreign synods, even of general councils, may not be published in France before the government has examined their form, their conformity with the laws, rights, and liberties of the French Republic, and whatever, in their publication, might alter or concern the public tranquillity.

4. No national or metropolitan council, no diocesan synod, and no deliberative assembly can be held without the express permission of the government.

5. All ecclesiastical functions shall be gratis, save for the offerings that will be authorized and fixed by the regulations.

6. Recourse will be had to the Council of State in all cases of abuse on the part of superiors and other ecclesiastical persons.

Cases of abuse are: the usurpation of authority or excess by the power, contravention of the laws and regulations of the Republic, infraction of the rules consecrated by the canons received in France, attacks on the liberties, privileges, and customs of the Gallican Church, and any undertaking or procedure that, in the exercise of worship, may compromise the honor of the citizens, arbitrarily disturb their conscience, or degenerate into oppression or injury of them, or into public scandal.

7. Likewise recourse will be had to the Council of State if offense is offered to the public exercise of religion and to the freedom which the laws and regulations guarantee to its ministers.

8. The recourse is available to any person concerned. In the absence of complaints by a private person, it will be made ex officio by the prefects.

The public official, the ecclesiastic, or the person who wishes to take recourse, will address a detailed and signed memorial to the Counselor of the State charged with all affairs concerning public worship. He must, with the shortest delay, take note of all suitable information. On his report, the affair will be continued and finally terminated in the administrative form or, according to the requirement of the case, referred to the competent authorities.

Title II

Of the ministers

Section 1. General provisions

9. Catholic worship will be carried out under the direction of the archbishops and bishops in their dioceses, and under that of the curés in their parishes.

10. Every privilege bearing exemption from the episcopal jurisdiction is abolished.

11. The archbishops and bishops, with the authorization of the government, may establish in their dioceses cathedral chapters and seminaries. All other ecclesiastical establishments are suppressed.

12. Archbishops and bishops are free to add to their name the title of Citizen or that of Monsieur. All other titles are forbidden.

Section 2. Archbishops or metropolitans

13. The archbishops will consecrate and install their suffragans. In case they are hindered or refuse, their place will be taken by the senior bishop of the metropolitan district.

14. They will watch over the maintenance of the faith and discipline in the dioceses dependent on their archiepiscopal see.

15. They will take cognizance of the claims and complaints brought against the conduct and decisions of the suffragar bishops.

Section 3. Bishops, vicars general, and seminaries

16. No one may be appointed bishop before the age of thirty years and unless he is of French birth.

17. Before the expedition of the decision of nomination, he or those proposed will be obliged to bear a testimonial of good life and morals, to be sent by the bishop in whose diocese they have exercised the office of ecclesiastical minister. And they shall be examined on their doctrine by a bishop and two priests, who will be commissioned by the first consul, and these shall report the result of their examination to the Counselor of State charged with all matters concerning public worship.

18. The priest named by the first consul will promptly report the institution by the pope.

He may not exercise any function before the bull of institution has received the sanction of the government and he has in person taken the oath prescribed by the convention entered into between the French government and the Holy See.

This oath will be taken before the first consul; the official document will be drawn up by the Secretary of State.

19. The bishops will appoint and institute the curés. However, they will not make known their appointment and will not give canonical institution until the appointment has been approved by the first consul.

20. They will be held to residence in their dioceses. They may leave their dioceses only with permission of the first consul.

21. Each bishop may appoint two vicars general, and each archbishop may appoint three. They will select them from the priests having the qualifications for becoming bishops.

22. Every year they will personally make a visitation of part of their diocese, and in the space of five years the entire diocese. In case of lawful hindrance, the visitation will be made by a vicar general.

23. The bishops will be charged with the organization of their seminaries, and the rules of this organization will be submitted to the approval of the first consul.

24. Those who will be chosen for teaching in the seminaries will subscribe to the declaration made by the clergy of France in 1682 and published by the edict of the same year. They will agree to teach there the doctrine contained in that edict. The bishops will send a form of this agreement to the Counselor charged with all the affairs concerning public worship.

25. The bishops will every year send to the Counselor of State the names of persons studying in the seminaries and destined for the ecclesiastical state.

26. They will not ordain any ecclesiastic unless he shows possession of property producing an annual revenue of at least 300 francs, and has attained the age of 25 years, and possesses the qualifications required by the canons received in France.

The bishops will not perform any ordination before the number of persons to be ordained has been submitted to the government and approved by it.

Section 4. The curés

27. The curés will enter upon their functions only after they have taken, in the hands of the prefect, the oath prescribed by the convention agreed to between the government and the Holy See. An official certificate of this oath will be drawn up by the secretary general of the prefecture, and a verified copy of it will be delivered to them.

28. They will be put in possession by the curé or the priest whom the bishop will designate.

29. They will be held to residence in their parish.

30. The curés shall be directly subject to the bishops in the exercise of their functions.

31. The curates and other officiating priests shall exercise their ministry under the surveillance and direction of the curés. They will be approved by the bishop and subject to recall by him.

32. No foreigner may be employed in the functions of the ecclesiastical ministry without the permission of the government.

33. Every function is forbidden to any ecclesiastic, even French, who does not belong to any diocese.

34. A priest may not leave his diocese to serve in another without the permission of his bishop.

Section 5: Cathedral chapters and the government of the dioceses during the vacancy of the see

35. The archbishops and bishops wishing to make use of the faculty granted them to establish chapters may not do so without having reported the authorization of the government, both for the said establishment and also for the number and choice of the ecclesiastics destined to form them.

36. During the vacancy of the sees, for the government of the dioceses provision will be made by the metropolitan or, in case of his failure or inability to do so, by the senior of the suffragan bishops. The vicars general of these dioceses will continue their functions, even after the bishop's death, until he is replaced.

37. The metropolitans, the cathedral chapters, will be held, without delay, to notify the government of the vacancy of the sees, and of the measures that will have been taken for the government of the vacant dioceses.

38. The vicars general who will govern during the vacancy, as also the metropolitans or capitularies, will not permit any innovation in the usages and customs of the dioceses.

Title III

Worship

39. There will be only one liturgy and one catechism for all the churches of France.

40. No curé may order public extraordinary prayers in his parish without the special permission of the bishop.

41. No feast day, except Sunday, may be established without the permission of the government.

42. In religious ceremonies the ecclesiastics will use dress and vestments suitable to their title: in no case and under no pretext may they assume the color and the distinctive marks reserved to the bishops.

43. All ecclesiastics will be attired in the French manner and in black. The bishops may add to this costume the pastoral cross and violet stockings.

44. Domestic chapels or private oratories may not be established without an express permission of the government, granted at the request of the bishop.

45. No religious ceremony will take place outside of edifices consecrated to Catholic worship, in the cities, where there are temples destined for different religions.

46. The same temple may be consecrated for only one and the same religion.

47. In the cathedrals and parishes there will be a special place for Catholic individuals who hold civil and military offices.

48. The bishop will concert with the prefect the manner of calling the faithful to divine service by the ringing of the church bells. Without the permission of the local police these bells may not be rung for any other purpose.

49. When the government orders public prayers, the bishops will confer with the military commandant of the place regarding the day, the hour, and the manner of carrying out these orders.

50. Solemn preaching, called sermons, and preaching known under the name of stations of Advent and Lent, will not be given except by priests who have obtained a special authorization of the bishop.

51. The curés, at the sermon of the parish Masses, will pray and will have prayers said for the prosperity of the French Republic and for the consuls.

52. In their instructions they will not permit themselves any blame, either direct or indirect, against the persons or against the other religions authorized in the State.

53. At the sermon they will not make any publication foreign to the exercise of worship, unless such is ordered by the government.

54. They will not give the nuptial blessing except to those who certify, in good and due form, that they have contracted marriage before the civil official.

55. The registers kept by the ministers of religion, since they concern only the administration of the sacraments, cannot in any case take the place of the registers ordered by the law for certifying the civil status of Frenchmen.

56. In all ecclesiastical and religious acts there is the obligation of making use of the equinox calendar established by the laws of the Republic; the days are to be designated by the names they have in the solstice calendar.

57. The day of rest for public officials will be fixed for Sunday.

Title IV

The circumscription of archbishoprics, bishoprics, and parishes; edifices destined for worship; the support of the ministers

Section 1. The circumscription of archbishoprics and bishoprics

58. There will be in France ten archbishoprics or metropolitans, and fifty bishoprics.

59. The circumscription of the metropolitans and of the dioceses will be made in conformity with the subjoined table.

Section 2. The circumscription of the parishes

60. There shall be at least one parish for every justice of the peace.

In addition there will be established as many subsidiary churches as need may require.

61. Each bishop, in concert with the prefect, will regulate the number and extent of these subsidiary churches. The plans drawn up will be submitted to the government and will not be carried out without its authorization.

62. No part of French territory can be erected into parishes or auxiliary churches without the express authorization of the government.

63. The priests serving the auxiliary churches will be named by the bishops.

Section 3. The support of the ministers

64. The salary of the archbishops will be 15,000 francs.

65. The salary of the bishops will be 10,000 francs.

66. The curés will be divided into two classes. The salary of the curés of the first class will be 1,500 francs; those of the second class will receive 1,000 francs.

67. The allowance payable to them for executing the laws of the Constituent Assembly will be deducted from their salary.

The general councils of the large communes may, from the income deriving from their rural possessions or from their tolls, grant the curés an increase of salary if the circumstances so require.

68. The curates and other functioning subordinate priests will be chosen from the number of ecclesiastics receiving income in execution of the laws of the Constituent Assembly. The sum total of these payments and the product of the offerings will form their salary.

69. The bishops will draw up projects of regulations relative to the offerings which the ministers of worship are authorized to receive for the administration of the sacraments. The projects of regulations, drawn up by the bishops, will not be published or otherwise put into effect until they have been approved by the government.

70. Every ecclesiastic receiving an allowance from the State will be refused his allowance if he refuses, without legitimate cause, the functions that may be confided to him.

71. The general councils of a department are authorized to procure a suitable lodging for the archbishops and bishops.

72. The rectories and adjoining gardens that have not been alienated will be placed at the use of the curés and the other priests serving the subsidiary churches. If such rectories are lacking, the general councils of the communes are authorized to procure for them a residence and a garden.

73. Foundations which have for their object the support of the ministers and the exercise of worship may consist only of revenues constituted on the State; they will be received by the diocesan bishop and can be executed only with the authorization of the government.

74. Real property, apart from the buildings intended for residence and the adjoining gardens, cannot be assigned to ecclesiastical titles, nor can they be held by the ministers of worship by reason of their office.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The following is a list of the works referred to in this volume.

ANGLAS, Boissy d' : Essai sur les fêtes.
ANTONIN : Histoire des émigrés français, 1828.
ARNAULT : Souvenirs d'un sexagénaire.
ARTAUD de Montor : The Lives and Times of the Popes.
Vie de Pie VII, 1839.
AULARD, A. : Etudes et leçons sur la Révolution française, 1924.
Histoire politique de la Révolution française, 1901.
Le culte de la raison.
Paris sous le Concordat.
AURIBEAU : Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la persécution, 1794.

BALDASSARI : Relation sur l'enlèvement et la captivité de Pie VI.
BALLANCHE : Œuvres.
BARBE-MARBOIS : Journal d'un deporté non jugé.
BARBERI (ed.) : Bullarium romanum.
BARRAS : Mémoires.
BARRUEL : Histoire du clergé pendant la Révolution française, 1793.
Mémoires sur le jacobinisme.
BASTON : Mémoires, 1899.
BAUNARD : Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, 1902.
BAZOT : Code des franc-maçons.
BEAUREGARD, Brumauld de : Mémoires, 1843.
BECCARIA, Cesare : Tratto dei delitti e delle pene.
BERTRAND : Bibliothèque sulpicienne.
BESNARD : Souvenirs d'un nonagénaire.
BLACHEZ : Bonchamps et l'insurrection vendéene.
BOERO : Osservazioni sopra del pontificato di Clemente XIV, 1853.
BOISGELIN : Observations sur le décret de déportation.
BOISSIN, Firmin : Le Camp de Jalès.
BOSSIER, G : La religion romaine, la fin du paganisme.

BONALD: Theorie du pouvoir civil et religieux.
BOSSARD: Cathelineau, generalissime de la grande armée catholique et royale, 1893.
BOSSUET, Jacques: Politique tirée de l'Ecriture sainte.
BOUILLE, Marquis de: Souvenirs.
BOULLIER, Isidore: Mémoires ecclésiastiques, 1846.
BOURLON: J.: Les Assemblées du clergé et le Jansénisme, 1909.
BOUTARD: Lamennais.
BOUVIER, Claude: Le Franc de Pompignan, 1903.
BRIDIER: Mémoires inédits de M. de Salamon, internonce à Paris, 1892.
BROC, de: Un évêque de l'ancien régime, 1894.
BRUGAL, Simon: Le schisme constitutionnel dans l'Ardèche, 1889.
BRUGERE: Tableau de l'histoire et de la littérature de l'Eglise.
BRYCE, James: The Holy Roman Empire.
BUCHEZ: Traité de philosophie.
Bullarium romanum (ed. Barberi).
BURKE, Edmund: Reflections on the French Revolution.

CALLIPE, C.: L'attitude sociale des catholiques français au XIX^e siècle.
CAMPANELLA: Civitas Solis, 1643.
CANTU, Cesare: Gli eretici in Italia.
Storia dei cent' anni, 1750–1850.
CARON: Les confesseurs de la foi.
CASSAGNAC, Granier de: Histoire des massacres de septembre.
CATTET: La verité sur le cardinal Fesch, 1842.
CHAMPION, Edme: La France d'après les cahiers de 1789, 1907.
CHARPENTIER: Jacques Cathelineau, 1911.
CHATEAUBRIAND: Essai sur les révolutions.
Génie du christianisme.
Mémoires d'outre-tombe.
Œuvres.
Voyage en Amerique.
CHENIRE, André: Œuvres en prose.
CHEROT: Figures de martyrs, 1907.
CHOTARD, H.: Le pape Pie VII à Savone.

CONDORCET : Tableau des progrès de l'esprit humain.
CONSALVI : Mémoires.
CONTRASTY : Le clergé français exilé en Espagne (1792–1802), 1910.
Corpus juris confoederationis germanicae.
Correspondance de Napoléon, 1887.
COSTE : Une victime de la Révolution, Sœur Marguerite Rutan.
CRETINEAU-JOLY : Histoire de la compagnie de Jésus.

DALLET : Histoire de l'Eglise de Corée.
DAUDET, Ernest : Les conspirations royalistes sous la Révolution.
DEBIDOUR : Histoire des rapports de l'Eglise et de l'Etat de 1789 à 1870.
DELAPORTE : Vie de H. Rauzan.
DEMENTHON : Vie de l'abbé J. B. Bottex, 1903.
DENIAU : Histoire de la guerre de Vendée.
Jacques Cathelineau.
DESDEVISES du Dezert : L'Eglise et l'état en France, 1907.
D'HAUSSONVILLE : L'Eglise romaine et le premier empire.
DIDEROT : La religeuse.
DOUMIC, Max : Le secret de la franc-maçonnerie, 1905.
DROCHON : La Petite Eglise, 1894.
DUBOIS : Le Pancha-Tantra, fables de brahme Vichnou.
Letter on the State of Christianity in China.
Mœurs, institutions et cérémonies des peuples de l'Inde.
DUCHEMIN-DESCEPEAUX : Souvenirs de la chouannerie.
DUFOURQC, Albert : Le régime jacobin en Italie, 1900.
DUNOYER, A. : Fouquier-Tinville, 1913.
DUPUIS : L'origine de tous les cultes.
DURUY, Albert : L'instruction publique et la Révolution.
DUVERGIER : Collection des lois et décrets.

FABRE, J. : Les pères de la Révolution.
FABRY, J. B. : Génie de la Révolution considerée dans l'éducation.
Itineraire de Buonaparte.
FAGUET : Le XVIII^e siècle.
Questions politiques.
Vie de Rousseau, 1911.

FAILLON: Vie de M. Olier.
FELICE, G. de: Histoire des protestants de France, 1895.
FELLER: Biographie universelle.
FERRERO: L'Europa giovane.
FICHTE: Beitrage zur Berichtigung der Urtheile des Publicums über die französische Revolution.
Zurückforderung der Denkfreiheit von den Fürsten Europas.
FILANGIERI, Gaetano: Scienza della legislazione.
FLAMMERMONT: Négociations secrètes de Louis XVI et du Baron de Breteuil, 1885.
FLEURY, J. P.: Mémoires.
FLOQUET: Histoire du parlement de Normandie.
FOLLENAY, Paquelle de: M. Teysseyrre.
FOUILLEE, A.: Esquisse psychologique des peuples européens, 1903.
FRANCHETTI, A. M. de: Pie VI dans les prisons du Dauphiné.
FUNCK-BRENTANO: Des lettres de cachet à Paris, 1903.
Légendes et archives de la Bastille, 1904.

GADUEL: Vie et esprit de M. Allemand.
GAGARIN: La Compagnie de Jésus conservée en Russie.
GAGRINE: Vie du P. Marc Folloppe.
GAUDRY: Traité de la législation des cultes, 1854.
GAUTHEROT, G. A.: Conférences sur les origines de la Révolution.
GAUTIER: M^me^ de Staël et Napoléon.
Portraits littéraires.
GAZIER, A.: Etudes sur l'histoire religieuse de la Révolution, 1887.
GENDRY, Jules: Pie VI, sa vie, son pontificat, 1906.
GIOBBIO: La chiesa e lo stato in Francia durante la Rivoluzione, 1905.
GIRAID, Victor: Pages choisies de Chateaubriand.
GODARD: Les principes de 89 et la doctrine catholique, 1865.
GOERRES, Joseph: Die Christliche Mystik.
Mythengeschichte der Asiatischen Welt.
Politische Schriften.
Rheinische Merkur.
Teutschen Volksbücher.
Teutschland und die Revolution.

GOSSELIN: Relation de l'établissement du christianisme dans le royaume de Corée.
GOYAU, G.: L'Allemagne religieuse, 1906.
Vue générale de l'histoire de la papauté, 1895.
GRAF, Arthur: L'Anglomania in Italia, 1911.
GRANDMAISON, Geoffroy de: La Congrégation, 1890.
Les cardinaux noirs, 1895.
GREGOIRE: Essai historique sur les libertés de l'Eglise gallicane.
Histoire des sectes religieuses.
Histoire du mariage des prêtres.
Mémoires, 1839.
GRENTE, J.: Le culte catholique à Paris de la Terreur au Concordat, 1903.
GRILLE: Tableau comparatif des mandats et pouvoirs données en 1789 aux représentants de la nation, 1825.
GROTIUS: De jure pacis et belli.
GUIBERT: Vie de J. B. de La Salle.
GUILLAUME, James: Etudes révolutionnaires.
GUILLON, M. J.: Brefs et Instructions de Pie VI, 1798.
Histoire du siège de Lyon.
GUIZOT: Mémoires.

HAUSSONVILLE: L'Eglise romaine et le premier empire, 1870.
HERDER, J. G.: Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit.
HERGENROTHER-KIRSCH: Kirchengeschichte.
Histoire des voyages des papes depuis Innocent I^er^ jusqu'à Pie VI, 1786.
HOBBES: De cive.
Leviathan.
HOFFDING, Herald: History of Modern Philosophy, 1900.
HOFFMANN, Amedeus: Bruder Medardus.
HOLBACH: Système de la nature.
HUC: Le christianisme en Chine.
HULOT: Collectio brevium Pii VI.

ISABEY and FONTAINE: Cérémonies et fêtes du sacre, 1805.
ISAMBERT: Anciennes lois françaises.

JAGER: Histoire de l'Eglise de France pendant la Révolution.
JANET, Paul: Histoire de la science politique dans ses rapports avec la morale.
JAUFFRET: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la Révolution, 1803.
Joseph II und Leopold von Toscana, 1872.

KELLER, Emile: Le Syllabus et les principes de 89, 1866.
KRAUS: Histoire de l'Eglise.
KURTH, Godefroid: The Church at the Turning Points of History, 1929.

LABORIE, Lanzac de: Paris sous Napoléon, 1908.
LACOMBE, Bernard de: Talleyrand, évêque d'Autun.
LACORDAIRE: Considérations sur le système philosophique de M. de La Mennais.
LA GORCE, De: Histoire religieuse de la Révolution française, 1923.
LAGRANGE: Vie de Mgr Dupanloup.
LAMARTINE: Histoire des Girondins.
LAMBERT: Vie de Mgr de Juigné, 1821.
LAMENNAIS: Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion.
Reflexions sur l'état de l'Eglise en France.
Tradition de l'Eglise sur l'institution des évêques.
LANSON: Histoire de la littérature française.
LANZAC de Laborie: Paris sous Napoléon, 1908.
LAREVELLIERE-LEPEAUX: Mémoires.
LAUNAY, A.: Histoire de la Société des Missions étrangères.
Les missionaires français en Corée.
Les missions catholiques françaises au XIX^e^ siècle.
LE BON, Gustave: La psychologie des foules, 1895.
LECLERCQ: Les martyrs.
LEMAITRE, Jules: Chateaubriand, 1912.
Jean-Jacques Rousseau.
LEMANN: Napoléon I^er^ et les Israelites.
LENOTRE, G.: Les massacres de septembre, 1907.
Les noyades de Nantes, 1911.
Vieiles maisons.

LE PLAY, F.: Programme des Unions de la paix sociale, 1877.
LESCOEUR: L'Eglise catholique en Pologne sous le gouvernement Russe.
Lettres inédites de Napoleon I^er^.
LONGHAYE: XIX^e^ siècle, 1900.
LIAUTARD: Mémoires, 1844.
LOCKE: Epistola de tolerantia.
On Civil Government.
LOUANDRE: Introduction aux conteurs français de XVIII^e^ siècle.
LOUVET: Les missions catholiques au XIX^e^ siècle.
LUBERSAC: Journal historique et religieux de l'émigration et de la déportation du clergé de France en Angleterre, 1802.
LYONNET: Le cardinal Fesch, 1841.
Vie de Mgr d'Aviau.

MADAUNE: Le Renaissance du catholicisme en Angleterre.
MADELIN, Louis: La Révolution, 1912.
La Rome de Napoléon, 1906.
MAISTRE, Joseph de: Considerations sur la France.
Soirées de Saint-Petersbourg.
MANSEAU: Les prêtres et religieux deportés dans la Charente-Inférieure.
Manuel pour la concordance des calendriers républicains et grégoriens, 1806.
MARCON, Marcel: La vente des biens nationaux pendant la Révolution.
MARNAS: La religion de Jésus au Japon.
MARSHALL, William: Christian Missions.
MARTENS: Nouveau recueil de traités.
MARTINIS, Raffaele: Ius pontificium de Propagande Fide.
MASSON, F.: Le cardinal de Bernis.
Les diplomates de la Révolution.
MATHIEU: Le concordat de 1801.
MATHIEZ: La Révolution et l'Eglise, 1910.
Les origines des cultes révolutionnaires, 1904.
Rome et le clergé français sous la Constituante.
MAURRAS, Charles: Trois idées politiques.

MAURAY: Correspondance diplomatique, 1895.
MAURY: Mémoires, 1891.
Œuvres choisies.
MAYOL de Lupe: La captivité de Pie VII.
MAZON: Un missionaire vivarais aux Indes, 1899.
MEAUX, Viscount de: L'Eglise et la liberté aux Etats-Unis, 1893.
MELLIE, Ernest: Les sections de Paris pendant la Révolution française, 1898.
Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la religion à la fin du XVIII^e siècle.
MEESTER, Placid de: Voyage de deux Bénédictins au monastère du Mont Athos.
MERIC: Histoire de M. Emery.
METTERNICH: Mémoires.
MEURTHE, Boulay de la: Documents sur la negociation du concordat.
MICHELET: Histoire de la Révolution.
Précis d'histoire modèrne, 1835.
MIRABEAU: Travail sur l'éducation publique.
MOILLANE, Durand de: Histoire apologétique du Comité ecclésiastique.
MOLLIER: Saints et pieux personnages du Vivarais, 1895.
MOMMSEN and MARQUARD: Manuel des instructions romaines.
MORE, Thomas: Utopia.
MOREAU, G.: Les prêtres émigrés aux Etats-Unis, 1856.
MORRIS, Gouverneur: Memorial and Correspondence.
MORTIMER-TERNAUN: Histoire de la Terreur.
MOUNIER, J. J.: De l'influence attribuée aux philosophes, aux francmaçons et aux illuminés sur la Révolution de France, 1828.
MOURRET: La vénérable Marie Rivier, 1898.
MUSSET, Alfred de: Confession d'un enfant du siècle, 1887.

NAPOLEON: Correspondance, 1887.
Mémoires.
NECKER: De l'administration des finances de la France.
NERVO, Baron de: La conversion de Talleyrand, 1910.
NETTEMENT, A.: Histoire de la littérature sous la Restauration.

NEWMAN, John H.: History of My Religious Opinions.

Œuvres oratoires de M. de Boisgelin.
OLLE-LAPRUNE, Léon: La vitalité chrétienne.

PACCA: Mémoires, 1885.
Œuvres, 1845.
PAPON: Histoire de la Révolution.
PASQUIER: Mémoires.
PASSERI: Mémoires sur la révolution d'Avignon et du Comtat Venaissin, 1793.
PAULUS, Henry: Commentar über das N. T.
PELESZ, Julian: Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom.
PERRON: Vie du P. Condrin.
PICOT: Les Serbes de Hongrie.
Mémoires, 1855.
PIERLING: La Russie et le Saint-Siège.
PIERRE, Victor: La Terreur sous le Directoire, 1887.
Seize Carmélites de Compiègne.
PIOLIN: L'Eglise du Mans pendant la Révolution.
PISANI: La Dalmatie de 1797 à 1815.
L'Eglise de Paris et la Révolution.
L'épiscopat constitutionnel.
Répertoire biographique de l'épiscopat constitutionnel, 1907.
PITOU, Ange: Voyage à Cayenne.
PORTES, Bittard des: Charette et la guerre de la Vendée.
POUJOULAT: Histoire de la Révolution française.
PRAT: Essai historique sur la destruction des ordres religieux en France au XVIII^e siècle, 1845.
PRESSENSE, E. de: L'Eglise et la Révolution.
PRUDHOMME: Révolutions de Paris.
PUAUX: Histoire populaire des protestants français.

QUINET: Œuvres.

RADET: Mémoires.
RAMBAUD, Alfred: La France coloniale.

RANKE: Histoire de la papauté.
RAOUL-ROCHETTE: Histoire de la Révolution hélvetique de 1797 à 1803.
REBOLD: Histoire des trois grandes loges de France, 1864.
REINACH, Theodore: Histoire des Israelites, 1885.
RENAN, E.: L'avenir de la science.
Révolutions de France et de Brabant.
RICARD, A.: Le P. Combalat.
RINIERI, I.: La diplomazia pontificia nel secolo XIX, 1902.
ROCQUAIN: L'esprit révolutionnaire avant la Révolution.
ROHRBACHER: Histoire universelle de l'Eglise.
ROSKOVANY, A. de: Monumenta catholica pro independentia potestatis ecclesiasticae, 1870.
ROUSSEAU, Jean-Jacques: Discourse on Inequality.
Emile.
Social Contract.
ROUSTAIN: Les philosophes et la société française au XVIII^e siècle.

SABTIE, A. C.: Les massacres de septembre: les martyrs du clergè, 1912.
SAINTE-BEUVE: Causeries du lundi.
Galerie de portraits historiques, 1883.
Portraits des femmes.
SAINT-LEON, Martin: Histoire des corporations, 1895.
SAINT-PIERRE, Bernardin de: Œuvres.
SCHLEGEL, Frederick von: Philosophy of History.
SCHLITTER: Die Reise des Papstes.
SCHOELL, F.: Recueil de pièces officielles.
SCIOUT, Ludovic: Histoire de la Constitution civile du clergé.
SEGUR and SAUVE: Un admirable martyr sous la Terreur, 1904.
Sentiments de Napoléon sur le christianisme.
SERBAT, L.: Les assemblées du clergé de France, 1906.
SEVESTRE, E.: La déportation du clergé orthodoxe pendant la Révolution.
SICARD: A la recherche d'une religion civile, 1895.
L'ancien clergé de France avant la Révolution, 1917.

SIMON, Eugène: La cité chinoise.
SOREL, A.: Carmélites de Compiègne, 1878.
Le couvent des Carmes, 1864.
L'Europe et la Révolution française, 1915.
SPULLER: La Mennais.
STOLBERG, Leopold von: Büchlein von der Liebe.
Geschichte der Religion Jesus Christi.
STRAUSS, David: Essai d'histoire religieuse.

TAINE: French Revolution.
L'ancien régime.
Le régime moderne.
Les origines de la France contemporaine.
TALLEYRAND: Mémoires, 1892.
TEIL, De: Naples et le Directoire.
THEINER, A.: Die neusten Zustande ker katholischen Kirche beider Ritus in Polen und Russland seit Katherne bis auf unsere Tage.
Documents inédits relatifs aux affaires religieuses de la France, 1790–1800, 1857.
Histoire des deux concordats.
L'histoire de Clement XIV.
THIERS: Histoire du consultat et de l'empire.
THOMASSIN: Ancienne et nouvelle discipline.
THUREAU-DANGIN: La Renaissance catholique en Angleterre.
Royalistes et républicains.
TIECK: Franz Sternbold.
TOCQUEVILLE, A. de: L'ancien régime et la Révolution, 1860.
TORNEZY: La legende des philosophes.

UZUREAU: Noel Pinto, 1912.

VAISSIERE: Lettres d'aristocrates, 1907.
VANDAL, Albert: L'avènement de Bonaparte, 1903.
VANDERPOL: La guerre devant le christianisme, 1912.
VAN DUERM (ed.): Correspondance de Consalvi avec Metternich, 1899.

VEUILLOT: Guerres de la Vendée et de la Bretagne.
VIALAY, A.: La vente des biens nationaux pendant la Révolution. Les cahiers de doleances du tiers état en 1789, 1910.
VIGNY, Alfred de: Servitude et grandeur militaire.
VINET: Essai sur la manifestation des convictions religieuses.
VITTORIA: De jure belli.
VOLTAIRE: Discourses on Man.
Epîtres à Uranie.
Philosophical Letters.

WALLON, Henri: La Terreur, 1881.
WELSCHINGER, H.: Le pape et l'empereur, 1905.
Le roi de Rome, 1897.
WISEMAN: Recollections of the Last Four Popes.

ZALENSKI, Stanislas: Les Jésuites de la Russie Blanche (French tr., 1886).

Index

Abbaye of St. Germain: Father Sicard's account of the massacres at, 185; Imprisonments at, 182; Massacres at, 185, 189
Absolutism of Hobbes, 25
Absolutism, royal, 90: Abuse of, 12
Actors, Civil rights of, 329
Advocates of the clergy, 117 note
Alençon, Murder of Father Valframbert at, 191 note
Alexander I (czar), 552: friendly to Catholic Church, 554; The Holy Alliance, 462; Leo XII and, 554
Alfieri (poet), 23: La tirannide by, 29
Alquier: envoy to Pius VII, 415; on scene of canonization, 420
American Revolution, French aid to, 10
Anarchy: in Paris, 90; in the provinces, 78
Ancient Regime, Decline of, 8 ff.
Ancona, seized by Napoleon, 296
Angela Merici, canonized by Pius VII, 419
Angers, Defeat of Vendeans at, 249
Annates: Abolition of, 80; memorial from Rome, 82
Anona, the, 48 note
Antibes, Murder of Father Cartier at, 191 note
Antraigues, Count: and émigré priests, 200
Antraigues, Madame, 200
Aranda (count) and émigré priests, 200
Archetti (nuncio), 50
Army, the: under the Directory, 290
Arouet de Voltaire. See Voltaire
Artaud de Montor, secretary of Cacault, 372
Articles of 1682, 19
Artois, Count of: Emigration of, 79
Assembly, Constituent. See Constituent Assembly of the Clergy (1775): Association of writers approved by, 44; Jansenism and, 42
Assignats, 164
Atheists in the Institute, 288
Auctorem fidei (bull), 20, 59
August 4, Night of, 79
  Action of the clergy, 79
  The curés, 80
  De Juigné, 79 f.
  De Juigné's praise of, 83
Aulard on feast of Reason, 232 note
Austria: conquered by Napoleon, 424; French émigrés in, 208
Austrian Succession, War of the, 9
Autonomous naturalism, 26
Aviau, François d': émigré at Rome, 212
Avignon
  Affair of, 147 ff.
  Camus and, 148
  The civil oath ordered in, 152
  Economic crisis, 148
  Pius VI and reforms in, 149 f.
  The Pope's duty, 151 note
  Possession of Holy See, 148
  Revolutionary propaganda in, 148
  Status of, 147
  And union with France, 150
  Uprisings in, 148
Avoine (bishop), 163
Azara, 292 f.: and armistice of Bologna, 293; Qualities of, 292

Bailly proclaimed mayor of Paris, 78
Ballanche: view of the Revolution, 3
Baltimore, Province of, 477
Barruel, Father: editor of Journal ecclésiastique, 65; on émigré priests in England, 203
Basel, Diocese of, 474
Bassville (French agent), Murder of, 218 ff.
Bastille, the, 76: The prisoners in, 77; Taking of, 76
Batavian Republic, Persecution in, 327
Bavaria: Concordat with, 472; Edict of Religion, 473

Bayane (cardinal) ordered back to Rome, 421
Beauharnais, Josephine. See Josephine
Beauregard, Brumauld de: on priests in Guiana, 303
Beauty, deified by Goethe, 27
Beccaria, Cesare: on capital and labor, 27; Tratto dei delitti e delle pene by, 32
Belgium
  Arrest of priests, 313
  Combats in, 314
  Committee of Public Safety in, 312
  Deportation of juring priests, 315
  Louvain University suppressed, 313
  Non-juring priests, 313
  Persecution in, 312 ff.
Bellarmine on civil power, 89
Belloy, de (cardinal), devoted to Napoleon, 418
Benedict the Moor canonized by Pius VII, 419
Benefice, Simple, 115 note
Benière, Father: Execution of, 234
Bérardier, Father: saved by Robespierre, 192 note
Bernier: and Concordat of 1801, 366; influence in the Vendée, 366; leader of Vendeans, 248; Spina and, 366 ff.
Bernis (cardinal): kept in ignorance, 128; Luxury of, 171; oath to the Constitution, 172; pensioned by King of Spain, 172
Berthier (general): Goods of Holy See seized by, 317; march on Rome, 298
Bertier of Rodez, 165
Besnard, Father: Souvenirs d'un non-agénaire by, 361
Bible Society (London), 511
Binardière, Duportail de la: Murder of, 178
Bishoprics, nomination of nobles to, 21
Bishops, French
  Abjuration of several, 230
  Canonical institution of, 436
  Election of, 122
  Emigré, 166, 389
  Income of, 21
  Institution of, 83
  Juring, 159
  Number of married, 232
  Pope's right to remove, 380
  Resignation of, 468
Bishops (continued)
  Two defections, 156
Bishops, Constitutional, 265
  Character of, 162
  One for each department, 163, 165
  Rehabilitation of, 387
  Validity of consecration of, 140 note
"Black cardinals," the, 435: at Fontainebleau, 448
Blanca, Florida: opposition to France, 199
Bogomiles in Bulgaria, 539
Boisgelin (bishop)
  Character of, 68
  Concordat of 1801, 382
  His offer to the king, 154
  At London, 204
  On need of reforms, 22
  On night of August 4, 80
  On ownership of Church property, 103
  On rights of the clergy, 117
  On sale of Church property, 100
  At States General, 68
Boislève (officialis): Nullity of Napoleon's marriage declared by, 433
Bollène, Execution of nuns of, 255
Bologna: Armistice of, 293; ceded to France, 297
Bonal (bishop): Form of oath proposed by, 154; National council asked by, 119
Bonald, Louis de, 488: Législation primitive by, 488; Théorie du pouvoir by, 489 note
Bonaparte, Jerome: Annulment of marriage of, 414; Marriage of, 412
Bonaparte, Joseph: and concordat of 1801, 376; at Rome, 297
Bonaparte, Napoleon. See Napoleon
Bonchamp, Marquis de: Vendean leader, 242
Bonnet (bishop), 163
Boscodon, Trappist abbey at, 308 note
Bossuet on arbitrary government, 12
Bottex, Father: Murder of, 189 note
Bourbon, Cardinal de: visitator in Spain, 396
Bracciano Museum, medals pilfered, 318
Braschi family, 46
Bravard, Father: Murder of, 177
Breda (Holland), Napoleon at, 439
Breton Club, 331
Briefs (papal)

Briefs (continued)
Charitas, 156
Dominus ac Redemptor, 550
Intimo ingemescimus corde, 135
Non sine magno, 477
Pastoralis sollicitudo, 274
Quod aliquantum, 156
Quod de fidelium, 476
Brittany and the Vendée, 236 ff.
Brongniart, Father: constitutional curé, 233
Brotier, Father: deported to Guiana, 302
Bruder Medardus by Hoffmann, 503
Bruguière (bishop) in Korea, 515
Brussels, Anti-Republican manifestations in, 313
Buchez, view of the Revolution, 3
Büchlein von der Liebe by Stolberg, 501
Bulgaria: Bogomiles in, 539; Latin Catholics in, 539
Bulgaris, Eugenius: Theologicon by, 529
Bulls (papal)
Auctorem fidei, 20, 59
De salute animarum, 475
In universalis ecclesiae, 556
Indefessum personarum, 538
Inter praecipua, 474
Paternae caritatis, 472
Quam memorandam, 385
Qui Christi Domini vices, 390
Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, 479, 511
Ubi primum, 471
Burke, Edmund: and French Revolution, 202
Busca (cardinal), papal envoy, 296

Cacault, François de
Artaud, secretary of, 372
And concordat of 1801, 370
To Florence, 373
French envoy, 296
Suggestion to Consalvi, 373
Caesarean Gallicanism, 16
Cahiers, the, 84: of the bishops, 85; of the clergy, 84
Calendar, Republican, 226, 284
Calvinist Churches regulated by Napoleon, 399
Cambacérès (jurist) and Napoleon's divorce, 431
Campanella: Civitas Solis by, 27; Utopias of, 23
Camus
And Avignon, 148
In Constituent Assembly, 89
Gallicanism of, 143
On institution of bishops, 83
On jurisdiction of clergy, 120
On state control of religion, 117
At States General, 69
Candor, Lodge of, 331
Canonizations by Pius VII, 419
Canons, chapters of: Suppression of, 141
Cantons of Switzerland, 337
Capital and labor, Beccaria on, 27
Caprara (cardinal)
And émigrés in Austria, 208
Organic articles read to, 381
Papal envoy, 381, 394
Recalled by Pius VII, 422
Carbonari, the, 460: condemned, 480
Cardinals: Abdication of some, 318; arrested in Rome, 318; Removal of thirteen from Paris, 435
Carmelite nuns, Execution of sixteen, 255
Carmelite monastery: Massacres at, 187; Prisoners in, 180 f.; Some escapes from, 189
Carnot, Lazare, 197
Carpentras, Raphael consul at, 149
Carrier, Jean: Description of, 256; drownings at Nantes, 256
Carroll, John: appointed by Pius VI, 212; Pius VI and, 50
Cartier, Father: Murder of, 191 note
Caselli, Father: and concordat of 1801, 364
Casoni (cardinal), Secretary of State, 416
Castellane (bishop), Murder of, 191
Castle Sant' Angelo occupied by French troops, 421
Castlereagh: conferences with Consalvi, 466; Consalvi welcomed by, 465
Catechism, ordered by Napoleon, 419
Catechisms, "Enlightened," 40
Cathelineau, Jacques, 243 ff.: Vendean hero, 240
Catherine II of Russia, 547
And the Jesuits, 49
On National Assembly, 126
Pius VI and, 49
Siestrzencewicz named bishop by, 56
Catholic cantons of Switzerland, 338

Catholic emancipation in Ireland, 342
Catholicism in France in 1799, 332
Catholics, Irish: Political rights of, 341
Cattereau, Jean: Vendean patriot, 238
Cayenne, Deportations to, 301
Cerfbeer (banker), 330
Cervoni (general), Pius VI and, 299
Chabot (priest), Marriage of, 233
Champagny, Count de: Talleyrand replaced by, 420
Champenois (bishop) in India, 516
Champion de Cicé, Disloyalty of, 134
Chapters of canons, Suppression of, 141
Charette, François: Vendean leader, 244
Charitas (brief), 156
Charles IV, Pius VI's concordat with, 396
Chateaubriand, Viscount, 482 ff.
  Essai sur les révolutions by, 482
  Genie du christianisme by, 482: on missions, 510
  At London, 204
  Mémoires d'outre-tombe by, 486
  In Rome, 405
  In the United States, 213
Chaudet, Father: Murder of, 178
Chemillé, Vendean battle at, 243
Chemin-Duponte, Manuel des theanthropophiles by, 280
Cheverus (bishop), 214
Chiaramonti (Pius VII), 346: Benedictine life of, 348; bishop of Imola, 348
China, 518 ff.
Chinese synod, The first, 519
Chollet (deputy) on oath of hatred, 308
Chonan, Jean: Vendean patriot, 238
Chouans, the: in the Vendean War, 247
Christian Brothers, religious garb resumed by, 418
Christliche Mystik by Goerres, 503
Church in France
  And the Empire, 410 ff.
  Persecution of (1790–99), 137 ff.
  Possessions of, 94
  Supplanted by civil religion, 271 ff.
  Wealth of, 94
Church and state: in France, 18, 20, 112 ff.; Robespierre on, 118
Church property: at disposal of the nation, 102; its sale proposed by Talleyrand, 99; Sale of, 99 ff.; Successive legislation on, 103
Churches, Sacking of, 225
Cicé, Champion de (bishop): Disloyalty of, 134; Pastoral of, 177 note
Cisalpine Republic: Anti-Roman spirit of, 392; concordat project, 395; organic laws, 394; representatives assembled at Lyons, 393
Civic religion, 272
Civil Constitution of the Clergy, 116 ff., 121 ff.
  Approved by Louis XVI, 134
  Clergy's duty of residence, 122
  Condemned by Pius VI, 147, 157
  Consequences of, 137
  Elections of bishops and curés, 122
  Favored by Jansenists, 134
  Gallicanism of, 121
  Oath not taken by some, 154
  Oath taken to, 153 f.
  Opponents to, 164
  Opposition to canon law, 133
  Pius VI and, 132 ff.
  Prudhomme on, 142
  Sanctioned by Louis XVI, 144
  Taine on, 335
Civil government, Locke on, 25
Civil religion, 272; Church supplanted by, 271 ff.
Civita Castellana, Victory of French at, 321
Civitas Solis by Campanella, 27
Clairac, Murder of Father Lartigues at, 177
Clement XIV, brief Dominus ac Redemptor, 550
Clementine Museum, Pius VI and, 47
Clergy of France, 14-16, 43
  Cahiers of, 84
  Conduct of the émigré, 198
  The constitutional, 158, 228
  Emigration of, 198
  General agent of, 97 note
  The lower: at States General, 15, 69
  Non-juring: Deportation of, 175; encouraged by Pius VI, 174; in the provinces, 172
  Oath to the Constitution by, 138 ff., 143, 153, 155
  Obligation of residence, 122
  "Officials of morality," 139
  Reckless generosity of, 79
  Revenue of, 82 note
  Support by the state, 116

Clergy of France (continued)
Two orders of, 15
The upper, 15: and the state, 16; and States General, 67
Clergy of Germany: opposition to Rome, 17; Power of, 17
Cletus, Blessed: Martyrdom of, 518, 521
Clubs, the, 91: Jacobin, 331
College of Propaganda: Debts of, 510; founded by Gregory XV, 510; reconstituted, 510
Collette, canonized by Pius VII, 419
Colybes, the, 523
Committee of Public Safety, 222: in Belgium, 312
Commune of Paris, 179
Committee of execution appointed by, 182
Committee of execution circular by, 190
Danton and, 180 note
Execution of 62 members of, 257
Fifty clergy imprisoned by, 180
Insolence of, 183
Marat and, 180 note
Origin of, 180 note
Communism of the Civitas Solis, 27
Comtat Venaissin: economic crisis, 148; Pius VI yields, 297; Status of, 147
Conclave: Pius VI's constitution on, 320; at Venice, 328
Concordat with Bavaria, 472
Cisalpine Republic, 395
Holland, 474
Naples, 473
Piedmont, 474
Russia, 473
Spain, 396
Switzerland, 474
Concordat of 1516, Project to re-establish, 470
Concordat of 1801, 350 ff.
Bernier, 366
Boisgelin preacher, 382
Cacault, 370
Commission of cardinals, 369
Consalvi, 365
Eighth project, 376
Fifth proposal, 368
First proposals, 368
Father Caselli, 364
Grégoire, 362
Concordat of 1801 (continued)
Joseph Bonaparte, 376
Napoleon's ultimatum, 372
Opponents in France, 391
Opposition of émigré royalists, 390
Papal envoys to Paris, 363 ff.
Pius VII, 370
Popular joy over, 382
Provisions of, 378
Ratification of, 380
Ratified by Napoleon, 378
Seventh project, 375
Significance of, 392 ff.
Spina, 363-65
Talleyrand, 361, 369: absent from Paris, 375
Text of, 562
Concordat of 1813: pronounced null by Pius VII, 448; Provisions of, 448; signed by Pius VII and Napoleon, 448
Concordat of 1816: a dead letter, 470; not ratified by Pius VII, 470
Condorcet on Masonry, 333
Confraternities suppressed, 175
Congress of Ems (1786), 17
Congress of Vienna, 461: Consalvi at, 461
Consalvi (cardinal)
Cacault's suggestion to, 373
The commercial code, 479
Concordat of 1801, 365
Conferences with Castlereagh, 466
At Congress of Vienna, 461
Dismissal of, 416
The fine arts fostered by, 479
At London, 465
Named Secretary of State, 351
Napoleon and, 374 ff.
Napoleon on, 479
Negotiations with Naples, 473
Negotiations with Russia, 473
To Paris, 373
Reception by Napoleon, 374
Reforms in Papal States, 478
At Venice conclave, 344
Welcomed by Castlereagh, 465
Considérations sur la France by De Maistre, 486
Constant, Benjamin, 329, 334
Constituent Assembly
Abolition of tithes, 82
Aims of, 140 ff.

Constituent Assembly (continued)
Antireligious work of, 73
Bishop de Bonal, 119
Beginning of anarchy, 74
Camus at, 83, 120
Change of States General into, 73
Church and state, 112 ff.
On Church property, 99 ff.
Civil Constitution of the Clergy, 116 ff., 121, 137
Constitution committee, 98
Corporations suppressed, 93
Disregard of the pope, 141
Ecclesiastical committee of, 96, 108
Gallicanism of, 112
Mirabeau at, 81, 89
Parliaments dissolved, 93
Religious orders, 106 ff.
Religious vows suspended, 107
Removal to Paris, 102
Report on conditions in the Vendée, 239
Sale of Church property, 99 ff.
States General changed into, 73
Support of the clergy, 116
Suppression of religious orders, 109 ff.
Suppression of religious vows, 110
Talleyrand at, 97 ff.
Constitution of the year III, 270
Constitutional bishops, 162, 265
Character of, 162
Number of, 163 note
One for each department, 163, 165
Rehabilitation of, 387
Valid consecration of, 140 note
Constitutional Church, 265 ff.
Councils of, 386
Grégoire leader of, 268
Its claims to be the National Church, 275
National council of, 276: letter to Pius VI, 279
Constitutional clergy, 158, 228
Constitutional curés, Success of, 165
Constitutional priests, Abjuration of, 262, 386
Constitutionals, Grégoire leader of, 386
Consuls, Charges against the, 318
Continental blockade against England, 422
Convention, the (France), 196 ff.
Decree: against ecclesiastics, 222; against harboring refractory priests, 224; against refractory priests, 222; of Vendean extermination, 246
Despotism of, 231
End of, 270
The Girondists, 197
Laws on marriage of priests, 232
The Mountain, 197
The Plain, 197
Saints' feasts abolished, 326
Worthy measures of, 197 note
Coppoli (archbishop), Academy of the Catholic Religion founded by, 480
Corea. See Korea
Coronation: Feast of the, 418; of Napoleon, 406
Corporations, Suppression of, 93
Costa (cardinal) and French émigrés in Italy, 210
Couches, Murder of priests at, 191 note
Council of Pistoia. See Pistoia
Council of "United Bishops" founded by Grégoire, 267
Crisis, The intellectual, 23 ff.
Curés
Country, 14
Election of, 122
On night of August 4, 80
A portion congrue, 14
Success of constitutional, 165
Cussac, Father de: imprisoned, 181
Czerniewicz, Jesuit vicar general, 57

Dalmatia, Latin Catholics and Orthodox in, 534
Dannenmayr, 39
Danton
Appeal to violence by, 183
Character of, 179
And the Commune, 180 note
Father Lhomond saved by, 192 note
Jacobins personified by, 167
And limits of France, 221
Minister of Justice, 179
And September massacres, 190 note
Daughters of Charity: executed at Cambrai, 253 note; re-established by Napoleon, 406
De jure belli by Vittoria, 29
De jure pacis et belli by Grotius, 30
De salute animarum (bull), 475

Decadaire feasts, 316
Decadaire worship, 284
Declaration of Independence (American), 9
Declaration of the Rights of Man, 73, 87 ff.: Christian understanding of, 5; Text of, 559
Deport, Right of, 80
Deportation: decreed by the Assembly, 182; of non-juring clergy, 175, 192; of priests, 301
Der Katholik (periodical) by Goerres, 503
Dereser, Father (apostate), 233 note
Desmoulins, Influence of, 76
Diderot, La religieuse by, 288
Directory, the, 270 ff.
  Arbitrariness of, 310
  The army under, 290
  Attacks on Catholic religion, 289
  Deeds of, 310 ff.
  Napoleon and, 290
  Number of priests persecuted by, 312
  Oath of hatred toward royalty, 308
  Persecution under, 300 ff.
  Power of minister of police, 310
  Prosecution of the émigrés, 311
  Recoil of, 295
  The Terror under, 290
  Tyranny of, 310
Discourse on Inequality by Rousseau, 36
Discourses on Man by Voltaire, 34
Divorce, Napoleon's, 430 ff.
Divorce decree, 168
Divorce law abolished, 468
Dominus ac Redemptor (brief), 550: confirmed by Pius VI, 57
Donnadieu, Father: Execution of, 311
Doria (cardinal), expelled from Rome, 422 f.
Dubois, Father: in India, 516; Mœurs . . . de l'Inde by, 517
Dubois (bishop of New York), 214
Dubourg (bishop of New Orleans), 214: at Lyons, 513
Dufresse, Blessed: Martyrdom of, 518
Duke of Orleans, resignation as grand master, 331
Du Lau (bishop), Murder of, 188
Du pape by De Maistre, 487
Duphot, Murder of, 297
Duportail, Father: Murder of, 178
Dupuis, L'origine de tous les cultes by, 288
Dupuy, Father: Murder of, 177
Durand de Maillane, 96

Eastern Church, 523 ff.
Eastern Europe, Churches of, 533 ff.
Ecclesiastical Committee of Constituent Assembly, 96: on Church property, 113; Packed membership of, 109
"Ecclesiastical Council": on canonical institution of bishops, 436; established by Napoleon, 432; on nullity of Napoleon's excommunication, 437; Questions submitted to, 435
"Edict of Religion," Bavarian, 473
Emery, Father: Napoleon resisted by, 441; and oath of hatred, 309; on oath of liberty and equality, 193; Priests sent to America by, 213
Emigration: of Count of Artois, 79; of the nobility, 79
Emigré bishops, 166: Resistance of, 389
Emigré priests. See Priests
Emigrés: in Germany, 205 ff.; Prosecution of, 311; at Rome, 131
Emile by Rousseau, 36
Empire of France (1804–14) and the Church, 410 ff.
Ems: Congress of (1786), 17; Punctuation of, 16
Encyclopedia, the: The unity of, 33
Encyclopedists: Influence of, 15; Influence at court, 44; Madame de Pompadour friend of, 44
"Enemies of the people," Decree against, 224
England
  Catholics in, 506
  Condition of Catholics in, 201
  Emigré priests in, 201
  Influence of émigré priests in, 204
  Lessening of anti-Catholic prejudices, 466
  Philosophical movement in, 24
  Prestige of, 460
Epitres à Uranie by Voltaire, 34
Ernest (Duke of Gotha), 41
Essai sur l'indifférence by Lamennais, 493
Essai sur les révolutions by Chateaubriand, 482

Europe, Restoration of, 459
Europe, Eastern: Churches of, 533 ff.
Expilly (bishop), 114: elected bishop of Finistère, 139
Exposition des principes, 157

Fabre d'Eglantine and republican calendar, 226
Feast of the Federation, 123
Ferdinand IV (king of Naples): offer to take Pius VII to Sicily, 423; order to French in Rome, 321; and tribute to Holy See, 51
Fesch (cardinal)
  Ambassador to Rome, 404
  At head of "Ecclesiastical Council," 432
  Marriage of Napoleon and Josephine, 406, 408 note
  Napoleon's envoy, 412
  And religious congregations, 418
Ferrara: ceded to France, 297; Napoleon at, 295
Ferrara (cardinal), imprisoned by Napoleon, 292
Fichte, Jacobinism defended by, 205
Filangieri, Gaetano: Scienza della legislazione by, 28
Fischer, Christopher, 39
Flaget (bishop of Bardstown), 214
Florence, Pius VI at, 319
Florida Blanca: opposition to France, 199
"Flying squadron," the: at conclave (1799), 346
Folleville, impostor among Vendeans, 248
Fontana (bishop) in China, 521
Fontainebleau, Pius VII at, 445
Fontenelle, 32
Foreign Mission Seminary, re-established by Napoleon, 406, 468
Foreign Mission Society, 508: dissolved by Napoleon (1809), 511; re-established, 417, 508, 511; Work of, 512
Foreign missions, 508 ff.
  Effects of the Restoration, 508
  Favored by Napoleon, 509
  Jesuits, 511
  Korea, 514 ff.
  Report of Portalis, 509
  Restoration of Jesuits, 508
Foreign views of the Revolution, 125
Forêt, René: Vendean patriot, 240
Fouché, 364: Council of constitutionals dissolved by, 387
Fouquier-Tinville (prosecutor), 193 note, 222
France
  Bishops from the nobility, 21
  Break of diplomatic relations with Holy See, 215
  Calvinist Churches regulated, 399
  Church and state in, 20
  Clergy in, 43
  Conditions in 1789, 64
  Diocesan boundaries, 472
  Economic classes in, 11
  Emigrés' return to, 342
  Foreign invasion of (1813), 449
  In 1799, 327 ff.
  Jews in, 401
  Lutheran Churches in, 399
  Masonic lodges in, 43
  Minister of worship in, 20
  Number of Catholics (1801), 386
  Population (1801), 386
  Protestantism in, 398 ff.
  Resignation of the bishops, 468
  Return of refugees to, 329
  Royal government in, 13
  Serfdom in, 10
  Upper clergy in, 67
  Wealth of Church in, 94
Francis I (emperor) at Rome, 480
Francis II (emperor): Abdication of, 417; and conclave (1799), 344; The exclusive by, 345
Francis Caracciolo, canonized by Pius VII, 420
Frankenberg (cardinal), deported from Belgium, 313
Franz Sternbold by Tieck, 499
Frederick William III, 475: at Rome, 480
Freedom of worship decreed (1795), 260
Freemasonry: Chief officers of French, 455; in France, 43
Freemasons
  During the French Revolution, 331
  And Illuminati, 41
  In Italy, 210
  Napoleon and, 401, 454
  Oath to the Constitution, 196 note
French philosophers, 32
French Revolution. See Revolution

French Republic recognized by Pius VI, 273, 297
Fribourg, Jesuits received in, 474
Friedland, Battle of, 416

Gacé, Murder of priests at, 191 note
Gallais, Father: imprisoned, 181
Gallicanism: Caesarean, 16; Civil Constitution of the Clergy, 121; of Constituent Assembly, 112; in Russia, 56
Garampi (nuncio), 56
Gassendi, 32
General agent of the clergy, 97 note
Generals, Political influence of, 272
Genie du christianisme by Chateaubriand, 482, 510
Genoa, Pius VII at, 461
George III (of England): and émigré priests, 203; return of art works to Rome, 465
Georgetown College, 213
German romanticism, 497
Germany
  Anti-Roman ideas in, 397
  Attitudes to French Revolution, 205
  Churches of, 17
  Emigré priests in, 205
  French émigrés in, 205 ff.
  Hospitality to émigré clergy, 208
  Illuminism in, 27
  Philosophical movement in, 25
  Power of upper clergy in, 17
  Prince electors: Rome's monetary demands, 17 note, 21
  Serfdom in, 10
Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi by Stolberg, 501
Ghislain (C.M.) in China, 518
"Gilded Youth," the, 197
Girondists, the, 197
Glatier, Father: Execution of, 311
Gobel (bishop)
  Abdication of, 229
  Career of, 159
  Election of, 159
  Oath taken by, 159
  And Paris clergy, 229
  Resignation of, 229
Goddess of Reason, Worship of, 230
Godoy (Spanish minister), 395; and émigrés in Spain, 200
Goerres, Joseph, 498, 502
  Der Katholik (periodical), 503
  Die christliche Mystik by, 503
  Die Teutschen Volksbücher by, 502
  Mythengeschichte der Asiatischen Welt by, 502
  Rheinische Merkur founded by, 502
  Teutschland und die Revolution by, 502
Goethe, Beauty deified by, 27
"Golden youth," 263
Goulard, Father: on reform project, 118
Graf, Arthur: L'Anglomania in Italia by, 29 note
Grand, Mrs.: marriage to Talleyrand, 361
Grand Lodge, Grand Orient merged with, 401
Grand Orient: Grand Lodge merged with, 401; without grand master, 332; Reorganization of, 455
Greek Church of Constantinople, Non-Catholic, 523
Greek revolution, 526
Grégoire (bishop)
  And abolition of annates, 80
  Career of, 161 note
  Character of, 152, 161
  And concordat of 1801, 362
  And the constitutional Church, 279
  Council of United Bishops founded by, 267
  Death of, 389
  Leader of constitutional Church, 268
  Leader of constitutional priests, 315
  Leader of the constitutionals, 386
  And the "National Council," 276
  Against new paganism, 228
  Opposition to feast of Supreme Being, 264
  Pisani on, 266
  Refusal of apostasy, 230
  On religious domain, 230
  "Report of the United Bishops," 277
  Resignation of, 388
  Soul of constitutional Church, 161
Gregory I (pope) on human liberty, 89 note
Gregory XV (pope), College of Propaganda founded by, 510
Gregory V (patriarch), Death of, 526
Grievances, Memorials of, 84

Grotius: De jure pacis et belli by, 30; and law of nations, 23, 29
Guégan, Father: on religious proposals, 119
Guiana
  Conditions in, 303
  Constitutional priests in, 316
  Deportations to, 301
  Exiles in, 302 ff.
  Priests deported to, 300
Guillotine: Installation of, 182; made permanent, 197
Guinguené: on system of morality, 333
Gustavus III of Sweden, Pius VI and, 50
Guyot de Folleville, impostor among Vendeans, 248

Hardenberg (chancellor) at Rome, 475
Hauy, Valentin: and theophilanthropy, 281
Hedderich, Philip (O.F.M.), 39
Helvetic Republic, Persecution in, 327
Herder, J. G.: Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit by, 27
Hertz, Henrietta, 330
Hertzberg on the French Revolution, 206
Herzan (cardinal) at conclave (1799), 345
Hobbes: Absolutism of, 25; on origin of society, 25
Hoche (general), 258
Hoffmann, Amadeus: Bruder Medardus by, 503
Holland: Catholics of, 474; Concordat with, 474; Philosophical movement in, 29
Holy Alliance, the, 462
Holy Ghost, Congregation of the: re-established, 417
Holy Roman Empire, End of, 417
Holy See: Ambassadors to, 480; Break of diplomatic relations with France, 215; memorial on the annates, 82
Holyday, The weekly, 284 ff.
Hontheim, Nikolaus von, 17
Hugon, Jean (i.e, Bassville), Murder of, 215 ff.
Huguenots. See Protestants
Hyacinth Marescotti canonized, 419
Hymns to the Virgin by Novalis, 499

Ile d'Oléron: Deportations to, 301; Exiled priests at, 308; Priests imprisoned at, 300
Ile de Ré
  Conditions at, 306
  Constitutional priests at, 316
  Deportations to, 301
  Description of, 305
  Life of deported priests at, 306
  Priests imprisoned at, 300, 306
Illuminati, the, 40: German, 206; in Italy, 210; and Masons, 41
Illuminism in Germany, 27
In universalis ecclesiae (bull), 556
Indefessum personarum (bull), 538
India, 516 ff.: Father Dubois in, 516; Jacobins in, 328; Missions in, 328
"Infernal columns," the, 258
Institute, the, 271: atheists in, 288
Intellectual crisis, the, 23 ff.
Inter praecipua (bull), 474
Intimo ingemiscimus corde (brief), 135
Ireland: Act of Union, 342; Catholic emancipation, 342; penal laws, 341; political rights of Catholics, 341
Ireland, Parliament of: suppressed, 342
Irish, Society of the United, 341
Irreligion (1789–99) in France, 287
Issy, Arrests at, 180
Italian spirit, 209
Italy: Emigré priests in, 209 ff.; Philosophical movement in, 27; Revolutionary ideas in, 209

Jacobi and French Revolution, 205
Jacobin clubs, 331
Jacobinism, defended by Fichte, 205
Jacobins, 167: in India, 328; Influence of, 179
Jalès, Federations of, 235 note
Jansenism
  Assembly of the Clergy and, 42
  Bishop Ricci and, 57
  Defended by Duke of Tuscany, 57
  Influence of, 41
  Among the Maurists, 42
  Among the Oratorians, 42
  At Synod of Pistoia, 18 f.
Jansenists: Constitution of the Clergy favored by, 134 ff.; Influence of, 15
Japan, Preservation of the faith in, 515
Jarente (bishop), 21: Oath taken by, 159

Jerico, Pauline: and foreign missions, 513
Jerome Bonaparte, Annulment of marriage of, 414
Jesuits
  Abolished in France, 42
  Catherine II and, 49
  In China, 518
  Expulsion of, 9: from Russia (1815), 554
  In foreign missions, 511
  Included in suppressions, 110
  Louis XV and, 42
  Peter the Great and, 55
  Received in Fribourg, 474
  Re-establishment of, 480, 508, 511
  Return to France, 468
  In Russia, 550 ff.: Pius VI and, 49, 56 f.
  Russia refuge for, 56
  Among September victims, 194 note
  Suppression of, 328, 508
  Vicar general in Russia, 57
Jerome Bonaparte, Marriage of, 412
Jews, the
  In France, 401
  In the French Revolution, 329
  Napoleon and, 452
  Pius VI's popularity among, 49
  Rise to power in France, 334
Joseph II of Austria, 16: Pius VI and, 47; Regulation of the Church by, 52
Joseph Bonaparte, king of Naples, 416
Josephine Beauharnais, Napoleon's marriage to, 406, 408 note, 430
Josephism, 16
Journal des curés, 418
Journal ecclésiastique, 65
Juigné (bishop)
  On abolition of tithes, 82
  Character of, 67
  Charity of, 67
  On night of August 4, 79
  And oath of hatred, 309
  On sacrifices of the clergy, 83
  At States General, 63
Juring bishops, 159: Retractations of, 170

Kant: news of taking of the Bastille, 77 note; Rousseau's influence on, 26
Karalevsky, Cyril, 523 note
Kaunitz on French Revolution, 206
King of Rome, title of imperial prince, 437
Klopstock and French Revolution, 205
Kommentar über das N. T. by Paulus, 504
Korea: Bishop Brugière in, 515; Father Tsiou in, 515; First Catholics in, 515; Missions in, 514 ff.
Krüdner, Baroness von, 462; and Holy Alliance, 463

La Bruyère on courtier's joy, 13
La Fare (bishop), at States General, 63, 68
La Font de Savine (bishop), 21
La Force (prison): Imprisonments at, 182; Murders at, 189
La Gorce, Pierre de: on Masonic lodges, 43
La Jaunais, Vendean treaty at, 258 f.
La religieuse by Diderot, 288
La Rochefaucauld (bishop), imprisoned, 180
La Terreur sous le Directoire by Pierre, 300
La tirannide by Alfieri, 29
Lafayette: commander of National Guard, 78; influential Mason, 91
Lake poets, the, 506
Lamennais, Félicité de: Essai sur l'indifférence by, 493
Lamennais, Jean-Marie, 495
Landry, Maille de la Tour: at Ile de Ré, 307
L'Anglomania in Italia by Graf, 29 note
Langoiran, Father: Murder of, 177
Lanjuinais, 96: on execution of Constitution of the Clergy, 141
Larevellière-Lépaux, president of executive Directory, 301
Lartigues, Father de: Murder of, 177
Latin rite Catholics in eastern Europe, 539
Laval: Persecution at, 173; Vendean capture of, 247
Law, Spinoza on, 30
Law of nations, Grotius on, 29
Lawyers at States General, 69
Lazarists. See Vincentians
Le Coz (bishop): Charge against, 317; and the constitutionals, 386; president of the "council," 276

Le Franc de Pompignan, Charges against, 135 note
Le Lau (bishop) imprisoned, 180
Le Perche, Murder of Father Duportail at, 178
Leben Jesu by Strauss, 505
Législation primitive by Bonald, 488
Legislative Assembly, 167 ff.
  Confraternities suppressed, 175
  Decree of deportation, 182
  Deportation: of clergy, 175; of non-juring priests, 192; of non-jurors, 179
  Divorce decree, 168
  Freedom to colonial Negroes, 168
  Oath of Liberty and Equality, 192 ff.
  Split in, 331
  Succeeded by the Convention, 196
Lenkeiwicz, Jesuit vicar general, 57
Leo XII: Alexander I (czar) and, 554; bull Inter praecipua, 474; and Korean mission, 515
Leopold (duke of Tuscany), 18: becomes emperor, 20
Les Vans, Murder of priests at, 177
Lessing; Nathan der Weise by, 26; and Wolfenbüttel Fragments, 26
Lettres de cachet, 76 note
Lhomond, Father: saved by Danton, 192 note
Liberty, Gregory the Great on, 89 note
Liberty and Equality, Oath of, 192 ff.
Licentious writings, Spread of, 15 note
"Little Church," the, 360, 390
"Little Terror," the, 289
Liturgy, Convention decrees on, 226
Locke: on civil government, 25; on origin of society, 25; Philosophy of, 25
Loiseau, Father: Murder of, 191 note
Loménie de Brienne (bishop), Oath taken by, 159
London: Consalvi at, 465; Emigré priests at, 204
Longwy, Taking of, 182
Loreto seized by Napoleon, 296
L'origine de tous les cultes by Dupuis, 288
Louis XIV: Glories of, 12; Royal power of, 12
Louis XV, and Jesuits in France, 42
Louis XVI
  Character of, 66
Louis XVI (continued)
  Constitution of Clergy sanctioned by, 134, 144
  Execution of, 219 ff.
  And foreign powers, 145
  Misty policy of, 138
  And Necker, 66
  New title of, 93 note
  Oath to Constitution approved by, 136
  Order to States General, 73
  Pius VI and, 144 ff.
  Pius VI's confidence in, 128
  Pius VI's esteem for, 220
  Procession at Versailles, 63
  In refuge at Legislative Assembly, 178
  Religious loyalty of, 130
  States General opened by, 63
Louis XVIII, 359 ff.
  Charter granted by, 468
  On future pope, 356
  Letter to Paul I, 359
  Society of Foreign Missions re-established by, 511
Louvain University suppressed, 313
Lower clergy of France, 15: at States General, 69
Loyseau on limits of royal power, 12
Lucern, Battle of (1798), 339
Luçon, Devotion of the people at, 173
Lutheran Churches in France, 399
Lutzen, Battle of, 449
Lyons, Cisalpine Republic's representatives at, 393

Mack (general), received in Rome, 321
Mackintosh and French Revolution, 202
Madaune, Father: on émigré priests in England, 204
Mai (cardinal): Vatican librarian, 479
Maillane, Durande de, 96: commentary on articles of Pithou, 113
Maillard, Stanislaus
  At the Abbaye, 189
  Career of, 184
  Character of, 184
  And committee of execution, 182
  At massacres: at Carmelite monastery, 187; at the Abbaye, 187
Maille, de (bishop): At Ile de Ré, 307
Maistre, Joseph de, 486
  Considérations sur la France by, 486
  Du pape by, 487
  On the Revolution, 6

Maistre, Joseph de (continued)
Soirées de Saint-Petersbourg by, 487
View of the Revolution, 4
Monosque, Murder of priests at, 178
Marat: and the Commune, 180 note; The Terror organized by, 197
Marechal (archbishop of Baltimore), 214: nomination of bishops, 477
Marengo, Napoleon's victory at, 352
Maria Louisa, marriage to Napoleon, 434
Maria Theresa: and Josephism, 16; and Pius VI, 47
Marie Antoinette, Unpopularity of, 66
Marist Fathers, Foundation of, 512
Maronites, 532
Marriage of priests, 232
Married bishops, Number of, 232
Married priests, Number of, 232
Marseilles, Murder of priests at, 178
Martineau: Ecclesiastical legislation by, 115; Jansenism of, 97
Martiniana (cardinal): and concordat of 1801, 363; Napoleon and, 354
Martinists (sect), 330
Masonic societies (1789), 91
Masonry. See Freemasonry
Masons. See Freemasons
Massacres, the September. See September
Massena (general): Freemason, 401; and the pillage of Rome, 318
Massimi (marquis), Arrest of, 298
Mattei (cardinal): at conclave (1799), 345; and Napoleon, 295; papal envoy, 296
Maury: émigré in Italy, 211; made archbishop of Paris by Napoleon, 440; on oath of liberty and equality, 194; on sale of Church property, 100; suspended, 211
Maximilian (elector) and French émigrés, 208
Mazenod (bishop), Oblates of Mary Immaculate founded by, 512
Meaux, Murder of priests at, 191
Méhée, Father: Account of massacres, 186
Melchite Catholic Church of Antioch, 530 ff.
Mémoires d'outre-tombe by Chateaubriand, 486
Memorials of grievances, 84
Mennecy, Closing of church at, 228
Metaphysics of Spinoza, 30
Metternich: defender of Holy Alliance, 464; negotiations with Napoleon, 438
Michael de l'Hospital, 32
Milan, Napoleon at, 411
Minister of police, Power of, 310
Minister of worship, in France, 20
Miollis (general): in Rome, 422; Seizure of Rome by, 421
Mirabeau
Character of, 72
At Constituent Assembly, 81
Influence of, 72
In National Assembly, 89
On ownership of Church property, 102
Physical appearance of, 72
At States General, 72
Miracles, Denial of Christ's, 26
Miratte, Father: Murder of, 178
Missions, Foreign. See Foreign
Mœurs . . . de l'Inde by Dubois, 517
Moïse (bishop), Resignation of, 388
Moldavia, 540
Monarchy, Spinoza on, 31
Monasteries, Suppression of, 109 ff.
Montaigne, 32
Montaleau (Mason), 332
Montenegro, 536
Montesquieu on division of powers, 84
Montmorin, Count de: Bernis kept in ignorance by, 128; Murder of, 189; Policy of, 139
Monserrat abbey, and émigré priests, 201
Morality, Proposed system of, 333
More, Thomas: Utopia by, 24
Morris, Gouverneur: on French Revolution, 126
Mount Athos, Monastery of, 524
Murat (general), Mason, 401
Murat (king of Naples), 424: Arrest of Pius VII ordered by, 426
Musquiz and concordat of 1801, 365
Mysore, Nabob of, 328
Mythengeschichte der Asiastischen Welt by Goerres, 502

Naples: Concordat with, 473; seized by French, 321
Naples, King of: tribute payable to Holy See, 51

Napoleon
Abdication of: first, 449; second, 401
Absence of cardinals at marriage of, 434
Address to clergy of Milan, 353
Affectionate meeting with Pius VII, 446
Ambition of, 342, 414
Ancona seized by, 296
Anger of, 292, 360, 377
Austria conquered by, 424
Benefactions to Church, 417
Benevolence to Protestants of Holland, 439
At Breda (in Holland), 439
Cardinal Martiniana and, 354
Character of, 377
Choice of second wife, 430
Christian death of, 458
Concordat of 1801, 350 ff.: negotiations with Pius VII, 359 f.; ratified by, 378
Concordat of 1813 signed by, 448
Conflict with Pius VII, 415
Consalvi and, 374 ff.
Continental blockade by, 422
Coronation of, 406
Coup d'état (1799) by, 342
Crossing of the Alps by, 352
Daughters of Charity re-established by, 406
Demands upon the Pope, 293
Desire for agreement with the Pope, 352
Divorce of, 430 ff.: devised by Cambacérès, 431; the diocesan court, 433; Pius VII's protest, 435
"Ecclesiastical Council" established by, 432
Entry into Vienna, 424
Excommunicated, 425
Exiled to St. Helena, 564
Foreign Mission Seminary re-established by, 406
Foreign Mission Society dissolved by (1809), 511
Foreign missions favored by, 509
And the Freemasons, 401, 454
At Ferrata, 295
His family welcomed by Pius VII, 457
His wish to be crowned by the Pope, 403
Napoleon (continued)
And the Jews, 452
As king of Italy, 411
Lazarists re-established by, 406
Loreto seized by, 296
March against Rome, 291
Marriage to Josephine, 406, 408 note
Marriage to Maria Louisa, 434
Maury made archbishop of Paris by, 440
At Milan, 292, 411
On need of peace, 352
Pius VII and, 349
Pius VII's intervention for the exiled, 458
A priest requested by, 458
Printing of a catechism ordered by, 419
Proclaimed emperor, 402
Project to keep Pope in France, 410
And the Protestants, 450
Reception of Consalvi, 374
Request for papal recognition of new Constitution, 273
Resisted by Father Emery, 441
Retreat from Russia, 445
Rise of, 290
Roman distrust of, 355
Second abdication of, 461
At Tolentino, 296
Victory at Marengo, 352
Victory at Pravdinsk, 416
Volney kicked by, 360
Napoleon Bonaparte, first use of the double name, 394
Nathan der Weise by Lessing, 26
National Convention, Convoking of, 179
"National Council" (1797), 276
National Council (1811), 442
Decisions accepted by Pius VII, 444
Ordered dissolved by Napoleon, 443
Reopened, 444
Three bishops imprisoned, 443
"National Council" of Constitutional Church: decrees of, 278; letter to Pius VI, 279
National Guard, Lafayette commander of, 78
National religion, a, 280 ff.
Nations, Battle of the, 449
Natural religion, 272
Naturalism, 32: Autonomous, 26
Neapolitan Republic, Persecution in, 327

Necker: Dismissal of, 74; Influence of, 329; Louis XVI and, 66
Negroes, Emancipation of colonial, 168
Netherlands. See Holland
Neufchateau, François: on national feasts, 284
Nikolaus von Hontheim, 17
Niebuhr, Berthold (Russian minister), 475
Nine Sisters, Lodge of the, 331
Ninon de Lenclos: salon of, 33; Voltaire and, 33
Nobility, Emigration of the, 79, 198
Nobles nominated to bishoprics, 21
Non sine magno (brief), 477
Non-juring clergy
  Decree of deportation of, 192
  Deportation of, 175
  Encouraged by Pius VI, 174
  Heroism of, 234
  Life of, 166
  In the provinces, 172
Notre Dame cathedral, Profanation of, 231
Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, Jansenist journal, 15
Novalis, Hymns to the Virgin by, 499

Oath of allegiance, English, 466
Oath of hatred toward royalty and anarchy, 308: and De Juigné, 309; explained by Chollet, 308; Father Emery on, 319 note
Oath of Liberty and Equality, 192 ff.
  Divergent views about, 193
  Father Emery on, 193
  Maury on, 194
  Pius VI on, 195
Oath to the Constitution: approved by Louis XVI, 136; by the clergy, 123, 138 ff.; taken by clergy, 155
Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Foundation of, 512
Ochs (Swiss leader), 337
O'Connell, Daniel, 342
Orange, Execution of 32 nuns at, 253
"Orangemen," 341
Oratorians, Jansenism among, 42
Organic articles, the, 373
  Portalis and, 381
  Provisions of, 384
  Revocation of, 470
  Talleyrand on, 384
Orleans, Duke of, 179: resignation as grand master, 331; Third Estate joined by, 73
Our Lady Help of Christians, Feast of, 457
Overbeck, 498 f.

Pacca (cardinal)
  On émigré bishops in Germany, 207
  On émigré nobles in Germany, 207
  On émigré priests in Germany, 207
  Expelled from Rome, 423
  Nuncio at Cologne, 18
  On Pius VII's character, 348
  On Pius VII's return to Rome, 457
  Secretary of State, 423
Paganism, Schiller and, 27
Paine, Thomas: and French Revolution, 202
Papal bulls. See Bulls
Papal elections, Bull on, 425
Papal primacy, Synod of Pistoia and, 19
Papal States, the, 478
  Annexed to French Empire, 424
  French émigrés in, 210
  Under Pius VII, 351
  Reforms of Consalvi, 478
Paris: Anarchy in, 90; Bailly acclaimed mayor of, 78; Murder of Father Chaudet at, 178; "Spontaneous anarchy" in, 74
Paris Commune. See Commune
Paris sections, 180 note: and Jews, 330
Pâris (deacon), Veneration of, 42
Paris, Brother (C.M.), in China, 518
Parishes, Temporal administration of, 261
Parliaments, French: dissolved, 93; and Jansenism, 42
Pastoralis sollicitudo (brief), 274
Patterson, Miss: Jerome Bonaparte's marriage to, 412
Patronage of benefices, 115
Paternae caritatis (bull), 472
Paul I (czar), 551: envoy sent to Pius VII, 351; letter from Louis XVIII, 359
Paulo, Count de: royalist leader, 336
Paulus, Heinrich: Kommentar über das N. T., 504
Peasants, oppression of, 11
Pensions to ex-religious, 110
Périer of Clermont, 164

Persecution of the Church (1790–99), 137 ff.
Under the Directory, 300 ff.
At Laval, 173
Fresh outburst of, 215
New laws of, 174 ff.
Peter the Great and Jesuits, 55
Petit, Madame: and foreign missions, 513
Pfeffer (Swiss leader), 337
Philosophers: French, 32; Rousseau's debt to English, 23
"Philosophers," the: and French Revolution, 332
Philosophical Letters by Voltaire, 34
Philosophical movement: in England, 24; in Germany, 25; in Holland, 29; in Italy, 27
Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit by Herder, 27
Philosophism, Danger of, 50
Philosophy: influence on the Revolution, 23; Sentimental, 15
Philosophy, social: in England, 24
Philosophy of History by Schlegel, 501
Pidalion, the, 527
Piedmont, Concordat with, 474
Pieracchi (papal envoy), 294
Pierre, Victor: La Terreur sous le Directoire by, 300
Piki, Korean convert, 515
Pillage of St. Lazare, 74
Pinot, Father: Execution of, 251
Pio-Clementine Museum founded by Pius VI, 47
Pistoia, Synod of, 18
Condemned by Pius VI, 20, 59
Jansenism at, 18 f., 57
And papal supremacy, 19
Sacred Heart devotion condemned, 19
Pithou, Pierre: Articles of, 113
Pitt, William: Act of Union under, 342; and coalition against France, 221; and French Revolution, 202
Pius VI, 46 ff.
Allocution on spoliation of the Church, 124
And the annates, 130
Attack of paralysis, 322
Avignon reforms, 149 f.
And Bishop Carroll, 50
Brief Dominus ac Redemptor, confirmed by, 57
Pius VI (continued)
Briefs: Charitas, 156; Intimo ingemiscimus corde, 135; Quod aliquantum, 156; Pastoralis sollicitudo, 274
Bulls: Auctorem fidei, 20, 59; Indefessum personarum, 538
Catherine II and, 49
Character of, 46
Civil Constitution of the Clergy, 132 ff.: condemned, 127, 147, 157
Clergy encouraged by, 174
Confidence in Louis XVI, 128
Constitution on conclave, 320
Council of Pistoia condemned by, 59
Death of, 324
Delay by, 131, 138
Deposition of, 388
Difficulties with Russia, 55
Doctrine of German bishops condemned by, 18
Draining of Pontine Marshes, 47
Early career of, 46
Esteem for Louis XVI, 220
Exile of, 300
Favors to the Jews, 49
Finances of, 47
First encyclical of, 50
First years of pontificate of, 46 ff.
At Florence, 319
In France, 321 ff.
And French émigrés in Italy, 211
French Republic recognized by, 297
Gustavus III and, 50
Illness of, 297, 299, 321
On interpretation of an oath, 319
And the Jesuits, 49, 56
And Jesuits in Russia, 57
John Carroll made bishop by, 212
Joseph II and, 47
Kept uninformed, 129
Louis XVI and, 144 ff.
Maria Theresa and, 47
And murder of Bassville, 219
Pio-Clementine Museum founded by, 47
Popularity of, 48
Recognition of French Republic by, 273
Rumanian Church and, 538
At Siena, 319
Synod of Pistoia condemned by, 20
Temporizing policy of, 127 ff.
At Turin, 321

Pius VI (continued)
At Valence, 323
Visit to Vienna by, 52
Pius VII
Academy of the Catholic Religion, 480
Accident to, 480
Affectionate greeting by Napoleon, 446
Angela Merici canonized by, 419
Appeal of Korean Catholics, 515
Arrival at Savona, 427
Benedict the Moor canonized by, 419
Briefs: Non sine magno, 477; Quod de fidelium, 476
Bull on papal elections, 425
Canonizations by, 419
Carbonari condemned by, 480
Character of, 355
Collette canonized by, 419
And concordat of 1801, 350 ff., 370
Concordat of 1813 signed by, 448
Concordat negotiations with Napoleon, 359 f.
Concordat with Spain, 396
Death of, 480
Decisions of the National Council accepted by, 444
Departure from Rome, 427
Departure from Savona, 445
Discouragement of, 447
Economies of, 351
Election of, 346
Excommunication of invaders of Papal States, 425
Family of Napoleon welcomed at Rome, 547
At Fontainebleau, 445
Francis Caracciolo canonized by, 420
On freedom of the Church, 350
At Genoa, 461
His isolation at Savona, 428
His lodging at Savona, 429
Hyacinth Marescotti canonized by, 419
Imprisonment of, 428
Intervention for exiled Napoleon, 458
Jesuits reconstituted, 480
Journey to Paris, 405
Last years of, 457 ff.
Liberation of, 449
Life of, 347
And marriage of Jerome Bonaparte, 412
Pius VII (continued)
Mother of, 347
Napoleon and, 349
Napoleon excommunicated by, 425
Napoleon's conflict with, 415
Nullification of concordat (1813) by, 448
Province of Baltimore erected by, 477
Qualities of, 348
Re-establishment of Jesuits, 511
And religious orders, 479
At Savona, 449
Seizure of, 427
Suppression of French bishoprics, 390
Triumphal return to Rome, 449, 457
Welcome to Napoleon's mother, 457
Pius VII, bulls of
De salute animarum, 475
In universalis ecclesiae, 556
Paternae caritatis, 472
Quam memorandam, 385
Qui Christi Domini vices, 390
Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, 479, 511
Ubi primum, 471
Plain, the, 197
Plato, Republic by, 24
Plouguerneau, Difficulty of installing curé at, 237
Poets, The English, 506
Poland
Divorce in, 543
Form of government, 543 note
Partitions of, 542
Seculars and Basilians in, 544
Third partition of, 551
Political and social crisis, 9 ff.
Political economy, 28
Political reform, Desire for, 4
Pompadour, Madame de: friend of Encyclopedists, 44
Pompignan, Le Franc de: Charges against, 135 note; at States General, 68
Pondichery, Seminary at, 516
Pont-Ecrepin, Murder of Father de Saint-Martin at, 178
Ponthion, Father: Murder of, 178
Pontine Marshes, Draining of, 47
Pope, right to remove bishops, 380
Popes: Pius VI (1775–99), 46 ff.; Pius VII (1800–23), 347 ff.

Portalis: and the organic articles, 381; report on Catholic missions, 509
Power of sovereign, Limits of, 12
Praemunire, Statute of, 465
Pravdinsk, Battle of, 416
"Presbytery" of Paris, 267
Presentation, Congregation of the, 308 note Priests
  Abjuration of constitutional, 386
  Deaths on prison ships, 223
  Deportation of, 223, 301
  Deported to Guiana, 300, 302 ff.
  Drowning of fifty, 256
  Heroism of non-juring, 234
  Imprisoned at Ile de Ré, 306
  The interned, 305 ff.
  Marriage of, 232
  Murder of, 176
  Murder of emigrating, 191
  Number of married, 232
  Persecution of the juring, 315
  Saved by English man-of-war, 302
Priests, Emigré, 297 ff.
  In England, 201: Financial help for, 203; Influence of, 204
  In Germany, 205
  At Montserrat, 201
  In Spain, 199
Prince electors, Rome's monetary demands, 17 note
Promise of submission to Republic, 268
Propaganda, College of: Debts of, 510; founded by Gregory XV, 510; reconstituted, 510
Propaganda seminary reorganized, 480
Propagation of the Faith Society, 509: Founding of, 513
Protestant cantons of Switzerland, 337
Protestantism in France, 398 ff.
Protestants in France: during French Revolution, 328; Property restored to, 329; Napoleon and the, 450
Provinces, Anarchy in the, 78
Provincial assemblies (1789), 65
Prudhomme: on Constitution of the Clergy, 142; on Paris anarchy, 90
Prussia: Catholics in, 475; nomination of bishops, 476
Punctuation of Ems, 16

Quam memorandam (bull), 385
Qui Christi Domini vices (bull), 390
Quieta non movere, motto of Metternich, 438
Quirinal: invaded by French troops, 423, 426; Pillage of, 318
Quod aliquantum (brief), 156
Quod de fidelium (brief), 476

Rabelais, Skepticism of, 32
Radet (general): Pius VII arrested by, 426; Quirinal invaded by, 426
Raphael of Avignon, 149: consul at Carpentras, 149
Rationalism of Socinus, 32
Rautenstrauch (O.S.B.), 39
Raux (C.M.) in China, 518
Raynau, Father: Murder of, 177
Reason, Worship of, 231
Rectories for school purposes, 265
Reding, Aloys (Swiss general), 338
Reflections on the French Revolution by Burke, 202
Reform, Desire for, 4
Reform, Social: Filangieri's aim, 28
Refugees, French: Return of, 329
Reimarus, Samuel, 26
Reims, Murder of priests at, 191
Religion, State control of, 117
Religion, Civic, 272
Religious dress, Wearing of, 174
Religious houses combined, 111
Religious orders in France
  Membership of, 107
  Pensions to former members, 110
  Pius VII and, 479
  Regulation by the old regime, 106
  Suppression of, 109 ff.
Religious papers combined, 418
Religious vows, Suppression of, 110
Renaissance catholique en Angleterre by Thureau-Dangin, 505
Renan, E.: on idea of English science, 25 note
Republic by Plato, 24
Republic, French: recognized by Pius VI, 273
Republic, Roman: Proclamation of, 299
Republican calendar, 226, 284
Restoration, the French: reanimation of foreign missions, 508
Restoration of Europe, 459
Retractants, Conditions imposed on, 262
Revelation, Denial of possibility of, 26
Revenue of clergy, 82 note

Revolt, Right to: Rousseau on, 36
Revolution, American: French aid, 10
Revolution, French
  De Maistre on, 6
  Desire for reform, 4
  Foreign views of the, 125
  Influence of philosophy, 23
  Movement of social renovation, 4
  Object of a new religion, 5
  Three movements of, 4
  Views of, 3
  Worship of, 5
Revolutionary ideas in Italy, 209
Revolutionary tribunals, 221, 224
Rheinische Merkur (weekly), founded by Goerres, 502
Ricci, Lorenzo (Jesuit general): Death of, 19, 49
Ricci, Matteo: True Idea of God by, 518
Ricci, Scipio (bishop)
  Jansenism of, 19, 57
  Popular outbreak against, 57
  See resigned by, 59
  At Synod of Pistoia, 19
Richard, Gabriel: French émigré in United States, 214
Rights of Man, Declaration of the, 73, 87 ff.
Rights of Man by Paine, 202
Rivier, Marie: foundress, 308 note; Zeal of, 235
Robespierre: Execution of, 257; Father Bérardier saved by, 192 note; Rise and fall of, 197; on Church and state, 118
Roettiers de Montaleau (Mason), 332
Rohan, Duke de: "affair of the necklace," 21
Roland and non-juring clergy, 176
Romagna added to France, 297
Roman Republic: Persecution in, 327; proclaimed, 299
Romanticism, German, 497
Rome
  Anti-Catholic ceremony in, 320
  Berthier's march on, 298
  At death of Pius VI, 328
  Former sovereigns in, 457
  French émigrés in, 131, 356
  German clergy's opposition to, 17
  Sacking of (1798), 317 ff.
  Seized by French troops (1808), 421
  Seminaries reopened, 480
  Taking of, 298 ff.
Romme (mathematician) and calendar, 227 note
Rousseau, Jean Jacques, 35
  Character of, 35
  Debt to English philosophers, 23
  Discourse on Inequality by, 36
  Emile by, 36
  Influence of, 35, 71
  Kant influenced by, 26
  On origin of our evils, 23
  On primitive state of man, 36
  On right to revolt, 36
  Social Contract by, 36
Royal power, Limit of, 12
Rumanian Church, 538
Russia
  Catholic Church in, 547 ff.
  Concordat with, 473
  Economic changes in, 460
  Gallicanism in, 56
  Jesuits in, 550 ff.
  Jesuits expelled from, 554
  Napoleon's retreat from, 445
  Pius VI's difficulties with, 55
  Refuge for Jesuits, 56
Rutan, Sister Marguerite: Execution of, 252
Ruthenian Catholic Church, 541 ff.

Sacraments, Abstention from, 42
Sacred Heart devotion and Synod of Pistoia, 19
Saint-Etienne, president of the Assembly, 329
St. Firmin, Seminary of: Murders at, 189
St. Gall, Diocese of, 474
St. George (monastery, Venice), 328
St. Helena, Napoleon exiled to, 461
St. Lazare, Pillage of, 74
Sacramentines, Execution of, 28, 254
St. Louis (church, Versailles), 63
Saint-Martin, Father de: Murder of, 178
St. Maur, Benedictines of: Jansenism among, 42
St. Napoleon, Feast of, 418
Saint-Pierre, Bernardin de: on system of morality, 333
Sainte-Croix, Baron de: and Avignon, 150
Salins, Father de: Murder of, 188
Salons, French, 33

Santo Domingo: The civil war in, 168; Priests in United States from, 214
Sapienza, the: New chairs at, 479; Oath taken by professors of, 319
Savine (bishop): Conversion of, 159 note; Death of, 308 note; imprisoned, 180
Savona: Arrival of Pius VII at, 427; Pius VII's departure from, 445; Pius VII's isolation at, 428; Pius VII's lodging at, 429
Schassenburg (general), 338
Schiller and paganism, 27
Schlegel, Frederick von: Philosophy of History by, 501
Schneider, Father (apostate), 233 note
Scienza della legislazione by Filangieri, 28
Scott, Walter: Influence of, 505
Secret societies, 460
Sections, Paris: and Jews, 330
Seminaries (Roman) reopened, 480
Sentimental philosophy, 15
September massacres, 184 ff.: Danton and, 190 note; Father Sicard's account, 185; Process of canonization of victims of, 190 note
Serbia, 536
Serfdom: in France, 10; in Germany, 10
Sicard, Father: account of September massacres, 185
Siena, Pius VI at, 319
Siestrzencewicz, Stanislas, 545
  Bishop of Mallo, 548
  Bishop of Moghilev, 549
  Career of, 548 note
  Evil influence of, 552
  Jesuits and, 550
  Named bishop by Catherine II, 56
Sieyès, Emmanuel-Joseph (priest)
  Abjuration of, 230 note
  And abolition of tithes, 81
  Influence of, 71
  Pamphlets by, 70
  Seminary studies by, 70
  "Social art" by, 71
  At States General, 73
Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny, 512 note
Skepticism of Rabelais, 32
Social Contract by Rousseau, 36: influence on Kant, 26
Social philosophy in England, 24
Social reform, Filangieri's aim, 28
Social renovation, Movement of, 4
"Societies of worship" and administration of parishes, 261
Society, Locke and Hobbes on origin of, 25
Society of Jesus. See Jesuits
Society of Foreign Missions. See Foreign Society of the United Irish, 341
Socinus, Faustus: Rationalism of, 32
Solari, Benedict (bishop), 20
Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum (bull), 479, 511
Spain: Emigré priests in, 199; Godoy, minister, 395; resistance to Napoleon, 424
Spina: Bernier and, 366 ff.; and concordat of 1801, 359, 363 ff.
Spinoza: on law, 30; Metaphysics of, 30; on monarchy, 31
Spitz, Andrew (O.S.B.), 39
"Spontaneous anarchy" of Paris (1789), 74
Staël, Madame de, 334: advice about Protestantism, 398
State, Upper clergy and the, 16
State and Church in France, 18, 20
State control of religion, 117
States General
  Attendance at, 63
  Boisgelin (bishop) at, 68
  Camus at, 69
  Change into Constituent Assembly, 83
  First sessions, 65
  La Fare (bishop) at, 68
  Lawyers at, 69
  Lower clergy at, 69
  Louis XVI's order to, 73
  Mirabeau at, 72
  Opened by Louis XVI, 63
  Pompignan (bishop) at, 68
  Prayers for the, 63 note
  Session of, 65
  Sieyès at, 73
  Transformation into Constituent Assembly, 73
  Treilhard at, 69
  Two groups in, 69
  Upper clergy at, 67
Statute of Praemunire, 465
Stolberg, Count von, 501: Ein Büchlein von der Liebe by, 501; Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi by, 501

Strauss, David: Leben Jesu by, 505
Sulpician émigrés in United States, 213
Sulpicians: diocesan seminaries, 418; reorganized, 417; among September victims, 194 note
Sunday observance: prescribed, 468; Suppression of, 285
Switzerland
  Catholic cantons of, 338
  Catholic revolt in, 338
  Concordat with, 474
  Democracy in, 337
  Dioceses of, 474
  French émigrés in, 208
  French invasion of, 337
  Protestant cantons of, 337
System of morality, Proposed, 333

Taine on Civil Constitution of the Clergy, 335
Talleyrand-Périgord (bishop)
  Absent from Paris, 375
  Changed attitudes of, 98
  And concordat of 1801, 361, 369
  At Constituent Assembly, 97 ff.
  Expilly consecrated by, 140 note
  Made minister of foreign affairs, 361
  Marriage of, 361, 369, 376 note
  Oath to the Constitution, 153
  Oath taken by, 159
  On the organic articles, 384
  Replaced by Champagny, 420
  On sale of Church property, 99
  Vocation of, 98 note
Tassy, Father: Murder of, 178
Tencin, Madame de: Salon of, 33
Terror, the: organized by Marat, 197; under the Directory, 289
Terror, The Belgian, 313
Teutschen Volksbücher by Goerres, 502
Teutschland und die Revolution by Goerres, 502
Theologicon, the: by Bulgaris, 529
Theology: Influence of Wolff on, 26; Study of, 38
Theophilanthropy, 280
Théorie du pouvoir by Bonald, 489 note
Théot, Catherine (visionary), 119
Thuin, Project of, 65 note
Thureau-Dangin, Renaissance catholique en Angleterre by, 505
Tieck, Franz Sternbold by, 499
Tilsit, Treaty of, 416: and Poland, 543
Tippo Sahib, 328
Tithes, Abolition of, 81: Juigné on, 82; Mirabeau on, 81, 99; Sieyès on, 81
Tithes, Monetary value of the, 94 note
Tolentino: Napoleon at, 296; Treaty of, 297
Torné, Anastase (bishop), 175
Trappist abbey at Boscodon, 308 note
Trappists re-established, 418
Tratto dei delitti e delle pene by Beccaria, 27, 32
Treaty of Tolentino, 297
Treilhard (Gallican): in ecclesiastical committee, 109; Qualities of, 96; on state control of religion, 117; at States General, 69
Trusteeism in United States, 477
Tsiou, Father: Chinese missioner in Korea, 515
Tuffin, Armand: leader of Brittany, 235
Turreau (Republican general), 258
Tuscany, Duke of, 57

Ubi primum (bull), 471
Unbelief, Spread of, 33
"United Bishops," encyclical of, 275
United Kingdom, the, 342
United States
  French émigré priests in, 212
  Nomination of bishops, 477
  Pius VI and Church in, 50
  Priests from Santo Domingo in, 214
  Sulpician émigrés in, 213
  Trusteeism in, 477
Upper clergy of France, 15: and the state, 16; and States General, 67
Upper clergy of Germany, Opposition to Rome by, 17
Ursulines, Execution of, 254
Utopia by Thomas More, 24

Van den Schiren (O.F.M.), 39
Vargas, Spanish minister at Rome, 396
Vatican, Pillage of, 318
Vatican library, 479
Vendean army: Defeat of, 249; Dissent in, 248; Excesses of, 247
Vendean treaty, 259
Vendean War, Second period of, 246
Vendée, the
  Brittany and, 236 ff.
  Convention's decree of extermination, 246

Vendée (continued)
Clergy of, 236
First insurgents of, 241 ff.
Intruding priests in, 237
Owners and tenants in, 236
Resistance of, 239
Venice, Conclave at (1799), 328, 344
Verdun, Taking of, 182
Versailles: Murder of priests at, 191; Paris mob at, 82; States General at, 63
Vienna, Pius VI's visit to, 52
Vienna, Congress of: Consalvi at, 461
Vincentians: in China, 518; re-established, 406, 417
Vindiciae gallicae by Mackintosh, 202
Vittoria, De jure belli by, 29
Volney, kicked by Napoleon, 360
Voltaire, 33
Debt to English philosophers, 23
Discourses on Man by, 34
Early life of, 34
Epitres à Uranie by, 34
Ideas of, 34
Influence of, 71
Voltaire (continued)
Ninon de Lenclos and, 33
In Paris, 44
Philosophical Letters by, 34
On state control of Church, 113
Writings of, 34
Vows, religious: Suspension of, 107, 110

War of the Austrian Succession, 9
Warsaw archbishopric, 473
Weekly holyday (decadaire), 284 ff.
White Russia, 55 note
Weishaupt, Adam: and Illuminati, 40 f.
Wiener Kirchenzeitung, 89
Wietinghoff, Juliana von. See Krüdner
Wolfenbüttel Fragments, 26
Wolff, Christian: Doctrines of, 26

Yung, Joannes, 39

Zelada (cardinal), 131: Secretary of State, 291; on taking the oath, 195
Zelanti, the, 49
Zoglio, nuncio at Munich, 18

HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

MOURRET-THOMPSON

VOLUME EIGHT

1823-1878

A HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

A HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

BY

THE REV FERNAND MOURRET, S.S.

TRANSLATED BY

THE REV. NEWTON THOMPSON, S.T.D.

VOLUME EIGHT

PERIOD OF THE EARLY NINETEENTH CENTURY

(1823-1878)

B. HERDER BOOK CO.

15 & 17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS 2, MO.

AND

33 QUEEN SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 31-507

IMPRIMATUR

✠ Joseph E. Ritter, S.T.D.
Archbishop of St. Louis

May 20, 1957

COPYRIGHT 1957 BY B. HERDER BOOK CO.

Printed in the United States of America
by Vail-Ballou Press, Inc., Binghamton, New York

CONTENTS

PAGE

INTRODUCTION 3

PART I

LEO XII AND PIUS VIII

CHAPTER

I. CHRISTENDOM IN 1823 13
Political Organization of Europe 13
The Social Crisis 17
The Social Question 21
Romantic Literature 25
The Secret Societies 29

II. THE FORCES OF THE CHURCH 35
Parish Missions 36
New Religious Congregations 40
The Congregation 45
Catholic Schools 49
Religious Movement in Italy 53
Religious Movement in Germany 56
Religious Movement in England 58

III. LEO XII (1823–1829) 62
The Conclave 63
First Difficulties 67
Religious Indifference 73

IV. THE CHURCH IN FRANCE 77
Gallicanism 78
Catholic Liberalism 81
The Jesuits 84
King Charles X 88
Religious Orders 90

CHAPTER PAGE

V. The Church in Austria, Germany, and England 92
Austria 92
Germany 95
Ireland 99
The Oxford Movement 104

VI. The Church in Other Countries 108
Spain 108
Italy 113
The Netherlands . . . 115
Russia 118
Greece 121
Foreign Missions 122
Last Acts of Leo XII 124

VII. Pius VIII (March 31, 1829, to November 30, 1830) 128
The Conclave 128
Cardinal Albani 131
Religious Situation in France 133
Dangers of the Catholic Movement 137

VIII. The July Revolution 142
The New Government and the Church 146
Belgium 151

IX. The Church in Poland and Great Britain . . 156
Poland 156
Ireland 158
Scotland 161
England 162

X. The Church in Other Countries 164
Germany 164
Italy 169
Non-European Countries 173

PART II

PONTIFICATE OF GREGORY XVI

XI. Gregory XVI and the Papal States (1831–1832) 179
Liberalism in the Papal States 180

CHAPTER		PAGE
	The Conclave	185
	Gregory XVI	186
	Cardinal Bernetti	190
	Foreign Intervention	194
	Conflict between France and Austria	197
XII.	GOVERNMENT OF THE PAPAL STATES	205
	Fiscal Reforms	206
XIII.	THE CHURCH IN PORTUGAL AND SPAIN	212
	Portugal	214
	Spain	218
XIV.	THE CHURCH IN POLAND AND SWITZERLAND	222
	Poland	222
	Switzerland	227
XV.	THE CHURCH IN ITALY	235
	Mazzini	235
	Defense Measures of Gregory XVI	239
XVI.	THE CHURCH IN IRELAND AND ENGLAND	246
	Ireland	246
	The Repeal of the Union	248
	Newman	251
XVII.	THE CHURCH IN GERMANY	257
	Bunsen	257
	Archbishop Droste-Vischering	260
	George Hermes	262
	Arrest of Droste-Vischering	265
	Catholic Renaissance in Germany	270
XVIII.	THE CHURCH IN FRANCE	274
	Idealistic Socialism	277
	The Catholic Press in France	279
	Lamennais	280
	The Avenir	282
	The Avenir's Excesses	284
XIX.	LAMENNAIS	289
	The Case in Rome	289
	The Roman Decision	292

CHAPTER PAGE

The Encyclical Mirari vos 293
Disciples of Lamennais 301

XX. MONTALEMBERT 306
The Order of St. Dominic 307
Abbot Guéranger 308
The St. Vincent de Paul Society 313

XXI. CATHOLIC SCHOOLS 318
Villemain 322
Louis Veuillot 325
Catholic Education 327

XXII. OTHER ACTIVITIES 330
The Jesuits 330
Socialist Movement 336
Dupanloup 337
Works of Charity 340
Works of Scholarship 343
Theological Errors 344
Gallicanism 346

XXIII. GREGORY XVI AND THE FOREIGN MISSIONS . . . 349
The Near East 349
The Far East 354
India 356
Indochina 359
China 360
Korea 361
Japan 363
Africa 364
Algiers 364
Abyssinia 367
Central Africa 368
The United States 369
Canada 371
South America 372
Oceania 373
Death of Gregory XVI 375

CHAPTER PAGE

PART III

PONTIFICATE OF PIUS IX

XXIV. PIUS IX AND THE PAPAL STATES (1846–1849) . . 379
The Conclave 380
Pius IX 381
Italian Political Parties 382
Liberal Measures of Pius IX 383
The Revolutionaries 387
Austrian Invasion 390
The Pope's Liberal Reforms 392
Sardinia 394
Count Mamiani 396
Rossi, Pius IX's Minister 398
Pius IX's Exile at Gaeta 401
Antonelli, Secretary of State 403
Attitude of the French Government 404
Proposed French Expedition to Italy 408
Siege of Rome 411
Letter of Louis Napoleon to Colonel Ney . . . 413
Pius IX's Return to Rome 416

XXV. PIUS IX AND THE CHURCH OF FRANCE (1846–1854) 417
Catholic Action in France 418
The Revolution of 1848 420
The Social Question 425
Catholic Schools 429
Parliamentary Discussion 433
The Socialist Peril 436
Restoration of the Empire (1852) 437
The Pagan Classics 439
Attacks by the Press 442
The Curé of Ars 445

XXVI. THE CHURCH IN ITALY 448
Victor Emmanuel 449
First Steps of Persecution 452
Further Measures of Persecution 456

CHAPTER PAGE

Cavour 457
Religious Orders 459
Other Measures 461

XXVII. The Church in Austria and Germany . . . 464
Austria 464
Emperor Francis Joseph 466
Germany 468
Prussian Hegemony 469
Bismarck 472
Catholicism in Prussia 474
Bismarck's Policy 478
Bishop von Ketteler 480
The Rhineland Bishops 483
Bishop Vicari 484

XXVIII. The Church in Other Countries 488
Switzerland 488
Religious Condition of Switzerland 491
England 493
Manning 496
Puseyism 498
Holland 500
Belgium 501
Spain 502

XXIX. Anti-Catholic Movement 506
Dogma of the Immaculate Conception 507
Anti-Catholic Movement 509
Cavour's Policy 512
Garibaldi 514
Cavour's Difficulties 515
Attempted Assassination by Orsini 517
Napoleon III and Cavour 519
The Motara Incident 520
Religious Policy of Napoleon III 522

XXX. The War with Austria (1859) 524
The Italian Campaign 524
Napoleon III and Bishop Donnet 527

CHAPTER PAGE

Pamphlet on the Papal Domain . . . 529
Opposition to the French Policy . . 530
Garibaldi 532
Treaty of Turin (1860) 532
Papal Volunteers 535
Garibaldi's Prestige 539
Battle of Castelfidardo 542
Siege of Ancona 543
Intervention of Napoleon III . . 545

XXXI. Attitude of Various States . . . 548
France 550
Other Countries 550
Russian Persecutions 552
Persecution of Polish Catholics . . . 553
Antichristian Intellectual Movement . 557
Ernest Renan 558
Congress of Malines (1863) . . . 563

XXXII. The Encyclical Quanta cura . . . 567
Reasons for the Encyclical . . 567
Reception of the Encyclical . . 570
Social and Political Doctrine . . . 575

XXXIII. The Roman Question 578
Attitude of Various Governments . 580
Communism 583
Frederick Le Play 584
Paris Exposition 586
Project of an Ecumenical Council . 587
Invasion of the Papal States 590
Franco-Italian Conflict 592
Austria 592
Repressions in Other Countries 593

XXXIV. Convocation of the Vatican Council . . . 596
Anti-Catholic Movement 596
Plan of a Masonic Anticouncil 598
Schismatic and Non-Catholic Churches . . . 599
The German Protestants 601
The English Protestants 603

CHAPTER PAGE

Pusey 604
The Catholic Rulers 605
Attitude of the Catholic World 608
Article in the Civiltà cattolica 609
Döllinger 612
Bishop Maret's Du Concile général 614
Article in the Correspondant 617
Dupanloup's Observations 618

XXXV. Opening of the Vatican Council 622
The Question of Procedure 624
The Bull Apostolicae Sedis 626
Groups in the Council 627
The Heads of the Groups 630
The Program 634
The Constitution De fide 637

XXXVI. Disciplinary Questions 640
Outside Discussions on Infallibility 643

XXXVII. Papal Infallibility 649
Projected Constitution De romano pontifice . . 651
Infallibility Attached to the Papal Office . . . 654
Pope's Direct Authority over Dioceses 656
Discussion on Infallibility 657
Absentees 660
The Vote 661
Franco-Prussian War 662
The Taking of Rome 663
Bishop Fessler's Pamphlet 664
Submission of the Opposition Bishops 666

XXXVIII. The Church in Italy and France 669
Rome 669
Victor Emmanuel in Rome 672
The Law of Guaranties 675
Protests of Pius IX 677
The Church in France 679
The Paris Commune 681
Montmartre Basilica 683

CHAPTER PAGE

Catholic Schools 683
Anticlericism 685

XXXIX. The Church in Other Countries 687
Germany 687
The Center Party 688
The Kulturkampf 688
Ludwig Windthorst 690
The May Laws 692
Courage of the Catholics 695
Switzerland 696
Bishop Mermillod 698
Swiss National Catholic Church 702
Austria 704
The School Laws 707
Spain 709
Alphonse XII 711
England 712

XL. Catholic Works 716
Devotions 716
Works of Charity 721
Christian Art 728
Philosophy and Theology 730
Spiritual Writings 732

XLI. Foreign Missions 736
The Near East 737
The Far East 745
India 746
China 748
Missions in Japan 751
Discovery of Christians in Japan 753
Korea 757
Oceania 758
Africa 761
America 762

Bibliography 766

Index 781

A HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

Volume VIII

I. Leo XII and Pius VIII

II. Pontificate of Gregory XVI

III. Pontificate of Pius IX

Introduction

THE work of the Church in the nineteenth century was complex. It cannot be grasped without a glance at the general movements of the world in that same period. The study of past ages will undoubtedly enable posterity to assess the significance of this period of history in relation to the times that went before it and those that came after it. At least we can even now discern, apart from the religious activities, which will form the special material of our account, four particular movements. These, taken together, seem to mark the characteristic of this century: a movement of internal policy, one of external policy, a social movement, and an intellectual movement. From the viewpoint of internal policy, some have called this period the century of democracy. This expression needs to be explained.

Democratic Trends

This century began with the personal rule of Napoleon I and the Bourbon kings. It then witnessed the formation in its midst of constitutional systems with limited suffrage, resulting later in universal suffrage. In many countries the power, after being in the hands of the right, passed successively to the center, then to the more advanced left. Yet we must recognize that the trend toward democracy was neither world-wide nor regular. Perhaps it was more apparent than real, more superficial than deep.

On one side were Russia, Germany, Austria, and the Ottoman Empire. During the nineteenth century, in spite of a certain swing of ideas toward popular government, those countries kept their personal governments. In England, amid similar changes, a constitutional monarchy remained. On the other hand, where the stages toward a democratic regime were more regular and distinct, the democratic movement of 1848 was followed by an abrupt return to personal government under the second empire. Let us add that the political system of democracy, where it seemed to triumph, has often been charged with having a deceptive appearance. Even the defenders of the popular form have called such pretended democracy a decapitated monarchy. This qualification is not without some basis. We may contrast the bourgeois aristocracy of the government of July with the military aristocracy of the first empire and the land-holding aristocracy of the Restoration, the Jewish and Masonic oligarchy of the third republic with the financial oligarchy of the second republic.

These trends affected the Church. Whether true or false, sound or perverse, the democratic agitation manifested in the ideas of the nineteenth century could not remain alien to the concern of the Church. The acts of Gregory XVI and Pius IX against liberalism, of Leo XIII and Pius X in the matter of Christian democracy, were provoked by this movement.

Now let us consider, not the internal organization of the states, but their diplomatic relations. Here we note that in the nineteenth century foreign policy took on a new expansion. In the sixteenth century the policy of Christendom was based on a European policy; in the nineteenth century it tended to be absorbed in world-wide interests. The preponderant part which colonial questions took in relations of people to people, the sudden entrance of Japan in the movement of European civilization, and the importance of the United States as a commercial nation and a political organization widened the diplomatic horizon. The major policies of this century aimed at nothing less than to rule the world. From 1801 to 1815 it was the ambition of Napoleon, and Germany, united by Bismarck, nourished the same dream at the close of the century. We can easily figure what effects such movements had on the religious situation and to what extent the Catholic Church had to take account of them.

From another point of view, without seeming too exclusive, we can define the nineteenth century as the century of social revolution. However sharp may have been the political discussions in this period, the social questions came more and more to dominate and condition them. The rise of capitalism, brought about by the industrial and commercial progress, and the spread of ideas of political equality, gave birth to what has been called the social question. In the course of the century this social question provoked theories that were more and more radical. Omitting the secondary systems, let us merely note the three principal steps of the movement: the socialist theory of Saint-Simon, the communist theory of Karl Marx, and the anarchist theory of Bakunin.

The socialism of the Frenchman, Saint-Simon, which was spread during the Restoration, appeared under the form of a sentimental and pacifist philanthropy. Such also is the character of various other schools formed under the government of July. But the Communist Manifesto, the work of the German Karl Marx, in 1847 opened a more militant phase of the social reform. It lays down in principle the strife of the classes and looks to the overthrow of the bourgeois class by the working class. In 1868 the Alliance of Socialist Democracy, founded by the Russian Mikhail Bakunin, goes still further and openly advocates anarchy. The anarchist doctrine opposes any social organization, whether social, political, religious, or financial, and urges their destruction by direct action, that is, by violence and uprisings.

In the course of the nineteenth century we shall more than once see the Church step in. It does so to condemn the excesses of socialism or to forestall its baneful influence on the nations. The Church was actively engaged in spreading social undertakings animated by a Christian spirit.

In considering a fourth aspect of the century that followed the French Revolution and that witnessed the first stirrings of the great war of 1914, some have called it the century of criticism. In fact, the period that saw the spread of Kant's doctrines, the publication of the works of Jaffé, Potthast, Duchesne, and De Smedt, the organization of the school of Chartres, and the popularity connected with the names of Sainte-Beuve, Pasteur, Renan, and Strauss, can boast of having pushed to their utmost limits, for good or ill, philosophical, historical, literary, scientific, and biblical criticism. But in this realm of ideas, more than in any other, it encountered the authority of the Catholic Church, ever ready to promote the real progress of science and letters, always alert to condemn their abuses.

The Church in the Nineteenth Century

Important was the action of the Church in relation to the political, social, and intellectual movements of the lay society. But its chief work did not lie there. The French Revolution had profoundly shaken the disciplinary organization of the Church and corrupted the beliefs of many of its faithful: in the nineteenth century its primary task had to be a work of restoration.

The revolutionary turmoil had, indeed, scattered the clergy. It had also overthrown their organization and confiscated their possessions. It had likewise let penetrate into men's minds, under more or less dubious forms, a poison of false ideas and utopias, propagated most eloquently by Rousseau and having formulas that received a sort of official consecration in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and in the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. The French Revolution by its very excesses had brought about a wholesome reaction in many minds. The ridiculous failure of its attempts to introduce a civil religion, and then practical atheism, made the people see the need of a religious authority solidly established and of a body of doctrine enunciated with the finality of ascertained truth.[1] In the course of the nineteenth century the Church relies precisely on this legitimate reaction to repair the ruins of the revolutionary period, to restore her hierarchy, and to strengthen her dogma.

This undertaking of disciplinary and dogmatic restoration may be considered in three chief periods. At the outset of the century, for the accomplishment of her work the Church counted on the support of the governments. The outstanding event of this period was the French concordat of 1801, followed by more than thirty other concordats. But the ill will which the Church soon experienced from various states, imbued with Gallican or Josephist ideas, led her, at about the middle of the century, to count more on the influence of public opinion. The French law of 1850 on freedom of teaching, several laws favorable to Catholicism in Prussia and in England, were the fruit of press campaigns and programs of public addresses. But the Church presently discovered in these popular movements certain illusions and errors, which she strongly condemned under the general name of liberalism. Moreover, soon the Supreme Pontiffs were evidently tending to free themselves as much as possible from outside influences and to count on the Church herself. The Vatican Council, to which for the first time no head of a Christian state was invited, plainly showed this tendency.[2]

Epitome of Church History

These summaries are mere generalizations. Whatever may be thought of them, the accounts of events related in the present

[1] See Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, VII, 327 ff.

[2] Pius X, in abolishing the right of exclusive, again confirmed this attitude of the papacy.

volume will enable the reader to judge whether they are well or ill founded. In any event the impartial study of the history of Catholicism in the nineteenth century seems to us, by the variety and importance of the questions raised, especially useful for Christians of the twentieth century. Someone has remarked that therein we find almost all the kinds of strifes that the Church has had to sustain from her first days. This study thus takes on the appearance of an epitome, a picture of the whole of Church history. "In fact, nothing is lacking: neither conflicts with the temporal powers nor the forcible oppression of the Church nor the inner rending of the Church by the budding of new doctrines which it has had to condemn nor the strife with heterodox thought, against the civilized paganism which adorns itself with the name of free thought, nor the triumphs." [3] Let us add that, notwithstanding the momentous events which have taken place since then, the intellectual, social, political, and religious problems which presented themselves before the minds of the nineteenth century have lost none of their actuality.

But nothing can better prepare the new generations to take up these problems and to solve them than a study of the attempts made by preceding generations to find an answer. The history of our predecessors' failures and successes in the means employed may spare us many mistakes and may supply us with many useful indications. Through the conflicts that have divided several eminent Catholics, we can retain our admiration for whatever was noble and generous in them. What more earnest and likewise more comforting spectacles do we witness than those of a Montalembert at the age of twenty years consecrating his entire life to the glorious and holy cause of his country and his God? We see a Louis Veuillot ever at the breach to defend the Church with his pen like the gallant knights of the Middle Ages defended it with their swords; a Newman and a Manning who, in different and at times divergent ways, but with equal sincerity and ardor, stimulating the trend of our separated brethren of England toward integral Christianity; a Windthorst, leader of the Catholics of Germany in the combat of the Kulturkampf; a Lavigerie becoming the apostle of Africa. We are heartened at sight of Pius IX sacrificing the tranquillity of his pontificate and his personal popularity for the relentless defense of the purity of doctrine against all its enemies, its defamers, and its well-meaning but imprudent champions; and a Leo XIII, showing to people and kings, to laborers and intellectual workers, the Catholic Church as the mother of true civilization.

[3] Un siècle. Mouvement du monde de 1800 à 1900, p. 765.

But let us not deceive ourselves. In the account of so many struggles, which still resound in our present world, in the description of so many men who have left impassioned disciples, we may think that impartiality, the first duty of a historian, is his chief stumbling block. We believe we have not failed to respect this impartiality while trying to rise to the point of view where the Church stands when she deliberates in her councils, when she legislates by her hierarchical representatives, when she speaks by means of her Supreme Pontiff. If in spite of our pains we have fallen short in any respect, we confide the judgment to the common father of the faithful for whatever may be defective in our work, submitting this present effort to his authority without reserve.

PART I

Leo XII and Pius VIII

CHAPTER I

Christendom in 1823

Pope Pius VII died on August 24, 1823. His last words were: "Savona . . . Fontainebleau." Emperor Napoleon had preceded him to the grave two years before; his last words were: "Head . . . army." These two men, who attained sovereign power at almost the same time and disappeared from the scene at a short interval from each other, had personified the two foremost powers of the world. Napoleon in his last moments was recalling the mighty military glory with which he had dazzled the men of his time; Pius was thinking of the redemptive sufferings by which he had continued the work of Jesus Christ in the Church. With these two leaders now dead, the strife between the world and Christ would take new forms. Following the fall of Napoleon and the weakening of several Bourbon monarchies, Gallicanism and Josephism would lose some of their strength. But the independence movement that carried the European nations toward nationalist policies and constitutional systems would give birth to liberalism. In the process of these changes almost everything was a trial for the Church. The authoritarian monarchies had given her the indispensable security which she needed for reorganizing her worship and discipline, but the liberal movement would allow her to develop her action by the acquisition of various precious liberties.

Political Organization of Europe

What was the political condition of Europe? At the time of Pius VII's death the status was regulated by the final act of the famous Congress of Vienna, held in 1815. It was "the vastest treaty ever signed, the first attempt to give Europe a charter, at least a territorial charter, to fix the state of each one's possession, . . . to base the general peace on a collective pact." [1] Never had the stability of the states been more maturely studied by men so experienced in the science of international questions, or on a free field of experimentation. Two aims were in mind: to prevent the return of a hegemony like that of Napoleon, and to strive everywhere against the revolutionary spirit. To attain this double end, Metternich proposed the principle of equilibrium, already applied in the Treaty of Westphalia; Talleyrand preached the principle of legitimacy. A combination of these two principles formed the basis for the work of European reconstruction which the diplomats began at Vienna. Our task is not to set forth the details of their work, which they considered final.

A new international code was proclaimed. Resting on the principles of legitimacy and equilibrium, introduced by France into the public law of Europe, the authors of the treaties of 1815 declared that henceforth any aggrandizement of a state at the expense of another was forbidden. Whatever state should make an attack on the equilibrium would be regarded as revolutionary, a disturber of the European order, and would risk seeing Europe join together against it. At the same time, unfortunately, the European diplomats failed to take account of two important factors in the peace of nations: the question of nationality and that of religion. By placing Magyar Hungary under the domination of German Austria, by subjecting Greece to Turkey, and by confiding northern Italy to the hands of the Hapsburgs, they were preparing the way for future national claims. By systematically neglecting to take up the question of the Ottoman Empire, they were leaving open the question of the Orient. By establishing schismatic Russia's rule over Poland and of Protestant Holland over Belgium, they were wounding the consciences of the Catholics. By letting Austria lay hands on Venetia, they aroused the legitimate dissatisfaction of the Holy See.

[1] Albert Sorel in Lavisse, Histoire générale. Cf. Sorel, Essais d'histoire et de critique: Talleyrand au congrès de Vienne.

The Vienna treaties did not appear solid in 1823. They were broken in 1830, partly reversed in 1848, utterly forsaken in 1860, 1866, and 1870, by the creation of an independent Belgium, of an Italian monarchy, and of a German empire. The yoke of those treaties was painfully borne by the peoples, statesmen began to discuss them, and their rupture, at that time regarded as imminent, threatened profound trouble for the Church along with society.

Too exclusive is the view that regards the Congress of Vienna as the starting point of the vast "struggle between conservatives and liberals which forms the political history of Europe in the nineteenth century." [2] What can be said is that, by too readily irritating the national and lawful aspirations of the people and by failing to distinguish what was legitimate in those aspirations from what was revolutionary, Metternich and Talleyrand had unwisely planted the seed of an inevitable reaction. A diplomat whom a delicate moral sense and religious feelings placed on a higher plane and thereby made more clear-sighted did not have that same confidence in the treaties of 1815. Joseph de Maistre, who was strongly attached to the conservative and legitimist cause, wrote, as early as April 11, 1815: "Never perhaps did the world have better princes . . . than those assembled at the Congress. Yet, what is the result? Dissatisfaction is universal. What is strange in this situation is that the greatest of those princes let themselves be influenced by the philosophical and political ideas of the time; and yet never were the nations more despised, trodden under foot in a way more irritating for them. . . . Herein is an eternal seed of wars and hatreds." [3] Consalvi wrote to Metternich: "Some day the oldest monarchies, abandoned by their defenders, will find themselves at the mercy of low-class schemers, whom today no one deigns to notice with a look of forewarning." [4]

[2] Seignobos, Histoire de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 8.

In these circumstances what could be the attitude of the papacy? It could not enslave itself to either of the two movements that were about to divide the world between them. That one which Metternich and Talleyrand had just taken in hand to direct, though in one aspect it responded to the conservative tendencies of the Church, was not inspired by a purely Catholic spirit. If, apart from merely utilitarian considerations, one idea had hovered over the deliberations of the Congress of Vienna, it was that of the Holy Alliance.

This idea was at best of doubtful orthodoxy. It expressly confounded the various ways of being a Christian: that of the czar and that of the king of Prussia. It set down frontiers for the Roman Church, extending its protection to the pope as a temporal ruler while purposely ignoring his title of vicar of Christ. Thus it "ratified, however holy it called itself, the secularization of the diplomatic maxims, and against this attitude Rome protested at the very time of the treaties of Westphalia." [5] The expulsion of the Jesuits, wrung from Emperor Alexander I, the intrigues contrived by Talleyrand to overthrow the Bourbons, and the policy followed by Metternich with regard to the papacy, all would presently show that the Church could not rely on the leaders of the famous congress. She never did put her trust in them. The falsely asserted solidarity between the Church and the Holy Alliance, so often exploited by the enemies of Catholicism, is an utter calumny.

[3] J. de Maistre, Lettres et opuscules inédits, I, 324.

[4] Consalvi, letter of January 4, 1818, quoted by d'Estampes and Jannet, La Franc-Maçonnerie et la Révolution, p. 249. "By a thoughtlessness that would have frightful consequences," says Crétineau-Joly, "the allied sovereigns intended to muzzle the Revolution, and they turned loose the revolutionaries." L'église romaine en face de la Révolution, II, 5.

[5] G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, I, 313.

On the other hand the liberal movement, as manifested in the first years following the Congress of Vienna, was not such as to inspire the Church with confidence. Soon the anti-Christian sects endeavored to exploit it to their advantage, seeing therein a means of undermining the old monarchies and the principle of authority.[6] We shall see the pope then clearly condemn, so far as it is revolutionary, the insurrection movement which seeks, by unsound principles and by unjust means, to overturn the thrones; in particular he strikes the secret societies, which were treated with too much consideration by the sovereigns.[7] But in all circumstances where justice or religion seemed to him to be involved, he withdrew sharply from the policy of the allied kings. He made some restrictions apropos of the French expedition in Spain; and, notwithstanding the protests of the European sovereigns, he recognized the republics of South America.

The Social Crisis

We have considered the threats to the political order. Now we must consider the causes of trouble threatening the social order. The fall of the Empire, by the very fact that it put an end to the big European wars, had been the starting point of an immense industrial, agricultural, and commercial progress. The invention of the steam engine by Watt, of the miner's lamp by Davy, and of spinning machines by Arkwright, Le-

[6] Cf. L. d'Estampes and Jannet, op. cit., and Crétineau-Joly, op. cit. The subsequent pages of this volume will, by the presentation of facts, justify the present assertion.

[7] "Every day I speak to the European ambassadors of the future dangers which the secret societies are preparing for the order barely reconstituted, and I perceive that they reply only by manifest indifference." Consalvi, letter to Metternich, January 4, 1818.

noir, Girard, and Jacquart, added a considerable impulse to industry. In a short time the production of cotton thread and fabrics became a thousand times more important, that of iron and steel was increased tenfold, and the English coal mines were actively worked. Big industry was born. Manufacturing on a small scale, which produced only for the near-by markets, disappeared in the face of immense factories, owned by stock-company corporations with negotiable securities, which extended its markets beyond the frontiers of the country where it was located, sometimes to the ends of the earth. Anyone could foresee the importance that city life would assume and the power that would be acquired by the groups of the working population.

On the other hand, the formation and functioning of the vast new enterprises would lead to the associations of capital. From 1818 to 1820 the first large fire insurance companies appeared. In 1821 and 1822, societies were formed to lend the state the funds needed for the building of large canals which were required by the development of commerce. Important transportation companies were formed. Stockholders' shares were bought and sold on the Exchange, where gradually they came to have official quotations. Then came negotiable securities, speculation, stock-jobbing. Confronting the world of workingmen, on the way to grouping and organizing themselves, appeared the world of capitalism, likewise on the way to its organization.

The commercial laws of different countries sometimes made acute the relations between these two social forces. The interest of the big manufacturers is that foreign products be taxed so heavily at their entrance that their price will be higher than that of the national products. At the request of the owners of French iron mills, certain laws of 1814 and 1822 laid heavy taxes on importation of foreign iron. Soon the textile industries were protected by similar measures. But the foreign countries followed the same system. The English imposed heavy taxes on French wines and alcohols and on articles from Paris. They kept out the silk goods of Lyons.

The producers' interest seemed to be favored by this system of protection. But the interest of the consumer appeared quite other: he wished to buy the best possible products, from wherever they came, at the lowest possible price. Hence arose an antagonism between the capitalists and the workers. In the matter of grain, a French law of 1814 had satisfied the consumers; a law of 1819, inspired by a system practiced in England since the end of the seventeenth century, came to the relief of the producers. It established a sliding scale; that is, it taxed foreign wheat more or less heavily according as the price of native wheat was higher or lower. This system continued, with a few interruptions in its application, until 1861. "In fact, the sliding scale did not succeed in raising the price of wheat, as those who favored it had hoped; it scarcely prevented a price decline, but this relative benefit was dearly paid for by the continual price fluctuations consequent on its application." [8]

This account is a mere summary. But such an epitome of the economic situation at the close of the first quarter of the nineteenth century was needed to throw light on the origin of the social crisis which was about to arise at that epoch and to seriously disturb all the European states. However, it does not provide a full explanation. The evil must be looked for in deeper causes. The French Revolution had not only suppressed the former corporations of craftsmen, which procured stability and security for their members along with protection of their common interests. It attacked the very spirit that animated those institutions, that Christian feeling which bound together the employer and the workman in the practice of the same faith, in the reception of the same sacraments. In consequence of the change, we witness a selfish and heartless individualism, which looked upon labor, independently of the worker, from the single point of view of its mercantile value.

[8] A. Viallate in Histoire générale, X, 465. Cf. A. Foville, La France économique; E. Levasseur, Histoire des classes ouvrières en France depuis 1789; Clément, Histoire du système protecteur en France depuis Colbert.

Further, this individualism removed from property ownership its character of social obligation, which devolved upon it by natural law and by the divine commandment of the Gospel. Hence came the abusive advantage taken of men's labor, the destruction of family life, and the uncertainty of the workingman's subsistence, which was subject to the fluctuations of production.

On the other hand, the state's seizure of Church property in the name of the secularization of society, then in the name of so-called equality the seizure of the property of the nobility, had created dangerous precedents. The collective spoliation, in the name of pretended social principles, was supposed thus to create legitimate titles of ownership. Might not the working class appeal to such reasons to despoil the bourgeois class for its own benefit? The temptation to reason in this way was the stronger as many of the laws passed under the Empire seemed to have been prompted by an exclusive concern for the interests of the middle class.

A law of 1803 had forbidden associations of workingmen, but had nothing to say about associations of employers. Article 1781 of the civil code said: "The employers' word is accepted on his affirmation in the matter of the quota of wages, of the salary payments of the past year, and of the partial payments made during the current year." A law of 1806 had created arbitration boards in 26 cities of France; but the organization of these boards was judged suspect by the workingmen: indeed employers strictly so-called did not constitute more than half of the members of these boards; but the other half, instead of being made up of wage-earners, contained only foremen and "patented workers," that is, small employers. The working class as a whole regarded all these laws as a sort of reprisal of the bourgeois class against the initiatives of the working class.

The Social Question

Various disturbances were produced at this time. They occurred in the world of big industry and of high finance as also in the world of workers, and led to what is since called the social question. To solve this question various systems were then proposed. These may be classified into three schools: the economist or liberal school, the socialist school, and the Catholic school.

The economists had a spokesman. In his catechism of political economy and his course of political economy, published in 1815, Jean-Baptiste Say, author of a treatise on political economy that had appeared in 1804, became their mouthpiece. For liberal political economy the solution of the social question is in unrestricted competition. Its motto was "Laissez faire, laissez passer." In the mind of this school, the right of property is an absolute right, to which no social obligation is attached. The sole title to ownership is labor; questions of interest between employers and workers should be solved and regulated solely by "the law of brass," the law of supply and demand. Lastly, the liberal political economy declares that it is concerned only with the laws of production, distribution, and consumption of wealth; the moral laws are outside its domain. Several of these principles had already been professed by the Englishman, Adam Smith, and the Frenchman, Turgot.

Such a theory was revolting to many of those who were concerned with the sufferings of the popular classes. By its pitiless law of supply and demand, by its doctrine on ownership and its unconcern with the moral law, it appeared to sacrifice the weak to the strong, the poor to the rich, the worker to the employer. In the name of humaneness, three men (Owen in England, Saint-Simon and Fourier in France) proposed to remedy the evils of the working class by a reorganization of society.

Owen (1771–1858) was the owner of a big cotton factory. He considered that the cure would be found in the substitution of a cooperative system in place of the capitalist system: the workers would group themselves together to produce in common, instead of laboring for the advantage of a capitalist. The attempts to apply this system did, in fact, provoke combinations on the part of the employers and, in spite of Owen's energetic efforts, it failed completely.

A different system was worked out by Saint-Simon (1760–1825). It was gradually set forth in 1803 in his Lettres d'un habitant de Genève à ses concitoyens; in 1818 in his Vues sur la propriété et la législation; in 1819 in his famous Parabole, which brought some law suits on him; in 1821 in his Système industriel; and especially in a work that did not appear until after his death (1825), the Nouveau christianisme. This system, the work of a great lord, in turn soldier, industrialist, farmer, journalist, and pamphlet writer, a man who was both a scholar and a philosopher, had loftier and wider claims than the works of Owen. Saint-Simon envisioned the cure for the physical and moral ills of the workers in a double cult: the cult of labor and the cult of fraternity. Ancient times and the Middle Ages, he said, believed that to live nobly was to do nothing, the contrary was the truth: to live nobly is to labor. Antiquity, he added, also wished to make the social order rest on justice. This foundation was sterile and deceptive because justice is often merely the argument of selfishness.

The true basis of social progress is fraternity, he said. By the feeling of fraternity the rich and the powerful, elder brothers of the poor and the weak, stoop toward their younger brethren to raise them up and thus procure "the amelioration, physical and moral, of the poorest class," the genuine aim of every social organization. Having reached that point, Saint-Simon recognizes that he has joined hands with the Gospel principle: "Love one another." But promptly he departs to the very antipodes of Christianity. Wishing to assure harmony and unity in the cult of labor and fraternity, he declares that science has supplanted religion and that big industry has taken the place of feudalism. Consequently he decides to entrust the spiritual direction of the world to a body of learned men, and its temporal direction to a body of industrialists. But he does not define what he means by these spiritual and temporal directions. Thus we may say that Saint-Simon was, not the first socialist, but a simple forerunner of socialism. By injecting his doctrine into the realm of practical applications, his disciples, Bazard and Enfantin, became real socialists.

This last title cannot be refused to Charles Fourier (1772–1837). In his treatise on the agricultural domestic association, published in 1822, he set forth the principles of a precise doctrine on ownership and labor. Ownership ought to be abolished, for the only reason that it has been adopted, in spite of the evils it introduces, is that it is a stimulant to work. But labor can dispense with this stimulant. Labor becomes natural and attractive as soon as man is let freely to develop his desires and passions, to obey the "passion mechanics," as animal and plant obey their sensitive and vegetative mechanics, thus accomplishing, without shock or disorder, their destinies in the bosom of harmony. This theory would be tried out by the formation of the "phalansteries" [9] and ended up in the same failure as the theories of Owen and Saint-Simon.

The Catholic Church, however, did not remain indifferent to the ills of society. While the faithful were increasing their [9] This name "phalanstery" was given to the agricultural or industrial establishment in which workers were grouped into phalanxes of from 1,600 to 2,000 persons, there to devote themselves to the attraction of labor.

works of charity to relieve the present miseries, one of her children, Viscount Louis de Bonald (1754–1840), forcefully pointed out the vice from which the social organization was suffering and the liberal theories that pretended to justify it. That vice he showed in the policy and the activity of modern man. Above wealth, Bonald placed the moral formation of man. Hence he preached, among other reforms, a return to agriculture, "which nourishes those whom it has brought forth, whereas industry has brought forth those whom it cannot always nourish." [10] And he urged a return to the Christian corporations "whose destruction philosophy, that universal dissolvant, has persistently pursued under the vain pretext of a competition which has profited neither the upright merchant nor the arts nor the purchasers." [11]

Bonald's political ideas on absolute monarchy are debatable, and his philosophical theory about the origin of language is erroneous. But we cannot deny that, by his specifying, at the very outset of the nineteenth century, the true ends and conditions of social life, he was the forerunner of the Catholic social school.[12]

To complete the sketch of the social movement during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, we must mention an original writer who, on the borders of socialism and Catholic orthodoxy, exercised a notable influence. This man was Pierre-Simon Ballanche (1776–1847). At the beginning of the century Ballanche of Lyons, when only twenty-five years old, published his Du sentiment considéré dans ses rapports avec la littérature et les arts. Of this book a certain critic says: "It is an immature Genius of Christianity, which appeared before the latter." [13] In the mind of Ballanche, Christanity is the unique basis of all civilization. But at the same time he thinks

[10] Bonald, Economie sociale; de la famille et due droit d'ainesse.
[11] Bonald, Législation primitive, Part III, chap. 4.
[12] Michel Salomon, Bonald.
[13] E. Faguet, Politiques et moralistes du XIX^e siècle, p. 139.

that the French Revolution, despite its errors and crimes, was "one of the progressive realizations of Christianity in the social order." Sainte-Beuve, who felt the influence of Ballanche, speaks of him as "a fine soul that had flashes of illumination in the gloom, . . . a genius more than half veiled, whom people did not clearly understand." But he declares that the reading of Ballanche's writings "contributed greatly to inspire a religious breath in the school of Saint-Simon, which was still materialist." He says further: "As a witness of the effect produced by their reading on some of the most vigorous minds of the school, I can affirm how direct and prompt it was."[14] His works were not free of the illusions that mingled in the ideas of several Catholics of the nineteenth century. For these diverse reasons the name of Ballanche must have a place in this history.[15]

Romantic Literature

Along with his good qualities, Ballanche had also his defects. By his vague idealism and his dreamy Christianity, he belonged fully to that romantic movement which, about 1823, blossomed forth in the literature of Europe. Lamartine and Vigny had just created what is called "meditative poetry." Victor Hugo had published his first adolescent verses in which the glories of religion and of the Middle Ages were celebrated with a flourish. Chateaubriand was in the full power of his glory. Classical mythology seemed to be dead. To sing the new themes the old molds had been broken. No more artificial rules. People dreamed of replacing the chords of the lyre by heart-strings.

Such at any rate was the first phase of Romanticism. Christianity still lighted up its summits. The rationalism, the sickly sensualism, and the oddities of bad taste that marked its second phase, after 1830, had not yet entered it. But already observable was an excess of sentiment to the detriment of the will, and in this feeling the predominance of a depressing gloom. Said Sainte-Beuve: "The nineteenth century, beginning with the idea of the gigantic will of man with which it identified itself, seemed to have of a sudden given up its faculty of willing." [16] Furthermore, the abrupt transition from an epic life to a calm and bourgeois existence left a vague melancholy in men's souls. "Three elements shared the life being offered to the youth: behind them, a past forever destroyed; before them, the dawn of a vast horizon; and between these two, something ill-defined and fluctuating. . . . A feeling of inexpressible unrest began to ferment in young hearts. . . . Like the Asiatic pestilence exhaled from the mists of the Ganges, a frightful despair stalked the earth." [17]

[14] Sainte-Beuve, Portraits contemporains, I, 323.

[15] Ballanche's chief works are: L'essai sur les institutions sociales, Les essais de Palingénésie sociale, and some poems in prose (Antigone, Orphé, etc.), which the author utilized to contain his doctrines. Cf. Guichen, La France morale et religieuse à la fin de la Restauration.

In the philosophical movement could be noted the same soaring toward the ideal and the same uneasiness. The sensualist ideology of Destutt de Tracy, the materialist physiology of Cabanis and Bishat, the irreligious fatalism of Naigeon, no longer satisfied men's souls. "A protest, at first timid, but persistent, and growing stronger from day to day, arose in favor of the spiritualism and the upright morality of the school of Laromiguière, Maine de Biran, and Royer-Collard. With them the intellect recovered the consciousness of its spontaneity, of its effort, and of its resistence to the material world and the passions." [18]

Unfortunately another trend set in. In a current of ideas that came from the extreme north of Germany, from that country where Pravdinsk, Sovetsk, and Tilsit bore high witness to the victories of France, that good movement encountered the poison which would paralyze its generous aspiration. Kant's Critique made an appeal to those who were seeking to reconstruct their beliefs, and offered them the means of bringing about, at least in appearance, that intellectual and moral restoration with purely subjective elements. The painful labor of an objective reconstruction was spared them. Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel followed up the work of Kant. Something mystical and undefined, like the northern fogs, added an additional charm to those doctrines in the eyes of men of that time. Victor Cousin, after his visit to Germany in 1817, colored his eclecticism with a Kantian tint. Conservative minds at first tried to oppose this current by a Cartesianism supplemented by Scottish philosophy. Others, like Bonald, attempted to oppose it by an exaggerated traditionalism.

[16] Sainte-Beuve, op. cit., I, 134.
[17] A. de Musset, Confessions d'un enfant du siècle, pp. 9–20.
[18] J. Didiot, in Un siècle, p. 373.

In 1823 Lamennais, in his Essay on Indifference, gave this doctrine the luster of his great talent. According to him, the consensus of mankind on a moral doctrine was the supreme and, everything considered, the sole guaranty that we can have against error. Lamennais did, indeed, then believe that the Catholic Church was the concrete and living incarnation of men's general belief and thereby he thought to save both the cause of religion and that of reason. But thoughtful minds already denounced the errors of this too narrow and absolute doctrine, which would lead its unfortunate author toward that same abyss of pantheism which the heirs of Kant had already reached. The danger was the more serious as Kantian criticism, overstepping the bounds of the purely philosophical sciences, was visibly exerting its influence in the realm of religious beliefs. At first Protestantism, then Catholicism itself, felt the harmful influence.

A double effort was made by Schleiermacher and Hegel. Their attempt to reconcile Protestant theology with the German philosophy resulted merely in impregnating it with subjectivism and pantheism. Said Schleiermacher: "Religion is only the inner sense of contact with God," and he held that faith, thus understood, created theology, instead of faith being formulated by theology. For Hegel, religion was nothing more than "God's awareness of Himself in the finite being." He eventually maintained that Christianity and Hegelianism had the same contents; all that differed was the form.[19]

We see the destructive consequences of such doctrine. A just comment has been made that, > if religion is nothing more than a matter of consciousness, the history of a religion will be, quite simply, the history of the developments of the religious consciousness. . . . The Hebrew religion, for example, will be regarded as a product of the Hebrew people. It will be treated, a priori, as if it were not a revealed fact, external and superior to Israel; it will be considered the creation of Israel. But Israel cannot have made its religion in the way the Old Testament relates, for there has been no people in whom the religious consciousness was awakened in such a fashion. Hence come the hypotheses about the writings of the Bible, their date, their succession, the artifice of their composition.[20]

The historical criticism of Strauss, Baur, Renan, and Harnach is the victim of these religious theories.

German Catholicism did not escape from this influence. A professor of theology in the faculty of Bonn, George Hermes (1775–1831) expressed, first in 1805, in his Untersuchung über die innere Wahrheit des Christentums, then in 1819 in his Philosophische Einleitung, the idea of a new apologetic which, neglecting the role of grace in the production of the act of faith, made it a product of the "practical reason," understood in Kant's sense. For Hermes the historical facts, [19] On Hegel's blasphemies against Catholic dogmas and practices in general, and against the Eucharist in particular, see Saint-Hilaire, Victor Cousin, I, 334; III, 373; and Victor Cousin in La Revue des Deux Mondes, August 1, 1866, p. 617. On the religious doctrines of Schleiermacher and Hegel, cf. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le Protestantisme, pp. 78–93; le Catholicisme, II, 81.

[20] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le Protestantisme, pp. 89–91.

proved true by the history of an external truth, become "internally true" only by the adherence of the practical reason. The commandments of God acquire obligatory force only after being recognized, in consequence of an examination, as comformable to the practical reason.[21] Such a system contained in germ the worst doctrines of modernism.

The Secret Societies

These theories were professed, taught, and spread openly. Against them the Church was able easily to fortify herself. The same was not true of various subversive religious and social ideas that were being spread in the secret societies. Whether the crimes of the revolutionary impiety had discredited the Masonic program,[22] or whether the powerful hand of Napoleon, by making it the instrument of his designs, had sapped the vigor of its autonomy,[23] for the time being it lost, to a great extent, its anti-Christian character. While Napoleon in France was filling the lodges with his agents and was making of the lodges centers of imperialist propaganda, the German and Italian lodges set about inflaming the people against the French Empire and against Austria respectively. But, about 1811, the famous society seemed to reorganize itself on new bases, resuming its old spirit.[24]

To what extent did the Tugendbund of Germany and the Carbonarism of Italy and France belong to Freemasonry? Were they, strictly speaking, ramifications of it? Were they connected with it merely by more or less close bonds of affiliation? We cannot answer these questions with precision. What [21] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le Catholicisme, II, 2–12.

[22] Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 221.

[23] "Masonry," said Napoleon, "if under my patronage, is not something to be dreaded. As it exists today, it depends on me; I do not depend on it." See Max Doumic, Le secret de la franc-maçonnerie, p. 199.

[24] Deschamps, op. cit., p. 222.

is certain is that the revolutionary movement that took place in Europe from 1815 to 1823 came about especially by these three associations.

We are well informed about the Tugendbund ("association of virtue"). We learn its history especially from the works of a Protestant writer, Ed. Em. Eckert,[25] and from the controversial writings which those works aroused in Germany. This society was founded in 1807 by Baron von Stein, minister of the interior at Berlin, for the avowed purpose of hastening the fall of the Napoleonic empire and replacing it by a great and unified Germany under the direction of Prussia and the Masonic principles of the Revolution. In a thoroughly German phraseology, we see philosophy, philology, and natural science presented as forming the Trinity on which the German Church of the future would be founded. In their university chairs and in their books the leaders of the Tugendbund insisted on the moral teachings of Christianity, but they presented the dogmas as a symbol in such a way as to join in German patriotism both unbelief and faith.[26]

Fichte succeeded Baron von Stein as head of the association. He declared: "Society cannot allow its powers to be abused for purposes that are alien to it; it wishes to employ them for aims chosen by itself." In the final analysis the battle was fought in favor of those who devote themselves to the deliverance of the human spirit. In the political order the Tugendbund, at first favorable to the King of Prussia, turned against him when he refused to grant certain rights promised to the members; it then uttered threats and prepared revolts. In the moral and religious order it secretly opposed Christian dogmas.

[25] Eckert's book on the organization of Freemasonry supplies documents on German Masonry. Cf. his Magazin der Beweisführung für des Freimaurer-Ordens. Eckert's works were made use of by Father Gyr in his La Franc-Maçonnerie en elle-même et dans ses rapports avec les autres sociétés secrètes de l'Europe.

[26] Deschamps, op. cit., II, 222.

Organized in two sections, the Männerbund ("society of men") and the Jünglingsbund ("society of youth"), it comprised a mysterious hierarchy, with its graduated secrets and revelations that kept growing in boldness.[27] Several members of the university and of the army belonged to the Tugendbund. Eckert has shown that a considerable number of the societies that were made up of the German youth after 1815, such as the Deutsche Turnschaft and the Allgemeine deutsche Burschenschaft, were penetrated with the spirit of the Tugendbund. This spirit, as its defenders acknowledged, was nothing but the spirit of the Masonic lodges.[28] A document found in the French national archives and published in 1913 by Léonce Frasilier, has demonstrted that the influence of the German secret societies penetrated France by an intermediate center established at Coppet; its chief directors were Madame de Staël and Benjamin Constant.[29] Evidently this penetration preceded that of Italian Carbonarism, which exercised an important influence on the French secret societies.

Like the German Tugendbund, Italian Carbonarism was born at the time of the French domination. If we accept what is said by Crétineau-Joly, who saw the documents which Pope Leo XII had gathered on the secret societies, "Carbonarism, in Calabria and Sicily, sprang from a deeply monarchical thought and, during the first years of the nineteenth century, it offered to its founder, Queen Caroline of Naples, promises of unquestionable fidelity." [30] But the very mystery with which the society enveloped itself, the influence exercised there by certain Englishmen who were imbued with Masonic principles [27] Gyr, op. cit., p. 355.

[28] In a pamphlet against Eckert, we read: "Everyone knows that to the Masonic lodges is due the birth of most of the societies that have raised up the defeated nations." Défense de l'ordre maçonnique contre les attaques de l'avocat E. Eckert.

[29] Simon Duplay, Mémoire sur les sociétés et les conspirations sous la Restauration. For the entrance of the German societies into France, see Grasilier's article in Revue internationale des sociétés secrètes (March, 1913, pp. 51–54).

[30] Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., II, 78.

and all-powerful at the court of Sicily,[31] made it little by little deviate toward revolutionary ideas. One of its principles was that the actual forms of the Church and of states were old forms, destined to give way to organizations founded on the single basis of "nature."

The members used to meet ordinarily in the Abruzzi forests, frequented by the charcoal-burners (carbonari). From these they took their name and their principal emblems, as the Masons had taken theirs from the art of building. They were divided into various groups, called venditas (huts), analogous to the Masonic lodges. But, whereas the Masons professed to reject all supernatural revelation, the Carbonari, the better to win over the religious population of Italy, put their basis, at least in appearance, on Christianity.[32]

Under the threat of dire penalties, secrecy was required of the members. A special tribunal sat in judgment on infractions of this law; rarely did a delinquent escape from the vengeance of the sect. The bonds attaching Carbonarism with Masonry have been avowed by the Masons; but many of them, humiliated by the bloody deeds of their Italian brethren, have wished to see in them only degenerate sons of the great sect. Wrote the Freemason Blumenhagen: "The Carbonari ostensibly wear the drawn dagger to be used against the foes of the light. The bloody wounds of Sicily are not yet healed. The corpses of slain citizens bear witness against them. Their mere name ought to recall to an instructed Mason to what a degree of degeneration certain sects of our society can descend." [33] In 1818 Carbonarism established one of its huts at Macerata, in the very States of the Church, and several others in Lombardy.

Consalvi's penetrating mind had perceived the danger and,

[31] Ibid.

[32] See the ritual for the reception of the Grand Master of the Carbonari in Gyr, op. cit., pp. 381–418.

[33] Blumenhagen, "Confession politique" in the Revue Maçonnique of 1828, p. 320.

as early as January 4, 1818, the eminent statesman pointed out this danger to the courts of Europe. But his warning was unheeded. Then, to combat the intrigues of the sect, he favored an "Association of Catholic Friendship," founded by the Count de Maistre. But King Charles Felix considered it a danger to the state. The Austrian government showed less distrust of the Carbonari's huts than it did of a "League of Religious Defense" which Cardinal Pacca and the Jesuits had attempted to found in Lombardy.[34]

In 1821 Carbonarism was established in France, where the German sects had already penetrated.[35] The center of its expansion was a Parisian club called the Amis de la vérité, founded by four clerks of the customs administration: Bazard, Flottard, Buchez, and Joubert.[36] "Wonderfully fitting for the Italian character, but not proper to become in France a code of plotters (because of some Christian appearance, necessary in Italy), consideration should be given to the idea of modifying the statutes. . . . The dominant idea of the society had in it nothing precise. The preamble merely decreed the national sovereignty without defining it, following the spirit of Italian Carbonarism. The vaguer the formula was, the better it responded to the diversity of sentiments and hatreds." [37] Further, at the side of the chief hut, central huts, and particular [34] Cf. Cavalotti, "Memorie sulle società segrete dell'Italia meridionale e specialmente sui carbonari," from the Bibliotheca storica del Risorgimento italiano, and a police report of 1822, published by Grasilier in the Revue internationale des sociétés secrètes, June 5, 1913, pp. 1770 ff. See also Cantù, Gli eretici d'Italia.

[35] According to a police report of 1823, "The statutes of the various German affiliations seem to have served as types for the regulations adopted by the French associations, before the latter were acquainted with the name Carbonari. Of little importance is an inquiry into the changes which the Italian societies made in the first plans taken from the German societies. But that they are owing to Germany is not without interest." Revue internationale des sociétés secrètes, March 5, 1913, p. 525.

[36] Louis Blanc, Histoire de dix ans, I, 82.

[37] Louis Blanc, op. cit., I, 92. Cf. Deschamps, op. cit., II, 237.

huts, it would have for the army the "legion," the "cohorts," the "centuries," and the "maniples." In the writing of a Masonic historian of the Restoration, we read:

> At that time a parliamentary committee (of Carbonarism) existed. Lafayette belonged to it. . . . Provided with letters of recommendation, several young men went into the departments to organize the Carbonari. . . . The seduction was general, irresistible. Almost throughout all France were plots and conspirators. Matters reached the point that, in the last days of 1821, all was ready for an uprising at La Rochelle, Poitiers, Niort, Colmar, Neuf-Brisach, Nantes, Belfort, Bordeaux, and Toulouse. Huts had been formed in a large number of regiments; even the changes of garrisons were for the Carbonari a speedy means of propaganda.[38]

The French Carbonari from that time fused with Freemasonry.[39] Louis XVIII thought a good policy would be to treat with the lodges, even to submit to their influence.[40] Likewise we see the Voltairian ideas rapidly invade France, where they were popularized by Courier in his pamphlets and by Béranger in his songs. We merely recall that between 1817 and 1824 twelve editions of Voltaire and thirteen of Rousseau appeared. Of the former 316,000 copies were issued, of the latter 240,000. The strife against the "priests' party," as people called it, was the fruit of this propaganda; it would last as long as the Restoration and would succeed in wringing from King Charles X in 1828 the expulsion of the Jesuits.[41]

[38] A. de Vaulabelle, Histoire des deux Restaurations, V, 148, 151. On the action of the Carbonari in the various plots of that period, see Guillon, Les complots militaires sous l'empire et la Restauration; and Revue internationale des sociétés secrètes, 1913, pp. 526–54. A so-called Histoire des sociétés de l'armée, published by Charles Nodier, is a product of the imagination.

[39] See the testimony of the Masonic historian, Jean de Witt, Mémoires secrèts, p. 6.

[40] Deschamps, op. cit., II, 225. See also Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, II, 111.

[41] Thureau-Dangin, Le parti libéral sous la Restauration.

CHAPTER II

The Forces of the Church

To WARD off the various perils that we have just indicated, what were the forces of the Church? Since the coming of Louis XVIII these forces had grown in spite of every influence to the contrary. In vain the King of France seemed to favor the Voltairian ideas, showed himself favorable to the secret societies, and to gratify them entrusted the care of his government to four renegades from their clerical vocation: Talleyrand, Pradt, Montesquieu, and Louis.[1] In the eyes of all, his coming was no less the signal of a religious renaissance; the political restoration of the Bourbons appeared inseparable from a Catholic restoration. After the Revolution, which had persecuted them with violence, and the Empire, which had oppressed them while wishing to make use of them, the clergy of France, as a whole, had acclaimed the return of the Most Christian King with feelings of lofty confidence.[2]

Under Louis XVIII France had a religious renaissance. The stimulation of French missions, the increase in the number of religious institutes, the influence exercised by the Congregation, the development of Catholic schools, works of piety, zeal, and charity, the penetration of the Christian spirit in literature and the arts, though more superficial than deep, but real and efficacious: such were the first manifestations of that renaissance. A like movement occurred at the same time in Italy, Germany, and England.

[1] Crétineau-Joly, L'église romaine en face de la Révolution, II, 2.

[2] In the first number of the Ami de la religion (April 20, 1814) Michel Picot wrote as the spokesman of the French clergy, greeting "that family which had given St. Louis to France . . . and which Heaven seemed to hold in reserve to lead it to our aid when the time marked by its decrees at length arrives."

Parish Missions

The Ami de la religion was the organ of the French clergy. It published (January, 1815) the following notice:

A number of ecclesiastics are deeply moved by the privation of spiritual helps owing to the scarcity of pastors in some of our provinces. In accord with the wishes of the bishops, they have joined together to form an organization with the chief purpose of giving missions and training missioners for the interior of France. This organization, one of the first fruits of the freedom at length rendered to the sacred word, should interest all the friends of religion and make their hopes come true. . . . Fathers Rauzan, Legris-Duval, and Forbin-Janson are at the head of the organization.[3]

The names of the three directors of the new work were guaranties of success. Father Rauzan (1757–1847), born at Bordeaux, was one of the most venerable priests of the Church of France. Successively vicar and director of a minor seminary in his native diocese, then obliged to expatriate himself during the revolutionary turmoil, he had left everywhere the renown of a learned priest, zealous and charitable; his serious and apostolic eloquence was full of force and unction. After the concordat, Cardinal Fesch, archbishop of Lyons, struck by the priest's outstanding qualities, appealed to his zeal for the founding of a school of higher studies and of sacred eloquence in the episcopal city. But an imperial decree (December 26, 1809), suppressing all the mission establishments in France, did not permit the celebrated prelate's project to materialize. Father Rauzan merely profited by all the occasions offered him to announce the truths of religion to the people. Discarding the poetical forms by which Chateaubriand championed the Christian religion against the sarcasms of Voltaire, and also the powerful argumentation with which Bonald and De Maistre refuted the sophisms of Rousseau, the new missioner sought his models rather in Vincent Ferrier, Francis Regis, Vincent de Paul, and Bridaine. King Louis XVIII, whom he had accompanied to Gand, appointed him his chaplain; but he thought only of undertaking in France a work of popular evangelization.

[3] Ami de la religion, 1815, p. 95. In its next number this journal, returning to the subject, added that the new work received the encouragement of the King. Ibid., p. 107.

At this period divine Providence put him in touch with a holy Breton priest who regarded no work of zeal as alien, Father Legris-Duval (1765–1819). He was born in the diocese of Saint-Pol de Léon and was ordained priest in 1790. He did not have to exile himself because, not yet having received an appointment, he was not obliged to take the constitutional oath. The young priest took advantage of this providential immunity to exercise, during the Revolution, a tireless apostolate in Paris, especially for those condemned to death, whom he accompanied to the scaffold. Helped by Countess de Carcado and by Madame de Saisseval, he founded, for the children of victims of the Terror, that work, Orphans of the Revolution, which, the first of the works of the nineteenth century, was a sort of connection between the charitable institutions of the Ancient Regime and those of the Modern Regime.

While the two apostles were exchanging their views, they met a zealous young man. In order to give himself unreservedly to the apostolate, he had generously renounced the temporal advantages of a high birth, immense fortune, and a princely education. This man was Father Forbin-Janson (1785–1844). Like Father Legris-Duval, in the St. Sulpice seminary and catechism classes he had been trained in habits of zeal. At Paris he devoted himself to all manner of good works, heeding God's call to a more definite apostolate.

A complete accord of views was promptly established among the three priests. Then they were joined by a few companions. A little house on rue Notre-Dame-des-Champs was the cradle of the new community, which took the name of House of the Missioners of France. Soon it had as patrons Father Frayssinous, already celebrated for his conferences of St. Sulpice, and Father Liautard, who had founded the establishment destined to become famous as Stanislaus College. The material needs of the new work were provided by a committee of ladies, among whom were Princess de Montmorency, Countess de la Bouillerie, the Marchioness de Croisy, and Viscountess de Vaudreuil.

God blessed the pious institution. In a few years three hundred cities had the gospel preached to them by the devoted missioners. They were received in Paris, Lyons, Marseilles, Nantes, Bordeaux, and Montpellier, the most populous cities and the ones most filled with the rationalist ideas, with the same enthusiasm as in the humble villages. Often the missioners, upon reaching a city, found hindrances cleverly contrived against them. But eight days of missionary preaching were enough to dissipate these difficulties. The churches re-echoed with popular hymns and acclamations; long processions were organized; crosses, which everyone wished to help carry, were borne triumphantly through the streets, pausing by way of expiation, at the spots where the revolutionary scaffolds had been erected. Triumphal arches were set up at certain intervals along the route; the houses were adorned with tapestries; flags hung from the windows. In several parishes the town officials took part in a body in the religious manifestation. A detachment of cavalry opened the procession; salvos of artillery announced the opening and closing of the ceremony. In some cities of the south, at the foot of a cross, touching dialogues occurred between the preacher and the crowd. At Toulon, Father Rauzan exclaimed: "Before this cross your enmities have been extinguished. . . . Your missioners need something more. You must love your enemies." "Yes, yes," shouted a thousand voices. "You will love them henceforth. You will form but one people of brethren."

Inevitably some excesses occurred. Immoderate words were uttered here and there; in some places the pressure of the civil authority was exercised more or less indiscreetly over the people; the name of the King was sometimes mingled with the name of God in the popular acclaims. In fact, such occurrences did take place in several places. Men who remained unfriendly or indifferent did indeed point to these manifestations, exaggerating and distorting them, when they blamed the French missions. In reality, what exasperated the unbelievers was especially the religious success of these great outbursts.[4]

In defense of the missions an eloquent voice was raised, the voice of Lamennais:

When Christ appeared on earth, He began a great mission which has continued for eighteen centuries and, though often hindered, was always triumphant and will end only with the end of mankind. . . . Some have asked whether France was, then, peopled with idolaters that it needed to have missioners sent from city to city to announce the faith. We hear endlessly repeated that Christianity is dead; and as soon as a priest opens his mouth to announce its teaching to the people, some cry out: "Of what use? None but Christians are here." Moreover, I care little on which of these two statements you insist. If we no longer have any Christianity, missions are needed to restore it; if the people are Christian, missions are needed to prevent them from falling away. But the missions inflict harm on the liberty of the Protestants, disturbing them. . . . A singular claim, to deprive 25,000,000 citizens of religious liberty in order to assure that liberty to a small number, which no one is attacking! Cannot the Protestants have their liberty except on condition that we be chained? . . . It would indeed be strange that, when antisocial doctrines have everywhere their organs, Christianity should alone be forced to remain mute![5]

[4] We find an echo of these bitter and unjust charges in Vaulabelle, Histoire des deux Restaurations, IV, 425–28. The historian's picture of the missions is a caricature. More authentic documents will be found in the reports issued at the close of these missions. Therein the writers are unbounded in their enthusiasm.

New Religious Congregations

Other congregations sprang up. The Society of the Missionaries of France was not the only religious congregation which, since the restoration of the Bourbons, was devoted to the Catholic regeneration of France. The Trappists, the Vincentians, the priests of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, and the Picpus fathers of the Sacred Hearts resumed and developed their former and recent works. At this same time Father Chaminade founded the institute of the Daughters of Mary and the Society of the Marianists, Fathers Collin and Champagnat were laying the foundation of the Congregation of the Marists, Father Mazenod was establishing the Society of Oblates of Mary Immaculate. The Society of Jesus, canonically reconstituted for the universal Church by the bull Sollicitudo (August 7, 1814), was preparing for its return into France by the pious associations of the Fathers of the Sacred Heart and the Fathers of the Faith.

Under stress of the revolutionary tempest, Father Chaminade was exiled to Saragossa. There, in the venerated shrine of Notre Dame del Pilar, he felt burning within him the flame of the apostolate which made him take for his motto these words, that became the inspiration of his whole life: "Let us form Christian apostles." His soul's desire was realized when, sixteen years later, he was able at Agen, with the cooperation of a devoted Christian, Mlle de Trenquelléon, to found a community of "little missioners." Its motto was "the increase of Christians." A year after that, in conjunction with a holy priest, Father Lalanne, he founded a society made up of priests and laymen, with the purpose of pursuing the same apostolic aim, "to increase true Christians" by all the means that the providential circumstances should make opportune. In 1823 the two societies founded by William Chaminade conducted only some free schools, some workshops, and some boarding-schools in the south of France and in Franche-Comté. But their holy founder continually urged them to be ready, for the purpose of making Christians, to go to the ends of the earth. His views became a reality and, shortly after his death, his work had off-shoots in all parts of the world.[6]

[5] Lamennais, Mélanges, Vol. I, Des missions. On the missions, see Delaporte, Vie du R. P. Rauzan. Father Lacordaire, in his Eloge funèbre de Mgr de Forbin-Janson (Œuvres, VIII, 75–114) exaggerates Father Forbin-Janson's part in the foundation of the work of the French missions; their real founder was Father Rauzan. Some new details on the French missions will be found in Burnichon, La Compagnie de Jésus en France, histoire d'un siècle, I, 86–89.

In 1816 Chaminade laid the first foundations of a society of Mary, whose members would bear the name of Marianists. At that same time a group of students in the Lyons seminary enthusiastically welcomed the project, manifested by one of them, of founding a body of religious devoted to the Blessed Virgin, which would likewise bear the title of Society of Mary. Thus began two new religious congregations: the Little Brothers of Mary, or Marist Brothers, founded the same year by Father Marcellin Champagnat,[7] and the Marist Fathers, who did not begin to organize until 1823, under the direction of Father Jean-Claude Colin (1790–1836).[8] Like the Marianists, the Marists were soon swarming even to the antipodes; they would furnish Oceania with vicars apostolic and martyrs.

Father Mazenod (1782–1861) was descended from one of the highest families of Provence. At first he directed the aspirations of his zeal toward the distant missions. Then, upon the return of the emigration, he was in a position to see the religious condition of France. He felt that, after becoming a priest, he had no need to seek the infidels beyond the sea. As he says in the preface to the constitutions of his congregation, he saw that "such were the wickedness and corruption of the Christians that the condition of most of them was worse than that of paganism before the cross overthrew the idols." [9] Following his ordination to the priesthood, as a young curate at Arles he formed the plan of a society of priests devoted to the apostolate of the country districts.[10] In February, 1816, his idea began to see its realization. It gradually took shape by the evangelization of the principal districts of Provence; it would be crowned by the solemn approbation given by Leo XII (February 17, 1828) to the rules of the Institute of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate.

[6] Simler, Guillaume-Joseph Chaminade; H. Rousseau, Guillaume-Joseph Chaminade.

[7] See Vie du V. Père Champagnat.

[8] See Le R. P. Colin by a member of the Society of Mary.

The new institutes met with opposition. More than once the revolutionary impiety, by its journalists, its pamphlet writers, and its statesmen, some of whom were close to the throne, denounced these new foundations, pretending to point out in them political activity of the "priests' party." But attention was directed to the celebrated Society of Jesus, which had been proscribed by most of the European states in the eighteenth century and which had already returned to Sardinia, Naples, England, and Switzerland. Would the restoration of the Most Christian King enable it to return also to France? If it should attempt to do so, what would be the attitude of the government?

We are told that in 1815, after the battle of Waterloo, Prince Talleyrand, president of the Council, even ventured to express his opinion to King Louis XVIII. "Sire," he said, "Your Majesty hopes to remain at the Tuileries. But you have urgent need to secure the necessary supports. . . . I propose to you the legal reconstitution of the Society of Jesus." [11] We cannot be mistaken about the motives that dictated such a proposal: they were of an exclusively political order. As in the interval Talleyrand fell from power, the project was not taken up. But the question was not thereby suppressed. It presented itself to the mind of the authority the more pressingly as it resulted, not from more or less vague proposals, but from continual and precise facts that had to be elucidated.

[9] Preface to the Constitutions of the Oblates.

[10] Letter of October 15, 1815, in Rambert, Vie de Mgr de Mazenod, I, 165.

[11] Crétineau-Joly, Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, VI, 127.

First, several bishops, by virtue of a royal ordinance (October 5, 1814) [12] which made the minor seminaries subject to them, had called Jesuits to teach in them. The Jesuits, like other priests subject to the jurisdiction of the bishops and to the laws of the realm, receiving from the bishops merely the power to preach, to hear confessions, and to teach, were content to follow, in their internal life, the rule of St. Ignatius. They did not have nor did they ask for civil recognition as a corporate body; as individuals they merely claimed the rights of citizens and of French priests.[13] Certain court decisions, sanctioned by a royal edict, had indeed abolished the Society of Jesus in France. But had not these decisions been virtually abolished by the concordat of 1801 and especially by the charter of 1814, establishing in its fifth article the freedom of worship?

Protestant England and America, which had similar constitutional laws, interpreted them broadly in the sense of freedom, with regard to the members of the Society of Jesus, which was established there in analogous conditions. Would the government of the Most Christian King show itself less well disposed with regard to religious whose Supreme Pontiff had just officially recognized the institute? In fact, the government of the Restoration did not enter into the question of approving or disturbing the Jesuits, who carried on their work in the minor seminaries in the conditions we have just set forth. But the entrance of the Society of Jesus into France was accomplished at the same time by another route.

[12] This ordinance was not published in the Bulletin des lois; it will be found in Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., VI, 131.

[13] Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., p. 132.

This was brought about in 1784 by two young priests. Students of the St. Sulpice seminary, emigrants in the Low Countries, Charles de Broglie and Léonor de Tournély, joined two young men recently retired from the army of Conde: Xavier de Tournély, brother of the preceding, and Pierre Leblanc. Both of them wished to perpetuate the traditions of the Society of Jesus, at that time suppressed; they resolved to revive it under another form. For this purpose they founded a society which they called the Society of the Sacred Heart. A few months later they added a new member to their number, Joseph Varin de Solmon, the son of a counsellor to the parliament of Franche-Comté, formerly a fellow student with de Broglie and Tournély at St. Sulpice. After the turmoil of 1789 he too entered the military service in the army of Prince Condé. Like his seminary friends, he was of angelic piety, enthusiastic and brave, like his former comrades in arms. Joseph Varin soon became the soul of the young company. Father Emery, having had occasion to meet the little group during a journey after his release from prison in 1796, expressed his admiration in these words: "These young men live like saints. They are turning over in their heads plans that are most astonishing as they are also altogether holy. I admire their faith and their courage." [14]

Three years later (April, 1799) the Society of the Sacred Heart merged with a society of the Fathers of the Faith, which an Italian priest, Father Paccanari, had founded at Rome in 1797 with the same view of preparing for the reconstitution of the Society of Jesus. Under the direction of Father Paccanari, then of Father Varin, the society of Fathers of the Faith increased its apostolic works. Dillingen, Augsburg, Paderborn, Berlin, Amsterdam, Moravia, Italy, Switzerland, England, and [14] J. Emery, Letter to Father Courtade, August 28, 1796.

France were the theater of their labors. Lamartine, recalling the Fathers of the Faith, who had been his boyhood teachers at the college of Belley, wrote: "There I saw what could be made of men, not by constraining them, but by inspiring them. . . . Fathers Debrosse, Varlet, Béquet, Wrintz, my friends rather than my teachers, remain always in my memory as models of holiness, vigilance, fatherliness, tenderness, and grace for their pupils." [15] Not satisfied with applying to the education of young men the tried methods of the Society of Jesus, Father Varin made use of those methods in the religious training of young women by founding in 1800, with the help of Madeleine Sophie Barat, the institute of the Madames of the Sacred Heart.

The decree dissolving the society of Fathers of the Faith, which Napoleon issued on November 2, 1807, brought about the dispersion of its members, but not the ruin of their apostolate, which increased in different dioceses and there made known the true spirit of St. Ignatius and increased the seeds of vocation. So fruitful was this zeal that, even before the bull Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, which re-established the Society of Jesus throughout the world, a considerable number of the Fathers of the Faith and of their disciples joined the Society where it had already been authorized. Father Varin, admitted to the solemn profession of his religious vows on August 15, 1818, was appointed superior of the house in Paris in October of the same year. He would continue to hold this office until 1853, except for an interval from 1821 to 1825.[16]

The Congregation

The Fathers of the Faith had not been Jesuits, but they were ready to become so at the first opportunity.[17] Meanwhile they continually sought to further by their efforts the works founded by the Jesuits or prompted by their spirit. Such was the famous work which, instituted by a former Jesuit in 1801, Father Bourdier-Delpuits, after a quiet development despite the iron hand that was governing France, had a rapid growth at the return of the Bourbons. It spread in all directions, filled the country with centers of faith, prayer, and action, and at once aroused on the part of the anti-Christians such attacks and calumnies that its name is, in the world of unbelievers, a mysterious bugbear: the Congregation.

[15] Lamartine, Confidences, Bk. VI, notes 2, 3, 4.

[16] Guidée, Vie du P. Varin.

[17] A. Brou, Les Jésuites de la légende, II, 174. For the origin of the Congregation, see Burnichon, op. cit., I, 115–35.

What is the Congregation? The person that uttered the first cry of alarm was Count de Montlosier, who, in a celebrated Mémoire, answered the question thus: "I find as great difficulty in saying precisely what it is as I do in showing how in the past it was successively formed, spread, and organized." [18] Numerous exact documents, brought to light by contemporary scholarship, allow us to answer more precisely.

Many young men were flocking to Paris for study. In 1801, a secularized Jesuit, Father Delpuits (1736–1811), wishing to protect the faith and the virtue of these youth, gathered them into a pious association, taking as its model the statutes of the congregations of the Blessed Virgin in use in the Jesuit schools, then among their former students, since the middle of the seventeenth century. These associations of piety and good works, whose regulations had nothing mysterious about them, had been praised by several popes, notably by Benedict XIV.[19] The meetings were held every two weeks, their sole aim being the edification of their members. Little by little the society developed. To the students were added some business men. At the end of 1805, when Pius VII came to Paris, the Congregation counted 180 members. The Pope authorized it to receive provincial congregations. In 1808 it admitted to membership two learned men of the highest merit: the geometrician Cauchy and the physician Biot. The Congregation drew down the wrath of the Emperor by favoring the publication of the bull that excommunicated the despoilers of the Holy See. In 1809 the members of the Congregation had to disperse. Father Delpuits, weighed down by age and smitten by the events, was obliged to take a well-deserved rest. Lacordaire, speaking of this holy priest, says: "Others have acquired more glory in their dealings with the youth of France: none has better deserved it." [20]

[18] Montlosier, Mémoire à consulter.

[19] Bull Gloriosae Dominae, September 27, 1748.

Upon the restoration of the Bourbons, the Congregation saw a new era open up. The newly reconstituted society received members in throngs. Among these we note the following: Prince de Polignac who had just returned from exile, Father Eliçagaray (rector of the University of Pau), Colonel de Montaut (master of the pages of Monsieur), Duke de Bourbon, the Count d'Artois, and the King himself. The king's membership was, indeed, a mere formality of sympathy.

Since the withdrawal of Father Delpuits the society had been provisionally directed by Father Legris-Duval. In the month of August, 1814, it passed to the direction of Father Ronsin, formerly one of the Fathers of the Faith. Like many of his brethren in religion, he had just entered the Society of Jesus. For fifteen years Pierre Ronsin administered the Congregation with a zeal that won the admiration of the Catholics and the most impassioned attacks of the liberals. He was born at Soissons in 1771. Although lacking the alertness of Father Delpuits and the eloquence of Father Legris-Duval, and having modest externals, he soon revealed his intelligent devotion to the work and his tireless energy.

With him a new phase began for the Congregation. While not abandoning the society's first aim of mutual edification, he was much engaged in remedying the physical and moral destitution from which the people of Paris were suffering. At that time the [20] Lacordaire, Eloge funèbre de Mgr de Forbin-Janson (Œuvres, VIII, 88).

Congregation, by its organization and its works, recalled the celebrated Company of the Blessed Sacrament, founded in the seventeenth century. Many good works were directed by members of the Congregation under the inspiration of Father Ronsin. These included the Society of Good Works, presided over by Charles de Lavau, which devoted its labor to the relief of the sick and of prisoners and to the patronage of the little Savoyards, the Work of Orphans' Apprenticeship, the Work of Debtor Prisoners, the Work of the Orphans of the Revolution, the Work of the Soup Kitchens, the Work of the Schoolteachers, the Association of St. Joseph for finding jobs for workmen, the House of St. Nicholas for abandoned children, the Society of Good Letters, founded in 1821 under the patronage of Chateaubriand, the Society of Good Studies, formed in 1823, the Society of Good Books, created in 1824.[21]

The convert-making character which the Congregation assumed drew attention to it more and more. Contemporary journalism was born. This form was no longer the annalist, anecdotal journalism which the Ancient Regime knew. It was already that blustering, turbulent journalism of modern times, aspiring to the role of a public power, feeling itself capable of directing the currents of opinion and at need of creating them. The revolutionary press of the period between 1817 and 1830 cannot be reproached with venality; rarely did it make a traffic of its views. But "apart from this justly deserved merit, we must say that it pushed the cynacism of falsehood as far as possible." [22] To seize upon public opinion and to stir it, a sinister word enveloped in mystery was needed. The word "Jesuit" had already been exploited by Pascal. The journalism of the time again used the word for the same purpose, and it added "Congregationist." Says Viel-Castel in his Histoire des deux Res-

[21] See Grandmaison, La Congrégation.

[22] Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., VI, 147.

taurations,[23] "The words 'Jesuit' and 'Congregationist' became powerful weapons in the hands of the opposition to discredit its adversaries and to ruin their standing." [24] Later we shall see the consequences of this campaign.

Catholic Schools

The fathers of the Society of Jesus increased their works of zeal and charity through the Congregation. But they were not unmindful of the work which, under the Ancient Regime, was their chosen activity, the Christian education of youth. Thanks to the protection accorded by Napoleon I to the Brothers of the Christian Schools, at the solicitation of Napoleon's uncle, Cardinal Fesch, the primary schools, since 1803, were not denied religious instruction. Not satisfied with giving the Brothers a legal existence by his decree of December, 1803, which in France created the monopoly of teaching, the Emperor willed to incorporate the Brothers in the University.[25] Such an arrange-

[23] This history was prompted by a marked antipathy toward the Congregation and the Jesuits.

[24] For the refutation of the calumnies hurled against the Congregation, Grandmaison's book is fortunately supplemented by an article of Edmond Biré, "La Congrégation," which appeared in the Correspondant of January 25, 1890. In spite of these two scholarly refutations, we still hear that the Congregation was a secret political association. Undoubtedly some Congregationists, for instance, Montmorency and Polignac, mingled in politics, even imprudently at times; but the Congregation did not do so. But, we are told, the Congregationists were at the head of everything in the state. This assertion can easily be checked. A full list of the members has been published (Grandmaison, op. cit., pp. 399–414). Comparing this list with the royal almanacs of the time, we meet with the following data; in the Chamber of Deputies (1826), 5; in the House of Peers, 7; among the 85 prefects, 4; among the ministers of justice, of foreign affairs, of war and of the navy, not a single one; in the fiscal department, one director and one head of a bureau; in the royal guard, out of 33,000 men, 17 Congregationists. Further, we are told they often received favors from those in power. Such is possible. They were Catholics, royalists, and as a whole good servants of the state. Nothing could be more natural than that they were recompensed. But of these various facts nothing proves that the Congregation was a secret political organization.

[25] Decree of November 17, 1808, art. 109.

ment could, indeed, create for the institute of the Brothers an embarrassing dependence. The broad spirit of Fontanes, grand master of the University, the intervention of Father Emery, and the adaptable energy of Brother Gerbaud, superior of the Brothers, enabled the congregation to escape from this danger.[26] The venerable superior, who had started with 32 houses and 160 Brothers, left, at his death in 1822, 173 houses and more than 600 religious.

Unfortunately the situation of the secondary schools was less satisfactory. Upon Louis XVIII's return to France, one of his first acts was to announce his intention of suppressing the University monopoly and of re-establishing freedom of teaching.[27] But on June 28 a royal ordinance continued the University monopoly provisionally.[28] On February 15, 1815, a new royal ordinance, creating seventeen regional universities, under the direction of a royal council, would have effected a relaxation, to some extent, of the absolutism and centralization in the direction of education, if Napoleon's return had not prevented the carrying out of the plan.[29] After the Hundred Days, Louis XVIII declared that the difficulties of the times did not permit him to undertake a fundamental reform in the system of public schools, and he re-established the University on the bases of the imperial decrees of 1808. From the extreme left as also from the right loud protests were raised. Benjamin Constant wrote: "The authority can increase the means of education; it should not direct it." [30] Lamennais, in an eloquent article, declared: "We hear repeated that the individual reason should be independent of all law, even independent of God Himself; and to the government is attributed the right to enslave the reason of all [26] Cf. A. Chevalier, Les Frères des écoles chrétiennes et l'enseignement primaire après la Révolution, p. 245.

[27] Moniteur of 1814, I, 389.

[28] L. Grimaud, Histoire de la liberté d'enseignement en France, p. 110.

[29] Ibid., p. 120.

[30] Mercure de France, October, 1817, p. 59.

society by seizing on education." [31] In fact, at that time the students of the University were subjected to an influence that was generally grievous, sometimes detestable, on the part of their teachers, who were largely disciples of impiety.

Lacordaire in his Mémoires relates that often his mother used to execrate the University, which had robbed her sons of their faith.[32]

"Often," says an eminent historian of that period, "we have known old men who could not recall memories of college without speaking of it with disgust and indignation." [33]

The government of the Restoration resorted to timid palliatives. Not only did it close its eyes to the return of the Jesuits in the minor seminaries, but it let these establishments receive all students who presented themselves there with the intention of later entering upon lay careers. In this way these schools became regular colleges. The government also allowed the formation of religious boarding schools which prepared their students for the royal colleges, but which eluded this obligation by various artifices.[34] A royal ordinance of February 27, 1821, went still further. It ruled: 1. that the bishop, as far as concerned religion, would have the right of supervision over all the colleges of his diocese (art. 114); 2. that the individual houses which had won the confidence of the families could be raised to the rank of colleges with full rights (arts. 21, 22, 23); 3. that the curés or other officially appointed priests could take charge of training two or three young men for the minor seminaries.

At length (June 1, 1822) Bishop Frayssinous of Hermopolis was appointed grand master of the University and president [31] Conservateur, I, 587.

[32] "A shadow of grief clouded the heart of that blessed woman whenever the thought came to her that she no longer had about her a single Christian and that none of her children could accompany her to the sacred mysteries of her religion."

[33] Thureau-Dangin, "Les libéraux et la liberté sous la Restauration," in the Correspondant of March 25, 1876, p. 958.

[34] Chabot and Charléty, Histoire de l'enseignement secondaire dans le Rhône; Burnichon, op. cit., I, 79, 222–305.

of the royal council of public instruction. The learned and devout prelate, who had become famous through his St. Sulpice conferences, appeared to be the Frenchman best qualified to save the institution by sheltering it under the shadow of a great name.[35] But he did not hide from himself the insurmountable difficulties of his task. To some friends who congratulated him, he sadly replied: "Providence has wished to chastise me by putting on my shoulders a burden above my strength; I cannot accomplish the good expected of me." In reality, the influence of the new grand master would be limited to the suppression of a certain number of scandals. The irreligious spirit of the University as a whole continued. The young Montalembert, a student at Saint Barba College, relates that he met there 120 unbelievers and that he counted 30 students of his class who declared that they did not believe in Christ. But the Catholic press began to arouse public opinion. Lamennais' open letter to the grand master, published in the Drapeau blanc, revealed numerous scandals in the establishments of the University. This letter had far-reaching reverberations.[36] It was the start of the campaign which, intermittently carried on until 1850, ended in one effective reform, the freedom of teaching.

For such a movement of public opinion to be possible in 1823 was a sign that Voltairianism had not altogether dried up men's souls. Another sign was the success of the Essay on Indifference.[37] The year 1823 was the time when Jouffroy, gathering together a few choice students in his modest apartment on rue du Four, "spoke to them of the beautiful, of moral goodness, of the immortality of the soul, or some other of those truths of Christianity that were then almost novel." [38] Similarly at this [35] Henrion, Vie de Mgr Frayssinous, II, 357.

[36] Lamennais, Œuvres complètes, VIII, 355. The Drapeau was prosecuted and condemned. See the report of this suit in the Gazette des tribunaux for 1823. Cf. also the Journal des Débats, September 3, 1823.

[37] See Boutard, Lamennais, I, 154; Lacordaire, Considérations philosophiques sur le système de M. de La Mennais, chap. I.

[38] Thureau-Dangin in the Correspondant of March 25, 1876, p. 961.

same time Vigny, Soumet, Victor Hugo, and Nodier were forming, in the famous salon of the Arsenal, that first Cenacle which would later give birth to the romantic movement.[39] Royer-Collard had just pointed out to the old parties the coming of a new nation, and Guizot had spoken of "this young generation, the hope of France, which the Revolution and Bonaparte had neither shattered nor perverted."[40] Often an ill-regulated enthusiasm would lead this new generation in the direction of fruitless dreams, ruinous utopias, unrestrained action. But beneath its foolish ambitions and its dubious liberalism, a Christian breath, which many of them would presently disavow, penetrated it unawares. Alfred de Musset, who has left us the most somber picture of his youth blighted by the University,[41] would become the eloquent interpreter of that generation when he denounces the teaching of Voltaire and praises the Hope in God.

Religious Movement in Italy

A similar movement took form in Italy at the death of Napoleon and Pius VII. It was likewise mingled with more or less visionary hopes and sincere aspirations toward Christianity. The potentate who had just disappeared from the scene left his powerful imprint on the Italian peninsula. In creating that kingdom of Italy, in which the various fragmentary states of the peninsula tended to be absorbed, he had seconded its tendencies toward unity, revived the memories of a past nationality, and aroused the proudest hopes. But when, after the fall of the Emperor, Italy had asked for independence from those who had vanquished it, these replied by a new partition. Austria, not satisfied with taking both Lombardy and Venetia as a conquest and unconditionally, brazenly set herself up as the protector of the absolute powers against all attempts at self-rule. Hence was born that movement, composed of love for the Italian fatherland and of hatred for the foreigners, which the Italian populations would express by a sonorous word, the Risorgimento, and translate by a sullen motto: Out with the foreigners!

[39] Lanson, Histoire de la littérature française, p. 926.
[40] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., p. 938.
[41] A. de Musset, op. cit., chap. I.

The holy pontiff Pius VII had just died. By the magnitude of his strifes and misfortunes as also by the final triumph of his authority, he had cast on the Holy See such a splendor that the Italian people, less than any other, could henceforth neglect or feign to ignore his power.

Among the patriots who aimed at the resurrection of Italy, two parties were formed. Some, approving violent measures and revolutionary principles, declared themselves enemies of the papacy. In history they are known as the party of Young Italy. Mazzini became their leader; the secret societies were their chief means of action. The members of the other party, joining devotion to Italy and that to the pope, formed the party of neo-Guelfs. One of the statesmen who assumed the task of continuing the traditions, describes it thus:

This party, inflamed especially for liberty, read in history that liberty always had the popes for its defenders. The popes were the ones who preserved Italy, saved the remains of ancient civilization, and kept the barbarians from being completely dominant. . . . This party of the neo-Guelfs will be opposed by all those who regarded the papacy as an obstacle to the freedom of Italy; but many a good man and good heart cherished a fondness for this idea. The most famous representative of the neo-Guelfs was Father Gioberti. According to him, the welfare of Italy was impossible without the help of religious ideas; the peninsula could not be free and strong if Rome, its center and moral head, did not rise to her position of leadership. If the political attempts had not heretofore succeeded, this failure was because in those undertakings no account was taken of the clergy and of religious beliefs; it was because the movements forgot that religion is at the basis of the Italian genius, that Rome is its metropolis, that Italy's only possible greatness must be a result of a confederation of all its states, with the pope at their head.[42]

Such at least was the program that Gioberti gave to the party. About 1820 this program was but a movement of public opinion, which included as its chief representatives the poets Alexander Manzoni (1785–1873) and Silvio Pellico (1789–1854), the lawyer Romagnosi, and the economist Melchior Gioja. Manzoni, at first caught in the current of unchristian philosophy, returned in 1810 to the faith and the practice of Catholicism. Some excellent religious hymns, which appeared in 1813, bore witness to the fervor of his convictions. His masterpiece, The Betrothed, did not appear until 1827. Silvio Pellico was already renowned by the success of his tragedy Francesca di Rimini. In 1819 the desire to work for the moral emancipation of their fellow countrymen and thus to prepare a future of happiness and liberty for Italy, prompted these men to found a purely literary journal, the Conciliateur. Before long this paper aroused the umbrage of the Austrian government.

By virtue of the celebrated decree of August 25, 1820, which imposed the death penalty on any member of a secret society and the penalty of imprisonment "duro e durissimo" on anyone who failed to oppose the progress of Carbonarism and who failed to denounce its members, the editors of the Conciliateur were condemned en masse. Pellico, condemned to death (February 21, 1822), saw his penalty commuted to fifteen years of severe imprisonment. He relates his sufferings in a book full of the purest Christian resignation, Le mie prigioni, which, at once translated into many languages, resulted in serious reforms in favor of prisoners. Manzoni, apart from his literary works, labored in defending Catholic moral teaching against the calumnies of the irreligious. As for Gioberti, a fickle and restless spirit, by his philosophical and political temerities he later incurred, like Lamennais, the severest condemnation of the Church.

[42] César Cantù, La storia di cento anni.

Religious Movement in Germany

The leaders of the Catholic movement in Germany at this time were likewise noted for their tendencies toward the ideas of liberty. A certain historian of Catholic Germany in the nineteenth century says: "Joseph Goerres, Frederick Schlegel, Charles von Haller, and Adam Müller entered, each in his own way, on a campaign against political and social absolutism. . . . They turned to the Middle Ages not merely for esthetic subjects; therein they sought lessons of political architecture, mottos of Christian social life." [43] In 1822 the recently converted Goerres wrote: "I consider that the Church is nowise subordinate to the state and to the interests of the state. . . . And I do not wish that religion be immured in the inner room of the heart. It has too much to do outside. It is in the market place, in the environs of which the Church has a spacious part to play." [44] Frederick Schlegel rejects with all his might any despotism, whether of a prince or of the masses, and he advocates the constitution of a Christian state, with a religious basis "founded on a justice full of love." [45] Haller, born a Protestant as were Goerres and Schlegel, became a Catholic because he saw in Catholicism a principle of regeneration for society.[46] Müller was a German Bonald, romantic and misty, but a clear-sighted and powerful mind. He persistently opposed, in his books and in his polemical articles, two "cursed idols": that of the Roman law and that of the so-called political economy, which he sharply called economic absolutism. He predicted that these [43] G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, I, 390.

[44] Goerres, Gesammelte Briefe, III, 34.
[45] Schlegel, Philosophy of History, p. 345.
[46] Haller, Letter to his family declaring his return to the Catholic Church.

two idols would crumble and be succeeded by the genuine law.[47] Goerres, Schlegel, Haller, and Müller were laymen. In a more strictly religious sphere, some devoted priests, faithful to the method inaugurated at the outset of the century by a pious ecclesiastic of Westphalia, Overberg, popularized catechetical teaching in Germany.[48] Another priest, Sailer (1751–1832), "the Francis de Sales of the Rhineland," was there making widely known, in countless works, the methods of Christian asceticism and the principles of true piety.[49]

The episcopate was not slow in putting itself at the head of the movement. The treaties of 1815 had stripped it of its possessions and its power. The thirty-eight German princes, to whom the allied sovereigns had guaranteed independence, refused to render to the other princes their old sovereignty, to the Church and the chapters their former rights and possessions.[50] Are we to look upon this change as good for the Church? A clear-sighted and judicious observer of Germany at this period, Cardinal Pacca, in his Memoirs, replied to the question as follows: "I dare to answer in the affirmative. I consider that the bishops, deprived of a temporal domain, which could be most useful for sustaining the ecclesiastical spiritual authority when applied to that object, will henceforth be more docile to the voice of the Supreme Pontiff. . . . The Catholic people will be able to behold, in the pastoral visitations, the faces of their bishops. The sheep will hear, at least sometimes, the voice of their shepherds. . . . The grave ideas of the sanctuary will at length dominate those of the militia." [51] Cardinal Pacca saw rightly. In that austere poverty would be trained the great episcopal souls

[47] Goyau, op. cit., I, 380–90.

[48] Ibid., pp. 259–74.

[49] Ibid., pp. 291–309.

[50] Menzel, Neuere Geschichte der Deutschen von der Reformation bis zur Bundes acte, XII, Part II, chap. 29.

[51] Pacca, Œuvres complètes, II, 444.

of a Droste-Vischering, archbishop of Cologne, and of a Diepenbrock, bishop of Breslau.

The Religious Movement in England

In studying the religious condition of Germany after 1815 the Cardinal added to the hopes just set forth another consideration. This was that, by the very effect of the decline of the Protestant sects, a large movement of return to the Roman Church was facilitated. The conversions of Goerres, Schlegel, and Haller were the first fruits of this movement. In 1827 a similar move toward the Roman Church was preparing England and would have as its inspirer another great convert from Protestantism, John Henry Newman. The eminent historian of the Catholic renaissance in England in the nineteenth century, treating of the religious situation in Great Britain for the period between 1813 and 1823, gives us a picture that we are happy to quote.

In the years following Waterloo, the English thought, freed from the gigantic and perilous effort that absorbed it during its struggle against Napoleon, found the leisure for more attention to the religious problems. It seemed at that time divided on this subject between two contrary tendencies. Some, who remained under the sway of the eighteenth-century traditions and of the French Revolution, showed themselves aggressive or disdainful toward any revealed and supernatural religion. Others, matured by the great crisis that the world had just gone through, felt the need of a return to Christianity. Some writers seconded this reaction, accomplishing in England a work like that of Chateaubriand in France, of Goerres in Germany; such, in different ways, were Walter Scott, Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey.

Was the Established Church of England ready to face this hostility and to satisfy this need? No one then thought so. The bishops, chosen by political favor, lived sumptuously, nearly always outside their dioceses, where they reappeared only to preside at some rare ceremony.

The clergymen, mostly younger sons of aristocratic families, without even a shadow of vocation from on high, were concerned with obtaining and even of accumulating rich benefices. A few of them had preserved a taste for classical studies. The best of them strove to lead a life which, as was said in England, was respectable and comfortable: nothing of the supernatural; no thought of the invisible; little piety or fervor; still less of asceticism and mysticism. At bottom the Church appeared to be less the custodian of a treasury of beliefs which must be accepted and which obliged the conscience than an "establishment" closely bound to the state and being the recipient of political privileges and of large wealth. . . . An effort had been tried to reanimate the religious life extinct in Anglicanism: this attempt was the evangelical movement, more or less inspired by Methodists. In places where its influence penetrated, it had awakened individual piety. Although its origin did not go back more than fifty or sixty years, it was beginning to show signs of decline; its beneficent power seemed to be exhausted. . . . Where were men to turn? Where find that religious renewal which souls were awaiting? Was it in the so-called liberal school, which, about 1820, was dominant at Oriel College, at that time the most renowned of the colleges at Oxford? But, under the pen of the heads of this school, the Church fathers were simply "certain old theologians"; the doctrinal part of religion was at least minimized. Instead of strengthening religion, the liberals opened the door to free-thought.[52]

One book at that time contributed most effectively in bringing the Anglicans back to the religious conceptions so thoroughly forgotten; this work was a volume of poetry. Its author was a village pastor, John Keble. . . . Beginning in 1819 he used to unbosom the feelings that overflowed his soul by composing short hymns. These were a sort of incense that he liked to make rise heavenward. Little by little his collection grew, and he soon found that he had written hymns for each Sunday and for each feast, as also for the principal acts of the Christian life. Some friends, who became acquainted with these little poems, were not resigned to see them remain under a bushel.[53]

[52] Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre au XIX^e siècle, I, 1–9.
[53] Ibid., I, 10–12.

Not until 1827 did the book appear, and then anonymously, with the title, The Christian Year. At that date the religious revival had another representative in the person of a young vicar of the parish of St. Clement at Oxford. This young ecclesiastic was John Henry Newman (1801–90). "The son of a London banker, he had received from his mother, a descendant of French Huguenots, a religious upbringing impregnated with Calvinism. A precocious student, when barely sixteen years old (1816) he was admitted to Trinity College at Oxford. . . . From that time on, he had an intense interior life, was absorbed in the meditation of things invisible, and eagerly sought to do good and to know the truth." [54] For a short time he felt the influence of liberalism, which was then powerful at the University. But the attachment which he had already professed for the early Fathers, and his study of them were a safeguard for him. "The men of Oriel, with their somewhat capricious independence of mind, at times found themselves mingling in their liberal views certain theses with a Catholic tendency. These were the men to whom Newman preferably attached himself, and whom he held on to." [55] We are told that one of his friends, on hearing him express his theological ideas, often said to him: "Ah, Newman, that will lead you to the Catholic error."

Newman would smile sadly at such prophecies. Catholicism, such as it then appeared in England, had nothing to attract a mind of so rich and noble a culture. Newman himself has left us a striking picture of what the Catholic Church was in England from 1815 to 1823. He says:

> No longer the Catholic Church in the country; nay, no longer I may say, a Catholic community; but a few adherents of the Old Religion, moving silently and sorrowfully about, as memorials of what had been. "The Roman Catholics"—not a sect, not even an interest, as men conceive of it—not a body, however small, representative of the Great Communion abroad,—but a mere handful of individuals, who might be counted like the pebbles and detritus of the great deluge, and who, forsooth, merely happened to retain a creed which, in its day indeed, was the profession of a Church. Here a set of poor Irishmen, coming and going at harvest time, or a colony of them lodged in a miserable quarter of the metropolis. There, perhaps, an elderly person, seen walking in the streets, grave and solitary, and strange, though noble in bearing, and said to be of good family, and a "Roman Catholic." An old-fashioned house of gloomy appearance, closed in with high walls, with an iron gate, and yews, and the report attaching to it that "Roman Catholics" lived there; but who they were or what they did, or what was meant by calling them Roman Catholics, no one could tell;—though it had an unpleasant sound, and told of form and superstition. . . . At length so feeble did they become, so utterly contemptible, that contempt gave birth to pity.[56]

[54] Ibid., p. 18.
[55] Ibid., p. 24.

Such was Catholicism in England in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. A guess has been made that it did not count more than 160,000 members. At the close of the century, exclusive of Ireland and Scotland, they were about 1,500,000. You might see cardinals sitting beside Anglican prelates in public ceremonies; the statue of one of them may be seen in London in front of the church of the Oratory; and the principal instrument of Providence in this marvelous movement of Catholic rebirth was John Henry Newman.

[56] Newman, The Second Spring (1911 ed.), preached at Oscott in 1852.

CHAPTER III

Leo XII (1823–1829)

"EUROPE still contains many inflammable elements." [1] So wrote Joseph de Maistre (April 11, 1815) on the morrow of the Congress of Vienna, in which the allied rulers undertook to accomplish a work of political, social, and religious pacification. The assertion of De Maistre was even truer in 1823. We have seen that, besides the causes of political troubles, brought on by the granting of sovereignty for mere reasons of convenience,[2] present were causes of social and religious troubles. The most evident of these causes were the parties of extreme socialism, the secret societies, the press, and the complex and dubious movements which were taking place in all spheres under the names of romanticism and liberalism.

Joseph de Maistre was not far from thinking that the famous congress must be held responsible for all these troubles.[3] At any rate, we may say that this "federation of crowns," which had just made over the nations of Europe at its good pleasure, at once stirred up a reaction against itself. This reaction, called liberalism and nationalism among the people and called zelantism at the Roman court, had not disarmed. "The party of the crowns" and the party of the zelanti would divide the conclave assembled to choose a successor of Pius VII.

[1] Lettres et opuscules, I, 325.

[2] Ibid.

[3] "The maxim was accepted that a nation, in spite of itself, can be deprived of its legitimate sovereign. Herein is the first consequence, direct and inevitable: hence with greater reason if the nation requests it. But if the nation can pass judgment on its ruler, why should it not do so?" Ibid.

The Conclave

The party of the zelanti did not here appear for the first time in the history of the conclaves. It was composed of the cardinals who, in making their choice, were bent on considering only the interests of the ecclesiastical power. In the eighteenth century this group took an active part in the election of Innocent XIII, Benedict XIII, and Benedict XIV. But perhaps it never had a more clearly defined aim than after the death of Pius VII. Its determination was to show itself inflexible toward the claims of the allied states, which, after regulating the political lot of the European nations in 1815, attempted in 1823 to influence the election of the head of Christianity. The zelanti had a candidate, Cardinal Severoli, bishop of Viterbo, former nuncio at Vienna. He was, in reality, a peaceful man who had inconsiderately been given a reputation for stubbornness. The "party of the crowns," backed by the courts of Vienna, Paris, and Naples, favored Cardinal Castiglioni, bishop of Frascati. This man was a pious and scholarly prelate, highly esteemed for the mildness of his character, but in him was evident the goodness of a shepherd and the patience of a martyr rather than the aggressiveness of a fighter.

Among the members of the Sacred College was one toward whom the eyes of all were turned. No one thought of proposing his name for the tiara, but they looked to him because his high influence could, according to its direction, determine the election of the new pope: this was Cardinal Consalvi, the diplomat who at the Congress of Vienna had obtained the restoration of the Papal States.[4] He judged that a pronounced attitude of opposition toward the sovereigns was, under the circumstances, untimely; he sided with the "party of the crowns." Along with him he carried several prudent and moderate men, who agreed with his policy. But the former Secretary of State, the man who held so important a post in the preceding pontificate, had some adamant opponents. Most of these absolute, determined spirits blamed him bitterly for giving too much place, in his policy, to political combinations, and even reproached him for giving the administration of the Roman States a reputation worldly rather than ecclesiastical. They murmured that, although he had finally saved the bark of Peter, he had first pushed it to the edge of the abyss. In short, these foes of Consalvi's policy ranged themselves solidly in the party of the zelanti.

[4] On Consalvi's important part in the Congress of Vienna, see Rinieri, Il congresso di Vienna e la Santa Sede, Vol. IV.

Their attitude seemed to assure the election of Severoli, who, on the morning of September 21, 1823, obtained twenty-six votes. Based on the number of cardinals present, the two-thirds for the validity of an election was thirty-three. The likelihood was that this number would be reached in the afternoon balloting. But the powers were on the watch. At the opening of the afternoon session, Cardinal Albani read a note thus phrased: "In my capacity of ambassador extraordinary of Austria to the Sacred College and also in virtue of instructions given me, I perform this task, unpleasant though it is for me, of declaring that the imperial and royal court of Vienna cannot accept for supreme pontiff His Eminence Cardinal Severoli, and hereby exercises a formal exclusive in his regard."

The effect of this unforeseen event was not precisely what the court of Vienna expected. This high-handed intervention of Austria exasperated the Italian cardinals. The candidate of the zelanti was put aside; but that of the crowns, Castiglioni, who had received seventeen votes in the morning balloting, obtained only eight at the afternoon session. A new candidate must be chosen.

In such circumstances, sometimes the votes were united on the name of an old man, whose brief pontificate would serve as an interval of preparation for an ultimate agreement. Did this sort of calculation enter the minds of some electors? Possibly so. More direct considerations seem to have prompted most of the cardinals when, on September 28, they elected by thirty-four votes, Cardinal Annibal della Genga. Although only sixty-three years old, he had become an aged man through infirmities.[5]

All were unanimous in recognizing the worth of his talents and the genuineness of his virtues. The older among them recalled how one day Pius VI, making an inspection of the ecclesiastical Academy, had been impressed by the clear and precise answers of the young Annibal and had forthwith made him secret chamberlain. No one forgot the memory of the funeral oration after the death of Emperor Joseph II in 1790 by the eloquent prelate in the Sistine Chapel in the presence of the Sacred College. The task was peculiarly difficult: to judge a sovereign whose reign had been, in many respects, harmful for the Church, without giving offense to the Austrian cabinet and without being disloyal to the truth. By the loftiness, the moderation, and the gravity of his words, the orator succeeded in avoiding the shoals hidden in a like subject. The most exigent minds expressed their satisfaction. The title of archbishop of Tyre, shortly afterward conferred on Della Genga, important nunciatures at Lucern and Cologne, several most delicate missions assigned to him in Germany and France, his elevation to the purple in 1816, and his appointment to the office of cardinal vicar in 1820, confirmed his reputation as a prudent and enlightened administrator.

Moreover, the fervor of his piety seemed to increase with the greatness of his offices. More than once his precarious health seemed to set obstacles to his ministry. After the death of Pius VI he retired to the abbey of Monticelli in the diocese of [5] For the details of the conclave of 1823, see Artaud de Montor, Histoire de Léon XII, I, 26–79; Terlinden, "Le conclave de Léon XII" in Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, XIV (1913), 272–303.

Fabriano, which the Holy Father bestowed on him. There he had his tomb built, persuaded that he would end his days in that retirement. On several occasions he returned to it, there to await in peace, as he said, the judgment of God. Nothing but duty drew him forth from that repose. At the time when a heavier mission was imposed on him, he ventured to object his sickly condition. When, following the customary formula, the cardinal camerlingo (Pacca) asked him whether he accepted his election as sovereign pontiff, he replied: "Do not insist. You are electing a corpse." The protests that rose around him interrupted him. Then turning to Cardinal Castiglioni, whose name had been pronounced by Pius VII on his deathbed, he said: "Why did they not follow the wish of the late pope?" Then, as if to reserve for Castiglioni the chance of later on taking the name of Pius VIII, as in fact he did, the newly elected, in memory of the kindness which Leo XI had shown to his family, chose the name Leo XII.

"Tall and emaciated, weak in his gait, pallid in countenance, Leo XII appeared as if he had just risen from a bed of sickness, to pass within to that of death." [6] His features were habitually impassive. Yet at times his sufferings became so acute that his mere presence inspired pity and dread.[7] "His eyes, however, and his voice compensated for all. There was softness and yet a penetration in the first, which gained at sight affection and excited me. His voice was courteously bland and winning. There was a peculiar dignity and gracefulness, natural and simple, in his movements, especially in ecclesiastical functions." [8]

[6] Wiseman, Recollections of the Last Four Popes, p. 166.

[7] Artaud de Montor, Histoire de Léon XII, p. 18.

[8] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 177. The most authentic portrait of Leo XII is that painted by Giorgiacomo and engraved by Lepri. After Leo XII's election, a Parisian publisher, urged to issue a portrait of the new pope, found nothing better than to reproduce the portrait of Father Olier, painted by Strésor and engraved by Boulanger, and there to insert the name of Leo XII. Copies may be seen in the Cabinet des Estampes.

First Difficulties

The new pope's feeble health was not the only difficulty he would encounter in the accomplishment of his high mission. After the keen agitations of the conclave, these difficulties might come upon him either from the party that opposed him, whose antipathies threatened to survive his election, or from the party that had elected him and that perhaps wished to keep him dependent on it, or from the great powers that had intervened in the affair of the conclave and that might try to exert a control in the government of a pope whose election had so concerned them.

Up to and inclusive of the last balloting, Cardinal Consalvi had remained faithful to the candidate of the crowns. Would the mighty statesman whose lofty personality dominated all the members of the Sacred College and whose relations extended everywhere, succeed in making a personal policy prevail and hinder the work of Pius VII's successor? The loftiness of the great diplomat's character did not permit his person to lend itself to such an idea. But his party, though much reduced, was active and able; and the group of the zelanti, to which Cardinal della Genga belonged before his election and which regarded him as its choice, had already, by the exaggerations and the rancor of some of its members, furnished pretexts for reprisals that might influence the policy and the person of the new pope. Moreover, some were maliciously exploiting a regrettable incident which, in the course of Della Genga's diplomatic mission to Paris in 1814, had placed him in opposition to Cardinal Consalvi.[9]

[9] In 1814, while Consalvi was accredited to all the sovereigns assembled at Paris, a political party not favorable to the Cardinal had obtained in favor of Della Genga, then archbishop of Tyre, a mission to Louis XVIII. Consalvi, hurt at this proceeding, which he considered a mark of lack of confidence in his regard, uttered some sharp words directed against the prelate (Artaud, op. cit., I, 15). Cf. Rinieri, Missione a Parigi di Monsignor Della Genga e del cardinale Consalvi (maggio, 1814). Civiltà cattolica, VI (1902), 272–87.

But the fomenters of trouble who speculated on such antecedents were ill acquainted with the noble Christian spirit animating both the Pope and the Cardinal. Their calculations were not long in being thwarted.

The occasion came soon. On the very day of the Pope's enthronement in St. Peter's, Cardinal Consalvi as deacon must present the chalice and the host to the Pope. The biographer of Leo XII, who was present at the ceremony as a member of the diplomatic corps, describes the scene. At the moment when the Cardinal advanced toward the Pontiff, holding the elevated chalice in his hands, from all parts of the vast edifice, especially from the tribunes where the princes and ambassadors were crowded, curious gazes were fixed on the two persons. What attitude would be taken, even at that solemn moment, by the minister of yesterday and by the Pontiff of today? [10] But all those stares of malignant curiosity were disappointed. Another witness of the scene, Cardinal Wiseman, wrote:

> Calm, dignified, and devout, unconscious of the gazing thousands of eyes around him, advanced the aged minister, now the simple deacon, with steady unfaltering step, and graceful movement. . . . From the hand of his humble minister the Pope received the cup of holiest love; their cheeks touched in the embrace of peace, the servant who partook, as is prescribed in the pontifical Mass, from the same chalice as the master. Who can believe that, in that hour, they were not together in most blessed union? [11]

Further events soon confirmed this impression. The powers of prime minister, confided to Consalvi, ended with the death of Pius VII, from whom he held them. Weighed down by age and infirmities, he asked the new pope's authorization to withdraw to his villa of Porto d'Anzio, there to pass his last days in retirement. But Leo XII was unwilling to deprive himself of the counsels of the great statesman. Before completely entering upon a policy that had multiple difficulties, he wished to receive the advice of the former counselor of Pius VII. Toward the end of December, 1823, after a painful crisis that almost cost him his life, he summoned the Cardinal to him. Consalvi, himself a sick man, had to be carried to the papal apartments. The audience was a touching one, and the conversation at once was of an elevated character. Questioned by the Pope, Consalvi with complete freedom and simplicity communicated his way of viewing the capital questions that concerned the welfare of the Church.

[10] Artaud de Montor, op. cit., I, 85.
[11] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 181.

Two of the most urgent tasks, according to him, were serious attention to the schemes of Carbonarism and the preparation of a great jubilee for 1825. The jubilee would bring to Rome 200,000 witnesses to see a pope free in his capital. According to Consalvi, the Pope ought also to give much thought to the emancipation of the Catholics in England and the protection of the Catholics in the young republics of South America, disregarding, on this last point, the protests of Spain. His opinion was that no reliance should be put on the negotiations undertaken in Russia for the union of the Greeks with the Latins. His reason was that the Russians considered this union too much from the viewpoint of their religious autonomy. On the other hand, the Holy See should draw close to France, there cultivate cordial relations with the King and, to the extent that was possible without offending Louis XVIII, to be closely united to the King's brother, the Count of Artois, who seemed to be better disposed toward the Church.[12]

At the close of this audience the Pope was full of admiration for Consalvi. "What a conversation!" he said to Cardinal Zurla. "Never have I held a more important conference, more substantial, more useful, with anyone. What a man this Consalvi is! How blessed Pius VII was to have him for his minister! Hereafter we will often work together. But he must not die today." [13]

[12] See a detailed account of this audience in Artaud de Montor (op. cit., I, 166–71), who declares that he learned its chief facts from the Duke de Laval, ambassador of France, from the Duchess of Devonshire, and from the Pope himself.

Consalvi did, in fact, give Leo XII a whole program of government, establishing a continuity with that of Pius VII. Shortly afterward the great Cardinal succumbed to the ailment that was afflicting him for some time. His death removed from the party of the crowns the leader that, more or less rightly, it sought to influence. On the other hand it removed the principal influence opposed to the faction of the zelanti, who recruited their numbers especially among the personal enemies of the former minister. The two parties were now face to face, but with modifications. The zelanti faction was thereafter made up especially of men inclined toward a policy of absolutism and intransigeance. The adherence of several French and Austrian statesmen strengthened its power. The opposed faction included particularly partisans of the moderate ideas; the heritage of consideration left by Cardinal Consalvi was its chief strength, but it remained a minority. From that time the zelanti, obstinately regarding the Pope as one of their own, at least as their elected choice, sought to dominate him. These attempts at subjection would be not the least embarrassment of Leo XII's pontificate.

Following the election of Leo XII, a shrewd observer wrote: "By all sorts of measures the parties will strive to raise to important posts the men of their choice. But these men, once they have reached high places, find a horizon which opens up new lights. They see with new eyes and govern with new outlooks. Friends then arrive on the scene and try to stir them. An upright man, in such a situation, may be distressed but he is not embarrassed about the choice he ought to make. Therein is the future of the history of the pope we have today." [14]

[13] Ibid., p. 171.
[14] Ibid., p. 115.

The forecast came true point by point. The first maneuver of the party was to obtain from the new pope, a few hours after his election and under the pretext of succoring his weak health, the formation of a "Congregation of State," composed of cardinals taken from the three orders; in this congregation they carefully contrived to have a large majority of zelanti. A short time later, however, Leo XII, perceiving the snare, declared: 1. that the meetings of the Congregation would not be held at regular intervals; 2. that, in all cases, important matters would be previously examined and reported by the Secretary of State. Then the latter, Cardinal della Somaglia, with a sort of publicity, notified the diplomatic corps that the Congregation was not a Council of State, that it would be merely a consultative body, and that, on occasion, such and such other cardinals would be called in consultation. A diplomatic report (December, 1823), addressed to Viscount Chateaubriand, then French minister of foreign affairs, says: "All these explanations were given in the tone of a man who was as jealous of his ministerial authority as Consalvi could have been." [15] Similar attempts at domination were repeated. At Rome, Cardinal Severoli, urged on by the faction whose candidate he had recently been, abused the confidence which the chivalrous generosity of Leo XII bestowed on him, to impose the zelantist ideas and rancors. The Pope had to put an end to the intrigues of this dangerous collaborator.[16] In France the partisans of the Count of Artois, generally more devoted to the Catholic cause than the people of the King's circle, but counting among them a number of loud extremists, allied themselves with the zelanti of Rome. In concert with the latter they undertook to turn the Pope against the policy of Louis XVIII, whom they pictured as systematically motivated by feelings of unfriendliness toward the Holy See and Catholicism. As we have already seen, the government of the Restoration was not beyond reproach. But the facts subject to criticism were enlarged, falsified, and generalized by partisan spirit.

[15] Ibid., p. 132.
[16] Ibid., p. 336.

All these reports were the more painful to Leo XII since he had been told that, immediately after his elevation to the see of Peter, the King had given assurance of his desire "to advance the good of our holy religion and perpetuate the honor of the Holy See." [17] Did not such acts, after such declarations, constitute a hateful hypocrisy? Unable to restrain his feelings, Leo XII wrote (June 4, 1824) a letter to King Louis XVIII in which he blamed the King for not sufficiently favoring the Catholic clergy, for permitting the continuance of laws offensive to religion in many respects, for restoring the practice known as appeal from an abuse, for putting the Protestant temples on a level with the Catholic churches, and for fearing that the influence of the clergy might become too great, while a throng of writers were attacking religion with impunity. The Pope then suggests that the King should choose for his advisers men approved by their political talent and by their piety.[18] This letter came to the court of Louis XVIII like a thunderbolt.[19] The passage in which the King is asked to choose other advisers was considered an insult, the more gratuitous, they said, since the ministry intended by the Pope's letter was that in charge of De Villèle and since this ministry was conspicuous for its opposition to the liberals. By a letter of July 20, 1824, the King, in a sharp tone, expressed "his surprise at the incorrectness of the reports which His Holiness seemed to have received from France and which, prompted by imprudent and unenlightened zeal, had deceived the religion of the Holy Father about the true state of affairs." [20] A lamentable crisis was on the point of breaking out. Profiting by a conflict between Paris and Rome, perhaps another state would take the place of [17] Letter of Louis XVIII to Leo XII (October 14, 1823). Artaud, op. cit., I, 106.

[18] For the full text of the letter, see ibid., pp. 234 ff.
[19] Ibid., p. 321.
[20] Ibid., p. 306.

France in its relations with the Holy See. The French and the Roman diplomats at the same time understood what each side might lose thereby. The French chargé d'affaires who took the principal part in calming this quarrel[21] has left us a moving account of the steps that ended the misunderstanding and that definitely "ruined the zelanti party in the Pontiff's mind." [22]

But, while freeing himself from one coterie, the Pope meant to show that he would not let himself be circumvented by another. In 1824 he created some foreign cardinals independently of any proposal by the crowns. Thereafter, says his biographer, "everything in his acts proves that, if he could no longer be importuned, he had the courage that commands and that does not accept unreasonable demands." [23]

Religious Indifference

In the course of May, 1824, Leo XII published two especially important pontifical acts. By his encyclical of May 3 he denounced to the bishops of the Christian world the dangers threatening the faith; at the head of these dangers he pointed to the doctrine of religious indifference. By his bull of May 27 he called upon the Catholic world to come to Rome for the celebration of a solemn jubilee.

The encyclical contained the following words: "You are not unaware of the existence of a certain sect, wrongly calling itself philosophical. It has revived almost all the errors of the scattered hosts. This sect, clothing itself with outward flattering appearances of piety and liberality, professes 'tolerantism'

[21] In the absence of the ambassador (Duke de Laval-Montmorency), the chevalier Artaud de Montor, first secretary of the embassy, performed the functions of chargé d'affaires.

[22] Ibid., pp. 305–35. A wise observer, the Russian diplomat Italinski, said: "Rome is invulnerable on dogma; as for matters that are not doctrinal, that are called political, Rome is the only country where basic blunders are never made." Ibid., p. 327; cf. p. 345.

[23] Ibid., p. 345.

—thus it is called—or indifferentism . . . teaching that God has given full liberty to every man." [24]

The head of the Church could not draw to the attention of the universal episcopate a more serious doctrinal question. Religious indifference, under its most variegated forms and under the names of tolerantism, liberalism, modernism, or the "party of the politicians," would be the great error of the nineteenth century. In 1809 Viscount de Bonald, in his Réflexions sur la tolérance des opinions, pointed to those men who, "intolerant on every other subject, advocated an absolute tolerance on religious opinions or beliefs." [25] Father Boyer, in the tract on religion which he taught at St. Sulpice seminary 1809–10; [26] Father Frayssinous in conferences to large groups of the faithful; [27] Father Teysseyre in his catechetical instructions: [28] all had insisted on the danger of religious indifference. Later, Father Lamennais, taking his inspiration from all those works,[29] in a stirring book gave a new echo to these cries of alarm. The error was the more to be feared inasmuch as it was concealed under so many forms. The partisans of political freedom connected it with their claims. But was it not found more subtle and obscure in the doctrine of the two most conspicuous leaders of the conservative reaction? Talleyrand, taking up the defense of the great religious and social principles at the Congress of Vienna, avowed that he was appealing to them merely for something useful.[30] Metternich, another defender of legitimacy and right, gave clearly to be understood that, for him, "security in present possession constituted all right." Both of them, by their high disdain for every doctrinal and moral [24] Ami de la religion, July 8, 1824, p. 245.

[25] L. de Bonald, Mélanges littéraires, politiques, et philosophiques, p. 129.

[26] Archives de Saint Sulpice. Christian Maréchal, in his La jeunesse de La Mennais (pp. 581 ff.), analyzes Father Boyer's work.

[27] Maréchal, op. cit., pp. 584–91.

[28] Paguelle de Follenay, Monsieur Teysseyre, pp. 380–410.

[29] Maréchal, op. cit., p. 598.

[30] Correspondance du prince de Talleyrand et de Louis XVIII, Preface, p. 6.

truth in their political conduct, were professing, each in his own way, the principle of religious indifference even while seeming to condemn it by their measures of stern repression.[31]

Indifferentism and liberalism were condemned by the encyclical of May 3, 1824. This prelude to the celebrated encyclicals Mirari vos and Quanta cura of 1832 and 1864, which would move public opinion so deeply, did not stir any notable opposition. The same was not true of the peaceful project calling to Rome the faithful of the whole world to celebrate the jubilee feasts. A tradition 300 years old fixed the recurrence of the jubilee for every twenty-five years. The Pontiff's desire was the more natural since Pius VII, because of disturbances that still continued in 1800, judged he should not celebrate a jubilee at that date. But the mere rumor that the Pope was preparing a bull on the subject started public opinion in motion. Without counting the sectaries, who spread the old Protestant calumny which presented the jubilee as a trafficking in spiritual goods in exchange for pecuniary profits, the non-Catholic powers of Germany did not conceal their hostility. Austria, still under the influence of Josephism, showed herself cool, and the government of Naples not merely objected all sorts of difficulties, but took steps to get the representatives of the powers to present an active opposition.[32]

Moreover, the Council of the papal government entered into the Pope's plan with reserve and apprehension. "The Secretary of State feared the introduction into the provinces and into [31] Talleyrand's religious and moral skepticism is well known. Metternich was not without moral qualities in private life, and he made profession of Catholic faith. But, as acknowledged by an author sympathetic to his person and his work, "the minister's imperturbable features seemed to cover a heart that did not beat. He took account of this impression. His explanation of it recurs often in his letters. He distinguishes two selves in him, between which the affairs of state interpose an impassable barrier. He declared: 'My life is composed of two parts which my character does not allow me to conduct parallel with each other, and which never fuse.'" C. de Lacombe, "Le Prince de Metternich," in the Correspondant, December 10, 1882, p. 912.

[32] Artaud, op. cit., I, 337–66.

Rome of political conspirators and members of secret societies: these, under the cloak of the pilgrim's scalloped cape, might meet in safety to plot destruction. The Treasurer was terrified at the inroad which extra expenses would make into his budget, and protested against financial embarrassments that he foresaw would ensue." [33] But none of these objections deterred the Pope from his resolve. "Say what you like," he repeated; "the jubilee will take place." [34] For the publication of his bull he chose the feast of the Ascension. In the words of Cardinal Wiseman:

> On Ascension Day he issued the bull of preparation, clear, bold, and cheering, as a silver clarion's note. Seldom has a document proceeded even from the Holy See more noble and stately, more tender and paternal. . . . The Pope first addressed every class of men who recognize his spiritual sovereignty, entreating kings to put no hindrance in the way of the faithful pilgrims, but to protect and favor them, and the people ready to accept his fatherly invitation and hasten in crowds to the banquet of grace spread for them. . . . He turns to those who are not of his fold, those even who had persecuted and offended the Holy See, and in words of burning charity and affectionate forgiveness he invites them to approach him and accept him as their father too.[35]

The jubilee took place amid the most touching and splendid ceremonies.[36] The sick pope, whom the factions had at first fancied they would subject to their influence, not only disappointed their expectations; he now triumphed over an opposition which enlisted the mightiest statesmen and even some of his own ministers. Says Cretineau-Joly: "Leo XII did not doubt the faith of the peoples; and the peoples took account of that fatherly confidence." [37]

[33] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 213.
[34] "Si dirà quel che si dirà; si ha da far il Giubbileo." Artaud, op. cit., I, 369.
[35] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 214.
[36] For the account of these festivities, see Wiseman, op. cit., pp. 211 ff.
[37] L'église romaine en face de la Révolution, II, 74.

CHAPTER IV

The Church in France

THESE first difficulties were of a general interest. Apart from them, Leo XII, in his relations with the different countries, from the outset of his pontificate found himself in the presence of numerous delicate questions calling for solution.

The misunderstanding between the Pope and the King of France in June and July, 1824, ended happily. It made both of them realize the value of their alliance. Both had occasion to ponder these words written by Cardinal Bernis on August 17, 1774: "I have made a deep study of France, considering it as a whole and in detail. For the welfare of the state and also that of religion, I have thought that the Most Christian King should maintain a good understanding with the head of the Church." On the occasion (August 25, 1824) of the feast of St. Louis, king of France, Leo XII, though suffering severely at the time, wished, as a sign of complete reconciliation, to go in person and pray before the altar of the holy king, in the church of St. Louis of the French, where he was received with magnificence. The diplomat on whom was incumbent as French chargé d'affaires to pay respects to the Pontiff, relates: "The Pope showed himself well satisfied with all the pains that were taken to receive him; by his mouth the papal government seemed to say, like the character in Tacitus: 'Si cunctatione deliqui, virtute corrigam.' "[1]

From that moment inevitable contested questions arose. But these differences between the court of Paris and the Roman curia were approached and solved with a mutual desire of good understanding. The best good will on both sides, however, could not suppress three irritating questions that were ever ready to stir conflicts: that of Gallicanism, perpetually alive in the heart of the old parliamentarians and of some members of the clergy; that of liberalism, which many ardent youth acclaimed enthusiastically; and lastly the question of the Jesuits, whose return and reorganization in France were followed with as much eagerness by devoted friends as they were looked upon with distrust by impassioned adversaries.

[1] Artaud de Montor, Histoire de Léon XII, I, 335; Tacitus, Annals, XV, 2.

Gallicanism

The French Revolution had renounced the principle of "Catholicism the religion of the state." Moreover, the Charter of 1814 had not restored it. Thus the question of the old Gallican liberties, such as Pierre Pithou had codified them and as the parliaments had professed them, seemed now to be without any object. The secularized state had no occasion to resort to such arms in its defense. Its so-called exemptions became useless.[2] Parliamentary Gallicanism, however, had not disappeared. Among the politicians who surrounded the restored throne of the Bourbons, some had not yet given up the hope of seeing a rebirth of the absolutist traditions of the Ancient Regime; others expected to disarm the liberal opposition by joining in its grievances with regard to the Holy See.

Ecclesiastical Gallicanism was not so much set on opposing the state to the Church as it was on opposing the episcopate to the papacy. The Modern Regime did not touch this Gallicanism directly. Especially as a protest against the so-called encroachments of Rome upon the rights of French bishops, the "Little Church" had been formed. Without going to the point of schism, certain Gallicans became earnest apologists of the four articles of 1682. They found fault with the interventions of the Holy See in so-called national Churches, and sharply attacked the Jesuits.[3] Among those who had valiantly resisted the revolutionary persecution and who were most commendable by their private lives, were some who remained attached to certain maxims and to certain usages current in the Church of France as to an inheritance which they judged worthy of respect. Father Frayssinous, who belonged to this last group, wrote: "I will say without evasion that we should not seek our Gallican liberties either in the pamphlets of pleaders, more lawyers than theologians, or in the jurisprudence which formerly tended to invade everything and which merely put the ecclesiastical ministry in chains." [4] And he quoted the following words of Bossuet: "In my sermon on the unity of the Church I was obliged to speak about the liberties of the Gallican Church. There I proposed two things: one was to accomplish it without any lessening of the real greatness of the Holy See; the other was to explain it in the way our bishops understand it." [5] Almost the same ideas were held by Father De la Luzerne and Father de Bausset and the outstanding ecclesiastical journal of the time, the Ami de la religion et du roi, directed by Michel Picot.

[2] Cf. Emile Olivier, L'église et l'état au concile du Vatican, I, 281.

Joseph de Maistre's Du pape had indeed delivered a hard blow to Gallicanism, even a moderate form of it. And Father Lamennais, giving an account of that work in 1820, declared: "Let anyone judge of the declaration of 1682 by its fruits. What did it produce? What evil? Jansenists, constitutionals, all the sectarians that have appeared in these latter days, have availed themselves of it to authorize their rebellion. It was branded from its birth with the double character of coercion and servility. What Catholic instructed by experience would venture to defend it today?" [6] Yet the clergy, without great protest, submitted to certain measures because they emanated from a power favorable to the Church. These measures were dictated by the Gallican spirit, such as the prohibition for the episcopate to correspond directly with Rome, the order given the bishops to submit their pastorals to ministerial censorship, the obligation imposed on seminary professors to teach the four articles of the declaration of 1682.

[3] Father Tabaraud, a priest of the Oratory, who was born at Limoge in 1774 and died in that city in 1832, had published a Histoire critique de l'assemblé du clergé de France en 1682, some booklets on L'appel comme d'abus and on L'inamovabilité des pasteurs du second ordre, and some works especially directed against the Jesuits: Essai sur l'état des jésuites en France, Du pape et des jésuites.

[4] Frayssinous, Les vrais principes de l'Eglise gallicane, in Œuvres de Frayssinous; Migne, Orateurs sacrés, 2nd ser., X, 1026.

[5] Migne, op. cit., col. 1027.

Yet whenever the measure wounded the rights of the religious conscience too violently, protests were raised. In 1819 the French government removed a mayor for not obliging some priest to give burial to a suicide. Wrote Lamennais:

> No one would wish—and rightly so—to oblige the Jews or the Protestants to bury a Catholic as a member of their communion. Yet do some people think that Catholics may justly be forced to adopt, in the name of their religion, a man who dies by violating one of its first precepts? . . . Have Catholics not a conscience? They say to us: Be tolerant. This word at one time meant: Let yourselves be slaughtered; at another time: Let yourselves be led. . . . The minister deigns to give some lessons of theology. He cites the Rituals. But who will interpret them? Is this interpreter to be the government minister, who has no authority in the Church, or those who are charged by the Church herself with the office of executing her laws? [7]

Anne Cardinal de Clermont-Tonnerre, archbishop of Toulouse, published a pastoral letter in 1823. In this pastoral, which he wrote from Rome, where he had taken part in the conclave, he called for civil modifications with a view to harmonizing the laws of the state with those of the Church. This letter, denounced to the Council of State as being an attack on the Gallican liberties, was suppressed by a royal ordinance under the pretext of "abuse." In a calm and firm tone the editor of the [6] F. de Lamennais, Nouveaux mélanges, p. 139.

[7] Lamennais, Réflexions et mélanges, p. 322.

Ami de la religion protested, saying: "What most afflicts us in these circumstances, besides the wrong it does to the episcopal character and the effect it may produce in the minds of the people, is to foresee that the same thing will happen as formerly occurred from the encroachments of the parliaments. A first step led to another. Examples of these measures are but too numerous." [8] In the course of 1824, when the minister required the seminary professors to follow the declaration of 1682, the Archbishop of Toulouse again intervened. In a letter addressed to several bishops who had consulted him in the matter, he declared that the minister's request should be regarded as null. Later, under Charles X, we shall see him defend the rights of the Church even more vigorously against the abusive claims of the civil powers.

Catholic Liberalism

Among the warmest adversaries of Gallicanism was Father Félicité de Lamennais. The brilliant success of his Essay on Indifference, the renown of his recent polemics, his exceptional gifts of intellect, warmth, initiative, and animation, and certain aspects of his character, at once winning and imposing, soon made of him, for those who joined his cause, the most beloved of friends and the most commanding of masters. Father Lamennais had become the center of a group of young men in which the seed of a new party could easily be discerned. Those who thus took their stand about the master were Gerbet, Gousset, Rohrbacher, and Lacordaire. They called themselves ultramontanes and on religious questions readily adopted the ideas of Joseph de Maistre. But an undisguised sympathy for the men and things of their time, a deep attachment to the popular classes, and a hearty concern for all political and social progress brought them close to the party that had just been organized in France under the name of liberal party.

[8] Ami de la religion et du roi, January 31, 1824, p. 375.

The Mémorial catholique, which they founded in 1823 and which was their organ until 1830, had, thanks to Lamennais, who was its real inspiration, a considerable part in the development that was plainly taking place in the very bosom of Catholicism during the last years of the Restoration. It was a sort of precursor of the Avenir, for it attempted, though timidly, to separate the religious question from the political one and to contrive in the pure realm of ideas a reconciliation between the Church and modern society. With him apologetics recovered a youthful spirit and lost something of its former rigidity; the ecclesiastical sciences broadened and recovered their standing of authority; the spirit of the clergy changed and began to be open to this simple but quite new idea, that, "to influence the world, we must understand it." [9]

In the campaigns carried on in the Mémorial catholique, Lamennais' liberalism was more a spirit than a doctrine. This would not be formulated until 1829, in the writing published by the celebrated polemist under the title of Des progrès de la Révolution et de la guerre contre l'église. In that work Lamennais attacked Gallicanism as a doctrine of servitude, freeing kings from every rule of justice and leading men to idolatry. He held that peoples can, in certain cases, forcibly resist arbitrary governments, as the Netherlands did against Joseph II, the Vendeans and the Bretons against the Revolution, the members of the League against Henry IV. He taught that the Christian restoration of society can be accomplished only by the triumph of the Church and that this triumph should be won only by the exercise of freedom.

This evolution of Lamennais' ultramontanism or, more exactly, of his anti-Gallicanism, to liberalism took place under a twofold influence. First the contact with the liberal party strictly so called, such as it then appeared in the writings of Benjamin Constant and Corcelles, introduced in the party of the young Catholics some formulas of the liberals. These formulas referred to the always beneficent effectiveness of liberty and to the practical indifference of the state toward all religions and to the separation of the state from all the Churches. A second influence, no less harmful, was exercised over the young group of the Mémorial by the very fact of the impassioned and excessive temperament of its leader.[10] The romantic Breton who bore within him, along with the physical defect of an abnormal constitution going back to his infancy,[11] the atavism of certain headstrong and contentious ancestors and of some hardy sailors from whom he inherited a taste for adventure and danger,[12] was unable to observe any restraint at the least ruffling of his restless sensitiveness.

[9] Mémorial catholique, Introduction; Boutard, Lamennais, I, 369.

He declared that the government was hypocritical in its words, atheistic in its acts. He called Lainé and Corbière the continuators of Henry VIII, and Frayssinous a schismatical bishop and usurper of the rights of Leo XII. "Who, then," he exclaims in one of his pamphlets, "empowered Frayssinous to capitulate to the kings of earth in the name of the spouse of Jesus Christ?" He considered the Society of Jesus ill-suited for the needs of men's minds, and he judged that the theology taught in the seminaries was nothing more than a narrow and degenerate scholasticism.[13]

Such language and thought were rash. They soon awakened

[10] In a penetrating article of the Annales de philosophie chrétienne (1912, p. 617), Maurice Blondel characterizes Lamennais as "that perpetual extremist who puts logic in the service of his passion, or rather who takes his passion for logic itself."

[11] "Born prematurely, with a notable depression of the epigastrium, owing to this infirmity he was subject to painful spasms from which he suffered all his life and which more than once put his life in danger." Boutard, Lamennais, I, 6. Cf. Peigné, Lamennais, sa vie intime à la Chênaie, pp. 51–56.

[12] C. Maréchal, La jeunesse de La Mennais, p. 3. Cf. Maréchal, La famille de La Mennais sous l'Ancien Régime et la Révolution.

[13] Lamennais was even more violent in private than in his pamphlets. Speaking of the Chamber elected in 1824, the most royalist and most religious of the Restoration, he said: "Never has anyone seen a degradation so ludicrous and a corruption so stupid." Then he concluded: "The three powers of the state, as they are called, seem to be a direct emanation of La Force, of Saint-Pelagius, and of Charenton." In his eyes, Father Clausel de Montals was only "the Marat of Gallicanism." Other quotations may be found in Thureau-Dangin, Royalistes et républicans, pp. 260–63.

uneasiness in some of the clergy and vigorous protests from others. In 1829, after Des progrès de la Révolution et de la guerre contre l'église made its appearance, the Ami de la religion interpreted these feelings and pointed out: 1. the strange relationship of certain doctrines of the author with the most dubious ideas of the liberal party; 2. the unjust violence of his attacks on the Catholics. He was charged with adopting the very formulas of the liberals on freedom of the press and on political freedom; he was criticized for having written that liberalism was nothing but "the feeling, wherever the religion of Christ prevails, which rouses a part of the people in the name of liberty," and for having added that "the party opposed to the interests of the throne had an immense advantage of good sense." He was reminded that the Church, far from admitting these principles in an absolute way, as he seemed to present them, had established a Congregation of the Index to condemn the abuses of the press. Moreover, the Church had also recommended to the people, apart from the most exceptional circumstances, respectful obedience with regard to the established authorities. Lastly, indignation was expressed at Lamennais' contemptuous treatment of the Jesuit order, of whom he had but lately written that "its whole existence was only a great devotion to humanity and to religion." [14] And he was blamed for calumniating that seminary teaching "which could have been saved from so many vagaries if it had better taken lessons from him." [15]

The Jesuits

Gallicanism had other foes, who could not be suspected of sympathy toward liberalism: the Jesuits. Since the promulgation of the bull Sollicitudo (1814), which solemnly re-established the Society of Jesus in the universal Church, Jesuit houses increased in France, and their apostolate there was fruitful.[16] By means of the Congregation they had organized several works of piety and charity in the upper ranks of society; in their twelve colleges they were educating a large number of sons of the nobility and of the middle class; by their missions they reached the popular class. Gallicans and liberals joined forces to destroy them. Some royalists of the extreme right and some revolutionaries of the extreme left were in agreement to carry on a campaign against them.

[14] Lamennais, Mélanges, pp. 18, 62 f.
[15] Ami de la religion, 1820, pp. 33–37, 238–40.

The spokesman of these foes was the Count de Montlosier, then seventy years old. Sprung from an old Auvergne family, he had kept in his manners and spirit the strong, violent, and abrupt ferocity of that mountain district where he was born.[17] Of his title of nobility, which had been recently contested, but which Louis XVIII confirmed, he retained scarcely more than an insolent arrogance. A believer in absolute royal power, he jealously nourished in his heart the most stubborn prejudices of the old legists against the Roman Church. This practicing Christian did not hesitate to declare his faith publicly; he did so in a stiff and lofty tone that recalled the austere haughtiness of the Jansenists. However, he was not wanting in brilliant qualities. His notions were confused and muddled, but his ideas were strong and his views shrewd.[18] In the Chamber of Deputies the revolutionaries of the extreme left were sometimes close to this extremist. They agreed on several points, such as accord of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy with Pithou's Gallican liberties, and the absolutism of the Convention with that of the evil days of the Ancient Regime.

In August, 1825, Count de Montlosier published in the Drapeau blanc two resounding letters against the Jesuits. Less than a year later he brought out a work entitled Mémoire à consulter sur un système religieux et politique tendant à renverser la religion, la société et le trône.[19] The book was written in a heavy style and was awkwardly constructed, abounding with errors and contradictions. But it was vehement, aggressive, full of mysterious revelations, violent, strong personal references, disconcerting declarations, suggestive allusions. Therein we see the Society of Jesus, thanks to "a system of application the most perfected since Pythagoras, . . . carrying overseas the yoke of its domination, sometimes bloody, sometimes putting forth flowers." [20]

[16] Burnichon, La Compagnie de Jésus en France, I, 59–79.

[17] Thureau-Dangin, Le parti libéral sous la Restauration, p. 386. Cf. Chateaubriand, Mémoires d'outre-tombe, II, 156–58.

[18] Burnichon, op. cit., I, 347–87.

There we read certain statements without the least proof in support of the assertions. Such were the declarations that Louis XIV's affiliation with the celebrated Society was "almost certain"; that "St. Sulpice, as everyone knows, was a creation and an affiliate of the Jesuits"; that "through an association of St. Joseph all the workmen were regimented"; that each section had a sort of centurion, that "the commander-in-chief was Father Loenen, a secret Jesuit"; that the wine merchants and the household servants were similarly organized; that the Chamber of Deputies counted at least 105 members of the Congregation,[21] bound by oath to the terrible Society; that formerly even a royal minister had been found at his death, wearing certain "insignia consecrated by the affiliation." [22]

After revealing these so-called facts, the author of the Mémoire pretended to make known precisely the hidden aim of all these undertakings. These he defined as follows: "To make use of religion as a political instrument; to have God obeyed by order of the King, and by authority of the King to [19] Burnichon, op. cit., I, 347–87.

[20] Mémoire, pp. 10–21. For the following details, see ibid., pp. 23–37.

[21] The Chamber counted exactly five members of the Congregation. Grandmaison, La Congrégation, p. 312.

[22] Mémoire, p. 27.

extend the authority of the priests." But the kings had to be the victims of such combinations because, says Montlosier, in a tragic tone, "the frail and merely life-long existence of princes is well known. . . . How are we to think that they can contend with a power which neither is born nor dies, . . . that has its militia, a general, with which it decides when and how it should be sovereign?"

The Mémoire appeared soon after the two sensational lawsuits brought against the Constitutionel and the Courier français. These two papers heaped praise on the Mémoire. The Journal des Débats called Montlosier "the torch of France." His person and his role were exalted. The writers feigned to forget the changes of allegiance which he manifested under the Empire. They affected to see in him only the noble émigré of Coblenz and London, the friend of Chateaubriand, the dauntless Catholic who had shut the mouth of unbelievers by his eloquent tirade about the bishops' cross of wood; and they praised this royalist, this believer, for having been independent and courageous enough to denounce the danger that threatened both the Church and society. The Ami de la religion and the Mémorial catholique and the Quotidienne easily pointed out the calumnies of the pamphlet. Viscount Bonald refuted it in a special booklet.[23] But Montlosier redoubled his audacity. Feeling himself backed by the Gallicans of royalism, by the Jansenists whom Tabaraud and Lanjuinais led to the fray, and by the liberals whose bitterness was stirred by the Constitutionel and the Débats, he addressed to the royal court a formal denunciation of the Society of Jesus. Forty lawyers of the Paris bar subscribed to his conclusions, which called for the application to the Jesuits of all the means of repression by the old and modern laws. The court declared itself incompetent in the matter. Montlosier then turned to the House of Peers and obtained from it a decision that his petition would be transmitted to the [23] Réflexions sur le Mémoire à consulter.

King. For the moment Charles X did not follow it up, but the question of the Jesuits was henceforth placed before public opinion, which would be stirred by it until the time when the King, yielding to the combined pressure of Gallicanism, Jansenism, and liberalism, would accord to these factions the expulsion of the celebrated Society.

King Charles X

King Charles X, who in 1824 succeeded his brother Louis XVIII, seemed to offer the cause of the Church some serious guaranties. Following a riotous youth, for many years past he had returned to the practice of religion. After his coming to the throne one of his first cares was to be crowned at Reims, with all the traditional rites of consecration, to draw down the blessings of God on his reign. Pope Leo XII expressed his joy on this occasion.[24] But, weak in character, undecided, changeable, and easily influenced, Charles X was incapable of presiding over the councils with his predecessor's decision and authority. He was even less able to rule over the factions. Louis XVIII's policy had been to elude the domination by exclusive parties and he repelled in turn the exaggerated liberals and the ultra-monarchists.

But Charles X swung from one extreme to the other. From the very outset of his reign the sudden re-establishment of the titles and functions of the old court served as a pretext to regard him as the restorer of the Ancient Regime. The retirement of 250 generals of the Empire aroused keen discontent in that part of the nation which had special devotion to the imperial glories. A law granting an indemnity of a billion francs to the émigrés had been opposed by a part of the right, which saw therein the security guaranteed to the acquirers of the national goods, and by the extreme left, the confiscation of the property of the émigrés as a penalty justified by their voluntary exile.

[24] Artaud, op. cit., II, 385.

A second law, most untimely, punished with the penalty of parricides the profanation of the consecrated hosts. It likewise inflicted the death penalty on every theft committed in a church with breaking and entering or during the night. This law had been attacked in the House of Peers by Chateaubriand and in the Chamber of Deputies by Royer-Collard and in the press by Lamennais. However, this law, passed despite these lively oppositions, was never to be carried out. But the agitation stirred up by these measures did not subside. While the imperialists, offended by the first acts of the King, made common cause with the liberals, a party of dissatisfied royalists, led by Chateaubriand and called "the party of the defection," carried on a relentless strife against the government.

Voltaire's works and the Encyclopedia were published in popular editions. Tartuffe was played in the cities where the missions were being presented. The secret societies increased their measures. The specters of the Ancient Regime, of domination by the "priests' party," of the Congregation, and of the White Terror were spread before the eyes of the people. Vainly the King tried (November 5, 1827) to crush the opposition by creating seventy-six new peers and by dissolving the Chamber. These measures exasperated the malcontents. The extreme right and "the party of the defection" joined hands with the left. The society known as "Help yourselves, and heaven will help you," which had some connections with the Carbonari and Freemasonry, directed the new elections, which gave the opposition an overwhelming majority. The King, driven to bay, had to choose a liberal ministry and to make concessions. But the left showed itself more and more threatening. Martignac, the new head of the ministry, advised the King, as a means of avoiding the peril that menaced his throne, to sacrifice the Jesuits.

Religious Orders

On June 16 King Charles X consented to sign two famous ordinances.[25] The first concerned the establishments known as secondary ecclesiastical schools directed by persons belonging to non-authorized religious congregations, then existing at Aix, Billom, Bordeaux, Dôle, Forcalquier, Montmorillon, Saint-Acheul, and Sainte-Anne d'Auray. These institutions were ordered to be subject, by October 1, to the direction of the University. Thereafter no one might direct a house of education or teach there without having affirmed in writing that he did not belong to any religious congregation not legally established in France. The second ordinance subjected to the government's authorization the establishment of secondary ecclesiastical schools or minor seminaries. It created in their favor burses of 500 francs each; but it fixed at 20,000 the total number of the pupils; it forbade the admission of externs and the wearing of lay dress after two years of classes.

In a memorial sent to the King by Archbishop Quélen of Paris, seventy-three bishops protested.[26] At the same time the episcopate consulted the Holy See. But the letters addressed to [25] See Henrion, La vie de Mgr Frayssinous, for most interesting details taken from Bishop Frayssinous' notes on the circumstances that preceded and determined the celebrated ordinances. On the same question see also Artaud de Montor, op. cit., pp. 372–89; Ami de la religion, February 27, 1844. The fullest details on this affair will be found in Antonin Lirac (pen name of Father Clair, S.J.), Les jésuites et la liberté religieuse sous la Restauration.

[26] Henrion, Vie de Mgr Quélen, p. 192. Only one bishop refused to sign the Memorial; this was Bishop Baillon of Dijon. His reason was, he said, that the royal ordinances did not touch on dogma or Church discipline. On the contrary, the resistance of Archbishop de Clermont-Tonnere of Toulouse was most energetic. When the government insisted that he carry out the ordinances, he replied: "The motto of my family is this: Etiamsi omnes, ego non. This is likewise the motto of my conscience."

Rome on this occasion were intercepted by the French government, which on its part sent to the Roman court a jurist instructed to explain to Leo XII "the true state of affairs." The Supreme Pontiff had Cardinal Bernetti write a note which the French ministers published only in part, giving the impression that the Pope approved of their conduct.[27]

The Catholic and royalist historian of the Restoration, Alfred Nettement, speaking of the ordinance of 1829, says:

> From the viewpoint of religious ideas we find three untoward consequences in the ordinances of June 16: they deprived the religious teaching of a source of support; they excluded the bishops from educational matters by the provisions against them; they gave acceptance, in the mind of the common people, of the calumnies piled up against a respectable religious order by proclaiming the need of expelling it. From the political point of view the disadvantages were equally serious: the government informed all concerned with the means of obtaining concessions from it; and the opposition, which it wished to satisfy, felt encouraged to demand more.[28]

[27] See A. Lirac, op. cit., II, 388 ff. The full text of Cardinal Bernetti's note was not known until 1846. Cf. Burnichon, op. cit., I, 288–470.

[28] Nettement, Histoire de la Restauration, VIII, 128.

CHAPTER V

The Church in Austria, Germany, and England

Austria

THE statesman who then presided over the destinies of Austria took quite a different attitude. Charles X liked the Jesuits, and he proscribed them; Metternich detested the Jesuit spirit, and he favored the Society of Jesus.

In 1825 some Jesuits, driven out of Russia and settled in Galicia, petitioned the Emperor of Austria for official recognition of their establishment. Prince Metternich on this occasion (October 18, 1825) wrote a long memorial in which, after carefully distinguishing between the Jesuit constitution and Jesuitism, he added: "This difference is of major importance, . . . for I am much inclined to regard the institution as a salutary arm against the invasions of the spirit of error; but no less absolutely do I condemn Jesuitism under all its forms as likewise in all its tendencies." [1] These lines reveal the general policy followed by the celebrated diplomat, who seemed to hold the same views about the Catholic Church. He valued it highly and supported its organization mightily to the extent that it appeared to him useful in maintaining order and discipline; he found fault with its spirit to the extent that this spirit seemed to him to furnish elements of political disorder as he understood this term. When asking his sovereign to authorize the establishment of the Society of Jesus in Galicia, the minister advised him to admit it only by way of trial. He said: "In the event that the Jesuits should not follow a 'correct line,' we might be led to adopt in their regard certain measures that would be inopportune today." [2]

[1] Metternich, Mémoires, IV, 237.

On the lips of Metternich "the correct line" was simple. It was to sustain the institutions of the past or at least as he judged suitable for maintaining the European order. Moreover, such a project was maintained by him with prodigious pride. He considered himself infallible. "Error," he said to Guizot, "has never entered my mind." To this the French minister replied: "I have been more blessed than you, Prince; more than once I have discovered that I was mistaken." [3] His aim was to form a society of states capable of fighting victoriously against the revolutionary revival of nationalities.[4] The center of this society was to be the Germanic Confederation, receiving its orders from Austria. He had formulated this dream, that a word pronounced at Vienna should be received throughout Germany as an "inviolable law." For many years this dream was almost realized so far as concerned the diplomatic relations of the nations and their political organization.

He was less fortunate in what concerned the internal government of his own country and the repression he wished to exercise on the national movements. He himself said: "I have often governed Europe; I have rarely governed Austria." The very severity of his repressive measures was what exasperated and strengthened the national movement in Italy. In the heart of Germany itself spirits most devoted to the cultivation of Germanic supremacy, such as Goerres and Schlegel, instead of following Metternich's absolutist movement in the organization of the states and his Josephist tendencies in the relations of the civil power with the Church, on the contrary became zealous apostles of liberal ideas in politics and of absolute independence of the Church with regard to the state.

[2] Ibid., IV, 242.

[3] Guizot, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps, IV, 20. Metternich in his autobiography, inserted in Volume I of his Mémoires, professed to be the lieutenant of God. He agreed that Richelieu and Mazarin were persons of merit, but he heaped sarcasm on his contemporaries: "the little Nesselrode," Thiers "a simpleton," and Berryer "a dolt."

[4] Talleyrand, whose practical skepticism was even more blameworthy than Metternich's, found himself in conflict with the latter at the Congress of Vienna. He strove to put a rein on the pretentions of the Austrian minister, who wished to upset the nations, particularly France, in the name of the principle of order. Talleyrand defended the independence of the threatened nationalities by appealing to the principles of legitimacy and of public right. The tactics were clever. They disconcerted the grave assembly and let loose a tumult. The Prussian minister exclaimed: "Why appeal to these principles? That goes without saying." To this Talleyrand replied: "If that goes without saying, it goes still better by saying it." "What has the public right to do here?" murmured another diplomat. "It has this much to do, that you are here," replied the French minister with his dominating coolness.

The Metternich system considered almost exclusively, in the Church as well as in the state, the principles of authority and hierarchy. But a young priest of Tübingen University, Johann Adam Moehler, published (1825) Die Einheit in der Kirche, a book full of freshness and life. In it he showed, as a principle of unity in Christian society and as a principle of faith in a believing soul, not timorous obedience, which depresses, but love, which elevates and unites.[5] By a more striking contrast, three years later in Vienna itself, that capital where religion, often considered an aspect of politeness or a machinery of bureaucracy, seemed "to lack fresh air," [6] another Catholic priest, Anton Gunther, was trying "to regenerate theology with a real science and a free and ingenious mysticism." [7]

But this time the freedom and ingenuity exceeded the limits of orthodoxy. Strangely, "Gunther, who was one of the wheels of that organization of intellectual repression which was heavy on the religious development of Austria, held the office of censor. . . . This policeman of thought ended by being himself an offender." [8] In his Vorschule zur speculativem Theologie (1828) and in several later publications, he held that "the ra-

[5] This book exercised a strong influence on the young German Catholics of the time. See Goyau, "Moehler" in La pensée chrétienne, 1905, and L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, II, 24–35.

[6] Goyau, op. cit., II, 43.

[7] Sainte-René-Raillandier, Revue des Deux Mondes, October 1, 1843, p. 96.

[8] Goyau, op. cit., II, 44.

tional soul is altogether distinct from the principle of bodily life and of sense knowledge"; he destroyed every bond between the formulas of Catholic faith and the Aristotelianism of the Middle Ages; he enclosed dogma in a new philosophical system that he created; he pretended to explain the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation as subjective awareness of the Divinity; he conceived the mystery of the Redemption as a necessary consequence of the creation. This teaching of his aroused an enthusiasm to which Goerres and Moehler were drawn for a while. But the temerarious doctrines brought upon him the severe condemnation of the Church.[9]

Germany

The center of the Catholic movement in Germany was not, however, at Vienna. It was at Munich. Of all the German states, Bavaria was the one that had been least influenced by the Metternich system and that of the Holy Alliance.[10] It was also the state that showed itself the most devoted to the Church. As Brentano wrote: "In Germany, Bavaria is the part that went furthest in the revolutionary corruption and, like France, it was the first to react." [11] This reaction was particularly notable beginning in 1825, the year when King Louis I came to the throne. After the coronation of the young prince, Goerres, who liked to assume the ways of a prophet, addressed him with the following words, placed on the lips of the revived Prince Maximilian: "What you intend to build, do not construct on the shifting sand of human opinions, but make it rest on God, the citadel of all that is solid. Be a Christian prince. I mean, be a pillar of the faith and a protector of the freedom of the spirit." [12]

King Louis of Bavaria would not continue to be the sure and

[9] Ibid., II, 43–53.
[10] Ibid., II, 63.
[11] Goerres, Gesammelte Briefe, III, 293.
[12] This writing will be found in Goerres, Politische Schriften, V, 235–65.

solid pillar greeted by Joseph Goerres. But at the outset of his reign his sincere and zealous faith along with his boundless devotion to Christian art and letters gave promise of the finest hopes. The ardent and romantic element of his rich nature was such as to stir the warmest enthusiasm about him. He dreamed of "a realm of beauty extending over the whole of Germany," and over it would preside his friends, the "Nazarene" [13] artists as the statesmen.[14] In more positive matters he settled the many questions in Bavaria by the promulgation of the concordat of 1817,[15] declaring that he would loyally abide by all the clauses according to the spirit of the Church. Faithful to the lessons of his venerated teacher, Father Sailer, he favored the religious life and seconded the efforts of the Benedictines and Redemptorists in the evangelization of Bavaria.

In short, this was a brilliant period for Catholicism. At that time in Bavaria, Joseph Goerres, drawn to Munich by King Louis, stirred a public of choice souls by his teaching on mysticism. Ignaz Döllinger there published his first scholarly works on the Church of the first centuries, Clement Brentano made well known the revelations of Catherine Emmerich and commented on them, and Schelling, drawn into the movement and combating the blasphemies of Hegel, declared that the historic Christ, as he thought, could not be preserved except by obedience to the authority of the pope.

Undoubtedly the works of each of these writers have shortcomings. They often exhibit a lack of moderation, a failure to grasp the nuances, a defect that seems to be a characteristic fault of the German race, the price of its undeniable fine qualities.[16] In Goerres' four volumes of Christliche Mystik, science

[13] Cf. Mourret, op. cit., VII, 498.

[14] Cf. Taillandier, La Revolution en Allemagne, I, 445 ff.

[15] Cf. Mourret, op. cit., VII, 472 f.

[16] Said Brentano: "I was never able to pour water into a glass without making it overflow; I have no grasp of moderation and a proper measure" (Blaze de Bury in Revue des Deux Mondes, March 15, 1845, p. 1124). Another German of the time, Frederick Schlegel, in his Philosophy of History, wrote that the study of history abounds and scholarship overflows. But an impression of confusion comes from a reading of this encyclopedia of all the marvels, divine and diabolical, in which ecstatics relate their visions, the stigmatists exhibit the sight of their bleeding dolors, the possessed yell in their contortions, and witches celebrate their infernal sabbaths.[17] Döllinger, when a young professor, in his work on the doctrine of the Eucharist in the first three centuries, showed an extensive acquaintance with the Fathers. But we can already perceive that the contemporary concern and an immoderate preoccupation for reforms were haunting and disturbing that restless spirit. After spreading the wealth of his knowledge in numerous writings, he endeavored by his intrigues to hinder the work of the Vatican Council and died obstinate in schism.[18] Brentano, converted from a loose life to one of piety, became the humble secretary of an illiterate seer, Catherine Emmerich, in the remoteness of a town in Westphalia, and consecrated his life to acquainting a wide public with the revelations of the poor servant of Christ. But he did so in such a fashion that we can scarcely distinguish, in his work, what God revealed to His servant from what the romantic imagination of Brentano unconsciously suggested to him.[19]

Another spiritual leader was Francis Baader. He was less penetrating than Goerres, less scholarly than Döllinger, with a piety less on fire than Brentano's, but with a more winning charm in his words. In his lectures, which continued at the street corners in Munich to the astonishment of passers-by, this superb teacher unfolded the series of his digressions, which should not be neglected by Germans, because it is the most effective antidote for that absolutist spirit which especially marks German science and its speculative direction.

---

[17] On Goerres' Christliche Mystik, see a study by Father Freppel, who became bishop of Angers, in the Correspondant, March 25 and July 25, 1852.

[18] Kannengieser, Catholiques Allemands, pp. 361–69.

[19] Schmöger, Das Leben der gottseligen Anna Katharina Emmerich; Wegener, Anna Katharina Emmerich und Clemens Brentano.

converged toward a philosophical explanation of the universe. The philosopher Schelling felt the influence of Baader, who inclined him to Catholicism. Unfortunately Baader himself was swayed by Schelling's pantheistic philosophy, Boehme's mysticism, and Saint-Martin's illuminism. Thus Baader more and more followed a path that would make him an apostate from Catholicism, if at the approach of death (1841) he did not sincerely repudiate the theories which he probably failed to perceive as dangerous in the fullness of his marvelous success.[20] Schelling, through his connection with Baader and by the ardor of his strife against Hegel's anti-Catholicism, seemed for a while orthodox enough for Döllinger to consider making him a collaborator in his periodical Der Katholik. But soon people could discern that Schelling had nowise abandoned his basic pantheism and that merely the form of his philosophy and the sympathy of his heart had become Christian.

Yet the movement of Catholic thought in Munich won the enthusiasm of outsiders who witnessed it. Montalembert, speaking of Goerres' lectures on mysticism which he had heard at Munich, wrote: "There a new source of study and pleasures opened up." [21] At a later date Wiseman, with the same admiration for the Munich school, thought of utilizing it as an intermediary to bring about relations between the Catholic clergy of England and those of Germany; [22] Rio and Falloux retained a tender memory of this scientific and artistic movement.[23] Nowhere does the school of the Avenir, by its defects perhaps no less than by its warm and sincere faith, find a more vibrant and faithful echo.[24]

[20] Goyau, op. cit., II, 82–85.

[21] Lecanuet, Montalembert, I, 383.

[22] Ward, The Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman, I, 135.

[23] Falloux, Mémoires d'un royaliste, I, 172; Rio, Epilogue à l'art chrétien, II, 165.

[24] Boutard, Lamennais, II, 208, 323. On the Munich school at this period, see some interesting details given by Charles Sainte-Foi (Eloi Jourdain) in his Souvenirs de jeunesse, pp. 239–309.

Ireland

Under Leo XII, Paris and Munich were the two most brilliant centers of Catholic activity. They were the cities where Lamennais was writing and where Goerres was teaching. But our idea of that activity would be incomplete if we were to ignore two other important centers of the religious movement, two cities of Great Britain. These were Dublin, where Daniel O'Connell was fighting for the enfranchisement of his fellow Catholics, and Oxford, where John Newman was slowly preparing for the return of a large number of his fellow Englishmen to the true Church.

The cause being championed by O'Connell was both national and religious. For four hundred years since England conquered it, Ireland had been subjected continually to that regime of terror which we can hardly understand, as a transition measure following a conquest. But this regime affected the religious faith of the Irish as well as their patriotic feelings. As conquerors and as Protestants the English had taken over all parts of the country, there administered justice, and there left three-quarters of the population in a condition of wretchedness. According to an inquiry made in 1822, out of seven million inhabitants, more than five and a half million Catholics were divided in thirty-two dioceses and more than a thousand parishes.

But ever since the time of the Reformation the English government had appointed Anglican bishops and pastors to all existing benefices. Since the Catholics were unwilling to accept their direction, the result was that each parish had two incumbents: the Protestant minister, well-to-do and surrounded with comforts, and the Catholic pastor, languishing in wretchedness like that of his flock, relying for his livelihood on the alms of his poor parishioners. Macaulay wrote that, by this policy of oppression, the Britannic government had given an example of the most unjustifiable and most absurd institution of the civilized world. Since 1792 Irishmen possessing an annual revenue of 40 shillings were voters; but they could vote only for Protestant candidates, who alone were able to take the Test Oath [25] and ordinarily were disposed to agree with the Anglican majority of the English Parliament. In 1797 the Irish, at the end of their patience, organized in armed bands. Three years later Pitt undertook to reduce the Irish opposition by abolishing the Irish Parliament and promising to abrogate the laws that deprived the Catholics of civil capacities. The island became peaceful, in the sense that the tyranny of the rich over the poor and of the Protestants over the Catholics was strengthened. Everyone could foresee that the promises made by the government would not be kept.

The Irish as a whole then gave up recourse to insurrection. But their discontent was shown by a legal, stubborn, and irreconcilable opposition to their Protestant masters. The very day when the bells of St. Patrick's at Dublin announced the Act of Union imposed by Pitt and the abolition of the Irish Parliament, a young lawyer, Daniel O'Connell (1775–1847), delivered an address of protest to a gathering of Catholics at the Stock Exchange. Later he said: "On the morning of that day I took an oath that the dishonor would not endure if I could put an end to it."

Daniel O'Connell was born in County Kerry. He came of an old family that had always been devoted to Catholicism and to Ireland. This man, as Lacordaire said, "without being a prince or captain or founder of an empire, but remaining a simple citizen, would govern more than kings did, would win more battles than the conquerors, would do more than all others who have ordinarily received a commission to destroy or to build." [26]

[25] See Mourret, op. cit., VII, 466.

[26] Lacordaire, Eloge funèbre d'O'Connell, in Œuvres de Lacordaire, VIII, 162.

He possessed the temperament of an agitator. This was the title he gave himself. O'Connell was said to be made up of three men: at home he was a gentle, peaceful man of joyous humor, seeming to have no other horizon than that of family joys and quiet study; at the bar he was a powerful lawyer, expert at fathoming the enormous arsenal of British laws, always followed by a throng of attorneys and clients at the mass meetings over which he presided, he was an incomparable orator, master of his audience as no one before ever was, knowing how to play the most intimate chords of indignation, irony, joy, and enthusiasm. But under all these different forms, what persisted and what gave them unity was the incorruptible character of the sincere Christian, giving priority, in his public life as in his private life, to obedience to the laws of God and of the Church.[27] His was the loyalty of the citizen, refusing to violate the least law of his country. His unfailing motto was: "Not to shed a drop of blood and to respect all the laws of England."

His activity was almost beyond belief. We see him in a single day make speeches in cities and villages remote from one another. He recruited followers, took up subscriptions, organized meetings, aroused the masses, and bent his knee before the Queen if she chanced to be along his route. But especially at the vast popular gatherings over which he presided in the open air, his influence developed in all its might. Wrote one of his contemporaries:

O'Connell's eloquence was an eloquence that could not be classified, prodigious, striking, spontaneous, such as neither the ancients nor the moderns ever had. This was the great O'Connell, standing on the soil of his fatherland, having the heavens for roof, the vast field for pulpit, an immense throng for audience, and for echo the universal [27] In 1815 he had the misfortune to accept a challenge to a duel, in which he killed his adversary. In his grief he made a vow never again to issue or accept a challenge. He remained faithful to this vow in spite of the lively controversies in which he was involved throughout the rest of his life.

acclamations of the multitude. . . . He identifies himself with his people, he lives their life, he smiles at their joys, he bleeds with their wounds, he weeps with their sorrows. . . . But he encloses himself and matures in legality as in an impregnable fortress. He is daring, but perhaps more adroit than daring. Punctilious, shrewd, sharp, a subtle attorney, he carries off by cunning what he cannot seize by force. Where others would be lost, he saves himself.[28]

A Catholic Association was formed in Ireland in 1810 under the direction of a silk worker, John Keogh. O'Connell reorganized it. It had its judges, its treasury, its journals. It scrutinized all the acts of the British government. The Parliament passed a law forbidding this kind of society. The Catholic Association declared itself dissolved and at once formed again by changing its statutes. Its daring increased. It now no longer called for merely the emancipation of the Catholics, but the repeal of the Union. It divided its affairs among three special committees, received contributions in each parish by the mediation of the pastor under the supervision of the bishop, and concentrated the grievances and the wishes of the Irish to have them reach the throne.

This agitation was always legal, but ever growing. It embraced six million oppressed Irishmen, obedient to the orders of a deeply respected leader, frightened a considerable number of statesmen. The Whigs showed themselves generally disposed to pass measures favorable to the Irish cause. The Tories were divided. In 1827, Canning, a member of the parliamentary Tories and favorable to the Catholics, became prime minister. But his death, coming soon afterward, occasioned a shake-up in the cabinet. The Catholic emancipation was rejected. O'Connell then made an experiment to convince the government of the necessity of yielding.

In July, 1828, he presented his name at the election in County Clare against a member of the ministry. Although unknown in the district as well as being incapable of sitting in Parliament as a Catholic, he was elected with such popular demonstrations that in the evening of the election the great agitator exclaimed: "Now Ireland is free." He meant that henceforth its cause was morally before the bar of public opinion.

[28] Timon (L. de Cormenin), Le livre des orateurs.

At the reopening of Parliament, Robert Peel and Wellington, in the name of the ministry, decided to ask for the emancipation of the Catholics. King George IV agreed, then refused his approval. Peel offered his resignation. But the King did not find anyone to take the office. The voice of O'Connell became more formidable. Despite his quality of Catholic, he openly affirmed his intention of sitting in the House of Commons. Although he refused to recognize the Protestant supremacy, he offered to take the oath of allegiance to the Queen. Like victors of old, he pretended to enter the place by a breach. The ministries, alarmed by his boldness, by the mighty manifestations that supported him in Ireland, and by the sympathies he was winning more and more in England among the liberals, decided (April 13, 1829) to introduce the Emancipation Bill. It passed by a vote of 348 to 160. Every Catholic who would swear fidelity to the king would be declared to have the right to vote and to be eligible for office. Every Catholic would be eligible to civil and military offices except a few high posts.[29]

O'Connell had freed not only the Catholics of Ireland. The Emancipation Act, in the full scope of its terms, embraced the whole British Empire, including, besides Ireland, Scotland and England and its colonies. More than a hundred million men, on the shores of the twenty seas, could now call themselves Catholic without being treated as a herd of slaves.

The Emancipation Act was acclaimed as a benefit of vast import. It was greeted by public opinion and by the courts of Europe, by the most confirmed representatives of liberalism in [29] On the negotiations preceding the passage of the bill, see Artaud, Histoire de Léon XII, II, 288–90, 335–90, 394 ff., 411–16.

France and Germany, and by the most authorized spokesmen of the old dynasties. While the disciples of Lamennais and Goerres regarded it as "a preparation for the future freedom of Christian peoples oppressed by the iron hand of despotism," [30] Prince Metternich (April 19, 1829), in the name of the Emperor of Austria, wrote to ambassador Esterhazy: "We see in the event (the emancipation of Catholics) not only the triumph of a cause, but likewise the consolidation of an administration on which rest our last hopes of universal well-being. . . . The Emperor desires Your Highness to express on his part to His Britannic Majesty his sincere felicitations on the conclusion of an affair that will add a new luster to the glory of his reign." [31]

The Oxford Movement

The Emancipation Act was disapproved in some quarters. At least a certain anxiety about the possible consequences of this legislative act was encountered among several eminent and sincerely religious members of the Anglican clergy. We have already seen that at the very time when O'Connell was carrying on his vigorous campaign in favor of his fellow Catholics of Ireland, some serious and pious minds, impressed by the decline of the Anglican Church, had thought of communicating a new life to it by steeping it in its early sources. Of this number was John Newman. This freedom granted to a foreign worship, admitted almost on the same footing with the established religion, seemed to them to be a sort of treason to the old national Church. That apparent indifference appeared to them to be prompted, at least partly, by the revolutionary liberalism which [30] Lacordaire, Œuvres, VIII, 175.

[31] Metternich, Mémoires, IV, 589. On O'Connell, cf. John O'Connell, Life and Speeches of Daniel O'Connell; J. Gondon, Biographie de Daniel O'Connell.

Newman mistrusted throughout his life.[32] At that moment he was unaware that soon he and his friends would ask of Catholic practices and doctrines, better and better understood by them, the regeneration of the Christian spirit which rightly formed their preoccupation.[33] Little by little their prejudices would crumble.

We cannot easily understand such feelings in souls otherwise generous and lofty-minded. But we need merely remark that at this time Catholicism appeared to them, through the Protestant misrepresentations, as an abominable corruption of Christianity. Newman "firmly believed that the pope was the antichrist foretold by Daniel, St. Paul, and St. John. Such was the strength of his feeling that in his Gradus ad Parnassum he had effaced the epithets which accompanied the word 'pope,' such as vicarius Christi, sacer interpres, and replaced them by uncomplimentary qualifications." [34] From 1822 to 1824 Newman saw some of his prejudices fall in consequence of his relations with a professor of theology, Dr. Lloyd, whose lectures he attended. Lloyd, who in his youth had known some French émigré priests and who admired their virtues and appreciated their doctrines, attempted to lead his pupils to less unfavorable views of the Catholic Church.[35] The close friendly relations that soon after were established between Newman and two young Anglicans inclined toward Catholicism, namely, Keble and Froude, continued the work begun by Lloyd. The reading [32] By liberalism Newman always meant antidogmatic rationalism, the error by which a person submits revealed doctrines to human judgment. Moreover, Newman numbered among his best friends many Catholics who, like Lacordaire and Montalembert, declared themselves in a different sense.

[33] On this attitude of Newman, see Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre, I, 48.

[34] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., I, 18. On the calumnies spread in England against the Catholics and on the efforts made by the episcopate of Great Britain to offset them, see Artaud, op. cit., II, 203–12, 266–68.

[35] Ibid., p. 25.

of the early Fathers, which the three young men studied with avidity in their search for elements of Christian regeneration, destroyed many preconceived notions in their minds. The friendly relations and collaboration of ideas which became established between them and a fourth person, Edward Pusey, had a similar result.

Pusey, whose mind was independent of any school and who had a gentle and austere piety, thought, like Newman, Froude, and Keble, of infusing into the Church of England an interior life more conformable to the Gospel spirit. But, strange to say, when he attempted to spread about him some books and prayers corresponding to his aim, he found them almost always among the books and prayers in use in the Roman Church. In a word, about 1827 and 1828 a transformation had been produced in Newman's mind prompting him to write that his spirit had not found his rest, that he was journeying, that he felt himself advancing slowly, led as a blind man by the hand of God, not knowing where God was leading him.[36] At this time also he refused to sign a petition tending to deny the rights of Catholics,[37] but he persisted in thinking that the favor met with in the emancipation project was "a sign of the times, a proof of the invasion of philosophism and indifferentism." [38] Nevertheless the truth was forging ahead in that upright soul. In 1826 he was made a tutor [39] in Oriel College, a position that gave him considerable influence with the young men of Oxford University. Two years later, still retaining his duties of tutor, he was promoted to the post of vicar [40] of St. Mary's at Oxford. His sermons to the people and his intellectual direction of the youth that thronged around him were inspired by the transformation which was taking place in his soul. He became a center. From [36] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., I, 36.

[37] Ibid., p. 49.
[38] Ibid.
[39] The post of tutor ordinarily was accompanied with considerable influence.
[40] In the Church of England a vicar is what we call a pastor or parish priest.

that period date the relations he formed with several students: Henry Wilberforce, Frederick Rogers (who became Lord Blachford), and William Gladstone, the future prime minister. Of these young friends, some would follow him all the way to Catholicism, others would stop on the way. But all would keep for John Newman, after as before his conversion, a sort of veneration that never was extinguished.

CHAPTER VI

The Church in Other Countries

POPE LEO XII did not live to see the emancipation of English Catholics nor the conversion movement which Newman prepared. The Pope was already dead two months when Rome received news of the act of Parliament which granted freedom to the Catholics. But Leo XII had collaborated in a way as effective as it was discreet; historians rightly give him this honor.[1] A direct intervention by the Holy See in the campaign waged by O'Connell, in which the Protestants pretended to see only the doings of a political party, might have had more disadvantages then usefulness. Leo XII did not, however, refrain from doing so. But by the letters which he exchanged with George IV [2] and by the encouragements and directions he gave to the English Catholic bishops,[3] he contributed not a little to the success of the movement which ended in the Emancipation Act.

Spain

The Supreme Pontiff showed the same spirit of prudent restraint and of political tact in the affairs that disturbed Spain during his pontificate. Among the heroic populations that, from 1804 to 1814, rose up for the defense of the Spanish soil and that resisted the armies of the French Empire, we can distinguish, beside the pure heroes whose patriotism and faith

[1] Artaud, Histoire de Léon XII, II, 416; Crétineau-Joly, L'église romaine en face de la Révolution, II, 165.

[2] Artaud, op. cit., II, 202.

[3] Ibid., II, 204–12; Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., II, 164.

were the sole motives, two classes of men. Some thought less of defending the monarchy and religion than the freedom of their local councils and the independence of their guerilla warfare. The writings of the French philosophers and the principles of the French Revolution had not penetrated into their midst. But, unconscious democrats, liberals without knowing it, they were ready to accept and defend every political institution favoring the sovereignty of the people and limiting the powers of the king and clergy. They were also champions of the constitution of 1812, which gave preponderant authority to the Cortes.

At the opposite extreme, popular masses acclaimed the privileges of the clergy and the absolute power of the king. This attitude was taken less by reflective conviction than by pugnacious instinct, by grudge against the upper classes—bourgeois, nobles, the learned—whom an absolute king would dominate, whom a powerful inquisition would strike without mercy. It was a demagogy of special form, less hideous than elsewhere, because the people had more faith, a higher sense of dignity and of national honor. The influence of religion restrained it and partly ennobled its tendencies.[4] These masses joined their noisy clamors to the acclamations with which the court nobility, and almost the entire clergy, and numerous high dignitaries of the army and the magistracy welcomed (1814) King Ferdinand's return. Ferdinand, carried away by these enthusiastic manifestations, at once re-established absolute power and made imprudent use of it. Arbitrary inequalities and unjustified privileges were again introduced or were freshly created. Exile, imprisonments, and deportations increased. Moreover, the government of Ferdinand VII had none of that continuity and unity in the direction of affairs by which arbitrary monarchies exercise their despotism.

The general welfare of the state was sacrificed no less than personal interests. The seaports were deserted, the arsenals were empty. When he wished to make an effort to suppress the insurrection of the Spanish colonies in America, which had just taken advantage of the troubles of the mother country in order to declare themselves independent, Ferdinand was reduced to the necessity of buying eight ships from Russia. When this squadron arrived at Cadiz, only two ships were in condition to set sail. The expeditionary force could not embark. The devotion to the Church, which the King so loudly professed, was itself not to be relied on. He suspended the appointment of prelates so as to use the revenues of the vacant sees for the wiping out of the debt; in his hands the Inquisition seemed to become an instrument of the royal administration.

[4] L. de Carné, Vues sur l'histoire contemporaine, I, 316.

A reaction was inevitable. It broke out, revolutionary, unjust, violent, attacking the King, the clergy, the whole social order. On January 1, 1820, two young officers stirred up the troops of the expeditionary force that was vainly waiting at Cadiz for orders to leave for America. The movement spread. General O'Donnell, charged with suppressing the insurrection, made common cause with it. The secret societies took charge of its direction. Ferdinand, assailed in his capital, agreed to swear to the constitution of 1812 and to promise liberal institutions. He was too late. The revolution kept him prisoner in his palace and it confiscated the property of the Church to fill up the deficit and to guarantee some loans.

The allied powers aroused themselves, and with good reason. The representatives of France, Russia, Austria, England, and Prussia, meeting at Verona (October 20, 1822), were concerned with a movement that seemed to them to threaten the foundations of the European system. Wrote Metternich: "The disorder which has overturned Spain is of a kind that poisons and attacks the principle of life." [5] France, definitely pledged by her two plenipotentiaries, Montmorency and Chateaubriand, assumed the burden of the expedition. Mingled with the desire to defend the social and religious order threatened by the revolution, was a concern of dynastic interest. Chateaubriand was able to communicate his great hope to King Louis XVIII. He said: "Legitimacy was for the first time going to burn some powder under the white flag, to override Spain in one stride, to succeed on the same soil where recently the armies of a conqueror had reverses, to do in six months what he had not been able to do in seven years." [6] This dream was realized.

[5] Metternich. Mémoires, IV, 37.

The Spanish government, disorganized, lacking both soldiers and money, could not present an effective resistance to the French. The Duke of Angoulême, who was in command of the expedition, covered himself with glory at the taking of the fort of the Trocadero, the key to the defense of Cadiz, where the government had taken refuge. One of the aims of the expedition was attained. France showed Europe that she had recovered an army. But the second aim, the pacifying of Spain, was not realized. Ferdinand VII, resuming the royal power, disdained the counsel of moderation which the Duke of Angoulême gave him, treated the vanquished with pitiless rigor, and thus laid the ground for violent reprisals that disturbed the rest of his reign. On the other hand, the Spanish colonies in America, continuing to profit from the embarrassment of the mother country, separated from it with finality.

Pope Leo XII anxiously followed the course of all these events. The thwarting of the revolutionary sects could but reassure him. At the first news of the French victory, he invited the diplomatic corps and the Sacred College to a Te Deum of thanksgiving, which was celebrated in the Lateran basilica.[7] But he did not wish thereby to be too closely allied to the cause of Ferdinand VII. Such a policy would have been to fall into the trap from which he could escape with difficulty.[8] He decided to reward, with an honorary distinction, the general who in this affair had shown himself as moderate in his counsels as he was valiant in combat. He therefore paid to the Duke of Angoulême a homage of the two traditional insignia by which his predecessors had honored the great defenders of Christianity: Don Juan of Austria after the battle of Lepanto; Sobieski after the battle of Vienna; Prince Eugene after the battle of Peterwardein. These insignia were a sort of medieval hat, called berettone in Italian, and a heavy sword, called stoco.[9] At the same time, to show that he was not, as it were, a vassal of the Spanish monarchy, he did not hesitate to enter into relations with the American states that had just separated from Spain and formed themselves into republics.[10] Several sees were vacant there. Spain, though it had lost all effective authority over those countries, insistently claimed the right to nominate the candidates for these sees. Leo XII, in a consistory held May 21, 1827, declared to the cardinals that he had just filled these vacancies "with worthy men by whose care those Churches, cleansed of their stains, would again flourish and would produce abundant fruits of salvation." [11] He acted thus without anyone's cooperation, but solely by virtue of his apostolic authority and his primary duty of feeding the sheep and the lambs.

[6] Chateaubriand, Mémoires d'outre-tombe, IV, 285.
[7] Artaud, op. cit., I, 120–23.

The court of Madrid showed its dissatisfaction. Ferdinand VII manifested his ill humor by deferring the reception of [8] On December 2, 1823, the French chargé d'affaires at Rome, Artaud de Montor, wrote to Chateaubriand: "Leo XII, expressing his approval of the noble and vigorous measures that have contributed to the re-establishment of the authority of the King of Spain, seeks the means of avoiding domination by the faction that had chosen him" (Artaud, I, 130).

[9] Artaud, II, 34, 43–46.

[10] From 1810 to 1822 Mexico, Guatemala, Colombia, Peru, Paraguay, and La Plata separated from Spain.

[11] Artaud, II, 299.

Bishop Tiberi as papal nuncio. Prompted by the same spirit, the Spanish government on this occasion reduced the amount of help it had been accustomed to send to the Holy Land.[12] The Supreme Pontiff wrote to the King of Spain: "Because we place bishops there, where for more than a dozen years you no longer rule, should you menace even your Spanish states that have remained loyal to you with a series of disagreements with the Holy See? Our duties come from on high. You cannot say that we have refused to hear your ambassador. He himself will bear true testimony to our keen grief at being obliged today to decline accord to the desires of His Catholic Majesty." [13]

Labrador, shortly afterward sent to Rome by Ferdinand VII to replace Vargas as ambassador, had the happiness of helping to restore the good harmony between the Spanish court and the Holy See.

Italy

The Spanish disturbances had their repercussions in Italy. There also Leo XII, while applauding the repression of the revolutionary moves, could not always be gratified at the attitude of the absolute powers toward him.

The number of secret societies continued to increase in Italy. Under a variety of names and forms they were extending their ramifications, not merely in the Abruzzi, but also in Romagna, Piedmont, Lombard-Venetia, and the duchies. Italy now had centers organized for a revolutionary agitation. For its outbreak, it needed only that a neighboring people give the example or that an extraordinary measure of repression, emanating from the authority, should be taken as a provocation. The two facts took place almost at the same time. In 1820, Ferdinand, [12] These subsidies were completely suppressed in 1835.

[13] Artaud, II, 300.

king of the Two Sicilies, tried to use the Calderari in opposition to the Carbonari. The former became the supporters of the absolute power. At the same time the news of the Spanish revolt reached Italy. On July 2, two young lieutenants of the Neapolitan army, Morelli and Silvati, at the instigation of the priest Minichini, stirred up the troops, set out for Naples, and forced the King to swear to the Spanish constitution of 1812. The movement of revolt reached Piedmont, where a revolutionary assembly called itself "the junta of the Italian confederation," and also proclaimed the Spanish constitution.

The allied monarchs, gathered in congress at Troppau (October–December, 1820), commissioned Austria to intervene in Italy. The Austrian army routed the revolutionaries at Novara. But hatred against the foreigners, that is, against Austria and the allied powers, did but increase. The secret societies exploited the national feeling in order to attain their own end, which was the antisocial and antireligious revolution. In vain the monarchies, when they considered everything lost, tried to come to terms with the rebels and to give them pledges. These concessions merely aroused the boldness of the sect. Leo XII, in speaking to Cardinal Bernetti, said: "We warned the princes, but the princes slept. We warned their ministers, but their ministers have not kept awake." [14] Carbonarism even established units in Rome itself.[15] A press subsidized by them spread calumny against all established authority and attempted to compromise the Church in the measures taken by the princes. The outrage upon Cardinal Rivarola in 1826 at Ravenna was one of the results of the dangerous incitements.[16]

However, amid all these disturbances the King of Naples, evidently backed by the allied sovereigns, found the means of returning to that perpetual question of the haquenée,[17] which since the Middle Ages had so often set at variance the Sicilian monarchy and the Holy See, and which the concordat of 1818 seemed to have regulated finally. On April 9, 1825, Baron de Damascus, French minister of foreign affairs, was commissioned by the ambassador of Naples to take up the question with the Holy See. The ambassador's language was haughty almost to the point of insolence. In his dispatch he wrote: "These claims of the Holy See go back to the time when it exercised rights over most of the crowns. . . . But the course of the centuries has made them fall into disuse. The independence of the throne has become the surest guaranty of the prosperity of states and even of religion." The Austrian ambassador sided with the declaration of the French minister. Pope Leo XII replied that he was not free to renounce a right established in favor of the Holy See by authentic treaties. He said: "We are depositaries of our rights only in the quality of an elected prince. We are more constrained than any sovereign of Europe not to relinquish any prerogative of the crown." [18] This reply admitted of no reply by sovereigns who were resting the whole legitimacy of their rights on the inviolability of the treaties and the traditions which had consecrated them long ago.

[14] Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., II, 163.

[15] All the secret societies, whatever their form, were organized in units of twenty members.

[16] On the Naples and Piedmont revolutions, see Cantù, La storia di centi anni, II, 442–64.

The Netherlands

At the moment when Leo XII was thus putting an end to the conflict raised by the courts of Naples, Paris, and Vienna, his attention was called to the Church of the Netherlands. There also a sovereign was hindering the action of the Holy See; there likewise were aroused popular feelings that, a few years later, would lead to a revolution.

About the middle of 1825, three serious affairs awakened the [17] Cf. Mourret, op. cit., VII, 51 f., 473. Cf. IV, 238.

[18] Artaud, II, 427. Cf. p. 353.

solicitude of the Supreme Pontiff in regard to the Netherlands. They were: 1. the appointment of a schismatic bishop at Deventer; 2. the hostile attitude taken by King William toward the Catholics; 3. the excitement aroused by that hostility in the provinces of Belgium.

Ever since the Jansenist chapter of Utrecht had arrogated to itself (1722) the right to name a bishop, the schism was perpetuated in Holland. In 1825 a certain William Vet, having been illegally chosen bishop of Deventer (one of the pretended sees suffragan to Utrecht), had the effrontery to notify Leo XII of his election. The Supreme Pontiff on this occasion addressed (August 17, 1825) a brief to the faithful of Holland. Therein he declared the election of Vet null and his consecration illegal, and exhorted the Catholics to gather about the Apostolic See, the center of unity.[19]

This brief came to the Netherlands at a critical time. It was the very time when the Catholic provinces of Belgium, arbitrarily annexed to Protestant Holland by the treaties of 1815, were undergoing a violent persecution on the part of the King. Notwithstanding the fundamental law of the kingdom, which guaranteed liberty of conscience, King William I plagued the Catholic clergy and faithful in every way. On June 14, 1823, he issued two decrees, by force of which no school could be opened without the assent of the government, which reserved to itself the naming of all the teachers and the supervision of the said schools. Further, all non-approved institutions, particularly all the episcopal seminaries, must regard themselves as henceforth suppressed. All aspirants to the ecclesiastical state must thereafter attend the official schools, in particular a certain "college of philosophy." But these official schools imparted instruction that was notoriously hostile to Catholicism.

The Belgium people's irritation increased. It was the greater inasmuch as, to the indignation aroused by the religious persecution, was added the aversion of an oppressed people toward an oppressing people. Would not the secret societies, prompted to seize upon all popular movements as a means of shaking the principle of authority everywhere, try to compromise the persecuted populations of Belgium in some revolutionary undertaking? Leo XII, apparently fearing so, addressed an energetic protest to King William I; but at the same time, through Bishop Mazio, he wrote a letter in which he advised the Catholics and clergy to maintain a passive attitude until such time as the Holy See might judge apropos to come to a decision on the situation.[20]

[19] Ibid., II, 121.

In accordance with the instruction given by the Pope, the bishops of Gand, Tournai, and Malines refrained from any manifestation when their seminaries were suppressed. Meanwhile the Pope did not remain inactive. To show his disapproval of any violence, he censured a pamphlet in which King William was called "a crowned Luther." But at the same time he gave the impression of an unfailing resistance and hinted that a continuation of the vexatious measures would let loose among Catholics a revolt movement which only his express will was holding in check. This attitude on the part of Leo XII resulted in the issuing, by the Netherlands' minister of the interior, of a circular declaring that henceforth attendance at the "philosophical college" by candidates for holy orders would be simply optional, and no longer obligatory. Shortly afterward (June 18, 1827) a formal concordat was signed at Rome by Cardinal Cappellari, another representative of the Holy See, and representatives of the King of the Netherlands. The second article of this convention stipulated that each diocese would have its chapter and its seminary. The third article provided that the election of bishops would devolve on the chapters with confirmation by the Supreme Pontiff.[21]

Unfortunately this concordat was not conscientiously carried out by the government of the Netherlands. Bigoted ministers exerted pressure on the King. In the month of April, 1828, the Courier des Pays-Bas, in an endeavor to shift the responsibility, tried to lay the blame for this non-execution upon "the ill-will of the Pope," whom it represented as "coveting the liberties and tranquillity of the country." Leo XII had simply asked for explanations regarding a confidential circular of the government which, a short time after the promulgation of the concordat, had alarmed the Catholics by seeming to say the very contrary to what was affirmed in the solemn treaty concluded with the Holy See.[22] The Catholic agitation began again. By combining with other oppositions of an economic and national order, it would end in the revolution of 1830, which proclaimed the independence of Belgium.

[20] Ibid., II, 124.

[21] For the text of this document, see Artaud, II, 307–16.

Russia

A conflict of the same sort, but more bitter, stirred up Catholic Poland, subjected to the schismatic empire of the czars. Czar Alexander I, following the religious policy of his predecessor Paul I, had not resumed the persecuting traditions of Catherine II toward the Polish nation. He even wished to make Poland an independent state, with the right to keep its own distinct institutions, its language, its administration, its army, and its Catholic hierarchy.[23] His mistake was to keep at the head of this Catholic hierarchy a man who, pushing to the extreme the traditions of most unadulterated Febronianism, "for fifty-four years of favor and power, had the talent to make use of the Church without ever serving the Church. By underhand methods he purchased the honors that it accorded him with laments, or that he shamelessly usurped." [24]

[22] This circular will be found in the Ami de la religion, October 24, 1827, p. 329. On the incidents mentioned, see ibid., April 26, 1828, pp. 344–46.

[23] On Alexander I and his probable conversion to Catholicism on his deathbed, see Mourret, op. cit., VII, 554.

[24] Lescoeur, L'église catholique en Pologne sous le gouvernement russe, p. 18.

We are referring to Stanislas Siestrzencewicz. He was born a Calvinist, a former soldier, who, through the intrigues of Catherine II, ascended the throne in the metropolitan see of Mahilev. From Alexander I he obtained the official formation of the too famous "Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical College." This body met at Saint Petersburg, after the manner of the Holy Synod and, made up of men without conscience, religion, or morals,[25] there became nearly all-powerful as the tool of the temporal power. The unworthy prelate crowned his work, by his chicanery, in the dismissal of the apostolic nuncio, whose mere presence at Saint Petersburg was thwarting his designs. Yet the energetic faith of the Polish Catholics enabled them to maintain and, on certain points, to improve their organization. When Czar Nicholas I came to the throne in 1826, the detestable traditions of Catherine II reappeared. On the day of his coronation the new emperor received with many signs of regard the envoy sent by the Supreme Pontiff, Bishop Bernetti, and several liberal measures taken at the outset of his reign favorably impressed Leo XII. At that time the Pope said of him: "Such acts are full of greatness; all that is worthy of Henry IV." But the future held in store a cruel contradiction of these hopes.

Some have said that the Polish insurrection provoked the absolutism of Nicholas I. But the facts belie this assertion. Let us note the first attacks by the government of Czar Nicholas I upon the Catholic Church.

In a period of complete peace, by a ukase of February, 1826, Nicholas began the attacks on the united Church which the considerateness of Paul and Alexander I had allowed to rise from its ruins. This ukase forbade all Polish or Russian merchants belonging to the united Church to sell in the fairs or any other gathering of people, in Little Russia, White Russia, or elsewhere,[26] any book for the use of the faithful of that Church. This measure, however, was but an insignificant preliminary, only the date being noteworthy. The ukase of April 22, 1828, two years before the Polish insurrection and eleven years before the final fall of the United Church, was the real cause of the ruin. . . . This ukase instituted, after the likeness of the Holy Synod established by Peter the Great, and of the Roman Catholic College designed by Siestrzencewicz, a "united Greek Ecclesiastical College." As Pope Gregory XVI later remarked in a memorable allocution,[27] "it marked an almost total dependence imposed by the Russian government upon the bishops in the exercise of their authority."

[25] Ibid., p. 20.

[26] On White Russia, see Mourret, op. cit., VII, 55, 542.

Moreover, all the subsequent acts were merely its logical development: formal exclusion from supervision of the teaching of both secular and regular clergy, issued against the bishops and superiors of religious orders, and consequently the forcible intrusion of secular persons and dissenters in the direction of ecclesiastical affairs; the suppression or complete upsetting of the religious orders, on which new regulations were arbitrarily imposed concerning profession, monastic vows, the novitiate, and studies, so to make morally impossible the recruiting of the religious houses that were not suppressed; vacancies of episcopal sees systematically prolonged, and appointments of incapable persons to them, and this by deliberate choice; repeated confiscations of property of religious houses.[28]

Parallel to these measures of religious persecution, repeated acts of systematic oppression had in mind particularly the Polish nation.

Nicholas was willing to be crowned king of Poland; but he no longer convoked the diet and he let Poland be governed by absolutists who spoke of revoking the charter of 1815. One of them declared: "We are not concerned with discussion, but with being obeyed." This regime irritated all the Poles; but on how they were to act, they were divided into two parties. The big landowners and the clergy preferred to submit to Nicholas' despotism rather than expose the Polish nation to complete destruction; they hoped for better times. These formed the [27] Allocution of July 22, 1842.

[28] Lescœur, op. cit., pp. 28–31.

party of prudence, called the Whites. The young men, the students at Warsaw, admirers of the French Revolution, wished for open strife against the Czar to defend the country's liberty. They formed a patriotic and democratic party, called the Reds, directed by secret societies connected with the Carbonari.[29]

Until 1830 the Whites succeeded in restraining the Reds.

Greece

Thus in Poland as in Belgium, in France as in Italy, the Catholics as a whole conformed to the authority without cooperating in the despotism. They were ready to struggle for liberty while refusing any agreement with the revolutionary societies. The question of what attitude should be observed appeared especially difficult with regard to the Greek revolt. The sympathies in favor of the Greek people created by the writings of Chateaubriand and Lord Byron, the memories of a glorious past and the energetic resistance of a Christian people to Islam, had at first aroused an almost universal enthusiasm in Europe. Artaud de Montor, at that time attached to the Roman embassy, states that persons of Consalvi's school applauded the efforts of the Greeks as likely to usher in happy days for Catholicism.[30] But several personages did not share these feelings. They thought that "a Greek schismatic is often more to be dreaded than all the Ottomans together." [31]

These differences became evident particularly on the occasion, in 1825, of the arrival at Rome of a Greek captain, named Chiefala. He came apparently to treat the question of the reunion of the Greek Church with the Latin Church. But this self-styled plenipotentiary was unable to produce evidence that [29] C. Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 557.

[30] Artaud, II, 111.
[31] Ibid.

he had received full powers in the matter. He was at once discredited because to his quality of envoy extraordinary he joined a claim to offer Cyprus wine at a low price. Stalinsky, diplomatic representative of Russia, said: "What does a man intend to do here who sells wine and Churches?" Leo XII saw in every dealing in the matter only the risk of compromising himself. He avoided all negotiations, and the affair was not pursued further.

Foreign Missions

The dubious attitude of Greece with regard to Catholicism was the more painful to the Pope's heart as he received sad news of the missions established in that country. In that same year 1825, the Duke de Laval, French ambassador to the Holy See, handed to the Cardinal Secretary of State a copy of two letters which the Baron de Damascus had written to Bishop Frayssinous, the minister of ecclesiastical affairs. The first letter, dated June 22, related that the Greek missions, entrusted to the Capuchins, counted no more than thirteen religious, divided among the missions of Pera, Smyrna, Chios, Naxos, Syros, and Canea. The residences of Athens, Parchia, Cimolus, Melos, and part of Candia had no longer any missioners.

The mission of Syria, likewise served by the Capuchins, was in a most deplorable state. It now counted only two religious: one at Algiers, the other at Beyrouth. The other posts—Diarbekr, Damascus, Tripoli, Seyde, Hede, Soleyman, and Gabail —were unoccupied. The Vincentian missions were in the same condition of decline. Where at least thirty religious were needed, not more than ten were there, nearly all of them aged or infirm.[32]

[32] Artaud, II, 49.

The reports that came to the Holy See about the state of the other foreign missions were equally gloomy. The Ami de la religion contained (May 22, 1824) the following lines:

> The Foreign Mission Seminary has received sad news on the situation of its missions. . . . That of Siam is reduced to one man, the vicar apostolic, weighed down with years and infirmities. . . . The mission of West Tonkin, which has more than 200,000 Christians, more than 90 native priests, a seminary, two colleges, and about 40 houses of religious, has only one European missioner, namely, a bishop 72 years old. . . . Cochin China, with about 80,000 Christians, has only an eighty-year-old bishop and three young French missioners. . . . The mission of Pondichery, with 500,000 faithful, scattered in several kingdoms, has, besides the bishop, only six French missioners and five Indian priests, who are not of great help. . . . What will become of these missions unless a reinforcement of apostolic workers is sent in sufficient numbers to keep up all the good that has been accomplished there? [33]

The bishops of the United States received financial help [34] and missioners from Europe.[35] The Holy Ghost Fathers could not adequately meet the religious needs of the colonies.[36] Almost everywhere resources and men were lacking. An immediate remedy for all these ills was not in the power of the Supreme Pontiff. But he labored effectively to prepare the renewal of the foreign missions; the result would appear a few years later. Following the example of Pius VII, he encouraged by spiritual favors the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. This work, established May 3, 1822, at Lyons, received yearly increasing alms. Its Annales, appearing every two months and sent gratis to each group of ten members, was ac-

[33] Ami de la religion, May 22, 1824, pp. 49–53.

[34] Annales de la propagation de la foi, no. 10; Ami de la religion, July 14, 1827, p. 290.

[35] Ami de la religion, October 13, 1827, p. 283.

[36] Ibid., February 17, 1827, p. 26.

quainting Catholics with the needs of the missions. Furthermore, the religious congregations, approved and blessed by Leo XII, were preparing numerous workers for the distant apostolate.

Last Acts of Leo XII

However, neither the preoccupation with big undertakings nor the negotiations carried on with the different European states diverted the zealous pontiff from the cares of his temporal and spiritual government. Leo XII set to work to assure in the first place the material tranquillity of his States. Brigands were still infesting the highways and, after their crimes, withdrew into the almost inaccessible mountains of the Apennines or Calabria. The Pope began by using methods of mildness. He had rewards distributed to those who made their submission. More severe measures were employed against the refractory. The struggle was a long one. For Cardinal Pallota, who was placed in charge of the repression and who did not succeed, Leo XII substituted Bishop Benvenutii. He received as military commander an army colonel, named Ruvinetti. This energetic officer entered resolutely in the strife against the famous Massarone, the head of the brigands, and brought security to the Papal States.

The reduction of the number of wine shops was a measure required for the public peace. Because of the people's habits, the move was the occasion of long struggles, which continued through Leo XII's whole pontificate.[37] The floods of the Anio were, for the people living near Tivoli, a cause of serious losses. The Pontiff had large works undertaken that placed the locality out of danger. Administrative, financial, and judiciary reforms introduced order into the government. One of the most extensive works of Leo XII was the rebuilding of St. Paul's outside the walls, which had been destroyed by a fire in the last days of Pius VII's reign. For its rebuilding Leo XII made an appeal to the charity of the faithful of the whole Catholic world; they responded generously. The reorganization of higher schools of learning, the renewal of parish life, and the restoration of the religious life in the various communities of men and of women were the object of the devout Pontiff's ceaseless care.

[37] For this measure and other details mentioned in the next few lines, see Wiseman, Recollections of the Last Four Popes, pp. 187, 194–98. 202.

Leo XII, at the time when he was Cardinal Vicar, often requested of Pius VII an improvement in the lot of the Jews, who at Rome were relegated to a much restricted district. Pius VII acceded to these wishes. But circumstances did not permit him to carry out his design. Leo XII, when he became pope, did what he had proposed to his predecessor. The Jewish quarter, or ghetto, was extended, made more healthful, and enriched with a fountain. Lastly, humane regulations and a wise tolerance were likewise taken account of.[38] To show plainly that this condescension toward the unhappy Jews did not imply, on the Pope's part, any thought of doctrinal indifference, he condemned the secret societies, in particular the sect of the Carbonari, blaming them chiefly for having as their aim to leave to each person the freedom of picking a religion according to his own whim and thus to introduce, as a religion, an indifferentism that could result only in deplorable ruination.[39] He blamed them also "for teaching that people have the right to stir up sedition for the purpose of stripping kings and other rulers of their powers." [40]

In this way Leo XII aided the efforts of the allied sovereigns. In the congresses or conferences of Aix-la-Chapelle, Carlsbad, Troppau, Laibach, and Verona, all but the last one [38] Cf. Artaud, II, 141.

[39] Ibid., p. 18.
[40] Ibid.

held before the publication of the encyclical, these sovereigns had considered the measures to be adopted to destroy the baneful influence of secret societies. But such was the extent of the troubles that the evil had already caused—such was the blindness of certain courts which were cleverly deceived by cunning and daring adepts—that they were not able to attain this end which they pursued with a too exclusively political point of view.[41] The outstanding driving force of the conservative policy in Europe, Prince Metternich, so renowned for his clear-sightedness, had in his chancery as private secretary a member of the High Vente, whose pen name was Gaetano.[42] Were not such compromises of a sort to annul all the efforts by measures of outward repression? These errors and weaknesses of the statesmen and their ministers were a matter of the greatest anxiety to Leo XII.

Toward the end of 1828 many griefs and labors had worn out the Pope's health, which was precarious five years before. According to a report, one day near the end of January, 1829, the Pontiff in conversation with a prelate of his household, Monsignor Teste, said to him: "In a few days we shall no longer see each other." On the day of the Purification he attended the entire office in the Sistine Chapel. In the morning of February 5 he experienced the first attacks of a strangury. In spite of the assiduous treatment by several physicians, the ailment grew worse. Four days later the Pope asked to receive Holy Viaticum. With devotion and courage he answered all the liturgical prayers. That evening he fell into a deep sleep and breathed his last the following day, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

The reign of Leo XII was almost completely without any sensational events. But this fact should not deceive us about the importance of his pontificate. Nowhere, indeed, did the Church win a final victory; but it continued the strife everywhere, prefacing its future conquests. In France, Gallicanism, still alive in the survivors of another age, was seriously checked by the young Catholic school; in Germany the Munich school gave out a bright luster; in England a rebirth of the Roman faith was in preparation. Ireland, Belgium, and Poland advanced toward their liberation; for a restoration of the distant missions, in decline since the end of the eighteenth century, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith prospered and new congregations were more and more fruitful in apostles: both were receiving the resources and men that the Church needed.

[41] Cf. C. Van Durem, Vicissitudes politiques du pouvoir temporel des papes, p. 132.
[42] Cf. ibid., p. 133 note and chap. 10.

A fresh zeal was leading the new generations to the combat. But the situation was not altogether free from illusion here and there, and from evident errors. The dangers appeared in France with Lamennais, and in Germany with the theologians too much imbued with the principles of Kant. Liberalism and rationalist criticism could already be seen as dangers that would soon have to be opposed. The revolutionary movement of 1830 would bring these more to light in the short pontificate of Pius VIII.

CHAPTER VII

Pius VIII
(March 31, 1829, to November 30, 1830)

The Conclave

FEW elections had been foreseen longer in advance and had more concerned the diplomats than that of Leo XII's successor. The uncertain state of the Pope's health made a fatal outcome to be expected from day to day. At each perceptible aggravation of the illness the conversations were taken up again between the ambassadors and their respective governments.[1] When the conclave opened (February 23, 1829) thirteen days after Leo's death, with eager curiosity attention was given to the discourses which, according to custom, the ambassadors of the great powers were allowed to deliver before the Sacred College. Count Lützow, the Austrian ambassador, and Count Labrador, the Spanish ambassador, spoke in a conservative tone. Declared Lützow: "The Emperor, and with him the Catholic world, asks you for a pope who, by his wisdom and moderation, will use his twofold power, spiritual and temporal, for the tranquillity, the advantages, and the happiness of all Europe." [2] Labrador was still more explicit. He said: "Your Eminences will elect a pontiff who, disposed to accord what is just, will at the same time, with his evangelical firmness, set up an insurmountable wall against the evil doctrines which, under the false name of generous ideas, are destroying the very foundations of the thrones of Europe and precipitating the nations in ignominy and blood." [3] The French ambassador, at that time Viscount Chateaubriand, expressed the liberal note, saying: "Christianity, which renewed the face of the earth, has since witnessed a transformation of the societies to which it had given life. As I speak, mankind has reached one of those epochs characteristic of its existence." [4] In short, the author of The Genius of Christianity, in the name of France, asked for "a leader who, mighty by the doctrine and the authority of the past, was no less acquainted with the needs of the present and the future." [5]

[1] See Artaud, Histoire de Léon XII, I, 140–47, 192–97.
[2] Artaud, Histoire de Pie VIII, p. 40.

Two tendencies thus showed themselves. They were the ones which a year later would in violent conflict overthrow many a throne of Europe and would shake them all. Public opinion was not misled in this matter. The press noisily discussed the speeches made by the diplomats in the presence of the Sacred College.[6] The questions thus stirred up took on a greater amplitude than had the previous conclave, which elected Leo XII.

The cardinals did not altogether escape from the outside influences. But they did not let themselves be dominated by them. Cardinal Castiglioni, designated to reply to the French ambassador, merely declared to him, in a tone of proud independence, that "the Sacred College was cognizant of the times." [7] Cardinal Castiglioni was the one that Pius VII, shortly before his death, had indicated for the choice of the cardinals as his successor. The former prisoner of Fontainebleau, as report had it, repeated to him in a familiar strain: "Your Holiness Pius VIII will do better than we have done." Of all the eligible candidates, Cardinal Castiglioni was the most conspicuous. Yet he was not elected until after several ballots.

[3] Ami de la religion, LIX, 283.

[4] Artaud, op. cit., p. 45.

[5] Ibid.

[6] For the echoes of these discussions and the different polemics aroused by the conclave of 1829, see the Ami de la religion, LIX, 89, 106, 121, 134, 145, 148, 164, 211, 212, 228, 280, 283.

[7] Artaud, op. cit., p. 46.

A certain number of votes at first favored Cardinal de Gregorio, who was known to be desired by the court of Spain and was acceptable to the court of Austria. Other votes, more independent, were cast for Cardinal Pacca, well known for his zeal in defending the rights of the Holy See while he was nuncio at Cologne and more recently under Emperor Napoleon, who had him imprisoned at Fénestrelle. Finally the majority combined on the name of Castiglioni, whose attitude was less clear-cut than that of the other two candidates; but it offered the same guaranties of a firm and prudent policy. Moreover, they knew that his election would be agreeable to Austria and to France. After his election on March 31, 1829, he at once declared with a smile that he would take the name of Pius VIII.

Francis Xavier Castiglioni was born at Cingoli, near Ancona, of a noble family that was highly honored in the province. He was at first noteworthy for his high scientific culture, and in particular for a deep knowledge of canon law, which he had studied under the direction of the celebrated professor Devoti. The prudent and enlightened zeal with which he successively administered the dioceses of Montalto, Cesena, and Frascati won him the confidence and friendship of the two last popes. Gentle, polished, of timid appearance, on more than one occasion he showed that he was capable of confronting all dangers when his conscience would find itself engaged in an affair. Men could remember that Napoleon had been unable to make him bend in a circumstance of that sort. Successively exiled to Milan, Paris, and Mantua, for having refused to comply with the desires of the mighty monarch, by his example he raised the courage of many a wavering spirit.

Trying events were about to unfold in his pontificate. As the sharp-eyed already foresaw, these would require of the Roman Pontiff precisely that temperate firmness and prudence which Francis Xavier Castiglioni had exhibited many times in the course of his career. The year 1830 marks one of the culminating points in the history of the nineteenth century. That year was the time of an almost general reaction against the absolute powers in favor of constitutional forms. The period was one of unprecedented social agitation in which the most revolutionary ideas did not yet shed a superficial veneer of Christianity. It was the high point of a literary and artistic movement in which good and evil were oddly mingled.

In France, with the school of Lamennais, the movement was the awakening of liberal Catholicism; in Germany, with the affair of mixed marriages, it was the prelude of the Kulturkampf; in England, with the Oxford movement, it was the beginning, still not well directed, uncertain, of a return of several noble souls to Catholicism; in Poland, Belgium, and Ireland, it was the heated campaign, here victorious and there brutally repulsed, of the Catholics for the freedom of their faith. To discern the questions where inflexible resistance was called for, to favor the lawful demands of the population without giving offense to the crowns, to uphold the principle of authority without discouraging the aspirations of the Catholics who would defend their faith in the name of liberty, all these practical problems the pontificate of Pius VIII will have to face. The circumstances, requiring him to adopt a less reserved attitude than that of his predecessor, will not let him intervene as decisively as will his successor in different circumstances. Between Leo XII's policy of appeasement and Gregory XVI's policy of combat, the balanced policy of Pius VIII should be viewed as a necessary transition and thus an interlude to be pointed out in the religious history of the nineteenth century.

Cardinal Albani

Often the Supreme Pontiffs, from the outset of their reigns, have indicated the direction of their thoughts by the choice of their Secretary of State and by the publication of their first encyclical. Pius VIII's appointment of Cardinal Albani as Secretary of State did not surprise the Roman court and the European diplomatic world. Well known was the conformity of views between Cardinal Castiglioni and the descendant of the illustrious Albani family. Cardinal Joseph Albani,[8] born at Rome (September 13, 1750), was already advanced in years; but his vigorous spirit, active and penetrating, made him well suited for the most delicate functions. He gloried in belonging to the great school of Cardinal Consalvi and, like him, held that a prudent energy always triumphs in the end. A diplomatic mission that he filled at the Austrian court in the pontificate of Pius VII and, people said, some family connection with the imperial family,[9] gave him the friendship of Emperor Francis I and Prince Metternich. He was the one that the court of Vienna had directed, at the conclave of 1823, to pronounce the exclusive against Cardinal Severoli. But notwithstanding what was said by his enemies, he was never the servant of Austria against the French policy.[10] The high encomiums of him by Artaud de Montor, who in 1829 was the French representative at Rome, contradicts the prejudiced insinuations of the Pope's enemies.[11]

Pius VIII's first encyclical was published on May 24, 1829. To be noted was the fact that he there spoke of his authority, "not only over the lambs, that is, over the simple faithful, but also over the sheep, that is, over the bishops." He then warned the Christian people against "those sophists of the time who held that the harbor of salvation is open to all religions," against "those translations of the Scriptures in which the texts are [8] Several other Albani cardinals had been members of the Sacred College. One of them had been elected pope under the name of Clement XI.

[9] Artaud, op. cit., p. 24 note.

[10] See Ami de la religion, LIX, 249, 259.

[11] Artaud, op. cit., passim. Cf. Wiseman, op. cit., p. 289; Moroni, Dizionario de erudizione, I, 181; Baudrillart in Dictionnaire d'historie et de géographie ecclésiastique, I, 1372.

twisted from their true meaning," and against "those secret societies of trouble-makers who labor to desolate the Church and to destroy the state." Lastly, he urged upon the faithful "respect for the holiness of marriage." [12] The future presently showed how well the Pontiff had discerned the real dangers of the Church. Misunderstanding of the rights of the Roman Pontiff, Protestant propaganda, the sophisms and illusions of indifferentism, the efforts of the secret societies to undermine the foundations of authority in the Church and in the state, and the mistaken notions of the peoples and the civil powers about Christian marriage, all these would constitute the chief perils of the Church and society during the pontificate of Pius VIII. These dangers were to be met with especially in France, the Netherlands, England, Germany, and Italy. They were, indeed, to be found along with noble examples of devotion and also works of piety and zeal, manifestations of faith and generosity that brought consolation to the august Pontiff.

Religious Situation in France

Of these good dispositions and these evil ones, France was the chief center. In spite of the sarcasms of the Constitutionel, the pamphlets of Paul Louis Courier, and the songs of Béranger, Catholicism was still a living thing in France when Pius VIII mounted the papal throne. "Notably in France, Christianity for fifty years past showed itself superior to all human vicissitudes. . . . The French are not perfect Catholics; they acknowledge and profess their religion at three great epochs of man's natural and social existence: at birth, marriage, and death." [13] By speaking thus, the journal of the highly regarded Michel Picot had in mind the rank and file of the people. The facts were more reassuring in the case of the upper classes. In 1828 the liberals' boldness and success brought about the formation of an association for the defense of the Catholic religion. It had the Duke of Havré at its head and counted among its directors Prince Hohenlohe, Count de la Rochejaquelein, Father Salinis, Father Des Genettes, Pierre Laurentie, and Augustin Cauchy.

[12] Ami de la religion, LXI, 1–6.
[13] Ibid., LXV, 160, 162.

The association had founded a fortnightly review. That paper was supplied with material by the correspondence of its adherents and took for its mission to point out and refute attacks against the clergy or against Catholic doctrine and practices. The first number of this periodical appeared (March 10, 1829) under the title of Correspondant.[14] The new publication was destined to take an important place in the Catholic press, which already included, besides the Ami de la religion, read by most of the clergy, the Mémorial catholique, the Défenseur de la religion, the Tablettes du clergé, the Eclair, and the Apostolique, which was the most zealous of all, though not always the most prudent.[15] Surviving the attacks of Count de Montlosier, the Congregation continued its works, being entrusted, after the resignation of Father Ronsin, to Father de Rohan, then to Father Mathieu, the future cardinal.[16] To the Société des Bonnes Etudes, directed by Emmanuel de Surcy, to the section of the Bonnes Œuvres, confided to Father Borderie, a magistrate, Jules Gossin added the Œuvres de Saint-François Régis, for the rehabilitation of irregular unions. In the salons of Father de Salinis, the chaplain of the College Henri IV, used to gather an elite group of young men: Melchior du Lac, Eugène de la Gournerie, Léon and Eugène Boré, Théophile Foisset, Edmond de Gazalès, and Franz de Champagny. We are told by one of the survivors of the group: "To these meetings was brought a great love of truth, an eager love for the cause of the Church. I do not think that Catholic youth ever showed more enthusiasm, activity, and life." [17]

[14] The principal contributors to the Correspondant, from March, 1829, to August, 1831, were Bailly de Surcy, Charles Séré de Rivière, Louis de Carné, and Father Edmond de Cazalés. When the success of the Avenir caused the Correspondant to lose most of its subscribers, it ceased publication. It was resumed in January, 1843, with part of its first editorial staff, to which were added Marquis Léonce de Vogué and Charles Lenormant. A third series began in 1855. For further details of the foundation of the Correspondant and its first editors, see Charles Sainte-Foi (Eloi Jourdain), Souvenirs de jeunesse, 1911, pp. 158–79.

[15] Ami de la religion, LXI, 225.

[16] Besson, Vie du cardinal Mathieu, I, chap. 5.

This religious ardor seemed to radiate its warmth. In 1829 Victor Hugo, enamored of the beauties of the Middle Ages, was planning to portray them in Notre Dame de Paris, Lamartine published his Hymn to Christ and his Novissima Verba, and a young man who would soon join the group of the Correspondant, Charles de Montalembert, having been introduced into the Cenacle where Vigny, Hugo, Sainte-Beuve, and Musset were conducting the romantic campaign, declared: "Their cause is just and holy. . . . Only there will you find the future, the regeneration, and especially the moral regeneration." [18]

The religious group and the literary cenacle seemed to exercise a reciprocal influence on each other. Montalembert wrote: "I was charmed with the views of Vigny and Sainte-Beuve on the regeneration of Europe by Catholicism." [19] We find a romantic flavor in the volume published by Father Gerbet in 1829 on the Dogme générateur de la piété catholique. Picot's classical and somewhat severe taste was criticized for regarding the ancient sacrifices as "the emblem of a mystery from the depth of which forty centuries have heard the voice of hope issue forth." He was also charged with considering the offering that accompanies prayer as a prayer of the senses, and even of saying that "the Eucharistic Communion is the means by which the permanent incarnation is individualized in each Christian." [20] But such writing as this went to the heart of the men of that time.[21] The many editions of the work and the conversions that it brought about bear witness in its favor. Father Lamennais, writing about Gerbet's book, says: "In my opinion this book is one of the most remarkable works that have been published for many years."

[17] Melchior du Lac, "Notice sur l'abbé de Scorbiac," in the Université catholique, XXIII, 12.

[18] Lecanuet, Montalembert, I, 86.

[19] Ibid.

Gerbet's book was not the only one. In that same year 1829 we read in the October number of the Mémorial catholique an announcement of a Bibliothèque des amis de la religion, a 200-volume collection of the best ancient and modern works treating of Catholic doctrine and morals. The success of this great work did not lessen that of the Bibliothèque choisie, published by Pierre Laurentie, of the Extraits des Pères de l'église translated by Guillon, of the Collectio selecta Patrum, and the Conférences d'Angers on practical theology.[22] In 1830, just before the July revolution, the clergy and the literary Catholics eagerly read the Démonstration philosophique du principe constitutif de la société and the Méditations politiques tirées de l'Evangile, recently published by Viscount de Bonald.[23] And people were enthusiastic over the scientific lectures in which the illustrious Cuvier taught that the positive sciences did not contradict the Bible, but rather confirmed its divine authority.[24]

One man was the leading inspirer of this whole Catholic movement. That man was Father Lamennais. The group that used to meet at the College Henri IV looked upon him as their master. The Mémorial catholique was proud of his collaboration; the Correspondant paid homage to his ideas; the Ami de la religion, although often disagreeing with him, did not dispute his influence over the faithful and the clergy.

[20] Ami de la religion, LXII, 98.
[21] E. Forgues, Correspondance de Lamennais, II, 60.
[22] Ami de la religion, LXII, 144; LXV, 477.
[23] Ibid., LXIV, 352; LXV, 445.
[24] Ibid., LXII, 334.

Dangers of the Catholic Movement

In the eyes of prudent men, however, the enthusiasm of the Catholic movement did not save it from a threefold danger. The first came to it from the romantic school, whose thoroughly superficial Christian spirit soon vanished in smoke. Notre Dame de Paris, begun as a pious liking for the ages of faith, ended up in daring descriptions that brought on it the condemnation of the Church; Lamartine's Catholicism changed into a vague and sentimental religiosity; that of Vigny into a haughty and gloomy pessimism. Sainte-Beuve, after seeming to hesitate, entered the Abbey of La Trappe and the Abbey de Thélème,[25] finally chose in favor of the latter.

The second danger of the Catholic movement came to it from the temperament of the man who declared himself its leader. True, Father Lamennais did not lack the fire of a captivating eloquence. Often repeated was the superb appeal to the future which closes his Des progrès de la Révolution. He said:

> Do we not see that no concession can satisfy the antichristian party; that its recklessness grows with the fear shown for it? . . . Woe to him who, responsible for safeguarding the doctrine which Christ sealed with His blood, would lower his spirit to earthly thoughts, who would fear man instead of fearing God! . . . Priests of Jesus Christ, on you, on your constancy, depends the welfare of the Church. The fate of the world is in your hands. To save it, what is needed? A word coming from the foot of the cross. May the time come when those who are in darkness will be told: See the light! And they will rise up; with their look turned to that divine splendor, they will joyfully adore Him who enlightens every mind: Oriens ex alto.[26]

But the Des progrès de la Révolution contains some pages full of unrestrained bitterness. Archbishop Quélen of Paris in a pastoral letter addressed to the clergy and faithful of his diocese on the occasion of Leo XII's death, warns them against the dangerous tendencies of Father Lamennais. He wrote: "Whereas we thought we had to fear only the audacity or snares of our avowed enemies, now we see that the spirit of system, a sad and perilous temptation of the finest talents, has been introduced, showing itself in the camps of the Lord and threatening us with an internal war." [27] The remark was just and most fitting. Ultramontanism, as the fiery polemist preached it, was of a sort to sow defiance and hatred between the sovereigns and their subjects. The impetuous writer was unable to tolerate, without a public protest, any humiliation that he thought undeserved, or any public criticism.[28] He took up his pen and wrote two pamphlets: Première and Deuxième lettre à Mgr l'Archévêque de Paris. In these he undertook to prove that ultramontanism is not, as was said, a new opinion, but a doctrine always and everywhere taught by the Church; Gallicanism is merely the mistake of a party and of a period. This error, born of despotism, should disappear with it because peoples are athirst for liberty, and the first condition of nations' liberty is the liberty of the Church.[29] The thesis was defensible if, under the name of ultramontanism, the author had not taken up again the exaggerated ideas which he set forth in his Des progrès de la Révolution and if he had not maintained them with unparalleled violence of language. The reader may judge from the closing lines of the Première lettre: "Look

[25] L. de Carné, Souvenirs de ma jeunesse, p. 136.
[26] Lamennais, Des progrès de la Révolution, chap. 9.

[27] Henrion, Vie de Mgr de Quélen, p. 201.

[28] All the historians of the private life of Lamennais have noted his excessive irascibility, which may be traceable to his physical constitution. One of his best informed biographers and the most sympathetic to him, J. Marie Peigné, mentions numerous instances. He writes: "Irascible to excess, his outbursts of wrath did not last long. Whether he simply wished to excuse himself or viewed the fact seriously, he repeated that they were necessary for his health and that, to avoid falling into a swoon, he was obliged sometimes to pick a quarrel with the first comer, and then ask pardon for his outbursts." Peigné, Lamennais, sa vie intime à la Chênaie, p. 55.

[29] Boutard, Lamennais, II, 55.

about you, Monsignor, and see who are now defending Gallicanism: wily sycophants of the power, who are pushing it to his ruin; a small number of old men, who are living only on school memories. What is all the rest? Words are lacking to describe the disgusting mixture of haughtiness and stupidity, of silly nonsense, of utter impotence of mind."

Lamennais' friends and his foes went to Rome at the same time. The purpose of the former was to petition a pronouncement against Gallicanism, of the latter the aim was to obtain a condemnation of that ultramontanism mingled with liberalism,[30] which seemed to be a serious danger for society. Both groups were disappointed. Pope Pius VIII did not judge that Lamennais' fault was great enough for a condemnation that would have thrown confusion into the ranks of zealous Catholics who were fighting at his side. On the other hand, to condemn Gallicanism at the very moment when the dispute was becoming more political than religious and when the monarchy of Charles X was tottering, might hasten the fall of the dynasty, to precipitate France into uncertain adventures, and to have the Church held responsible. The Pope refrained from any intervention. Lamennais, in one of his uncontrollable outbursts of anger, wrote: "Smothered is the voice that used to terrify the nations. . . . The sanctuary is empty, nothing any longer emerges from it. . . . God has said to the Power, as to the fig tree of the Gospel: 'Be thou withered.' "[31] This was more than the revolutionary pamphlet of 1834; it forecast the gloomy spirit of revolt.

The third peril that menaced the Catholic movement came to it from the very power that assured the movement of its protection. On January 5, 1828, when Charles X yielded to the pressure of the left and accepted the resignation of De Villèle to entrust the ministry to De Martignac, the Duchess of Angoulême said: "My father has taken the first step down from the throne." The King of France took a second step when (August 8, 1829), prompted by the influence of the extreme right, he summoned Prince Polignac. In the words of a judicious historian: "If we consider Polignac with the impartiality of history, we feel surprise, almost stupefaction, and more compassion than aversion. . . . His character was reliable and loyal. But his was not a brilliant mind, his modest bearing ill hid a simple and serene infatuation with himself. This was not the infatuation of a commonplace pride; it was that of a believer, judging himself predestined by God to bring about the triumph of the truth in this world." [32]

[30] This combination of ultramontanism and Catholic liberalism would be understood if these two phrases should mean simply the defense of the liberties of the Church. But we saw above how, for various reasons, especially the contact with the party of the rationalist liberals, this notion was altered.

[31] Forgues, Correspondance de Lamennais, letter of May 3, 1829, to Countess de Senfft.

The Congregation, counting Prince Polignac among its members, at once resumed its meetings, which had been suspended for some time.[33] This was an occasion for the liberal press to stir up anew the specter of the "priests' party," henceforth in power. Polignac's person itself was particularly unpopular. People recalled that his mother had been the friend of Marie Antoinette and that he himself, after his elevation to the peerage, had for a long time refused to take the oath to the Charter. The indignation of the liberals increased when they read in the Apostolique, one of the journals of the extreme right, the following lines: "The sources of the evil come from an impious and atheist charter. Religion, justice, and God Himself command the abolition of all these infamous codes which hell had belched forth." [34] The ministry in vain declared in the Moniteur that "no one who has not lost his common sense would be able to conceive the idea of destroying the Charter; the [32] Thureau-Dangin, Royalistes et Républicains, p. 324.

[33] Grandmaison, La Congrégation, p. 356.
[34] L'Apostolique, August 4, 1829.

whole liberal press carried on a bitter warfare against the ministry; many government officials sent their resignation to the King. Others remained at their post without hiding their disapproval of the ministry's policy; many were dismissed; they were hailed with cheers. Montalembert wrote: "Nothing in the world is sadder than a state of affairs where the power is entirely outside the nation; where the officeholders form a people apart; where dismissals are titles of honor, and judicial charges are triumphs." [35] Following the formation of the Polignac ministry, Lamennais wrote: "My view is that this ministerial revolution will have no other effect than to concentrate the revolutionary forces in a formidable unity." [36] This prophecy became a reality; and the misfortune, for the Church, was to see that, at the moment when the power was headed to its fall, he ran the risk of drawing with him, in his unpopularity, the cause of the Church, by his alliance with the extreme parties. "The royalists, who had not been able with sufficient clearness to separate the monarchical rights from the royal absolutism, and the liberals, who had not been able to separate the national right from the revolutionary passions, found themselves thus thrown into a new situation," [37] from which the Church had much to dread.

[35] Lecanuet, Montalembert, I, 92.

[36] Forgues, op. cit., II, 73.

[37] Nettement, Histoire de la Restauration, p. 740. This historian adds: "Present was a circumstance attenuating the faults which were committed by all the parties and all the politicians from 1814 to 1830; this was their thorough inexperience in representative government." Ibid.

CHAPTER VIII

The July Revolution

THE government of Charles X could not be unaware of the gravity of the crisis. At the beginning of 1830 a strenuous effort was made to raise the prestige and the authority of the civil power.

For sixteen years France and the Algiers regency were at odds in the matter of important claims of two Algerian subjects on the French treasury. The dey of Algiers, Hussein, a real tyrant who terrorized the city of Algiers, had written insolent letters on this matter to the government of Charles X, and had even struck the French consul with the handle of his fly-swatter. Then (1827) a French squadron blockaded Algiers, but without result. On January 31, 1830, a council of the ministers decided to send before Algiers a fleet of 100 warships, escorting 50 transports that would carry 37,000 landing troops. To avenge the honor of France and to abolish piracy and slavery on the shores of the Mediterranean were certainly two of the purposes of the expedition. But the King and Polignac had another aim: a brilliant victory of French arms might silence the parties of the opposition or at least give the government the moral force needed to crush them.

We know the brilliant success of the expedition. The following events were noteworthy: the debarkation of the troops at Sidi-Ferruch, the capture of the camp of Staoueli, the bombardment of the Emperor's fort, the taking of Kasbah, the capitulation of Algiers (July 5). That same evening the white flag of France floated over this coast of Africa which, so long an object of terror for Christianity, would become a French and Christian land. The Catholics took the greatest part in the universal joy. Te Deums were sung in all the churches. Archbishop Quélen of Paris, receiving the King at the entrance of Notre Dame, declared: "Sire, what favors in this single one! France revenged, Europe freed from an odious tribute, humanity triumphant over barbarism, the cross victorious over the crescent! Son of St. Louis, what more legitimate cause of joy for your heart, and for us, your faithful subjects, what cause for joy and delight!" [1]

However, the government was aware that not all distrust was disarmed. Guizot, who was then entering into politics, has left us a vivid picture of the public opinion at that moment. He says: "The disposition of the public is like my own, tranquil on the surface, but beneath much agitated. No one is conspiring, no one is rising up in revolt, but people are in expectation and are preparing for anything. . . . Inactive but not resigned, the secret societies were still there, ready, as soon as a favorable circumstance should present itself, to resume their work of conspiracy and destruction. In the popular masses the old instincts of distrust and hatred for all that recalled the Ancient Regime and foreign invasion, continued to furnish arms and inexhaustible hopes to the enemies of the Restoration." [2]

Charles X and Polignac saw but one means for overcoming these last resistances: a coup d'état. Does it not belong to the sovereign to attribute to himself the powers he judges necessary? Has he any need to consult a parliament? Assemblies, like nations, have never created a strong power, but they always accept it. Thus reasoned the politicians of the extreme right. But Polignac still hesitated. One day Michaud, the editor of the Quotidienne, said to him: "Sir, do you hesitate to make a coup d'état? I grieve at your hesitation." "And why?" asked Polignac. Michaud replied: "Because, as you have for you no men except those who desire a coup d'état, if you do not bring it about, you will then have no one." [3] The coup d'état was decided on. On July 25, 1830, the King, appealing to article 14 of the Charter, which recognized in him the right "to make regulations needed for the safety of the state," signed four ordinances: the first suspended the freedom of the press; the second pronounced the dissolution of the Chamber; the third fundamentally modified the electoral system; the fourth convoked the electors for choosing new deputies.

[1] Ami de la religion, LXIV, 292.

[2] Guizot, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de non temps, I, 348, 371.

The next morning several papers, having appeared without authorization, were seized. In the evening popular manifestations took place with the cry of "Long live the Charter!" The next day the crowd, after pillaging some armorers', took possession of many military posts. On the 28th the tricolor flag was unfurled on the towers of Notre Dame. The cries of "Long live liberty" drowned the cries of "Long live the Charter!" In the course of that day more than half of Paris fell into the hands of the rebels. The national guard, aided by a regiment of infantry that joined them, seized the city hall. On the following day the uprising, led by students of the polytechnic school, forced the barriers of the Louvre and installed themselves in the palace, shouting: "Long live the Republic!" But the republicans did not form the majority of the insurgents; the imperialists and liberal monarchists of the school of the Constitutionel had taken an important part in it. These last, in a proclamation drawn up by Adolph Thiers, asserted that the Republic would embroil France with Europe. This fear was well founded. Metternich was watching for a revolutionary agitation in France in order to combine the great powers against her.[4] The name of the Duke of Orleans was mentioned. The son of Philippe Egalité had fought in the republican army in 1792. In the bourgeoisie he was popular for his affability and his good nature. At the Palais Royal he readily attracted about him the leaders of the liberal party. The deputies present in Paris at first proclaimed him (July 30) lieutenant general of the realm, then (August 5) king of the French, under the name of Louis Philippe I.

[3] Thureau-Dangin, Royalistes et Républicains, p. 328.

[4] Metternich, Mémoires, V, 28.

From the political point of view, the revolution ended in a compromise. Louis Philippe declared himself king of the French "by the grace of God and the national will." But the religious revolution was unrestrained. The secret societies, which feared a European coalition while upsetting the monarchy, had not the same fear of throwing down the crucifix and sacking the churches. In the course of the uprising, the residence of the archbishop of Paris had been pillaged; the house of the Jesuits at Montrouge was invaded by the insurgents, who mistreated several religious; the residence of the Missioners of France was set on fire. On the following days churches were pillaged and various profanations took place.[5] As Eugene Veuillot wrote, "the year 1830 was indeed the date when the Revolution, taken possession by the freethought bourgeoisie, was completed and crowned." [6] The historian of the July monarchy has given us the following picture of the religious state of France after 1830: "Catholicism, vanquished for the same reason as the old monarchy, with which it was thought to be solidary, while Voltairianism thought itself called to share the victory of the liberal party; the crosses destroyed by the same hands as destroyed the fleur de lis; everywhere, in the press, in caricatures, in the theater, an orgy and a sort of vengeance of impiety." [7] The chief organ of the Church of France was able to declare, with full justice, that the clergy was thenceforth stricken "with a sort of civil death." [8]

[5] See Ami de la religion, LXV, passim.
[6] Eugene Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, I, 18.
[7] Thureau-Dangin, L'église et l'état sous la monarchie de Juillet, p. 205.
[8] Ami de la religion, July 2, 1831.

The New Government and the Church

The secret societies were triumphant and, for the occasion, boldly took off their mask. The society Aide-toi communicated to the newspapers a report made to it (August 13, 1830) in a general assembly in which the society avowed with pride its efforts to overthrow Charles X and to accomplish the long-awaited revolution.[9] Shortly afterward a liberal paper, Ami des peuples, revealed more specific details on the participation of the secret societies in the revolution, in an article entitled: Causes secrètes de la révolution de 1830: revelations officielles sur le fameux comité directeur "les Carbonari de Paris." [10] The purpose of the secret societies in these revelations was not so much to display their strength before the public as it was to intimidate the civil authorities. The reporter of the Aide-toi society declared the notable services the association could render during the election period, thanks to the might of its organization in the capital and outside. "What we are doing," he said, "we should continue doing." The liberal papers, which counted nearly all the editors belonging to the Aide-toi society or other societies affiliated with the Carbonari—the Globe, the Temps, the Constitutionel, the Courier français, the National, the Journal des Débats, and the Révolution—exerted pressure on the government which they proclaimed to be their work.

The government ceaselessly gave them pledges. In a report on the situation of the realm, read at the session of the Chamber (September 13, 1830), the minister of the interior assumed a threatening tone with regard to the Catholics. "The King's government," he said, "is not unaware of the plots hatched by the help of associations or congregations which reject our laws.

[9] Ami de la religion, LXV, 187.

[10] This article was reproduced in its entirety in the Gazette de France of September 13, 1830, and in large part in the Ami de la religion of September 25 (LXV, 363). Cf. ibid., p. 465.

It knows how far the rights of the public power extend." A week later the same minister allowed a public manifestation to display its cortege in Paris and rehabilitate the memory of the four sergeants of La Rochelle, who had been executed in 1822 as conspirators; and the scandal was so great that the Journal des Débats wrote: "Beware. It was a jury that made the heads of Bories and his friends fall. . . . To glorify these condemned men is to celebrate for taking the initiative in the destruction of order." At about this same time some deputies asked the Chamber for the re-establishment of divorce. On October 1 a royal ordinance suppressed the partial burses previously granted to the minor seminaries. A fortnight later a new royal ordinance altered the composition of the committees of elementary education, taking the presidency from the curé and giving it to the mayor and suppressing the two notables chosen by the bishop. The Catholics saw in these measures a scarcely concealed advance toward complete secularization of education.

In these distressing circumstances, the attitude of the episcopate and of the clergy in general was calm and worthy. Though respectful of the established order, they did not abandon the defense of the rights of the Church. In a circular addressed to his priests, inviting them to celebrate a service for the intention of the victims of the bloody days, the Archbishop of Paris, with restrained emotion, recalled that, "in the asylum which the poor had offered him during the tempest," he was able to note the extent of the misfortunes. In a confidential letter to his curés and other priests, the Bishop of Orléans indicated to them the measures of prudence which they should take to safeguard respect for the sanctuaries, in the event that the mayors, as had sometimes happened, should wish to assemble the national guard in the churches. "Take no part, my brethren, in the public discussions," wrote the Archbishop of Tours. "The minister of God should open his mouth only to bring words of comfort to all." The bishops of Angers, Troyes, Blois, and Carcassone made use of similar language, and no discordant note was mingled in their voices.[11]

The clergy followed these counsels. But the obedience they owed to the established power did not prevent them from striving courageously as soon as the good of souls was at stake. On July 6, 1830, the new chaplains of the royal colleges of Paris, setting forth in a memorial the sad moral and religious state of the houses confided to their care, expressed a wish for the freedom of education, and one of them, Father Lacordaire, chaplain of the College Henri IV, explained the meaning of this memorial in an eloquent letter addressed to the Correspondant. The editors of this review and of the Ami de la religion let pass no attack, no threat to the rights of the Church, without an energetic protest. The Catholic people, after a first moment of stupefaction, recovered and, gathered about their pastors and encouraged by them, made the profaners retreat. A letter by a traveler who had just passed through several districts of the west and south of France, states (October, 1830) that, in many places "you might see men mount guard at night to hinder the profanation of the crosses, and women on watch during the day to prevent similar disorders." In Brittany, under pressure of public opinion, a prefect, instead of throwing down the crosses, urged that they be respected. At Bordeaux restraint had to be used in the zeal of some persons who wished to erect new crosses along the highways.

Under the prompting of the Supreme Pontiff the bishops were careful to keep the activities of the faithful within the limits of strict legality. As soon as the government of Louis Philippe seemed to be firmly established, Pius VIII openly recognized it, confirming the powers of his nuncio, conformable to the constant policy of the papacy with regard to the established powers. Bishop de Quélen, even after this decision, prescribed public prayers for the head of the state and took his oath, as a peer of France, of fidelity to the Constitution. The Pope wrote to him that he could order public prayers; but he advised the Archbishop to resign as a peer of France if the required oath should be repugnant to his conscience.[12]

[11] For the incidents mentioned in these two paragraphs, see Ami de la religion, LXV, 98, 187, 259, 274, 322, 365, 397, 400, 498, 525, 572–77.

Hateful persecutions were stirred up by the new regime. Yet the revolution of 1830, thanks to the strong and prudent attitude of the clergy, ended in three results from which the Church would soon profit. First, no one could any longer attribute the success, influence, and pretended wealth of the Catholic clergy to the backing of the governmental power, and thus many oppositions fell of themselves. Furthermore, the Catholics, relying now only on themselves, were being accustomed to strive by means of their own initiative. Lastly, by thus separating from the socialists, from the plotters of the secret societies, and from those who had just founded the new government, they were becoming accustomed, like their brethren in Ireland, to fight on legal ground. By this method they would soon impress public opinion as a law-abiding power which would have to be reckoned with.

Unfortunately a divergence of attitudes came to light. These different views, blaming each other more and more as time passed, would cause a deep cleavage between defenders of the faith. The Correspondant, in an article appearing in the course of 1829, in connection with freedom of education, had shown as a desirable aim the establishment of a system in which we might see "each party, each sect, set up school against school, pulpit against pulpit." That same article spoke of the legal right that would result, in such a system, for philosophism to teach errors. The Ami de la religion (October 24) pointed to these assertions as being opposed to the doctrine of the Church and as deriving from the theories of Lamennais; the editor of the [12] Henrion, Vie de Mgr de Quélen, p. 254.

Correspondant (November 3) offered the following explanation: 1. he was not the fanatical and exclusive disciple of Lamennais, as seemed to be implied; 2. in speaking of the legal right of error, he intended merely to take note of a juridical situation, recognizing that only unity is a conserving force and that doctrinal indifference is a social dissolvant; but 3. that, granted the actual order of affairs in which we live, duty should prompt us to make every effort to draw out of it the best possible part. He ended by saying: "Everyone knows that religion has more trouble in being heard than in persuading. But, in this age of independence, the idea that religion can be the instrument of a government, or simply that religion wishes to depend on the government, found many people against it. The only ones who ought to fear the strife are those who are not sure of the goodness of their cause. . . . Let religion appear in all its beauty, and its victory is assured." The Ami de la religion (November 14) noted these last words. It said: "For a long time now religion has appeared in all its beauty; yet it has not been victorious in all minds. Must we not take account of human passions, the indifference of some, the hatred of others, the prejudices of some, the propensities of others?" [13]

This dispute was spirited. We have set it forth at considerable length because we find already formulated therein the arguments that will later be advanced, on both sides, in the mighty quarrel of Catholic liberalism. Perhaps they were never presented in a more striking manner than in this first clash of two tendencies among the defenders of the Church. Indeed, we understand that, in a divided society like that of France about 1830, some sincere and zealous Catholics preferred in the struggle against error a regime of liberty rather than a risky protection. But this regime of freedom was imposed in fact—later on people will say, "hypothetically"—and the situation gave rise to a fear that the fact might be erected into a right. For these reasons the thesis needed to be affirmed, that no man, no institution, no state, has the right to profess indifference between truth and error, between good and evil. On the contrary, their duty, so far as respect for individual conscience might allow, was to protect the true and the good, in the order of religion as in that of morality, against the snares of error and evil.

[13] Ami de la religion, LXI 350–52; LXII, 14–16.

Belgium

In its origin, its characteristics, and its first results, such was the French revolution of 1830. Some have said that Prince Metternich was dominated by his prepossession of tracing all the European agitations to a conspiracy against the old monarchies, and that he wished to connect with the July revolution in France the political movements that took place shortly afterward in Belgium, Poland, Ireland, Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. This assertion is not exact and is contradicted by the facts. The July events were apparently the occasion and the signal for most of these movements; but these had their real causes in earlier events of a national sort, and appeared with different traits, conditioned by the circumstances in which they were produced. Thus, whereas the July revolution in France, determined by a coalition of the liberal monarchists, the imperialists, and the republicans against the institutions of the Ancient Regime, took on a clearly anti-Catholic character, the insurrectionary movements in Belgium, Poland, and Ireland had a religious origin and character. Italy's liberal aspirations had as their special aim to shake off the yoke of Austrian domination and united in a single feeling both freethinkers and sincere Catholics. In Germany the demands for independence had the character of an appeal to German unity. The troubles agitating Spain and Portugal would undoubtedly not have broken out if the irritating dynastic questions were not involved.[14]

The first revolt that was an echo of the July revolution was the one that broke out on the 25th of the following August, in Brussels. In the degree in which he made the Belgian people feel the weight of the Dutch and Protestant yoke, the king of the Netherlands, William I, saw the spirit of opposition to his government growing. In his desire to conciliate this opposition, he adopted some liberal measures; but these fell short, and were always followed by a return to the acts of intolerance and tyranny. Though outwardly affable, King William was as distrustful of others as he was infatuated with his own person and with his personal authority. By a decree of June 20, 1829, he had revoked his decrees of 1825, in what was most oppressive in them: attendance at the philosophical college would no longer be obligatory, and the bishops could now open diocesan seminaries.[15]

But he retained the obligation of every appointed bishop to ask a royal placet, and the consecrating bishop would also have to obtain the King's placet. A few bishops thought they would be acting in accord with their conscience by declaring that they requested a placet only for their bishopric in temporalibus. The Bishop of Namur, called to give them episcopal consecration, refused to submit to the wishes of the King, saying that he had no need of a royal placet for the consecration of a bishop any more than he did to perform an ordination or a confirmation. The appointments then remained in suspense.[16]

At this juncture appeared the papal bull ordering the celebration of a jubilee. The King of the Netherlands published the bull, but with reservations on "the clauses that it might contain against the rights of the sovereign and the liberties of the [14] See Guichen, La révolution de Juillet 1830 et l'Europe.

[15] Ami de la religion, LX, 260.
[16] Artaud, Histoire de Pie VIII, p. 103.

Belgian Church." As we read in the Ami de la religion, "the liberties of the Belgian Church were inserted at a time when that poor Church had not yet the bishops promised to it and when a solemn concordat had remained without effect for more than two years." In December, 1829, King William appointed a notorious Catholic, Baron Pélichy, director of the affairs of Catholic worship. But the Catholics of Belgium anxiously wondered whether they ought to consider that appointment a liberal measure, having as its purpose to give a benevolent interpretation to the civil ecclesiastical laws, or a clever means of introducing into the institutions a governmental control over the affairs of religion. Besides, a law of that same month increased the penalties in matters of the press; a decree of the previous September, obliging the use of the Dutch language over the entire extent of the kingdom, was applied rigorously. Shortly after this (January, 1829) several public officials were dismissed for "having shown aversion to the government system." [17]

The measure of grievances seemed to be filled up. In February, 1830, the Belgian Catholics made an alliance with the liberal party. A constitutional opposition was formed, taking its stand on the ground of liberty, demanding freedom of religion, of teaching, and of the press. The same month the Catholics of Belgium published a manifesto in which we read: "In the face of the terrible danger of seeing the teaching of our children, and through laws governing the press, the teaching of all ages, given over to the good pleasure of man, the Catholics have been forced to seek guaranties. In the age in which we live, no guaranty could be found but that of liberty. . . . The liberals, without their aim being the same as ours, ask for the same liberties. . . . We advance in company with them. But let no one imagine that anything in the world can ever induce us to make the least sacrifice of our principles. . . . We will be free because such is our determined will. Such is our right. We will be free, and many nations of the two worlds will likewise be free. Woe to those nations that remain under the yoke of man!" Father Lamennais, reproducing this manifesto in the Revue catholique of March 15, acclaimed "this magnificent movement of a whole people rising up as a single man and, in the name of all that is most sacred on earth, marching to the conquest of its most precious rights." [18]

[17] For the details mentioned above, see Ami de la religion, LXI, 137; LXII, 154, 157, 173, 332.

The French July revolution was what gave the idea of a revolt. On August 25, 1830, at the Brussels theater, during the performance of Muette de Portici, the appeals to liberty, which came in this opera, excited the public. People cried: "Let us do as the French have done!" The crowd rushed to the offices of the National, a ministerial paper, and to the house of the Dutch minister, Van Maanen, both of which were put to the flames. So far, this was but a local uprising. But two days later the Brabant flag was unfurled. An army of 10,000 men, sent to halt the revolution, was repulsed before the walls of Brussels, by the bourgeoisie in arms. The insurrectionary movement won all the Belgian provinces. Upon the request of King William the signatory powers of the 1815 treaties intervened, but to recognize the provisional Belgian government.[19] A national congress, meeting in Brussels, had proclaimed the independence of Belgium and called for a constitution having its basis in a constitutional monarchy, complete freedom of worship and education, and the communal franchises.

Pope Pius VIII exercised a spirit of pacification. In this spirit he had sought to bring King William to more equitable sentiments with regard to his Catholic subjects, but he had not been without anxieties at the time of the alliance of the Catholics with the liberals. Cardinal Albani, Secretary of State, on June 8, 1830, wrote to Count de Senfft:

[18] Lamennais, Troisièmes mélanges, p. 67.

[19] On this changed attitude of the great powers, see Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, I, 69–80; Metternich, Mémoires, V, 39–46; Talleyrand, Mémoires, III, 371–90.

> The Holy Father is not reassured on the state of minds in Belgium. . . . Will the constitutional union end in consecrating liberty in favor of the Church? The Catholics bring to this union such good faith that the others will scarcely be tempted to mingle therein any duplicity. We think that misunderstandings rather than divergencies exist between the governments and the peoples. Can any remedy be applied? . . . At a distance of a thousand miles, knowledge of characters and facts are hard to obtain; therefore nothing more than general advice can be given. We can set a movement in motion, but specific action must be determined on the spot.[20]

In short, the results of the Belgian revolution were favorable to the Church. It was the starting point of great religious activity in the development of the Christian life, including works of education and of the apostolate.[21]

[20] Quoted by Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., II, 178.
[21] Hergenröther, Kirchengeschichte.

CHAPTER IX

The Church in Poland and Great Britain

Poland

IN THE Polish revolution as in the Belgian, religious interests played a large part. As in Belgium, they were connected with national claims. By its origin the revolution in Poland was related to old and deep causes; but its outburst, prepared by the French July revolution, was determined by the Belgian revolution of August. From 1825 to 1830 Poland had continued to call itself a constitutional kingdom. The Czar, however, did his utmost to reduce this title to an empty phrase. Legally Poland was supposed to be governed by the viceroy, assisted by a representative body, to have an independent magistracy, an army separated from the administration, and a free press. As a fact, the Czar intervened personally in the legislative, judiciary, and administrative power, ignoring the established institutions. Legally, according to the very terms of the Polish constitution, "the Catholic religion, professed by the greater number," [1] was to be the object of particular care by the government, without prejudice to the freedom of the other religions, and the property of the Latin clergy and of the Greek uniates was inalienable. In fact, Czar Nicholas assumed the right to carry on meddlesome investigations of the clergy, hindered the relations of the bishops with Rome,[2] and did not conceal his desire to unite all his subjects in a single Church, subject to his domination.

[1] According to an official report, read at the Polish diet in 1828, the kingdom had 3,471,282 Catholics, divided among 1,917 parishes. The Lutherans, whose number was estimated at 200,000, occupied 28 parishes. The 100,000 Calvinists had 9 temples; 345,000 Jews, 274 synagogues; the non-uniate Greeks, 6 churches; and the Mohammedans, 2 mosques. For further details, see Ami de la religion, LXI, 225–30; LXIII, 312 ff. For articles of the Polish constitution relative to the Catholic Church, see ibid., LXII, 66 note.

The news of the Paris revolution produced a lively impression in Poland. The feeling was increased by the preparation which the Czar then made for an expedition against France. Freemasonry, which had been introduced into Poland by Dombrowski and which had already been spread in the army and the universities, exploited the national unrest to stir up troubles. The leaders of the patriot party resisted these intense excitements or at least awaited the next spring to organize a general uprising of the nation. But when (November, 1830) Czar Nicholas, by virtue of his family alliances with the Nassaus and in execution of the treaties of 1815, undertook to send the Polish army into Belgium for the purpose of re-establishing the authority of William I and to replace in Poland the national troops by Russian troops, the insurrection broke out.

On November 29 two officers drew after them the military school and the regiments of Warsaw. The white eagle was unfurled to the national song: "No, Poland, you will not lack defenders!" Chlopicki, a former soldier of Napoleon, was named dictator. While the young men enrolled en masse in the rebel army, the wealthy offered their gold, the church bells furnished bronze for the arsenals, and the sacristies silver for coinage of money. Austria was astounded and at first word of the insurrection sent troops into Galicia,[3] reinforced her armies in Italy, to guarantee herself against an invasion of her frontiers.[4] But Metternich seemed to consider the movement irresistible. To the Austrian ambassador at Berlin he wrote: "By its nature, powder is inflammable; in my eyes, the kingdom of Poland is like a powder magazine." [5] Liberal Europe was inter-

[2] Ami de la religion, LXIII, 347.
[3] Metternich, Mémoires, V, 70.
[4] Ibid., p. 71.
[5] Ibid., pp. 73, 77.

ested in this epic campaign, more dramatic than that of Belgium; the romantic poetry, the singing, and the Catholics thrilling with its emotion. While Armand Carrel celebrated the Polish insurrection in the National, while the people sang the Varsovienne of Delavigne no less ardently than the Parisienne, and while Lafayette declared: "All France is Polish," the young Count de Montalembert wrote in the Avenir: "It has at length uttered its waking cry, it has at length shaken off its chains, this proud and generous Poland, so much cherished by all free and Catholic hearts. . . . Free and Catholic Poland, fatherland of Sobieski and of Kosciusko, we salute your new dawn, we invite you to the sublime alliance of God and liberty." [6]

Ireland

The Irish cause aroused an almost equally fervent enthusiasm among the young Catholics. Upon returning from a journey to Ireland, Montalembert wrote: "If ever discouragement should overshadow us, let us think of the marvels of that Catholic Association which began with only seven members and after fifteen years of struggle has won Ireland's religious freedom and laid the foundations of its national independence." [7]

After winning the Catholic Emancipation Act, O'Connell did not abandon the strife. He demanded Ireland's independence, the repeal of the Act of Union. He declared: "The union was not a treaty; it was effected by violence and fraud. It is without obligatory force. The Irish, still treated as aliens in race and religion, demand the repeal of the union." [8] The aim of this demand was chiefly the re-establishment in Ireland of a distinct and home parliament, having absolute control over the affairs of the Irish nation, without breaking off the perpetual alliance of Ireland with Great Britain, by the intermediary of Queen Victoria and her heirs and successors. O'Connell judged that without this guaranty the religious emancipation of Ireland would remain a delusion. For the attainment of this new end, O'Connell's program remained what he had scrupulously assigned to himself and what he had imposed on his party in the campaign for emancipation: "Not a drop of blood to be shed, not an illegal act." Thus the Irish struggle had a character quite different from the campaigns undertaken in Belgium and Poland.

[6] Montalembert, Œuvres, IV, 123.
[7] Ibid., p. 163.
[8] O'Connell, Ireland and the Irish.

Great was the astonishment in England when, following the Catholic emancipation, they saw a new association organized in Ireland to the cry of "repeal of the union." Promptly a law authorized the lord lieutenant of Ireland to dissolve any association that appeared to him dangerous to the security of the state. Without delay the viceroy employed the arbitrary power put at his disposal. In the winter of 1829 a proclamation of the Duke of Northumberland suppressed the society formed by O'Connell.

When the Whigs came into power in 1830, they thought that the agitator would lay down his arms. On the contrary, he redoubled the virulence of his attacks. That winter the strife became most keen. To evade the act of 1829 against the association, the tireless agitator fancied the creation of societies under different names which, having no bond between them, would not have the semblance of a national association. He began by assembling the trades. Said he: "I am a man with a trade; my trade is agitation." [9] A proclamation promptly was issued, proclaiming the dissolution of the society of trades. O'Connell obeyed; but, since the proclamation dissolved by name "the society of the trades," he organized under the name of "association to prevent illegal meetings." A new proclamation forbade this association. Then O'Connell proposed "the society of political luncheons," and he called his followers, not to a meeting, but to a luncheon. Then came a new proclamation forbidding the luncheon. O'Connell tried several other combinations, which each time were banned by a fresh proclamation. Finally the lord lieutenant, worn down by this kind of warfare, forbade "any other association of the same nature."

[9] Jules Gondon, L'agitation irlandaise depuis 1829, pp. 76–79.

Before the inexorable orders of the government, submission was necessary, and the strife must shift to new ground. First, O'Connell, in sign of mourning, wore a band of crape, which he swore to keep on wearing until the law against the associations would be abolished. Then he attacked his foes on the side they would feel most, by establishing in Ireland a system of non-importation, which closed the outlet of products of English commerce. He gave the example by refusing to receive into his house any tea, coffee, or other products that came to Ireland by way of England. He thought up another stratagem, which affected the insolent financial aristocracy, from whom he was meeting a persistent opposition. The banks had in circulation a large quantity of bank notes. O'Connell determined to discredit this currency. He asked all those who had such notes to present themselves on a given day and demand the immediate and full cash for their face value. This request of O'Connell was received as an order and was at once carried out. General panic followed. At once the bank vaults were emptied. Bankruptcies increased in number. Commercial operations were suspended. Ten days passed without any business being transacted. The drama was not bloody, but it was ruinous. Thus in England people learned what an influence was in the hands of this man whom the Irish had chosen for their leader.[10]

To appease the Catholics, the government departed a little from its rigorous application of the laws about ecclesiastical affairs. The bishops of Ireland, in a pastoral letter to the faithful (February 9, 1830), made no difficulty in acknowledging "that the state of religion was slightly improved." And they expressed their appreciation to the monarch, the ministers, and the Parliament. At the same time they asked the Catholics not to let themselves be weakened by adversity nor be misled by seduction.

[10] Ami de la religion, LXIV, 521–23.

Scotland

The courage of the Irish Catholics was an example for those of Scotland. The presence in Scotland of numerous French émigrés during the French Revolution and the sight of their virtues had brought about there a considerable number of conversions to the Roman Church. We may fix approximately the Catholic population (March, 1830) at 110,000.[11] But these people, extremely poor, could not provide for the support of the numerous establishments that had to be founded in recent years. A debt of almost $5,000 burdened the Edinburg chapel and the house occupied by the bishop and his missioners. Moreover, this chapel was not large enough, being unable to accommodate more than 1,500 persons, whereas the city counted about 15,000 Catholics. Bishop Paterson (June 19, 1829) made an ardent appeal to the French Catholics.[12] Archbishop Quélen of Paris was listened to by the Catholics of France, who showed themselves generous; and the Pope came to the rescue of the Scotch Catholics to the extent of his means.

The Catholic clergy of Ireland and Scotland were eminent not merely in their courage and zeal. They included several men of distinguished learning. In this number was Doctor Curtis, archbishop of Armagh, highly regarded for his eloquence and for the soundness of his doctrine; Doctor Doyle, bishop of Kildare, former professor in the ecclesiastical college of Car-

[11] Ibid., LXIII, 182. On the state of the Irish Church about 1830, cf. ibid., LXII, 1–5. On the Anglican and Catholic clergy in England, cf. ibid., LXI, 273; LXII, 49; LXIII, 55, 129.

[12] Ibid., LXI, 145–47.

low; and Doctor John Lanigan, recently professor of Hebrew and theology in the University of Paris, then librarian of the Royal Society at Dublin, author of a much valued Church history of Ireland.

England

In England, God was preparing other lights for His Church. "The revolution of 1830 had there given a strong impulse to the democratic movement. The wind of reform which had arisen for some years past in England, rose with the force of a tempest. The coming of a Whig ministry assured the success of electoral reform within a short time; it seemed to presage what was called the reform of the Church. Announcement was made of an intention to revise the Church support, its hierarchy, and its doctrines. This task would have to be undertaken by a Parliament which the suppression of the tests had just opened to non-conformists." [13] The little Oxford group, made up of such men as Newman, Froude, Keble, and Pusey, had been laboring for a reform of the Church to be brought about by the simple return to its own authentic traditions, apart from any intervention of a secular state, which was radically incompetent in that undertaking.

Precisely at this period Newman had undertaken the history of the Council of Nicaea and of the Arians of the fourth century. Filled with admiration for the great Church of Alexandria, he felt the teaching of its theologians and philosophers penetrate his soul. But, while considering this glorious past, he could not help contrasting it with the spectacle offered by his own Church. In the following words he summed up the reflections suggested to him by this contrast: "With the Establishment thus divided and threatened, thus ignorant of its true strength, I compared that fresh vigorous power of which I was reading in the first centuries. . . . I ever kept before me that there was something greater than the Established Church, and that that was the Church Catholic and Apostolic, set up from the beginning." [14] Thus arose what would be for many years thereafter Newman's dominant idea: The Church of England, threatened with destruction, can save itself only on condition of rising to the knowledge of its divine origin and mission.[15]

[13] Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre, I, 51.

[14] Newman, Apologia pro vita sua (ed. 1869), p. 80.
[15] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., I, 53–55.

CHAPTER X

The Church in Other Countries

Germany

IN CERTAIN aspects the situation of Catholicism in Germany was similar to the conditions of its existence in England. In Germany likewise a Catholic minority was dominated by a Protestant majority. There, too, the Catholics, grouped in certain regions, such as Bavaria and Austria, had a chance to organize. But at that point the resemblance ceased.

Germany, as the treaties of 1815 made it, was politically an unstable organization. It balanced between two powerful states, Austria and Prussia, on the one hand, seeking to dominate the confederation, and, on the other hand, forty little states, some of them, like Austria, Catholic, the others Protestant as Prussia was. All of them were impatient to impose their hegemony. From the religious point of view Prussia and the Protestant states, following the Caesaropapist traditions that went back to the first times of the so-called Reformation, and the Catholic governments, still too much penetrated with the Josephist spirit, were more or less putting an arbitrary yoke on the faithful. In the realm of ideas, a double tendency showed itself: a liberal tendency, opposed to absolutism, with Börne and Heinrich Heine as its most eloquent spokesmen, and an ultramontane tendency, opposed to Caesaropapism and Josephism, with Goerres as its most vigorous interpreter. Although inspired by utterly opposite principles, these two tendencies were often combined and mingled, because again and again they had been directed against the same enemy, because, seeking freedom from an odious yoke, they had frequently used the same motto, that of liberty. Hence the ambiguities, misunderstandings, and confusions that were the source of keen disputes in Germany as in France, Belgium, and Italy.

In Germany, no more than in the other countries that felt the shock of 1830, did the events of July create conflicts, but they determined the violent crisis. At the first news of the Paris insurrection, uprisings broke out in Brunswick, Saxony, Hesse-Cassel, Hanover, and several other small states. The alarmed princes granted liberal constitutions. These were blows to the Vienna treaties, which concentrated all the powers of the state in the person of the prince. Metternich took alarm, declaring that the whole evil came from the faction that was trying to introduce into Germany the dissolving idea of the sovereignty of the people. Under his prompting, Austria reacted with all her might against the invasion of political liberalism and favored its repression in the secondary states. It found, in these revolutionary agitations, an occasion to attach to her the Hungarian magnates, more frightened at the popular liberties than they were hostile to the Austrian domination.

The Catholic clergy, taken as a whole, did not mix in these political movements. Sad to say, the German bishops scarcely concerned themselves with defending the independence of the Church against several abusive interferences by the civil power. We refer to their attitude in the presence of two serious questions which, in the course of 1830, invited the solicitude of Pope Pius VIII: the question of the thirty-nine articles of Frankfort and the question of mixed marriages.

On March 2, 1830, the states of Würtemberg, Baden, Hesse, Nassau, and Frankfort, on the pretext of organizing the five bishoprics which the papal bulls Provida (August 6, 1821) and Ad dominici gregis (April 11, 1827) had formed into the ecclesiastical province of the Upper Rhine, published a Declaration in thirty-nine articles in which the rights of the Church were openly violated. After proclaiming (art. 1) that "the Catholic Church has the freedom to the profession of its belief and to the public exercise of its worship," other articles proceeded to restrain that freedom in an arbitrary manner. Article 4 subjected every ecclesiastical regulation and circular to the government placet. Article 5 subjected even the papal bulls and briefs to the approval of the states. Article 10 forbade any discussion outside of the ecclesiastical province of disputes concerning Church questions. This prohibition implicitly banned any recourse to Rome. Articles 7, 8, 11, 12, and 13 attributed to the civil authority the right to define the boundaries of dioceses and parishes. Articles 14, 15, and 16 regulated the manner of episcopal elections and required from the bishops an oath of fidelity to the sovereign. Article 18 required the approval of the states for all meetings of ecclesiastics in synods and all the resolutions they would adopt there. Articles 25–29 concerned the recruiting of the clergy. They will be subjected to examinations before entrance into the seminary and during the course of their studies and after finishing the course; these examinations must be passed before the religious and civil authorities. Article 36 gave both ecclesiastics and laymen the right to appeal to the civil authorities to denounce abuses by the ecclesiastical authority.[1]

"The Church of Germany at this time was easy-going and lacked virility. It had a docility which made it, to some extent, an accomplice of the imperious encroachments by the civil power. Of the five bishops aimed at, only one protested, the bishop of Fulda. The archbishop of Freiburg along with the bishops of Rottenburg and of Limburg-in-Nassau, rather than take the trouble to act, preferred the reproach of being 'silent dogs.' "[2]

Pius VIII protested at first unofficially to all the states that had signed the Frankfort Declaration. Then, in the presence of the inadequate replies received from various sovereigns, he decided the time had come to write to the Archbishop of Freiburg and the four other bishops (of Mainz, Rottenburg, Limburg, and Fulda) an urgent letter on this affair. "By its divine institution," he said, "the Church, spouse of Jesus Christ, is free. It should not be subjected to any earthly power. But if the civil power should be allowed the right to confirm or reject the councils, to choose candidates for the priesthood, to partition dioceses, to control ecclesiastical education and discipline, even the seminaries, and to hinder the free communication of the faithful with the head of the Church, all this would be to reduce the Church to shameful servitude." The Pope added that his heart had been filled with bitterness upon learning that, among the bishops to whom he was sending this letter, one was found rash enough to dare give his assent to the Declaration of the thirty-nine articles." Then he wrote a second time to the heads of all the states involved.

[1] For the complete text, see Ami de la religion, LXIII, 321 ff.

[2] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, II, 136.

The question of mixed marriages, which subsequently would provoke heroic resistance, showed the same weaknesses in the German episcopate. A royal ordinance, going back to November 21, 1803, prescribed that all children born in Prussia of mixed marriages were to be raised in the religion of the father. This ordinance, rigorously applied in Silesia, where a large number of marriages had been contracted between Protestant officials and Catholic natives, had considerably developed Protestantism. This measure, formally contrary to the rules of canon law, which requires from future spouses, as a preliminary condition of a mixed marriage, the promise to bring up all the children in the Roman faith, had not encountered grave opposition in Silesia, any more than the administrative regulation that took away from the Catholic schools their own management and conferred control on the representatives of the government.

When in 1814 Prussia took possession of the Rhineland provinces, it first hesitated to apply the ordinance of 1803. But, eleven years later, the King declared that this ordinance would thereafter regulate the civil matrimonial law in the Rhenish districts and in Westphalia. The episcopate uttered no protest; but several priests refused to bless the mixed marriages when the future spouses did not make the promises required by the Church. The Prussian government complained, bringing before its courts the priests who were refractory to the ordinances and required that the bishops inflict punishment on them. These priests, prompted by the Archbishop of Cologne, Ferdinand August Spiegel, an ambitious prelate who fancied himself playing in Germany the role of a primate and of defending the "ecclesiastical liberties" against Rome after the manner of the Josephists and the Gallicans,[3] joined hands with their colleagues of Silesia and petitioned Frederick William for authorization to enter into conversations with the Pope. Permission was granted on condition that their correspondence would be transmitted through the intermediary of Berlin. In a word, the bishops bowed before the royal absolutism and addressed themselves to the Pope to have the right to remain thus prostrate.[4] Pius VIII replied [5] by his brief Litteris (March 27, 1830), accompanied with an explanatory note from Cardinal Albani, who declared valid but illicit the mixed marriages contracted without observing the rules laid down by the Council of Trent. The Pope obliged the priests, before the celebration of the marriage, to require from the parties the promise that all the children would be Catholic. If this promise was refused, he forbade the priests to give the blessing to the married couple;

[3] Spiegel's correspondence, published in 1897 (Briefe an Bunsen), revealed the character of this prelate, who, although condemning the thirty-nine articles, aspired, with the help of the civil power, to unite the Church of Germany under his authority and to withstand Rome.

[4] Goyau, op. cit., p. 150.

[5] The request was addressed to Leo XII, who died at this time. Pius VIII took up the affair which had remained in suspense.

but he allowed passive presence.[6] The Holy See had gone to the limit of concessions authorized by the principles of ecclesiastical law. But the Berlin court was not satisfied; it published neither the brief nor the accompanying instruction and set to work to make the Roman court yield.

Secret societies, more or less closely affiliated with Freemasonry, may have had a part in the political agitations of Germany in 1830. We may surmise this; but no precise document is extant to prove it. At this period in Germany a vast association existed, the Teutonic Society. But this association, whose principal aim was the unity of Germany, seems to have been nothing more than the echo of the public spirit, showing itself in young heads.[7] Freemasonry strictly so called, certainly widespread in Austria in 1830, always held its meetings with so many precautions that no information is obtainable on its activities.[8]

Italy

The situation was different in Italy. By the aid of authentic documents, we can follow the movement of the secret societies and their influence on the political and religious revolutions of the peninsula. We may even say that the development of the secret societies in Italy was the chief result of the revolutions of 1830. The Belgian and Polish insurrections had keenly impressed the Italian nationalists. On the other hand, Austria's system of repression in Italy redoubled in rigor after the agitations that had just troubled Europe. The Italian revolution did not break out until the death of Pius VIII and it then assumed a clearly anti-Catholic character.

[6] John Moeller, Affaires de Cologne, pp. 58–77. On the situation of Catholics in Prussia at this time, see Ami de la religion, LXII, 344; LXV, 132. Cf. ibid., LXV, 363.

[7] Gustave Bord, "Les Illuminés de Bavière, le Tugend-Bund et les sociétés de malfaiteurs," in Rev. intern. des soc. secr., July 5, 1913, p. 2172.

[8] Ibid., p. 2174.

This trait came to it precisely from the secret societies. The Italian, more than anyone else, is able to submit to necessity and at the same time to conspire in the dark. In 1830 the occult associations in Italy had two centers: the papal states and the province of Lecca, in the southern part of the peninsula. As early as May 24, 1829, Pius VIII renewed the edicts of his predecessors against them.[9] But the Pope's reputation for kindness encouraged the audacity of the sectaries. Their conspiracies may be discovered in many a revolutionary plot. Austria was menaced and increased her measures of repression. A judiciary commission was formed at Rome, with Bishop Cappelleti at its head. Twenty-six persons were brought before it, charged with belonging to the society of the Carbonari. After long discussions one of them, Joseph Picilli, grand master of the Vente of Rome and first instigator of all the troubles, was condemned to death; but Pius VIII commuted the penalty to deportation for life.

Did Napoleon's family figure in these agitations? What is certain is that the Napoleonic ideas, in Italy as in France, mixed with the ideas of opposition to the governments that were said to belong to the Ancient Regime and that these governments distrusted the Bonapartes. In 1822 Duke de Blacas, ambassador at Rome, wrote to Viscount Montmorency, the minister of Charles X, saying: "The Roman Carbonari and the others of the Italian peninsula find a secret encouragement here in the many meetings of the Bonaparte family." [10] In 1830 the court of Naples requested that Princess Caroline, sister of Napoleon I, who was living in Rome, be asked to leave the city; she withdrew to Austria.[11] Later the two sons of Queen Hortense acknowledged their part in the Italian conspiracies. The head of one of the Italian states, Duke of Modena, also entered into relations with the Carbonari. Cherishing the prospect of placing himself at the head of a liberal movement, which would make him the sovereign of a kingdom in Upper Italy, he got into relation, through the intermediary of a dubious personage, Dr. Misley, with the leader of the Carbonari of Modena, Ciro Menotti by name. But the threats of Metternich, who was informed of the affair, abruptly put an end to the negotiations.

[9] Encyclical Traditi (Artaud, Histoire de Pie VIII, p. 561).
[10] Archives du ministère des affaires étrangères, 1821, CXLVII, 219.
[11] Metternich, Mémoires, Vol. V.

Meanwhile southern Italy, or more exactly the province of Lecca, became a hotbed of new secret societies. Under the influence of Mazzini, who found Freemasonry too aristocratic and Carbonarism too bourgeois, societies of more democratic tendencies were founded. The Genoese agitator gave them the following objectives: Italian unity, anticlericalism, and the republican spirit. One of these new organizations, the Catena Salentina, took for its motto: "Wealth and honors are smoke." The others are known but vaguely, although their existence is certain. They preceded the Society of Young Italy, which, founded in 1831, would be the most active instrument of the Risorgimento and of the conspiracies against the Holy See.[12]

The influence of the secret societies appeared likewise in Switzerland in the political agitations that took place there in 1830. That country had been a rendezvous of the different revolutionary sects. The Illuminati of Germany there came in contact with the Carbonari of Italy and France. Under their inspiration, literary and art societies, especially societies of riflemen, were founded in various places; their fundamental purpose was revolutionary plots. These societies played an important part in the cantonal revolutions that occurred in Switzerland, starting in 1830, in a democratic sense and one hostile to Catholicism.

[12] On the secret societies of Lower Italy at this time, see: Oreste Dito, Massoneria, carboneria ed altre società segrete nella storia del Risorgimento italiano, 1905; A. Cavalotti, Memorie sulle società segrete dell'Italia meridionale, 1904; J. Fraikin, "La Charbonnerie dans l'extrême-sud de l'Italie, de 1815 à 1830," in Rev. int. des soc., May 20, 1914, pp. 1157–64.

We have no evidence that the counterblows of the European revolutions in 1830 were felt in Turkey. But these revolutions coincided with the events that, with the backing of the European states and the intervention of the pope, partially and momentarily freed Armenia from the Ottoman yoke. The Greek war of independence had been the pretext for a violent persecution of the Catholics by Sultan Mahmud, that potentate who pretended to reform his empire on the European model, but who did nothing to moderate the traditional hatred of his nation toward the Christians. Accused of treason to the Porte, the Armenian Catholics everywhere saw themselves stripped of their possessions, proscribed, and condemned to penal servitude or to death.[13]

The situation of the Armenian Catholics was intolerable. What aggravated their condition was the fact that they depended hierarchically on a schismatic patriarch who, instead of taking up their defense, turned them over to their persecutors and constrained them to practice their religion in the secrecy of their homes. The Catholic population asked to form a separate nation, having its civil status and especially its own Catholic spiritual chief. Before the threats of Count de Guilleminot, French ambassador, the Porte decided to liberate the Armenian Catholics from dependence on the schismatic patriarch. Pius VIII, by his bull Quod jamdiu (July 6, 1830), then hastened to erect at Constantinople an Armenian archiepiscopal see, having the title and privileges of primatial metropolitan. The holder of this high office was Anthony Nouridgian, a distinguished Armenian priest. He was consecrated in Rome (February 11, 1831) in the presence of the ambassadors of France, Austria, and Sardinia. But this institution did not realize all the hopes that were expected. The Sultan, after freeing the Armenian Catholics from the jurisdiction of the schismatic patriarch, put them under the authority of a civil chief who, at first a simple layman, was later a priest decorated by the Turkish government with the title of patriarch. The existence of these two chiefs at the same time would give rise to painful conflicts.[14]

[13] For the details, see E. Boré, L'Arménie, pp. 55–68.

Non-European Countries

Beyond the Turkish Empire, in the distant regions of Asia, Africa, America, and Oceania, other Christian centers turned their eyes toward Rome to ask for shepherds, resources, helps of all sorts that they were in need of.

The Annals of the Propagation of the Faith (April, 1829) set forth the sad situation of the Catholic missions in Tonkin and Cochin China. In western Tonkin, where a mission of 150,000 Christians had, for their direction, only three French priests, these were tracked down by the police of King Minh-menh and had to seek safety in hiding. In Cochin China the vicar apostolic Tabert was closely guarded; three French priests succeeded in reaching him secretly.[15] In China, where the persecution was rekindled and all the foreign missioners were expelled, thirty-three Chinese priests, who had made their studies in the Vincentian seminary of Macao, were the only ones to care for the religious needs of the Christians spread through the provinces.[16] Father Maistre, of the Foreign Mission Seminary, was wandering, under every kind of disguise, from the Chinese ports to the deserts of Liaotung, about the impenetrable frontier of Korea.[17] The missions of India had not yet recovered from the disastrous blow given them by the suppression of the Society of Jesus.

Protestant ministers followed in the wake of the English soldiers and American merchants. These missioners, backed by the double prestige of governmental sympathy and of gold, [14] Petit, s.v. Armenie, in Dictionnaire de théologie, I, 1912.

[15] Annales, April, 1829, III, 410–86.
[16] Piolet, Les missions catholiques françaises au XIX^e siècle, III, 75.
[17] Marshall, Christian Missions, I, 113.

had won large numbers there. In regions placed under the protectorate of Portugal, the situation was scarcely more satisfactory. The archbishoprics of Goa and Cranganore and the bishoprics of Cochin and Meliapour, following the culpable neglect of the Portuguese government, were deprived of incumbents for several years. From the Sandwich Islands missioners wrote that they hoped at the end of a few years to form a core of solid Christians; but their chief obstacle was to be found in the Protestant propaganda.[18] In Brazil, out of seven episcopal sees four were vacant. The new emperor, Pedro, while making a show of sympathetic feelings to the Holy See, was causing anxiety by his encroachments in the domain of ecclesiastical affairs.[19]

The situation of the Church in the United States, although showing a satisfactory development, gave rise to some anxiety. The Irish immigration began to turn its stream on the new continent, even to the point of arousing the jealousy of the descendants of the first English and Puritan colonists. Such was the origin of the movement known as Native Americanism. At first directed against foreigners, the movement soon became, under the influence of religious bigots, a systematic opposition to Catholicism, regarded as something antinational.[20] Other dangers came to the American Church from the surroundings. Such was the intrusion of a democratic spirit into the administration of parishes. This spirit the Church did not find fault with in the political organization, but judged it incompatible with the character of her divine hierarchy. Such also was the too ready occupation of the clergy in secular affairs, which might seriously alter their ecclesiastical spirit.

None of these dangers escaped the care of the provincial council which convened at Baltimore on October 4, 1829,

[18] Ami de la religion, LXV, 207.
[19] Ibid., LXI, 188.
[20] G. André, s.v. Amérique, in Vacant's Dictionnaire, I, 1057.

Bishop Whitfield presiding. The main questions of the agenda concerned: the powers of the bishops, the significance of the promise of obedience made by every priest at the time of his ordination, the means of spreading the faith, polemics with the Protestants, the reading by the faithful of the Bible in the vulgar tongue and of writings by heretics, the organization of a Catholic press by books, reviews, and papers, the conditions of existence of the religious congregations, and lastly the delicate question of the trustees, lay committees that often arrogated to themselves a right to manage the American parishes.[21]

At the close of the Council (October 17) the bishops published two collective pastoral letters. The first one, addressed to all the priests of the United States, strongly urged them not to mingle excessively in the affairs of this world, to practice the truths which they preached, to study the Scripture, to abstain from frivolous reading, and to live free from any reproach, even from any suspicion. The second letter, intended for all the Catholics of the United States, recommended cooperation in the works of the press and of education, warned them against the trustee system, and admonished them against the spirit of religious indifference, which, under a veneer of liberalism, would tend to put truth and error on the same plane.

To provide for the needs of all these missions, Pius VIII, by a rescript of September 18, 1829, recommended to the faithful of the whole world the Propagation of the Faith Society, founded in France a few years earlier. This work, continually prospering since its foundation, was able to distribute in 1829 more than 300,000 francs [22] and in 1830 about the same sum,[23] to the various missions that asked it for help. The number of apostolic workers grew in proportion to the generosity of the faithful. The Foreign Mission Seminary, which had but 25 missioners in 1824, counted 53 six years later.[24] The Vincentians, the Jesuits, and the Holy Ghost Fathers gave more and more numerous workers to the labor of spreading the gospel in distant lands. However, Pius VIII was unable to witness the mighty rebirth of the foreign missions, a consolation reserved for Gregory XVI and Pius IX. After occupying the Apostolic See only twenty months, the wise and pious Pontiff, feeling himself stricken by a disease from which he had been suffering a long time and which was aggravated by the cares of his rule, asked to receive the last sacraments and drew his last breath on November 30, 1830. During his pontificate, amid events that overturned all Europe, many lofty and sincere ideas were mingled with many illusions; generous movements were in contact with revolutionary passions and doctrinal errors. To discern these errors with care and to condemn them forcefully, will be the task falling to Pius VIII's successor.

[21] On the 1829 Council of Baltimore, see Ami de la religion, LXII, 145–50; LXV, 173–79.

[22] See Annales, July, 1830, IV, 251–59. The sum mentioned was the equivalent of about $60,000. (Tr.)

[23] Ibid., pp. 605–13.

[24] Ami de la religion, LXVI, 518.

PART II

Pontificate of Gregory XVI

CHAPTER XI

Gregory XVI and the Papal States (1831–1832)

THE double task which Pius VIII bequeathed to his successor was to discern and to condemn the errors of the time. This task was the more difficult to accomplish inasmuch as most of these errors found shelter under equivocal appellations. The most elusive was that of liberalism. The revolutionary agitator Mazzini called himself a liberal, as did the conservative Protestant Guizot, as did the ultramontane priest Lamennais, as did the group of young Catholics, Gerbet and Rohrbacher, who again and again in the Avenir carried on a valiant fight for "God and liberty." [1] Moreover, the meaning of the word was not exactly the same in the different nations. In Italy the liberal movement seemed to be confounded with the movement for national independence and, considered thus, was acclaimed by men like Silvio Pellico and Manzoni. In England liberalism was understood rather in a dogmatic sense; and Newman, thinking he saw it in the agitations of O'Connell and the Irish Catholics, blamed them for it as a crime.[2] With the head of the liberal movement in France, Father Lamennais, liberalism would successively take the most varied forms: setting out from the most ardent ultramontanism, he ended up in open revolt against the pope. The equivocation did not cease until the supreme authority of the Holy See defined and condemned the liberal error.

[1] The Avenir (founded October 16, 1830) carried, at the head of its columns, this motto: "God and Liberty."

[2] On the meaning that Newman attached to liberalism and the manner in which he condemned it, see his Apologia. Cf. Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre, I, 23, 195.

Liberalism in the Papal States

In Italy, even in the Papal States, "liberalism" embraced most diverse aspirations. For some it expressed a noble sentiment of national independence, for others a vague constitutional or democratic tendency, for still others a defiant distrust of the Holy See. For the secret societies, which seized upon the movement, it was the sonorous word by which hypocritical plotters tried to justify the most sacrilegious attacks against the Church and the most dangerous conspiracies against the social order.

The man who would become the inspirer and leader of the revolutionary agitation in Italy, the organizer of Young Italy and Young Europe, Giuseppe Mazzini, summed up the plan in this passage of his instructions: "In Italy the people has still to be created: but it is ready to break the envelope that holds it back. . . . Some words are to be found that ought to be often repeated to the people: liberty, the rights of man, progress, equality, fraternity. This is what the people will understand, especially when we use the mottoes in opposition to despotism, privileges, tyranny, slavery, and so on. The difficulty is not to convince the people; it is to unite them. The day when they become united will be the day of the new era." [3] Once the people are aroused, the princes will follow. The famous agitator wrote: "The pope will enter on the path of the reforms by very necessity; the Grand Duke of Tuscany will do so by weakness or imitation; the King of Naples by constraint; the King of Piedmont by the idea of the Italian crown." [4] The idea of the national unity of Italy was one of those which the secret societies exploited with greatest success.

[3] Quoted by Lubienski, Guerres et révolutions d'Italie, p. 46, and by Claudio Jannet, La Franc-Maçonnerie au XIX^e siècle, p. 148.

[4] Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 273.

The history of Italy during the nineteenth century shows more than any other how the harmful influence of Freemasonry and of the sects sprung from its bosom misled the development of the public life among the people where they managed to be implanted. Italy, the outstanding and predestined center of civilization, had been, in consequence of its destiny, the battleground of other peoples. The rivalries of its own children and especially the republican form of its city governments, had kept it from forming a nation at the time when the other European races were constituting themselves into compact monarchies. Foreign domination, to which some of its provinces were subjected, became particularly hard to tolerate in the nineteenth century. The feeling of nationality developed everywhere in the degree to which the governments were centralized to the detriment of local autonomies. Besides, the unjust annexion of Venetia by the treaty of Campo Formio and the shocking disregard of right shown in the Congress of Vienna, by sanctioning this injustice, seriously compromised the principle of legitimacy which Austria was able to invoke over Milan.[5]

The independence and unity of Italy were, then, the watchwords cleverly chosen by the sects. But far-sighted minds easily grasped that, behind these apparent aims, were hidden designs hostile to Catholicism. As we read in a work by a writer closely acquainted with their maneuvers: "Italy was covered with sects. Freemasonry, reinforced by Carbonarism, was humanitarian; its universal brotherhood could be translated into what today would be called socialism and, in radical language, the federation of the peoples. It was anti-Catholic." [6] What all the sects especially desired was the destruction of the temporal power of the pope and of the Catholic Church itself.

In the first rank of those who needed to oppose these sects was Prince Metternich. He especially needed to perceive, denounce, and combat these sacrilegious plans; for he was the statesman who then assumed the role of directing the policy of the great powers of Europe against the revolution. Following the revolution of 1830, the Austrian minister clearly noted the power acquired by the sects that were grouped about Freemasonry. To the Austrian ambassador at Paris he wrote: "Neither the cabinet of the Tuileries nor anyone else can any longer entertain the least doubt about the dangers threatening the social body, in consequence of the extreme force it has acquired, under the shadow of tolerance and impunity, by an antisocial sect which, under this aegis, has been able to form itself into a solid and compact government." [7] But, after so clearly stating the destructive might of the secret societies, what is the institution which the celebrated diplomat sought for preservation from their blows? He did not turn to that principle of legitimacy whose defender he proclaimed himself at the Congress of Vienna, for in the case of King Charles X and the Duke of Bordeaux he showed a selfish disregard. He no longer calls himself the first defender of this temporal power of the Holy See, for he will protect it only in trying to dominate it. We may say that what he sought primarily was the tranquillity of the de facto governments, including that July monarchy which he had just counseled his own monarch to recognize.

[5] Cf. Jannet, op. cit., p. 147. This book is merely the reproduction of Deschamps, op. cit., Vol. III. This Volume III is the work of Claudio Jannet.

[6] Madame Rattazzi, Rattazzi et son temps, documents inédits, I, 20, 46. Cf. Silengardi, Ciro Menotti.

As evidenced by his diplomatic correspondence, the gist of Metternich's whole effort is evident. It consisted in attempting to circumscribe the revolutionary peril and particularly to induce King Louis Philippe to enter on the path of repressive measures against the sects. In several diplomatic documents of this period, which he inserted in his Mémoires, we see him put forward, in order to influence the King of the French, the part taken by the Bonapartists with regard to the secret societies. He says: "The sons of Louis Bonaparte are at the head of the insurgents who wish to take the capital." [8] Later on, returning

[7] Metternich, Mémoires, V, 355.
[8] Dispatch of March 9, 1831.

more precisely to his point of view, he wrote: "France is geographically placed in such a position that the Bonapartist monarchy would merely have to cross the Pyrenees and the Bonapartist republic merely to cross the Alps to join hands in the kingdom of France." [9]

While the famous stateman was pursuing these almost fruitless negotiations, the sects had profoundly upset the Papal States. The spark that set off the revolutionary explosion started at the city of Modena. A close friend of Francis IV, duke of Modena, by name Ciro Menotti, an able and intriguing personage and an influential member of the Italian High Vente, organized the uprising. Intimating to the old duke, his master, whose ambitious dreams he carefully cultivated, that he was concerned solely with conquering the political independence of the peninsula and with consolidating that work by placing on the prince's head the constitutional crown of a unified Italy, he had full scope for recruiting secret agents in the various cities of the Papal States and at Rome itself. The high approbation of Francis IV, of whom he availed himself on the occasion as a pledge of success, brought him many valuable followers.[10] If we are to believe the conspirator, among these followers were several highly placed personages of the French government.[11] Assuredly he had in his hand the two sons of Louis Napoleon.[12] But the Duke opened his eyes in time. At last understanding that Menotti's undertaking was directed to nothing less than the outbreak of a social revolution with the Holy Father and the European sovereigns as the principal victims, he forestalled the insurrectionary movement. At the moment when Menotti

[9] Dispatch of September 17, 1834.

[10] Menotti's schemes, their antireligious aim, and his connections with the secret societies cannot be doubted since the publication of the documents of Louis Blanc, to whom Menotti's secret correspondence had been communicated. See Louis Blanc, Histoire de dix ans (5th ed.), II, 292 ff.

[11] Menotti, Letter of July 19, 1831, quoted by Louis Blanc, loc. cit.

[12] Deschamps, op. cit., II, 260–62; Louis Blanc, op. cit., II, 295, 317.

was preparing the invasion of the ducal palace, the Duke had him arrested as a perjurer and rebel.

Unfortunately these measures came too late to prevent the execution of a firmly organized plot. At the same time that Menotti was attempting to revolutionize Modena, his associates, faithful to orders, were stirring up Bologna. Shortly afterward the movement won over all the other cities of Romagna, Umbria, the Marches, and all the Legations. The conspirators everywhere formed national guards, then established provisional governments made up of nobles, doctors, and lawyers. Bologna was the headquarters. The prolegate Clarelli, to avoid the greatest evils, had to consent to the formation of a governmental commission, having a provincial guard under its orders. Then, feeling his authority overwhelmed by the new order, he left the city and returned to Rome.[13] Thereafter the rebels no longer hid their aim. After the prolegate's departure, the commission declared, without discussion, "the complete freedom from the temporal dominion of the pope in a single government." Lastly it published a manifesto against the administration of the pope and organized a central government consisting of a president and seven ministers.[14] All these events took place in the interregnum, cleverly chosen, between the death of Pius VIII and the election of his successor. Masters of the legations and the Marches, the rebels had thus far respected the patrimony of St. Peter.[15] But evidently the events that had just taken place were only the prelude of an invasion of Rome. The governor of the city neglected nothing to uncover the secret of the conspiracy. Informed that plots were being laid in secret, he had the chief suspects arrested (December 11, 1830) and forced the others to leave Rome. Among the persons arrested were Joseph Cannonieri, a lawyer and refugee from Modena, and Guy Fedeli of Recanati, the master of the chamber of Prince Charles. Thanks to these energetic measures, the conclave was able to meet (December 13) in a relative security.

[13] Sylvain, Grégoire XVI et son pontificat, p. 36.

[14] Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 315.

[15] The States of the Church embraced three parts: the Patrimony of St. Peter, the Marches, and the Legations. Article 103 of the act of June 9, 1815, was worded as follows: "The Marches, with Camerino and their dependencies, as also the Duchy of Benevento and the principality of Ponte Corvo, are returned to the Holy See. It again enters into possession of the Legations of Ravenna, Bologna, and Ferrara, except the part of Ferrara situated on the left bank of the Po." Cf. Farges, "Le pouvoir temporal au début du pontificat de Grégoire XVI," in the Revue historique, XLII (1890), 317.

The Conclave

Forty-five cardinals took part in the various ballotings. On the first day Cardinal Pacca, dean of the Sacred College, Cardinal Cappellari, prefect of Propaganda, and Cardinal Giustiniani, former nuncio to Madrid, received the largest number of votes. But the Spanish government, making use of the right of "exclusive," accorded to the Catholic powers by a custom tolerated by the Holy See,[16] presented its veto to the election of Cardinal Giustiniani. The part taken by Giustiniani in the appointment of the bishops of America under the pontificate of Leo XII is supposed to have been the cause of this exclusive. Two were left: Pacca, prominent by his long services in the nunciatures, which revealed his enlightened devotion to the interests of the Church; and Cappellari, whose less brilliant but much esteemed labors recommended him to his colleagues. Pacca, better known in the diplomatic world, was easily accepted by the crowns. Cappellari was preferred by the zelanti.

For almost two weeks the two parties remained evenly balanced, the difference in the votes cast for them being only four or five. To put an end to the stalemate, Albani, whose relations with the crowns were well known, joined the party of the zelanti. Most of the cardinals who followed his lead imitated him. On February 2, 1831, the feast of the Purification, Cardinal Maur Cappellari was elected pope by thirty-one votes. The conclave had lasted fifty days.[17] The new pope, in remembrance of the monastery of St. Gregory, where he had been superior, and of the great saint who had dwelt there, took the name of Gregory XVI. This election was received throughout the world with evidences of satisfaction. In the press that was indifferent or unfriendly to Catholicism, the National and the Temps praised the new pope. Prince Metternich wrote to Count Lützow, Austrian ambassador to the Holy See: "I need not assure you that no choice by the Sacred College could be more agreeable to our august master than that which has just been made." [18] In the Avenir, Lamennais greeted the new pontiff in these words: "Cardinal Cappellari, in his office as prefect of Propaganda, has had an anticipated experience and a sort of magnificent apprenticeship of the papacy. . . . His blessing Urbi et Orbi, issuing from the height of St. Peter's basilica, will spread traces of its benefits to the ends of the earth. . . . From the heart of that universal charity, it will ascend the steps of the throne reserved to the supreme defender of truth and justice."

[16] On the right of exclusive, see Mourret, op. cit., VI, 417.

Gregory XVI

The satisfaction was general. It was justified by the character of the new pope, the happy success of the undertakings in which he had been employed, and the soundness of his theological knowledge which he had already shown.

He was tall, his step firm, and his bearing erect in spite of his sixty-five years. In the lines of his face Gregory did not have the distinguished features that appeared in the faces of Leo XII and Pius VIII. The ill-will of his enemies at times caricatured the strongly marked lines of his face, his slightly protruding lips, his big black eyes, and his widely arched eyebrows.

[17] Ami de la religion, LXVII, 101. Cf. pp. 86, 118. 209.
[18] Metternich, op. cit., Vol. V, letter of February 12, 1831.

But, according to the reports of all who approached him, the expression of his soul transfigured him as soon as he had to perform a religious function or when he entered into conversation. The devout dignity that he displayed in the liturgical ceremonies, the spiritual amiability that he showed in his converse, the simple, lively, and warm tone by which he put at ease the lowliest of his visitors, touched the heart of more than one heretic. However, in the presence of a flagrant injustice his face quickly assumed a severe expression, almost terrible. But this expression soon gave way to his habitual air of kindness, and evidently the Pontiff had done violence to his kindly nature only in obedience to an imperious duty of conscience.[19]

Such he appeared to those who came into close contact with him. He had been such also in his past life, and such he would be throughout his pontificate: his was a fatherly kindness toward men, a rigid inflexibility toward error. The perfect constancy of attitude and ideas was one of the most characteristic traits in the career of Pope Gregory XVI.

Bartholomew Albert Cappellari was born September 18, 1765, at Belluna.[20] He came of a family of the lesser nobility, commendable by the traditions of virtue that were perpetuated in it from generation to generation. When in 1783 he received the white habit of a Camaldolese monk in the monastery of St. Michael of Venice, the young religious, in memory of one of the cherished disciples of St. Benedict, took the name of Maur. In the successive offices he held in different monasteries of Venice, Rome, and Padua, Dom Maur Cappellari formed those habits of simple, recollected, and laborious life which he would preserve on the papal throne.[21] Moreover, the delicate offices he [19] On the person and character of Gregory, see the testimony of historians who knew him personally, such as Wiseman, Recollections of the Last Four Popes, pp. 398 ff.; Crétineau-Joly, L'église romaine en face de la Révolution, II, 189; Gaume, Les trois Rome, II, 150.

[20] An ancient and picturesque city of Venetia.

[21] We are told that, after his election to the papacy, when his servant came to had to fill, either as visitator of the colleges and universities or as reviser of the books of the Eastern Church or as prefect of Propaganda had brought out that art of dealing considerately with men and affairs, which some historians have said, without foundation, Gregory XVI did not possess. But the impartial study of his life will demonstrate their presence. He it was who, under Leo XII, accomplished, as prefect of Propaganda, against the clever diplomacy of Count Labrador, the surrender of the rights which Spain arrogated on the appointment of bishops in the countries of the New World that broke away from her empire. With this expert negotiator the understanding of concrete situations and of the solutions they required never made him forget the inviolability of the principles that directed his steps.

From early youth the future author of the encyclical Mirari vos had nothing more at heart than to defend the rights of the Church and of the papacy against the contemporary errors. In 1786, the year of his religious profession, he sustained, in the presence of the patriarch of Venice, a public thesis on the infallibility of the pope.[22] The next year, as professor of theology, he chose by preference, as subjects of his courses, the questions stirred by the philosophers of the day.[23] In 1799 he summed up and supplemented all his ideas previously set forth in his work, Il trionfo della Santa Sede e della Chiesa contra gli assalti dai novatori, combattuti e respinti colle stesse loro armi.[24] A few years later Maur Cappellari was one of the chief promoters of the Academy of the Catholic Religion and at its receive his orders for the table, he replied: "Do you think my stomach has altered because I am pope?"

---

[22] Cardinal Zurla, Memoire intorno alla vita ed agli studii del Padre Lodovico Nachi, abbate cameldolese.

[23] The Camaldolese of Monte Coelio still possess the manuscripts of several theses then taught by Dom Maur Cappellari.

[24] A French translation of this work is in Volume XVI of the Démonstrations évangéliques by Migne.

meetings he read several dissertations against the errors of the time.[25]

The new pope lacked neither practical experience nor a knowledge of the intellectual problems raised by contemporaries. He soon had need to use both of these qualifications. The political question was the first one he had to handle. The gravity of the rebellion that made its center at Bologna was recognized by all the great powers. They could not doubt that the blow to the Holy See emanated from the revolutionary sects and thereby indirectly threatened their own authority. But none of them showed any eagerness to repress the movement. Some, such as England and the France of Louis Philippe, viewed, not without a certain satisfaction, a breach made in the institutions of the Ancient Regime in papal Italy and replaced by a constitutional regime. The others, with Austria at their head, and with Metternich as its daring and self-appointed spokesman, at first adopted a threatening attitude.

But they showed little zeal in thwarting the insurrection. Perhaps they wished to humor the secret societies, whose might they dreaded, or perhaps they were not displeased to see the ultramontanism shaken and awaited the hour to intervene in favor of the Holy See to force their protection on it. In short, neither the states that loudly proclaimed the principle of intervention, such as Austria by the mouth of Metternich, nor those that withdrew into the system of non-intervention, such as France, tried to give full satisfaction to the Supreme Pontiff. The former, suspected of being guided, not by a generous respect for right, but rather by a national self-seeking, yielded too much to the inspirations of Josephism or Gallicanism; the latter, by their application of "laissez-faire, laissez-passer," in their international relations, did nothing but transfer the pure doctrine of liberalism and indifferentism into the realm of diplomatic relations.

[25] Cf. Moroni, Dizionario di erudizione, XXXII, 312. Moroni, who was close to Gregory XVI, is a well-informed witness of the events of his pontificate. A detailed chronology of these events will be found in XXXII, 313–28.

Cardinal Bernetti

The Pope could not fail to see the import of the revolutionary moves. A few days after his election, the insurrection entered the Patrimony of St. Peter, even penetrated into the streets of Rome, and there paraded its unfurled banners. Time was not left to resort to preventive measures. The papacy was forced to a close combat with the uprising. Gregory XVI appealed to the devotedness of a man whose strength he knew and whose experience of affairs and fidelity to the Holy See he could rely on, Cardinal Bernetti.

Thomas Bernetti, born at Fermo on December 29, 1779, should be placed, not far below his master Consalvi, in the first rank of the statesmen who served the Church in the nineteenth century. After his literary studies and his law courses in his native city, he came to Rome and was there trained in the practice of affairs under the direction of the celebrated Bartolucci. His first appearance on the political scene was at the time of Pius VII's captivity. Without the knowledge of Emperor Napoleon, whose police he had to evade at any price and whose wrath he had to face, he was to transmit a secret message from the Pope to the Emperor of Austria. Bernetti undertook the delicate and perilous mission. He succeeded in having the letter reach its destination; by the success of the undertaking he rendered a most signal service to the Church. Thanks to him, the plenipotentiaries of the allied powers, gathered in congress, gave the Pope a favorable reply in the matter of the restitution of the States of the Holy See.[26]

After these glorious beginnings, Thomas Bernetti became the right arm of Consalvi. The great statesman confided to him the task of re-establishing, as legate, the papal government in the province of Ferrara. The qualities he displayed in this enterprise led to his being called to the duties of assessor of the committee of the armies in Rome, then to those of governor of Rome. Under Leo XII and Pius VIII the position of Bernetti grew and his talents of statesman shone with such brilliance as to draw to him the esteem of the most obdurate foes of the Church. Stendhal, speaking of the conclave of 1829, wrote: "I desire to see on the throne of St. Peter the most reasonable cardinal, and my votes are for Bernetti." [27] The very day of Gregory XVI's election, with a presentiment of the gravity of the revolutionary movement that had broken out in the Bologna legation, he confirmed Bernetti in the government of that province, which had been confided to him by Pius VIII.[28] A few days later, when the revolution reached Rome, he raised the intrepid cardinal [29] to the high post of pro-Secretary of State in order to rely more completely on him. In these painful circumstances, said Gregory XVI, "I wished to have at my side an arm of iron and a heart of gold: I confided to Bernetti the supreme direction of the government." [30]

[26] Ami de la religion, CLVII, 121.

At his very first glance, Bernetti judged the situation as a real statesman whose look goes beyond the present difficulties. His advice was that the Holy See, confronted by the insurrection, ought to act, so far as would be possible, by its own powers and ought to have recourse to the intervention of the foreign powers only in the last extremity. The future would show how well justified were his apprehensions.

Conformable to the views of his counselor, the Pope first addressed a fatherly appeal to his people. Replying to the calumnies of those who pictured him as the enemy of all progress, [27] Stendhal, Promenades dans Rome, 2nd ser., p. 336.

[28] Maynard, Jacques Crétineau-Joly, sa vie politique, religieuse et littéraire, p. 343.

[29] Bernetti was created a cardinal by Leo XII, October 2, 1826. Ami de la religion, CLVII, 123.

[30] Maynard, op. cit., p. 343.

he protested his desire to contribute to the material and spiritual well-being of his subjects.[31] But the uprising spread. It reached the cities of Imola, Faenza, Forli, and Ravenna. Sercognani, passing through the Marches at the head of an army of 2,000 men, addressed a proclamation to the Romans, urging them to revolt. The two sons of Queen Hortense left Tuscany to join the rebels. The Pope, to prove to his subjects that his promises of reform were not vain and to reply to the maneuvers of the conspirators, whose first act had been to decree the lowering of the taxes, hastened (February 13) to take similar measures. On the 16th he lowered the customs duties. Three days later he reduced the tax on salt. At the same time he opened the political prisons, setting at liberty seventy persons who had been condemned for crimes against the state.

The Pope needed to show that these measures were not a disguise of weakness and did not constitute a capitulation. While the Pontiff was attempting to disabuse his people of the accusations brought against the government of the Holy See, Bernetti was negotiating the purchase of arms abroad and (February 17) he urged the Romans to form a civic guard. This appeal having received an enthusiastic welcome among the populations of the city of Rome and the Roman Campania, a new act of the papal government (February 21) organized the new institution. Article 1 declared that the civic guard would be composed of all men, except ecclesiastics, over twenty years old and not yet over sixty. Article 2 added that persons over sixty years of age who would offer to give this proof of zeal might form a part of it.

In the mind of the Secretary of State this measure took into account not only the people of Rome, who should be interested in the defense of the city, and the insurgents, who had to be opposed with material force, but also the great powers. The chief among these was Austria, which, having already one foot in Italy, asked nothing better than to intervene again and to make the Pope pay for its designing protection. In fact, Prince Metternich had written (February 15) to his ambassador at the court of France to obtain assurance that Louis Philippe would not oppose Austrian action in the peninsula. The ambassador was to remind the King that "the revolution of the Bonapartists was backed by the French anarchists and that the King of the French would find to his interest not to let a Bonapartist throne be set up next door to him." [32]

[31] Apostolic letter of February 9, 1831, in Bernasconi, Acta Gregorii papae XVI, I, 1; Barberi, Bull. Rom. continuatio, XIX, 1.

As we shall presently see, such declarations deceived neither the French government nor the papal government about the real designs of the court of Vienna. However, the insurrection continued to gain ground and to become more threatening. On February 17 the garrison of Ancona capitulated to the insurgents, and two days later Cardinal Benvenuti, sent by the Holy Father as legatus a latere into the revolted provinces to restore peace there,[33] was seized and made a prisoner by the uprising. On February 21 Cardinal Bernetti informed the diplomatic corps of these outrages. A combined action of the Catholic powers, conducted with decision and firmness, would perhaps have succeeded in allaying the danger. Such action did not occur. In the presence of this inactivity, the Secretary of State sent the following note to the powers: "The Holy Father, having exhausted all means in his power, recognizes the necessity of asking foreign assistance. . . . He has turned to the Emperor of Austria and requested the armed help of his soldiers."

The Austrian troops, as the Pope and his minister knew, were already massed on the frontiers. At the first sign from the Holy Father, they crossed the Po. On March 21, Ferrara, Ravenna, and Bologna fell into their hands. A week later the surrender of Ancona ended the campaign. By April 2 the authority of the Holy See was re-established in all the provinces. All signs indicate that the so-called popular uprising had been the deed of a few clever and turbulent leaders, who deceived some by their perfidious calumnies and terrorized others by their brutal aggressions. Once these leaders were removed, good order was restored. Confidence returned in the Papal States. Gregory XVI took advantage of this situation to address (April 5) to his people a proclamation marked by gentleness and firmness. He solemnly repeated his "firm resolution to create institutions suitable to improve the lot of his subjects"; but he added that "these fatherly cares would be possible only through the maintenance of energetic measures, calculated to prevent the return of fresh disorders."

[32] Metternich, op. cit., V, 153.
[33] Barberi, op. cit., XIX, 2.

No time was lost in carrying out this twofold declaration. As first fruits of the judiciary reforms that he proposed to introduce, Gregory XVI declared the abolition of confiscation of property, a penalty which the political customs of civilized peoples no longer justified. As a pledge of the mildness which he intended to show toward those who had strayed, he promulgated a decree of amnesty for all the rebels who, not being civil or military employees of the papal power, would lay down their arms by April 6. But, on the other hand, he named a civil commission instructed to search out and judge the instigators and promoters of the revolutionary movement. All officials, military or civil, implicated in the movement, could not be restored to their offices until they cleared themselves of the charges brought against them. In fact, as Bernetti declared in a note dated April 30, "most of the chief culprits had time to leave the States of the Holy See" and thus escape any condemnation.

Foreign Intervention

The period of the disorders seemed to be ended. Perhaps it would have been so in reality if the powers, faithful to the most elementary rules of international law, were satisfied with merely protecting external order in the States of the Holy See, refraining from any interference in the internal policy. Unfortunately the government of Louis Philippe and that of Francis I soon agreed to carry out a totally different policy. The cabinet of Casimir Périer, who strongly advocated a policy of absolute non-intervention, proceeded to intervene in the most internal machinery of the papal government; and the cabinet of Prince Metternich, who professed, along with devotion to the papacy, devotion to the most authoritarian institutions of the past, agreed with the government of July in requesting liberal reforms from the Pope. Soon after this, the two governments decided to gather in conference for this purpose, to which France invited Protestant England, and Austria invited heretical Prussia and schismatical Russia.

The conference opened, at Rome itself, under the eyes of the Holy Father, but without his participation. What was the purpose of Austria and of Russia in taking part in such a move? Guizot, in his Mémoires, surmises that "they did so out of prudence, at a stormy time, especially with regard to France and England, whose liberal action they feared and whom they hoped to restrain by not separating from them." [34] It was neither well conceived nor praiseworthy. So far as Austria was concerned, it might well be suspected of Josephism as a thought in the back of their minds. The Vienna cabinet, when it acted thus, lent itself to the suspicion that it wished to resume the worst traditions of Joseph II by abusively interfering in the affairs of the Holy See.

The Memorandum drawn up by the plenipotentiaries of the five powers at the end of the Roman conference (May 21, 1831) did but confirm these impressions. By a proceeding unprecedented in the annals of history, the five powers presumed to dictate to the Pope the reforms that he must introduce in his states to correspond to the so-called aspirations of his people. This presumptuous decision was monarchical Josephism putting its authority at the service of revolutionary liberalism.

[34] Guizot, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps, II, 291.

The essence of these strange demands is found set forth in the first two paragraphs of the diplomatic document.[35]

> The representatives of the five powers judge that, as to the State of the Church, the question, in the interest of Europe, concerns two fundamental points: 1. that the government of that state be based on solid foundations by the ameliorations considered and announced by His Holiness himself at the outset of his reign; 2. that these ameliorations which, according to the expressions of the edict of His Excellency Cardinal Bernetti, will found a new era for the subjects of His Holiness, should be, by an internal guaranty, safeguarded from the changes inherent to the nature of every elective government.
>
> To attain this salutary end, which, owing to the geographical and social composition of the States of the Church, is of European interest, the organic declaration of His Holiness should set out from two vital principles: 1. the application of the ameliorations in question not only to the provinces where the revolution has broken out, but also to those which have remained faithful to the capital; 2. the general admission of laymen to administrative and judiciary offices.

Evidently the pretentions of the powers were not limited to a transient intervention. They extended even to a permanent control of the political reforms asked of the Holy See; and no doubt remained that, if the government of Louis Philippe tended to propagate in the States of the Church the constitutional regime of which it claimed to be the model, Austria aspired to fix her influence in Italy by her role of interpreter of the popular demands. On May 22, following the conference, Count Saint-Aulaire, ambassador of France, in a dispatch to his government, stated with apprehension that Austria was becoming popular in Italy. In the preceding month of May, France had already protested against the prolongation of the sojourn of the Austrian troops in the peninsula. France began to wonder if, in the Memorandum, she had not been the dupe of Metternich's politics. Bernetti, a shrewd observer, promptly fathomed how artificial and unstable the accord of the powers really was. A solemn and outspoken protest of the Pope against the Memorandum taken as a whole accentuated the misunderstanding which the sects had created. More than ever the Supreme Pontiff was made to appear as the defender of the tyranny of the Ancient Regime against the liberal reforms demanded by the sovereigns themselves.

[35] The document was written by the Prussian minister, Bunsen.

Gregory XVI's calm and dignity were admirable. To the delegates of the conference he pointed out, not without spirit, that he would carry out all the reforms spontaneously promised by him, and all those he might subsequently judge useful. But he insisted on retaining the initiative, strongly resolved to make use of all his prerogatives as a free and independent prince. This attitude was worthy and dignified. If the people of the Marches and the Legations, even those of the Patrimony of St. Peter, had been partly drawn into the movement of revolutionary liberalism, they had preserved in the depth of their heart the feeling of national independence, an instinctive hatred for outside interference in their country.

Conflict between France and Austria

The subdued disagreement, manifested even during the Roman conferences between the cabinet of Vienna and that of Paris, soon became sharper. In the course of the discussions, Count Saint-Aulaire, speaking of Austria, in a dispatch addressed to his government, mentioned odd symptoms of disagreement.[36] A short time later, Louis Philippe hinted to the Pope, through his ambassador, that France would gladly take upon herself the defense of order in the Papal States, if the [36] Dispatch of May 22, 1831.

Holy See would agree: 1. to set aside the influence of Austria to the advantage of France; 2. to take, without great delay, certain liberal measures, such as the promulgation of an amnesty in favor of the rebels. Bernetti replied to Saint-Aulaire that the French guaranty seemed precious to His Holiness, but that the Pope thought he could not purchase it by measures which would be an abdication of papal independence. As these last words were interpreted by the powers as an implicit rejection of the Memorandum, Gregory's minister explained in a later note that, although the Pope could not consent to sanction reforms that would be dictated to him imperiously and at a fixed date, he had for a long time shown by his conduct his eagerness in investigating and carrying out the desirable ameliorations that were compatible with public security.

But the conflict between Austria and France became bitter. France persisted in asking for the evacuation of Italy by the Austrian troops and the amnesty. Metternich, advancing the pretext that the Pope had need of being succored, imposed certain conditions for the withdrawal of the imperial armies.[37] Besides, he complained of the French government's urgence in its demands. "The French cabinet," he wrote, "abandons itself to its desires with an eagerness that makes it blind to the imprudence of the means it adopts." [38] The impatience of the government of Louis Philippe is understandable. The head of the cabinet, Casimir Périer, ever since he came to power, was sustaining an almost relentless struggle against the revolutionary party.[39] The opening of the Chambers was going to take place on July 23. An interpellation by the left on the occupation of the Roman States by Austria was imminent. The French ambassador, in a conversation with Cardinal Bernetti, set forth that, if Austria had not evacuated the papal territory when the legislative labors were resumed, France would be obliged, for a successful reply to an interpellation, to occupy Civitavecchia and Ancona in order to counterbalance the influence of the court of Vienna in the Papal States.

[37] Metternich, op. cit., Vol. V, letter of June 3, 1831, to Count Apponyi.
[38] Letter of June 4, 1831.
[39] Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, I, 444.

The situation was critical. French and Austrian armies finding themselves in conflict on papal soil, perhaps coming to blows, would create a condition that might be the letting loose of a war. With the tension of the diplomatic relations at that moment, the entente existing between the court of London and that of Paris,[40] the community of ideas which drew together the governments of Prussia and Russia with that of Austria, ran the risk of setting Europe on fire, or at any rate of profoundly disturbing the States of the Church and arousing revolutionary passions. Gregory XVI was ready to stretch to the utmost limits the testimonials of his condescensions. On July 12, 1831, he granted a general amnesty to the insurgents who would sign an act of submission to his authority; but he excepted by name thirty-nine of the ringleaders, among them Mamiani and Pepoli. Three days later he obtained the immediate evacuation of his states by the Austrian troops, but on condition that they would return to lend a strong hand to the papal militia if the tranquillity of the States of the Church should be menaced anew. Were these measures going to put an end to every conflict? [41]

Gregory XVI did not look forward to such a happy result. Though he had momentarily shunted an imminent danger, the deep causes of the crisis from which the Papal States suffered had not disappeared. The inopportune Memorandum, with its [40] England remained, no doubt, at bottom, the rival of France in her general policy; but political complications raised by the Belgian revolution made the two nations proceed in accord. While Austria, Prussia, and Russia viewed with an evil eye the dissolution of the kingdom of the Netherlands and the independence of Belgium, England and France, in sympathy with this revolution, showed a united front to impose this agreement on the powers of the north.

[41] On this occasion, to reward his subjects whose devotedness had sustained him during the crisis, Gregory XVI instituted the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

injunctions about vague reforms, continued to give the revolutionary agitators a point of support and a force which, even if not desired by all the signatories, was nonetheless considerable. Moreover, the situation of the Holy See, without a real army, without important means of defense, offered the sects occasion to resume their conspiracies. The prolegates and the general staffs of the civic guard of Bologna, Forli, and Ravenna organized (December 22, 1831), of their own initiative, a sort of autonomous constitution. They intended to oppose any interference of the papal troops in the Legation. Under a less violent form, this was an insurrection as radical as that which had troubled the States of the Holy See a few months before.

The Pope saw the danger and at once tried to ward it off. Cardinal Albani, whose energy and experience were well known, was made extraordinary commissioner in the four Legations, with most extensive civil and military powers. The pontifical militias, already organized, furnished him with 5,000 men.[42] Unfortunately their military training was not completed; their roll of officers left much to be desired; their action was marked by enthusiasm more than by discipline. When they reached the frontiers of the Legations, they clashed with some troops of peasants, raised by the revolutionary agents, who, with the usual high-sounding words of liberty, independence, and hatred toward the foreigner, had made them fanatics, desperate and ready for anything. Did Cardinal Albani exaggerate the danger? Some historians have thought so. In any event the peril was real, and the need of repressing it was urgent. The Austrians were holding themselves in readiness on the frontiers, resting on their arms. They alone could bring immediate help.

Albani did not hesitate. Without consulting the Pope, whose personal intervention might have stirred up diplomatic complications,[43] he asked General Radetsky, commander-in-chief of the Austrian army, to send him the needed forces, while he himself at the head of the pontifical militia occupied Ferrara, Forli, and Ravenna, Radetsky seized Bologna and all the positions abandoned six months before. In the last days of January, 1832, the authority of the Holy See was restored in all the provinces.

[42] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., I, 517.

Feeling ran high in France. Thus the great efforts exerted by Périer's diplomacy to keep Austria out of Italy and to develop an entente between the Pope and the reformist movement were abruptly rendered vain. What triumphed was Austria and the policy of repression. Guizot, in his Mémoires, expresses the feelings that then stirred the government of Louis Philippe. He says:

> If affairs remained thus, if the French government did not show itself sensible of this failure and prompt to repair it, France would no longer have any consideration or influence in Italy. In France the government did not know what reply to give to the attacks and insults of the opposition. Already it was exasperated, it questioned, it related the griefs of the Italians, the excesses of the soldiers of the Pope, the return of the Austrians in the Legations as rulers. There France had no direct and material interest; but a question of dignity and of national greatness arose, perhaps also of domestic quiet. Périer was not the man to accept this situation idly, and the King shared his view. The Ancona expedition was decided on.[44]

Yet, before carrying out this resolve, the Paris cabinet tried to have the step agreed to by the papal chancery. At the same time that a fleet, under the orders of commandant Gallois and

[43] Croza, ambassador of the King of Sardinia, wrote to his minister (February, 1832): "As to the idea that I have about Cardinal Albani's decision to call the Austrian troops before sounding out the intentions of His Holiness, I am more and more convinced that he did so, not merely because of the urgency of the circumstances, but also to forestall all the possible diplomatic difficulties."

[44] Guizot, op. cit., II, 296.

Colonel Combes, set sail for Ancona, General Cubières was sent to Rome and was instructed to come to an understanding with the French ambassador to give the expedition a direction favorable to the interests and dignity of the Holy See. Unfortunately, by a combination of unforeseen circumstances, as some say, or by a cleverly calculated combination, as others say, while General Cubières' voyage was delayed by contrary winds, the fleet crossed over with unusual speed. At Rome, Count Saint-Aulaire was endeavoring to have Cardinal Bernetti accept a simultaneous military occupation by Austria and by France. Even before General Cubières had landed in Italy, the French fleet appeared in sight of Ancona. It was February 22, 1832. As related by a historian especially well informed on these events,

> Commandmant Gallois found himself in an extremely embarrassing situation. They had received instructions not to do anything without receiving word from the ambassador of France. No one, either at Ancona or at Rome, expected them so soon. They feared, if they delayed one day, to give time for a resistance to be prepared, perhaps even for the arrival of an Austrian force. They were completely unaware of the political situation. Imbued with warlike opinions, favorable to the insurrections, they thought they were headed for hostilities against the Austrians, for an alliance with the Italian revolutionaries. They asked to be allowed to enter the harbor, a permission that was granted in face of their threats. The troops were landed during the night. But they were refused admittance into the city; the city gates were forced. They imprisoned the magistrates, seized the citadel, saying they were allies of the Pope, and had a proclamation printed which seemed to suppose that France was at war with Austria, and that by her arms France was protecting the Italian revolts. Saint-Aulaire was not at all prepared for this grave incident. He was awaiting General Cubières that he might inform the papal government of the resolve to occupy Ancona and he hoped that the Pope, while protesting against this act of hostility, would let it be accomplished without open resistance. Now the question was no longer the same. With armed force and without previous warning, the French, combining deceit and violence, had taken possession of the city, acting as enemies and conquerors.[45]

Says Guizot, the act seemed too contrary to public law and too reckless to be thus committed in a state of complete peace and without the consent either of the Pope or of the allies of France.[46] The Pope was not the only one who protested. At the court of Vienna they declared that the occupation of Ancona was a European affair. Metternich wrote: "If the French government wishes war, it makes a mistake to begin with the Pope." [47] The court of London also gave warning to the court of Paris. But evidently this latter protest, as also that which the Pope addressed to the Powers, concerned less the French occupation than the brutality with which the proceeding was conducted.

Périer put an end to the aroused feelings of the chanceries by declaring that Commandant Gallois and Colonel Combes had exceeded their instructions. The leader of the fleet was recalled to Paris. Saint-Aulaire himself was blamed for not sending someone to Ancona to convey his orders to the force. Excuses were made to Prince Metternich by the French ambassador at Vienna, Marshal Maison. The French government gave orders to the commander of the occupation forces not in any way to favor the revolutionary movements and protested its absolute devotion to the Holy See, declaring that "the preservation of the Pope and the independence of his states would always be, as in the past, the directing motives of its policy in Italy."

In consideration of these assurances, Cardinal Bernetti declared that the court of Rome would recognize the occupation of Ancona as a temporary fact if the French government were willing to accept the following three conditions: not to increase the number of its soldiers, not to construct any fortifications, and to quit Ancona at the same time as the Austrian forces would leave Italy, as soon as the Pope would no longer have need of their help. These conditions were strictly adhered to and followed. The French troops occupied the citadel of Ancona up to the moment of the evacuation of the Papal States by the imperial troops, in 1838, under the minister Molé. If we are to accept the statement of César Cantù, a statesman well situated to know the events in Italy at this period, Cardinal Bernetti had to present a forceful protest against the brutal occupation of Ancona,[48] but really rejoiced at this intervention of France. This occupation of Ancona by the French seemed to him the best counterweight to oppose the domination which Austria sought to force on the Papal States.[49] These sentiments were likewise those of Gregory XVI, who dreaded the hindrances of an oppressive Josephism not less than he did the agitations of a revolutionary liberalism.

[45] Barante, Notice sur M. le comte de Saint-Aulaire, p. 114.

[46] Guizot, op. cit., V, 299.

[47] Metternich, op. cit., Vol. V, letter of February 29 to Count Apponyi.

[48] According to Crétineau-Joly, when Bernetti learned the circumstances of the occupation of Ancona, he said: "Never, since the Saracens, was anything of this sort attempted against the Holy Father." Op. cit., II, 222.

[49] Cantù, Della indipendenza italiana.

CHAPTER XII

Government of the Papal States

GREGORY XVI had to pronounce certain energetic condemnations in the course of his pontificate. The resulting impression seems to have deceived several historians regarding the character of this pope. His great prudence, as we have seen in the history of his diplomatic relations, did not degenerate into grim intolerance; and his conservative spirit did not prevent him, at the opportune time, from carrying out useful reforms. The organizing activity of Gregory XVI was exercised in the administrative, judiciary, financial, military, artistic, and scientific fields.

Prince Metternich passed a severe judgment on the government of Gregory XVI. To his ambassador at Rome he wrote: "The papal government does not know how to govern.[1] . . . The papal government belongs to the category of those that are the least capable of governing." [2] Metternich, who endeavored to substitute the Austrian influence for the papal influence in Italy, had a political interest in speaking thus. Unfortunately many reputable historians have followed his judgment in their evaluations.[3] A conservative, indeed, more inclined to tradition then to novelty, Gregory XVI was also

[1] Metternich, Mémoires, V, 343.

[2] Ibid., p. 315.

[3] As Thureau-Dangin says: "Gregory XVI possessed the virtues of a religious or the science of a theologian rather than the qualities of a statesman. In political and administrative affairs he brought much uprightness with but little openness of mind and no experience at all" (Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, I, 440). The illustrious Roman archaeologist, J. B. de Rossi, a man of broad mind and sound judgment, was indignant whenever he heard such assertions and he resolved on a historic rehabilitation in favor of Gregory XVI, whom he considered a person as just as he was firm, having a remarkable coherent policy. More recently Father Paul Dudon, after inspecting the Vatican archives and those of the French minister of foreign just, prudent, and moderate. The proof of this is furnished by his internal government as also by his foreign policy.

To be convinced of this truth, we need simply read with attention the official report drawn up at Rome by the French ambassador. This report was intended to inform the French government of the reforms which were carried out by Pope Gregory XVI in 1832. We take it from the Mémoires of Guizot, who, in a high spirit of impartiality, thought he ought to insert it among the historic documents that accompany his work. The document, too long for us to quote in full, we here summarize.

The edict (July 5, 1831) concerns largely the administration of the papal domain. This was divided into seventeen delegations, which were subdivided into smaller units. For administrative purposes each entity had a council, which regulated the budget, audited the accounts, apportioned the taxes, and performed other similar functions. In the realm of the administration of justice, the decree introduced a fundamental reform. In Rome alone the variety of courts had fifteen different jurisdictions. These were now simplified, and appeals were regulated in an orderly manner.[4]

Fiscal Reforms

Like reforms were carried out in the financial sphere. Without accepting the injunctions of the Memorandum, Gregory XVI on his own initiative carried out more effective reforms than those asked for by the powers. These called for a meeting at Rome of a central junta. The Pope instituted a permanent affairs in what relates to the most critical acts of this pontiff, namely, those that ended with the condemnation of liberalism, comes to the following conclusion: "Historians have seen in Gregory XVI a Camaldolese monk absorbed in the contemplation of eternal things and foreign to things of this world. This view is fanciful. . . . Without straining the terms, we can say that he was experienced in ecclesiastical affairs." Dudon, Lamennais et le Saint-Siège, p. 115.

---

[4] Guizot, Mémoires, II, 436–46.

commission whose duty it would be to control the accounts of the different administrations. The commission, called the Congregation of Revision, was composed of a cardinal president, four prelates, and four lay deputies, chosen at Rome or in the provinces. Among its functions were the general supervision of the receipts and expenditures of the state, the drawing up of the budgets, and the auditing of the accounts. It was also charged with the liquidation of the public debt. Besides, the commission was to investigate and submit directly to the Pope all the reforms that it judged necessary in the general system of the finances.[5]

The occasion soon arose for recourse to such measures. Floods, epidemics, earthquakes, and the need to assist the victims of these calamities burdened the treasury heavily.[6] Financial difficulties increased in consequence of the revolt of 1832, which required the organization of an army and the appeal to Austria. Says a biographer of Gregory XVI: "We must say that the devotion of Austria, so urgently asked to come to the rescue of the Holy See, was not at all disinterested. Undeniably well known is the fact that to maintain public tranquillity in the Papal States would be a heavy drain on the papal treasury." [7] To meet these difficulties, Gregory XVI alienated some possessions of the Church, levied a tax on the goods of the clergy, ordered a reduction in the salaries of his employes, was even obliged to resort to borrowing and to the re-establishment to their former rate of certain taxes that had been reduced at the outset of his pontificate. But the Pope himself watched that these measures should be accomplished with order and method. To simplify the transactions, he issued new money, more fully in accord with the decimal system.[8]

The agitations in the Papal States compelled the Pope to [5] Guizot, op. cit., p. 445.

[6] Wiseman, Recollections of the Last Four Popes, p. 359.
[7] Sylvain, Grégoire XVI et son pontificat, p. 123.
[8] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 359.

think of the military organization. In this branch of the government, as in the administrative, judiciary, and financial departments, he showed the qualities of a far-sighted and attentive statesman. He instituted a body of volunteers for the purpose of maintaining order in the Legations and the Marches. The members of this new militia promised under oath to defend the Holy See even to the shedding of their blood and not to lay down their arms before the submission of the rebels would be complete. The subjects of the Papal States replied generously to the Pope's first appeal. In a short time the number of the pontifical volunteers rose to 50,000 men. Gregory XVI supplemented the defense measures required by the circumstances, engaging and paying two Swiss regiments whose recruiting he entrusted to two officers that had served Charles X; they were Colonel Salies and Colonel Courten.

The political cares of Gregory XVI were great in the first two years of his pontificate. But they did not make him neglect the economic and social reforms which he judged useful for the material and moral well-being of his subjects. Those who tax this Pontiff with indifference or inattention in that respect, undoubtedly have not remarked that in 1832 the Pope had already started at Tivoli the extensive works that succeeded five years later in diverting the course of the Anio and consequently in saving the district from the disasters which that river caused every year by its sudden floods; that he undertook the restoration of the Forum, continued the adornment of the Pincio, reconstructed the basilica of St. Paul, established the seat of the Academy of Archaeology in the Roman College, improved the hospice of St. Michael, and favored the foundation of a Chamber of Commerce at Rome. Subsequently he continued these reforms by introducing, in the system of customs duties of the Papal States, wisely calculated changes of a sort to favor commercial freedom without in any way impairing the interests of the treasury. He fixed the age of majority at twenty-one years, thus facilitating the making of contracts; he authorized foreigners to acquire territorial property in the Roman state; he created a discount bank in the interests of commerce, and a savings bank for persons in moderate circumstances; he organized mobile columns of dragoons to repress brigandage and make travel safe; he established a bureau of statistics that enabled him to keep track of the shifting of the population and of changes in other affairs.[9] He repaired and embellished the monastery of St. Gregory together with the surrounding roads. He exercised watchful care that the prices of primary necessities did not rise too high; he founded evening schools for apprentices and workmen; he took effective measures to prevent the excessive raising of rents; and, during the terrible cholera epidemic that desolated the city of Rome in 1837, he organized works of assistance with a zeal to which Cardinal Wiseman bears witness.[10] Cardinal Hergenröther says that we must indeed recognize that Gregory's aptitudes led him to engage in strictly religious questions rather than in negotiations that concern temporal interests. But his devotion to the improvement of the condition of the popular classes is beyond dispute and, in his own time, he was loudly proclaimed by the people themselves. We need only recall the enthusiastic ovations that marked his journeys in August and October, 1841, to Loreto, and in May, 1843, to Anagni, Frosinone, and Terracina.[11]

[9] Sylvain, op. cit., pp. 122, 246, 290–328.

[10] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 359.

[11] Hergenröther, Kirchengeschichte, III, Part I, chap. 8. Gregory XVI has been reproached with three chief faults from the viewpoint of the temporal administration of the Papal States. He has been accused: 1. with being opposed to the construction of railroads in his states; 2. with favoring the rapid enrichment of the Torlonia family to the detriment of the public treasury; 3. with having forbidden his subjects to participate in scientific congresses. The first of these three has some foundation. Like many of his contemporaries, Gregory XVI had some misgivings regarding the new method of travel. He feared especially that it would become, in his states, an active agency of the cosmopolitan revolution. But his apprehension was in no way prompted by a preconceived opposition to material progress. He eagerly adopted

The progress of sciences, letters, and arts did not leave Gregory XVI indifferent. The Roman universities had to interrupt their courses during the disturbances of 1831 and 1832, but they were reopened in the autumn of 1833, and learned men were called to teach there. Under the Pope's auspices the publication of the great Bullarium Romanum was undertaken; the Pope rewarded with the purple the scholarly labors of Mai and Mezzofanti. He encouraged the first philosophical work of Rosmini, the historical publications of Crétineau-Joly, and the artistic works of Overbeck; he enriched the zoological museum of the Gregorian University and founded two new museums in the Vatican (the Etruscan museum and the Egyptian museum); in the papal palace itself his faithful servant Moroni compiled that important Dizionario di erudizione whose 300 volumes give us, not only the fruit of immense researches, but also valuable details on the Roman institutions of the time of Gregory XVI and on the person of the Pontiff.[12]

We have sketched the progress realized by Pope Gregory in the administrative, judiciary, financial, economic, and intellectual realms in governing his own states. This sketch suffices to show that, if he refused to let himself be led by the liberal movement which the Memorandum of the powers wished to steamboats, seeing in their invention a powerful means of serving the commercial and moral interests of the Old World and the New World (Sylvain, p. 246). As for the enrichment of the Torlonia family, that cannot be made a complaint against the administration of Gregory XVI. Upon taking possession of the Holy See, the Pontiff found the administration of the tobacco trade in a deplorable state. The wastage and various other abuses were numberless. Knowing the impossibility of curing the situation by himself amid the cares thrust on him by the revolt of part of his states, he decided to auction off this administration. The Torlonia family, having obtained the concession by lawful and regular means, derived great profits from it, but without depriving the treasury of any of its ordinary resources. As for the third complaint, the prohibition of the Pope's subjects from taking part in scientific or literary congresses is to be explained by the fact that these congresses were nothing more than cleverly imagined means for spreading the revolutionary doctrines of the secret societies (Sylvain, p. 255).

---

[12] Notably XXXII, 312–28, s.v. Gregorio XVI. See also, under the words Ferrara and Forli, for the revolutions in the Papal States.

impose on him, he was able to carry out what was reasonable and practical in that movement. The study of his diplomatic relations with different governments and his intervention in the great disputes that agitated them after the revolution of 1830 will show him at grips with similar problems on a vaster scale.

CHAPTER XIII

The Church in Portugal and Spain

THE government of the Papal States was faced with many internal political questions. But the relations with the various states of Europe presented more burdensome difficulties to Gregory XVI. Austria and the Catholic powers that gravitated in her orbit, such as Spain and Portugal, represented the tradition, order, authority, and official protection of the Holy See; but their intentions were sometimes annoying and their services indiscreet. Belgium, Ireland, and Poland had valiantly fought for their Catholic faith. But they did so while attacking the authorities reputed legitimate, invoking mottoes that seemed dubious, and accepting alliances that appeared compromising. Such causes of anxiety presented themselves when people lent an ear to the fiery polemics that violently stirred the youth of the time.

No one showed more fearlessness in defending the rights of the papacy than did Lamennais in France, or Goerres in Germany. But none showed themselves more favorable to the modern liberties, for the high-sounding formulas that seduce the masses, for the demands of the people against the undertakings of the kings. Gregory XVI was following the profoundly conservative tendency that was in his nature and that he believed was his duty. He did not always succeed in perceiving the fine points of a problem; sometimes such or such an aspect of a political situation escaped his attention; in the expressions of his decisions he did not in every case restrain a vivacity that pained those he had to strike. But who, considering the circumstances we have recalled above, can make them a crime? That his general conduct was too often prompted by an ill-restrained passion and by a fierce stubbornness or by excessive narrowness of mind, is a calumny which an impartial study of the events will suffice to dissipate.

In short, two questions filled the public mind. The first question, regarding the attitude which the Holy See would take toward the governments that sprang from the recent revolutions, aroused especially the concern of the chanceries. The second question, regarding the conflicts that arose within the nations between liberty and authority, was especially discussed in the press. The first was the one that most insistently called for a solution.

Should the Pope establish diplomatic relations with the governments of France and Belgium, born of the revolt? For him to do so might be looked upon as encouraging rebellion, might seem to sanction that revolutionary movement which aimed at undermining the thrones and upsetting society. On the other hand, to refuse to treat with the new powers might be to leave the Church without defense and without protection in the nations from whom religion could expect much. A few years earlier, Pope Leo XII, finding himself faced with the fact of the declaration of independence by the Spanish colonies of America, had solved practically a similar question by entering into official relations, in spite of Spain, with the young American republics. But the hour seemed to have arrived for the proclamation of a general principle, intended to serve as a rule in all analogous cases. Ireland and Poland were still on edge, ready for anything to defend their rights against England and Russia respectively. Dom Pedro and Dom Miguel were in conflict over the throne of Portugal; Don Carlos and Maria Christina, over that of Spain. Such contests might arise also with other nations.

Gregory's decision was set forth in a constitution beginning Sollicitudo ecclesiarum. He decided that, in the cases of change of government and of vicissitudes of the states, "the Roman Pontiffs would enter into relations, for the Churches of those countries, with those who were de facto in possession of the power; but of course the Holy See did not intend to confirm them in their offices nor to confer on them any sort of new rights." [1]

Says Cardinal Wiseman: "At the moment when changes were rapidly made in governments and dynasties, and when scepters passed from hand to hand with the rapidity of magical or illusory exhibitions, it was at once bold and prudent to lay down simple principles by which the judgment of the Holy See might be easily anticipated; at the same time that it kept itself clear of all internal disputes and embarrassing appeals during actual contests." [2]

Portugal

At the beginning of Gregory's pontificate two parties were at strife in Portugal. In one respect the conflict was of a purely dynastic order. King John VI died in 1826, leaving two sons. The elder, Dom Pedro, who was living in Brazil and had just had himself proclaimed emperor, considered himself the lawful successor of his father. But, declining to reign in Portugal, he ceded his rights to his daughter Dona Maria de Gloria, a seven-year-old child, and designated as regent his younger brother Dom Miguel, to whom he promised the hand of the young queen. At first Dom Miguel seemed to accept this arrangement. But a party, the soul of which was Dona Joachina, the queen mother, formally rejected it.

[1] Barberi, XIX, 38–40; Bernasconi, I, 38–40. The principle proclaimed by Gregory XVI rested on certain precedents. Clement V, John XXII, Pius II, and Clement XI were moved in these acts that are recalled by the bull Sollicitudo ecclesiarum. We need not remark that the doctrine here proclaimed by Gregory XVI has nothing in common with the famous theory of the fait accompli, the expression of which would be condemned by Pius IX in proposition 61 of the Syllabus: "An injustice de facto crowned with success does not impair the sanctity of right."

[2] Wiseman, Recollections of the Last Four Popes, p. 341.

Dom Miguel, so they said, had the right to the crown as direct and lawful successor of his father. This they maintained by virtue of the ancient laws of the kingdom, which prescribed that no foreigner could reign in Portugal.[3] They declared that Pedro had become a foreigner by accepting the crown of Brazil, which had cut itself off from Portugal. Having thus lost his rights, he could not pass them on to someone else. Basically what rendered the opposition of the two parties irreconcilable was that Dom Pedro, having abdicated the crown, promulgated a charter for Portugal, establishing a constitutional monarchy similar to that of the French Restoration. The queen mother never accepted such a lessening of the sovereign power. The open and well-known opposition that she manifested toward her husband, King John, during the whole time of his reign, was caused by his acceptance of a constitution, and Dom Miguel had consistently shown himself favorable to his mother's ideas. The conflict between the Miguelists and the Pedrists, as they were called, was thus a conflict between absolutists and constitutionalists. On this basis Dom Miguel soon took a stand with the Spanish Carlists and the two French legitimists, and Dom Pedro won the sympathies of the liberals of France and England. Marshal Bourmont and Marquis La Rochejaquelein placed their swords at the service of Dom Miguel. The absolutist courts of the north were favorable to him; but the courts of London and Paris declared their opposition to him.

Moreover, the secret societies, always eager to seize upon the liberal movement and to echo in the ears of the people, according to the orders of Mazzini, the words "liberty, reform, progress," declared for Dom Pedro; while Dona Joachina and Dom

[3] An old tradition relates that in 1139 Alphonso I had been elected king by his soldiers on the field of battle of Ourique after a brilliant victory over the Moors; the three orders of the realm then acclaimed him, and the archbishop of Braga crowned him, having decided, in the name of the people, in the name of the king, and in the name of God, that never would a foreigner become lord of the kingdom. Therein, they said, was the fundamental formal pact of the Portuguese monarchy.

Miguel promised to restore the Jesuits in Portugal and to have the Catholic religion prevail there in all the strength of its hierarchy subject to the Roman Pontiff. The members of the clergy as a whole acclaimed Dom Miguel and had him acclaimed by the faithful, with cries of "Long live the Catholic king! Long live the absolute king!" But several of them, such as the patriarch of Lisbon and the bishop of Elvas, who had been president of the Chamber of Deputies under King John IV, did not hide their sympathy for the constitutional regime.

Gregory XVI, conformable to the rule of procedure which he had outlined and despite the demands of the Pedrists, agreed to enter into diplomatic relations with Dom Miguel and carried on negotiations with his government so long as the younger son of John VI effectively occupied the throne. But Dom Pedro, backed by England and France, succeeded in driving his brother from the kingdom and conferring the crown on his daughter, Dona Maria. Dom Miguel (May 26, 1834), vanquished and discouraged, agreed, in consideration of a pension of 375,000 francs, never to return to Portugal and he retired to Rome, where the Pope received him with every consideration due to his former dignity, to his misfortune, and to the good will he had manifested toward the Church.

But the master of Portugal, Dom Pedro, was irritated at the support his rival had received among the Portuguese clergy and the friendly relations he enjoyed with the Pope. Egged on by the sects, which had made themselves his powerful auxiliaries in his campaign, he determined to make the Church expiate dearly for what he called its treason. The Jesuits, whom his brother had recalled and to whom he had restored all the goods which the great persecution of the eighteenth century had taken from them, were driven out, after being dragged from prison to prison and being treated outrageously. Dom Miguel, yielding to the promptings of his mother and his own instincts, authoritarian and violent, often showed himself merciless to his enemies. At 40,000 is estimated the number of those he exiled, and well known was the sort of cruel treatment he dealt out to the French nationals, thereby drawing on himself the severe repression which the French government inflicted on him.[4] By way of reprisal, Dom Pedro closed a large number of religious houses, hospices, and ecclesiastical colleges, and transferred their property to the treasury. To show his hostility toward the Holy See and the Portuguese clergy, he expelled the nuncio, suppressed the nunciature, declared vacant all the bishoprics that had been filled by the Supreme Pontiff in accord with his predecessor, and instituted a commission whose function it would be to proceed to a general reform of the clergy.

In a consistorial allocution (September 30, 1833) the Pope deplored "the grave evils that afflicted the Church of Portugal and the shameful misdeeds, the more to be lamented inasmuch as the Holy See had the less reason to expect them." [5] Again (August 1, 1834) the Pope repeated his protests and threatened the prince with the canonical penalties which his outrages merited.[6] After Dom Pedro's death (September 24, 1834), Queen Maria da Gloria, his daughter, continued his policy for a while and, in the consistory of February 1, 1836, the Pope was constrained to denounce once more the outrages of the Portuguese government.[7] In 1840, a reaction took place. Queen Maria II sent Viscount Carriera to negotiate a concordat with [4] Two Frenchmen, residing at Lisbon, had been condemned, one to public flogging for sacrilege, the other, for his revolutionary connections, to deportation. A French fleet forced the entrance of the Tagus, captured the Portuguese fleet, blockaded Lisbon, and compelled Miguel to grant all the reparations demanded by the French government (July, 1831). The domineering and harsh character of Dom Miguel is undeniable. But the hatred of the sects has blackened the memory of this prince, and the judgments of the liberal press about his person and his acts need to be carefully checked.

[5] Barberi, XIX, 276; Roskovany, Monumenta catholica pro independentia potestatis ecclesiasticae, II. 336–40.

[6] Roskovany, II, 363–66; Barberi, XIX, 381.

[7] Bernasconi, Acta Gregorii papae XVI, II, 93.

the Pope. Gregory required, as a preliminary condition, that the bishops appointed under Miguel I should be recognized and that the Queen should revoke the prohibition against recourse to Rome for dispensations. The negotiations were resumed and, in testimony of his satisfaction, the Holy Father sent (March 12, 1842) the golden rose [8] to the Queen of Portugal.

Spain

The political crisis in Portugal was complicated by the nearness of a similar crisis in Spain. There also the absolutists and constitutionals were in conflict. The Pope was called upon to take a stand regarding two parties between which the great powers of Europe took opposite attitudes and in which the religious views, mingled with political feelings, assumed a militant, almost violent, aspect.

Ferdinand VII, king of Spain, died September 20, 1833. He bequeathed his crown to his daughter Isabella, who was three years old and was placed under the guardianship of the queen mother Maria Christina. Don Carlos, Ferdinand's brother, who contested the lawfulness of a female succession, at once became the rival of his niece and had been proclaimed in Biscay. The old Spanish law admitted women to the throne. The Bourbon dynasty in 1714 had substituted for this right, if not the Salic law, at least a pragmatic sanction which limited the succession to the case of the absence of any male heir. Charles IV, in 1789, revoked this pragmatic sanction and re-established the former Spanish law; in 1830 Ferdinand solemnly published his confirmation of this revocation. Apparently, then, the question of law was settled in favor of the women's right. But a party strife complicated matters. The absolutists counted on Don [8] Bernasconi, III, 204. This was the rose blessed by the pope on Laetare Sunday. Ever since the Middle Ages the Supreme Pontiff used to send it to some Catholic prince. See Goschler, Dictionnaire de théologie, s.v. Rose d'or.

Carlos; Maria Christina favored the liberals. The former were thus interested in the male succession; the latter, in the female. A conflict of influences and intrigues followed between the two parties during the last years of Ferdinand, each seeking to obtain a royal act in favor of his contention. The King wavered between his affection for his daughter and his sympathies for the absolutist party. For a moment this party seemed to have won the day. But its triumph was of short duration. Ferdinand retracted everything that had been wrung from him by the partisans of the male succession, and he died proclaiming the rights of his daughter.[9] France and England promptly declared themselves in favor of Maria Christina, whereas Austria, Russia, and Prussia stoutly maintained their sympathy for Don Carlos.[10]

After thus attaining to power, Maria Christina adopted a complete parliamentary regime, and unfortunately, in Spain as in France, the beginnings of this regime were marked by acts of hostility toward the Church. The Spanish Cortes (April, 1835), confronted by serious financial difficulties, proposed to solve them by secularization of the property of the religious. In vain the minister president of the council, Martinez de la Rosa, tried to proceed with respect for the canonical rules and practices. The Chamber, after replacing the cabinet over which he presided by a cabinet favorable to the strife against the Church, obliged (July 4, 1835) the regent to sign a decree expelling the Jesuits; three weeks later, a second decree suppressing 757 religious houses that contained less than a dozen members each.[11]

At this news Gregory XVI at once recalled his nuncio, [9] Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, II, 389.

[10] Metternich, Mémoires, V, 640.

[11] Martinez de la Rosa, negotiating with Rome for the diminution in the number of these almost empty monasteries and consequently the placing of part of their possessions at the disposal of the nation, endeavored to put an end to the financial crisis. But the sectarian passion of the opposition did not enable him to follow up the project.

Amato de Santo Philippo, who, recently arrived in Spain, was about to present his credentials to Maria Christina. Then (February 1, 1836), in a consistorial allocution the Pope denounced the latest acts of the Spanish government and declared them null. He declared: "To the calamities of Portugal are now added those of Spain. There also laws are promulgated which are contrary to the authority of the Apostolic See." [12]

However, the Pope refrained from a declaration in favor of Don Carlos. This he did in spite of the pressure brought to bear on him by the legitimists of France, the Miguelists of Portugal, the Carlists of Spain, and the chancery of Austria. But the clergy of Spain did not imitate his reserve. The greater number of them openly embraced the cause of the pretender, favored the enrollment of his partisans and the activities of his army. For seven years a bitter civil war embraced Navarre, Catalonia, Castille, and Aragon, a war of partisans and surprise attacks, in which the two parties engaged in cruelties in return for cruelties.[13] The government revenged itself by depriving the priests of their support, by suspending from the religious the pension that was their due, and by leaving the dioceses without bishops. The coming of a moderate majority in the Cortes in 1839 brought about a calm. Some of the measures against the Church were revoked, and negotiations were again taken up with the Holy See for filling the vacant dioceses.

The Carlists, active, determined, commanded by able leaders, whose principal chief, Zumalacarreguy, combined to a rare degree the qualities of warrior, party leader, and popular hero, had at first obliged to draw back to the very gates of Madrid the poorly disciplined forces of the Christinos. But Zumalacarreguy's death in 1835, the appearance at the head of Maria Christina's army of an experienced and courageous leader,

[12] Bernasconi, II, 93.

[13] General Mina in cold blood had the mother and the three sisters of the Carlist Cabrera put to death. Cabrera, in reprisal, had 300 Christinos prisoners shot.

Espartero, and the deplorable divisions of the Carlists into "apostolics," who wished a war to the finish, and "transactionists," who wished to put an end to the war by a compromise, gave new daring to the liberals. Espartero, vanquisher of the Carlists, was named regent in 1840. He increased all the preceding outrages and had the representative of the Holy See taken to the frontier.

In the consistory of March 1, 1841, Gregory XVI voiced a protest more energetic than the previous ones. To the members of the government who had passed laws prejudicial to the rights of the Church and to the clergy who had cooperated in these wrongs, he recalled the grave censures which they had incurred.[14] The fall of Espartero in 1843, the proclamation of the majority of Isabella in 1844, and the coming of a conservative ministry permitted the new queen to inaugurate a policy more worthy of the old traditions of Spain. In 1845 a plenipotentiary was sent to Rome with a view to concluding a concordat with the Holy See. Gregory XVI, after laboring in its preparation, did not have the consolation of signing it. This was reserved to his successor, Pius IX.

[14] Bernasconi, III, 109–12.

CHAPTER XIV

The Church in Poland and Switzerland

Poland

LESS complex in its causes but sharper in its manifestations, was the political and religious crisis that kept stirring and dividing Poland and Russia. On one side was an oppressed people to whom the Church was greatly indebted for having been, more than once, the bulwark of Christendom on its eastern front. This people, armed, asked that its faith be respected, that its promised liberties be maintained, those liberties pledged by the very treaties that had stripped them of their nationality. On the other side, a mighty empire which, for a quarter of a century, had become the defender of the principles of tradition and legitimacy, asked the Pope, the born protector of the social order, to defend it against the spirit of revolt and revolution. There was to be encountered, with its disconcerting equivocations, that eternal question of liberalism, which would trouble Europe so profoundly in the course of the nineteenth century.

The common father of the faithful could not but be keenly moved by the heroism of those Polish Catholics who braved death and a captivity harder than death when fighting under the noble watchword of their fathers: "We love liberty more than anything else in the world, and the Catholic religion more than liberty." [1] But he was aware that in Poland, as in Italy, Belgium, and France, the sects were endeavoring to exploit the popular uprising to their advantage, that many Poles identified the religious cause with the political cause, that some were captivated by the high-sounding watchwords of revolutionary liberalism. The Russian diplomats exaggerated these facts and generalized them, representing the Polish insurrection as a serious danger to the tranquillity of Europe. The Czar appealed to the Pope to intervene and to summon the Poles to obedience. The Czar insinuated that the Pope, by his silence, made himself responsible for the measures of violent repression that would surely be provoked by his refusal to intervene.[2]

[1] This was the watchword adopted by the Polish Catholics during the persecution of Catherine II.

Gregory XVI judged that he should yield to the insistence of the Russian government. To the Polish clergy he addressed an encyclical (June 9, 1832) [3] in which, without referring to any other question, he reminded them of the maxims of the Catholic Church regarding submission to temporal powers. Accepting as true the one-sided allegations of the Russian minister, he said: "We have learned that the frightful calamities which have desolated your kingdom have their sole source in the doings of some who make use of wiles and lies, who, under pretext of religion, in our distressful age, raise their head against the power of the princes."

The effect produced by this letter was deplorable. Emperor Nicholas, not satisfied with having it read and spread everywhere, presented it as an approbation of his policy, as an excommunication of the rebels. Then, taking advantage of the stupefaction into which the Poles were plunged by this interpretation of the encyclical, he increased the violence and hypocrisy of his persecutions. A decree of 1832 ordered that all children of mixed marriages be brought up in the schism; that all the religious schools and seminaries of the uniate rites be closed, and the pupils of these institutions be constrained to follow the courses of a schismatic university.

[2] Note sent to the Holy Father (April 20, 1832) by Prince Gagarin, Russian minister at Rome. See the principal passages of this note in Lescœur, L'église catholique en Pologne, p. 49.

[3] Bernasconi, I, 143.

Gregory XVI, profiting by the occasion of his pacific encyclical addressed to the Poles, sent to the Russian embassy a confidential note concerning the outrages directed against the Catholic religion in the imperial domains. No reply was given to this note. It was followed by a second note (September 6, 1832) in which fresh grievances were detailed. Instead of giving any attention to it, the Czar instructed his minister Guriew to present the Pope with a long memorial which, dated May, 1833, reached the utmost limits of insolence and hypocrisy. Said the Russian minister: "The clergy are the ones who, by their culpable and ungrateful conduct, have rent the pact which assured them the peaceful enjoyment of the benefits flowing from it. The government returns to the full exercise of its rights of conqueror. . . . To the government alone pertains the decision about the means it judges most effective to forestall new disorders." [4]

In short, the unfortunate condition of Poland, instead of improving in consequence of the encyclical, was made worse. The Pope understood that he had made a mistake in yielding to the Czar's demands. Sometime later he said to General Zamoyski, who represented the Polish Catholics: "I never disapproved of you, but I was deceived in regard to you. I was disturbed by threats. I trembled at thought of the persecution that would be let loose on you. I yielded to a veritable demand." [5] And when, in 1840, the knight Furhmann, in a report, sought to explain the removal of thousands of Polish children, who were transported to Siberia because their parents refused to apostatize,[6] Gregory, in the presence of the cardinals gathered in consistory, delivered a solemn allocution (July 22, 1842) which made a deep impression. The Pope said:

[4] Quoted by Lescœur, op. cit., p. 69.
[5] Lescœur, pp. 55–61.
[6] Ibid., pp. 71–78.

The time has come to speak. What we have done without ceasing, for the defense of the rights of the Catholic Church in the Russian Empire, the public does not know. . . . The enemies of the Holy See, with the hereditary deception that distinguishes them, spread the rumor that we are covering with our silence the great evils by which a part of our flock was crushed and that we had thus almost abandoned the cause of the Catholic religion. We owe to God, to religion, and to ourselves to reject far from us even a suspicion of so outrageous an insult. Such is the reason why all the consequence of the efforts undertaken by us in behalf of the Catholic Church in the Russian Empire has been set forth in a special paper.[7]

In this restrained and enlightening exposition, Gregory, with apostolic simplicity and vigor, told the whole world that touching story of weakness in the grip of force, of truth unarmed in conflict with perfidious violence. And all Europe, Catholic or Protestant, liberal or not, read this pathetic account with a feeling and sympathy that did honor to human nature.[8]

Three years later (December 13, 1845) the Czar arrived at Rome at four o'clock in the morning. He alighted at the Giustiniani palace, the residence of his representative, at once sent word to the Vatican, and asked for an audience. Gregory replied that he would receive the monarch that day at half-past eleven. What took place in the interview that the Pope and the Emperor had together? No report of it was ever revealed during the lifetime of Gregory XVI, who, when asked, merely replied: "I said whatever the Holy Ghost prompted me to say." However, sufficient evidences were known that the Vicar of Christ worthily represented his master before the crowned persecutor. Cardinal Wiseman reports the following:

An English gentleman was in the same part of the palace through which the imperial visitor passed as he returned from his interview, and described his altered appearance. He had entered with his usual firm and royal aspect, grand, as it was from statue-like features, stately frame, and martial bearing; free and at his ease, with gracious looks and condescending gestures of salutation. So he passed through the long suite of ante-rooms, the Imperial eagle, glossy, fiery, "with plumes unruffled, and with eye unquenched," in all the glory of pinions which no flight had ever wearied, of beak and talon which no prey had yet resisted. He came forth again, with head uncovered, and hair, if it can be said of man, disheveled; haggard and pale, looking as though in an hour he had passed through the condensation of a protracted fever; taking long strides, with stooping shoulders, unobservant, unsaluting: he waited not for his carriage to come to the foot of the stairs, but rushed out into the outer court, and hurried away from apparently the scene of a discomfiture. It was the eagle dragged from his eyrie among the clefts of the rocks, "from his nest among the stars," his feathers crumpled, and his eye quelled, by a power till then despised.[9]

[7] Bernasconi, III, 223.
[8] Lescœur, p. 80.

Twenty-one years later we have a new account of the situation of the Catholics in Russia. In this report Pius IX revealed the details of the interview of 1845. Gregory entered into the heart of the question, without hesitation recalling to the Emperor the laws of the Empire which most wounded the Catholics, and the deeds of brutality with which the laws had been applied; and he handed to the Emperor a written account in which all these things were vouched for by supporting documents. Nicholas left with a promise that he would suppress all the abuses with which he would become acquainted; and undoubtedly we must attribute to this interview the origin of the concordat which the Czar signed (August 3, 1847) with the successor of Gregory XVI. The European press was almost unanimous in paying just tribute to the Pope as soon as it knew the significance of this audience. As the journal La Réform said, "The conflict of right against might is always a magnificent spectacle. The papacy has shown itself worthy of its finest days. Justice, right, and liberty have found an interpreter in the Roman sanctuary. The modern conscience can rest satisfied." [10]

[9] Wiseman, op. cit., p. 406.

Thus spoke an important organ of the liberal press, happy to see a despot's outrages condemned by the Roman Pontiff. To be just, we should add that, at this same period, Gregory XVI was obliged to condemn, with equal energy, certain acts no less prejudicial to the laws of the Church, committed by a purely democratic government, that of Switzerland.

Switzerland

One of the wisest decisions of the Congress of Vienna had been to assure the neutrality of the Swiss Republic. This it did by granting its federal constitution to it under the guaranty of the great European powers. Setting aside the centralized constitution which Napoleon had given it in 1803 and which did not correspond to the traditions and the needs of a country fashioned for centuries to cantonal and communal independence, the allied monarchies had stipulated that each canton would preserve its absolute sovereignty and also gave guaranties to prevent any one of them from ever prevailing over the others. Nevertheless a diet, composed of the deputies of the twenty-two cantons, with one vote for each canton, was to meet in turn at Zurich, Bern, and Lucern, to deliberate on common concerns and to smooth internal differences. But this solution was not accepted equally by all. Whereas the "federals" were attached to the revival of their old traditions, the "radicals" worked for the formation of a more centralized state, which they hoped to bring under their sway. Reduced to these terms, the conflict remained purely political. What enhanced its importance was that, as in France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, and [10] One of the most stirring episodes of the persecution of the Polish Catholics by the Russian government is the story of the hateful treatments inflicted on the Basilian religious of Minsk. See Martyre de sœur Irena Macrina Mieczysloska et de ses compagnes en Pologne.

Russia, as almost everywhere at that time, the social question, the religious question, and the political question were closely intermingled.

After the revolution of 1830, Switzerland became a land of asylum for all the revolutionary refugees of the various countries. Bands of French, Italian, and German fugitives made it a common meeting place. In 1834 thither they called the famous conspirator, Mazzini. This man, on April 15 of that year, created at Bern a cosmopolitan alliance under the name of Young Europe. The alliance centralized the efforts of several particular societies, confederated together: the Young Italy, the Young Germany, and the Young Swiss.[11] The spirit of Freemasonry inspired all these associations. The authorities of Geneva, in January, 1834, arrested some bands of suspect refugees; but the cantonal powers of Bern and Vaud allowed them to organize.

The radical party, whose tendencies they seconded, soon made common cause with them. Mazzini stayed two years in Switzerland. He was exceedingly active, bringing there that spirit ever hostile to Catholicism, opposed to the monarchies, but deist and mystical, which seduced the young men of the time. His motto was: "Liberty, equality, humanity, one God, one sovereign, the law of God." His followers were taken mostly from the well-to-do classes: lawyers, doctors, professors, officers. He gave it out that he was a foe of the Carbonari, but he employed the same methods, partial uprisings, and the murder of princes and traitors.[12] During Mazzini's sojourn in Switzerland we see the beginning and growth of all those scientific, historical, literary, and agricultural associations which became effective means of revolutionary propaganda and which later spread in Italy to the great harm of religion and good [11] Later were formed the Young France, the Young Poland, and the Young Spain.

[12] Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 317; Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 274; Eckert, Magazin der Beweisfürung für Verurtheilung des Freimaurer Ordens, II, 218.

social order.[13] Meanwhile the radicals, who had arrived in power in the cantons of Solothurn, Zurich, Aargau, and Basel, abolished all seigniorial rights, the rights of the bourgeoisie, and all privileges; they favored Protestant and impious propaganda, and multiplied hindrances to the Catholic works.

The federalist party, attached to the best traditions of the country, feared the revolutionary agitation and was heartily backed by the Catholics. In some cantons, flourishing colleges directed by the Jesuits spread the true Roman doctrines among the youth and the bourgeoisie. A devout and well-trained clergy labored to give the people a solid nourishment, equally removed from childish superstitions and from dangerous novelties. This clergy was divided in five dioceses, which were subject to no metropolitan but were directly dependent on the Holy See, represented by a nuncio who resided at Lucern. The Catholics, led to organize themselves for the defense of their beliefs and of their institutions, had three principal leaders: the lawyer Meyer, who placed his remarkable legal and diplomatic talents at the service of the cause; the magistrate Siegwart-Muller, a sincere Catholic and convinced democrat; a peasant of the district of Schwytz, Joseph Leu, a simple man but one of valiant faith and a natural eloquence that moved the masses.

Four notable incidents marked the strife that arose between the two parties and that would end under Pius IX in the Sonderbund War. These were: 1. the plan to modify the federal pact in 1832; 2. the Baden conference in 1834; 3. the forcible coup of the radical party against the conservative government of the canton of Vaud in January, 1845; 4. the formation of an alliance between the seven Catholic cantons of Switzerland in December, 1845.

A revision of the federal pact, permitting the radical and Protestant majority of the diet to govern the civil and religious administration of each canton was the first step in the program of the radical party. For its preparation they called upon the skill of an eminent lawyer, whom we shall meet several times in the course of this history, Pellegrino Rossi. Born at Carrara in 1787, he became a doctor of law in 1806, professor of civil procedure and of penal law at Bologna in 1814, then of Roman law at Geneva. He was celebrated for the part he took in 1815 in the ephemeral undertaking of Murat, king of Naples and by the publication in 1818 of a treatise on penal law which brought him a reputation as a great criminologist. Honored with the right of citizenship at Geneva in 1819, a member of the Geneva council from 1820 on, he was reputed in Italy, France, and Switzerland, not only as a jurist, but also as an orator and statesman, and he was certainly at that time the personage that the Swiss confederation was most proud of. A Catholic, like his fellow countrymen Silvio Pellico and Manzoni, like them he had taken part in the liberal movement in Italy and perhaps belonged to Carbonarism. His moderate opinions connected him to the school that was represented in France by Guizot, Royer-Collard, and Villemain. No one seemed better fitted to draw up and lead to success a revision of the federal pact. The project which he was appointed to report in the federal diet meeting at Lucern in 1832, was prompted by the imperial act of 1803. It transferred to the diet the most important of the powers which, since 1814, had belonged to the authorities of the individual cantons.

[13] Paolo Menacci, Memorie documentate per la storia della rivoluzione italiana, I, 10.

This move was the crushing of the Catholics. The three primitive cantons of Uri, Schwytz, and Unterwald assembled at Sarnen the representatives of the cantons that wished to maintain the federal pact. The Catholic cantons answered the call. They formed, indeed, only a weak minority. But the cause they were defending became easily popular. The peasants and shepherds of the little cantons lacked confidence in a constitution that might strip them of their traditional rights to the advantage of the people of the cities and the big cantons. Besides, in spite of the dissolution of the league of Sarnen, and in spite of the skillful modifications proposed by the learned jurist, when the new constitution, approved by the diet on July 17, 1832, was submitted to the vote of the cantons, the majority of them rejected it. This was a victory for Catholicism and liberty.

But the sect which in this affair had in view the defeat of Catholicism did not consider itself beaten. On January 20, 1834, some delegates of the cantons of Bern, Lucern, Solothurn, Thurgau, Basel-Land, Saint Gall, and Aargau met at Baden. The presiding officer of the meeting, Edward Pfiffer, declared in his opening address that Switzerland should be independent in religious as in political matters. Then he proposed the measures which, according to him, would assure that independence. The result of the Baden conference was the passing of fourteen articles. One of these put the synodal assemblies under the supervision of the government; another made the publications and the acts of ecclesiastical authority subject to the placet of the civil authority; a third declared that "ecclesiastics were bound not only to do nothing contrary to the present dispositions, but also to denounce such a case to the respective authority." The conference proposed also to oblige Catholic priests to bless the mixed marriages, agreed to lessen the number of feast days and fast days, submitted to governmental approval the internal regulations of the seminaries and religious houses. The fourteen articles of Baden recalled the French Civil Constitution of the Clergy.

Gregory (May 17, 1835), by a letter to the bishops and faithful of Switzerland, condemned the fourteen articles.[14] He denounced "the wicked men who, under the guise of the public interest, passed into law perverse and erroneous doctrines." The radicals replied to this denunciation by expelling from Lucern (November 4, 1835) the apostolic nuncio, Monsignor de Angelis, by closing Catholic schools and novitiates, by pestering the religious communities with repeated inventories and endless vexations, by giving a chair of theology to the German professor Strauss, famous for his attacks on the divinity of Christ.

[14] Bernasconi, II, 32–36.

Gregory protested (April 1, 1842) publicly against these fresh outrages, declared legally null all the measures taken against the laws of the Church, and exhorted the Catholics to resist these criminal attacks.[15]

The Pontiff's appeal was heeded. The Swiss Catholics took as their motto, "to live as Catholics or to die." They elected as their representative in the great council Joseph Leu, who became the champion of all their rights. The great council removed from its body the intrepid athlete. The people elected him again. Condemned to be fined and to be imprisoned, Joseph Leu appeared greater than ever. Reduced to inaction, he repeated the maxim of his old master Wolf: "Prayer will save the fatherland." However, with a faith no less living, the lawyer Meyer attempted to act by way of diplomacy, seeking a support in the powers that had declared themselves protectors of the traditional liberties of his country.

Since the attempt to modify the federal pact, a pact sanctioned by the treaties of 1815, the leading powers signatory of these treaties were on the watch. A centralized and radical Switzerland seemed to them to disturb the equilibrium and security of Europe. In the name of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, remonstrances were addressed to the Swiss government. England rallied to their side. As to the "France of July," it was divided between the desire to back the liberal party in Switzerland and the apprehension she felt from the presence, close to her frontiers, of revolutionary refugees openly protected by the radicals. France hesitated, then abstained from any decision.

[15] Ibid., III, 208.

Several events occurred to raise the courage of the Swiss Catholics. Lucern had shaken off the radical yoke; her turn was about to come to be the seat of the federal diet. The papal nuncio, Monsignor d'Andrea, made his solemn entry there. The people of Lucern considered confiding to the Jesuits the theological institute and the seminary of their canton. Their right was undeniable. But was it prudent to exercise that right? On this question of action, the two most influential leaders of the Catholics were not in agreement. Joseph Leu, concerned especially with removing dubious influences from Lucern, urged that the Jesuits be called in. Meyer, more calculating, feared to associate unnecessarily the conservative cause with that of the highly unpopular religious. The latter feeling was that of Metternich, who, at Meyer's request, had tried at Rome, though without success, to obtain a decision that the Jesuits should decline the mission which was intended to be confided to them.[16] The view of Leu prevailed. The call for the Jesuits was passed in 1844.

The exasperated radicals replied by violent opposition to what they called "a defiance cast at the Protestant and radical opinion." [17] A coup, attempted in February, 1845, against the conservative government of the Vaud canton, was the starting point of a series of attacks which a certain historian has characterized by saying: "Never has political brigandage shown itself more undisguised in a civilized country." [18] In the month of March the people of Lucern, attacked by an army of 8,000 men, defeated their assault with a much smaller force. But the seditious bands, protected by the radical authorities, spread terror everywhere. Meyer barely escaped the ambushes devised against him. Joseph Leu was not equally successful. He was slain (July 20, 1845) traitorously in his bed with a pistol shot.

[16] Metternich, op. cit., VII, 115; Mémoires de Meyer; Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, VII, 174.

[17] Dispatches of Guizot to Pontois, December 26, 1844, and March 3, 1845.

[18] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., VII, 175.

The Catholic cantons thought the hour had come for them to organize to defend themselves. A confederation, called Sonderbund ("separated alliance") by their foes, was concluded (December 11, 1845) between the seven cantons of Lucern, Uri, Schwytz, Zug, Fribourg, and Valais. This pact contained nothing contrary to the laws and traditions of Switzerland. The radicals had several times given an example. These latter did not shout the less loudly at the violation of the federal pact. But the energy they displayed and the means they employed to fight the new federation showed that they appreciated the power that arose before them. We have no need to recall here the Sonderbund War and its lamentable conclusion in the crushing of the Catholic cantons. Gregory XVI would not live to witness the events of this war, which took place in the pontificate of his successor.

CHAPTER XV

The Church in Italy

Mazzini

WHILE following with anxiety the revolutionary movement in Switzerland, Gregory XVI could not lose sight of its progress in Italy. At Marseilles, Mazzini had founded the Young Italy in 1831; at Geneva in 1834 he had organized the Young Europe; in England he then directed his work of propaganda; but for him Italy always remained the center of the European regeneration which he dreamed of.

His program was clear and simple. As the resistance of the princes and the local spirit had till then been the two chief obstacles to the liberty of Italy, Mazzini wished to rid himself of the one by the republic, of the other by the establishment of unity. He used to say: "Young Italy is unitarist and republican": republican because the republic is the only form of government that satisfies reason as also the Italian traditions; unitarist, because "unity is the condition of strength, and because Italy, surrounded by unitarist powers, which are jealous and strong, needs especially to be strong"; because also "federalism, by destroying the unity of the great Italian family, makes impossible the mission which Italy is called upon to fulfill in mankind." [1]

[1] The Congress of Vienna in 1815 created three middle states. In the north were the Sardinian states, placed under the old authority of the house of Savoy and enlarged by the addition of the former republic of Genoa. To the south was the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, put under the house of Bourbon. In the middle were the States of the Church, which comprised four distinct parts: Rome and the Patrimony of St. Peter, then Umbria with the provinces of Perugia, Spoleto, and Rieti; also, on the eastern slopes of the Apennines, the Marches of Ancona, and the Legations of Bologna, Ravenna, Forli, and Ferrara; from there the papal domain ex-

To attain the ideal regime that he dreamed of, Mazzini preached a method quite different from that which was employed by the revolutionaries preceding him in Italy. Up to then the malcontents had organized secret societies, whose projects formed a mystery for the indifferent populations. In place of their methods, Mazzini wished to substitute the uprising of an entire people, conscious of its strength and its rights. "The means which Young Italy plans to use for the attainment of its end," he said, "are education and insurrection. Education, for instance, by the spoken word and by books will give twenty million Italians an awareness of their nationality so that the insurrection finds them ready against their oppressors." Thus they will be able to do without any foreign intervention; "what they lack in order to free themselves, is not the power, but only faith." [2]

The education of the people, planned by Mazzini, was to be accomplished by special means. These were historical publications systematically given a direction toward the intended aim, and congresses with a scientific emblem, which were sessions of patriotism understood in the sense meant by the agitator. With Canina, the Turin university became a center of the new ideas. Under the direction of Sclopis, Cibrario, and Soli, the Monumenta historiae patriae revived the memory of the ancient tended to the banks of the Po. To these relatively large monarchies, were added three little states, one of which, Tuscany, had its traditions, it glorious memories, and its historical raison d'être. The two others were merely arbitrary political creations; these were the Duchy of Modena and the Duchy of Parma. Lombardy and the former republic of Venice had been attached to Austria under the name of Kingdom of Lombardo-Venetia. The chief aim of the plenipotentiaries of the Vienna congress had been to guard themselves against the undertakings of France, regarded as the agent of the revolution; and the soldiers of Austria were there as a sort of advanced sentry, charged with the assurance of conservative Europe. But Austria had expanded her mission to the point of quite distorting it. Under the pretext of protecting the sovereigns of Italy against revolutionary enterprises, she installed garrisons among them and reduced them almost to the state of vassals. Cf. "Les origines de l'Unité italienne," in the Correspondant, November 13, 1893, p. 436.

---

[2] A. Pingaud, in Histoire générale, X, 584.

glories of Italy. In 1838 the scientific congresses, which had become annual, kept up a permanent agitation in the peninsula. In 1841 the Archivio storico italiano became its organ.

Further, the republican unity of Italy was only part of Mazzini's program. For him, as for all who were in accord with his ideas, Rome must be the center of Italy's political life, the indispensable capital of its unity; and thereby, for most of them, the pope, by isolating it in a way for the advantage of the unity of the Catholic Church, became an obstacle, an enemy that must be fought and suppressed. Moreover, as everyone understood, this destruction of the papacy would entail the destruction of Catholicism and the inauguration of a broader religion, as wide as humanity. Said Mazzini: "The Italian people is called upon to destroy Catholicism in the name of the continuous revelation." [3] God is God, and mankind is His prophet. God is perpetually incarnate in humanity. Humanity is the religion. We must believe in humanity, the sole interpreter of the law of God on earth.[4] Christ is a saint, whose voice has been received as being divine.[5] But Catholicism is dead. It is a worn-out symbol, preserved only by the amateur admirers of antiquity.[6]

Such was the doctrine by Mazzini.[7] Some of his hardy notions alarmed more than one of his followers, still attached to Catholicism. The carrying out of the second part of his program, the revolutionary agitation, detached from him many other partisans. We have no need here to recount the history of this movement. In 1833 at Genoa, the Ruffini brothers stirred up a revolt, which was promptly put down and was followed by a period of terrorism in Piedmont; in 1834 Ramorino vainly attempted to stir up the rural districts of Savoy; similar endeavors were made in 1843 in Romagna, in 1844 in Calabria. A [3] Iniziativa revoluzionaria dei popoli.

[4] Proclama agli Italiani.
[5] Prose politiche, p. 221.
[6] Prefazione a uno scritto di Charles Didier.
[7] Cf. Cantù, Gli eretici d'Italia.

relatively moderate party was formed and received its program under the inspirations of three men: Gioberti, Balbo, and Azeglio.

Vincenzo Gioberti was a priest of Turin. A daring philosopher, rash theologian, unsteady spirit, impressionable and violent, he was at first a disciple of Mazzini, but was unwilling to follow him to the very limit. In his book Del primato d'Italia, published in 1840, he exalted the primacy of the fatherland among the nations, but he saw the condition of this primacy in the papacy, the ancient protector of the nation and, he added, "in our days the inviolable asylum of civil tolerance and generous hospitality, open to all honorable men, especially if they are victims of misfortune, whatever their religion."

Gioberti had been appalled at Mazzini's irreligious radicalism; Balbo was shocked by his revolutionary radicalism. Gioberti had tried to attenuate the doctrine; Balbo tried to limit the violence of the practical program. The son of a Sardinian minister and former auditor in Napoleon I's council of state, having a greater sense of the practical realities than did Gioberti, Cesare Balbo, in a book published in 1844 under the title, Espérances de l'Italie, held that the primacy of Italy celebrated by Gioberti, could be realized only after the complete expulsion of Austria. He realized also that the task of driving Austria out of Italy by force of arms would be rash; but, he said, they might confidently hope that the question would be solved of itself in consequence of the events that were being prepared.

Two years later, Marquis Massimo d'Azeglio, published a resounding pamphlet, Gli ultimi casi de Romagna. There and in several subsequent writings, he proclaimed the Italians' right to rebel against Austria, and indicated Charles Albert, the king of Piedmont, as their leader.

The moderate party of the Italian patriots now had its program. Gioberti had laid down the principles; Balbo had set forth the conditions of success; d'Azeglio had pointed out the means to be taken and the chief to be chosen. All three rejected the anti-Catholic and revolutionary spirit of Mazzini, but none of them was free from the reproach of liberalism, in both the religious and the political order. Gioberti fancied, for the people's role, a sort of indifferentism; Balbo shared this fancy; d'Azeglio criticized the papal government in such a way that he discredited the very authority of the Holy See.

Defense Measures of Gregory XVI

The Pope had to intervene. The complexity of this movement, and the confusion between the religious question, the national question, and the political question made this intervention a most delicate matter. Gregory XVI thought that the most effective means of combating the revolutionary movement was to bring into the open the real designs of those who made use of the national feeling and of the idea of Italian independence in order to attack the Holy See and the Church. Mazzini had left Carbonarism, but only to establish in the Young Italy and in similar societies a law of secrecy even stricter than that of the conspirators of 1820. Article 30 of the rules of the Young Italy reads: "Those who do not obey the orders of the society, those who disclose its plans, will be stabbed pitilessly." [8] Besides, Young Italy and Carbonarism fraternized by the common bonds that attached them to Masonry.[9] As for d'Azeglio, he himself, in his Ricordi, relates that he made a journey to Italy in the interest of the secret societies with a view to lead the followers of Mazzini and the republicans to join the monarchists and Charles Albert for the purpose of bringing about Italian unity.[10]

[8] Deschamps Les sociétés secrètes, II, 273.

[9] Eckert, op. cit., II, 213, 219; Jannet, La Franc-Maçonnerie au XIX^e siècle, pp. 207–11.

[10] Chap. 34; Jannet, op. cit., p. 155.

At the outset of his pontificate the Pope had been able to obtain a certain number of documents establishing the preponderant part which the secret societies played in the contemporary agitations. He sent (May 23, 1846) for a writer well known for the fearlessness of his courage and the liveliness of his mind, Jacques Crétineau-Joly. The author of the Histoire de la Vendée militaire and of the Histoire religieuse, politique et littéraire de la Compagne de Jésus, had already laid himself open to charges of excessive impetuosity in his polemics and thus of injustice in some of his appreciations. But his two capital works had, as a whole, rendered service to the cause of the Church.[11] Moreover, he was a man who would not recoil before any perilous enterprises. To him the Pope said: "My son, you have always had the courage of your opinions. I ask you to trim your pen and promise me, without halting before any obstacles, to write a history of the secret societies and of their consequences." [12] The Pontiff placed in his hands a large number of important documents that would serve as material for the projected work. The Histoire des sociétés secrètes, in consequence of various circumstances, was not published; but the most important of the documents confided to Crétineau-Joly were made use of in the two volumes that appeared in 1858 under the title, L'église romaine en face de la Révolution.

The work requested by the Holy Father could not have an immediate effectiveness. And Gregory did not wait for its accomplishment before taking measures against the threatening insurrection. In this labor he was energetically seconded by his Secretary of State, Cardinal Lambruschini. Louis Lambruschini, born in Liguria on June 2, 1776, joined the Barnabites at an early age. He rendered services to the Church under Leo XII and Pius VIII. Gregory, in the first year of his reign, [11] In his youth he had abandoned the practices of religion. He returned to them only at the hour of his death. See Maynard, J. Crétineau-Joly, 1875.

[12] Maynard, Crétineau-Joly, p. 340.

raised him to the purple and entrusted several important missions to him. In 1836 Metternich, vexed at a criticism of himself by Cardinal Bernetti, laid down, as a condition for the evacuation of Italy by the imperial troops, the change of Secretary of State.

The Pope, in his desire for conciliation, yielded to this demand, and Cardinal Lambruschini succeeded Bernetti.[13] The new Secretary of State, entering on his office, as it were under the auspices of Austria, would, more than his predecessor, turn his eyes willingly toward the court of Vienna. His temperament likewise inclined him to leave to the severities of the law an initiative with which Bernetti merely threatened the revolution.[14] But in 1845 he declined the armed help which Austria proposed to him for the repression of the renewed insurrection in the Legations; however, he followed attentively the various ramifications of the secret societies in Italy. A good number of the documents handed to Crétineau by the Pope to help him in disclosing the mysteries of the sect had been gathered by the pains of Lambruschini. The watchful minister strove also to check the propaganda of the liberal ideas among the secular and regular clergy.

Gregory XVI was convinced that nothing is more effective in fighting evil than the spread of good. In line with this conviction, he favored with all his power the pious associations that purposed the development of the faith or the practice of charity. He bestowed spiritual favors on the two congregations of priests founded by Father Jerome Chemin of Bassano, to preach retreats to ecclesiastics and the laity. He encouraged the Oblates of the Blessed Virgin instituted in 1826 at Pignerol by the venerable Bruno Lanteri for the service of the missions, and the Oblates of St. Alphonsus Liguori established in 1839 at Bobbio. He confirmed the rules given in 1825 by Theodora

[13] Maynard, op. cit., p. 343.
[14] Crétineau-Joly, op. cit., II, 356.

Campostrina to the Little Sisters of the Compassion of Mary, those of the priests of the Mother of Good Counsel and those of the Pious Works of the Mission. He procured the establishment at Rome and Turin of the institute of Perpetual Adorers of the Blessed Sacrament, founded in 1807 by Sister Mary Magdalen of the Incarnation (in the world, Catherine Sordini) for the purpose of repairing by uninterrupted adoration the insults offered to the Eucharist. Among the less known congregations that were the object of decrees of approval by Gregory XVI we may also mention the following: at Turin the Society of the Faithful Servants of Jesus, that of the Sisters of St. Anne, and the Penitents of St. Mary Magdalen; at Genoa, the Daughters of Mary; still others at Verona and Venice.[15]

Among the works that Gregory XVI blessed and approved were two which deserve special mention. They were notable by the particular interest the Pontiff showed for them, by the good they accomplished, and by the personal worth of the priest who founded them: the institute of the Fathers of Charity and that of the Sisters of Providence, founded by Antonio Rosmini of Rovereto.

In 1823 the future Pope Gregory XVI, then procurator general of the Camaldolese at Rome, met Antonio Rosmini.[16] This priest, then twenty-six years old, was pondering the idea of fighting the errors and miseries of his time by science and charity. Born at the castle of Rovereto in the Tyrol, of a family of the old nobility, he entered the seminary at the age of seventeen in spite of the lively opposition of his parents, who were counting on him to perpetuate the illustrious house of the Rosmini counts. After being ordained priest in 1821, he declined to enter the diplomatic career, to which his family and his friends were urging him. He retired on his paternal domain, which he had just inherited by his father's death, there to follow a life of prayer, study, and good works. For his motto he took these three words: To adore, to practice silence, to rejoice. His wish was that the peoples among whom he lavished his charities should know him by no name but that of Don Antonio. A devout Christian, the Marchioness Magdalen Canossa, foundress of a charitable association to which the young priest's sister, Margaret Rosmini, belonged, helped him in his works of charity. Two profound feelings united Dom Maur Cappellari and Don Antonio: a great devotion to the Holy See and a great love for the religious life. A warm friendship was soon formed between them.

[15] Hergenröther-Kirsch, Kirchengeschichte, II, Bk. III, chap. 17; Civiltà cattolica, VII, 3, 81.

[16] For the following details of Rosmini's life, see Lockhart, Vie de Rosmini, pp. 80 ff., 90, 103, 172, 188.

In 1826 Rosmini wrote to the venerated Camaldolese monk, felicitating him on his elevation to the purple. In this letter Rosmini explained the plan for a religious order which he planned to found: it was to engage in all the works of charity which the times would call for. Two years later Cardinal Cappellari encouraged him to publish his treatise on the origin of ideas and to undertake an exposition of his philosophy, "persuaded that it is destined to revive the study of St. Thomas, Aristotle, and Plato at the center of the Christian world, close to the infallible seat of Catholic doctrine." He also wrote to Rosmini (July 2, 1830), who had sent him a detailed memoir on the institute he was planning: "I have read your description of the institute. The description is short, clear, and precise. I intend to make a copy of it for the Holy Father." Five months later the Holy Father was Maur Cappellari himself enthroned under the name of Gregory XVI. At first by an oraculum vivae vocis, then by apostolic letters (November 20, 1839), the Supreme Pontiff, after a single modification, approved the rules that had been submitted to him.[17]

[17] Bernasconi, II, 361–74. In this document will be found the full text of the rules of the Institute of Charity. Rosmini is there called vir rerum divinarum atque humanarum scientia illustris, eximia pietate, religione, virtute, probitate, prudentia, integritate carus, ac miro in catholicam religionem atque hanc apostolican sedem

Rosmini's philosophy was inspired by the highest and purest zeal. But it was developed with a view to refuting the modern errors more directly, and was oriented in paths not yet trod. It would not escape the condemnation of the Church. A decree of the Holy Office (December 14, 1887) censured forty propositions taken from his philosophical works. But, a few days before the promulgation of the condemnation, Leo XIII wrote to the archbishops of Turin, Verceil, and Milan: "We do not wish any harm to come to the Society of Charity, which has been so usefully devoted to the services of humanity according to the spirit of its institution. On the contrary, we hope it will continue to prosper and bear more and more abundant fruit." [18]

Rosmini had, in fact, founded two distinct works: the institute of the Brothers of Charity and that of the Sisters of Providence. The former had as their aim "their own sanctification and, by means of this sanctification, any works of charity whatever, especially those having as their object the eternal salvation of souls." [19] The flexibility of this aim would enable the society to adapt itself, according to circumstances, to the needs of times and places. The pious founder wished to introduce a amore ac studio fulgens (ibid., p. 372). This praise is the more remarkable since Gregory XVI knew the originality of Rosmini's philosophical system and his connection with Manzoni and other personages of the advanced national party.

---

[18] Lockhart, op. cit., p. 557. For the condemnation of the Rosminian errors, see Denzinger, nos. 1891–1930. Rosmini's purpose was to fight the sensualism and subjectivism by the exposition of a philosophy resting on the positive observation of facts, and, on the other hand, reaching the intellectual reality beyond the sensible reality, the non-ego and God beyond the ego. Rosmini remarks that, if we closely observe the phenomena of knowledge, we find, at the base of each of them, a common element: being, undetermined and universal being: the things are this or that, but they are something. But being presents itself to us under the form of a feeling, under the form of an idea, or under the form of a relation between the feeling and the idea. Hence three divisions of Rosminian philosophy: reality, ideality, morality. Rosmini's doctrine was condemned as being tainted with ontologism. On Rosmini's philosophy, see Palhoriès, Rosmini; Segond, Œuvres de Rosmini; Trullet, Examen des doctrines de Rosmini; Bulletin critique, XIV, 309–12; Revue du clergé français, LIX, 309–18.

[19] Art. 3 of the rule (Bernasconi, II, 363).

similar flexibility in the organization of his society. Living in common as religious, practicing strict poverty in their manner of life, the Brothers of Charity would retain, like the secular priests, the ownership of their personal possessions, on condition of using them only for works of piety or charity.[20] The Brothers of Charity soon spread, not only in Italy, but also elsewhere, especially in England, where they led to many conversions to Catholicism.

The Sisters of Providence was approved by the same apostolic letters as the institute of the Brothers, as an affiliated community. At first it had been brought together by the initiative of Father Loewenbruch, one of the early disciples of Rosmini, who soon placed their spiritual and temporal direction into the hands of his superior. Their success in the different works entrusted to them, notably in the education of girls, brought from all sides requests for the maestre rosminiane, as they were called. In 1888 they numbered more than six hundred. Introduced into England in 1843 by Lady Mary Arundell, the daughter of the pious Marquis of Buckingham, they opened several boarding schools for young ladies of the upper aristocracy and the English middle class, and many schools for the poor classes. They likewise took up the care of the sick in hospitals, home visits of the sick, practicing, according to the instructions of their founder, "the union of the contemplative life with the active life and with the sort of active life that is the most simple, humble, and laborious." [21] The good they accomplished in these different works and the esteem they won powerfully seconded the work of the missions preached by Father Gentili and Father Furlong in all the Catholic centers of England and contributed greatly to the progress of the religious renaissance in that country.

[20] Arts. 23–28 (Bernasconi, II, 365).
[21] Lockhart, op. cit., p. 378.

CHAPTER XVI

The Church in Ireland and England

FROM 1831 to 1846 the Catholic movement in England, Germany, and France assumed a particular breadth. In England the period was that of O'Connell's great agitation, wringing from the government the abolition of its most unjust laws against Catholics. The period also saw the development of the Oxford Movement, which led in 1845 to the conversion of Newman and several other eminent doctors of Anglicanism. In Germany those years marked the victory of the Catholic episcopate in the important question of mixed marriages. In France the same period laid the groundwork for the winning of the freedom of education.

Ireland

The Emancipation Bill of 1829 did not indeed give full liberty to the Irish Catholics. They rightly complained that they had to pay annually almost one million pounds for the clergy of the Protestant Churches, which had a membership of hardly 800,000, whereas their own clergy, who were ministering to 6,000,000 Catholics, had no resources for their living but the charity of an impoverished population. The Irish Catholics complained, and not without good reason, of being crushed under the weight of exorbitant farm rents and of being pitilessly evicted from their cottages when, following a poor crop, they could not pay these rents to the agents of the landlords. They recalled, lastly, that Ireland was inadequately represented in the English Parliament. In other words, the three questions which, since the fourteenth century, had, one after the other or at the same time, stirred that country, seemed to them not settled. On March 22, 1829, even before the emancipation was an accomplished fact, O'Connell wrote to a friend that no one should think all would be finished after the Catholic emancipation; this would be merely the time to begin the struggle for the rights of the nation.[1]

The Agitator was then at the height of his popularity and power. At the age of fifty-four he still preserved all his physical vigor. In his long strifes he had acquired an experience of men and things that made him more than a popular tribune, a politician in the finest sense of the term. Contrary to the opinions of some of his friends, he judged that the political question ought to follow on the other two, and he started his new campaign in the Parliament itself. Some might have wondered whether the great orator of the Irish meetings would be able to adapt his words to the debates of a legislative assembly. O'Connell did not hesitate; his successes during his seventeen years in the House of Commons justified his daring.

Although the emancipation of the Catholics had been granted by the Tories, O'Connell resolutely took his stand on the side of the Whigs. This party was then demanding an electoral reform and, to prevail over the opposition in Parliament, they needed the support of the Irish votes. This support O'Connell offered them. In return he could ask for promises favorable to the Catholics.[2] Moreover, the Tories, preservers of the existing state of things, clearly represented themselves as defenders of the Established Church.

The success but imperfectly corresponded to O'Connell's hopes. The presence of the Whigs in power for six years gave Ireland a comparative peace. The country was governed with fairness. The magistrates regarded all those before them as citizens without the former odious distinction between an Irishman and an Englishman, a Protestant and a Catholic.[3] Moreover, on the floor of Parliament, as before the great popular gatherings, O'Connell appeared as a power. The contest that he sustained during the eleven days of the famous debate on the Coercion Bill showed him to be a formidable master of parliamentary tactics, discussing foot by foot, article by article, that bill which, amplifying the power of the magistrates, put Ireland almost in a state of siege. In an effort to overcome his resistance, he was offered an important magistracy in Ireland. O'Connell, in order to keep his independence, was unwilling to accept anything. In the work of the baneful bill, he again found the animation, irony, and sarcasm which formerly stirred the crowds of his compatriots. His improvised speech (February 5, 1833), in the opinion of Michelet, is the most thrilling piece of eloquence heard since Mirabeau.[4] The minister withdrew his bill. But O'Connell's parliamentary campaign brought few practical and immediate results. The abolition of one of the taxes for the support of the Anglican worship, the suppression of some Anglican bishoprics in Ireland, and a slight change in the manner of collecting the tithes were almost the only positive fruits obtained by so much effort.

[1] A. Langlois, "O'Connell d'après sa correspondance," in the Correspondant of January 25, 1889, CLIV, 247.

[2] On these promises, see Langlois, op. cit., p. 257.

The Repeal of the Union

In 1839 the Liberator, as the Irish called him, feeling worn out from his labors, thought of ending his days in a monastery.[5] But the coming of the Tories to power in 1841, having Robert Peel at their head, threw O'Connell into the opposition.

[3] Gondon, L'agitation irlandaise depuis 1829, p. 83.

[4] This speech will be found in Marcel, Chefs d'œuvre de l'éloquence française et de la tribune anglaise, III, 562–72.

[5] Langlois, op. cit., p. 265.

Up to this time he had suspended all popular agitation in Ireland and he himself refrained from demanding the repeal of the Union, that is, the legislative autonomy of Ireland by the establishment of a parliament at Dublin. To his friends he wrote: "Henceforth my hope is solely in Ireland." In spite of his age he resumed his journeys as agitator.

We shall not detail this new series of campaigns. By the manifestations they appeared to be purely political. But in the course of them O'Connell, first of all a Catholic, never lost sight of the question that was always uppermost in his eyes, the religious liberty of his country. This liberty, he was convinced, would remain illusory and precarious so long as it should not be guaranteed by political liberty. The repeal of the union was his watchword; the defense of Catholicism in Ireland remained his primary objective.

Notwithstanding the murmuring of some of his too fiery partisans, his agitation remained always legal. He declared at Dublin (April 11, 1843): "I will violate neither the law of God nor the laws of men; but as long as a shred of the constitution is left to us, I will give it my support and will there place the influence with which I intend to maintain the uncertain liberties of my country." At Tara, the seat of the ancient kings of Ireland, the Liberator gathered together and harangued (August 13) 700,000 persons; the Times spoke even of a million. Another meeting, attended by 400,000, was held at Mullaghmast. A still more colossal meeting was announced for October and was to be held at Clontarf. O'Connell, learning that the government was prepared to disperse the meeting by force and that troops and cannons were proceeding toward Clontarf, foresaw a bloody clash between the armed forces and the crowd. At the last moment he forbade the meeting and was pleased that he was obeyed by 500,000 determined to give their lives for their country. The English government had him arrested, condemned, and imprisoned as guilty of conspiracy. But the House of Lords (September, 1844) reversed the decision and freed O'Connell. At the same time the Tory cabinet did not venture to carry out its threats. At the close of 1842 Robert Peel, though imposing an income tax in England, did not dare to impose it in Ireland. The next year he declared that he was determined to do anything for the welfare of the Irish. O'Connell, in his deep faith, wrote that the hand of man is not in this matter, but that Providence is the one that answers the prayers of the faithful people of Ireland.

The big popular manifestations in celebration of the great agitator's liberation were his last triumphs. In the words of Lacordaire, "this great Christian merited that God should purify him from the subtle poison of glory and place on his head, after so many untarnished crowns, that supreme crown of adversity without which no glory, either on earth or in heaven, is perfect." [6] In spite of the Whigs' return to power, in spite of the excellent choice of officials appointed for Ireland, the year 1846 was the saddest in O'Connell's life. Two facts contributed to embitter his last days. The extreme dissidents, who wished to win Ireland's liberty by violence and who were known as "Young Ireland," a society that openly declared its opposition to O'Connell, and a frightful wretchedness caused (1845–46) by the failure of the potato crop, brought about the death, through famine or typhus, of almost a fifth of the Irish population. The great agitator, overwhelmed by physical and moral sufferings, wished, before dying, to go to Rome, there to lay at the feet of the vicar of Christ the testimonial of his fidelity. But God did not permit him to reach the end of his pilgrimage. He died at Genoa on May 14, 1847; and Pius IX shortly afterward, embracing O'Connell's son, rejoiced to hold in his arms the son of "the hero of Christianity." [7]

[6] Lacordaire, Eloge funèbre d'O'Connell, in Œuvres, VIII, 190.
[7] Lacordaire, op. cit., p. 191.

Newman

Several members of the Whig (or Liberal) Party showed themselves more or less favorable to the cause of O'Connell. But they were not led to act thus by their slight zeal for the national religion; nor was their religious indifference in favor of the progress of the true religion. By a no less singular phenomenon and, we may add, no less providential, the obstinate attachment of several members of the Tory (or Conservative) Party to the Established Church, resulted in a Catholic revival. Keble, Froude, and Newman were not merely outspoken partisans of the Tory Robert Peel; more conservative than their chief, they forsook him when they saw him decide for the emancipation of the Catholics, accusing him of betraying the Anglican Church.[8] But with the same zeal for defending their Mother Church and of giving her a powerful vitality, these men were led to say to themselves that it had need of being reformed; and the reforms which they imagined or which they took from the old traditions, for giving life to that Church, were remarkably close to Catholic beliefs and practices.[9]

The Tractarian Movement would lead Newman and many of his friends to Catholicism. He later wrote that he always considered, as the starting point of that movement, a speech by Keble in regard to the bill which, in 1833, suppressed part of the bishoprics in Ireland.[10] Was this not lax apostasy, to disorganize the Church of England at the very time when the freethinkers on one hand and, on the other, the Irish Catholics were carrying a fierce war against her? Keble entitled his discourse "The National Apostasy." And he distributed copies of it widespread. The conclusion of this manifesto was that, in such a crisis, every faithful churchman ought to devote himself fully to the cause of the Anglican Church. Some churchmen agreed to answer this appeal. This agreement had as its first result the appearance (September 9, 1833) of an anonymous writing of three pages, addressed to the writer's brothers in the holy ministry, "the priests and deacons of the Church of Christ." The guiding idea of this little leaflet was to recall to the clergy, who had too much forgotten it, that their powers came, not from the state, but from the apostolic succession; that it belonged to them, independently of the state, to take the initiative of any reform, of every act capable of restoring to the Church of England its vitality, its greatness, and its fruitfulness. This was the first of the so-called tracts that came out in the course of twelve years and explains why the movement is called the "Tractarian Movement."

[8] Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre, I, 49.
[9] See supra, pp. 104–6, 162.
[10] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., p. 67.

"The second tract attacked the Irish Bill because it was taken without consulting the Church; the third denounced certain changes in the liturgy and the funeral services; the fourth returned to the question of the apostolic succession; the fifth set forth the constitution of the Church and of that branch established in England; succeeding numbers treated analogous subjects, seeking in every way to make the religion loftier, deeper, and more real." [11] Most of them, the most brilliant and striking of them, were from Newman's pen. At first zealous friends distributed these leaflets, passing whole days in going on horseback from one rectory to another. Soon no need required them to be spread from hand to hand. Their fame helped their diffusion. Some were in such demand that a second edition had to be published.[12] They became a matter of frequent discussion. The Evangelicals denounced their papist tendencies; the liberals, their dogmatic rigor; the prudent conservatives of Anglicanism, their recklessness. Newman continued to remain

[11] Ibid., p. 71.
[12] Ibid., p. 82.

the soul of the movement. He compared the stimulant of the tracts to an application of volatile salts for a fainting person. Moreover, they did not take seriously the reproach of papism. For Newman himself to become a Romanist seemed more and more impossible to him. In fact, at this period he thought he had found the means of separating from the Church of England without joining that of Rome.[13]

In 1835 the Tractarian Movement took on a new character by the intervention of Pusey. The publications became little complete treatises, somewhat heavy, but solid. The effect has been compared to the coming of a battery of heavy artillery on a battlefield where before only rifle skirmishes had taken place.[14] Froude's death that same year was an appreciable loss for the movement, but did not slow it down. Furthermore, the tracts were no longer the sole means of propaganda. Newman became pastor of St. Mary's at Oxford and there raised the parish worship from the sort of lethargy into which it had fallen. The success of his sermons kept increasing. The collection of these sermons [15] was regarded, even by the Protestants, as one of the most precious monuments of English literature of the nineteenth century,[16] and contributed as much as the tracts in winning followers to the movement.[17]

We have already mentioned how the condition of being pariahs had produced in the Catholics of England a sort of social and intellectual depression. "When they came forth from the catacombs, we might say that the full daylight dazzled them. They remained timid and distrustful." [18]

[13] This he called the Via media.

[14] Church, The Oxford Movement, p. 136.

[15] The first volume (1834) was followed by eleven other volumes.

[16] Gladstone, at the close of his life, was asked which were the finest prose writers of his time. He named Newman and Ruskin.

[17] Further, this movement of a great number of cultivated Protestants toward the Roman doctrines coincided with a movement of English Catholics toward scientific and literary culture.

[18] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., I, 120.

But a Catholic, a priest, was at hand. He was English enough to understand his fellow Englishmen and to make himself understood, yet by his personal training, free enough from the Catholics' habits of mind not to have their timidity or their short views. This man was Nicholas Wiseman.[19] Born at Seville in 1802 of an English family, brought up in England from early childhood, sent to Rome in 1818 with a group of young students, there to occupy the English College recently re-established, the young Wiseman was already revealed to be an orator, poet, exegete, and Orientalist. His meeting a young convert of noble ancestry, the last son of Lord Spencer,[20] turned his thoughts to the conversion of England. The visit of Newman and Froude in 1833 acquainted him with the importance of the Oxford Movement.[21]

A short stay in Paris in 1835 reanimated his courage and confidence. It was the time when his friend Lacordaire was starting his conferences in Notre Dame before a hostile or indifferent public. The next year Wiseman delivered some lectures in London. These were intended for the Protestants as well as for his fellow Catholics; they treated the principal doctrines of the Catholic Church. The simple and courteous tone of his lectures and his evident pains to enlighten without irritating drew many non-Catholics about his pulpit. In consequence several Anglicans of note were converted. Many others, without going so far as conversion, felt their prejudices destroyed or lessened.[22] Wiseman founded the Dublin Review in May, 1836. The first number succeeded in giving the Catholic movement an impulse and breadth that revealed to Protestants the might of the Roman Church and gave the Catholics a new confidence. It was the prelude of all the works which

[19] Ibid., p. 129.

[20] Madaune, Ignace Spencer et la renaissance du catholicisme en Angleterre, p. 155.

[21] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., pp. 58–113.

[22] Ibid., p. 138.

Catholicism would accomplish in the course of the nineteenth century in England.[23]

Newman, however, remained unmoved in his Via media, and his influence did but increase. When one of the most original and spontaneous minds of the Oxford Movement, William George Ward, was asked what was the symbol of his belief, he merely answered: "Credo in Newmanum." But when Newman's influence was at its height, and his authority unquestioned, when apparently he would be able to form a new Church with himself at the head, he began more and more to see that the intermediate way he intended to place between the Church of England and the Church of Rome was untenable. The Church of England, a national institution that had separated from the great Church, seemed to him to have neither Catholicity nor apostolic succession. Any other new Church would have the same defects; while the Church of Rome alone, as he saw, possessed, de jure and de facto, a boundless continuity and geographical extent. A phrase uttered by St. Augustine in connection with the Donatists, one repeated by Wiseman in the Dublin Review, kept recurring to his memory: Securus judicat orbis terrarum. He wrote later: "The words of St. Augustine struck me with a power which I never had felt from any words before. To take a familiar instance, they were like the 'Turn again Whittington' of the chime; or, to take a more serious one, like the 'Tolle, lege,—Tolle, lege,' of the child, which converted St. Augustine himself." [24]

In 1842 Newman felt the need of quiet and reflection to find the light and grace needed for the solution of the great problem that was troubling him. For this purpose he withdrew to the solitude of Littlemore. A few disciples, unable to do without his counsels, joined him there. He let them share his life of silence and retreat; but no one could induce him to resume his public life. For more than two years he prayed, reflected, discussed with himself, considered all the aspects of the questions disturbing him. He studied especially the question of the development of Christian doctrine and began writing on this subject one of the most penetrating works that came from his pen.[25] He wrote to his friend Pusey that he was as near the decisive step as if he had already taken it. On October 8, 1845, in his Littlemore hermitage, he made his abjuration of Protestantism and his profession of the Catholic faith in the hands of Father Dominic, a Passionist. A few of his disciples, Ward, Dalgairns, and St. John, foreseeing this issue of the crisis, had preceded their master and on August 13 and 19, and October 2 abjured Anglicanism. Others soon followed. Among their names should be mentioned Faber, the future Oratorian. His writings, as also those of Dalgairns, would enrich the Catholic literature of the nineteenth century.[26]

[23] Wilfrid Ward, Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman (1912).
[24] Newman, Apologia pro vita sua.

The number of conversions immediately following that of Newman has been reckoned at three hundred, and the movement has continued ever since. Gladstone spoke truly when he said that Newman's conversion to the Roman Church marked an epoch in the history of the Church of England.[27] More recently Lecky, one of the outstanding historians of England, was not uttering a paradox when he declared that, in the order of ideas, no greater event had happened since the time of the Stuarts.[28]

[25] Newman, Essay on the Development of Doctrine.

[26] Among Faber's works we note especially the following: All for Jesus, The Creator and the Creature, The Precious Blood, The Blessed Sacrament, and Spiritual Conferences; of Dalgairns': Holy Communion and Devotions to the Sacred Heart. Among the eminent men born in Catholicism, England counted Cardinal Acton, whose theological and canonical knowledge were rightly esteemed, and the historian John Lingard, whose History of England was highly appreciated even by the Protestants themselves.

[27] Gladstone, Life of Bishop Wilberforce, I, 328.

[28] Lecky, History of Rationalism, I, 159.

CHAPTER XVII

The Church in Germany

THE future Cardinal Hergenröther was teaching Church history at Würtzburg. In one of his lectures he made a similar assertion regarding the events occurring in Germany at this same period. He said: "Since the Reformation the Church has not known a more important event than the Cologne affair." [1] That affair was merely the sequel of the affair of the mixed marriages, a problem that had its beginnings under Leo XII and Pius VIII.

Bunsen

The court of Berlin received Pius VIII's brief, Litteris, condemning its claims. But finding nothing better to do about it than to hide the document from the public and to try to make the Pope yield, it followed the same plan after the coming of Gregory XVI. The personage chosen by the King of Prussia to carry on the discussions with the Roman curia was Count von Bunsen; the diplomat appointed by the Pope to represent him was Cardinal Lambruschini. This Bunsen, who drew up the Memorandum of the powers, was the type of sectarian and dominating Protestant.

He possessed a verbose and labored erudition. He was also well versed in the knowledge of the ancient liturgies and considered himself qualified to infuse a new life into the religious institutions sprung from the Reformation. Not only did he fancy a mighty Prussian national Church in which the king would be the head; he also devised a vast Protestant colonization plan, like former such undertakings. We may believe that, in the course of the journey he made in 1828 with the crown prince, Bunsen and the future Frederick William IV gladly joined hands in concerting the coming triumphs of the God common to Prussia and the Reformation.[2] But at Rome he was known. He had been seen when he was taking his first steps in the diplomatic career as Niebuhr's secretary. In the very palace of the minister he opened a little chapel where he pretended in some way to centralize Christian truth by the purification and modernizing of the rituals with a view to spreading it over the whole earth.[3] When Gregory XVI and his legate met the Protestant ambassador Bunsen and heard him insistently ask that the Catholic priest take part in the marriage ceremonies with the rites and conditions which he had determined, they showed themselves inflexible. Lambruschini, in the Pope's name, declared that they intended to abide by the declarations of Pius VIII without any concessions or modifications.

[1] Cf. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, II, 220.

The discussions lasted two years. The Prussian chancery was not discouraged. After failing to win over the Pope, it set out to deceive the faithful. The German episcopate, whom they had already found complaisant, supplied some accommodating prelates who, in ambiguous terms, gave them a hope that in time the passive presence of Catholic priests at mixed marriages, as permitted by Pius VIII, would gradually be changed into active presence, even if the spouses would not conform to the conditions laid down by the canon law. For a moment the plan seemed to succeed. Without any fuss the Prussian government would fill the Catholic districts with Protestant officials and, by some cleverly contrived marriages, would endeavor to make the district Protestant. The essential point was to obtain the docile obedience of the faithful and the silence of Rome.

[2] Goyau, op. cit., II, 130. Bunsen's religious ideas will be found in his book, Gott in der Geschichte.

[3] Nippold, Bunsen, I, 165.

Among the people and clergy a rumor circulated that a brief of Pius VIII would be issued, opposing the Prussian demands. Bunsen tried to end these rumors (June 19, 1834) by elaborating with a compliant archbishop, Spiegel, and his vicar general, München, an agreement that claimed to take the papal document as its basis but, through a cunning falsification, adapted it to the royal edict of 1825. In short, the so-called convention ended with an order that the pastors abandon entirely, in cases of mixed marriages, the requisite that a promise be made regarding the bringing up of the children. Thus circumvented and perhaps proud to take on themselves an initiative that was represented to them as the guaranty of a religious peace saving the honor of their king, Archbishop Spiegel of Cologne and his three suffragans (of Trier, Münster, and Paderborn) consented to apply the agreement of 1834; at the same time they informed the Pope that they would execute the brief. Basically this move was a deception of the people and of the Pope.

Bunsen now thought that his positions were protected by these crafty arrangements. But just then Lambruschini, having wind of these maneuvers, called upon Bunsen for explanations. The Prussian diplomat brazened it out. He let out indignant cries when they spoke to him of the agreement of 1834, saying at first that such a convention was morally impossible, then giving positive assurance that it never existed. A more shameless lie was not possible. The German prelates, likewise brought into the case, did not use the same audacity. But, having set foot on a false path and not daring at first to forsake it by a frank disavowal, they tried to justify themselves by equivocation. They replied that they had indeed concluded a sort of pact, but merely to interpret, from a practical viewpoint, certain doubtful cases. For the honor of the Catholic Church of Germany, we are happy to note that such a yielding by the episcopate was neither general nor lasting.

At the close of 1836 the Bishop of Trier, on his deathbed, heeded the voice of conscience. Ashamed of the miserable reticence behind which he had covered his weakness, he wrote to the Pope to confess his fault, to retract his compromising acts, and to ask pardon. Bunsen, at once involved, did not consider himself beaten, drew up some adroitly jumbled notes, tried to have the affair accepted as a misunderstanding, appealed from the declaration of the deceased bishop to that of the living prelates. But the latter could hardly continue in the policy of loopholes and evasions which they had adopted, and the retractation of the Bishop of Trier would soon find on the lips of a living bishop a forthright echo; its reverberations were widespread, and its significance incalculable.[4]

Archbishop Droste-Vischering

Archbishop Spiegel of Cologne died August 2, 1835. Then the government's desire was to find a successor both agreeable to the clergy and favorable to the convention of 1834. The government thought it found these two conditions combined in the person of the venerable coadjutor of the Bishop of Münster, Clemens August Droste-Vischering, who, on an intimation from Berlin, was elected by the Cologne chapter, preconized by the Holy Father (February 2, 1836), and enthroned three months later. The first condition required by the civil authority was certainly found in the venerable prelate, whose pious life and apostolic zeal were an edification to all. But did he fill the second desire of the Berlin court? Under the Napoleonic domination he did not fear to take up the defense of the rights of the Church, refusing to recognize canons appointed merely by the authority of the Emperor. Later, when the King of Prussia took under his protection the teaching of Professor Hermes, Droste-Vischering was alarmed at Hermes' doctrine and forbade the Westphalian seminarians to attend his classes.

[4] Goyau, op. cit., p. 163.

But the Bishop of Münster was old and supposedly worn out. His was a contemplative soul, attracted by the devotion of the cloisters. He was thought to be timorous or unmindful of the noisy conflicts. The Berlin government did not know or had forgotten that the contemplative life of the monasteries had trained the virile courage of an Athanasius and of a Gregory VII and that piety, inclining men's souls to the miseries of the weak, helped them to stand up against the threats of the strong. In the question of Hermesianism and in that of mixed marriages, Droste-Vischering was not slow in showing himself as belonging to the race of the most valiant champions of the Church.

At first glance the issue did not appear momentous. The view may seem strange to regard as great episodes of Church history the conflicts that arose in connection with the orthodoxy of a professor of theology and with the ceremonies to be observed in the marriage of a Catholic party and a Protestant party. The breadth and import of these struggles can be grasped only if we consider them in their relation to the general policy of Germany at this period. To exercise a political, intellectual, and religious domination over the world had long been the dream of several German statesmen. This dream had, in 1835, assumed a precise form; and on this point the liberals did not think otherwise than the adherents of absolutism.

To the German democrats the 1830 revolution had given hope and new encouragement. The princes in Brunswick, Saxony, and Hanover hastened to give constitutions to their people. Even the students who plotted in the secret societies against absolutism, and the insurgents who alarmed Metternich, all were singing Becker's Rhin Allemand with the same spirit and showed the same enthusiasm in raising the flag of the Burschenschaft, the black, red, and golden standard that had become the symbol of unified Germany. These various classes all nourished the same hope of a Germany enlightening the world.

For a moment the princes, even the King of Prussia, deluded themselves, believing that by this movement they were realizing the great ambition of the race. Becker received an honorary cup from the King of Bavaria and a pension from the King of Prussia. Some writers, such as Ranke, showed themselves skeptical of the movement;[5] but the secret societies, now long centralized in Berlin, were the ones that preached the realization of the German dream under the direction of the King of Prussia.[6] This organization would officially affirm its stand in 1842, when, on the occasion of the laying of the cornerstone for the completion of the Cologne cathedral, a national festival gathered together all the German princes under the presidency of the King of Prussia. It was already an accomplished fact in 1835.

At this period Prussia assumed to dominate the thought of Germany and thereby of Europe and the world, by an official teaching. And it tried to regulate the ceremonies of religion by royal decrees. The strifes stirred up on the occasion of Hermesianism and of mixed marriages were two episodes of the campaign undertaken for this purpose.

George Hermes

Prussia had become mistress of the Rhenish provinces. She considered making Cologne lose her old scientific prestige and had introduced in Bonn an elite number of professors who, placed especially under dependence on the civil authority that had brought them there, would give a sort of official teaching.[7] Among these professors was one outstanding by the originality and boldness of his doctrine. His name was George Hermes.

[5] For Ranke's opinion, see J. Bainville, Histoire de deux peuples, p. 220.

[6] "The lodges judged that, of all the states of Europe, Prussia was the most capable of realizing their work." Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 400.

[7] Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 369.

Although a Catholic, he had been recommended to the Prussian government by the Protestant Niemeyer.

His Untersuchungen über die innere Wahrheit den Christenthums, published in 1805, and his Philosophische Einleitung on the introduction to philosophy, which appeared in 1819, set forth an effort at synthesis. It was perhaps sincere but disquieting, in which Protestant thought and even Kant's rationalist thoughts and those of Hegel seemed to merge in the conception of a novel Catholicism. Hardly had Hermes entered upon his professorship in 1820, when he was considered for the rectorship of the university. Fragments of his Dogmatik and especially his review for Catholic philosophy and theology, founded by his disciples in 1832, after his death, spread his doctrine in all German-language countries.

This doctrine began by claiming to be nothing more than a reaction against the dry scholasticism of certain second-rate theologians. But its conclusions tended to a dubious intellectualism which had about it nothing Catholic but the name. Appealing to freethought, as did the Protestants, and turning to no means of investigation but pure reason, like the rationalists, Hermes pretended to reconstitute the totality of the dogmas defined by the Catholic Church. Such an eclectic undertaking at once obtained the favor of the Prussian court, which hastened to give Hermesianism a sort of lay consecration by erecting it into a theology of the state.[8] But Gregory XVI, in his encyclical Dum acerbissimus (September 26, 1835), condemned Hermes' doctrine as departing from the tradition of the Church and leading to a variety of errors. The Pope made his own a decision of the Holy Office, condemning in the doctrine of Hermes several errors on the rule of faith, the essence and attributes of God, original sin, grace, and the future life.[9]

[8] Goyau, op. cit., p. 12. Cf. ibid., pp. 142, 145. For fuller treatment of Hermes' doctrine, see Goyau, op. cit., pp. 2–12, 142, 146, 166–69; Kleutgen, La philosophie scholastique, I, 432; the article "Hermes" in the Kirchenlexicon, V, 1875–99.

Droste, as administrator of the diocese of Münster, had already shown his mistrust regarding Hermes' doctrine. On taking possession of the see of Cologne, he found himself in the presence of a conclusive act of the papal authority. Losing no time in carrying it out, he asked the Bonn professors to submit to the decision of the Holy See and he ordered the students not to attend the classes of the refractory teachers. This act was a serious one, equivalent to placing an interdict on professors appointed by the state. It was to graft on the religious conflict a political conflict. The government threatened to take disciplinary measures, even to the point of excluding from the university those who should obey the orders of the Archbishop. The leaders of the Hermes party proposed a public debate. The Archbishop was not moved by the government's threat and declined to accept the proposed debate. No longer was anyone in a position to debate the cause of Hermes. It had been judged by the Pope. Droste merely extracted from the papal encyclical eighteen condemned theses and asked of his clergy unqualified adherence to these condemnations. Berlin insisted, reducing the exigencies of its demands. They would be satisfied with the Archbishop's silence or at least with a halfway condemnation that would allow the Hermesian doctrine to be spread in a discreet and occult way, letting it be attenuated in explaining it.[10] Said Droste: "The encyclical of the Pope is there." Without willing to give further explanation, he resumed that life of prayer and good works which appeared to the government a guaranty of his docility.

On another occasion the venerated prelate made no different reply to the agents of the King of Prussia. These asked him to agree to the governmental declarations or at least to maintain silence on the question of mixed marriages. "The Pope's encyclical is there," he said. He then spoke of the encyclical of Pius VIII. Placing side by side the papal letter on the 1834 convention and the act of the King, he was unable to reject that of the Pope; thus he had to condemn that of the King.

[9] Denzinger, nos. 1618–21.

[10] Goyau, op. cit., p. 168.

Arrest of Droste-Vischering

But the government desired silence at any price. Being unable to force the Archbishop to be silent, it determined to prevent the people from hearing his voice. For the government the spread of Hermesianism was the means of fusing the different religious and philosophical parties of Germany; so the multiplication of mixed marriages, understood in its own fashion, was the most effective procedure for realizing this fusion in the realm of the practical life. Thus only one German religion would prevail, one German philosophy, as one German fatherland. But to attain this end, they needed the silent complicity of the clergy. As the Archbishop of Cologne placed an obstacle in the way of these plans, they decided to intern him in a fortified place. Thus would they stifle his word, and the example of the punishment would deter his colleagues of the episcopate from raising their voice.

In the evening of November 20, 1837, the St. Gereon square, where the Archbishop's residence was located, was suddenly occupied by troops. Then the Prussian state, under the protection of bayonets, made its entrance into the residence. Bodelschwingh, in the name of his king, had the palace evacuated. The aged prelate was placed in a carriage. A gendarme accompanied him at his side; another was on the watch on the driver's seat. The next morning the faithful of the Cologne diocese learned with amazement that, by the King's will, their archbishop, accused of arrogating arbitrary power and of trampling the royal authority underfoot, was placed in seclusion in the fortress of Minden, in the depth of Westphalia.[11] The silence and inaction of the German episcopate following this outrage seemed to justify all the hopes of the Prussian government. Canon Lennig at the Würzburg assembly declared: "At the time of Clemens August's arrest, an unprecedented thing in the history of the Church took place. It occurred in consequence of a lack of unity: the German episcopate did nothing." [12]

A center was lacking in Germany, but not at Rome. From Rome arrived the solemn and peremptory protest. Gregory XVI, in the presence of the Sacred College (December 10, 1837), complained "of the grave indignity he had received." In the name of the violated ecclesiastical immunity, of the despised episcopal dignity, of usurped jurisdiction, and of the rights of the Catholic Church and of the Holy See trodden underfoot, the Pope praised the eminently virtuous bishop whom Prussia had just deposed in an unworthy manner.[13] A week later Cardinal Lambruschini transmitted the text of the papal allocution to all the members of the diplomatic corps by a most solemn letter.

The impression produced by this allocution was immense. Lamennais, separated from the Church, had, in his Paroles d'un croyant and later in a sensational pamphlet, Les affaires de Rome, represented Gregory as bold against whatever seemed to him to be error, but as timid toward the mighty. In the present circumstance the Pope's attitude was a clear denial of such a view. Montalembert rejoiced. In the Univers for December 29, 1837, he wrote a stirring article, saying: "The Supreme Pontiff's allocution is an event. . . . Its importance will increase as events follow. Henceforth the most distrustful and irritated souls, if they have kept some good faith, will know how to view these reproaches of servility, of connivance with the oppressors of religion, reproaches that have been hurled at the court of Rome." [14]

[11] Goyau, op. cit., p. 171.
[12] Ibid., p. 173.
[13] Bernasconi, II, 237.

Montalembert spoke truly. From the Pope's allocution (December 10, 1837) dates the awakening of Catholic Germany. A young priest of Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle), who had gone to Belgium to avoid the teaching at the Bonn university, the future Bishop John Laurent, translated the allocution into German and sent bundles of copies for his fellow Germans in the Rhineland. Goerres took up his pen and, in four weeks, composed a book entitled Athanasius, a sparkling and animated commentary on the papal document. Therein he said that the Church did not seek the state, but the state, coming after the Church, went to find it; the Church, dwelling in the house before the state, received it there, but on condition that the state would keep the peace.[15] He was called the German O'Connell. His pen, in the words of John Laurent, "was worth four army corps." At his side two theologians, Döllinger and Moehler, and two jurists, Moy and Phillips, entered the lists. The impulse was given.

The Catholic people, tired of the heavy oppression under which they had been held by a servile episcopate, of a sudden rose up in favor of the imprisoned prelate. At Cologne the mob broke the windows of the houses of canons who were guilty of not defending their archbishop. At Coblenz and Paderborn could be seen men mounting guard day and night to protect priests they thought might be arrested by the police. In Westphalia the nobility decided to abstain from amusements, and to suspend dances and big evening parties so long as Droste-Vischering remained in prison. In the churches of Aachen the people gathered together and recited aloud prayers for the liberation of the Archbishop.

[14] Montalembert, Œuvres, III, 252, 254 f.
[15] Montalembert, op. cit., III, 252–55.

The official circles at Berlin were much humiliated and disquieted. This state of affairs was at the time when the government felt victory almost in its grasp. It was the moment when the different Protestant Churches without exception, the most independent scholars of the Reformation, even Schleiermacher, the champion of freedom of consciences, had bent before the dogmatizing of a Hohenzollern. Moreover, at the cost of so many efforts and deceptions, they had obtained from the Catholic episcopate a timid, almost complaisant, silence. Then indeed the Pope's words troubled all Germany and threatened the collapse of the edifice they had patiently built up. Should they act rigorously? Should they break with the Pope? Some advised this course. But the undertaking seemed full of perils. Ambassador Neibuhr did not hesitate to criticize the Berlin policy; even the prince apparent, Frederick William, complained of the agents who had conducted the affairs so clumsily.[16] The mighty defender of order and authority in Europe, Prince Metternich, declared that the unpleasant situation of the Prussian government was owing to the clumsiness of its policy.[17]

The Berlin court hesitated. It did not dare use force to suppress the popular manifestations, yet it was unwilling to let the Pope's act pass without reply. It had the bishop of Posen, Martin von Dunin, arrested and haled into court for having threatened with suspension any priests who would bless the mixed marriages without the required promises. The consistorial allocutions (September 13, 1838, and July 8, 1839) in strong language condemned these encroachments by the civil power on the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. All the lower clergy of Germany echoed the Pope's words. Priests suppressed the pomp of public worship in their churches, and some of the laity were seen wearing permanent mourning for the period during which the Bishop would continue to be imprisoned. The sympathetic feeling reached the worldly or indifferent. The young August Reichensperger, the future great orator of the German Center, felt himself torn from a life of an idle man of letters in order to devote himself to a life of action and strife. All Europe was interested in the lot of the illustrious prisoners. Montalembert wrote to the Bishop of Posen: "From the depth of your prison, as from a sanctuary, you are a lesson and a consolation for the whole Church." [18] The twelve bishops of North America, assembled in council at Baltimore, in 1840, sent to the imprisoned prelates the expression of their deep admiration.

[16] Ranke, Zur Geschichte Deutschlands und Frankreichs im neunzehnten Jahrhundert, p. 366.

[17] Metternich, Mémoires, VI, 274.

At this juncture, in 1840, Frederick William III died, leaving the throne to his son. This son, Frederick William IV, had already taken account of the dangerous situation. His mind was especially concerned with the need of strongly maintaining the unity of the kingdom of Prussia. But the recent events threatened serious danger to that unity. The Westphalians, assigned to Prussia by the treaties of 1815, had accepted their new masters willingly enough. But, ardent Catholics that they were, the vexations against their archbishop exasperated them and made them regret the loss of their independence. For the Poles, who had always desired national autonomy, the imprisonment of their bishop made the domination of the King of Prussia more intolerable. Assuredly Frederick William III, wishing to strengthen the national unity by religious uniformity, had taken no steps to prepare for the political division of his nation. Frederick William IV resolved to establish the political union by the restoration of religious peace.

By a royal decree of July 29, 1840, the Bishop of Posen was authorized to return to his diocese. In virtue of an accord with the Holy See, the Archbishop of Cologne, released from his imprisonment, received a coadjutor who administered the diocese in his name. By this sacrifice, to which the Pope agreed only after long discussions, the King granted full liberty to the Catholic Church in the kingdom of Prussia.[19]

[18] Lecanuet, Montalembert, II, 36.

Catholic Renaissance in Germany

The results of this struggle and this victory were immeasurable. The Catholic regeneration of Germany dates from the Cologne affair. Thereafter the Prussian policy with regard to the Catholic Church was bound to be one of pacification. On the other hand, under the pressure of the events, a Catholic opinion was formed, which had its eloquent spokesmen and organized manifestations. The new attitude of the state and the activity of the Catholics made possible the creation of works of education, of propaganda, of religious defense, of social action, and of scientific apologetics. All these were the glory of Catholic Germany in the nineteenth century.

For the Church of Prussia, with the coming of Frederick William IV, began the winning of its liberties. In the first months of 1841 the only Germanic country where the clergy could communicate with the Holy See unhindered and publish the acts of Rome without hindrance was the kingdom of Prussia. The Punctuation of Ems, by which the prince archbishops of the eighteenth century dismissed the nuncios, became decidedly obsolete. The Church was no longer a subordinate entity, but a contracting party. In his short work on the Church and the state after the error of Cologne, Goerres took account of this new fact. In the years after 1841 the difficulties were solved in a bilateral fashion, by arrangements between the bishops of Prussia and the Prussian ministry. Berlin accepted or refused or proposed; but Berlin no longer imposed. Previously a bureaucracy, mostly Protestant, passed on its orders to the bishops; now, in the Berlin ministry of worship, was a Catholic section, composed of Catholics and having as its function the affairs of the Roman Church. In January, 1841, Frederick William IV created this institution. It assured to Prussia, until the Kulturkampf, thirty years of religious peace.[20]

[19] For fuller details, see Hergenröther, Kirchengeschichte, III, Part III, chap. 11, sec. 7.

At the same time the Catholics, shaking off their apathy, were ceaselessly active. The political poet Hoffmann von Fallersleben declared to the German sovereigns: "You have awakened Michael; you will not succeed in putting him to sleep again." [21] Having awakened at the time of the Cologne affair, a marvelous power arose: something that no one had invented or led or regulated, a Catholic opinion.[22] Although no one had created this new power entirely, it had some eloquent interpreters. We mention the aged Bishop Keller, who in 1842 obtained from the first Würtemberg Chamber a vote favorable to the liberty of the Church; Professor Franz Joseph Buss, who in 1845, in the archduchy of Baden, organized a petition for the recovery of religious liberties. Everywhere, from top to bottom of the social ladder and in all parts of Germany, a movement took shape which an orator of the time compared to the Irish agitation under the leadership of O'Connell.[23]

One of the first happy results of this agitation was felt in the religious education of the people. Criticism has been directed against the theological construction of John Baptist Hirscher, professor in Tübingen faculty, then in that of Freiburg in Breisgau. We must confess that, in the exposition of dogma, he departed from the Scholastic method and that he preferred to follow the historical order in expounding religious truths. But, if we consider his point of view and the marvelous results obtained by his method, his work on catechetics (1831) and his Catechism (1845) must be regarded as masterpieces of [20] Cf. Goyau, op. cit., pp. 253–59.

[21] Saint-René-Taillandier, Histoire de la jeune Allemagne, p. 60.
[22] Eichendorff. See Keiter, Joseph von Eichenforff, p. 94.
[23] Lenning, at the Catholic Congress of Mainz, 1848.

pedagogy. The Jesuit Deharbe and Father Schuster and Father Stolz follow a somewhat different path. But no one can deny that the pedagogical zeal of the clergy for the teaching of catechism received an impetus from the initiatives of Hirscher. Between 1840 and 1846 the publisher Herder prepared the publication of the Kirchenlexikon. This work was undertaken under the direction of Wetzer and Welte and with the collaboration of Allioli, Hefele, and the leading Catholic scholars of Germany. Copies of this work would enrich the libraries of German ecclesiastics and educated laymen. In 1844 the Borromeus Verein was active in grouping studious persons together, in procuring books by the foundation of libraries, and in opening to Catholic writers markets for the publication of their works.[24]

Even Catholic art became more Catholic, or at least took on a more distinctly Catholic coloring. Around the first pictures of the "Nazarenes" the two Christian religions seemed to have sworn to a sort of truce of God: a city as Protestant as Frankfort invited the Catholic Veit to come and direct its museum. Now this truce was abandoned. In 1845 and 1846 Father Martin Deutinger, philosopher of Munich, published two volumes on esthetics in which he showed how the artistic conscience needs divine revelation for its expansion. In Deutinger's mind, worship and art are the two culminating points of civilization; and esthetics invites art to become the devotee of revelation.[25]

The life radiating from Catholicism exercised its influence on the Protestants themselves. The historian Frederick Hurter, the author of a life of Innocent III which won Montalembert's

[24] In 1832 Catholic literature was enriched with Moehler's Symbolik, a work of capital value, which brought together for comparison Catholic logic and Protestant logic. The whole plan of this powerfully constructed work is expressed in the statement of its author: "Why the Catholic Church conceives justification as it does and cannot conceive it otherwise, and why the Protestant has to conceive justification as it does, these are questions that no one can penetrate without grasping the organic connection of all the doctrines."

[25] Goyau, op. cit., p. 223.

enthusiasm, became a convert in 1844. Many of his fellow Protestants, though remaining outside the Roman Church, admired its majesty, its beauty, and the fruitfulness of its works in the course of history. The poet Novalis sang the praises of the Blessed Virgin, and the historian Boehmer, who published the Regesta of the old empire, hailed in the papacy a supreme preservative against military despotism.

CHAPTER XVIII

The Church in France

WE HAVE related the history of the Catholic revival in Germany. We likewise had occasion to note the echo it had in France, in the young school that had Montalembert for its most eloquent spokesman. There also a new generation, earnest, devoted to the liberty of the Church, had arisen and declared itself in broad daylight. Montalembert (April 16, 1844), addressing the House of Peers, said: "Gentlemen, among you a generation of men has sprung up whom you do not know. Whether you call them neo-Catholics, sacristans, or ultramontanes, as you choose, the name is of no moment; the thing exists. . . . In the midst of a free people, we do not wish to be islets. We are the successors of the martyrs, and we do not tremble before the successors of Julian the Apostate. We are the sons of the Crusaders, and we do not recoil before the sons of Voltaire." [1]

How was this Catholic movement formed in France, amid what difficulties did it grow, toward what goal did it advance? The answer to these questions is what remains for us to set forth in order to complete the features of the pontificate of Gregory XVI.

The beginning of the July monarchy was marked by violent attacks on religion. Yet King Louis Philippe did not inaugurate a policy openly hostile to the Church. Personally a skeptic or at least but little concerned with religious questions, not perceiving their true import,[2] he understood, by instinct and

[1] Montalembert, Œuvres, I, 293, 404.

[2] The significance of the struggle of Catholics for the freedom of education always eluded his grasp. He never understood Montalembert's religious convictions, when the latter, in the Chamber, was fighting to defend his faith. He used to ask: "When experience, the danger involved for the civil power in alienating a force such as that of the clergy, in disturbing the conscience of Catholics. He said: "Never should anyone meddle in the affairs of the Church." With regard to Catholicism he would gladly have adhered to this policy of non-intervention which was his program in international relations. Louis Philippe was full of personal valor, but he was timid in political matters.[3] He let his officials—ministers, magistrates, or prefects—do as they liked when, imbued with bitter prejudices against the Catholic Church, they exercised local vexations, they allowed or incited popular uprisings against the "priests' party," as it was then called.

The conflict which the Church in France had to endure was indeed not, as in Germany, a direct struggle with the civil power. Rather it was a conflict against doctrines and passions toward which the government showed an excessive weakness, sometimes a secret satisfaction. These doctrines and passions assumed two forms: that of the Voltairian spirit widespread in the middle classes and that of revolutionary socialism, much in favor in the popular classes.

Beginning in 1830 the greatest poets of the period, Lamartine and Victor Hugo, turned to rationalist deism. Good critics have thought that between the emancipation of the imagination which found expression in the romanticism of the day, and the emancipation of individual reason which revived Voltairianism, more than a simple coincidence existed, rather an intimate relation.[4] The skeptical and jeering spirit was expressed by a certain man, possessed of mediocre talent, a colorless and commonplace style,[5] but of such popularity that no writer of the will Montalembert receive holy orders?" The discussion over the freedom of education he called a quarrel of pedants and sacristans.

---

[3] Every Sunday Louis Philippe attended Mass in a chapel, but without ado or ceremony.

[4] F. Brunetière, Manuel de l'histoire de la littérature française, p. 454.

[5] Lanson, Histoire de la littérature française, p. 955.

time, not even Victor Hugo, could rival his glory,[6] the song writer Béranger. Chateaubriand even compared him to La Fontaine, Horace, and Tacitus.[7] In his Dieu des bonnes gens, smiling and fluent, Sainte-Beuve, likewise a skeptic, acknowledged a God as Voltaire thought of Him in his best moments.[8] Béranger expressed the ideas of the contemporary bourgeois; hence his success.[9] Around him was an outburst of caricatures outraging the clergy, theatrical performances with titles that insulted religion. The following are samples: The Jesuit, The Congregationist, The Dragons and the Benedictines, The Cloistered Victims.[10] In the press some papers disappeared along with the government they had overthrown, and the Globe survived it for only two years. But from the Journal des Débats, which already gloried in having on its editorial staff the most remarkable literary talents, to the Charivari, a periodical leaflet full of spirit and insolence, the most widespread press in the constitutional camp as also in the liberal camps, some more restrained in style, others more violent, had not repudiated the spirit of Voltaire. This spirit it expressed more crudely and violently, without the serious tone and moral veneer of the Restoration.

The popular classes did not escape the imprint of that Voltairian spirit. But more profound and more serious concerns, at once taking a perverse turn, had likewise seized them and remarkably disturbed them. By a strange coincidence, exemplified at the close of the eighteenth century, the outburst of scoffing impiety was accompanied with an irresistible need for the religious ideal. The religious sentiment seemed to be astray

[6] Ibid., p. 954.

[7] "Under the simple title of song writer, a man has become one of the greatest poets that France ever produced. With a genius that connects him with La Fontaine and Horace, he has sung when he wished, as Tacitus wrote." Chateaubriand, Etudes historiques, p. 20.

[8] Sainte-Beuve, Portraits contemporains, I, 93.

[9] Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, I, 250.

[10] Lanson, op. cit., p. 955.

in society like an exile who goes rapping on all doors. The religious longing, finding the door of Catholicism closed by the railing skepticism of Voltaire, sought its satisfaction in socialism.

Idealistic Socialism

The word "socialism," which for men of today suggests especially ideas of political organization, awakened quite different notions following the July revolution. The French socialist from 1830 to 1848, is a dreaming idealist who, with more or less good faith, tries to reconcile the principles of the revolution with those of Christianity. In 1831 the Nouveau Christianisme, a posthumous work of Saint-Simon, became the manual of his school, which was directed by two of his disciples, Bazard and Enfantin. Fourier had published his principal writings; Leroux had set forth his ideas in the Globe, and Buchez in the Européen. One of Saint-Simon's last words on his deathbed was this: "Religion cannot disappear from the world; it is merely transformed"; and his disciples formed themselves into a sort of Church with its different degrees of initiation, its worship, its feasts, its officers, its supreme father, or pope, in the person of him who was called Father Enfantin.[11]

Buchez, of all the leaders of the school the nearest to Catholicism, went so far as to say that he saw salvation for society only in the civilizing influence of the Roman Church. With the same zeal and the same conviction he preached the sovereignty of the people, the abolition of capital, the social equality of all men, the love of duty, and Christian brotherhood to the point of sacrifice. His chief followers would be Roux-Lavergne, Réquédat, Piel, Besson, Olivaint. The first of these, having turned back from the utopian contents of the master's doctrine, later became canon of Nîmes; Réquédat, Piel, and Besson died in the Dominican habit;[12] Olivaint became a Jesuit and gave his life for the faith during the Paris Commune in 1871;[13] and Buchez, rewarded for his uprightness, received a priest when he was dying and died a genuine Christian.[14]

[11] See Œuvres de Saint-Simon et d'Enfantin, III, 176 and passim.

However, we must not suppose that the socialists of this period exhausted all their efforts in the domain of fanciful dreams. Although they did not organize political parties, they were the creators of socialism. They were the ones who thought up all the criticisms of existing society, all the maxims, even the practical schemes and measures of socialist reform. Before 1848 they were already talking of "the exploitation of man by man," "the right of labor, of anarchy, of social democracy, of the strifes of the masses, of the workingman's party, of an international entente between workers, of emancipation of the proletariat, of the organization of labor. They proposed the cooperative association of producers, national workshops, free credit, progressive taxation, the eight-hour day, the general strike. The socialist parties which developed later lived on the intellectual work of the first half of the century."[15]

A general inspiration of brotherhood animated various socialist schools following the July revolution. This led some of Buchez' disciples to Catholic orthodoxy. But in the case of the followers of Saint-Simon, it degenerated into a sensualism that, not content with being theoretical, ended in the most scandalous disorders. A certain historian of the July monarchy rightly says that Saint-Simonism, fruitless for good, was not so for evil. It produced an unhealthful poison that penetrated the veins of the nation. It sought to substitute for Christian hopes an impatient pursuit of immediate blessings and the rem-

[12] Cartier, Vie de R. P. Besson.

[13] Clair, Vie du P. Olivaint.

[14] On Buchez, see Calippe, Attitude sociale des catholiques au XIX^e siècle, pp. 137, 191.

[15] Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 686.

edy for all evils in the complete reshaping of the social mechanism. Thus it abandoned Christian doctrine, which taught renouncement and respect for authority, after at first unfurling the banner of this sound teaching. By a utopian desire for equality, wishing to apportion the fruits of labor and the revenues of capital through the medium of authority, it prepared the way for the despotic schemes of state socialism.

By these tendencies the socialism of 1830, or at least the most important branch of it, joined hands with philosophical rationalism and in this combination constituted a peril for the Christian faith. A good number of French Catholics saw this danger and endeavored to thwart it.

The Catholic Press in France

One of the outsanding propaganda instruments of the Voltairian spirit and of the socialist doctrines was the press. By means of the press also the Catholics resolved to enter the strife. To affirm the faith against all the negations of Voltairianism and against all the attenuations of Gallicanism; to defend, against the utopias of socialism, the well-being of the people and their liberty: such was the program of the group of Catholics which (October 16, 1830) brought out the first number of a daily with the title of L'Avenir, bearing the motto "God and Liberty."

Three papers had already assumed the task of defending religion. These were the Ami de la religion et du roi, the Mémorial catholique, and the Correspondant. The first of these, founded in 1814 by the scholarly author of the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique du XVIII^e^ siècle, Michel Picot, grouped about its industrious and intelligent director the most eminent representatives of Catholic thought: Bishop Boulogne, Father Frayssinous, Father Lécuy, Father Lamennais, and Viscount Bonald. The abundance of its accounts, the honesty of its news, both contributed to its great success in the Catholic world.[16]

But many persons complained that it had a sympathy for a moderated Gallicanism. The Mémorial catholique, started in 1824, had a more militant appearance, but it addressed a special public, which was further lessened by the appearance in 1829 of a new Catholic paper, which came out semi-weekly, the Correspondant.[17] The new organ counted among its collaborators Louis de Carné, Franz de Champagny, Théophile Foisset, and Edmond de Cazalès. For its slogan it took the saying of Canning: "Civil and religious liberty for the whole universe." After the July revolution its editors, all originally legitimists, declared that they separated the cause of the Catholic Church from that of the vanquished princes, and that it accepted any government that would assure order by giving religious liberty.

Lamennais

But the group of young Catholics that followed Lamennais as their leader hoped to have a big daily paper. It should be more alive, freer from attachment to the former parties, more exclusively Catholic, and more devoted to the popular cause. As his followers knew, Father Lamennais originally had been a royalist of the extreme right, a believer in theocracy, favoring the absolute and paternal power of a monarch subject to the lofty pre-eminence of the Roman Pontiff. But they knew also that, in his book on the progress of the revolution, he foretold the fall of a royalty that refused to follow his program and he [16] These qualities make them the most valuable source that can be consulted on the religious history of the first half of the nineteenth century. After the July revolution the Ami de la religion et du roi suppressed part of its title and became the Ami de la religion. It then appeared three times a week instead of twice. See Ledos, article "Ami de la religion," in the Dictionnaire d'histoire ecclésiastique, II, 1225.

[17] The Correspondant did not appear in the form of a review until 1843.

earnestly wished for a revolution to avenge the misunderstood right. And then, seeing O'Connell snatch Irish liberty from the English monarchy, the Belgians win their independence by an alliance with the liberals, and the French overthrow a royalty guilty of no more respecting the rights of the people than the rights of the Church, he rejoiced at seeing his prophecies realized. From that time on, all his former sympathies for the monarchy were dead and never revived.

Some have said that for Lamennais the events of July had been like a revolutionary Sinai, where, in the midst of the lightning, he thought he heard a divine voice, which converted him to liberalism and democracy.[18] The comparison will not appear extraordinary to those who have closely studied that strange character, so versatile and absolute, moved by his impressions when he thought himself led by logic, and ever ready to take the promptings of his self-esteem or of his anger for messages of God.[19] When, in September, 1830, Father Gerbet passed on to him the money offering of an obscure writer, Harel du Tancrel, for the foundation of a daily paper, Lamennais accepted it enthusiastically. Besides other motives, an additional one was probably that of having an organ of his school, of his personal thought, because all the future editors who took a stand at his side—Gerbet, Lacordaire, Montalembert, and Charles de Coux

[18] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., I, 286.

[19] Benoit-Champy wrote: "You would have to live, as I did, in a long intimacy with Lamennais, to understand his strange character. . . . A simple credulity was there mingled with a headstrong stubbornness. In the evening smashing the idol he had adored in the morning, a rigorous logician to the utmost limits, even to absurd consequences, he had to be what he was, ultramontane and revolutionary: despite his perpetual contradictions, believing himself, or at least forcing himself to believe himself, the most logical man and the least changeable; ever seeking his path, ever thinking he had found it, even while endlessly changing it. . . . For that vast and impressionable mind, religion, that is, the faith, and submission to the rule were necessary because nothing else could give him calm and serenity" (Benoit-Champy, Quelques souvenirs sur la mort de M. de Lamennais). Benoit-Champy, one of the testamentary executors chosen by Lamennais, was, by relationship and intimate association, one of the most authentic witnesses to his life and thoughts. The lines quoted above give the key to many problems in the agitated life of Lamennais.

—felt the sway of his renown and were prepared to develop his doctrines. The Avenir was Lamennais, with his generosities, his impetuosity, his excesses of language and thought, and his imprudences of policy.

The Avenir

We must acknowledge that never was the Catholic faith expressed in language more lofty and vibrant. Declared Montalembert: "We gather up the debris of the cross and swear eternal worship for it. . . . If we had been granted the privilege of living in the time of Christ and of seeing Him but for a moment, we would have chosen that moment when, crowned with thorns and falling from fatigue, He advanced toward Calvary; just as we thank God for having placed the short instant of our mortal life at a time when His holy religion has fallen on evil ways, that we may be able to sacrifice our existence to Him more completely, to adore Him more closely." [20] The valiant paper denounced the outrages to religion, the vexations of the mayors or local officials toward priests and the faithful, along with the weaknesses and complicity of the authorities with the enemies of religion. The paper went even further. Lacordaire suggested (November 25, 1830) that the bishops reject the first episcopal nominations made by Louis Philippe.

His article and one by Lamennais on the oppression of the Catholics were made the basis for legal charges against the two writers; but they were acquitted by the jury. To meet the expenses they opened a subscription for which contributions from five centimes (one cent) to five francs (one dollar) were accepted. The success of this case decided Lamennais to found the general agency for the defense of religious liberty. The association was to prosecute before the courts every act committed against the liberty of the clergy, to uphold the right of holding meetings, and to group together the local societies that purposed assuring religious liberty. In fact, several local societies were founded. Montalembert toured southern France, and there his enthusiastic words won a considerable number of adherents to the cause of religious freedom.[21]

[20] Avenir of February 21, 1831.

The Avenir, to offset the socialist danger, took up the economic and social problem and championed the defense of the popular classes. Lamennais, with his usual penetration, saw that, although the "legal country" under the July government was constituted by the bourgeoisie, beneath this organization in the political sphere was the people, almost ignored by the Charter, but the people that was stirred, that discussed the problems, and that, like the third estate of the Old Regime, complained of being nothing and wished to be everything.

One of the contributors to the Avenir, Charles de Coux, spoke with true competence. He denounced the faulty sharing of the goods of this world, the exploitation of the workers by capitalism, and, in reply to certain Catholics of the time, the inadequacy of the alms to remedy the misery. He attacked the liberal economics of Smith, Say, and Sismondi. He charged it with being concerned only with the production of wealth and with its distribution, of attributing to industrial progress an end in itself, and consequently of taking no account of the worker, the real producer. It sacrificed the worker, he said, to material prosperity, considered him merely a machine that must indeed be maintained in good condition that it may function with regularity, but from which it is allowable to require more and more work, while spurring it by stimulants like hunger and need. He said: "The economists were careful not to ask whether the distribution of the public wealth is not as important as its increase; in such inquiry they would have encountered Catholicism." [22] He then accused them of drying up the sources of the religious life in the hearts of workers and employers, and thus of destroying the most powerful basis of true progress. In the presence of the wretchedness of the people, the economists, said Charles de Coux, "would be scarcely more useful to the common people than would a dancing teacher to paralytics." [23]

[21] C. Weill, Histoire du cath. lib. en France, p. 40.

As a cure for this state of things, the Avenir favored with all its might the experiment of associations. It admired the wonderful corporative organization of the Middle Ages. It blamed the Revolution for their destruction and spoke of trying to re-establish them. Meanwhile it favored the foundation of agricultural colonies, a combination of industrial activities and farming activities, and particularly of the priests' participation in these undertakings. Said Lamennais, "this intervention will always be needed not merely to give these associations the moral character on which their political usefulness and their material prosperity would depend, but also to provide a third, disinterested party that could intervene between the rich and the poor."

The Avenir's Excesses

These campaigns were in themselves praiseworthy. But unhappily the Avenir used violent language and doctrinal exaggerations which soon aroused the susceptibilities of part of the clergy and would lead to the paper's condemnation by the Pope.

The program of the Avenir contained two parts: one negative, the other positive. The negative part was summed up in [22] Avenir of January 10, 1831; Mélanges catholiques, I, 107. Under the title of Mélanges catholiques extraits de l'Avenir, the Agence générale pour la defense de la liberté religieuse published, in 1831, a collection of the principal articles that had appeared in the Avenir.

[23] Avenir of June 30, 1831; Mélanges catholiques. I, 85.

two points: for what concerned the Church, its complete separation from the state; for what concerned the people, its freedom from all political and social authority. The separation of Church and state was something the Avenir asked for in full, an absolute separation, without any transition stage, without preliminary agreement, with immediate renunciation of state support. According to Lamennais the union of Church and state led necessarily to the enslavement of the Church; the state support led to its shame and its discredit among the people. "The bit of bread that the state throws to it, is the basis of its oppression; although free according to the law, it is, whatever it does, enslaved by this support." [24] As for the people, like a child that has grown up and possesses freedom as his father does, so the people, having grown up in intelligence, acquire the right to manage themselves. This time has come for the Christian peoples; it will come for the others. As this freedom is exercised solely by intelligence and love, not under compulsion, this new sovereignty of the peoples will not be oppressive like that of the kings. Consequently it will be a friend of the Church, which will become the firmest support of popular liberties, not by the exercise of any political jurisdiction, but by its own inner and spiritual strength.

The positive part of the Avenir's religious and political program was summed up in an article published by Lamennais under this title, Ce que sera le catholicisme dans la société nouvelle. In the future society, constituted by the liberated peoples and by an independent Church, the author sees three things develop. First, it will have a truly Catholic science, no longer simply a matter of words, abstract and empty, like that of the Middle Ages, which will penetrate dogma far enough to disclose there and clarify, in a way, the very laws of creation, and which, based on the constituent laws of intellect, will bring the various orders of knowledge into unity. Secondly, it will have a political harmony which, founded on love, "will successively efface, as far as possible on earth, what divides individuals and nations, and these, politically freed, will live a powerful and common life." Lastly, it will have a social organization such that the poor and the workmen, instead of being the pariahs of society, will in reality become what they are in the true concept of Christianity, the friends of the priest, "the privileged ones of Christ, who was Himself poor and suffering, of Christ who said, Blessed are those who weep." Particular applications of this program showed its utopian and dangerous parts. In two articles on the future of society, the director of the Avenir demanded of the government without delay six principal liberties: 1. liberty of conscience, complete, universal, without distinction and without privilege; 2. liberty of teaching, as promised by the Charter; 3. liberty of the press, for it should have faith in the truth and its eternal power; 4. liberty of association, which is a matter of natural law; 5. liberty of election, which should reach to the bosom of the masses; 6. liberty of the provinces and the communes by decentralization.

[24] Avenir of October 18, 1830. Cf. Mélanges catholiques, I, 150.

Such a program contained some good reforms. But it was dominated by an erroneous principle. Said Lamennais: "The truth is all-powerful. What most retards its triumph is the support which material force tries to lend it." [25] The uneasiness aroused by this program increased when the director of the Avenir tried to unite in a vast federation, not only the Catholics of France, Belgium, Ireland, Poland, and Germany, but even the liberals of all countries. An Act of Union was drawn up to this effect, which the editors of the Avenir presumptuously called "The Great Charter of the Age." [26] The governments bestirred themselves. Some saw in Lamennais' project a sort of new Carbonarism, and denounced him to Rome. Such an agitation, uniting in an affirmation of the same aspirations and toward a goal much suspected of revolutionary liberalism, of Catholics and unbelievers, could not but be ill received by the Holy See.

[25] For the passages quoted and details referred to in the preceding paragraphs, cf. Avenir, 1830; Mélanges, Vol. I.

[26] Boutard, Lamennais, II, 189–215.

The writers of the Avenir, with too little reflection and prudence, signing the "Act of Union," had in a way signed their own condemnation.[27] Protests arose in France and Italy; several bishops showed their disapproval; many subscribers refused to receive the paper or no longer renewed their connection with it. An ill-considered and violent article against the Carlists of Spain, who were accused of sacrificing God for their king and of degrading their altars to be merely a throne,[28] exasperated the royalists of all countries. The Gazette de France joined the Ami de la religion in attacking the Avenir and in leveling at its editors the most treacherous insinuations.[29] Discontinuance of subscriptions increased. From 3,000, the subscriptions fell to 1,500. Poorly managed, the paper's treasury was empty. In May, 1831, an urgent appeal for funds was issued, addressed to some friends in France and Belgium. Several followers withdrew from the master.

Father Prosper Guéranger wrote to Lamennais (June 11, 1831): "I learn with pain that Léon Boré has left you." Others, on the contrary, felt their ardor redouble in the strife. Father Guéranger, in the letter just quoted, said: "I hope to work always under your direction and to make myself more and more worthy of the benevolence you have ever shown toward me." The young, zealous canon of Le Mans announced to Lamennais that he was sending him a book which he had just published on the abolition of concordats, hoping that "this book, by directing the attention of the clergy, would prepare for the great work of the abolition of the concordats in France." [30]

[27] Ibid., II, 215.

[28] Avenir of February 18, 1831.

[29] Canon Sibour, future archbishop of Paris, wrote from Nimes to Lamennais (November 13, 1831): "I need to pour out my heart to you. The purest intentions are misunderstood. The calumnies accumulate. One bishop wrote to his priests: 'I know that you belong to that sect of presbyterians who no longer desire a hierarchy.' . . . Do but look at the arms which your adversaries are using: intrigues, insinuations, outrages." Cf. Boutard, op. cit., II, 244–48.

But the stockholders of the Avenir, at their meeting in Paris on November 11, did not hide from themselves the seriousness of the paper's situation. They unanimously declared that, if "the material position of the enterprise permitted it to continue for several months," the suspension of the paper seemed to them to be demanded for the sake of the doctrines defended by the Avenir.[31] Consequently in the number of November 15, 1831, the editors announced that, "to advance, as far as it depended on them, the desired moment that would calm all consciences, three of them—Father Lamennais, Father Lacordaire, and Count Montalembert—would leave at once for Rome. Some say that we are condemned at Rome. Very well, to Rome we will go to hear our sentence, prostrate before the see of St. Peter." [32]

[30] A. Roussel, Correspondance inédite de Lamennais et de l'abbé Guéranger (1820–1832), pp. 20 f. This correspondence is quoted by Roussel in his Lamennais et ses correspondants inconnus, pp. 189–231. Guéranger had been one of the guests at La Chênaie and collaborated in the Avenir. The author of Dom Guéranger, abbé de Solesmes, rightly says that Father Guéranger, in attaching himself to Lamennais, saw in him especially the undisputed and venerated leader of the ultramontane school; but he is less exact when he declares that Guéranger was far from espousing his philosophical system. On March 15, 1830, Prosper Guéranger wrote to Lamennais: "The war against common sense (that is, against the philosophical system of the Essay on Indifference) and its consequences is ever flagrant to St. Sulpice. Carrière had just put the last touch to his folio of last year. . . . Besides, he is the most loyal of your adversaries. He has read and reread you; he even knows you by heart. Only, he does not understand you, and I fear that he will never understand you" (Roussel, op. cit., p. 14).

Rohrbacher, another collaborator of the Avenir, drawn to Lamennais by the desire to defend the ultramontane doctrines and to oppose Gallicanism, also adhered to the master's philosophical doctrines. In the preface of the second edition of his Kirchengeschichte, he relates how, in 1828, he withdrew from the connection. Some Jesuits, among them Father Brzozowski, assistant to the General, had likewise been attracted by Lamennais' doctrines, by his anti-Gallicanism and his antirationalism. Neither of these two men followed Lamennais in his defection. See Burnichon, op. cit., II, 13–46.

[31] Ibid.

[32] Ibid.

CHAPTER XIX

Lamennais

FOR a long time scant information was available about the sojourn of the three pilgrims in Rome. Relying only on Lamennais' Affaires de Rome and the incomplete correspondence of his two companions, the account of this episode, so important in the history of the Church in the nineteenth century, has too often been written in terms but little favorable to the reputation of Pope Gregory XVI. Lamennais has been represented as vainly waiting for two months to hear the reply that a pontiff "pious but ignorant of the state of the Church and the condition of society, immovable in the darkness with which he was encompassed," refused to provide. The indignation of the misunderstood priest overflowed when he learned that the cabinets of Vienna, Saint Petersburg, and Paris, of almost all Europe, alarmed at his republicanism, exerted pressure on the Pope, calling for Lamennais' condemnation. He left Rome, indignant and embittered, and the violent terms of the encyclical Mirari vos, which condemned him, determined in that impressionable temperament and proud spirit, which they had done everything to exasperate, a revolt that, however culpable it may have been, could appeal to extenuating circumstances.

The Case in Rome

In the presence of the documents which public and private archives have recently brought to light, this view can no longer be held.[1] The gravity of the question justifies a detailed consideration. Gregory XVI, who was not narrow-spirited, inflexible, and ill-informed, had not waited until the arrival of the Avenir's three editors before making a deep examination of the serious questions of dogma, of moral, and of religious politics, raised by that paper. Three leading personages were consulted: Father Ventura, general of the Theatines, with whom Lamennais would receive hospitality during his stay in Rome,[2] Cardinal Lambruschini, former nuncio at Paris and thus well informed about the state of minds in France, and Father Baraldi of Modena, a learned and pious ecclesiastic, founder of a journal sympathetic to the group of La Chênaie. We possess their written replies. Ventura declared that Father Lamennais is an extraordinary genius and that his life is beyond reproach, but that several of his theories are dangerous and that care must be taken not to give him or promise him a written approbation of his doctrines. His friends would make abusive use of it.[3] Lambruschini judged that the best procedure would be not to give Lamennais any answer. He came to Rome expecting a triumph; this should not be given him. He intends to give the Pope a sort of summons; to reply is not in accordance with the Pope's dignity.[4] Baraldi was of the opinion that Lamennais should be received cordially, that acknowledgment should be made that he is right in certain things, but his thesis on the sovereignty of the people overthrows the constitution of the Church and of society, and that he should be made to understand this.[5]

[1] Notably the documents found in the Vatican archives and in those of the French minister of foreign affairs, published by Paul Dudon in his book, Lamennais et le Saint-Siège.

What was the attitude of the Avenir's editors? Father Vuarin, who saw Lamennais when the latter was passing through Genoa, wrote: "For three hours we listened to his out-

[2] Boutard, Lamennais, II, 261; Rastoul, Le P. Ventura. Lamennais was so affected by the gracious welcome of the good religious that to him he confided the direction of his conscience during his stay in Rome.

[3] Dudon, op. cit., pp. 127–32.

[4] Ibid., pp. 133–35.

[5] Ibid., pp. 135–37.

bursts of anger. . . . He went to Rome to convert the Pope. . . . His political heresy might indeed throw him into religious heresy." [6]

Having reached Rome, the three journalists, with an insistence that appeared excessive, urged the Holy Father to make a decision. They said: "The Holy See's silence would have as its effect to weaken the courage of those who are devoted to it. This silence would be regarded as a condemnation. An immense part of the population would draw away from religion with more hatred than ever." [7] A commission of theologians was appointed to study the memorial. While these theologians were seriously deliberating, Lamennais, more and more embittered, wrote: "One of the most beautiful days of my life will be that on which I come forth from this big tomb. The mission of the papacy is to hasten the final destruction that must precede the social regeneration. God will save Catholicism by the people." [8] Gregory XVI had Lamennais informed by Cardinal Pacca that the examination of his doctrines, which would have to be thorough and deliberate, could not be done hastily and that he could return to France with his colleagues.[9]

Lacordaire alone understood.[10] Lamennais remained stubborn. He declared that this profound examination was a victory for his cause and that he would stay in Rome to furnish indispensable explanations and to answer any objections.[11] An audience with the Pope (March 13, 1832), at which Gregory did not say a single word about the affair in question, was interpreted by Lamennais as a second victory.[12] To his friends he spoke of nothing but his plan to resume the publication of [6] Revue des Deux Mondes, November 1, 1905, p. 191.

[7] Dudon, p. 148.

[8] Boutard, op. cit., pp. 282–84.

[9] Dudon, op. cit., p. 154.

[10] Lecanuet, Montalembert, II, 285. Lacordaire's departure was decided before the reception of Cardinal Pacca's letter. Blaize, Œuvres inédites de Lamennais, II, 98.

[11] Dudon, op. cit., p. 158.

[12] Ibid., p. 160.

the Avenir; far from abandoning or toning down any of his ideas, he accentuated them by writing a 300-page volume on the ills of the Church and of society and the means of curing them. However, the Holy Father's silence, the growing divergencies between Lamennais and Lacordaire,[13] the moderation of Montalembert's ardor, the inaction, the separation from his friends in France, financial difficulties,[14] and the French ambassador's lack of zeal for his cause, irritated and troubled him. The appearance of the papal brief (June 9, 1832), advising the Poles to submit to Russia, filled the cup of Lamennais' irritation. On July 1 he wrote to his brother that, considering his mission finished, he was going to leave Rome. In fact, he did so (July 9, 1832) and along with Montalembert went to Munich and there rejoined Lacordaire.

The Roman Decision

But an important happening prompted the Pope to break the silence sooner than he had intended. Even before the examination of the Avenir's doctrine began at Rome, some French prelates, with Archbishop Astros of Toulouse at the head, had, with the concurrence of three priests of St. Sulpice, drawn up a list of the theological errors which they had found in the Essay on Indifference and in addition some blameworthy prop-

[13] Lacordaire wrote to Gerbet (June 25, 1832): "The resumption of the Avenir seems to me to be in opposition to the act that suspended it and to be destructive of the influence that Father Lamennais has acquired with Catholics." Two months later he wrote that the renewed publication of the Avenir, which appeared imminent, seemed to him both fatal and hopeless. "I stand aloof," he said, "so as not to be either a collaborator or a foe of a work that distresses me" (letter transmitted to us by Father Even, a Paris diocesan missioner).

[14] A Libraire classique élémentaire, in which Lamennais had sunk his funds, became insolvent. One of the creditors obtained a court decision ordering the imprudent investor's arrest for debt. A letter written by Lamennais from Venice (July 31, 1832) contains the information that at this date his financial affairs were not yet arranged and that he was waiting for an arrangement before returning to France.

ositions in the political and social theories of the Avenir.[15] This list was sent to Rome on July 15, 1832. The prelates requested the Pope to confirm their judgment to the extent and in the manner he would find suitable.[16] This intervention of the episcopate made the pontifical commission's decision urgent. That decision, already prepared for by long investigations, was soon issued. The consultors were unanimously of the opinion that the Pope could not longer remain silent. However, in condemning Lamennais' ideas, the Pope, they advised, should act prudently by not naming the father of these errors.[17] On August 9 they presented to the Holy Father a note worded in this sense and accompanied by a suggested apostolic letter in conformity with their conclusions. This was the sketch of the encyclical Mirari vos which Gregory XVI published a week later.[18]

The Encyclical Mirari vos

The papal document, accompanied with a letter of Cardinal Pacca, was sent to Lamennais on August 20, through the Munich nunciature. It reached him in the middle of a banquet

[15] A collection of letters concerning this affair, called "The Toulouse Censure," is to be found in the archives of the St. Sulpice Seminary. This correspondence was made use of by Father Dudon in his Lamennais et le Saint-Siège.

[16] Dudon, op. cit., p. 176.

[17] Ibid., p. 184.

[18] In his book, Affaires de Rome, Lamennais presents the encyclical as having been drawn up under the pressure of European diplomacy, in particular the urging of Prince Metternich. The assertion is not accurate. The following are the facts as established by the documents preserved in the diplomatic archives. Metternich did, in fact, send to Lützow, Austrian ambassador at Rome, a long note of complaint against the two men, Lamennais and Chateaubriand. He particularly accused Lamennais of confounding, in the Avenir, evangelical equality with social equality, of engaging in a revolutionary work under the pretext of a religious work. The Holy Father replied to Metternich that the Avenir did, in fact, have revolutionary tendencies and that he could distinguish in this affair what was religious from what was political. After the appearance of the encyclical Mirari vos, Metternich regretted that it did not contain an authentic consecration of the principles of legitimacy. Cf. Dudon, pp. 118, 120, 208.

that the leading scholars and literary men of the Bavarian capital were offering to the three representatives of the Avenir. The first movement of the illustrious writer was that of complete obedience. After acquainting himself with the encyclical, he merely whispered to his two collaborators: "I have just received a letter of the Pope against us; we must not hesitate to submit." Upon his return to France, he promptly (September 10) signed and published, conjointly with the editors of the Avenir, members of the council of the Agence générale pour la défense de la liberté religieuse, a declaration of submission. The Avenir, provisionally suspended, no longer appeared; the Agence was dissolved. These declarations were well received at Rome, and Cardinal Pacca felicitated Father Lamennais in the name of the Pope.

However, on both sides the new encyclical was the object of impassioned comment. The attention of the Avenir's friends, as also of its adversaries, turned especially to those passages where liberalism, in the various articles of its program—freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, and freedom of the press—was sharply condemned. Even in our time, some historians seem to perceive nothing else in the encyclical. This view is to misunderstand the breadth of the famous pontifical document. It began by formulating discreetly and firmly all the main and just complaints which the editors of the Avenir impressed on public opinion. They had lamented the decline of the Catholic liturgy, they had attacked the blasphemies of rationalist impiety, the encroachments of human politics on the untouchable domain of the religious conscience, the relaxing of the bonds that ought to unite all members of the Church to the supreme pontificate of Rome. They had strongly protested against the corruption of the education given to youth by the professors of the University. They had disclosed the imprudence of those monarchs who, by shaking off the restraints of religion, were laying the ground for the fall of their own thrones, and they had shown the danger of those secret societies which embraced all the elements of disorder to undermine the religious and social institutions.[19] The encyclical Mirari vos made itself the echo of all these demands. Said the Holy Father: "With our heart penetrated by a deep sadness, we come to you to speak about what we lament and weep over. The majesty of divine worship is turned into derision by perverse men. The laws of the Church, its rights, its institutions, these are not safe from the tongues of iniquity. They bitterly attack this Roman See. The bonds of unity are loosened. The authority of the Church is trampled on by human politics. Youth is corrupted by the instruction and examples of the teachers. When the yoke of divine religion is cast off, what do we see being prepared if not the fall of princes and the overthrow of all legal power? And these accumulated calamities have their source especially in the conspiracy of those societies whence flow what is most sacrilegious in heresies and schisms." The Pope next denounced in terms never more vigorously surpassed by the author of the Essay on Indifference, "that foul source of indifferentism from which come forth the evils that afflict the Church and contemporary society." And he pointed out in particular as traceable to that source, the overflowing "freedom of opinions which, against all good sense, sanctions the spread, sale, and consumption of all the poisons on the pretext that no remedy exists against them, and that unrestrained ardor of a brazen independence, which, in harmony with Luther, aspires only to congratulate itself with being free in all matters." The Pontiff ends his encyclical by recommending to princes that they exert all care to maintain intact religion and piety toward God.[20]

In its tenor such is this celebrated encyclical. Some critics have affected to see in it the condemnation in toto of all modern society, but it contains only the condemnation of the revolutionary and lay state. We should recognize it as a simple and energetic, though necessary, reaction of good sense, instructed by the notion of society against the pretentions of any prince or people who would claim that the free conflict of ideas, true or false, is a good in itself,[21] that the right of revolt is a permanent right of peoples, or that an ignoring of the rights of God is permitted to kings.

[19] Avenir of April 23, 1831, article of C. de Coux, Des sociétés secrètes en Italie. Cf. Mélanges, II, 30-40.

[20] Bernasconi, I, 169–74.

Neither Lamennais nor the Avenir was named in the encyclical. This omission was for the purpose of not offending the great writer who, by self-correction, might still render important services to the Church.[22] A second reason was to show that the condemned doctrines were not so much those professed explicitly and verbatim by the school of the Avenir but rather those that might logically be deduced from the direction it was taking.[23]

Unfortunately the Holy Father's prudent reserve was not imitated by all. Archbishop Astros' intimation to the sixty-three bishops who signed the Toulouse censure: "Keep silence so as not to irritate the censured writers," was not observed by all the prelates. Some of them required of their ordinandi an oath to reprove the doctrines of Lamennais and to conform to the censures of the bishops.[24] Astros himself, having received from the Pope a letter which expressed the wish that his judg-

[21] G. Goyau, La papauté et la civilisation.

[22] Cardinal Gregorio, in transmitting (August 18, 1832) the encyclical Mirari vos to the nuncio at Paris, wrote to him: "The Holy Father, wishing to avoid the occasion of irritating a celebrated man who might do much good, has in his wisdom judged as fitting to give an indirect reply that would suffice to let him understand that his views are opposed to those which His Holiness recommends to all the bishops."

[23] Father Lacordaire always maintained that, for what concerned him, he had never intended to uphold, in the Avenir, the thesis of religious liberty taken in an absolute sense, which, he said, is manifestly absurd; but he acknowledged the blameworthy exaggerations of the paper. On this subject, see an interesting letter of Lacordaire to Count de Falloux, dated July 27, 1859, and published in the Correspondant of June 10, 1911, pp. 358–63.

[24] Dudon, p. 249.

ments be accepted in a sincere and absolute manner, wrote to Cardinal Gregorio: "I have no intention of going against the intentions of His Holiness by letting this brief be published in the papers." But the document did, in fact, appear (July 20, 1832) in the Ami de la religion and was warmly discussed in the press.

This publication may have been called for. It was fatal. Journalists saw in this brief, or feigned to see in it, an allusion to the person of Lamennais and called on him to submit or to explain himself. The Gallicans, forgetful of their old distrust toward the Holy See, now spoke only of obedience to the Pope. They distorted the meaning of the encyclical, representing it as inspired chiefly by the defense of the princes against those who attacked them; and the liberal press in turn considered the papal letter under this aspect. Lamennais had retired to the solitude of La Chênaie, purposing to live there unnoticed, in the company of a few faithful followers, removed from any controversy.

But echoes of the disputes that were stirred up in the press reached him there and exasperated him. On November 15, 1832, he wrote to Baron de Vitrolles: "Our friend Coriolis is quite right in telling you that I was not the least shaken in my opinions, that I did not give up any of them, and that, on the contrary, I held to them more than ever." The coolness of some friends, whom he hoped to find more devoted to his cause, the separation from Lacordaire, who, after an attempt to lead him to sentiments of complete submission, abruptly left La Chênaie (December 11, 1832), all these were acute griefs for him and embittered him still more as he revolved them in his mind. Thus the solitude where he went to seek peace exalted him. At times, when speaking of Rome, of the Roman congregations, or of the Pope, he used extremely harsh words.[25] At other times he sought refuge in prayer. He wrote (February 27, 1833): "Providence has not assigned to me the government of the Church. On this subject I have said what I thought useful; my task is finished, and my conscience is tranquil: all I have left to do is to pray." [26] But for Lamennais, prayer seems never, or rarely, to have been that dew which refreshes the soul, which he spoke of in his Paroles d'un croyant; he said rather that he sought in prayer something he did not find in reality.[27] Feeling himself abandoned by men and by God, or imagining that he was, this man who was not only a firebrand, but also—this was the second trait of that strange nature—a man impatient of any yoke or domination, and for whatever he took to be a yoke and a domination, was prepared for the final fall. A letter from Cardinal Pacca in the Pope's name precipitated the catastrophe.

[25] Boutard, op. cit., p. 350. "I went to Rome. I saw there the most infamous sewer that ever offended the eye. The gigantic sewer of the Tarquins would be too narrow to provide passage for so great indecencies." Letter, November 1, 1832, to Countess de Senfft.

Up to that time Lamennais' obedience consisted in ceasing from any campaign, in keeping quiet. His enemies loudly remarked this; and perhaps the indiscretions of certain friends gave occasion for thinking that the editor-in-chief of the Avenir had not abjured any of his ideas. Cardinal Pacca wrote to him that his submission to the encyclical Mirari vos was considered insufficient and that he needed to supplement it by a simple, absolute, declaration without reservations. Without delay Lamennais signed a declaration by which he agreed to "follow solely and absolutely the doctrine set forth in the encyclical." [28] But a letter to Montalembert, enclosing the text of this declaration, contained the following words, which appalled Montalembert: "I renounce without exception all that filled my previous life." To an urgent request from his young friend, he answered that, in acting as he had done, "he regarded in this sad affair only a question of peace at any price and that he was [26] Letter in the archives of St. Sulpice Seminary.

[27] "Some torrid winds pass over a man's soul and dry it up. Prayer is the dew that refreshes it." Paroles d'un croyant, chap. 17. Cf. H. Bremond, L'inquiétude religieuse, 2nd ser., Le silence de Dieu.

[28] Lamennais, Affaires de Rome, p. 162.

resolved to sign, not only what they required of him, but anything else they might ask of him, even were it a declaration that the pope is God, the great God of heaven and earth, who alone ought to be adored."

The letter containing these lines was dated January 1, 1834. When Lamennais wrote it, he had ceased celebrating Mass and never after that performed any priestly function.[29] Four months later, toward the end of April, appeared under his signature a strange book, which he entitled Paroles d'un croyant ("Words of a believer") at the very time when the faith was almost dead in his soul. It was a series of meditations, dialogues, prayers, and visions which, in the solitude of La Chênaie, since the appearance of the encyclical, he had written under the influence of various promptings. This book, beginning with an invocation of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, treated kings in general as having their foot on the crucifix and drinking human blood from a skull.[30] In particular it represented William IV of England, in his death throes, pale as a shroud, Louis Philippe as a perjurer and tyrant, clinging to bags of gold, Francis II of Austria as condemning to every sort of physical and spiritual torture persons unfortunately suspected of having uttered the word "fatherland," Czar Nicholas as bearing in his heart, in place of God, whom he had driven out, a worm ceaselessly gnawing, and even Pope Gregory XVI, who was abused in unmeasured terms. The pages of this work were more virulent than any [29] As we read in Caussette, Manrèze du prêtre, Lamennais had for some time, on the pretext of his labors, ceased to recite the Breviary, and this neglect of the liturgical prayer may have determined his defection. The following are the facts that gave occasion to this report. Its source was a letter written by Félicité Lamennais to his brother Jean, August 25, 1819 (Blaize, Œuvres inédites de F. Lamennais, I, 390). With this letter Lamartine, without Lamennais' knowledge, had obtained for him from Rome, a dispensation from the Breviary, on the ground of the poor condition of his eyes. But Lamennais refused to make use of this dispensation, alleging that his vision was good. On this subject, see Roussel, Lamennais d'après des documents inédits, I, 177–80.

[30] Lamennais, Paroles d'un croyant, chap. 12.

political pamphlet he had ever published.[31] However, the book contained clear, penetrating passages that revealed a soul truly moved.[32] But many chapters are nothing but a varied and complex echo, often disconcerting in its contradictions, of a soul perpetually shifting, ever ready to change at the different contacts with men and things, even when he held that he was obeying only the strictest logic and when he boasted of the grimest independence, always the slave to his impressions of the moment.[33]

From the time of the publication of the Paroles d'un croyant, which was soon condemned (June 25, 1834) by the bull Singulari vos, the name of Lamennais does not further belong to the history of Europe. Abandoning both Catholic discipline and Catholic dogma, he adhered to socialism, which was then starting to be organized as a political party and which considered him one of its leaders. Thus he who, during the first part of his life, had, along with Rohrbacher and Guéranger, given the early impulse to the most advanced ultramontane party, he who later, along with Montalembert and Lacordaire, had given the liberal Catholic party its motto and its direction, finally devoted himself to revolutionary democracy, lending the support of his talent and the help of his activity to the three great currents of ideas that most stirred the nineteenth century.[34]

[31] Ibid., chap. 31. The kings are not mentioned by name, but they are readily identified. With regard to Gregory XVI, in the first edition Lamennais replaced by dots the page concerning him. Later he allowed the primitive text to be printed without omissions.

[32] Many of these expressions will be found ibid., chaps. 15–40.

[33] Thus one of the impressions that most contributed to vex Lamennais against Rome and to precipitate his fall was his almost morbid fear of the snares which he dreaded on the part of the Roman curia and the Jesuits. Unfortunately some young and imprudent correspondents nourished this fear in him. One of them, Father Emmanuel d'Alzon, wrote to him from Rome: "M. C. (MacCarthy) has informed me of some people's plan to make you come to Rome. I can assure you that the scheme was a snare, and I have good reason to believe that the ones who intended to spread the net live at the Gesù." Boutard, Lamennais, II, 40. Cf. I, 366; II, 367; III, 67.

[34] A confusion of dates has led some to suppose, among the causes of the defection of Félicité Lamennais, his break with his brother Jean. The following are the

Disciples of Lamennais

We cannot easily be precise about the part due to Félicité de Lamennais in the religious movement that took place in the nineteenth century. Like Chateaubriand at the beginning of the century, so Lamennais, before becoming a leader, was an echo. In his Essay on Indifference, he made himself the eloquent interpreter of the feeling that Silvestre de Sacy expressively described when he said: "The unbelief of the eighteenth century had the pleasure of unbelief; we are now having the facts. After the publication of the Paroles d'un croyant, Bishop Lesquen of Rennes asked from Father Jean Lamennais a letter by which he would explicitly disapprove this latest work of his brother. The prelate promised that this letter would not leave his hand and that it would serve merely to confound those who might denounce the venerable priest. The letter was written on May 10, 1834. Hardly had it reached the Bishop's office, when it was made public. On May 24, 1834, the Ami de la religion quoted it from the Gazette de Bretagne. Félicité's irritation was extreme. From that moment he no longer showed his brother the same confidence as formerly. In 1837 he completely ceased seeing him. The only effective influence that could still be exercised on Father Félicité, after the death of Teysseyrre, thus disappeared, at the very time when the unfortunate writer had started on the road of open revolt. On that road he proceeded farther and farther. The publication of the Affaires de Rome in 1836, the Livre du peuple in 1837, Le pays et le gouvernement (pamphlet), for which he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment at Sainte-Pélagie in 1840, and in the same year L'esquisse d'une philosophie, were progressive steps toward a vague pantheism. In 1848 he was elected a deputy to the national Assembly by the department of the Seine. There he had no success and appeared ill at ease. One day Berryer was attacking apostasy. He said: "I then saw a man rise abruptly and slide the length of the benches to go out. The man was Lamennais. My heart was pained, for in speaking I had not been thinking of him" (Lecanuet, Berryer, p. 81). Lamennais passed his last years in discouragement. Wrote Benoit-Champy: "From the time when he broke the bonds attaching him to Catholicism, I always knew him as a sad man" (Quelques souvenirs sur la mort de M. de Lamennais). On July 11, 1848, he wrote: "What we see is not the Republic; it is not even something that has a name." On February 27, 1854, he died, surrounded by a few friends (Henri Martin, Hippolyte Carnot, Armand Lévy, and a few less well known), of a disease that his relative and friend Benoit-Champy was not able to determine. The day before, he had the following conversation with his niece, Madame de Kertanguy: "Féli," she said, "do you wish a priest? You wish a priest, do you not?" "No, no, no. Leave me in peace." Then for about eight hours he was unable to talk although his mind seemed to be clear. In the midst of a confused babbling, the single word "paper" could be distinguished. Then tired at being unable to make himself understood, he turned toward the wall, and the death agony began. At the moment of his death, according to a report published by Eugene Pelletan in the Siècle of March 4, 1854, "a long tear suffering of it; we feel its emptiness. . . . We raise our eyes on high, seeking a light there." [35] This light Father Lamennais showed in the Catholic tradition, in the Church, in the pope; and in his campaign he awakened public opinion. He also gathered about him, drawn into the arena, a choice group of priests and laymen who, after his defection, would continue the work brilliantly and successfully.

---

For the author of the Paroles d'un croyant was not followed by his disciples in his defection. By separating himself from the Church, this priest, who had as great prestige as the most celebrated of the ancient apostates, did not create a schism, as Photius did, nor a heresy, as Luther did. On the contrary his disciples, on the morrow of his fall, found themselves at the head of most of the religious enterprises. In 1835 Lacordaire began his Notre Dame conferences and Montalembert on the floor of the Parliament voiced the Catholic claims. The restoration of the Benedictine Order (1836) by Dom Guéranger and the re-establishment of the Friars Preachers three years later were the work of two of his collaborators.[36]

St. Vincent de Paul Conferences enlisted several former members of Lamennais' school. The great history of the Church that Rohrbacher would publish had been undertaken with the encouragement of Lamennais. In the work of defending the papacy and in the strife against Gallicanism, the Uni- flowed silently down the cheek of the dying man. But it dried at once, devoured by the burning fire of grief." The next Sunday Father Gratry, preaching in the Oratory, said: "Should we despair of the salvation of this poor soul? No. That this great example might serve for our instruction, God has permitted that the end appear without any hope. But his soul had contributed to raise up the religious feeling in our country. May we not think that it had a return hidden from our eyes and that it obtained mercy?"

---

[35] Silvestre de Sacy, Variétés littéraires, Vol. II. De la reaction religieuse.

[36] One of his young disciples, Father Emmanuel d'Alzon, who, even after the appearance of the Paroles d'un croyant, sent him from Rome the expression of an earnest fidelity (Boutard, III, 67; cf. ibid., II, 367, 400), would also later on found a religious congregation, that of the Augustinians of the Assumption.

vers, with its militant editorship, would continue, without any ambiguity,[37] the traditions of the Avenir.

In the Catholic renaissance from 1833 to 1841, some events are noteworthy. We should mention particularly the preaching of Lacordaire in the pulpit of Notre Dame, the speeches of Montalembert on the floor of Parliament, the re-establishment in France of the Order of St. Dominic and that of St. Benedict, the liturgical revival undertaken by Dom Guéranger, and the works of charity started by Frederick Ozanam and some of his friends.[38]

The religious revival that, beginning in 1830, took place in the souls of the young men consisted rather of vague sentiments than of deliberate convictions. This trait did not escape the discernment of a group of Catholic students who were concerned with the apostolate. In January, 1834, they asked Archbishop Quélen of Paris to have some conferences given in the church of Notre Dame where the new generation would be able to hear the truths of the faith set forth in a language conformable to its state of mind. An attempt was made that year according to a plan conceived by the Archbishop; but it did not attain the desired result. However, the next year Archbishop Quélen, yielding to the urging of these young people who had taken the [37] "The Avenir rose to its notable height and rendered great services. By its strife against Gallicanism it effectively served the religious cause in the domain of doctrine; it served it also in the domain of politics by ceaselessly establishing that Catholics ought not to tie the religious interests to any form of government, even to legitimate royalty. An elite rose up. The encyclical Mirari vos killed the Avenir. But although the paper disappeared, still existing were the ideas and needs, sources of the movement. The field must not be left free to the Gallican and narrowly royalist press. On November 3, 1833, the first number of the Univers appeared" (E. Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, I, 351–56, 362–65). Among the first editors of the Univers, some were formerly disciples of Lamennais. Later on, at the time of the Vatican Council, the editor of the Univers, Louis Veuillot, recalled that no one strove harder to forward France toward the saving dogma of papal infallibility. Louis Veuillot, Rome pendant le concile, Vol. II.

[38] Under the general title of Ecole menaisienne, Bishop Ricard published: Lamennais (1881), Lacordaire (1882), Gerbet et Salinis (1883), Montalembert (1884), Rohrbacher (1885).

first steps, decided to turn over the pulpit of his old basilica to a young priest who had made his first trial at arms in the Avenir, Father Lacordaire. Bruised by his break with him who had been his master, almost disheartened by the failure of a work to which he had devoted himself with his whole soul, Lacordaire spent three years in a life of prayer and labor, hardly interrupted by some instructions given in a college.[39]

This young priest at once obtained a prodigious success. He had called himself "a son of his age," and declared that "all his previous life, even including his faults, had prepared in him some understanding of his country and of his time." Soon 6,000 men filled the naves of the old cathedral. Mostly they were young people, representing the intellectual life of that period and all the hopes of the future. If you were to glance over them while they were waiting, you would see that this gathering was not made up of people accustomed to frequent church. It was indeed the new society of the nineteenth century, such as it came forth from the revolution of 1830, in a way dechristianized, that was forming around a Christian pulpit an audience such as perhaps had not been seen since St. Bernard.[40]

The young Father Lacordaire introduced a new form of apologetics. Its orthodoxy and timeliness were later approved by the Vatican Council. First he put his hearers face to face with the fact of the Catholic Church, that is, of Christianity under the living and, so to speak, the palpable form which it had before their eyes. He spoke to them of the necessity of the Church, its constitution, its moral and infallible authority, its head, its relations with the temporal order, and its coercive power. The next year he led his listeners over the threshold of dogma: the doctrine of the Church in general, tradition, Scripture, reason, faith, and the means of acquiring the faith. The continually increasing throng of his hearers, following his theme more and more attentively, gathered about the Catholic orator. They were eager to hear the word which, by its new accent and its modern terms, gave them the sort of pleasure that a traveler in a distant country feels upon suddenly hearing the tongue of his native land. Bishop de Quélen himself, but little prepared by temperament and training to enjoy the flavor of things modern, was quite won by this eloquence and called Lacordaire a new prophet.

[39] After separating from Lamennais, Lacordaire gladly withdrew into solitude. He wrote: "I have a feeling of joy in the solitude about me. It is my element, my life" (letter to Montalembert, September 8, 1833). In another letter to Montalembert (June 30, 1833) he wrote: "Every man has his proper hour. He simply must wait for it and do nothing contrary to Providence."

[40] Cf. Thureau-Dangin, L'église et l'état sous la monarchie de Juillet, p. 10.

Some men were astonished at these daring presentations. This preacher of Christian doctrine was regarded by them with some suspicion, a preacher who scarcely mentioned the name of Christ, "that wild republican," as they called him, "who preached doctrines taken from anarchy." In reality this preacher, whose words were sometimes venturesome, was a humble and austere apostle. Later on people learned that, upon coming down from the pulpit and still trembling with the triumphs that he won from his enthusiastic listeners, he went off to scourge his body with instruments of penance, to humble his soul with avowals of the faults of his past life. When at the very height of his fame, he interrupted his conferences and went to Rome, there to seek peace and solitude before returning in the habit of a mendicant friar. Meanwhile his work had borne fruit. His sermons, which had been blamed as having a tone too much of this world, disposed his listeners to kneel down in the tribunal of penance and come to the Holy Table, when the evangelical word of Father de Ravignan persuasively invited them to come there.[41]

[41] On Lacordaire, see Chocarne, Le P. Lacordaire, sa vie intime; Foisset, Vie du P. Lacordaire; H. D. Noble, Lacordaire apôtre et directeur des jeunes gens; J. D. Folghèra, L'apologétique de Lacordaire. On Father de Ravignan, see Ponlevoy, Vie du P. de Ravignan.

CHAPTER XX

Montalembert

UNDER the vault of Notre Dame a son of that skeptical and pleasure-loving bourgeoisie which the July monarchy had just raised to the preponderant political influence, was conducting his generation toward the eternal truths of Christianity. At the same time another editor of the Avenir, a descendant of the nobility, a peer of France, a "son of the crusaders," was declaring from the French rostrum the proud claims of Catholicism, almost everywhere oppressed and despised. When (September 8, 1835) the young Count Charles de Montalembert, then twenty-five years old, spoke for the first time before the House of Peers and there, simply and firmly, without bragging or fear, affirmed his religious faith, the first feeling of the high assembly was a sort of stupefaction. Someone rightly remarked that "the entrance into the Luxembourg court of a knight wearing the armor of the Middle Ages and a cross on his breast, would not have appeared stranger." [1] The new knight, with modest and dignified graciousness, excused himself for uttering in the High Chamber a language alien to the ideas that were usually expressed there. He asked that he be allowed to follow the frankness of his age. From 1835 to 1841 he took part in the discussions on the press, Polish nationalism, emancipation of slaves in the colonies, ecclesiastical property, insane asylums, traffic regulations, various questions of foreign policy, the work of children in factories, and the freedom of education.[2]

Whatever might be the subject of discussion, he kept in mind

[1] Thureau-Dangin, L'église et l'état, p. 49.
[2] Montalembert, Œuvres, I, 1–266.

the defense of Catholicism, which he championed with an alert, lively, and remarkably supple eloquence. Therein feeling often gave way to irony, and lofty enthusiasm gave way to scathing retort. Not hiding a whit of his Catholic faith or of his obedience to the latest condemnations by Rome, he declared in his first discourse: "I frankly avow that liberty of conscience is not one of my principles; I have no idolatry for it; I profess and acknowledge the most ancient, lofty, and holy principles. . . . If absolute truths are to be found in politics, I hope the same may be found in religion." [3]

The Order of St. Dominic

Montalembert was one of the first to whom Lacordaire announced his project of re-establishing the Order of St. Dominic in France. To him Lacordaire wrote (July 1, 1838): "I may say that this act is the unfolding of my life. God calls me to put on a new power. . . . Let us be humble, belonging solely to God, without party spirit, ready to live or to die." The next year appeared the Mémoire pour le rétablissement des Frères Précheurs. The undertaking was crowned with full success. The best recruits of the new foundation came to him from those youths brought back to the faith by his Notre Dame conferences. During the early weeks of 1841, Father Lacordaire, returning from Rome, wearing his new costume, crossed through an astonished and friendly France. When he reached Paris, he pointed to his white habit and said: "I am a liberty." He had won before public opinion, and consequently before the government, not only the cause of the Friars Preachers, but that of the religious orders in general. The Jesuits were among the first to profit by this changed condition.

[3] Ibid., pp. 37, 39.

Abbot Guéranger

A few years earlier, with not so much publicity, a less celebrated disciple of Lamennais had re-established in the former priory of Solesmes an equally illustrious order, which was destined to render to the Church of France no less conspicuous services: the Order of St. Benedict. That man, Prosper Guéranger, in his early youth had dreamed of the monastic life. That life appealed to him as a center of prayer, a power of influence for the Church, at the same time as a life of studious leisure. This persevering concern explains the interest he brought to the Society founded by Father Lamennais under the name of the Congregation of St. Peter.

After this work was thwarted, Guéranger turned finally to the Benedictine life. On December 14, 1832, he rented the former priory of Solesmes in the diocese of Le Mans, and there installed himself a year later with three companions; of these, two were priests, and one was a deacon.[4] Then followed for them the trials of poverty, uncertainty of the morrow, and ill-disposed attacks by those who were ready to see in the little band a resumption of the Lamennais school. But the four zealous pioneers, wishing to carry on the glorious traditions of Cluny and St. Maur, began their labors. A translation of the works of St. Alphonsus Liguori, which was soon interrupted, a new edition of the Liber pontificalis of the Church of Le Mans, a Life of St. Julian, and the Annales ecclésiastiques de l'Eglise du Mans, were their first undertakings. Lacordaire and Montalembert offered warm encouragement to their friend.[5] The continuation of the Gallia christiana, entrusted to the young community, seemed to it a precious promise of vitality. The solemn approbation of its rules, the erection of the Solesmes priory into an abbey, and the conferring of the abbatial office on Dom Guéranger (July 14, 1837) assured it a canonical existence.[6]

[4] Dom Guéranger, I, 78, 105, 107.
[5] Lecanuet, Montalembert, II, 38.

Four years later, on the feast of St. Dominic, the restorer of Benedictine life in France, now confident of the future, turning his regard toward the restorer of the Dominican life, wrote to him: "This morning I sang the Mass with the intention of gathering more solemnly the good wishes of my brethren for you, our very dear friend, and for your entire family." [7] He now set out to devote himself without reserve to the three missions which he proposed to himself through restoring the Order of St. Benedict in France: the development of the religious sciences, the exaltation of the papal power, and the restoration of the liturgy. Of these works, the first two would come to fruition with the cooperation of other efforts. But the liturgical restoration, such as it was effected in the nineteenth century, was owing particularly to Guéranger's initiative and remained the characteristic of his labors. History must pay him a special tribute.

The essential ideas that would develop and sustain the author of the Institutions liturgiques and the Monarchie pontificale are to be found in four articles that he published in 1830 in the Mémorial catholique.[8] While, in his journal, Lamennais was fighting Gallicanism in the field of theoretical doctrine, his young collaborator undertook to dislodge it from the positions it wrongly held in the domain of the practical. The Gallican heresy, as he said, appeared to be implanted in France under the form of rites that systematically separated from the Roman tradition. "Thirty years after St. Pius V's famous constitution Quod a nobis, out of the 130 dioceses which France then contained, not even six had failed to adopt the ensemble of the Roman liturgy; and now in 1830 hardly a dozen dioceses remained faithful to that fine uniformity. The Church of France had, then, on this point abandoned the Roman Church. It had, according to the expression of the saintly Pope, torn to shreds the communion of prayers and praises which should be addressed to the one God with one and the same voice." [9] The Gallican heresy had become the antiliturgical heresy.

[6] Dom Guéranger. II, 128.
[7] Ibid., p. 289.
[8] Mémorial catholique, February 28, March 30, May 31, and July 31, 1830.

Said the author: "I know that I am going to wound many prejudiced men. But we are always strong when we are right. I challenge every man of good sense, every theologian, to refute my principles, and every logician to reject my conclusions." [10] He first sketched the development of the liturgical life, "coming forth from the catacombs with the Church, spreading with it in the temples built by Constantine, creating a language worthy of it, finding an expression in the confessions of its faith, the sighs of its hope and the ardor of its love, the needs of its children and the groans of its sinners." He then placed beside her majestic beauty the ungraceful diversity of these new liturgies, some of which boasted of a century of possession, and others could not justify themselves by an existence of fifty or thirty or ten years, perhaps hardly one year. This general shortcoming, at which the earnest polemist leveled his sarcasms, was especially evident in the Parisian liturgy. He said: "We are not ignorant of the spirit that give it birth; we are also aware of the one who presided over its latest changes." This was Charles Coffin, openly claimed by Jansenism, rejected by the Church; in a word, a heretic. In order to provide a new chant for the new words, recourse was had to that Father Le Boeuf, who, "after spending ten years in putting notes over the lines and lines under the notes, presented to the Paris clergy a monstrous composition." [11]

[9] Dom Guéranger, I, 59.
[10] Mémorial catholique, February 28, 1830, p. 49.
[11] Ibid., p. 57.

The depth and form of these articles were sure to please Father Lamennais. On April 15, 1830, he wrote to the author: "Everyone that I have seen is greatly pleased with your two articles. You would, I believe, perform a genuinely good service by continuing them." But some persons of moderate views were shocked by the exaggerations which they thought to find there. Said Michel Picot in the Ami de la religion of June 2: "Why represent the diocesan liturgies as tendencies to schism, as the fruits of a sectarian spirit? Such a view shows prejudice and is exaggerated. The author indulges in a magnificent eulogy of the Roman liturgy. If he confined himself to saying that the Roman liturgy is the most venerable by the authority from which it emanates and by its antiquity, we would be in entire agreement with him. But he supposes that this liturgy has never varied, that all the Churches followed it for several centuries. These suppositions are not verified by history. From the very birth of the Church diversity existed in the rites and in the prayers. The practices at Rome differed from those at Jerusalem. The Churches of Gaul had their particular rites and, in Italy itself, the Church of Milan had its distinct liturgy. St. Gregory the Great advised St. Augustine of Canterbury to take from the Churches of Gaul what he would judge suitable for the English." [12]

Fundamentally, in spite of his excesses of language, Father Guéranger was right. The diocesan liturgies, particularly the Paris liturgy, had, to some extent, felt the influence of Gallicanism and of Jansenism. The hymns of men like Santeul and Coffin, the music of Le Beuf, notwithstanding the science and technical ability which they showed, could not stand comparison with the simple and appealing hymns which Rome and Christian antiquity bequeathed us. Every Catholic must unreservedly applaud the words of Father Guéranger when he said: "I have heard some persons remark that we find the most beautiful arguments of religion in its liturgy." [13]

[12] Ami de la religion, LXIV. 97.

In 1840 appeared the first volume of the Institutions liturgiques, the fruit of twelve years of study.[14] This work enkindled the zeal of Guéranger's friends and the polemics of his opponents. This publication opened a series of five volumes, intended to introduce young clerics to the mysteries of the divine worship and prayer. The impression produced was not uniform. Madame Swetchine wrote: "While reading your book I breathed an air of truth, pure and unmixed." [15] But Father Lacordaire rejected the idea of an "antiliturgical heresy," which according to him never existed.

The Année liturgique—the first volume appeared at the close of 1841—was a complement to the preceding works of Dom Guéranger. The purpose of this new publication was to make accessible to all the faithful the teachings which the Church gives us when, in the course of the twelve months of the Christian year, she recalls and, in a way, reproduces the different mysteries of our redemption by Jesus Christ. Each of the liturgical periods of the Christian year must be explained: 1. in the historical light of its origin; 2. by the mystical interpretation of its rites; 3. by an indication of the outward practices and of the internal dispositions which it should stir in the soul of a Christian. This work was one of peace and edification. But at the very time when pious souls were relishing the new work of the abbot of Solesmes, fresh controversies arose following a case of conscience, publicly proposed by Archbishop Gousset of Reims, on bishops' rights and duties in regard to the liturgy. Dom Guéranger's publication of his letter to the Archbishop of Reims on the right of the liturgy was the first act of this dispute. We shall return to this question presently.

[13] Mémorial catholique, July 31, 1830, p. 246.
[14] Institutions liturgiques, 2nd ed., I, 85.
[15] Falloux, Lettres inédites de Mme Swetchine, p. 413.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society

Frederick Ozanam, the founder of the St. Vincent de Paul conferences, was not, like Prosper Guéranger, a disciple of Lamennais. He met Lamennais only once (December, 1831); that single meeting seems not to have awakened any great sympathies between the celebrated writer and the young student.[16] But Ozanam, from the time of his early youth, thought of a religious apologetics capable of winning the mind and heart of his contemporaries. With his entire generous nature he eagerly followed the campaign of the Avenir and became attached to two of its chief editors. One of these was Father Gerbet, the learned philosopher and deep theologian whose Considérations sur le dogme générateur de la piété catholique entranced him.[17]

The other was Father Lacordaire, whose warm eloquence and apostolic zeal thoroughly corresponded to Ozanam's own feelings. Guéranger had been especially attracted to the group of the Avenir by his ultramontane tendencies; but Ozanam was attracted to that same group by his desire of drawing the contemporary society to Christ and by his interest in the popular classes.[18]

[16] Baunard, Fréderic Ozanam d'après sa correspondance, p. 49.

[17] Ibid., p. 72.

[18] Lacordaire, like Ozanam, never felt deeply attached to Lamennais. They did not have the same attitude to ultramontanism. Moreover, in his plans for social regeneration, Lacordaire had in mind especially an interior and supernatural influence on souls; Lamennais, regarding Christianity as a work of politics and social transformation rather than as a work of individual sanctification, seemed to look to a reform of society. This idea was evident in the strange preamble to the Rules of the Congregation of St. Peter, drawn up by Félicité de Lamennais. This preamble may be seen in an article by Father Dudon in Etudes for November 20, 1910, pp. 452 ff. Cf. Lamennais, Réflexions sur l'église de France, p. 93. Lamennais' correspondence, compared with that of Lacordaire, shows clearly the difference we have pointed out. In an effort to formulate Lamennais' dominant tendency and to set forth what led to his fall, opinions are divided. Spuller and others have considered him an eternal democratic. Thureau-Dangin and some others have called him a perpetual theocrat. Rohrbacher, from his first relations with the master, thinks to see in him a vague pantheism, which gradually became more explicit. If we may be permitted a neologism, we would say that Lamennais was essentially not a pantheist but a demo-

Frederick Ozanam, born in 1813 of a Christian family, was trained in philosophical and religious studies by an exceptional teacher. This master was Father Noirot, whom Victor Cousin called the leading professor of France. As early as the age of seventeen, Ozanam thought of a great work, which he entitled Démonstration de la verité de la religion catholique par l'antiquité des croyances historiques, religieuses et morales. In 1831 he published his Réflexions sur la doctrine de Saint-Simon. As he himself said later on, in this work he sowed the seed of the idea that would engage his whole life. This dominant idea of his life was an apologetic of Catholicism intended for his contemporaries. This thought he pursued in his historical works and in his works of charity.

Of these latter works the principal one, and the only one which we purpose speaking of here, was the St. Vincent de Paul Society. In founding it, Ozanam had several aims: first, to strengthen the bonds of friendship between the young Catholics; he said that the strongest principle of true friendship is charity, and charity finds its nourishment in good works; secondly, to drawn down God's blessing on his apostolic labors, for, he said, an apostolate is not complete if it lacks works of benevolence, and the blessing of the poor is that of God; lastly, to supplement the apologetics of the Church in past times by showing its present works. He wrote: "Our enemies say to us: In former ages Christianity produced prodigies of charity, but it is dead. Let us prove that it is living by showing its good works." [19] theist. When as a fervent Catholic he regarded truth as consisting of a sort of universal suffrage of minds, he was already placing infallibility in the people; later he put justice and right in the same depositary. At first he believed that the organ of the people was the king, then the pope, then finally he admitted that the infallibility of the people was a sort of incommunicable privilege. This last stage of his thought was expressed by him in 1848 in a work entitled De la société première et de ses lois, ou de la religion.

---

[19] Ozanam formulated this twofold aspect of his work in two phrases, which have sometimes been criticized but which he successfully defended as having an orthodox

In May, 1833, six students, answering Ozanam's appeal, joined him at 18 rue du Petit-Bourbon-Saint-Sulpice, in the office of the Tribune catholique. The meeting was presided over by the director of the paper, Emmanuel Bailly. One of the seven founders has written an account of that memorable session.[20] It opened with the recitation of the Veni sancte Spiritus, the Ave Maria, and an invocation of St. Vincent de Paul. Then they studied the practical means of visiting the poor in their homes. They decided to obtain addresses of needy families from Sister Rosalie, the apostle of the Mouffetard quarter, and they requested her to turn over to the Society a certain amount of the goods that she had for distribution to the poor. The meeting closed with a collection among the members and with prayer. By the end of the school year the Society counted fourteen members. It grew steadily.[21] The members who returned home after finishing their studies founded new conferences. Before long the Society spread beyond France.[22]

The visiting of the poor in their homes remained the essential purpose of the conferences. But special works were soon added: clothing depots, where used clothes were received and were then given to the needy; libraries intended to meet the growing need for reading matter; Holy Families, or associations formed among Christian working people for mutual edification and religious instruction; patronages of workers and apprentices; meaning: "Let us pass to the barbarians," and "Let us go to the poor." By "the barbarians" he meant the unbelievers of the nineteenth century. When he said "let us pass to the barbarians," he did not advocate joining Mazzini, but the people whom Mazzini deceived. "We will probably," he said, "not convert Attila and Genseric, but perhaps we will succeed with the Huns and the Vandals." His expression, "Let us go to the poor," did not contain any implication of dubious democritism. Said Ozanam: "We must do what is most agreeable to God. Hence we must do what our Lord did in preaching the gospel. Let us go to the poor."

[20] Origines de la Société de Saint-Vincent-de-Paul.

[21] In 1835 Paris had four conferences. The name "conference" was adopted in accord with the traditions of the Société des Bonnes Etudes, to which the first members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society belonged.

[22] In 1953 the United States alone had 2,810 conferences. (Tr.)

and other undertakings suggested by the needs of places and circumstances.[23] The Congregation of Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul, founded by one of Ozanam's first companions, Léon de Prévost, with the idea of engaging in undertakings for workingmen, was likewise an offshoot of the society founded by Ozanam.[24]

This program of works of charity was indeed vast. But that wide scope did not limit the zeal of the founder of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. He published articles of apologetics in the Tribune catholique, directed by Bailly, and in the Univers, recently founded by Father Migne. The foundation and success of the Notre Dame conferences were partly owing to his help. He collaborated in the formation of a Catholic society of fine arts, and he gave glory to the Church in scholarly historical studies. As a student at the Sorbonne he had obliged Theodore Jouffroy to retract certain attacks directed against Christian revelation; as a professor he succeeded in interesting large numbers of listeners in the glories of Christianity. In one of the campaigns conducted by the Catholics of the time in behalf of freedom of education, he was unable to take an active part. But his attitude was worthy and courageous. As Lacordaire wrote: "In the conflict that arose between the Church and the University, Ozanam was placed in a most painful situation. Earnest Catholic though he was, still he could not ignore the fact that he [23] From the outset an understanding was established that the St. Vincent de Paul conferences would be open to Catholics of all parties. Ozanam wrote in 1835: "I should like the disappearance of any political spirit to the advantage of the social spirit." He did not intend to introduce a special system of social organization. But his writings reveal philosophical views on property, which he regarded as a social function (Mélanges, II, 339), on wages, analyzing the normal conditions apart from which the worker's labor becomes an exploitation of man by man (ibid., Notes d'un cours de droit commercial), on association, which attaches the workers to their labor as to something belonging to them and leading them to habits of morality (ibid.), on democracy, which he declares the natural term of progress (letter of March 11, 1849).

[24] Vie de M. Le Prévost.

belonged to the body that was the legal depositary of the University monopoly. But he remained fully united with those who were defending the cause of freedom of education." [25]

[25] On Frederick Ozanam, see Mgr. Ozanam, Vie de Frédéric Ozanam; Baunard, Frédéric Ozanam; Curnier, La jeunesse de Frédéric Ozanam.

CHAPTER XXI

Catholic Schools

WE MUST now turn to the campaign for the freedom of education. Of all the Catholic campaigns of the nineteenth century, none was more glorious and none was more fruitful in useful lessons than the one which, after twenty years of strife, resulted in the abolition of the monopoly of the University. It deserves to be recounted in some detail.

In this campaign Lamennais played a major part. To him belongs the merit of being the first who, with incomparable brilliance, raised the question of freedom of education. The articles which, at the time when he was in the fervor of his Catholic and royalist convictions, he published in the Conservateur and the Drapeau blanc were, in thought and style, the most powerful that had appeared in the French language.[1] The Avenir, in its early numbers, gave his views a widespread influence on public opinion. In October, 1830, appeared three eloquent articles by Lacordaire, in which he demanded that the hated University monopoly be abolished in the name of liberty and progress. He said: "The servitude of teaching is incompatible with any liberty; for liberty is obtained by teaching. . . . Mankind wishes progress, the aim of all liberty. But is progress possible with the monopoly?" [2]

The editors of the Avenir did more than repeat these demands. Manifestos, polemics, every avenue was used by them to stir public opinion on the question of the freedom of education. They even had recourse to a proceeding novel in French practice. The Charter of 1830 in article 69 promised the promulgation as promptly as possible of a law on the freedom of education, and article 70 declared all contrary laws and dispositions at once abrogated. Basing their contention on these articles of the Charter, Father Lacordaire, Count Charles de Montalembert, and Count de Coux opened at Paris (May 9, 1831) a free school without authorization. Two days later the police commissioner of the district ordered the children to withdraw. As these orders remained unobserved, the teachers and the children were excluded by the public force, and the three professors were arraigned in police court.

[1] E. Spuller, Lamennais, p. 122.
[2] Mélanges catholiques, I, 238.

These teachers wished for nothing better than an occasion, in a widely publicized trial, to plead the cause of the fathers of families. They succeeded beyond their hopes. Count Montalembert, a peer, had just died. His son, Viscount Charles, succeeding to his rights, was, by his new dignity, subject to trial only before the peers. In consequence of the indivisibility of the offense and of the trial, he brought with him his fellow accused before that high jurisdiction.

After the pleadings of the lawyers, the young Count Montalembert, scarcely twenty years old, stepped forward to the bar of the House. His youth, his signs of mourning, and his personal position won the deep attention of his hearers. Thus he began: "Peers of France, the task of our defenders is accomplished; ours now begins. They took their stand on the ground of legality; for us, the accused, the duty now is to speak the language of our heart and our faith: the Catholic language." Perhaps the noble court never had heard a more courageous and touching profession of faith. In conclusion the young orator said: "I shall always felicitate myself on having been able in my youth to bear testimony to the God of my childhood. To Him I commend the success of my cause, of my holy and glorious cause. I call it glorious for it is that of my country; I call it holy, for it is that of my God." [3]

[3] Montalembert, Œuvres, I, 29.

Lacordaire, a former lawyer, kept for himself the reply to the public ministry, whose spokesman was the procurator general Persil. A short time earlier the latter, taking his stand on the principle of ministerial responsibility, had upheld the charge of high treason against the last four ministers of Charles X. Lacordaire's vigorous speech began thus: "Noble peers, I look about me and I am astonished. I am astonished at seeing myself on the bench of the accused, while the procurator general is on the bench of the public ministry. With what does he charge me? With having made use of a right written in the Charter and not yet regulated by a law. And he recently called for the heads of four ministers by virtue of a right written in the Charter and not yet regulated by a law. If he could do that, I can do the same; with this difference, that he asked for blood, and I wished to give free instruction to the children of the people." [4]

The three accused men were condemned, each to a fine of 100 francs and jointly to the expenses of the trial. But in fact the result was a defeat for the government, for public opinion had been impressed by the reports of the trial debates. Unfortunately the circumstances served the cause of the University. The campaign so brilliantly begun was adversely affected by the discontinuance of the Avenir, the dissolving of the League for the Defense of Religious Liberty, and the attention of man's minds diverted by the revolutionary troubles of 1831 and 1832 and by the uprising of the royalist provinces of the West at the voice of the Duchess de Berry.

But the agitation was not fruitless. The law of June 28, 1833, on elementary education, known as the Guizot law, may be considered one of the indirect results. This law was liberal enough, as was its author. The monopoly of elementary education was suppressed. The Brothers of the Christian Schools benefited by the exemption from military service on the same basis as the lay teachers. The right to teach was granted to any member of a congregation who presented a letter of obedience from his superiors. This last provision was a testimony of confidence given to the superiors of the teaching congregations, which were supposed to be justly engaged with replying to the lawful requests of the families and the requirements of teaching by the good choice of their schoolmasters.

[4] Lacordaire, Œuvres, VII, 163.

This testimonial of confidence was not, however, an isolated fact. A notable improvement took place in the relations of Church and state in France. In that same year 1833, the government, without raising any protest, allowed Father Guéranger to restore the Benedictine Order at Solesmes, openly recognized the rights of the Catholic clergy to the buildings devoted to worship,[5] and did nothing to hinder the works of the fathers of the Society of Jesus: to such an extent that the chargé d'affaires of the Holy See, Mgr. Garibaldi, said: "We are obtaining from King Louis Philippe what any other government would have refused." [6]

This assertion, as far as it concerned the person of Louis Philippe, was true only in a general way. On this question of the freedom of education the King showed himself particularly hostile. The law of June 28, 1833, rightly called the Guizot law, was in fact the work of the minister, not of the King, who accepted it only against his will. And when, in 1840, an ecclesiastical society was formed to denounce the University monopoly in liberal and Catholic France, under the presidency of Father Rohrbacher, a disciple of Lamennais, and when the next year the new archbishop of Paris in his first pastoral letter set forth his stand, in restrained language, for a freedom of education

[5] Moniteur for January and May, 1833. Guizot granted an annual allotment to the Benedictines of Solesmes for the continuation of the Gallia christiana.

[6] Besson, Vie du cardinal Mathieu, I, 146.

subject only to the restrictions required by the interest of religion, of morals, and of instruction, the King showed his disapproval.[7] But he distrusted a University that would be too powerful. He was not averse to counterbalancing it with a prudently regulated rival. A bill on secondary schools, which the Guizot ministry presented to the Chambers in 1841, accorded with these wishes. But, far from bringing peace, it started a fight.

Villemain

The minister of public instruction, Villemain, was author of the new bill. Guizot, whether he was discouraged by the failure of a proposed law which he presented in 1836 or whether he was then absorbed by the direction of foreign affairs, remained almost entirely aloof from the problem. This condition was a misfortune. Villemain was a distinguished writer, eminent professor, restorer of literary criticism, and creator of the history of literature, at the same time as his two colleagues Guizot and [7] Father Cruice, the future bishop of Marseilles, relates the following anecdote. King Louis Philippe was pleased to show his regard and fondness for Archbishop Affre of Paris. He often consulted him about nominations for the episcopal sees. But when the prelate broached the question of freedom of education, the King, by countless shiftings, avoided the subject. One day when the Archbishop insistently returned to the question, the King said:

"Archbishop, you must decide between my wife and me. How many candles should be lighted at a marriage? I hold that six candles are enough. My wife maintains that twelve are needed. I recall that at my wedding we had six candles."

"Sire," replied the Archbishop, "of little importance is the question whether six or a dozen candles are lighted at a marriage. But please listen to me about the most serious question."

"But," replied the King, "this is a very grave question; my household is divided; my wife claims she is right, I hold she is wrong."

The Archbishop without replying to the King's question, continued the defense of the freedom of teaching. At this the King interrupted him.

"But, Archbishop; how about my candles?"

The Archbishop continued. The King in anger exclaimed: "Stop; I do not wish to hear about your freedom of teaching. I have no liking for ecclesiastical colleges. There the children are taught the verse of the Magnificat: Deposuit potentes de sede."

The Archbishop then withdrew. Cruice, Vie de Denis-Auguste Affre, archevêque de Paris, p. 218.

Cousin founded the political history and the history of philosophy. Yet he had no qualities of a statesman. Furthermore, odd prejudices against the Jesuits which dated from the Restoration,[8] and which, growing worse, led him to madness in his latter days, could not leave him the calm needed in a discussion on the freedom of education. At any rate, his bill showed his complete ignorance of the susceptibilities of the Catholic conscience. This he wounded both by the maxims on which he pretended to base his views and by the applications he deduced therefrom. In his statement of his motives, the minister even denied the principle of the freedom of teaching, which, he said, "may have been admitted by the Charter but which is not essential to it." In the provisions of his bill he even withdrew from the bishops the exclusive direction of the minor seminaries and placed these schools under the jurisdiction of the University.

Until then the bishops did not mingle in the polemics regarding the freedom of education. This restraint they exercised in a spirit of conciliation and out of consideration of the friendly efforts which the July monarchy had been showing toward the Church. But the provisions concerning the minor seminaries the bishops felt were an invasion of their special domain and their spiritual jurisdiction in the work of the moral and intellectual training of their priests. Spontaneously, without any previous agreement among them, they uttered their protests. For some months the papers were full of episcopal pronouncements, some in a tone of grief, others in an almost threatening tone, denouncing the projected attack on the liberty of the Church.[9]

In the presence of this unanimous manifestation, the bill was weakly supported by the parliamentary left, which considered it too liberal toward the Catholics, and it was withdrawn. But the public opinion thus provoked did not subside. The episcopate rose up to give battle; and it did not disarm thereafter. The group of laymen that, after Lamennais' defection, followed the lead of Count Montalembert and that, before the presentation of the Villemain project, had consented to negotiate with the government, henceforth took a clearly militant attitude. In self-defense the enemies of the Church, men jealous of her influence, then tried to shift the debate to the question of the Jesuits. This issue became an open and declared strife.

[8] G. Vauthier, Villemain, p. 97.

[9] See the Ami de la religion of 1841.

From 1841 to 1843, on the side of the Catholics, no concerted plan of campaign was evident. Bishop Clausel de Montals of Chartres published vigorous pamphlets; Archbishop Affre of Paris sent memorials to the King. But in 1843 the example of the Catholic party in Belgium suggested to the French Catholics a method and a program. A journey of Bishop Parisis to Belgium made him grasp the role which could be taken by the Church in modern societies.[10] On his return to France he published pamphlet after pamphlet which brought increasing notice. Nothing in his previous record seemed to point to such an attitude. He had found fault with Lacordaire's apologetics,[11] and was supposed to be rather unfavorably disposed to the new ideas. But when Montalembert and the former editors of the Avenir appeared to hesitate, Bishop Parisis announced definitely the character which the strife against the University ought to take and he indicated the polemical methods which seemed to him suited to the present times. First of all, he did not intend that the great debate which had sprung up should be turned into a wretched quarrel between the clergy and the University. In his very first writing, he said: "We should refrain from repeating that we are defending the cause of the clergy; we must show that we are defending the cause of all." [12] In the [10] C. Guillemant, Pierre-Louis Parisis, II, 16–22.

[11] Correspondance de Lacordaire avec M^me^ Swetchine, p. 392.

[12] In a book which appeared in 1847, entitled, Cas de conscience à propos des libertés exercées ou reclamées par les catholiques, Bishop Parisis even said that, "all circumstances being considered, our liberal institutions, in spite of their abuses, were the best for the state and for the church."

defense of this cause, he declared opportune: 1. that the episcopate take part in a public and legal agitation; 2. that the laity have their place therein and that Count Montalembert be its heart and soul.[13]

This appeal of Bishop Parisis was effective. The other bishops began to stir themselves, the group of former editors of the Avenir recovered their confidence, and Montalembert published his famous pamphlet on the Devoir des catholiques dans la question de la liberté d'enseignment. Of course many formulas of the Avenir were repeated, and the new campaign seemed to some merely a revival of the recently condemned campaign. But an attentive eye would see in it two notable differences. In the first place, the battle bore on a precise, concrete question, and not on a complete restatement of the relations of Church and state as in the time of the Avenir; a new strategy was proposed, new principles were proclaimed. In the second place, the movement was undertaken in accord with the episcopate, and Montalembert declared that he did not wish to attempt anything apart from that accord.

Louis Veuillot

The union of the Catholics was based on this program. The Correspondant, which had ceased publication, was reorganized by some of its former editors; the Univers entered strongly into the campaign.[14] It had a new editor, a former ministerial journalist, recently converted to Catholicism. His initiative and [13] See his booklet, Du silence et de la publicité. On Bishop Parisis' role from 1843 to 1848, see Follioley, Montalembert et Mgr Parisis.

[14] "The constitutional point of view," wrote Veuillot to Bishop Parisis, "is the one we must take. It will close the mouth of the liberal of bad faith, and will open the eyes of the liberals of good faith. It will lead Christians on the broadest and most practical road that today is open to ideas. For a long time now, I think, God has reserved for us, in the Charter and in the laws, powerful weapons, which we ought to use. . . . To remember that he is a citizen, is a Christian's duty." L. Veuillot, Correspondance, I, 210.

talent at once was felt by all his collaborators and his name soon became inseparable from the paper: it was Louis Veuillot. He was born at Boynes. His father was a Burgundian, a cooper, and his mother was a native of Orléans. Neither of them was a Christian. The boy grew up, so to speak, by himself, with no religious education, first at Boynes, then at Paris, where his father, in 1820, opened a small wine shop. As a simple lawyer's clerk, he devoured books and composed poetry. Then, fired with a desire to write, after the revolution of 1830, when not yet twenty years of age, he accepted the role of defending the July monarchy with his pen. At bottom he detested that bourgeois regime, which was sensualist and practically atheist, and which gave the worker "masters to sell him water, salt, and air, taking from him the tithe of his sweat and requiring from him the blood of his sons, but never offering him a protector to defend him or a guide to enlighten him, to teach him hope." [15]

But the journalist was soon ashamed of his trade. He declared: "If my father knew what I was doing, what I was writing, he would have refused the bread that I was providing for him." The young man, on the point of passing to socialism, reflected and became a Christian. In the course of a journey to Rome, which he made in the company of a Catholic friend, he was entranced by the beauty and strength of Catholicism. According to his own expression, "he became a Christian from head to foot," decided to combat not only manifest unbelief, but whatever seemed to lessen or falsify the authority of that Church in which he had found peace of soul and the satisfaction of all his aspirations toward justice.

"His entrance into the journalistic world gave the Catholic press what it no longer had since the Avenir. That was an alert and vigorous polemist, such as no paper possessed at that period; a born writer, with a pen flowing with flashing wit; a master of satire, able to grasp and at need to create ridicule; a courageous fighter, making himself hated, but listened to." [16] He had the biting, arrogant spirit of Lamennais. He wrote: "Although I hardly like the times in which I am living, I recognize in myself more than one trait of its character, conspicuously that which I condemn the most: I am scornful." [17] His particular pleasure will be to slash the insolent face of impiety.[18] Mingled with his lively love for the Church was always that hatred of the wealthy and egoist bourgeoisie which in childhood he felt so harsh toward his own. And at times "surprise is felt at seeing him of the same mind on this question with the most decided revolutionaries." [19] But a warm piety and a sincere obedience to the directions of the Holy See preserved him from the shoals where Lamennais foundered.

[15] Louis Veuillot, Les libres penseurs, p. 10.

Catholic Education

Louis Veuillot issued his Lettre à M. Villemain, a vehement pamphlet of which about 15,000 copies were sold in a few weeks. Almost at the same time Montalembert published his appeal on the duties of Catholics, and Bishop Parisis his first booklet. All the Catholic groups joined hands. Veuillot wrote in the Correspondant, and the Univers opened its columns to Montalembert. The Archbishop of Paris and his suffragans had sent the King a confidential memorial against the educational monopoly; the editor of the Univers procured a copy of it, published it, and thus obtained a public manifestation of fifty-six bishops, who gave their approval to the memorial.[20] The legitimists put themselves at the side of the former editors of the Avenir; one of the signers of the ordinances of 1828, Vatimesnil, took his stand beside Montalembert, and the [16] Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, V, 475.

[17] L. Veuillot, Les odeurs de Paris, p. 15.
[18] L. Veuillot, Les libres penseurs, p. 20.
[19] Lemaitre, Les contemporains, p. 31.
[20] Guillemant, op. cit., II, 45–47.

Catholics, receiving their directions from a committee of laymen, recognized Bishop Parisis as the ecclesiastical leader of the campaign,[21] as their doctrinal guide.

A second bill, presented by Villemain (February 2, 1844) merely tightened the union. By a contemptible maneuver, the government tried to obtain the adherence, or at least the silence, of the episcopate by increasing the number of burses granted to the minor seminaries and to soften the parliamentary opposition by entrusting the report of the law before the Peers to a well-known Catholic, Duke Victor de Broglie. The new law, while proclaiming the educational freedom, organized and perfected the monopoly. It admitted the foundation of free schools, but subjected them to the supervision, control, and jurisdiction of the University in the smallest details of their functioning. Louis Veuillot expressed the view of all the Catholics when he declared: "For the love of God, let us be victims, but not dupes." Most of the prelates, grouped about their metropolitans, sent protests. During the discussions before the Chambers (April 22 to May 24, 1844), Montalembert championed, against Cousin, the cause of freedom with an eloquence that was the foundation of his repute as a parliamentary speaker.[22]

The Catholics, with the high approval of Bishop Parisis,

[21] Eugène Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, I, 409.

[22] Said the young orator, as he faced his astonished adversaries with his clear and loyal eye: "Gentlemen, we must persuade you that you do not finish with consciences as with parties. Do you know what is the most unbending thing in the world? It is the conscience of convinced Christians. We know, indeed, that our rights as Christians are prior to all the constitutions of the world; but we are happy to see that these rights are consecrated by the constitution of our country. The Charter is the ground on which we take our stand. Freedom is our sun, and no one is privileged to extinguish its light. Because we are of those who go to confession, do not think that we rise from the feet of our priests disposed to hold out our hands for the fetters of an anticonstitutional legality. In the midst of a free people, we are unwilling to be islets. We are the successors of the martyrs, and we do not tremble before the successors of Julian the Apostate; we are the sons of the Crusaders, and we do not recoil before the sons of Voltaire." Discourse of April 16, 1844; Montalembert, Œuvres, I, 364–401.

decided, in the early days of 1845, to found a committee of action. This was called "The Committee for the Defense of Religious Liberty," and Montalembert was acclaimed its president. The vice-presidency was given to Vatimesnil, a former member of the Martignac ministry, and to Charles Lenormant, a Catholic member of the University. Veuillot became the propagandist of the movement by founding in other parts of France committees for the purpose of backing up the Univers.[23] He answered Guizot, who reproached Montalembert for an unjustified claim to represent the Church: "Yes, M. de Montalembert is only a child of the Church, but he is the child on whom the mother relies." [24] Lenormant and the liberal Champagny replied to the Lord Chancellor, who had called their group "the Catholic party": "We would not have proposed the term; but if it is cast at us as a reproach, we accept it." [25]

What was organized was indeed a Catholic party, under the direction of a lay leader and with the approbation, at least tacit, of the large majority of the episcopate. But neither the bishops nor the orators nor the journalists who commended it considered it a permanent and normal institution. Montalembert, Veuillot, and Parisis presented it merely as a transient strategy, which most of them abandoned in 1848, when they found themselves in the presence of a great conservative party, able for the defense of religion, the family, and society without compromising the authority of the Church in its polemics. The same was true, at least in the minds of many, of the motto which all adopted at this period: "Liberty as in Belgium," [26] that is, the liberty of common rights, war against any monopoly even in favor of the Catholic Church, "which would be the most fateful gift that could be bestowed on her." [27]

[23] Veuillot, Correspondance, I, 179.
[24] E. Veuillot, op. cit., I, 426.
[25] Correspondant, X, 934; XIII, 581.
[26] E. Veuillot, op. cit., p. 487.
[27] Montalembert, Discourse of April 26, 1844; Œuvres, I, 453.

CHAPTER XXII

Other Activities

The Jesuits

To REGARD all those who were then defenders of the University monopoly as partisans intent on the destruction of the Church would be incorrect and unjust. Such a qualification could not be laid on Victor de Broglie, Guizot, Cousin, or Villemain.[1] But behind these men were some for whom the actual struggle was merely an episode of a more general war against the Catholic influence under whatever form it should appear. These men, feeling that their contention was, for the time being, lost on the field of freedom of education, attempted to open a breach at a point which they judged harder to defend. The attacks increased against the so-called encroachments of the religious congregations and their misdeeds. Shamelessly these were charged with undue influence in the making of wills, with thefts, with countless crimes. Then little by little the accusations were especially centered on the Jesuits. A strong [1] Villemain, however, was obsessed with a fear of the Jesuits, which would bring him to a state of mental derangement. Says Thureau-Dangin: "Villemain always imagined Jesuits about him, spying on him and threatening him. One day, in company of a friend, he left the House of Peers where he had delivered a brilliant discourse. He was talking quite normally, when, upon reaching the Place de la Concorde, he stopped, frightened. 'What ails you?' asked his friend.

'Do you not see?' he answered.

'No. Nothing,' said the friend.

Then, pointing to a heap of paving stones, he said: 'Stop. There are some Jesuits. Let us go away.'

Toward the end of December, 1844, Villemain, oppressed by domestic griefs and by political annoyances, had a violent attack of madness and jumped from a window of the cabinet hall." Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, V, 546.

counterattack, ably and vigorously conducted, soon took on such proportions that, in the press, in parliament, even in diplomatic negotiations, all other questions appeared to be relegated to a second place, giving place to the question of the Jesuits.[2]

Two professors of the Collège de France, Jules Michelet and Edgar Quinet, opened the contest in 1843. Both of them had previously shown a friendliness to Catholicism. At least they had admired its poetry and its social benefits. Said Michelet: "The most filial things that have been said about our old mother Church, have been said by me." And Quinet delighted to read the Psalms and the Imitation of Christ. But Michelet, a sensitive, impressionable, changeable soul, devoid of religious habits, not baptized till the age of eighteen, without strong convictions, following all the suggestions of his successive sympathies, suffering at the least wound to his tender feelings, was ready for all changes. In Quinet's vague and visionary religiosity, in which Herder's philosophy kept close to Chateaubriand's romanticism, were mingled anticlerical and revolutionary tendencies.

The two professors adopted a completely opposite attitude. Was this change owing to a desire to avenge the University for certain excessive insults directed against it in the writings of a Jesuit?[3] Should we suppose, in the case of Quinet, the gratification of a long restrained hatred; in the case of Michelet the desire for a clamorous popularity, as a revenge for mundane humiliations from which he had greatly suffered? Whatever may be the answer to these questions, the two professors chose ultramontanism and the Jesuits as the subject of their courses in 1843. Michelet, relying on the Monita secreta (the work of an impostor),[4] on the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius, and [2] Burnichon, La Compagnie de Jésus en France, II, 493–572.

[3] Le monopole universitaire, destructeur de la religion et des lois, by Father Deschamps.

[4] "To see that the Monita are a satire, you have only to open them and read them on the Constitutions of the Society, which he distorted by evident misinterpretations,[5] represented the teaching and work of the Jesuits as a doctrine and work of tyranny and corruption. Young students, avid for scandal, flocked to the courses of the two professors, who possessed real talent. When Michelet, with his feverish eloquence, and Quinet, with his tone of a prophet, stirred up the worst passions, their baneful suggestions were met with tumultuous applause and cries of hatred.

The professors' success tempted the journalists to imitate them. A certain writer, who was lacking in culture, but gifted with imagination, animation, and jeering gusto, Eugene Sue, had just published in the ministerial Journal des Débats, under the title of Mystères de Paris, a description of the filth of Paris. Sainte-Beuve, speaking of this work, says: "The essential inspiration of the Mystères de Paris is a foundation of debauchery." [6] The Constitutionel offered Sue 100,000 francs for a serial that would pillory the Jesuits. Thus originated the novel, The Wandering Jew, an unwholesome and calumnious work. Its author himself said in his Mémoires: "The desire to increase the popularity of the Constitutionel made me indifferent to the subject and to the moral aim of the book." In a short time the number of subscribers to the paper mounted from 3,000 to 25,000. The illustrated editions of the book were numerous. Ballanche wrote (November 26, 1844) to Ampère: "The whole world is devouring it; it is spreading more quickly than the cholera."

---

without prejudice. . . . The work appeared at Cracow in 1614, being the work of a Jesuit who was expelled from the Order" (Boehmer-Monod, Les Jésuites, pp. 64–66).

[5] Says Alfred Monod: "All the quotations given by Quinet and all his translations betray the prejudice with which he read and interpreted the texts" (ibid., p. 12). St. Ignatius wrote: "When a superior gives an order, let us be persuaded that the order is just, let us reject any contrary feeling, whenever we cannot perceive in it any sin." Michelet, in his course, quotes this passage, but suppresses the restriction (ibid.).

[6] Sainte-Beuve, Chroniques parisiennes, p. 169.

But the exaggerations of the calumniators hurt their cause. People saw that the serial novel of Eugene Sue appealed to antisocial passions no less than to antireligious passions. Michelet, continuing his attacks on the Society of Jesus, finally made his assault on the citadel of Christianity itself, treating it as the foe of the revolution, as the city of evil opposed to the city of good. Quinet went further, bestowing on the revolution the universal papacy and the government of souls.[7] Indeed, the Revue des Deux Mondes, reviewing the book on the Jesuits, in which the two professors had combined their lectures of 1843, wrote: "The attack has perhaps overreached itself." The public was ready to hear the Jesuits' reply. The stirring and serious reply came from a man who, in the Notre Dame pulpit, along with Lacordaire, had acquired a renown for eloquence, wisdom, and holiness. Under the title, De l'existence et de l'institut des Jésuites, Father Ravignan set forth, in a dignified, calm, and fearless style, the constitutions, teachings, and works of the Society to which he belonged. The work had an immense success. As Sainte-Beuve said in the Revue Suisse, the work was worthy of a great and holy cause.

However, the government took account of the attacks on the Jesuits. It feared that it might be drawn into one of those religious strifes which, taking the appearance of a persecution of consciences, is never a success for the powers that undertake it. Guizot, at least, saw this danger and sought to avoid it by referring the question to the spiritual authority,[8] that is, to the Holy See. He chose as the negotiator a man who, in the discussion of the education law in the House of Peers, had adroitly taken a position between Montalembert and Cousin. This man was Pellegrino Rossi, the jurist whom we have seen, in 1832, draw up, in Switzerland, a revision of the Constitution favorable to the radical party.

[7] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., V, 509.

[8] Guizot, "Lettre au P. Daniel," in the Etudes religieuses for September, 1867. The government of the Restoration, at the time of the ordinances of 1828, had also attempted to have the Holy Father intervene. And these "appeals to Rome," on the part of a government for which an appeal to Rome was an offense of the state, are not unique events in history. In 1832 Rossi became a naturalized Frenchman, and was a peer of France when Guizot selected him for plenipotentiary.

Such a choice could not be pleasing to Rome. Rossi's political party and his marriage to a Protestant were of a nature to make him suspect in the eyes of the Holy See. But the negotiator possessed at bottom the qualities that have made the renown of the diplomats of his race: a precise and clear judgment, a rare suppleness in his moves, and, under the forms of an urbanity of manner at times exuberant, a cool perseverance in the pursuit of his designs. In the course of March, 1845, he came to Rome. There for two months he experienced the trial of a coolness which was at first general at the papal court, then considerably attenuated, thanks to the friendly relations he was able to cultivate among the prelates. Early in May sharp debates arose in the French Chamber of Deputies over the religious congregations and a resolution was passed by the representatives of the nation requesting the government to have the laws of the state executed against them. These events gave him an occasion to have Rome see the dangers of the Church in France: the probable dissolution of all the congregations, the people already stirred up against the Jesuits, repeating against them, with greater violence, those outbursts which had so greatly saddened France. Although France was Catholic after the July revolution and King Louis Philippe was personally well disposed toward the Church, yet he was constitutionally powerless to repress an uprising of so great importance.

Cleverly Rossi insinuated that, for the peace of the Church, every pretext for agitation needed to be removed. Was not the Catholic party quite likely to compromise the Holy See by its violent acts and to disturb the hierarchy by its daring initiative; for what is that militant group of laymen, formed apart from the episcopate and issuing orders to the bishops, except a survival of the Avenir, the "coda of Lamennais"? In a word, urgently needed was an understanding for a combination that, without approving the detractors of the Jesuits and without encouraging their dangerous defenders, would assure the peace of the Church and of the state.

The existing circumstances could not have been more adroitly exploited. But, in his discussion of these questions with Cardinal Lambruschini, Rossi was face to face with a diplomat of his own stature. Gregory XVI's Secretary of State judged that a rejection of Rossi's request would not be opportune. He sought merely to reduce the concessions of the Holy See to a minimum in the proposed "combination." Rossi, who had at first called for a papal order expelling the Jesuits from France, finally agreed that these religious be asked "to place themselves in a condition that will enable the government to close its eyes to their presence," for example, by withdrawing from the big cities and numerous houses of the Society or by installing themselves in less important localities. Moreover, the Cardinal obtained Rossi's agreement that the Pope would not intervene officially in this measure, which would be carried out by the General of the Society himself. Consequently Father Roothaan, the Jesuit General, wrote (June 14, 1845) to the provincials of Paris and Lyons directing them to proceed "gently and quietly" to the diminution or the dissolution of the houses of Paris, Lyons, and Avignon. Presently he added the house at Saint-Acheul and several novitiates.

The Paris government congratulated itself over this result as being a success,[9] and sent its felicitations to Rossi. But in reality the papal diplomacy had triumphed. "The question of the Jesuits disappeared, without the Jesuits themselves disappearing." [10] On July 15, 1845, Montalembert declared in the House of Peers, addressing his remark to the ministers: "The [9] Guizot, Lettres à sa famille et à ses amis, p. 230.

[10] Thureau-Dangin, V, 574.

question of the schools and that of religious liberty remain untouched. They ran a risk of being absorbed in the question of the Jesuits. You have separated the two questions." [11]

Socialist Movement

The strife over the religious question did not indeed cease, but it was less heated, less sharp on both sides. The notion of an accord by mutual concessions began to appear. The government opened its eyes on the socialist peril. The period from 1840 to 1845 was the time when the propagators of the social utopias began to organize into a political party. A writer who was less original than either Saint-Simon, Leroux, or Fourier, but more aggressive and more popular, Louis Blanc, was the chief promoter of this evolution. The champions are no longer dreamers, but tribunes; their followers are not a sect, but a faction. In 1843 the movement was spread by a new socialist organ, La Réforme, founded by Ledru-Rollin and inspired by Louis Blanc. Two years later a petition circulated in the workshops of Paris, calling for a political revolution as a condition of the social revolution. The Journal des Débats took alarm. Guizot recognized frankly that each hindrance imposed on the religious influence was one more force given to the socialist perversion; and Louis Philippe, enlightened by experience, said to his prime minister: "You are right; where we must fight the revolutionary spirit is in the depth of men's minds." [12]

Count de Salvandy, the new minister of public instruction who succeeded Villemain, was quite filled with these views. In 1845 he protested against the impiety in the teaching, which, he said, would be a public crime. That same year he stopped the continuance of the courses of Edgar Quinet and in a bold move [11] Montalembert, Œuvres, II, 197. On the attitude of the Roman court and particularly on the personal attitude of Gregory XVI in this affair of the Jesuits, see Guillemant, op. cit., II, 127–32, and Burnichon, op. cit., II, 646–75.

[12] Thureau-Dangin, L'église et l'état sous la monarchie de Juillet, p. 117.

he substituted for the royal Council of the University, all-powerful because of its life tenure and most hostile to the demands of the Catholics, a Council of thirty members, which was renewable yearly.

The Catholics, on their side, explained that they would not refuse a prudent compromise. Frederick Ozanam declared his approval of this attitude. Lacordaire advised less animosity against the University, and concern for the lukewarm, the indifferent, the politicians, and the wavering masses.[13] But one of the most important events of the religious history of the period was the publication in 1845 of a writing entitled De la pacification religieuse. Its author was the superior of the minor seminary of Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet at Paris, Father Dupanloup.

Dupanloup

Already the year before, Father Dupanloup had taken a hand in the controversy over the freedom of education. This he did by the publication of two letters to M. de Broglie and, in 1848, by a pamphlet, Les associations religieuses, véritable état de la question. He was already known as a preacher, catechist, and educator. Born in Savoy (January 3, 1802), abandoned by his father at the time of his birth,[14] but brought up in a Christian manner by a pious mother, he had early felt the call to the priesthood. He prepared for this vocation by earnest studies and an intense religious training in the minor seminary of Saint-Nicolas [15] and in the seminary of St. Sulpice. Appointed curate in the parish of the Madelaine immediately after his ordination and charged particularly with the catechism classes, he showed himself from the start an incomparable teacher. He himself said: "They came from all directions, from distant countries; for the revolutions of 1830, 1831, and 1832 had brought to Paris children from Italy, Poland, Portugal, Germany, and Brazil." One day he was able to note among his listeners three queens. This son of the people, called to deal with the great, honored with the friendship of the Duke de Rohan, later appointed to give religious instruction to the Duke de Bordeaux, then to the Duke de Nemours and Princess Clementine, easily found himself, by his lofty culture and the elevation of his soul, on a level with the noblest minds.

[13] Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, V, 444-95.

[14] E. Faguet, Mgr Dupanloup, p. 2.

[15] Before entering the Saint-Nicolas seminary, Felix Dupanloup had studied in the institution of M. Poiloup.

Probably no compliment touched him more than the one addressed to him by Royer-Collard upon meeting him at the deathbed of Prince Talleyrand: "You are a priest." Dupanloup was indeed fully a priest when, in 1834, the Archbishop of Paris appointed him director of studies in the minor seminary of Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet. Only those who knew Saint-Nicolas during those brilliant years (1834–35) can form an idea of the intense life developed there," wrote Ernest Renan. "And that life had a single source, a single principle, Father Dupanloup. He took the place of all. To be a writer or orator was secondary with him; as an educator, he was unequaled." [16]

In his book on religious pacification, Father Dupanloup took up the question of general religious policy for the first time. There he showed himself, both in his ideas and in his style, such as he would be to the end of his life: a warm defender of the Church in the presence of modern society, to the point of being called by the freethinkers "a fierce reactionary," and a defender of modern society in the presence of the Church, to the point of incurring and at times deserving the epithet of being a liberal and a Gallican. In both cases he was a stubborn fighter, a tireless polemist; preaching pacification and conciliation with unparalleled liveliness; having an intense supernatural life with a depth and solidity revealed in his intimate writings, but never suppressing the natural impetuosity of his temperament; a burning fire fanned in turn by grace and nature.[17] "Peace," he said, "is the wish of our heart. But the peace we desire is peace in liberty, peace in justice. Any other peace would be shameful. We can be humble; we should not be abject." He added: "Will France have a statesman who wishes to attach his name to a new and glorious concordat?" For the making of this concordat, he indicated the dispositions which he professed toward modern society: "We accept, we appeal to the principles and liberties proclaimed in 1789. . . . You made the Revolution of 89 without us and against us, but for us, God willing it thus in spite of us."

[16] Renan, Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse.

The author of the work on religious pacification was not contradicted by the editor of the Univers. Declared Louis Veuillot: "We have said and repeat that a new era begins, the fruit of long revolutions that have stirred us. Democracy arises, and the Church is there as a mother beside the cradle. . . . Citizen by the same title and with the same rights as the impious, let the Christian be in every juncture the defender and apostle of his belief, as the impious is the advocate and servant of his unbelief. This noble and new use of political right is enough in a way to dissipate all the dangers." [18]

In the elections of 1846 the Catholics took their stand on "liberty for all." Practically the electoral committee for the defense of religious freedom declared that, "since religious liberty is for Catholics of an interest above any other, we should not exclude any candidate who promises to defend that liberty consecrated by the Charter of 1830." [19] This admonition was followed, and the elections sent to the Parliament 146 candidates recommended by the committee, at the head of which was Montalembert. This number did not amount to a majority. Besides, [17] This is the testimony of Father Debeauvais, who had been a fellow student of Felix Dupanloup in the seminary and his close friend to the end of his life.

[18] Louis Veuillot signed himself as associate editor. After August 3, 1845, the editor-in-chief was Charles de Coux. Cf. Univers of August 3, 1845.

[19] Univers of December 7, 1845.

among the promises of the candidates, many appeared to have doubtful sincerity and firmness. But it was a considerable success, owing to the union and the timeliness of a strategy which, without sacrificing principles, made the Catholic cause more popular. Unfortunately the expressions used in recommending this strategy had an equivocal meaning and would soon arouse very lively controversy among those who had unanimously proclaimed them.

Works of Charity

Pope Gregory followed all these strifes with a fatherly eye. He rejoiced at seeing the bishops of France once again taking the road to Rome, whether to make a report of their spiritual administration in accordance with their promise at their consecration, or to receive instructions from the Holy See in difficult situations, or simply to show their union with the chair of Peter. The Pope also felt grateful to the French government for not hindering these manifestations of fidelity. When receiving some of these prelates, he told them how happy he was to be surrounded by the bishops, "his support and his defense."

The movement toward liturgical unity seemed to Gregory to be a guaranty of that hierarchical unity which Christ established in His Church. He praised Bishop Parisis of Langres for having brought all his clergy to the universal practice of the Church. But, understanding that an exaggeration in this direction or too great haste in carrying out the projected reforms might have its dangers, he declared to the Archbishop of Reims that, for the avoidance of grave dissensions, he judged that for the present he should refrain from treating the subject at length or even from giving detailed replies to the questions submitted.[20] [20] Letter of August 6, 1842; cf. Bernasconi, Acta Gregorii papae XVI, III, 224.

Gregory XVI rejoiced at the wonderful development of works of charity under his pontificate: "a new charity, private charity in place of official and public charity; organized charity instead of scattered and spontaneous charity; fraternal charity to the people by the people." [21] The St. Vincent de Paul Society with all the works depending on it, and the Propagation of the Faith Society had been the outstanding expressions of that charity. But the Pontiff's heart was particularly moved at noting that the charitable works had developed in France in a dependence on a spirit of prayer and sacrifice. To assist the poor, to care for the sick, to educate children, and to provide relief for the aged, religious congregations had been founded.[22] Among these works one seemed especially marked with a divine seal: the Little Sisters of the Poor. "The extraordinary and supernatural peculiarity of this work had been that of a charity which became, not only servants of the poor, but beggars for them; this sublime and daring trust in God, excluding possession of anything; no foundation or endowment; everything at the risk of a precarious charity, with no guaranty but a word of the Gospel." [23] And Providence blessed this hardihood. In 1841, in a little town of Brittany, a former servant girl, Jeanne Jugan, seconded by three poor working girls and directed by a humble curate, Father Lepailleur, had vowed her life to the service of the poor and infirm aged people and founded the institute which, a century later, counted more than 4,000 religious, divided into more than 250 houses scattered over the face of the earth.

Gregory rejoiced also to see works of piety flourishing, in particular works of devotion to the Blessed Virgin. He saw the birth at Paris and its wide extension of that association of [21] Baunard, Un siècle de l'église de France, p. 271.

[22] For a list of these works, see Baunard, op. cit., pp. 270–97.

[23] Baunard, op. cit., p. 283. (In 1953 the Little Sisters of the Poor in the United States numbered 860 and had 51 homes for the aged. Tr.)

prayers, placed under the auspices of the immaculate heart of Mary and called by that title. Its rapid progress and the countless favors were no less wonderful than those of the Little Sisters of the Poor. On November 27, 1830, a pious Daughter of Christ, Catherine Labouré, had been favored with an apparition of the Blessed Virgin, surrounded by rays of light, her feet on a half-globe, and encompassed with an invocation in letters of gold: "Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee"; and a mysterious voice asked her to have a medal made after this model. Following lengthy inquiries, Archbishop Quélen of Paris consented to have a medal made according to the indicated model. This medal, by the prayers it stirred up, by the devotion to the Virgin Mary which it awakened in souls, operated prodigies of conversion. A zealous priest of Paris, Father Dufriche-Desgenettes, pastor of Notre Dame des Victoires,[24] having given the precious medal as their symbol to an association founded for the conversion of sinners, in a short time saw his parish take on new religious life. The Supreme Pontiff, on April 24, 1838, made the pious association an archconfraternity, and authorized it to affiliate with itself similar associations in the whole Church. After that the archconfraternity experienced marvelous developments and became an inexhaustible source of graces.[25] On February 14, 1841, Father Lacordaire, wearing the Dominican habit in the Notre Dame pulpit, saluted, as a glory and national hope, the meeting of souls of a hundred countries [26] at that church of Notre Dame des Victoires.

[24] Cf. E. A. de Valette, Vie de M. Dufriche-Desgenettes.

[25] Cf. Aladel, La médaille miraculeuse.

[26] Lacordaire, Œuvres, IX, 219. Among the numerous conversions brought about through the medal, thereafter called the miraculous medal, we must mention the return to God of an Alsatian Jew, Alphonse Ratisbonne. Later, with his brother Theodore, he established the congregation of Our Lady of Sion, founded for the conversion of the Jews.

Works of Scholarship

Gregory XVI was well versed in the ecclesiastical sciences. He was pleased to note that philosophical, theological, and historical studies had continued to be successfully cultivated in spite of the disturbances of the time. To the founder of the Annales de philosophie chrétienne he expressed his gratification in 1840.[27] These Annales, founded in July, 1830, by a member of the Société Asiatique, Augustin Bonnetty, were an important manifestation of this scientific movement among Catholics. In the beginning their purpose was to make known whatever human sciences, particularly history, archaeology, astronomy, natural history, jurisprudence, and the like, contained in the way of proofs and discoveries in favor of Christianity. We have already referred to the works of Gerbet, Rohrbacher, Guéranger, Frayssinous, Lacordaire, and Lamennais. A former ardent disciple of the Avenir, Father Maret, in his essay on pantheism, had vigorously fought the "separated philosophy" of the eclectics of the school of Cousin and the socialist doctrines of the school of Saint-Simon and Leroux, in which he found the same source of errors, an avowed or disguised pantheism. Father Gousset, vicar general of the diocese of Besançon, had issued (1832), against the survivors of Jansenism, a work to justify the moral theology of St. Alphonsus Liguori. In 1844, after he was made archbishop of Reims, he published his moral theology for the use of pastors and confessors, a clear and solid work, which obtained a notable success.

The struggles carried on by the Catholics for the primary and secondary schools did not make them forget the question of higher education. In 1845 Bishop Affre founded the Ecole des Carmes at Paris, intended to train writers capable of composing solid writings in favor of religion. There the students prepared for the licentiate and the doctorate, either in letters or in sciences. Three years later the Ecole des Carmes saw its students receive twelve licentiates. After another two years it had its first doctor, Father Lavigerie, later a cardinal. For the teaching in the major seminaries, Joseph Carrière published (1837–46) his Praelectiones theologicae majores in eight volumes; it had successive editions and contributed to the raising of theological studies among the clergy.[28] But no publication contributed more effectively to the progress of higher ecclesiastical studies than the two patrologies of Migne.

[27] See Annales de philosophie chrétienne, XXI (1841), 471–73.

About 1840 news was received that a priest of Auvergne, Father Migne, intended to publish a new and convenient edition of a complete patrology, that of the Greeks as well as that of the Latins. The undertaking was a colossal one. Though not a theologian ex professo, Father Migne was gifted with a remarkable theological sense. His project met with difficulties of all sorts. But he succeeded by force of tenacity and skillful management. The two patrologies were published, one after the other, beginning in 1844, and were welcomed gratefully by scholars who were engaged in the study of the early Christian literature.[29]

Theological Errors

The theological errors of this period, by the discussions they stirred up and by the writings they provoked, contributed to the advance of the religious sciences. Among these errors, we must mention the most notable and most widespread: traditionalism. This error was an exaggerated reaction to the rationalism of the eighteenth century and the shameful excesses of the French Revolution. The philosophy of the eighteenth century had attacked revelation and tradition. The Revolution tried to justify its spirit of revolt by human reason, which it attempted to deify in 1793. Some Catholics thought that the time was at hand to dethrone this pretended divinity. They believed they could undermine rationalism at its foundation by showing that individual reason is powerless to demonstrate religious and moral truths; that these truths are the patrimony of humanity, which receives them from divine revelation and hands them on by tradition. The traditionalist movement had two chief centers of propaganda: the Annales de philosophie chrétienne and the group of disciples who gathered about a former professor of philosophy at Strasbourg, a convert to Catholicism who became a priest, Father Bautain.

[28] E. Levesque, s.v. "Carrière" in Vacant's Dictionnaire, II, 1804.

[29] J. Bellamy, Théologie catholique au XIX^e siècle, p. 47. Migne had conceived his project in 1836. The Latin Patrology, which appeared in 1855, contains 221 volumes; the Greek Patrology (1857–66) is in 166 volumes.

Carried to its extreme consequences, traditionalism invited a double reproach. By putting on the same plane and confusing in one and the same demonstration the truths that are in the domain of reason and those that are in the domain of faith, it failed to distinguish between the natural and the supernatural order and led to the absorption of one in the other. By proclaiming the radical impotence of individual reason to ascertain the truth, it did not allow in universal reason the collectivity of individual reasons. Father Bautain was obliged to subscribe (1840), by order of Gregory XVI, to six propositions, by which he acknowledged the power of human reason to prove with certitude the existence of God, the truth of revelation, the authenticity of the New Testament, and so on.[30] The followers of traditionalism humbly submitted. They had the merit of bringing into the light certain notions treated by the heirs of Descartes with too much contempt, with having restored to a place of honor the ideas of tradition and authority and with searching for remnants of the primitive revelation in the history of ancient peoples, the product of remarkable works, thus making them the forerunners of the history of religions.

An excessive reaction against Gallicanism, after disturbing the Church of France, eventually, by a closer examination and by a supreme decision of the Holy See, established some disputed points of discipline.

[30] Bellamy, s.v. "Bautain," in Vacant's Dictionnaire, II, 481–83.

Gallicanism

The two Allignol brothers, priests of the diocese of Viviers, were ecclesiastics of blameless morals. But they were somewhat lacking in the observance of residence and had a vexatious irritability of character. Considering themselves victims of unjust prejudices on the part of the episcopal administration, they published (1839) a pamphlet entitled De l'état actuel du clergé en France. In this little work the two brothers, collaborating in it as the Lamennais brothers did in preparing similar publications, tried to defend against the modern discipline, accepted by the French episcopate and inspired by Gallicanism, the old discipline of the Roman Church, which alone conformed to the prescriptions of canon law. According to these brothers, the ministry of pastors was of divine institution, and their irremovable status was a consequence of that institution. Moreover, they said, the bishop has not the right to administer a diocese by himself alone, but only in conjunction with his priests assembled in synod. In a word, in the name of the country pastors, who were removable at the will of the bishop and were without much standing in the eyes of the people, the two authors demanded that the clergy "be freed from the despotism of the bishops." The book was much discussed. Some priests who were piously attached to the Church, while regretting the book's violent language and its doctrine, were not displeased to see the Gallican spirit attacked. Others, embittered and discontented, were glad to see their rage put in the form of propositions. Others were exasperated at this unjust aggression on their esteemed Bishop Bonnel.

The clergy of the diocese of Viviers were divided into two camps. The strife seemed to reach its climax when, after Bishop Bonnel's death, he was succeeded by a young Oblate, originally from the diocese of Aix, Father Guibert. The new prelate arrived with a well-deserved reputation for being a man of mature mind, correct and confident judgment, solid piety, and of administrative talent which he had shown as superior of the seminary of Ajaccio and vicar general of the diocese. At the very outset he showed his firm determination to do everything to bring peace to the conflict. Unfortunately the quarrel soon assumed unforeseen proportions. The press of Paris took up the affair. Father Clavel, who edited Le bien social, journal du clergé secondaire, in which, under cover of a fiery ultramontanism, he pleaded for his personal grudges, made himself the defender of the Allignol brothers. Father Migne in his Voix de la vérité, and Father de Genoude [31] in the Gazette de France, took occasion of the differences to attack the whole episcopal body, which was "directed by the Univers," said the Gazette, "and was tyrannized over by the Jesuits." Marquis de Régnon, in La Liberté, lay the blame directly on the Bishop of Viviers. For their part, the Allignol brothers, intoxicated by the fuss made about them, assumed an arrogant attitude, boasting that they were supported at Rome by the Holy Father himself.

Bishop Guibert thought the moment had come for him to act with firmness. On January 6, 1845, he issued his pastoral on "the dangerous tendencies of a party being formed in the Church in France against episcopal authority." "We cannot deceive ourselves," he said; "they wish to free the priests from what they dare to call the despotism of the bishops. This language contains a revolt against the authority of the Church. . . . The Supreme Pontiff is not unaware of what is taking place in our country. He knows that at the least signal he would be faithfully obeyed; yet he does not impose any change in the present state of affairs." Besides, in reply to the false allegations of the Allignol brothers, the prelate communicated to his clergy and his faithful a letter of Cardinal Lambruschini, the Secretary of State, assuring him that "the assertions of the two refractory priests, far from having any shadow of truth, were entirely false." The Allignol brothers, urged repeatedly by two holy bishops, Mazenod, bishop of Marseilles, and Devie, bishop of Belley, submitted, and Pope Gregory by a brief (November 26, 1845) congratulated the Bishop of Viviers for having, by his prudence, calmed the quarrel by not entering into the debates on the question of the irremovable status of certain categories of priests, on which His Holiness desired silence to be observed.

[31] Antoine Genou, better known as Eugène de Genoude, especially after the title of nobility conferred on him by Louis XVIII in 1822, had been a disciple of Lamennais. He was the author of several highly regarded works.

Once more the wisdom of Gregory XVI, too often represented as a friend of the extreme parties, favored the moderate opinion. Between the excesses of Cartesianism and those of traditionalism, he had recommended, in philosophy and in apologetics, a method where individual reason and tradition would be harmoniously combined. Between the claims of Gallicanism, which tended to exaggerate the rights of bishops, and those of a fanatical ultramontanism, which wished to lessen those rights excessively, he declared himself for the moderate regime which the French bishops, after the Revolution, thought ought to be adopted, at least provisionally, for the good administration of their dioceses and for the good of souls.[32]

[32] On the affair of the Allignol brothers, see Follenay, Vie du cardinal Guibert, II, 42–97.

CHAPTER XXIII

Gregory XVI and the Foreign Missions

WHEN he was a cardinal, Pope Gregory XVI gave much thought to the spread of the faith in the infidel, schismatical, and heretical countries. His elevation to the highest dignity of the Church enabled him to give this work a greater expansion. Turkey in Europe and Turkey in Asia, the Far East, Africa, America, and Oceania were the object of his care.

The Near East

At the moment when Gregory XVI ascended the papal throne, the rivalry of Russia and England in Asia gave particular importance to the situation of Turkey. The political power of the Ottoman Empire was in decline. The succession to the "Sick Man" was greatly coveted. But a matter of supreme importance for Europe was that this succession should not be an open question. The balance of the two powers, Russia and England, in the East formed an equilibrium which was an advantage to Europe and which an open strife for the possession of Constantinople would have upset. Moreover, the question of the Dardanelles was then, more than it is today, a European question, even a worldwide question. To prolong the life of Turkey was the big political concern of Europe. All the secondary questions connected with this one made up what was then called "the Eastern Question." In the course of the century the combinations of international politics was almost always colored by this question and often dominated by it.

The gravity of such a question did not escape the attention of Gregory XVI. But his mind, little occupied with purely political questions, was naturally more concerned with the religious problems. From this point of view, he had perceived another Eastern question of equal importance. In the Ottoman Empire not only were the institutions and customs disintegrating, but so was the official religion, Islam. The religion of Mohammed still boasted of 200 million followers. But in the countries where European civilization had penetrated, in Egypt and India and even in a large part of the Turkish Empire where education was developing, religious fidelity to the Koran was becoming weak. The fighting spirit, which was the soul of Mohammedan propaganda, was extinct. Faith in the Koran, in a God who was master rather than father, a sort of Oriental despot arbitrarily distributing his punishments and his favors, appeared more and more inadmissible. Cultivated men among them were engaged in the interpretation of these dogmas by deforming them. The lofty-minded souls began to blush at the encouragement given by the Prophet to divorce, polygamy, the worst forms of slavery, and that pretended perfection of Islam, engendering in its followers pride, intolerance, and stagnation.

To a close observer, Islam seemed to be on the way to becoming the religion of some fanatics and of the popular masses belonging to the lowest degrees of civilization. Of course, no Mussulman avowed these conditions. The more educated showed themselves as hostile to Christian evangelization as did the most ignorant. But evidently their opposition stemmed from other motives than a deep religious conviction. An unconquerable racial and national pride and the scandal produced among them by the lax morals of many Christians who had settled in the Ottoman Empire easily explain their adamant opposition to every attempt of proselytism.

Eugène Boré was a man of superior intelligence, zealous for the spread of the faith; he had been one of Lamennais' choice disciples. Well versed in the living Oriental languages, for a long time he had reflected on the means by which the Catholic faith might profit from the slow but fatal dissolution of Islam. For the moment the European political situation favored his hopes, by preventing schismatic Russia and heretical England from seizing the Ottoman Empire; but this result was only negative. Eugène Boré, who received a scientific assignment in Persia by the Académie des Inscriptions, sent memorials to the Institute and reports to the Propagation of the Faith Society. After mature reflection and prolonged discussion of his ideas with a zealous Vincentian priest, he concluded that two indirect means of the apostolate should be employed at the same time: the spread of education to withdraw the Mussulmans from their false beliefs, and the evangelization of the Christians of the Orient to make Catholicism respected and desirable to the minds of these infidels, once they were disabused of their distorted notions. Boré himself founded and directed schools at Ispahan and Djoulfa. Later he devoted himself especially to the evangelization of the Christians in the Orient as a Vincentian.[1]

Gregory XVI was well suited to appreciate the wise views of the apostolate advocated by Boré. No work of direct evangelization of the Moslems was organized in the Orient; but works of education were increased there, and a considerable impulse was given to the evangelization of the Christians, both European and Oriental. In 1840 Father Daviers, a Vincentian, opened at Smyrna and confided to the Daughters of Charity a group of works including an orphan asylum, a foundling asylum, a dispensary, in a word, all the works that habitually constitute the charitable activities of the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul. The next year a father of the Picpus Congregation founded, in that same city, a college intended for the children of well-to-do families. At the same time the Jesuits, especially encouraged by the Supreme Pontiff himself, developed their works in Syria.

[1] Eugène Boré, ordained priest in 1850, soon after entered the novitiate of the Priests of the Mission, or Vincentians, and was sent as a missioner to the Orient shortly after pronouncing his vows. There he exercised the office of superior of the Bébek mission, then of prefect apostolic. Called to Paris as secretary of Father Etienne, his superior general, he succeeded him in 1874 and died four years later, after earning the title of apostle of the East.

Gregory XVI had become well informed on the state of the missions by his office as prefect of Propaganda. From the first year of his pontificate he placed at the disposal of Bishop Mazloum, Greek-Catholic bishop, three members of the Society of Jesus, Father Riccadonna of Plaisance, Father Planchet of Gap, and a lay brother, Henze of Hanover, to direct a seminary founded twenty years earlier at Ain-Tras in Lebanon. In consequence of various circumstances, the intended project was not carried out; but the three religious, soon joined by several of their fellow Jesuits, exercised a fruitful apostolate among the Christians resident in Syria, gave retreats to the laity and to the priests, explored the province of Hauran, until then almost unknown, discovered there a Christian population almost abandoned, and prepared the way for a more fruitful apostolate.

Their personal ministry extended to Mesopotamia. There, in 1832, Gregory XVI had instituted an apostolic delegation with a jurisdiction reaching into Persia. Father Riccadonna was given the task of appeasing certain differences that had arisen between the apostolic delegate and the native clergy. Father Planchet, in the name of Propaganda, headed the reorganization of the mission, which was confided to the French Dominicans in 1841. After Father Riccadonna's death, his successor, Father Ryllo, a Pole, was able to purchase, at the gates of Beyrouth, an extensive tract of land, and there built a residence. But his notable work was the foundation (1845) of the Ghazir seminary, which was designated by Propaganda as the central Asiatic seminary. Later on this house developed into two flourishing establishments: a seminary, and a college where the rich Europeans at first, and then the native notables, the sheiks and emirs, applied to obtain the favor of a distinguished education for their sons.

In 1835 Egypt was opened to the influences of European civilization. At that time the apostolic delegate, Bishop Guasco, asked for the sending of more missioners to help in gathering about him the Coptic Catholics. The Daughters of Charity, at the cost of many hardships, arrived in 1845 to open a hospital and a school at Alexandria. Two years later the Christian Brothers there began for boys the sort of works that were already undertaken for the girls. The comparatively liberal regime inaugurated in Egypt favored also the evangelization of the Melchites. The word "Melchites" ("royalists," or "imperialists") was applied in the course of the fifth century to the Oriental Christians who, conformable to the edict of Emperor Marcian, followed the doctrine of the ecumenical council of Chalcedon, acknowledging in Christ one person and two natures. After being for a long time subject to the schismatic patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem, in the eighth century they had energetically refused to follow the movement that came from Constantinople and they declined to break with Rome. The Melchites were consequently the object of many vexations on the part of their fellow Syrians, and they had to resist the government of the Porte, that wished to subject them to the authority of the Armenian patriarch. But the persevering efforts of Pope Gregory ended in their emancipation from all foreign tutelage and in the official recognition of their patriarch.[2] The Pope was also solicitous for the lot of the Maronites. In 1845 he took steps in their behalf with Abdul-Madjid, the sultan, and these efforts obtained a favorable reply from the Moslem sovereign.

European Turkey was not overlooked by the watchful Pontiff. In 1838, in an audience granted to Fieschi-Pasha, the ambassador of the Porte at Paris, he gave expression of his joy at the benevolent attitude of the Sultan, who had permitted the Catholics to erect new churches in Constantinople and in the provinces. And the Sultan, appreciative of this step, accentuated his relatively liberal policy toward the Church. At that time European Turkey counted 613,000 Catholics, 180,000 of whom lived in Constantinople. The independence of Greece also permitted the Pope to give a new impulse to the spread of the gospel in that country. By a brief of August 9, 1834, he established an apostolic delegation in Greece. Soon new churches were erected at Piraeas, Patras, Nauplia, and Navarino.

[2] See Cyril Charon (Karalevsky), Histoire des patriarchats melkites, II, 162–207.

Under Pope Gregory such was the work of spreading the gospel in the East. Toward the end of his pontificate, the superior general of the Vincentians, Father Etienne, wrote: "The Koran has still its disciples, but only because it proscribes all education. At present, however, this prohibition is no longer regarded by the great. . . . Once they are permitted to frequent our schools, the gospel and science will find them equally docile to their instructions. From the moment the Turks are allowed to enjoy liberty of conscience and the blessings of education, the Church will be on the eve of counting them amongst the number of her children." [3] Various obstacles intervened to hinder the progress of the movement pointed out by the venerated religious. But his views have not lost their worth and continue to justify good hopes.

The Far East

Various difficulties were encountered in the Far East. In some respects, these were more painful to the heart of the Supreme Pontiff because many of these obstacles stemmed, not from infidel potentates, as in Turkey, but from Christian rulers, even Catholic rulers. We have noted the sad situation inflicted on the missions in India in consequence of events that preceded, accompanied, and followed the French Revolution.[4] For sixty years (1760–1820) the Catholic missions in India had to be abandoned for lack of missioners and resources. But the English and the Dutch, on the pretext of observing a policy of strict religious neutrality,[5] hindered the spread of Christianity. The East India Company refused to carry on its ships any missioner, whether Catholic or Protestant, bound for China or India. By a government ordinance of 1814, Christians born in the country were excluded from all public offices except the least important.[6] The English government was equally energetic in encouraging the worship of idols as in hindering the preaching of the gospel. A certain English Protestant who lived in India for several years comments that the acts of weakness committed by so-called Englishmen exceeded any idea we might suppose.[7] At the close of the eighteenth century the pagodas in the presidency of Madras were falling in ruin. And the English government was at pains to halt their decay. The ignoble and bloody cult of Juggernaut was not only sanctioned, but was abetted and practiced by the English authorities.[8] The famous general Sir Perregrine Maitland was obliged to return to England for having refused to give the English soldiers an order to fire a salvo in honor of the infamous idol.[9] If to these facts we add the scandal produced on the natives by the bad conduct of most of the Europeans, we must acknowledge, along with a Protestant writer, that this conduct was calculated to lead the natives to a contempt for the religion of Christ.[10]

[3] Marshall, Christian Missions, II, 24.

God, however, was watching over the regions evangelized by Francis Xavier, Britto, Francis Laynez, and their heroic

[4] See Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, VII, 516 f.
[5] Asiatic Journal, XVIII, 8.
[6] Marshall, op. cit., I, 262 f.
[7] Colin Mackenzie, Six Years in India, I, 313.
[8] Marshall, op. cit., pp. 265 f.
[9] See the Times of October 14, 1863. Cf. Marshall, I, 267.
[10] Mackenzie, op. cit., I, 333.

companions. The pontificate of Gregory XVI would be marked by a remarkable development of the Catholic apostolate in India.

Many causes favored this development. The Catholic movement manifested in 1830 among the youth aroused a number of apostolic vocations; and the Congregation of Foreign Missions, reorganized in 1826, saw an increase in its membership. The Propagation of the Faith Society, founded at Lyons in 1822, furnished the missioners with more and more abundant financial help. Ocean travel became easier. Since the construction, in 1814, of the first paddle-wheel steamer, the art of navigation had developed. In 1824, the Sirus made the voyage from London to New York in seventeen days. Moreover, the long and apparently fruitless voyages of the Catholic missioners had borne fruit. The tireless devotedness of these men of God and scientific works like those of Father Dubois,[11] had contributed to make the missioners regarded, no longer as pariahs, but as men of high moral and intellectual worth and consequently of enormous importance, and had prepared men's minds to accept the preaching of the gospel.

India

The exceptionally enlightened zeal of a missioner, Bishop Bonnaud, of the Foreign Mission Society, was able to combine, with the help of God's grace, all these elements of success.[12] Bishop Bonnaud, a missioner in India since 1824, was appointed coadjutor of the Bishop of Pondichery in 1833, then vicar apostolic of India in 1836. In his various posts he revealed the highest qualities of missioner and administrator: prudence, combined with firmness, and far-sighted intelligence served by an accommodating activity.

[11] Mourret, op. cit., VII, 517.

[12] On Bishop Bonnaud, see Launay, Histoire de la Société des Missions étrangères, III, 19.

One of his first cares was to publish several works setting forth the teachings of the Catholic Church and works of apologetics, calculated to destroy the prejudices of the Hindus. His principal writing was an exposition of Catholicism in the form of a history of mankind. He sketched the Old Testament, the Gospels, and the history of the Church, carefully noting the appearance of heresies and especially the Protestant heresy, which he refuted in a few short and decisive pages. The book concluded with the picture of Christian doctrine and life, such as the practice of the Church in the nineteenth century, with its feasts, its sacraments, its works of piety and of charity, defended against the objections of its adversaries.

The second care of the great missioner was the training of a native clergy. At Pondichery he founded a minor and a major seminary, clearly separating the two and relieving the professors of any service alien to their seminary functions. The seminarians began by being completely separated from the world, that they might devote themselves entirely to the development of a solid interior life. But, before being called to major orders, they were sent to accompany and help the priests in their apostolic rounds. Several synodal meetings, at which all the missioners were convoked, both secular and regular, were likewise the object of the zealous prelate's solicitude. The most important of these synods was that of 1844, which was held at Pondichery. It was for India what the synod of Se-Tchuen had been for China.[13] Lastly, the education of youth was the object of Bishop Bonnaud's special care. He founded several schools, and, at the request of the French government, himself directed the colonial seminary,[14] and in 1846, in opposition to the liveliest prejudices of the populations of India,[15] some schools for girls, confided to a congregation of sisters.

[13] Ibid., III, 142–47.

[14] Beginning in 1879, the colonial seminary was entrusted to the Fathers of the Holy Ghost.

[15] Dubois, Mœurs des peuples de l'Inde, I, 476.

In the Annals of the Propagation of the Faith we can easily follow the progress of the Indian mission after 1820. About 1821 a missioner wrote: "I am astonished at the faith of these Christians." In 1829 Father Bonnaud, not yet a bishop, made a similar observation.[16] Ten years later, Father Garnier, a Jesuit, related that, notwithstanding much ignorance and many superstitious practices, "the Christians of these countries are in general well disposed and strongly attached to the faith. The usages introduced by the Jesuits still subsist: morning prayer in common an hour before sunrise; evening prayer with spiritual reading; catechism for the children given every day by a catechist; and the devotions of Mass on Sundays in the chapel. When the missionary makes his tour of the district, all approach the sacraments." In 1849 Father Louis de Saint-Cyr noted that "within a certain radius around what we call the center of the mission, all the villages, with rare exceptions, are Christian." The next year, Bishop Borghi, vicar apostolic of Agra, reported: "Surrounded as we are by sects, religion advances in the midst of them, with quiet but steady and uninterrupted progress." [17]

The Indian missions were, however, a cause of grief for the Supreme Pontiff. This grief was the greater as the responsibility could be attributed to the action of a Catholic power, Portugal. To fill the gaps in the clergy of their colonies, particularly in the diocese of Goa, the Portuguese had ordained, without the candidates having sufficient priestly preparation, some native priests, or half-castes, whose disedifying conduct had given the Goa clergy an unpleasant reputation and might seriously discredit the Catholic religion.

[16] Marshall, op. cit., p. 250.

[17] Ibid., pp. 250 f. Father Bertrand, writing from Madura, related this fact, often referred to since then: "Among these Indians there are numbers who, if asked whether they commit particular faults, will reply: 'Formerly I did—it is many years since. I told it to the Father, who forbade me to do so, and since then I have not committed it.'" Op. cit., I, 250.

Upon taking possession of the Apostolic See, Gregory XVI, already made acquainted with the situation from his office as prefect of Propaganda, which he had just held, thought that the first measure to be taken to restore the former luster to the missions of the Far East was to put an end to the scandals which the Lisbon government was unable to stop.

He began, therefore, to institute in India some vicariates apostolic and entrusted them to various missionary societies. Thus were established the vicariates of Ceylon, Sirdhana, and Bengal (1834–35), Madras and Pondichery (1836). The Portuguese government protested. The Pope replied by the bull Multa praeclare (August 14, 1838), which suppressed the jurisdiction of the Portuguese bishops in the territories attributed to the vicars apostolic. The Portuguese refused to submit, contested the validity of the papal act by juridical quibbles, and finally organized a formal schism. This was "the schism of Goa." The conflict seemed to be appeased when, in 1843, Gregory XVI, in agreement with Queen Maria, placed over the government of the Goa diocese, Bishop Silva Torrès. But scarcely had the newly chosen ruler, backed by the civil authority, arrived at Goa, when he showed his intention of exercising, in spite of the orders of the Pope, all the jurisdiction enjoyed by his predecessors. Thus was resumed the schism of Goa, which would afflict the Church until the pontificate of Leo XIII.[18]

Indochina

Cruel persecutions afflicted the Church in Indochina. On October 17, 1883, Father Gagelin, a priest of the Paris Foreign Missions, underwent death with so calm a piety that the pagan [18] On this subject see the letter of Gregory XVI of March 1, 1845, the consistorial allocution of Pius IX of February 17, 1851, the concordat between Pius IX and Peter V of Portugal (February 21, 1857), and the accord between Leo XIII and the crown of Portugal (June 26, 1886). Cf. Piolet, Les missions catholiques françaises, II, 200–7.

crowd, witnessing it, was unable to restrain its emotion.[19] Several of his faithful and neophytes suffered the same lot with a like courage. Some of them, before the act of sacrifice, were beaten with rods to the point of seeing their flesh fall in shreds. One of their executioners was heard to exclaim: "Indeed this Christian religion is a good religion." On September 21, 1838, Father Jaccard, a friend of Father Gagelin, received also his crown of martyrdom. The executioners broke ten bamboos on his body without wringing any outcry from him. Bishop Tabert, vicar apostolic of the kingdom of Annam, wrote: "In my vicariate alone 80,000 Christians are flying hither and thither in the deepest distress. . . . Nearly 400 churches, the creation of their labors and alms, are utterly destroyed." [20] Father Marchand, under the torture of red-hot pincers, gave testimony to the truth until his last breath. On November 24, 1838, Bishop Borie, vicar apostolic of Tonkin, was beheaded, after seven unsuccessful attempts by the executioner, whom the martyr encouraged, while the mandarins covered their faces with horror. On September 11, 1840, Father Perboyre, a Vincentian, died after undergoing for a whole year one of the longest and most cruel martyrdoms that any man has ever endured.

China

Not only in Indochina, but also in China the persecution raged with fury. When Gregory XVI mounted the papal throne, the persecution which was let loose in 1814 [21] was still going on. Missioners, Chinese priests, catechists, and simple faithful were put to death, thrown into prison, and sent into exile to the depths of Tartary. "There is no more famous date (1840) in the annals of Chinese missions." [22]

[19] Jacquenet, Vie de M. l'abbé Gagelin.
[20] Marshall, op. cit., I, 109.
[21] Mourret, op. cit., VII, 519 ff.
[22] Marshall, op. cit., I, 128.

From another point of view, we might say that no more shameful date can be found in the history of civilization in the Far East. Several Christian powers were moved and judged the moment had come for them to intervene, if only to protect their material interests. In 1842 England, limiting herself to this concern, obtained from China the opening of a certain number of ports for her commerce. In 1884 the United States, by a special article, stipulated the freedom of the Christian religion in the open ports. Toward the end of that same year (October 23) M. de Lagrenée, minister plenipotentiary of King Louis Philippe, signed, at Canton, with the Chinese minister, Ki-Ying, a similar treaty, but more explicit in its clauses. Exceeding his first instructions but not without referring the question to Guizot, then prime minister, who approved it, Lagrenée obtained from the Chinese negotiator that two edicts should be issued, in the name of the Emperor and under his seal, in favor of native Christians. The first, under date of December 28, granted them the free exercise of their religion. The second, dated February 20, 1846, promised them the restitution of their former churches.[23]

Korea

Korea, a vassal of China and bordering on that kingdom, was also the scene of violent persecutions.[24] We have recounted the preaching of the gospel in this country and told how, in the course of half a century, the Church of Korea, founded without priests, was preserved and spread without priests, except for the five-year apostolate of the Chinese priest James Tsiou. From 1784 to 1835 it underwent four major persecutions, never enjoyed full security, and gave more than a thousand martyrs. Bishop Brugnière, appointed vicar apostolic of Korea by Pope Leo XII in 1827, did not succeed in entering the country. He died on the frontier of the empire at the beginning of the winter of 1835, after repeating his fruitless attempts for several years.

[23] Piolet, op. cit., III, 79; Annals of the Propagation of the Faith, XVIII, 81; XXI, 23–25.

[24] Mourret, op. cit., VII, 515.

The first missioner to penetrate there was Father Maubant, of the Paris Foreign Missions, who arrived in 1836, soon followed by Father Chastan and Bishop Imbert, who had been a missioner in Se-Tchouan for ten years. The presence of these three zealous, courageous, and experienced missioners was an immense benefit for the Christian people there, who began to organize on the model of the European countries. But in 1839 the government of Korea passed into the hands of a sworn enemy of the Christians. The three missioners, betrayed by a false brother, were arrested and, on September 21, were put to death along with 250 of their disciples, of whom 70 were beheaded and 180 were strangled. A few years later (1844) the French admiral Cécille, coasting along the peninsula, sent the sovereign a letter threatening the vengeance of France if the persecution continued. By way of reply, the despot had a native priest, Andrew Kim, put to death. Korea was not freely opened to missions until 1910, after the Russo-Japanese war.

The plan of admiral Cécille, encouraged by Lagrenée's success in China, was to open Korea and Japan to the Catholic missioners. His failure with the Korean government did not discourage him. Moreover, his project was the result of an understanding with the ecclesiastical authorities. When, in 1832, the Holy See erected Korea into a vicariate apostolic, joining to it the Ryukyu islands, the move was in the hope that these islands, near-by and dependent on Japan, would be the gateway by which Christianity would again enter that country. Neither Bishop Brugnière nor Bishop Imbert was able to land on the Ryukyu islands. But in 1844 the French admiral proposed to the procurator of the China missions, Father Libois, the entry into Japan by one or two of his missioners. Father Forcade, the future archbishop of Aix, offered himself. Accompanied by an intelligent and brave catechist, a former confessor of the faith in China, Augustine Ko, he was presented to the authorities of Nafa, capital of the principal island, as an interpreter of the French admiral, desiring to make a deep study of the Japanese language.

Japan

At that time the empire of Japan was still systematically closed to foreigners. The Russians, English, and Americans had already tried to penetrate at Yeddo and Nagasaki, and had been refused admittance. Long and trying negotiations, carried on perseveringly by admirals Cécille and Guérin, concluded with the authorization given to the missioners to buy a little house at Nafa. But the work of evangelization seemed to be no further advanced. On the pretext of protecting the two foreigners, the king of Nafa had them accompanied everywhere by mandarins, forbade them to enter into the cities, kept them aloof from the common people, and ordered all houses to be closed at their approach. Nevertheless Father Forcade was able to make some reassuring observations. The Japanese people seemed to him to be a gentle people, kindly disposed, polite, intelligent, desiring to enter into relations with the Europeans; he even had serious reasons for believing so, after certain indications that a group of Christians subsisted in Japan in hiding. The future would justify these presentiments. But meanwhile the mandarins increased the precautions to prevent Father Forcade and his companion from undertaking the least religious propaganda among the natives.[25]

[25] See Marnas, La religion de Jésus au Japon, I, 80. Cf. Marbot, Vie de Mgr Forcade.

Africa

Among the lands that Gregory desired most earnestly to rescue from the yoke of infidelity, was one that in the early days of the Church rivaled the great Church of Alexandria. Having received the gospel in the first century of Christianity and famous for its great bishops and its glorious martyrs, the northern region of Africa, the country of St. Cyprian and St. Augustine, of St. Felicitas and St. Perpetua, fell to the power of Islam at the end of the seventh century. The twenty basilicas of the Church of Carthage had been turned into mosques. Since that time Christianity was represented in the Barbary states only by European slaves captured by the Moslems and abandoned to their fate by the Christian rulers. But, thanks to a mission founded at Tunis in the thirteenth century following the expedition of St. Louis, and thanks to the zeal of the Friars Preachers, the Friars Minor, the Trinitarians, the religious of Mercy, and later the sons of St. Vincent de Paul, the light of faith was not entirely extinguished on these shores.[26]

Algiers

The clergy in France were stirred with religious enthusiasm by the conquest of Algiers in 1830.[27] The fleur-de-lis seemed to be a forerunner of the sign of Redemption. In fact, after the victory the Count of Bourmont, commander of the expeditionary army, at once planted a cross on the loftiest monument of Algiers.[28] Unhappily the July government of France, by a misconceived respect for the so-called freedom of conscience, did nothing to acquaint the natives of Algiers with religious truth, nothing to affirm the Catholic faith of the victorious nation.

[26] See Le Roy, s.v. "Afrique," in Vacant's Dictionnaire, I, 543.
[27] See above, p. 142.
[28] Pioneau, Vie de Mgr Dupuch, premier évêque d'Alger, p. 87.

Pretense was made to say not a word about religion, to perform no religious ceremony before the Arabs. This policy did not impress them favorably; rather it scandalized them. They despised those Frenchmen, who lived like godless men and, in the words of one of the Arab leaders, "those dogs, who never pray to God." [29] Besides, when, two years after the conquest, a question arose of building a church in the city of Algiers, a Moor made the following reply to a magistrate who asked him how the Mussulman population would view this edifice: "Hasten to erect it, for only then will we believe that you have a God and that your word can be trusted." [30] In 1838 the government finally grasped that for many reasons, among other reasons to win the regard of the natives, Catholic worship needed to be organized in Algiers. Consultations with the court of Rome ended in the erection at Algiers of a diocese that would depend on the metropolitan authority of the archbishop of Aix. A bull of Gregory XVI (August 9, 1838), promulgated in France by the Moniteur, officially approved this erection. A short time later, the Pope appointed to the new post a young vicar general of Bordeaux, Father Antoine Dupuch.

Born in the ancient capital of Guyenne in 1800, of an honorable family of merchants, Antoine Dupuch, at first as a law student and later as a lawyer, was one of the most zealous members of the Congregation which Father Ronsin was then directing. As in the case of several of his comrades, the practice of works of charity was for him the prelude of an even loftier vocation. In 1822 he entered the seminary. As a priest, in his native diocese, he exercised as missioner, as director of works of charity, and as vicar general an apostolic activity that designated him for the highest and most delicate offices. After his appointment, the Ami de la religion commented: "Father Dupuch is well fitted to create in Algiers all that it lacks." But these lacks of the new diocese were vast.

[29] This was the word of Abd-el-Kader to one of his prisoners. See Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, III, 541.

[30] Moniteur of August 1, 1832. The Journal des Débats had said in all seriousness that, following the conversion of the Arabs, the local color would disappear, a change that would be harmful. Replied Louis Veuillot: "Assuredly we would lose those picturesque rifle shots that lend variety to the march of our troops. We should understand that the Arabs will belong to France only when they become French; they will become French only when they are Christians; and they will not be Christians so long as we ourselves are not."

"When Bishop Dupuch landed in Algeria, he found in Algiers only one church, served by a single priest, lacking the objects necessary for public worship, and an establishment of sisters; at Oran, an aged and worn-out priest; at Bone, a wretched chapel, a zealous priest who was without resources, and the beginning of a community of sisters. Nothing else in all these possessions." [31] "A bishop without priests, in the midst of an infidel or unbelieving people; backed up in Paris by the King, in Algiers by the governor general, but having against him an unyielding bureaucracy; repulsed by the indifference of the rich; too poor, even with the many gifts from the faithful in France, Bishop Dupuch at first was merely the most pestered of the persons holding office." [32] But his zeal did not weary. A year after his arrival he had twenty-five priests, eight churches, seven chapels, a seminary, eight schools, two orphan asylums, and a native hospital. In 1840 a mosque was turned over to him to be made into a cathedral. The foundation of several schools and institutions of charity by the Trinitarian Sisters of Valence, in the city of Oran; that of a house of the Good Shepherd in the neighborhood of Algiers in 1843; that of a boarding school of the Madames of the Sacred Heart at Mustapha; the foundation of the Trappists of Staouél in 1845: [33] these works were among the most fruitful of the zealous prelate. Abandoned by the government, at the end of ten years of the apostolate, he had to return to France. But he left behind him 80 priests, 140 sisters, 60 churches or chapels, a seminary, Christian schools, military hospitals, reformatories, associations of ladies of charity, all a flowering of evangelical works. And he had laid the bases of the chief foundations to which his two great successors, Bishop Pavy and Cardinal Lavigerie, would give such splendor.

[31] Thureau-Dangin, op. cit., III, 541.
[32] Louis Veuillot, Les Français en Algérie, p. 297.
[33] Berdange, Dom François-Régis, fondateur de la Trappe de Staouéli.

Abyssinia

Another old Christian country of Africa was Abyssinia. It had been lost to the Church and had fallen into schism two centuries earlier. During the year following Bishop Dupuch's arrival in Algeria, Abyssinia received a great missioner, Father de Jacobis. A French explorer, Antoine d'Abbadie, who in 1837 had succeeded in penetrating the heart of Ethiopia and who had been impressed by the depth and refinement of the religious sentiments of the inhabitants, went to Rome to communicate to the Congregation of Propaganda the results of his observations. The creation of a mission in Abyssinia was decided on, and its direction was assigned to a priest of the Mission, a native of Naples, Father de Jacobis, who arrived at Massaua in 1839 with the title of prefect apostolic. This man's gentleness, patience, and boundless charity soon won the kindly feelings of the people and even of several chiefs. In spite of the many obstacles arising from human respect and from family ties, two little communities of Catholics were soon formed near Massaua and Gouala, and four parish churches were erected in Agamie. A breath of powerful grace passed over this region. Moreover, helpers arrived to assist the worker who was weakened by excess of labor: Father Biancheri, Vincentian, and in 1846 Bishop Massaia, vicar apostolic of the new Galla mission, along with several Capuchin fathers, who lent him their assistance while waiting for the route to the Galla country to be opened to them.[34]

But at this time a Coptic bishop, the abouna[35] Salama, known for the looseness of his morals and the violence of his fanaticism, had, by his criticisms, raised up a persecution against the missioners. Tracked down by hordes of brigands, the Catholic communities were obliged to disperse. However, the efforts of the enemies of the Roman Church were powerless to destroy the people's friendly feeling toward the missioners. New apostolic centers were formed, and these were the consolation of Bishop de Jacobis, who was consecrated by Bishop Massaia in 1851.

Central Africa

Algeria and Abyssinia were missionary points. From there the missioners of the nineteenth century, following or preceding the explorers and armies of Europe, set out for the conquest of the African continent. Pope Gregory did not live to see the results; but he was able to hail the first fruits.

Bishop Le Roy, one of the apostles of this country, writes as follows:

Providence was preparing a new era for the vast dark continent. In our times when the European powers were going to divide it among them, new apostles had to rise up to precede them or follow them. This movement, which would mark the end of the nineteenth century, was modest in its origin and had its start from the seminary of St. Sulpice. At that time this house had two young Creole seminarians, Frederick La Vavasseur, a native of the island of Reunion (Bourbon), and Eugene Tisserand of Haiti. Having seen at close hand the lamentable abandonment in which the black race was living, they made this situation known to one of their elders. This was Francis Libermann, born at Saverne in 1803 and recently converted from Judaism to the Christian faith. Shortly afterward (1841) a new congregation was founded, the Society of the Holy Heart of Mary, which, seven years later joined to that of the Holy Ghost, thereafter bore this double title. Its founder died in 1852 and has since been declared Venerable. His first care was to evangelize the blacks of the French colonies, still subject to slavery, and to prepare them gradually for liberty.

[34] Coulneaux, in the Missions catholiques, II, 21.

[35] An abouna is a metropolitan in the Ethiopian Church.

The apostolate of Father Laval on Ile Maurice has remained rightly celebrated. Later on, through the care of Father Libermann, the French colonies of Reunion, Guadeloupe, and Martinique were erected into dioceses, and the new society entered the land of Africa. This entrance was undertaken under the patronage of Bishop England of Charlestown. This prelate, stirred by the activity of the American Protestants, who had just founded Liberia, in 1833 called the attention of Propaganda to the state of affairs, and the Council of Baltimore backed his move. Seven years later his vicar general, Father Barron, visited the coast of Africa and, on his return, was appointed vicar apostolic of the Two Guineas. But where were missioners to be found? At that time at Notre Dame des Victoires in Paris, he providentially made the acquaintance of Father Libermann, who was wondering where to send his spiritual sons, and at once supplied seven helpers. The African missions were taken up again and were never abandoned after that.[36]

The United States

The Church in America was then in need of being strengthened. Native Americanism, which we have already spoken of,[37] was trying to stir up a persecution against the Catholics of the United States.

Attempts were made to exclude Catholics from political office. At Philadelphia some churches were destroyed in 1843, and blood flowed. At Boston in 1844 the Ursuline convent was given to the flames, and the city was threatened with civil war. That same year New York with great difficulty escaped bloody conflicts. A bitterly hostile press spread suspicions and calumnies everywhere. The question of the schools aroused still more anti-Catholic feeling of the Protestant population. The Church found herself seriously endangered in her social existence. She seemed to gather all her forces against the dangers, without at the same time ceasing its development in the midst of the prodigious growth of the nation.[38]

[36] Le Roy, in Vacant's Dictionnaire, I, 544. For more details, see Cardinal J. B. Pitra, Vie du R. P. Libermann.

[37] See above, p. 174.

Three principal means were employed to remedy the situation: the meeting of frequent provincial councils, the creation of new episcopal sees, and the organization of new missions, generally entrusted to religious. From 1833 to 1849 six provincial councils were held at Baltimore. At the second of these councils was adopted, with the approval of Rome, a method of nominating bishops, which was supplemented by decrees of the third plenary council.[39]

The principal bishoprics erected by Gregory XVI in the United States were those of Vincennes, Detroit, Pittsburg, Nashville, Dubuque, Natchez, Little Rock, Chicago, Milwaukee, Hartford, Buffalo, Albany, and Cleveland. The first bishop of Vincennes was Bruté de Rémur, a Sulpician priest who had accompanied Bishop Flaget to America in 1808. When Bishop Bruté took possession of his see, everything had to be created. His clergy consisted of four or five priests. A wooden cathedral was there, one other wooden church, and a few temporary chapels. His people, less than 30,000 Catholics, were scattered over a territory as big as the fourth of France.[40] Thanks to his zeal and that of his successor, Bishop de la Hailandière, and to the devotedness of their missionary helpers, Fathers Petit, Desseville, Buteux, Benoît, and Schoeffer, the statistics of the Vincennes diocese at the end of 1842 reckoned 36 missioners, 53 churches or chapels, a college conducted by the Eudists, 3 schools under the Sisters of Providence, and 2 schools founded by the Brothers of St. Joseph. In 1844 the Bishop had the happiness of remarking that almost all the Catholics fulfilled their Easter duty and attended the offices of the Church.[41]

[38] G. André, in Vacant's Dictionnaire, I, 1057.

[39] On the method of nominating bishops in the United States, see ibid., I, 1063.

[40] Piolet, Les missions catholiques françaises, I, 205.

In the other dioceses recently founded, the new bishops had to engage in similar missionary work. Among the religious that helped to spread the faith in the United States under the pontificate of Gregory XVI, we may mention: the Congregation of the Holy Cross, called by Bishop de la Hailandière; the Fathers of Mercy, established in New York in 1842; the Jesuits, who came to New Orleans in 1837; the Sulpicians, entrusted with the education of young men and with some missions until they could take up the direction of seminaries, the proper object of their institute; lastly, the Madames of the Sacred Heart, the Daughters of Charity, and the Sisters of St. Joseph of Le Puy.

Canada

The years of Gregory's pontificate were fruitful for the Church of Canada. In 1840 Bishop Forbin-Janson organized some missions there. The wonderful fruit of these missions was strengthened by the establishing of parish retreats.[42] In 1841 Bishop Bourget, first bishop of Montreal, invited into his diocese the Oblates of Mary, who realized on the Canadian soil their evangelical motto: Evangelizare pauperibus misit me. The next year he invited the Jesuits, who, withdrawn after the conquest, happily returned to the land which their fathers had fertilized by their labors and their blood.[43] Several congregations of sisters were founded. The number of dioceses was increased. Gregory XVI in 1841 erected the diocese of Toronto, [41] Ibid., I, 207.

[42] Philipin de Rivières, Vie de Mgr de Forbin-Janson, pp. 382–402.
[43] Chassegros, Histoire du noviciat de la Compagnie de Jésus au Canada.

to which he appointed Bishop de Charbonnel; the next year, that of Saint-Jean, under Bishop Dollard. Two years later he created the ecclesiastical province of Quebec, over which Archbishop Signay was appointed, assigning to him as suffragans the bishops of Montreal, Kingston, and Toronto. The growth of the population called for an increasing number of schools. A devout man, Meilleur by name, in 1842 became superintendent of education for Lower Canada. He gave a vigorous impulse to public education. Conformable to the regulations of 1841, assuring to Catholics and Protestants separate primary schools, the bishops created numerous distinctly Catholic establishments.

South America

We have seen how the revolutionary movement shattered the bonds of many countries of Latin America with Spain. Gregory XVI, solicitous especially for the good of souls, thought the time opportune to treat directly with the new authorities of those countries for the organization of the hierarchy there.[44] That no Church might be outside his care, the Pontiff in 1836 established in New Granada a chargé d'affaires, who would watch over the religious interests of the American republics, which were without any representation at the Holy See.

In South America as in North America an abuse existed that could not leave the head of the Church indifferent: it was the slave trade. Gregory XVI raised his voice (December 3, 1839) to recall the doctrine of the Church on this subject. First the Pope showed how Christianity had gradually made slavery disappear from all countries where it was practiced. Then he added:

But we grieve to have to say that, even among the Christians of today, men shamefully blinded by a sordid desire for gain do not hesitate to reduce to slavery, in distant lands, or even help in this unworthy crime, organizing the trade in these unfortunates, whom others have put in chains. . . . By virtue of our apostolic authority we reprove all these practices as entirely unworthy of the name of Christian and we forbid any ecclesiastic or layman to teach in public or in private, in any manner whatsoever, anything contrary to these apostolic letters.[45]

[44] See above, pp. 112, 213.

Oceania

Oceania is a multitude of islands scattered over the South Sea, which covers a third of the globe. The preaching of the gospel in these Islands presented difficulties of a nature and gravity that could not be foreseen. But these obstacles dismayed neither Gregory nor the valiant workers to whom he turned. By his brief Omnium gentium (April 29, 1836) he entrusted to the young Society of Mary the mission of carrying the light of the gospel to Oceania. A group of seven missioners, comprising four fathers and three lay brothers, set out at once. The oldest of these fathers, born in the village of Cuet in 1803, was called Pierre Chanel. As a youth, while shepherding the flocks, he aspired to work in the overseas missions. As soon as he had pronounced his religious vows in the Society of Mary, his desires were gratified. On November 1, 1837, an apostolic band had landed on the Wallis Islands. Winning them to the Christian faith cost four years of prayer, labor, and tribulation for its first apostle, Father Bataillon.[46] The second mission, that of Futuna, was even more costly for the gentle and holy Father Chanel, who after some years of a hard and apparently sterile apostolate, fell under the sword of the enemies of the religion which he was preaching.[47]

The mission of New Zealand was founded by Bishop Pom-

[45] Bernasconi, II, 387.

[46] Mangeret, Mgr Bataillon

[47] Nicolet, Vie du B. Chanel, p. 272. Father Chanel was declared Blessed by Leo XIII on November 17, 1889.

palier amid sufferings and humiliations. Within a few years six missioners were massacred, five perished at sea, others were devoured by the cannibals. But soon the survivors were able to write: "Religion is winning the ground which it seems to be losing in Europe. Regnavit Dominus, laetentur insulae multae." Cannibalism disappeared everywhere. Some islands formed themselves into a kind of religious community. Others combined into a Christian confederation. All of them formed a sort of necklace of precious gems for the Spouse of Christ. Oceania, with its 180,000 scattered faithful, in the closing years of the nineteenth century offered a sight which perhaps no preceding age had shown.

However, the secondary foreign mission activities increased. The Propagation of the Faith Society, founded in 1822, collected more than two million francs in 1840. At Aachen the Society of St. Francis Xavier began; in 1839, in Austria the Leopoldsverein; in 1843, in Bavaria the Ludwigsverein; in the same year, in France the Work of the Holy Infancy, founded for the purchase and baptism of abandoned Chinese infants; its purpose becoming subsequently more general, the apostolate of Christian children among children in pagan countries.[48]

[48] Sometimes the work of the Holy Infancy has been attacked on the ground that it was without a justifiable purpose since, as was said, the Chinese have great regard for human life, especially that of children. Yet we know from letters of the missioners, as also from authentic declarations of impartial witnesses, such as Admiral Dumont-d'Urville, Baron Hübner, Captain de la Jaille, and Mr. Wade, the English minister at Pekin in 1871, that many infants were abandoned by the Chinese. Says Dumont d'Urville: "The Peking police gather up a good number of these infants in the streets." Some contrary assertions have been made by serious observers, such as Léon Rousset, in his A travers la Chine, and Eugène Simon in La cité chinoise, where he says: "I affirm that infanticide is much less frequent in China than in France" (quoted by Maréchal, Histoire contemporaine, II, 593). Perhaps these travelers never or rarely saw abandoned infants. The Chinese do indeed regard a large family as a blessing of heaven, and in normal times neither rich nor poor think of abandoning their children. But famines are frequent, sudden, and terrible in China (see Maurice Courant, Annales de l'Ecole des sciences politiques, July, 1900, p. 526). These are the periods when poverty-stricken families rid themselves of their children, not as in Europe by abortions or the criminal use of preventives, but by exposing infants on the highways or in the streets. As the Chinese

Death of Gregory XVI

The sight of the progress of the Church in pagan countries did not make the Holy Father forget the trials it was experiencing in Europe. The activities of the secret societies, the equivocal attitudes of liberalism, the encroachments of the sovereigns on the religious domain, and the rashness of an irreligious and frivolous literature were continual matters of grief for him. In 1846, at the beginning of his eighty-first year and the sixteenth of his pontificate, he had a foreboding of his approaching end. In his will he wrote: "We, Gregory XVI, unworthy heir of the chair of St. Peter, having before our mind the hour of our death and the summons to the divine tribunal, . . . recommend our poor soul to our Lord Jesus Christ. To the same divine Redeemer we recommend the Church, His well beloved Spouse, in the numerous trials and persecutions with which she is assailed." On May 26, 1846, a rather mild attack of erysipelas prevented his presiding at a religious ceremony. Soon the ailment became grave and took him from this world on June 1, 1846. He died as a poor religious, replying to some persons who were recalling the great works of his pontificate: "I wish to die as a monk and not as a sovereign." These were the Pope's last words.[49] La Quotidienne expressed the feelings of the Catholics when, on the morrow of his death, it published the following lines:

The Catholic world has lost a great pope, one of those wise and conciliatory spirits needed in periods of transition. At times astonishfather of a family, like the ancient paterfamilias, had the right of life and death over his children, he was safe from any legal prosecution. Moreover, the missioners declare that a whole year may pass in China without sight of an abandoned infant; but let a year of flood or of drought come, starting with scarcity of food, then the exposing of infants will become frequent. On this subject, see Launay, Histoire de la Société des Missions étrangères, III, 125–29; Piolet, Les missions catholiques françaises, III, 260–67; Annales de la propagation de la foi, XXVIII, 52.

---

[49] Ami de la religion, CXXXIX, 653.

ment was felt at not seeing Gregory XVI take the initiative in certain questions of a general import, of social transformation, or of political liberty, that were preoccupying the peoples and disturbing the states. But history will say that he intervened in all these questions to the extent that suited the present situation of the Church; that, while he respected the rights of the crowns, he proclaimed the rights of consciences, and that in the presence of so many violent and revolutionary deeds perpetrated by Europe, he maintained, as far as he could, the rule of Christian ideas and the holiness of Christian maxims.[50]

[50] Ibid., p. 595.

PART III

Pontificate of Pius IX

CHAPTER XXIV

Pius IX and the Papal States (1846–1849)

GREGORY was elected on the morrow of a great European commotion. He died at a time when a new cataclysm, a deeper one and more violent, was in preparation. The revolution of 1830 marked the triumph of parliamentarianism, gave preponderance to the middle classes, and seemed to end in simple political rearrangements. The revolution of 1848 would directly affect the popular classes and would tend to a complete social reorganization. For some time past, a subdued unrest, not manifest by any precise fact or by any well-defined formula, yet perceptible in its general significance, was stirring France, Germany, Belgium, and especially Italy. But, strange to say, the Catholics of all shades of opinion, who had been amazed by the fall of the Bourbons, considered with unruffled calm the perspective of a future that would give more place to the peoples than to the kings and would introduce an era of greater political liberty.

A few days after Gregory's death, the Correspondant wrote: "Today a good understanding with the people is more important than with the princes." [1] In the Univers of June 10, 1846, Louis Veuillot said: "The Pontiff whose loss we now mourn will be more illustrious by the great things prepared under his reign than by the things he accomplished. . . . A grateful posterity will refer back to him the triumph of Catholic liberty which is now certain." [2] The Quotidienne, the organ of the legitimists, expressed its wish that the "mild and peaceful sovereignty of the Holy See may long subsist for the order of the world and the liberty of the peoples." [3] Nowhere were the aspirations more boldly declared than in Italy. There Father Gioberti's Primato, Count Balbo's Speranze d'Italia, and Marquis Azeglio's Casi di Romagna had set forth the ideal of an Italian confederation. The pope, having become a liberal and a patriot, would be its head, and the king of Piedmont the arm. At the hour of setting out for the conclave, a member of the Sacred College, Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti, bishop of Imola, asked one of his diocesans to give him these three works, saying "that he might pay homage to the new pope with these three beautiful books." [4]

[1] Correspondant, XIV (1846), 808.
[2] Univers, June 10, 1846.

The Conclave

In the masses the liberal sentiment was less restrained. With a view to preventing this feeling from going to excess and to hinder the great powers from exercising pressure on the coming election, the Italian cardinals urged the fixing of Sunday, June 14, as the date for the conclave, without waiting for the arrival of the foreign cardinals. According to certain rumors, which perhaps were nothing more than an expression of some desires, the conclave would be a long one. A warm strife would ensue—so some said—between Cardinal Lambruschini, who was, rightly or wrongly, represented as the candidate of the absolutist party, and Cardinal Gizzi, who would be backed by the liberal or moderate party.[5] Others held that the conflict which would divide the Sacred College would arise between what was called the Genoese party, directed by Lambruschini, and the Roman party, which would follow the promptings of Bernetti.[6] A hope was entertained that these discussions would permit the revolutionary agitations to break out in the Roman state and would enable the powers to intervene and weigh on [3] Quoted by the Ami de la religion, CXXIX (1846), 596.

[4] Thureau-Dangin, Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, VII, 221.
[5] Pougeois, Histoire de Pie IX, I, 96–98.
[6] Univers, June 26, 1846.

the votes of the cardinals. None of these hypotheses was realized. In the first ballot Gregory's last Secretary of State received seventeen votes [7] as a testimony of deference and esteem. In the next three ballots the cardinals more and more concentrated their votes on Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti, whose name, proposed by Cardinal Altieri, bishop of Albano, rallied a large number of votes. The conclave had lasted only two days.

Pius IX

The new pope, who, in memory of Pius VII, his predecessor in the see of Imola, took the name of Pius IX, was fifty-four years of age. Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti, a son of the family of the Counts of Mastai, was born at Sinigaglia in the March of Ancona, on May 13, 1792. Some distant relationship connected him with Pius VII, but he was never seen involved in any great political affairs. The people of Rome did not know him; his name, proclaimed by the cardinal deacon, June 17, from the balcony of the Quirinal, aroused at first only surprise in the crowd.[8] But when the Pontiff appeared to give his first blessing urbi et orbi, the harmonious power of his voice, the gentle and majestic beauty of his features, and an impression of goodness emanating from his whole person, immediately won the hearty acclamations of all. The people soon found out that this instinctive sympathy had not been misplaced.

The life of the new pope was soon well known. Noteworthy milestones were: his pious childhood under the care of a noble mother; his first aspiration toward ecclesiastical life, hindered by a terrible attack of epilepsy; his promotion to the priesthood at the age of thirty-one; his first ministry in a humble asylum for poor children; the distant mission given him in 1823 by Pope Leo XII in the New World, to regulate the new relations between the clergy and the state in the republics that had just [7] This is the figure given in some accounts; others say twelve or thirteen.

[8] Pougeois, op. cit., I, 127.

shaken off the yoke of Spain; his short and profitable administration of the great hospice of St. Michael at Rome; his bishopric at Spoleto amid the political troubles of 1831 and 1832, where his goodness and charity had disarmed 4,000 insurgents prepared to pillage the city; lastly, his numerous works of charity in the important diocese of Imola. The fervent Catholics rejoiced at the coming of a pope whose soul was filled with the purest evangelical charity. The revolutionists themselves, at a time and in a country where the idea of revolution was covered with a religious and Christian tint, did not hesitate to acclaim a pope who recently had received their brethren of Spoleto with words of kindness and peace. Some added that, by the traditions of his family and by his personal feelings, Pius IX was not unfriendly to the liberal tendencies; that one of his brothers was involved in the uprisings of 1831;[9] and that, at any rate, he was neither a monk nor a foreigner, and that, being a native of the territory that he was to govern, he would be able to take in hand the cause of National independence.[10] The result of all these impressions, of all these memories, and of all these reflections was a general enthusiasm. "Perhaps nothing ever equaled the hosanna of the first days of this reign. The world was dazzled with a feeling of fondness."[11]

Italian Political Parties

The new pope had never previously engaged in any political activity. But he was clearly connected, by his personal sympathies and by his family antecedents, to what was then called [9] Letter of Rossi, the French ambassador, to Guizot, the minister of foreign affairs in France, under date of June 17, 1846 (Guizot, Mémoires, VIII, 341). One day Gregory had said: "In the house of the Mastai everyone is a liberal, even the cat." The authenticity of these words has been questioned (L. Veuillot, Pie IX, in Grandes figures catholiques, I, 29). But J. B. de Rossi repeatedly asserted their genuineness, declaring that he had them from his father, a close friend of Gregory XVI.

[10] Guizot, loc. cit.

[11] Louis Veuillot, Pie IX, I, 39, and his Mélanges, Vol. I.

the national school. The revolutionary school, to attain its aim, the liberation of Italy, had decided to ignore all laws and all duties, to sacrifice the temporal power of the popes, and to bring about the unification of Italy by democracy. The conservative school, called the German school, was in favor of the status quo of everything that had been regulated by the treaties of Vienna, and thought to arrest any contrary movement by force of arms. Between these two schools a third school was formed in Italy, having deep roots among the people. Generally it was called the national school. It claimed to reject the dominance of foreigners and upheld the autonomy of Italy, respecting the rights of the Church and in no way hindering the exercise of the established powers.

Pius IX held himself aloof from the revolutionary school. But his education and his personal aspirations brought him close to the national school. He was a true Italian and patriot in the best sense of the word. . . . Moreover, he was not unaware that a blind opposition to the tendencies of a period almost always constitutes a real danger for a ruler and may lead to catastrophes. Before the desires of his subjects should become demands, Pius IX resolved to make timely and voluntary concessions to the material progress, to the exercise of political liberty, and to the more direct and close association of the people with the government of the state.[12]

Liberal Measures of Pius IX

As we see above,[13] Gregory XVI had carried out notable reforms in the administrative, judiciary, and financial realms, as also in the artistic and scientific order. But, in his mind, these reforms were only the preludes of more important improvements. In public opinion they awakened a desire for new modifications, such as a broader representation of the lay element in the temporal government, the establishment at Rome of a consultative assembly elected by the provinces, and the improvement of the railroads. This last benefit and the amnesty of 1,500 proscribed persons whom the tribunals of the preceding reign had condemned for rebellion were impatiently awaited from the new pope.

[12] C. van Duerm, Vicissitudes politiques du pouvoir temporel des papes, de 1790 à nos jours, p. 170.

[13] See above, pp. 192, 194, 206–10.

Pius IX decided to respond to these popular desires in large measure. Was this move a political calculation on his part? Was his purpose to bring back to the cause of the Holy See a public opinion that had gone astray through calumnies and, at the same time, to force the unmasking of the parties that, on the pretext of calling for the reform of abuses, were attacking the very institution of the temporal power? Or was his move an impulse of a generous heart? Was it an illusion of a mind that experience of men and affairs had not yet sufficiently enlightened? Perhaps all three motives simultaneously influenced his noble and lofty soul. On the very day of his elevation to the pontificate, amid the ovations showered on him, he conceived the idea of promulgating a broad amnesty, to restore to their families all the political exiles, and from that day he granted pardon to all the proscribed who asked it of him. A month later (July 17, 1846) a decree granted freedom to all those condemned or accused of political offenses, on the single condition of acknowledging the authority of the pope and promising to conduct themselves as loyal subjects of the Papal States.[14]

At Rome and in the provinces the amnesty decree was re-

[14] For the text of the decree, see Pougeois, I, 152–54. Pius IX, to be better informed on the difficulties and advantages that would be presented by the decree of amnesty, convoked (July 15) at the Vatican a congregation of cardinals. Each of them was permitted to set forth his reasons for or against the decree. The Pope even asked them, according to the custom of the Sacred College, to express by secret ballot their opinion on the proposal. But the opening of the ballot box revealed only black balls. In the presence of this unexpected opposition, Pius IX solved the difficulty by a procedure in which were revealed the qualities of spiritual delicacy, personal initiative, and generous goodness that marked most of the acts and words of his long pontificate. Taking off his white skullcap and putting it over the black balls, he said: "See, they are white." Two days later the amnesty decree was posted in all the streets of Rome.

ceived with acclaim and with popular celebrations, which gave testimony to the universal joy. To the promises that were required on their honor from those pardoned, they added exaggerated forms of oath, "swearing on the head of their children, fidelity to the point of death," promising "to shed their blood to the last drop for the pope." Such demonstrations encouraged Pius IX to persevere in his policy of clemency and concessions. "He believed the good possible, and he stuck to it. He believed in liberty and he stretched forth his arms to it. He believed in gratitude, in honor, and he trusted the oaths." [15]

The Pontiff decided that his palace would be open Thursday of each week to everyone who might have a favor to ask of him or any information to give him. He favored the holding, in his states, of scientific congresses, under cover of which, only recently, were hidden the plots of the factions. Besides, he authorized the opening of the circles whose avowed aim was political. On August 1 he chose as Secretary of State, Cardinal Gizzi, who was said to be one of the chiefs of the liberal party. Commissions were appointed for the study of the questions regarding the exercise of criminal and civil justice, regarding the foundation of evening schools and Sunday schools for the instruction of the working class, for the improvement of the postal service, and that of the customs offices and the railroads. The labors of these commissions soon resulted in practical reforms, accepted with enthusiasm. The municipal franchises of the city of Rome were extended; a civic guard was instituted; an assembly of notables, chosen by the Pope from a triple presentation of the provincial councils, was called to give its advice on all the major temporal matters of the state. The exceptional restrictions until then imposed on the Jews were abolished. At the Pope's voice the barriers of the Ghetto fell. So great was the joy among the Jews that some of them thought to see in the new pontiff the expected Messiah.[16]

[15] Louis Veuillot, op. cit., I, 39.

[16] On all these reforms, see Pougeois, op. cit., I, 161–86.

The word of these reforms crossed the frontiers and even reached beyond the ocean. The French journal Le Siècle wrote: "Apparently on the two shores of the channel civilization is going backward. On the recently disparaged banks of the Tiber, human liberty and dignity, raised up by a magnanimous power, will soon be better founded than among us to demand all their rights." [17] In October, 1847, a big meeting held at New York voted an address to Pius IX. Said this address: "We offer you the assurance of a boundless sympathy, not as Catholics, but as sons of a republic, and as friends of liberty." [18]

Considering such approbations, some historians have wondered whether, in the first years of his pontificate, Pius IX had not misunderstood the limits separating true liberty from license, and even the limits between political liberalism and religious liberalism. Only a superficial study of the Pontiff's acts could have suggested these doubts. From the dispatches (August, 1846) by the French ambassador in Rome to his government, we see that Pius IX from the outset had fixed, even in the political order, certain limits beyond which he never ventured. To Rossi he said: "You know that certain limits exist that we cannot pass beyond." [19] He said further that "a pope must not hurl himself into utopias. Would you believe that some people are even speaking of an Italian league with the pope at its head? As if such a thing were possible! Those ideas are chimeras." [20]

As to religious liberalism, the Pope was far from adopting it. In fact, in his first encyclical (November 9, 1846) the reader can note, in germ, the reprobation of the chief errors that would later be condemned by the encyclical Quanta cura, the Syllabus, and the two constitutions of the Vatican Council. Pius IX there energetically denounces "that frightful system

[17] Quoted by Rohrbacher, Histoire universelle de l'église, XII, 246.
[18] Quoted by Desdevises du Dezert, L'église et l'état en France, II, 116.
[19] Guizot, op. cit., VIII, 347.
[20] Ibid., p. 345.

of indifference which removed all distinction between virtue and vice, between truth and error"; he there lays bare "those secret sects, sprung from the bosom of darkness, for the ruin of religion and of states"; he flays the "execrable doctrine of communism, which would be able to establish itself only by the ruin of the rights and true interests of all"; he condemns the theory of absolute progress of humanity, "which becomes a sacrilege when anyone wishes to introduce it in the Catholic religion, as if this religion were the work of man and not the work of God"; lastly he proclaims "the existence of a living and infallible authority in the Church, which the Lord Christ built on Peter, chief, prince, and pastor." [21]

The Revolutionaries

The sectaries, who had counted on, if not the unintentional complicity, at least the timid silence of Pius IX, for executing their designs, feigned to ignore those wise restrictions and timely declarations. Soon they showed that the improvements of the Roman state, which they wildly applauded, were of little concern to them. "Everyone soon perceived, including the Pope himself, that he was in the presence of interests and problems much vaster. . . . The idea of national unity, monarchical or republican, made its appearance. Almost as soon as he had entered on the plan of the Roman reforms, Pius IX saw opening before him the perspective of Italian wars and revolutions." [22]

The secret societies, taking advantage of the situation falsely attributed to the Pontiff, seized hold of the sort of intoxication that prevailed everywhere. At Rome and in the papal provinces the cleverest emissaries of the Ventes and the Lodges were sent forth into the campaign. They succeeded in insinuating themselves in all the meetings and into all classes of society. They exerted their influence on the [21] Denzinger-Bannwart, nn. 1634–39; Chantrel, Annales ecclesiastiques, I, 3–5.

[22] Guizot, op. cit., VIII, 352.

clergy, the nobility, the middle class, the common people. They created an artificial opinion by their bold speeches, their daily papers, their books, their pamphlets, and their popular feasts.[23] By use of the press they contrived to picture Pius IX throughout Europe, as the author of the odious measures of which they alone were the creators. Thus they made out that he was the declared foe of the Jesuits and of the Sonderbund, the irreconcilable enemy of Austria.[24]

The danger had more to it. The national liberal party pretended to regard Pius IX as one of its chiefs, who had, they said, "found genius in his conscience." [25]

The courts of Europe were moved. Rossi, the French ambassador at Rome, wrote to his government: "The Pope's popularity is almost complete; but I fear that he may be misled thereby, thinking that he can repose as on a bed of roses." [26] Guizot, in replying to him, expressed the wish that Pius IX "would recognize with a penetrating eye the distance that separates change from progress, the necessary from the chimerical, the practical from the impossible, the salutary from the perilous." [27] The court of Vienna, considering itself more directly threatened, declared by the pen of Metternich that "it regarded as being in a state of revolution any state in which the power had in fact passed from the hands of the legal authority into those of another power; but it did not question that this change had taken place in the Roman State." [28]

These apprehensions were not without foundation. If the people showed toward the Pontiff a sincere appreciation for his benevolent reforms, the sectaries took unfair advantage of them. Some of those who profited by the amnesty returned as victors. Journalists made use of the liberties that had been

[23] Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 285.
[24] Van Duerm, op. cit., p. 173.
[25] Massimo d'Azeglio, Correspondance politique, p. 3.
[26] Guizot, op. cit., VIII, 349.
[27] Ibid., p. 354.
[28] Ibid., p. 374; Metternich, Mémoires, VII, 394–403, 405.

granted them and loudly called for chimerical innovations. Both groups profited by the right of free speech to organize "the popular enthusiasm into a permanent uprising of ovations." [29] Sedition, bearing flowers in its hands, wrote Veuillot, knelt before the Pontiff and shouted its request for his blessing.[30] Still more vociferous was the cry: "Long live Pius IX!" But they added: "Down with the Jesuits!" They erected arches of triumph to the Pope; but they prevented the prelates of his house from passing under them. In a city of Calabria the mob forced the gates of a prison and freed the prisoners with cries of: "Long live Pius IX!" Acclamations, prompted by a hidden power, became more or less enthusiastic, following the papal acts of the day, following the personages whom the government of the Pope made conspicuous. Ovations were given to Gizzi because they thought he was a liberal; they murmured or greeted his presence with a cold silence when they found he was too lukewarm to suit them. The crowd used its manifestations as a sort of permanent control of the policy of a pope whom it seemed to regard as its ward. When Pius IX appeared on the balcony of the Quirinal, the crowd, prompted by some ringleaders, cried out to him: "Courage, Holy Father!" as if to help him free himself from an excessively conservative entourage.

Soon no doubt was any longer possible. According to Mazzini's uncouth expression, the revolutionaries intended to make of Pius IX "a fat political bull, by smothering him under flowers." The founder of the Young Italy, until then disguising his real aim, now boldly put himself forward, revealed his designs, roused the moderates, and demanded of the Pope nothing less than the freedom of Italy by an offensive war against Austria. The first symptoms of the revolutionary movement appeared in a triumphal parade of the sectaries on September [29] L. Veuillot, op. cit., p. 40.

[30] Ibid.

8, 1846; these signs became more evident in the meetings of the representative assembly of the province in April, 1847, and in the revival of the municipal councils. Gizzi, who advised calm, they pretended to consider an agent of Austria and of reaction. On July 10, 1847, Gizzi, feeling the increase of his unpopularity, resigned as Secretary of State. He was replaced by Cardinal Ferretti, the Pope's cousin. Thanks to this relationship and to personal qualities appreciated by the people, he succeeded, for a few months, in bringing about a comparative tranquillity.

Austrian Invasion

At this juncture, a serious international incident occurred. Six days after Cardinal Gizzi's resignation, the Austrian government (July 16, 1847), concerned over the attacks and provocations in Italy, felt authorized by article 103 of the Congress of Vienna, to send into the city of Ferrara a battalion of infantry, a detachment of cavalry, and a battery of artillery. Upon receipt of this news, the real patriots joined the revolutionaries in loud outbursts; of course the latter sought to exploit the event to their advantage. The situation was extremely delicate for Pius IX. He decided to turn toward France. The government of Louis Philippe had again and again declared that it did not wish to leave the field in Italy free either to the revolution or to Austria. Perhaps, too, Pius IX knew something of the unkind judgments held by Prince Metternich regarding his person and policy.[31]

The reply of the French government was favorable. On September 27, 1847, Count Rossi, the French ambassador at [31] Wrote Metternich: "The Pope each day shows himself more and more without any practical spirit. Born and grown up in a liberal family, he was trained in a bad school. Warm of heart and weak in ideas, he has allowed himself, from his assuming the tiara, to be caught and enmeshed in a web from which he does not know how to free himself." Metternich, Mémoires, VII, 342; cf. pp. 344, 435.

Rome, received from Guizot the following official communication: "Do not leave the Pope in any doubt that, in case of a foreign intervention, we will sustain him effectively, and likewise his government and sovereignty, his independence and his dignity." [32] In fact, Guizot had obtained from the King and the Council of ministers formal decisions to this effect. While Cardinal Ciacchi, legate of Ferrara, sent the members of the diplomatic corps a protest against the act of Austria, a French force of 2,500 men was concentrated at Toulon, and a second force, of equal strength, at Port-Vendres, both of them ready to set sail for the coast of Italy at the first signal under the command of General Aupick.[33] The Austrians countered this step by reinforcing their army in Lombardy and by establishing a military post six miles from Ferrara and from Comacchio. Mazzini, foiled in his plans, made a final effort. On November 25, 1847, he wrote directly to the Pope, begging him to put himself at the head of the national movement; unless he did so, said Mazzini, that movement would withdraw from the religious cause, to the great injury of civilization and of Italy.[34] The Pope took no account of this letter; he also opposed the French government's undertaking a campaign independent of his positive assent. In the Pope's name, Ferretti declared: "Without this assent the French government and navy would find themselves in the same position, with respect to the Holy See, as the Austrian army and cabinet." [35]

Austria soon grasped that she had entered an impasse. She put conditions on the withdrawal of her troops. But these conditions were not accepted by the papal government. After some months of negotiations the Vienna cabinet finally admitted a diplomatic compromise, which was equivalent to a defeat for her. A decision was reached that the Austrians would occupy [32] Cf. Victor Pierre, Histoire de la République de 1848, p. 527.

[33] Guizot, op. cit., VIII, 403.
[34] Pougeois, op. cit., I, 360; Villefranche, Pie IX, p. 49.
[35] Pougeois, op. cit., I, 290.

the citadel, the barracks, and the military magazines of Ferrara, conformable to article 103 of the Congress of Vienna; but the papal Swiss would have the guarding of the city gates and that of the military posts situated in its precincts. Pius IX, seconded by his able cousin, Cardinal Ferretti, showed himself capable of a policy as prudent as it was firm.

The Pope's Liberal Reforms

In the French House of Peers on January 11, 1848, Montalembert spoke on the affairs of Italy. He said:

> I, a Catholic, cannot have the rashness of judging Pope Pius IX. But, if I might do so, I would say that he has been beyond reproach. . . . Within eighteen months he has granted his people the amnesty, a civic guard, the municipal organization, the consulate, that is, reforms so considerable and fruitful that we cannot perhaps find in the annals of any country or any reign an example of so spontaneous and complete generosity. If he fails, Gentlemen, do you know what that will prove? It will not prove that he has been imprudent, that he was charmed; but, as I regret to say, it will prove only one thing, that Italy is not capable of possessing a regular liberty, pure and generous like that which he desires to give it.[36]

Many Catholics, of Rome and elsewhere, did not share that enthusiasm for the reforms so rapidly accomplished by Pius IX. They paid honor to the spontaneous generosity of his heart, rather than the wisdom of his policy. With expressions of sincere respect for the supreme head of the Church, they regretted the change from his predecessor's slower and more calculated way of acting.[37] But to make Italy responsible for their failure would be unjust; that responsibility must rest on the hypocritical partisans whom we have already seen at work.

[36] Montalembert, Œuvres, II, 664.

[37] J. B. de Rossi reports this impression as that of his venerable father and of several Catholics whose orthodoxy was beyond question.

Their intrigues were what led (February, 1848) to the fall of the Ferretti ministry after six months, of the Antonelli ministry after three months, and of the Ciacchi ministry after twenty-seven days. Public demonstrations increased on the streets of Rome. Noisy agitators tumultuously demanded the full freedom of the press, the complete secularizing of public offices, the mass arming of the people, and the expulsion of the Jesuits. For some time Pius IX had seen the plots being hatched against him. His allocutions and encyclicals of 1846 and 1847 abound with allusions to the ulterior purposes of the revolutionary sect. But he continued to cherish the hope of winning back his straying people by kindness, and he postponed the use of repressive measures.

On February 11, 1848, a characteristic incident helped to disabuse him. Evening had fallen. During one of those noisy and grandiose ovations that were being incessantly repeated under the windows of the Quirinal, a voice, above the shouting of the crowd, called out: "No more priests in business affairs!" Pius IX, standing in the lofty loggia, was raising his hand to bless the throng; he protested mildly against "certain opinions in which he no longer recognized the heart of his people." Then, as a low murmur seemed to follow the ovation, he was heard to pronounce the formula of protest which many of his predecessors had used in solemn circumstances: "Non posso, non debbo, non voglio" ("I cannot, I ought not, I will not"). Then was sensed the feeling that a sort of abyss had opened between him and the agitators.

Shortly afterward the repercussion of the French revolution of February stirred up in Italy, as almost everywhere in Europe, fresh popular agitations. These became rumbling and threatening. "The uprisings of love changed into uprisings of anger." [38] Under the pressure of the events, Pius IX made a last concession, the most liberal of all. By the constitution of [38] Dupanloup, La souveraineté pontificale, p. 166.

March 14, 1848, known as the Fundamental Statute, he instituted a popular representation, not merely consultative, but deliberative, for the government of his States. This representative regime included two chambers: one appointed by the pope, the other elected by the people. This move was the introduction of the constitutional system into the Papal States. But, far from appeasing the popular movement, it did but arouse it the more. When the news spread that the Lombard-Venetian kingdom was in full insurrection against Austria, the cry "Fuori gli barbari" ("Out with the barbarians") resounded in the streets of Rome, and the Pope was called upon by the mob to preach the holy war. Pius IX resisted.

Sardinia

At this point, unexpected news reached Rome. The king of Sardinia, Charles Albert, without any previous declaration of war on Austria, fell upon Lombardy. On March 23, 1848, at the outset of the campaign, he addressed to the peoples of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom a proclamation in which he said: "We will second you, hoping in God, who has given Pius IX to Italy and who has put Italy beyond the need of anyone." Two days later, at the head of 25,000 men he entered Milan. The situation became more and more complicated for the Pope. The figure of King Charles Albert was indeed a strange one, a sovereign "half-ascetic, half-carbonaro":[39] ardent, chivalrous, and mystic, under an appearance of coldness; acclaimed as a liberal, and frightened at every reform. At bottom he had a sickly nature, not interested in anything except one idea, which dominated his mind and commanded his whole activity: the independence of Italy, in which he dreamed to be the head.[40]

[39] Falloux, Mémoires d'un royaliste, I, 444.

[40] King Charles Albert's mysterious character has been wonderfully well grasped by Marquis Costa de Beauregard. See the preface of his book, L'epilogue d'un règne, les dernières années du roi Charles-Albert.

The sudden aggression of the King of Sardinia upset the calculations of the old Austrian marshal, Radetzky, who, pressed on all sides, was beating a retreat and withdrew into the Venetian quadrilateral.[41]

The Pope's determined idea was clear. It was to maintain, from the military viewpoint, a strict neutrality, while remaining on the defensive against any invasion of his States. With this policy in mind, he sent 17,000 men to the frontier, on the right bank of the Po, instructed to take no offensive action at any point, but to defend, wherever the need might arise, the inviolability of the papal territory. Unfortunately the leader of the expedition, General Durando, a Piedmontese, did not observe this restriction. Upon arriving at Bologna (April 15), he delivered a fiery proclamation to his troops, declaring, in the name of Pius IX, war on Austria and exhorting his soldiers to undertake a holy crusade of Italy. This act was the first treason from which Pius IX had to suffer during this unhappy campaign.

By a note inserted in the Roman Gazette officielle, by a solemn allocution delivered on April 29, 1848,[42] and by a letter four days later to the Emperor of Austria,[43] Pius IX protested that, far from favoring the revolutionary agitations and arousing his people to war against Austria, with all his might he repelled such tendencies. His acts of political reform were but the continuation of the work begun by his predecessor, in the spirit of the Memorandum drawn up by the great powers of Europe.

[41] The Venetian quadrilateral was formed by the strongholds of Verona, Legnago, Peschiera, and Mantua. In a diplomatic memoir, intended to justify his intervention in Lombardy, Charles Albert declared that "he was taking this measure to prevent the actual movement from becoming a republican movement" (Léopold de Gaillard, Histoire de l'expédition de Rome en 1849, p. 48). Metternich declared that he wished merely to withdraw Lombary-Venetia from the revolutionary influence. Later Cavour appeals to a similar motive for invading the States of the Church. Says Gaillard: "At bottom, in 1848 as in 1860, to take measures was especially to take something." (Ibid.)

[42] Chantrel, Annales, I, 36–39.

[43] Ibid., p. 40.

As for the idea of making war on Austria, he proclaimed it entirely contrary to his thoughts, having for his purpose, he said, "only the daily increase of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, which is the Church, and not to reduce the boundaries of his temporal sovereignty." [44]

These declarations had an immense reverberation in the European courts, where they began to regard Pius IX as the chief author of the public commotions that were troubling Europe.[45] Besides, the fall of the Metternich cabinet, which was followed (March 18, 1848) by a liberal ministry, removed from the political scene the diplomat who was the most disposed to be irritated against the attitude of the Supreme Pontiff. Near the end of May, Emperor Ferdinand I showed himself disposed to make broad concessions in favor of peace, going so far as to give up Lombardy on certain financial conditions.[46]

The intrigues of Lord Palmerston interfered with a view to lessening the power of Austria. This English statesman, interested in maintaining the Austro-Italian conflict, and especially the moves of Mazzini, who could not hope to see his revolutionary program succeed except in disturbance, defeated the peaceful designs of the new Austrian cabinet. The court of Vienna withdrew its offers, and the Emperor ordered Marshal Radetzky to reconquer, by prompt and energetic action, the positions taken by the enemy, in order to crush in Italy the perpetually reborn forces of the revolution. This time the assault of the imperial armies was irresistible; the Italians, defeated, were everywhere driven back.

Count Mamiani

Unfortunately this circumstance affected the cause of the Pope. General Durando, whom Pius IX, too trusting or too powerless, had kept at the head of his troops, in spite of his culpable folly of April 5, made common cause with the forces of Charles Albert. A new minister, whom the Holy Father, under pressure from the advanced parties, had been obliged to take at the end of April, Count Mamiani, had fancied a strange expedient to satisfy the fanatical national party without forcing the Pope to involve himself in a contradiction. He decided that the Roman government would not open any hostility against Austria, but that Durando's reconnoitering troops would be placed under the command of Charles Albert. This move would render inevitable the common action of the papal forces and the Piedmont forces.

[44] Ibid., p. 38.

[45] Pius IX himself, in his allocution of April 29, 1848, referred to this charge. Chantrel, p. 37.

[46] Balleydier, Histoire de la Révolution de Rome, I, 172.

This Count Mamiani, one of those formerly proscribed by Gregory XVI and pardoned by Pius IX, did not rule over the army and the people any more than did the Pope. The government was in the hands of the clubs, of the press, and particularly of a "popular circle," inspired by the secret societies, which claimed to direct everything, or at least to control everything. The Pope, seeing the peril, little by little lost his former confidence that he could lead the people to him by his kindnesses and thus rescue them from the revolutionary sects. Mamiani, a well-educated and literary man, a romantic poet, a man who admired the Christian doctrine in the manner of an eclectic philosopher, had been accepted by Pius IX. The Pope thought Mamiani capable of accomplishing a work of temporary appeasement and did not suspect that this minister could ever betray the cause of the Holy See.

During his ministry, which lasted only three months, Count Mamiani was said to have had no aim but, by every possible means, to provoke war with Austria and trouble in the Roman States. After falling from power (July 19, 1848), he profited from the long ministerial crisis that followed his fall to stir up the people, not only against the imperial government, but also against the papal temporal power, which he declared was incompatible with the sovereignty and freedom of Italy. Anarchy prevailed everywhere. According to the report of the French ambassador, the police were powerless to suppress the daily disorders.[47] The legations, legislating of their own accord, issuing paper money, and even setting up committees of public security, were almost separated from the rest of the States of the Church.

Rossi, Pius IX's Minister

In this sad situation, Pius IX turned his eyes to France. Of all the Catholic powers, France was the one to which the Holy Father could most usefully appeal for support. In the first days of August, he addressed General Cavaignac directly and begged him to send a few thousand soldiers to Rome. Under the July government, in the previous January, when the dangers were much less serious, Guizot was preoccupied in preparing such help. The French Republic, at that time less far-sighted, rejected this first appeal of Pius IX. It judged that an out-and-out intervention would be incompatible with the role of mediator which it had assumed in Italy.[48]

Oppressed by his own subjects and feeling himself abandoned by France, Pius IX did not lose courage. He might have given way to the revolution in the hope of appeasing it by sacrifices; he might have reversed his stand and asked the absolutist powers for the consolidation of his throne. Instead of going to either extreme, he wished, in spite of his miscalculations, to make a last effort for the establishment of a regular regime, liberal and lasting. To second him in this generous and daring undertaking, he turned his eyes to the former ambassador of King Louis Philippe, Pellegrino Rossi.[49]

On September 16, 1848, the former statesman of the Hel-

[47] Dispatch of M. d'Harcourt to M. Bastide (September 4, 1848). Quoted by La Gorce, Histoire de la seconde République, II, 65.

[48] M. Bastide to M. d'Harcourt, August 25, 1848.

[49] La Gorce, op cit., II, 63.

vetic Republic, former professor of constitutional law at Paris, and representative of the French policy at Rome, accepted from the Pope the post of three portfolios: that of the interior, that of the police, and temporarily that of finance. Few men of the time were better versed in the theoretical and practical science of public and international law. Rossi's earlier relations with the Carbonari had made him suspect to the conservatives, and his negotiations undertaken with a view to the suppression of the Jesuits in France had alienated from him the sympathies of the Catholics. But the exercise of power had progressively moderated his views, and the Holy Father, "in the evil days through which he had just passed, appreciated Rossi's lofty mind and his devotedness." [50]

The Pontiff did not have the sorrow of seeing his hopes deceived. The prime minister chosen by Pius IX started on the task with unfaltering zeal.

When accepting the mission entrusted to him by Pius IX's confidence, Rossi fully understood its importance. The able diplomat and distinguished administrator, possessed the two qualities characteristic of the statesman: the sharpsightedness which sees at once the measures to be undertaken, and the energy to carry them out promptly. On September 16 he presented his program of government to the Pope: from the viewpoint of maintaining public order, to concentrate the authority in his hands and to give confidence and strength to his subordinates; from the military viewpoint, to confide the supreme command of the army to a general who was attached neither to Piedmont nor to Austria; in the order of economic and social reforms, to answer the calumnies of the foes of the papacy by a mighty impulse given to the construction of railroads, to scientific institutions, and to commercial freedom; in the order of internal policy, to maintain strongly the liberal principles of the constitutional Statute, but to repress with energy every [50] L. de Gaillard, op. cit., p. 73.

anarchical manifestation; lastly, in the order of foreign policy, to favor the establishment of an Italian Confederation, without giving in it a preponderance to the Sardinian States.[51]

This plan of government threw disarray into the camp of the revolutionaries. The man who proposed it seemed to be of a stature to bring about its success to the glory of the Holy See. Thereby the agitators lost the benefit of their long conspiracies. They had one resort left: by a supreme conspiracy to destroy the man who thus barred the way to their dark plots. Count Rossi's death was decided on by the secret societies.[52]

On November 15, 1848, Rossi went to the Chamber of Deputies, which was in session in the palace of the Chancery, for the purpose of developing the program of his policy. By the indiscretion of some conspirators, who perhaps were moved by remorse, the secret of the plot became known. On the previous evening and in the morning itself several letters urgently adjured the minister to be on guard. These warnings he disdainfully disregarded. "The cause of the Pope," he said, "is the cause of God; I will go where duty calls me." He was mounting the steps of the porch when someone slashed his throat with a stiletto, severing the carotid artery. The wound was mortal. Rossi died, after receiving absolution from the parish priest of San Lorenzo in Damaso.

This crime was especially detestable: it was the signal for unbridled forces of anarchy. Riotously shouting crowds poured through the streets of the city; the widow and the children of the victim were insulted; in the evening the city witnessed illuminations to celebrate the so-called victory of the people. The civic guard made no move to lay hold of the assassin or to halt the course of the uprising; in the Chamber of Deputies the president uttered not a word in denunciation of the outrage; in the press the moderates dared not blame the crime. The sect was absolute master of Rome. The "popular Circle" meant to force on the Pope the carrying out of its program and sent a messenger to him for this purpose. Pius IX at first refused. Shots were fired on the windows of the Quirinal palace. Monsignor Palma, one of the prelates of the papal household, was wounded. On the evening of November 16, Pius IX, seeing himself abandoned by all, yielded to the rebels to avert greater disorders, and declared he accepted a ministry containing Mamiani, Sterbini, and Galetti.

[51] The Sardinian States comprised Savoy, Piedmont, and Sardinia. Their king was Charles Albert.

[52] Mazzini, in a letter that was published, declared that this death was indispensable. Cf. Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 299; Lubienski, Guerres et révolutions d'Italie, chaps. 12 and 13.

These men were the three idols of the day, the most active instruments of the secret societies, obeying the orders of Mazzini. We have become acquainted with Mamiani. Sterbini, who was called the Marat of Rome because of his repulsive ugliness and his brutal instincts; Galetti, the hypocrite with polished manners and gentle voice, who, having been granted amnesty by Pius IX, had repeated his protests of devotedness: these men represented all that was vilest in the Roman population. Pius IX was the prisoner of the Revolution.

Pius IX's Exile at Gaeta

The Holy Father was indeed a prisoner. At the same time that the uprising had forced him to accept a cabinet favorable to the revolutionists, it had constrained him to entrust his defense to the civic guard, which openly compromised with the rebels. But the members of the Sacred College, born defenders of the Holy See, and the members of the diplomatic corps, incensed at the insults heaped on the Supreme Pontiff, undertook to deliver him. Countess de Spaur, a noble woman of French birth, married to the Bavarian ambassador, conceived the plan of escape and, by her personal efforts, greatly helped in carrying it out. On November 24, 1848, Pius IX, dressed as a simple priest, left his palace by a secret door and, under the protection of the Bavarian ambassador, went to Gaeta in the kingdom of Naples, where King Ferdinand II paid homage to him and promised his help. During the seventeen months of his exile, Pius IX accomplished several acts of importance.

On November 27 he drew up a protest, declaring null and void whatever his enemies had done at Rome since the death of Count Rossi, and confiding the administration of affairs to a permanent commission appointed by him.[53] By the publication of this document, the equivocal situation which the revolutionists had tried to maintain on the Pope's attitude was dissipated. The representatives of the European powers, with the exception of the Sardinian States, at once left Rome and joined Pius IX at Gaeta.[54] But the party that had seized the power refused to recognize the authority of the commission appointed by the Pope. The commission was unable to function. Even Mamiani, overwhelmed by the fanatical and undisciplined element of the secret societies, had to abandon the field to them. As for Pius IX, from the depth of his exile, he did not let any attack on the rights of the Holy See pass without repeating his protests. On December 17 he declared null the junta convoked at Rome by the usurpers.[55] On January 1, 1849, he recalled the canon of the Council of Trent which pronounced excommunication against those who violate the rights of the Church.[56] Six weeks later, in the presence of the Sacred College and of the diplomatic corps, he declared the nullity of all the acts accomplished at Rome by the revolutionary party and protested particularly against the establishment of the Roman Republic, which had just been proclaimed.[57] A few days later, a diplomatic memoir of Cardinal Antonelli, Secretary of State, informed the powers of [53] Chantrel, Annales, p. 57.

[54] Mathieu, La souveraineté pontificale justifiée par l'histoire, p. 629.
[55] Chantrel, p. 61.
[56] Ibid., p. 65.
[57] Ibid., p. 74.

Europe of the events that had happened at Rome since the preceding November and asked them, in the name of the Holy Father, "to cooperate, by their moral intervention, to re-establish him in his see and in the capital of his domains, guaranteed by all the treaties which form the basis of the European public law." [58]

Antonelli, Secretary of State

This important memoir was the first diplomatic act of a statesman who would play a considerable part in European politics. Giacomo Antonelli, born in 1806, had, under the pontificate of Gregory XVI, occupied the post of under-secretary of state in the ministry of the interior, then the treasury of the Apostolic Chamber. Pius IX, appreciating his tact and his experience acquired in administrative and political affairs, at the outset of his reign made him a cardinal and, in March, 1848, appointed him head of the council of ministers not responsible to the parliament. Rossi, during his short ministry, kept Antonelli in the background. But Pius IX, during his Gaeta exile, showed great confidence in him in the management of temporal affairs. This prince of the Church never became a priest, never engaged in matters purely spiritual except to transmit information to the foreign powers or to the episcopate. But in the government of the domain of the Holy See he exhibited an ability and wisdom which have been praised by all impartial historians. Few men have been more attacked both in their private life and in their public life. Speaking of the latter, which alone belongs to history, Emile Ollivier says:

Antonelli's outward way of acting gives but an incomplete idea of his true character. To see him courteous, friendly, displaying a constant equanimity, without stiffness or pomposity, always tempering with a smile the fire of his beautiful dominating eyes, you would call him an agreeable statesman, especially concerned with pleasing and being admired. In reality, proud, impenetrable, stubborn, he was of the number of those great souls, superior to destiny and men's changeable opinions, one who is moved neither by praise nor by blame. . . . The very notion of seeking any sort of domination over the head of the Church was revolting to him. To a certain person who proposed to him the example of Richelieu, he replied: "Richelieu served a king, who was simply a man and ruled only a kingdom; but I serve the Pontiff, the vicar of Christ, who governs the Christian world." He was not learned in what books contain; but he was erudite in the science learned from things, and to the keenness of an alert and open mind he owed his ability to disregard nothing that might be divined. To a highly placed personage of France, Cavour said: "Do not trust this project to your ambassador at Rome. Even should he try to keep the secret, Antonelli is so sharp that he would guess it." [59]

[58] Ibid., pp. 74–77. In March, however, we see the Pope becoming discouraged and for a moment thinking of resigning the tiara. Marquis de Ségur, Vie de l'abbé Bernard, p. 104.

Antonelli grasped that the European states were capable of being moved by the Pope's situation at Gaeta and by the threats of the Roman revolution. He perceived that the moment had come for making an effective appeal to their intervention.

Attitude of the French Government

Feeling ran high in Europe and even beyond at the news of the Pope's flight to Gaeta. While the peoples, touched by this great misfortune, sent to the exiled Pontiff the expression of their sympathy and the assistance of their spontaneous offerings, the governments were concerned over the success obtained at Rome by the revolutionary sects. Their cosmopolitan ramifications were known, and men could foresee the repercussions of this triumph in the other nations.

[59] Ollivier, L'église et l'état au concile du Vatican, I, 502. Antonelli's diplomatic ability has sometimes been called in doubt. These words of Count d'Arnim are quoted. Pointing to the windows of the Secretary of State, he said: "See there, the great misjudged incapacity." Teste, Préface au Conclave, p. 46.

Following Count Rossi's assassination, the head of the French government, who was then General Cavaignac, had a noble movement of chivalrous generosity.

> To go to the help of the Pope, to snatch him from the factionists who were holding him captive, to offer him hospitality on the soil of France, to bring him to Marseilles in the midst of a respectful and kneeling people, would be to repeat the tradition of the national policy, and on the eve of the presidential election to rally the votes of the Catholics and to gather around himself that floating mass which is always pleased by a daring initiative. Cavaignac was a man to grasp this role. On November 25, he went straight to M. de Corcelles, whose religious zeal he knew, and confided to him the mission to go to Rome, to provide for the liberation of the Holy Father, and to offer the Pope hospitality on the territory of the Republic.[60]

By its vote on November 30, the French Chamber of Deputies approved the project. A brigade of 3,500 men, assembled some time before on the shore of the Mediterranean, received orders to embark for Civitavecchia; and the minister of worship, Freslon, went to Marseilles to receive the Pope. But the news of the Pope's escape and of his happy arrival on Neapolitan territory made the noble initiative of France useless for the moment.

Cardinal Antonelli's diplomatic note placed the question anew before the chanceries of Europe. Not only the Catholic powers, but also the schismatic and heretical nations, such as Russia and England, showed themselves disposed to reply to the appeal of Pius IX.[61] In France the election of Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte to the presidency of the Republic (December 10, 1848) seemed for a moment to compromise the political intervention. The son of the King of Holland had, in 1831, taken part in the insurrection of the people of Romagna against the Pope and subsequently he had not sufficiently disavowed that culpable folly. On November 30, in the Chamber of Deputies, he had abstained in the voting relative to the expedition to Civitavecchia.[62] If on the eve of the presidential election, by a letter to the nuncio Fornari, he disavowed his cousin Charles Bonaparte, Prince of Canino, who had been too much involved in the Roman revolutionary agitations, this disavowal, on the eve of the election, had too much the aspect of an electoral move to constitute a serious guaranty. Moreover, in the Constituent Assembly the republican majority showed itself clearly opposed to any undertaking that would seem to have as an effect the restoration of the temporal power of the pope. Only the extreme right and a few individual members of the other groups had praised this plan. In the ministry the Count de Falloux was its sole supporter.

[60] La Gorce, op. cit., I, 178.
[61] Ibid., II, 80.

A fresh incident occurred that apparently would finally eliminate it. Father Gioberti, the famous author of the Primato, toward the end of 1848 was called to the presidency of the Council of ministers of the Sardinian States. His first care had been an attempt to realize his dream: the re-establishment of the union between the pope and the people by charging Charles Albert with the forming of an Italy independent in its existence, liberal in its institutions, and unified under the high patronage of the Roman Pontiff. In the lack of Italian princes, who were cool toward the project, the prime minister of the court of Turin met with utmost sympathy with the French government. Prince Bonaparte by his character, a friend of order as a matter of policy, but a dreamer by nature, chimerical by his tendency, and already enamored of the theory of nationalities, was easily seduced by this scheme. Without hesitation he fully adhered to it.

[62] See his letter of December 2, 1848, published in the Univers, the Presse, and the Constitutionnel.

Alone in the cabinet, being able to count on only a slim majority in the Parliament, the young minister of public education and of worship, Count de Falloux, devoted himself to the task of wrecking the project of the Sardinian minister. "To be willing to hide France behind Piedmont," [63] he said, "was to wish to hide a giant behind a reed." [64] He exerted himself to show to the prince-president, to his colleagues, to the leaders of the political parties of the Assembly, that such an undertaking could procure for France merely dangers and humiliations, without any sort of advantage to compensate for these vexations. The events turned out to be serviceable to him and soon brought the prince, the cabinet, and the Parliament itself to the traditional policy of France in its relations to the papacy.

First, at Rome and in the Papal States the anarchy became more and more threatening. The Roman element was absorbed in the Italian and cosmopolitan element. The worst representatives of the secret societies gathered in the Eternal City and there enacted laws without restraint. A decree of February 21, 1849, declared all ecclesiastical goods the property of the Republic. Four days later another decree struck the rich with a forced loan which, according to the various fortunes, varied from a fifth to two-thirds of the annual income. The government was no longer in the hands of the "popular Circle" but of the "Young Europe," of the "Young Italy," of the "Young Ireland," of all the groups depending on Mazzini. Soon Mazzini himself, who arrived in Rome and was there welcomed with the greatest honors, was in control; he received the title of [63] The kingdom of Sardinia, or of the Sardinian States, was already being called Piedmont. It was not given this name officially until 1860.

[64] Falloux, Question romaine, in Mélanges politiques, II, 178.

Roman citizen and was invited to sit in the Parliament beside the president.

Furthermore, Austria, which was the first to feel itself threatened by this agitation, hastened to intervene. On March 21 imperial troops crossed the Italian frontier. Three days later, the Piedmont army was defeated at Novara; and Charles Albert, fearing that his person would become an obstacle to a necessary peace, handed over his crown to his young son, Victor Emmanuel II.

A consequence of these events was to impress a decisive bent on the French policy toward Rome.

> Not hard to guess was the supposition that victorious Austria would not resist the temptation to add to her successes that of bringing the Holy Father back to his capital. But in that event the influence of France in Italy would be ended. The same was true of the liberal work that France had advised and that Pius IX had tried to accomplish. Austria had been let conquer Novara: but following the Novara victory to let her intervene in the capital of the Christian world, would be to push too far the policy of effacement. An important step, if France did not wish to be anticipated, was to hasten. Thereupon the Roman expedition was decided on.[65]

Proposed French Expedition to Italy

On March 31, 1849, the French national Assembly voted to authorize the executive power to proceed to a partial and temporary occupation in Italy. That very evening General Oudinot reached Marseilles to take command of the troops already established on the Mediterranean coast and to make all arrangements for a descent into Italy.

At Rome, Mazzini, the head of a triumvirate that included also Armellini and Saffi, was organizing an outright dictatorship. The intrigues of Piedmont, the plots of Lord Palmerston, and the threats of former companions of the prince-carbonaro tended to delay the French intervention. The Spaniards, Austrians, and Neapolitans were also preparing to intervene.

[65] La Gorce, op. cit., II, 85.

The prince-president determined not to be anticipated by these powers. His purpose was, in fact, not only to take the power from Mazzini in order to transmit it to Pius IX; it was also to neutralize the influence, too absolutist to suit him, of the three powers, and to assure the maintenance of all the liberal reforms introduced by Pius IX up to November 15, 1848.[66] For this reason he rejected the plan proposed by the Pope, according to which France would occupy Civitavecchia, the province of Spoleto, and that of Perugia; Austria, the Legations as far as Ancona; the Neapolitan army, the provinces of Velletri, Frosinone, and Ascoli; Spain, Rome and its surroundings. France, accepting the simultaneous action of the powers, but not their combined action, took for its objective the occupation of Rome and to that point directed her army as swiftly as possible.

On April 29, 1849, two French brigades, commanded by General Oudinot, entered Civitavecchia without firing a shot. From there the General addressed the Romans in a proclamation, agreed on at Paris, in which he declared that "the French Republic wished to give a striking testimony of its sympathy toward the Roman nation." "Welcome us as brothers," he continued; "we will justify this title." The following day the French army was before the walls of Rome. Oudinot had hoped to enter, as at Civitavecchia, without opposition. But the triumvirs closed the gates to him and entrusted the defense of the city to Garibaldi's volunteers. Moreover, a column of 250 men, caught in a trap, had to consider themselves prisoners. A regular siege had to be determined on.

[66] Some historians have supposed, parallel to these designs which were openly avowed by Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, the concealed aim of obtaining, by way of a hypocritical moderation, the ruin of the papacy's temporal power. Thus they explain the consideration which the prince would have had for the followers of Mazzini and for Mazzini himself (Crétineau-Joly, L'Eglise romaine en face de la Révolution, Vol. II, Bk. II; Deschamps, op. cit., II, 300–13). But we cannot easily ascertain whether the compliance of the President of the French Republic should be attributed, as these writers suppose, to an understanding with the Masonic lodges, or whether they were owing to the pressure of his entourage, to purely political calculations, and to the Prince's liberal tendencies.

But the French had to be ahead of the other powers, which, in turn, had crossed the frontiers. The Neapolitans had taken Terracina; the Spaniards occupied the provinces of Rieti and Spoleto; the Austrians, established in the Legations, were beginning to seize the papal strongholds of the north. Oudinot, urged by the French envoys, attacked the city on April 30 with 5,000 men. But he was repulsed. The word of this set-back, reaching Paris on May 4, filled the Assembly with amazement. At a night session three days later, it invited the government to "take such measures as might be necessary that the Italian expedition no longer be turned aside from the purpose that had been assigned to it." Then Louis Napoleon Bonaparte judged the time opportune to take a bold initiative. Without asking, as intended by the Constitution, the assent of the Council of State, without consulting his ministers, he wrote to General Oudinot: "Our military honor is at stake; reinforcements will not be lacking"; and General Changarnier, to stress the importance of this letter, placed it on the order of the day of the army of Paris.

At the same time a diplomat who, as consul general at Barcelona, had just shown a remarkable spirit of decision and ability, Ferdinand de Lesseps, was commissioned to negotiate with the government of the triumvirs. The mission bristled with difficulties. The known liberalism of the plenipotentiary gave ground to hope that his overtures would not be abruptly rejected by the Roman authorities. But his role seemed to be a contradiction, almost a treason, toward the representatives of the powers, who, since March 30, were deliberating together at Gaeta with regard to the Austrian, Spanish, and Neapolitan armies, to whom France had promised a "simultaneous cooperation." Furthermore, disagreements broke out between General Oudinot and the French plenipotentiary. Besides, Mazzini, who held the population of Rome under his yoke, opposed an absolute refusal to all the projects of compromise proposed by Lesseps. The tenacity of the diplomat, however, succeeded in obtaining from the dictator that Oudinot's army should remain in the Roman States, as a necessary counterpoise to forces of Austria, Spain, and Naples. By article 1 of a convention concluded on May 31 between the French agent and the Roman triumvirate, the Roman State "considered the French army as a friendly army, coming to cooperate in the defense of its territory," and, by article 3, "the French Republic guaranteed against all foreign invasion the territories occupied by its troops."

Had Lesseps allowed himself to be seduced by the cleverness of Mazzini or intimidated by the blustering of Garibaldi, as the Count de Falloux supposed?[67] Should we see in the convention of May 31 the execution of a plan framed by Freemasonry, as Deschamps insinuates?[68] The fact is that the diplomatic act signed by the French plenipotentiary was judged unacceptable, as being opposed to the precise instructions that had been given him, and as contrary to the interests and the dignity of France.[69] Lesseps was recalled to Paris and was denounced to the Council of State, which administered a reprimand to him. Removed from the diplomatic career, he subsequently exercised his activity in a different way and there acquired a wide celebrity.

Siege of Rome

A new Assembly met on May 28, 1849. Most of its members had been elected on a Catholic program, or at least one favorable to Catholicism. Then General Oudinot received orders to resume hostilities. The siege of Rome was at once begun, under the commands of Generals Oudinot and Vaillant. On June 3, by the occupation of the monastery of St. Pancratius and the Pamphili, Valentini, and Corsini villas, the enemy were driven from all the advanced posts which they were holding outside the walls. The leaders of the French demagogic party tried in vain to turn the government from its expedition. On June 13, at the very moment when the uprising was rumbling at Paris, General Oudinot issued a last summons to the besieged, and then pushed the attack vigorously. The siege was prolonged in consequence of recommendations to the artillery to spare the monuments of the Eternal City. At length, on June 29, the feast of St. Peter, a general assault enabled the French army to seize the top of the Janiculum and to install themselves there, dominating the city. Three days later the triumvirs had to surrender unconditionally. The following day the French army entered Rome. Garibaldi, fleeing with his troops across the Apennines, was closely pursued by the Neapolitans and the Austrians. At the same time Colonel Niel left for Gaeta to bring to the Pope the keys of his pacified capital. Pius IX received the valiant soldier with deep feeling and said to him: "France had not promised me anything, yet on France I have always counted. I felt that at the opportune moment France would give her blood to the Church and, what is more difficult, that restrained courage to which I owe the preservation of my city of Rome." [70]

[67] Falloux, Mémoires d'un royaliste, I, 452.
[68] Deschamps, op. cit., II, 307.
[69] Falloux, loc. cit.

Nevertheless Pius IX judged that the time was not suitable to return at once to his capital. He was satisfied to send there a commission of three cardinals, charged with taking the most urgent measures in his name. By this step the Pope wished to spare the feelings of the courts of Vienna, Madrid, and Naples, which had only reluctantly ceded the decisive part to the French army, and which desired, after the military action of France, to contrive a diplomatic action, but this delay gave time to the advanced parties of the French Chamber to formulate bitter complaints against the policy of the prince-president, who was charged with exceeding the instructions of the national representation in the Roman expedition. To put an end to these oppositions and to give guaranties to the extreme parties, Louis Napoleon, without consulting his ministers and even knowing that he was going contrary to the ideas of most of them, once again performed one of those acts by which the future emperor gave an intimation of what would come.

[70] Falloux, op. cit., I, 516.

Letter of Louis Napoleon to Colonel Ney

On August 18, 1849, Louis Napoleon wrote to one of his aides de camp, who was sent on mission to Rome, lieutenant colonel Edgard Ney:

> I learn with pain . . . that proscription and tyranny is spoken of as a basis for the return of the Pope. I sum up the temporal re-establishment of the Pope thus: general amnesty, secularization of the administration, the Napoleonic Code, and a liberal government. . . . When our armies made the round of Europe, they left everywhere, as a trace of their passage, the destruction of the abuses of feudalism and the germs of liberty; it will not be said that in 1849 a French army has been able to act in a different sense and to introduce other results.[71]

This famous letter belongs to history because of the influence it had on Italian affairs. Moreover, it is a revelation of the capricious policy which Louis Napoleon would practice later.[72] It aroused the keenest feeling. Pius IX saw renewed against him, under a more brusque and radical form, the pressure which the great powers had intended to exercise against Gregory XVI by the Memorandum of 1831. Donoso Cortès became [71] For the complete text of this letter, see La Gorce, op. cit., II, 225; Pougeois, op. cit., III, 148.

[72] La Gorce, II, 225.

the interpreter of some Catholics when he wrote: "After such a letter what is to be hoped from this president adventurer?" [73] And a certain newspaper expressed the apprehensions of part of the liberals, pointing to the talons of the imperial eagle under this act of audacious initiative.[74] The French minister of public education resigned.

Pius IX, confronted by the same difficulties as faced Gregory XVI, imitated the prudence of his predecessor. By a motu proprio (September 12, 1849) he declared that the "valiant armies of the Catholic powers" which had come to his aid could have had as the object and result only "to re-establish his full liberty and independence in the government of the temporal domains of the Holy See." This independence he purposed to maintain in its fullness before the world.[75] Consequently, by virtue of a free and spontaneous act of his authority, he created a Council of State charged with giving its advice on all projects of law, and a Consultus, having an advisory voice in financial matters. The members of the Consultus would be chosen by the Pope from a list drawn up by the provincial councils. Further, the motu proprio gave assurance of extended provincial and communal liberties and announced the reform of the civil and judiciary laws.[76]

Louis Napoleon began to take account of the untimeliness of his letter to Ney. An official note of the Moniteur (September 10) declared that "the publication of this letter had been purely unofficial, and that it was without any sort of public character." A week later the reporter of the commission charged with examining a credit request for the Roman expedition, Adolphe Thiers, gave a long account of the question without mentioning the unlucky missive. In the commission itself he had, in favor of the Pope, warm words, which aroused the admiration

[73] Adhémar d'Antioch, Deux diplomates, p. 113.
[74] L. de Gaillard, op. cit., p. 318.
[75] Chantrel, Annales, p. 84.
[76] Ibid.

of the Catholics. He declared: "We cannot do violence to the Pope. Why? Because he is strong? No, but on the contrary because he is weak. Do you know what you would be if you did violence to the Pope? You would be not only a soldier striking a priest, a thing which is dastardly and vile; you would be a nab striking a woman, and we have no name for this iniquity." In the course of the discussion, Alexis de Tocqueville, minister of foreign affairs, declared, in the name of the government, that he accepted the letter of the president, but that he found sufficient guaranties in the Pope's motu proprio.

Passions were stirred. During the session of October 19, Victor Hugo, withdrawing from the majority with which he had joined before that, violently attacked the policy and history of the papal government. Montalembert answered him by one of his most magnificent discourses. "History," he declared, "will say that a thousand years after Charlemagne and fifty years after Napoleon, France has remained faithful to her traditions and deaf to hateful provocations. . . . Do you know what would forever dim the glory of the French flag? It would be to oppose that flag to the cross. It would be to change the role and glory of Charlemagne for a pitiful imitation of Garibaldi." Then, repeating and amplifying the comparison made by Thiers, he went on: "When a man is condemned to fight against a woman, if this woman is not the lowest of creatures, she can face him with impunity. She says to him: Strike, but you will dishonor yourself, and you will not win. Well, the Church is not a woman; it is indeed more than a woman, it is a mother. It is the mother of Europe, the mother of modern society, the mother of modern humanity." At these words, as we are told by the papers of the time, applause broke out, such as no one had ever heard in a deliberative assembly.[77]

[77] The whole discourse was filled with wonderful warmth and spirit. The address of Victor Hugo, to whom the orator was replying, had been loudly applauded by the extreme left. "Gentlemen," said Montalembert, at the outset of his speech, "the address that you have just heard, has already received the punishment it deserved

Pius IX's Return to Rome

On April 12, 1850, Pius IX made his triumphal entry into Rome. Five days later he wrote to General Baraguey-d'Hilliers, commander of the expeditionary forces sent to Italy: "My heart expresses the feelings of lively gratitude which I profess for the French nation, which has spared neither labor nor blood to assure the Vicar of Christ his independence." [78] He had already written to General Oudinot: "The triumph of the French army has been won over the enemies of human society." [79] The judgment of the Supreme Pontiff would be the judgment of history.

---

in the applause it received." Murmurs and violent protests interrupted the speaker. The president, Dupin, remarked to him that his expression was unparliamentary. Montalembert replied: "Since the word 'punishment' wounds you, gentlemen, I withdraw it and substitute for it the word 'recompense'" (Montalembert, Œuvres, III, 254).

[78] Chantrel, Annales, p. 95.

[79] Ibid., p. 81.

CHAPTER XXV

Pius IX and the Church of France (1846–1854)

UNDOUBTEDLY Austria, Spain, and the kingdom of Naples had contributed to the deliverance of Rome from anarchy and its restoration to the head of the Catholic Church. But Pius IX could not forget that in this work France had played a decisive part. Of this fact he was always mindful. On the evening of his return to the Vatican, he expressed the wish that part of the interior service of his palace should be performed by French soldiers. A French army would in fact remain in Rome until 1870 to protect his spiritual and temporal independence. Other reasons prompted the Pope to keep his eyes turned toward the eldest daughter of the Church. In spite of the political troubles which disturbed that nation, in spite of the religious controversies which arose there from time to time, it always appeared to be a warm center of Catholic life. At the time when the second Republic gave way to the second Empire, a prelate, under no suspicion of a liberal tendency, Bishop Pie of Poitiers, expressed the gratitude the Church owed to the government that was about to disappear, and likewise the hopes that would be inspired by the power which was entering the scene. He said:

> Bad taste would be shown by hurling insult at the republican period that was dying. Please Heaven, during the years that are in preparation, our action may continue to develop as freely and effectively as it was exercised the last four years. The prince who is about to ascend the throne has not yet been able to show all his capabilities. But when God, in His mysterious and inscrutable designs, takes by the hand a man, whoever he may be, to raise him to the glory of being, even momentarily, the head of a nation such as France, He always offers this man graces by which he will be able, if his will corresponds, to accomplish his mission usefully.[1]

The intense development of Catholic life and works in France since the coming of Pius IX, and in particular the ardor of the campaign conducted by the French Catholics for freedom of education, the eloquence and value of their principal leaders, and the impression throughout all Europe of their generous struggles, justified such hopes. If these were not fully realized, if on one hand painful divisions, and on the other hand an excessive distrust of the public powers, disappointed them, yet the good that was accomplished in France and by France corresponded to the fatherly confidence which Pius IX had accorded to the eldest daughter of the Church.

Catholic Action in France

A few days after the election of Pius IX, Bishop Fornari, the papal nuncio at Paris, said to Montalembert: "The need is urgent that you go at once to Rome to enlighten the Pope on the true religious situation and prevent Rossi from deceiving him." In fact the liberals of France were, like the liberals of Italy, counting on obtaining broad concessions from the new pope. Louis Philippe flattered himself that he would obtain from the Pope the complete extinction of the Jesuits. The head of the French Catholic party, replying to the nuncio's desire, drew up a memoir which Father Dupanloup was charged to take to Rome. This memoir sketched the picture of the religious progress accomplished since 1843: the organization of the struggle for the freedom of education, the success of the Notre Dame conferences, the reawakening of the faith signaled by the large attendance at parish devotions, the widespread influence of the episcopal protests, the grouping into the Catholic party of eminent men, who came from various political centers, such as Vatimesnil, Cormenin, and Lenormant. Pius IX was filled with admiration at reading this memoir, spoke with esteem of Montalembert, "that true champion of the good cause, whose very name is a eulogy." [2]

[1] Pie, Œuvres complètes, I, 530, 533, 557, 560.

Louis Veuillot, writing in the Univers, ridiculed "the practice of pointing out to the Supreme Pontiff the path he ought to follow to procure peace." Probably the Catholic polemist had in mind especially the Constitutionel and the Siècle, which were ready to praise "the wisdom and piety of the Pope if he had enough spirit to accept the dedication of The Wandering Jew"; but he had also a word of defiance for "those estimable men whose courage and good intentions no one honored more than he did"; and he ended his vigorous article by saying: "Pius IX will apply the old truths to the new times, and the world will advance a step in the way of salvation." [3] In short, two centers of Catholic action stood out in relief: one, in the committee for the defense of religious liberties; the other, in the Univers, where Veuillot urged an uncompromising attitude.

The divergence of these tendencies was evident in connection with a pamphlet of Dupanloup, De l'état actuel de la question, in which Veuillot thought he saw a criticism of his attitude in a sentence of the author on "the extreme parties." A hybrid legal project of Salvandy on the freedom of education, in which the minister, as he himself said, thought he ought "to compromise with evil principles in order to be useful to the good principles," [4] restored the union that had been momentarily endangered. Louis Veuillot wrote: "M. de Salvandy might have divided us; but he drew us together, the first service that he renders us." A big petition was at once organized for the defense of the freedom of education. This petition soon had

[2] Lecanuet, Montalembert, II, 312–17.
[3] Univers, June 24, 1846.
[4] Lecanuet, II, 319–24; E. Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, II, 161–64.

125,000 signatures. But, whether the deep divergence just spoken of persisted in the common action and paralyzed it in its movements, or whether the relatively benevolent policy of the government had put the bishops' zeal to sleep, or whether the cleverly continued misleading statements about the so-called liberalism of Pius IX had brought a change in opinion, the campaign begun in 1847 did not arouse the same enthusiasm as that shown by the Catholics of France in 1844. Montalembert, in a letter of this period, bitterly criticized those French Catholics, grossly numbed, who "for a moment slightly raised their eyelids when a loudly significant fact made enough noise to disturb their peace; and thereupon they turned on their side, hid their head under any thick veil so as to flee from the troublesome light." [5] Nothing less than the great jolt of 1848 was needed to make them rise up again, united and quivering, for the defense of religious liberties.

The Revolution of 1848

Our task is not to dwell on the remote and proximate causes of the revolution of 1848 and on the various incidents of that important political event. We note the instability of the July monarchy which, to make a compromise between the principle of heredity and that of national sovereignty, was not assured of solid support either in the aristocracy or in the people. The coalition of all those whom it excluded from the right of suffrage because of lack of sufficient capital, added to city and rural laborers a number of men of letters and artists. Discontent was felt by those who lived in the memory of the glories of the Empire and who blushed to see France practice the policy of peace at any price. Further, we hear the complaints of the Church, which in spite of herself was thrown into the opposition by the vexations derived from the Voltairian spirit and by the obstinate refusal of a law on freedom of education. Still deeper was a movement of ideas, of aspirations of a sort more social than political, principally manifested by the socialist schools and by the school of the Avenir. Such were the causes of the revolution which, in three days, transformed the French government from a monarchy to a republic and had its repercussions throughout Europe.

[5] Lecanuet, II, 329.

While the republicans were surprised and astonished at their own success, the Catholics did not tremble, but showed a serene confidence. Following the proclamation of the Republic, the Ami de la religion wrote: "An unexampled revolution of the peoples has just been accomplished to the cry of: 'Long live liberty!' May this cry reassure us. The Church remains unmoved on her eternal foundations, God covers us with His protection, Pius IX with his glorious popularity, the people with their generous good sense." [6] "We are not men of yesterday," said the Correspondant; "but we should be more and more convinced of the necessity of the Republic. For the last seventy years the world has been gravitating in this direction. France takes her place at the head of the general movement. . . . Let those who would continue to believe that a crown is necessary above our national symbol, render the crown to the only monarch whom the people will never dethrone and whom they will hail as did our fathers: Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat." [7] Of all the Catholic organs, the Univers showed itself the most enthusiastic. Said Louis Veuillot at the head of the number of January 27: "God speaks by the voice of events. The revolution of 1848 is a notification of Providence. . . . From human governments the Church asks only one thing: freedom. But almost all monarchies more or less attack the liberty of the Church. . . . Lamartine said that the French Revolution is an outflowing of Christianity; these words are true, and we said them before he did. May the French Republic, then, give freedom to the Church, the only liberty of everyone. The Church asks nothing more than this, and it will pay with an eternal gratitude and immense services the acknowledgment of this right pure and simple: liberty." [8]

[6] Ami de la religion, CXXXVI, 493.
[7] Correspondant, XXI, 807–9.

The attitude of the people during the disturbance explained what might seem excessive in this confidence of the Catholics. The strifes of the Church with the July government, the compliments paid to Christianity by several socialists, and the liberal reforms accomplished by Pius IX had won for the Catholic religion the good will of many. At the height of the insurrection, while the mob was pillaging the Tuileries, an arresting sight was to be seen: at the word of a student of the polytechnic school, the crowd stopped at the entrance of the chapel, took off their hats, devoutly escorted the crucifix and the sacred vessels to the church of St. Roch, knelt to receive the priest's blessing, and then dispersed with cries of: "Long live Christ! Long live liberty! Long live Pius IX!" [9] A few days later the president of the provisional government, receiving Archbishop Affre of Paris, said to him: "Liberty and religion are two sisters alike concerned to live together well." [10]

Two results of capital importance seemed to be acquired: the accord of all Catholics for one action, with the same program, and the accord of the Catholics with the popular masses. In the office of the Univers on the evening of February 24, Veuillot, Lacordaire, and Falloux were reconciled to one another and professed their adherence to the Republic. Veuillot had agreed to take for his watchword, the liberty of common law. Montalembert, who a few days before, when speaking in the Chamber on the question of the Sonderbund, had not concealed his aversion to democracy, and Falloux, who always called himself a legitimist, likewise declared their adherence to the Republic. Soon, upon instructions communicated by Berryre and Rochejaquelein, royalists faithful to the senior branch of the Bourbons, were going to adhere also to the republican government.[11] Their patriotism did not allow them to create difficulties at the moment when the social order might be threatened; and their political faith more easily accommodated itself to the provisional government acclaimed by the people on February 24 than to the bourgeois regime inaugurated by the son of Philippe Egalité.

[8] Univers, February 27, 1848; March 1, 2, 6, 15, 1848.
[9] Ami de la religion, CXXXVI, 498.
[10] Univers, March 9, 1848.

As to the union of the Church and the people, Lacordaire (February 27) from the Notre Dame pulpit, with the applause of a large gathering, stated it in these terms: "Thanks be to God, we believe in God. If I doubted your faith, people would need only a single look to confound me. Just now, even amid the excited elation of its might, after overthrowing several generations of kings, it carried in its hands as it were associated with its triumph, the image of the Son of God made man." [12] As the Journal des Débats reported the next day, "at these words an irresistible feeling seized the whole body of listeners and broke out in applause which the holiness of the place could not restrain. The wise ones may have regretted it, but they took part in it." [13] The Voltairian bourgeoisie itself saw its prejudices against Catholicism fall. Said the Revue des Deux Mondes: "It found itself in a civilization where everything is crumbling and shaking, and the Church alone surviving." At the opposite extreme of the republican party, the sworn enemy of the bourgeois, the anarchist Proudhon improved on these declarations. He wrote: "As long as religion will have life in the people, I wish it to be fully and publicly respected." [14]

This union of the Church and the people, of Christ and lib-

[11] La Gorce, Histoire de la seconde République, I, 122.
[12] Lacordaire, Œuvres, IV, 257.
[13] Journal des Débats, February 28, 1848.
[14] Quoted by Desdevises du Dézert, op. cit., II, 120.

erty, had a symbol: the planting and blessing of liberty trees. We read in the Ami de la religion (March 25, 1848): "For several days past, the streets and principal squares of Paris have seen the clergy of the parishes pass by in procession, preceded by a cross and respectfully accompanied by the people under arms. The workmen, wishing to inaugurate their last triumph by the planting of liberty trees, have thought they could not better consecrate the memory of their victory than, on their own account, to invite there religion, its ministers, and its august prayers." These scenes were repeated in all the departments.

The episcopate was unanimous in rallying to the new government. On February 24 Archbishop Affre of Paris ordered the pastors of his diocese to celebrate a service for the victims of the insurrection; and three days later Cardinal Bonald, archbishop of Lyons and a son of the author of the Legislation primitive, wrote to his clergy: "You have often formed the wish to enjoy that liberty which renders your brethren of the United States so happy. That liberty you will have. The flag of the Republic will always be a protecting flag for religion." On that same day the apostolic nuncio, replying to an address by Lamartine in the name of the diplomatic corps, expressed his gratification at the respect which the people of Paris, amid such great events, had testified to religion;[15] and, on March 20, Pope Pius IX himself, in a proclamation to the peoples of Italy, spoke as follows: "The events of the past two months which have followed one another and have piled up so rapidly, are not a human work. Alas for anyone who, in this tempest by which the cedars and the reeds have been shaken, torn up, and broken in pieces, does not hear the Lord's voice!"[16]

This unanimous accord would not long endure. The socialist republicans soon would oppose the government of conservative republicans; in both groups the enemies of Catholicism would resume their campaign against the Church; and the Catholics themselves would see revive among them the conflicts which had already set the liberals and the intransigeants against each other. Yet the Church showed herself ready to sustain every government, every institution that respected her freedom. This impression would remain in public opinion. She alleviated the dangers of the conflicts that we have just mentioned and she was not alien to the success of the campaign, presently engaged in again by the Catholics, to win freedom of education.

[15] Cf. Ami de la religion, CXXXVI, 735, 495, 515; Univers, March 4, 7, 1848.
[16] Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, p. 35.

The Social Question

A difference of tendencies appeared first among the Catholics in regard to the social question. The demands of the working classes were not foreign to the revolution of 1848. Once the change of regime took place, the socialists sought to profit by it. Socialism, organized into a political party, was henceforth a power that had to be reckoned with. At the side of its leader, Louis Blanc, were ranged Blanqui, Raspail, and Barbès, agitators rather than theorists, men prepared to let loose a social war. On February 26, to escape from this peril and to show its solicitude for the working classes, the provisional government had decided to create for the unemployed some national workshops, with their direction entrusted to a young engineer, Emile Thomas. But these workshops did not give the hoped-for results. The government was not able to employ in works sufficiently remunerative the 120,000 workers who presented themselves. In three months the undertaking cost 7,000,000 francs.[17]

In the club of the Révolution organized by Barbès, in that of the Amis du peuple with Raspail at its head, men's minds were disturbed. Socialist papers (the Atelier, the Populaire, the Réforme, the Représentant du peuple) came out with daily demands. In the month of March, on the pretext of replying to a manifestation of the national guards, but in reality to find time for the preparation of an election campaign, a countermanifestation of 100,000 workers marched to the City Hall, demanding the postponement of the elections, which the government had fixed for April 9. They did, in fact, take place on the 23rd of that month. And they did not give the socialists the success they counted on. They once more resorted to an uprising. The occasion was an uprising in Poland in the duchy of Posen. On May 15 a disorderly mob, with cries of "Long live Poland!" invaded the meeting hall of the Assembly and proclaimed a provisional government made up of Louis Blanc, Raspail, Barbès, Blanqui, and some other leaders of the workers' party. General Changarnier, rushing up with the mobile guard, dispersed the uprising; but that day was the prelude of a more serious insurrection.

[17] Emile Thomas, Histoire des ateliers nationaux.

The Catholics had not remained indifferent to this social agitation. A devout Christian who until then had seemed to be absorbed by the preoccupations of charitable works and historical scholarly works, Frederick Ozanam, had taken the initiative of a social Catholic movement. In an article published by the Correspondant on February 10, 1848, he compared the coming of democracy in the nineteenth century with the penetration of the barbarian world in the Greco-Roman society, and Pius IX's attitude with that of the popes of the sixth and ninth centuries. He wrote: "Let us give up our repugnances and our grievances, that we may turn to that democracy, to that people which does not know us. . . . Let us pass to the barbarians and follow Pius IX." [18] After the revolution of 1848, Ozanam thought of spreading his ideas by means of a paper. At that period, to found a paper was not a difficult matter. The only requirement was to gather a few friends together and find a printer: with some money, of course: but so little money was needed, merely enough to meet the expense of the first number and, at the worst, of five or six following ones.[19] The rest was the affair of the subscribers. Early in March, 1848, Lacordaire, after an understanding with Ozanam and Father Maret, gave a conference to the Catholic Circle on the state of minds, in the course of which he made known the plan to found a daily paper. A subscription was opened on the spot and amounted to the sum of 11,500 francs.

[18] Correspondant, February 10, 1848, p. 435.

This new organ of the Catholics was given the title of Ere nouvelle. A few days afterward a prospectus, with 50,000 copies, set forth the mind of the paper. It said: "Today two victorious forces exist: the nation and religion, the people and Christ. If these two forces separate, we are lost; if they agree together, we are saved. This happy mutual understanding will result if the Church works for the good of the nation, and if the nation agrees to the good of the Church." This declaration was signed by Lacordaire, Maret, Ozanam, Charles de Coux, Lorain, and Charles Sainte-Foi. Father Gerbet and Father Coeur soon joined the first editors. A certain fear might discourage subscriptions: that of seeing a revival of the Avenir under a new form. A letter of Archbishop Affre (April 16) reassured hesitant consciences. Said the prelate: "Not only am I fully reassured against the danger of a so-called resurrection of the Avenir, but I know that you will effectively oppose what was blameworthy in the theories of that paper." [20] Lacordaire, refuting his articles in the Avenir, gave the reasons why the budget of worship should be preserved.

The Ere nouvelle obtained a considerable success. By May 25 it had 3,200 subscribers; in June it issued 20,000 copies. The new paper took a more and more prominent place in the social questions. It said: "The political theories have not produced the promised felicity; tireless thought calls for another solution to the problem of social harmony." This solution was seen at first by the zealous journalists in the association, to be ruled over by religion. "We have," they said, "monks of science, of the apostolate, of the upper classes; we need monks of labor, of industry, of the working classes." They planned also to found a Catholic social school. They said:

[19] Edmond Biré, La presse royaliste de 1830 à 1852; Alfred Nettement, sa vie et ses œuvres, p. 366.

[20] G. Bazin, Vie de Mgr Maret, I, 227–33. Father Bazin claims for Father Maret the initiative of the undertaking. In any event, Ozanam had the chief part in the editing of the new paper.

> The aim of social science is perfectly Christian, but it has been inaugurated by impiety. . . . We ourselves must form a social school. In a single center would be united whatever is good, true, and just in the output of economists and socialists, and there we should analyze and judge seriously and impartially all the writings of this kind. We call upon all Catholic economists and members of charitable societies to wrest from the false sects the dangerous power which they assemble by their active propaganda.[21]

The days of June brought a terrible blow to the Ere nouvelle. This battle of five days stirred the general opinion, not only against the socialists, but against all those who took a stand on the same ground, whether to fight them or to supplant them. What the Ere nouvelle had called the party of confidence began to get out of order. Many Catholics, following the general movement, turned to authority rather than to freedom. Certainly Ozanam and his friends, at the height of the outbreak, had a courageous and glorious part. Owing to their initiative was the step taken by the Archbishop of Paris, who undertook to be a mediator in the midst of the frightful civil war. Accompanied by Ozanam, Cornudet, and Bailly, Archbishop Affre went to General Cavaignac to apprise him of his perilous attempt; with them he headed for the insurgent districts. There they had to let him advance alone toward the barricades, out of obedience to the order of the prelate, who wished to present himself alone that his presence might have a more peaceful appearance.

[21] Ibid., I, 294. See the Œuvres complètes d'Ozanam, Vol. VII, for several excerpts of his articles that appeared in the Ere nouvelle, in particular a philosophical and historical study on the origin of socialism.

He was struck down by a bullet before a barricade in the faubourg Saint-Antoine at the very moment when, holding in his hand the promise of pardon, he was beginning to incline their hearts to a conciliation. For large numbers of Catholics his death was a new grief laid to the charge of the popular masses. This outrageous attack seemed to symbolize the peril of Christian society, assailed by a socialist barbarism. Lacordaire judged that the interests of his Order and that of his preaching imposed on him a duty to abandon any responsibility for the Ere nouvelle, although he did not withdraw his devotion to it. Montalembert published, in the Ami de la religion, a rather bitter article in which, without naming the Ere nouvelle, he was pointing to it when speaking of the Catholics who had become, not accomplices, but dupes of the socialist aberrations.[22] Veuillot more directly accused the Ere of compromising with the Phalasterians, of entering into good relations with the government, in short, of preaching conciliation to the Church, "which acts only by virtue of a doctrine, from which she can retrench nothing, withdraw nothing." [23] Finally a legitimist, La Rochejaquelein, acquired the paper and made it disappear.[24] In 1871, after the massacres of the Paris Commune, two French officers, Count de Mun and Count de La Tour du Pin, would resume, on broader and sounder foundations, the work outlined in 1848 by Lacordaire and Ozanam.

Catholic Schools

If the June insurrection had the regrettable result of interrupting the generous attempt of Ozanam in the field of social reforms, it had the happy consequence of giving a new impulse to the campaign by the Catholics for freedom of education. But in this attack on the University monopoly, the defenders of the Church were not always united. On the contrary, the disagreements were many and heated. On both sides, however, the aspirations were so magnificent and the Church was presented as so fitted, by its beliefs and by its hierarchy, to fight the revolutionary peril, that all men having a care for order and morality in society did not hesitate to grant the Church the right of teaching youth.

[22] Ami de la religion, October 23, 1848.

[23] L. Veuillot, Mélanges, I, 20.

[24] Bazin, op. cit. p. 355. On the Catholic social movement in 1848, see Joly, Le socialisme chrétien. On the Catholic press and the socialist press from 1848 to 1852, see Hatin, Bibliographie de la presse périodique française, pp. 436–525.

The tragic days of June had three immediate effects: they convinced the most heedless of the reality of the revolutionary danger; they showed the clergy under a light more and more sympathetic to the people; lastly, they brought forward the energy and cool-headedness of a young legitimist deputy of Maine-et-Loire, an earnest Catholic, Count Alfred de Falloux. Under the date of June 15, 1848, the Marquis of Normanby, English ambassador at Paris, wrote in his notes: "Amid the wreckage of so many reputations, one man at this moment dominates the storm. M. de Falloux has manifested a quiet energy that assures him an influence among even those with whom his name did not formerly arouse any sympathy." [25] The chronicler of the Revue des Deux Mondes wrote: "This man may go far. He has prudence, tact, self-control, and, in his appearance, the bearing of a son of the crusaders." [26]

In December, 1848, the newly elected president of the Republic, Prince Louis Napoleon, offered to Count de Falloux the portfolio of minister of public education; but Falloux felt that he was strong enough to place certain conditions; he would work to put through a bill on freedom of education.[27] The Prince agreed the more readily since he then desired the support of the Catholics. Besides, the cause of freedom of education had gained ground for some time. Dupanloup had just won over one of the most influential politicians of the left center, Adolphe Thiers. "Cousin, Cousin," said the former minister of Louis Philippe to the celebrated university professor, "Father is right. Yes, we have contended against justice, against virtue, and we owe them reparation." [28] He wrote: "I see safety only in the freedom of education, in the teaching of the clergy. Our enemy is demagoguery. To it I will not hand over the last remnant of the social order, the Catholic establishment." [29]

[25] Marquis of Normanby, Une année de Révolution, II, 57.
[26] Revue des Deux Mondes, September 30, 1848.
[27] Falloux, Mémoires d'un royaliste, I, 391–99.

The minister of public education acted with decision and promptness. On January 4, 1849, he named two extraparliamentary commissions charged with studying all the questions relating to education: one commission for primary education, the other for secondary.[30] Three months later a bill was presented. This bill: 1. declared the freedom of education; 2. changed the Council of the University into a Council of Public Education and admitted to it representatives of free education: bishops, rabbis, Protestant pastors, and laymen; 3. recognized the right of individuals or associations to teach. Was this term "associations" to be understood as including religious congregations, whether officially recognized or not? The authors of the bill had not wished to decide; but the discussions in the commission showed that the members did not intend to exclude the Jesuits. In return for these concessions, the state reserved to itself: the giving of university degrees; a right of inspection over all educational establishments, including the minor seminaries.

[28] Thureau-Dangin, L'église et l'état sous la monarchie de Juillet, p. 482.

[29] Among the private initiatives that had favored the cause of freedom of education, we must mention that of Father Emmanuel d'Alzon, who, since 1843, had put his youth, his words, his zeal, and his brilliant fortune in the service of this cause and had formed at Nimes, under the title of College of the Assumption, one of the finest colleges of the Midi. See Besson, Le R. P. d'Alzon, in the collection Les contemporains.

[30] H. de Lacombe, Les débats de la Commission de 1849, p. 11.

The immediate effect of this project was to provoke the most violent charges by the parties of the extreme left and the extreme right. The former exclaimed: "France is given over to the Jesuits; the Middle Ages comes to life again." From the Catholic extreme right came the complaint that the project disposed of the rights of the Church without the assent of the Church herself,[31] and that it gave to the Church, not freedom, but a feeble share of the University monopoly;[32] and that it provided that bishops, in the Council of Public Education, should sit beside rabbis and Protestant pastors.[33]

The Falloux bill, as it was called, was defended by the parties of the center. Dupanloup wrote: "We have thought that the moment has arrived, if it is ever to come, to say: All or nothing. . . . The Church can face dangers, it must never run risks."[34] Thiers, turning toward the Catholics, said to them: "If you persist in exceeding our bill, our laborious work will fail. I will regret it for religion, for the state, for all society." Then, turning toward the university group, he begged them thus: "The project leaves the jurisdiction to the University, the conferring of degrees and the right of inspection, and you complain!" Moreover, not all the friends of the Univers agreed with the bitter criticisms of Louis Veuillot. The abbot of Solesmes, Dom Guéranger, wrote: "The monopoly is abolished, the University is done for. Instead of congratulating ourselves on these advantages, we disdain them and we run the danger of endlessly prolonging a regime that has inflicted all the evils of [31] Cf. E. Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, II, 356.

[32] Louis Veuillot in the Univers, June 29, 1849.

[33] The authors of the bill had decided that the bishops would participate in the councils by the same title as the Protestants and the rabbis. This arrangement gave the Catholics reasons for complaint (E. Veuillot, op. cit., II, 356). Said Bishop Pie: "They wish to drive the Church to make an alliance with the big party of conservative rationalism. The state-God is incensed by all, and Christ is no longer anything but one of the demigods gathered about its altar" (Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, p. 290).

[34] Lagrange, Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, II, 505.

the Church and of society. In our part of the country all read the Univers and love it; but the most intelligent members of the clergy disagree on this point from the view of their paper." [35] Father Ravignan, although, like Guéranger, criticizing certain provisions of the bill, expressed similar opinions.[36]

Parliamentary Discussion

The discussions began in the Legislative Assembly on January 14, 1850.[37] The bill was attacked from the left by Barthélemey-Saint-Hilaire and by Victor Hugo. The former argued against the principle of freedom of education: 1. in the name of the state and of the University, which, he said, would be, in a way, destroyed by the proposed law; 2. in the name of the principles of 89, that is, "of the very spirit of the age, of its works, of its hopes, and of its principles." Victor Hugo aroused the clerical specter. He began by declaring that he desired religion, that he wished all heads to be raised toward heaven, that belief in a better world was the supreme certitude of his reason, as it was the supreme joy of his soul; but he added that he did not wish the teaching of the Church, or rather that he wished the Church to be in its own home, and not in the school. He then added: "I address myself to the clerical party and I say to it: This law is your law. I distrust you. To instruct is to construct. I am distrustful of what you construct. I am unwilling to confide to you the future of France, because to confide it to you would be to betray it to you." Then he evoked the memories of the so-called martyrs of clerical intolerance: Campanella, Harvey, Galileo, Moliere, and Pascal.

From the right of the Chamber the bill was attacked by Fa-

[35] Guéranger, letter of July 21, 1849, in the Ami de la religion of July 28, 1849, CXLII, 254.

[36] Lecanuet, Montalembert, II, 476; P. de Ponlevoy, Vie du P. de Ravignan, Vol. II, chap. 20; Lacombe, op. cit., p. 334.

[37] Falloux had just resigned because of illness and was replaced by Parieu.

society, I have extended my hand to those who had opposed me, to those whom I had opposed; my hand is in theirs; there it will remain, I hope, for the common defense of that society which may be indifferent to you, but which affects us deeply." [38] Then he said: "I now pass to the Jesuits. They will return. I ask you, in the name of your principles, how you can oppose their return. An individual presents himself, bringing to you the two required evidences of capacity and morality. Nothing else remains to ask of him. You can require nothing more of him. You may say to me that we will have to examine this point at the time of the law on the associations. Even so. But permit me to tell you that I shall be waiting for you on that day, to know how you will act to interdict the Jesuits." [39] As the Moniteur remarked, at these words long laughter broke out.

The bill was passed on March 15, 1850, 399 votes against 237.[40] The next day Louis Veuillot wrote in the Univers: "Let it be well understood that this law is not our work. . . . In our eyes it is only the fortress of the monopoly restored and enlarged. It is a compromise full of traps, a pact with adversaries whose loyalty we do not trust." But the article concluded with this Christian and worthy declaration: "We are ready to defend the law even if we should be tricked. Our self-respect cannot suffer from wounds when the interest of the Church is saved." [41] The press hostile to the Church vehemently showed its irritation. We read in the National: "At present the congregations are twofold mistresses of teaching in France; for the law now turns over to them both the free teaching and the public teaching." [42]

[38] For this whole debate, see the Moniteur, January 15, 16, 19, February 8, 1850.

[39] Lagrange, Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, I, 515.

[40] For the text of the law, see Rivière, Hélie, and Paul Pont, Lois usuelles, pp. 304 ff. This law has been modified by several later laws, notably by those of March 9, 1852, June 14, 1854, October 30, 1866, April 10, 1867, February 27, 1880, December 11, 1880, June 7, 1881, March 28, 1882, and October 30, 1886.

[41] Univers, March 17, 1850.

[42] Quoted by the Ami de la religion, CXLVIII, 34.

What ought the Catholics do? Rome was consulted. By a letter addressed (May 15, 1850) to all the bishops of France, the apostolic nuncio replied, in the name of the Holy Father, that they should accept the law. He said: "His Holiness cannot forget that the Church, in the interest of Christian society, can suffer some sacrifice compatible with her existence and her duties." [43] The submission of the Univers was prompt and entire. Louis Veuillot wrote: "The keener our opposition was, the more we must see to it that no cloud arise on the integrity and sincerity of our submission to the directions of the Vicar of Christ." [44]

Subsequent events showed that those favoring the law were right. It was the starting point of a wonderful development of Catholic education. From 1850 to 1852, 257 Catholic establishments of secondary education were founded. In 1854 they amounted to 1,081. As François Poujoulat, a Catholic royalist writer, said, the law of 1850 was a law of compromise; but at the same time it was a law of salvation.[45]

The Socialist Peril

Concern for the social welfare, the desire to defend society from the dissolving doctrine of socialism, had in the minds of many counted heavily in the evolution that decided Thiers and his friends to contend for the freedom of Catholic education. But the socialist peril continued. In the June defeat it had received a terrible blow, but not mortal. After a moment of astonishment, its leaders resolved, not to suspend or moderate their [43] Ibid., CXLVIII, 34.

[44] Univers, May 24, 1850. Some Catholics did not imitate this submission. The Moniteur catholique, a fanatical paper, tried to show that the Pope disapproved of the law (Univers, May 24, 1840; Ami de la religion, CXLVIII, 155). Bishop Clausel de Montals of Chartres, the sole exception among the bishops, refused to comply with the direction given by the Pope. On this fact, see Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, I, 297.

[45] Cf. Lacombe, Les débats de la commission de 1849, p. 340.

action, but to transform it. After the period of peaceful propaganda, with Saint-Simon as its chief mover, after that of the open political struggle, organized by Louis Blanc, a third period began for socialism, that of the hidden strife, of propaganda in the little towns and country places. "Let us prepare for 1852; until then, let us be patient": such was the watchword of the socialists in 1850. The year 1852 had been chosen as an objective because they hoped that the multiple ballotings that would take place here and there and the resulting confusion would facilitate a violent coup on society.

But Prince Louis Napoleon also had his plan. Surrounded by followers devoted to his person and his name, personally ambitious to resume the work of the first of the Napoleons, he had decided, rather than return to private life, to attempt a coup d'état. For this purpose, the strategy was clearly indicated: to arouse in the middle class the feeling of fear, by emphasizing the dangers of anarchy; to win the common people by presenting himself as the armed defender of democracy; to assure himself of the good will of the Church by promising it that he would become the defender of its moral teaching and of its rights. This plan was carried out.

Restoration of the Empire (1852)

At the beginning of December, 1851, public opinion seemed ripe to accept a coup d'état. On the night of December 1, five generals and twelve representatives of the people were arrested and imprisoned. The next day the Assembly was dissolved. Terrible repressions got the better of all attempted resistance. On December 20 and 21 a plebiscite gave more than seven million votes to the prince-president, who toured France amid enthusiastic ovations, cleverly prepared. On October 9, 1852, at Bordeaux, at the close of a big banquet, after promising to "win the people to religion, morality, and comfort," he uttered this famous phrase, "The Empire is peace." A month later a senatus consultus proclaimed the restoration of the hereditary empire in favor of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte and his family.

Once again the Catholics had to face the problem concerning the attitude to be taken toward the new power. They divided into several groups. Some, such as Lacordaire, obstinately refused to rally to the Empire. Said the Notre Dame preacher: "Undoubtedly the demagogue prepared a frightful ruin for us; but despotism has never saved anything." He recalled that, "although Napoleon I had re-established public worship in France in 1801, eight years later he imprisoned the pope who had consecrated him emperor." [46] The restorer of the Order of St. Dominic in France then gave up all activity in political life that he might devote himself solely to the religious apostolate. Montalembert, followed by several of his friends, at first in 1851 adhered to the coup d'état of the prince-president, because, he said, "elsewhere he observed only the yawning gulf of victorious socialism." [47] But his adherence did not last long. The appearance (October, 1852) of his pamphlet on the Intérêts catholiques au XIX^e^ siècle marked his break with the new government.[48]

The Univers, followed by the large majority of the clergy, hailed, in Napoleon III, "the great man who had re-established the Vicar of Christ on his see," [49] and Father Ventura, in an enthusiastic book which appeared with a eulogistic preface by Louis Veuillot, regard the restoration of the empire as a work of God, that would bring to life again the beautiful days of the Crusades.[50] The Univers' editor-in-chief did not share this optimism. He mingled some reservations with his praises [46] Lacordaire, letter of March 31, 1852, to Mme de Prailly, quoted by Foisset, Vie de P. Lacordaire, II, 254.

[47] Lecanuet, Montalembert, II, 39.

[48] Montalembert, Œuvres, V, 1–173.

[49] Univers, October 3, 1854; cf. Univers, December 13, 1855.

[50] Ventura, Le pouvoir politique chrétien.

and expressed the wish that "the wise and valiant hand which had been able to repress the Revolution . . . would not deliver the holy truth to the bites of the impious." [51]

The first acts of the Emperor justified the confidence of the Catholics. The education law was applied in a spirit of benevolence toward the Church. A committee on free education labored without interference at the foundation of Catholic colleges.[52] Many municipal councils turned their colleges over to the ecclesiastical superiors or even offered them to the bishops. The right of inspection of the minor seminaries, a right established by the law of 1850, was exercised with a courtesy and deference that touched the clergy. The teachers in elementary schools found guilty of spreading doctrines subversive of the social order or of religion were reprimanded or dismissed. The schools of higher education were watched over by the authorities from this same angle. In short, atheism and anarchy were proscribed in the school as they were in public, and Christian education, under a discreet control by the state, could call itself truly free in its methods and its organization.

The Pagan Classics

Some Catholics thought the time had come to organize a system of purely Catholic education, freed from every element that was alien to the pure doctrines and sound traditions of the Church. In 1851, a year after the law of educational freedom, Father Joseph Gaume, vicar general of Nevers, published Le ver rongeur des sociétés modernes, a vehement thesis against the prevailing use of the pagan authors in the Catholic colleges. Basically the claims of the author were not excessive. He asked that, up to the fourth class inclusive, all the classics would be Christian and that the pagan authors might be admitted beginning with the third, but in editions carefully revised and explained.[53] But the tone of the book was violent, absolute, and aggressive. The system followed up to that time was called that of "scholastic paganism." That system was here presented as destructive of the faith, of the family, of authority, and as preparing the triumph of socialism. The new method proposed was set forth as the infallible means of salvation. At the close of his work the author says: "If it goes on, soon it will lead to socialism, communism, and all those formidable errors that threaten to bring us to chaos." [54] The contention was not a new one. Lamennais had already maintained it in his polemic against the University. But, after the law on freedom of education, the thesis acquired a particular publicity. Montalembert, then absorbed in the study of the Middle Ages, at once shared in it with his usual ardor.[55]

[51] François Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, p. 99.

[52] Beugnot, Rapport au comité de l'enseignement libre.

Father d'Alzon, the founder of the Assumption College at Nimes, Donoso-Cortés, a recent convert to Catholicism, and especially the editor of the Univers, Louis Veuillot, became its earnest champions. But the Jesuits (whose scholastic traditions were opposed by Gaume), Bishop Clausel de Montals, whom we have seen sharply defending the ideas of the Univers in the struggle against the University monopoly, and Dupanloup, recently made bishop of Orléans, were in agreement in combating the doctrines of the Ver rongeur. The controversy was most spirited. Louis Veuillot wrote: "This dispute is the hottest that I can remember having seen." [56]

The Bishop of Orléans wrote (April 19, 1852) his clergy a glowing letter advising them to make room in the courses for [53] Le ver rongeur, p. 409.

[54] Ibid., p. 413.

[55] Letter of Montalembert (Univers, January 7, 1852).

[56] E. Tavernier, Louis Veuillot, p. 301. Among those who favored the classical humanities we should include Father Landriot (later bishop of La Rochelle, then archbishop of Reims) and Charles Lenormant. Father Daniel took up the defense of the methods of the Jesuits.

the classics of profane antiquity.[57] In three long articles in the Univers (May 7, 8, 10) Louis Veuillot directed ironical barbs at the prelate's letter. The conflict between these two men, from the outset of their relations, continued to be without let-up so sharp that it passed beyond the realm of the scholastic question to such an extent that, in the minds of some, it seemed to be a sort of strife between the lay element and the episcopacy; others regarded it as the conflict of the old Gallicanism against the Roman spirit. The clergy and the Catholics of France found themselves divided. The Univers was even forbidden, on this occasion, to all the professors of the seminaries of the diocese of Orléans, as having encroached on the episcopal authority.[58] Yet the polemic, with its regrettable excesses, ended in a true good. The attention of the public was awakened on the important question of education.

The study of Christian authors, which the University had completely despised, since Villemain had published in 1849 his beautiful book on Eloquence chrétienne au IV^e siècle,[59] had a place of honor. Father Gorini published his remarkable extracts from the Fathers,[60] a prelude to his beautiful historical works on the defense of the Church. The University of France, on its part, gave more room, at least in its programs, to the masterpieces of Christian literature. The Univers (September 20, 1852) protested that it did not ask for the total exclusion of the pagan authors, that it did not regard the teaching of them as the sole source of modern paganism; and Bishop Dupanloup by his fine works, Education and Haute éducation intellectuelle, as also by the brilliant success of his seminary of La Chapelle, showed clearly that his intention was to subordinate to religion all the branches of human knowledge.

[57] Ami de la religion, CLVI, 253.

[58] Ibid., p. 613.

[59] The book had appeared in another form eight years before. See G. Vauthier, Villemain, p. 120.

[60] Martin, Vie de l'abbé Gorini, p. 68.

In 1853 a new dispute arose on the subject of the respective rights of Catholic journalism and of the episcopate. An encyclical of March 21, beginning Inter multiplices, voiced the mind of the Supreme Pontiff on the two conflicts which had agitated the Church of France. Pius IX recommended to the bishops that they train the youth "in the art of writing with elegance by studying both the excellent works of the holy Fathers and the writings of the most celebrated pagan writers, carefully expurgated." He then asked them "to encourage the Catholic journalists to defend the cause of truth with zeal and fairness and to admonish them prudently, with fatherly words, if in their writings they happened to fall short in some matter." [61]

Attacks by the Press

Nothing could be more opportune than such exhortations; for, as the Pope noted sadly in the same encyclical, the discussions that arose among the Catholics furnished the enemies of the Church with arms to harass and combat her. The attacks on Catholic dogma and worship increased in the antireligious press. "The most widely read papers," wrote Montalembert, "notably the Presse and the Siècle, which alone have three times as many subscribers as all the other papers together, contain almost daily attacks against religion and the clergy." On 1852 the most brilliant and popular poet of the time, Victor Hugo, in his virulent invectives, connected the Empire and the Church, or, as he said, "Bonaparte and Mastai." [62] The same year Littré, the most serious of Auguste Comte's disciples, wrote: "The social reforms can be obtained only by the extinction of theological beliefs." [63] With greater fire, Proudhon maintained the same contention. Dupin was satisfied with making odious

[61] Chantrel, Annales, pp. 144–46.
[62] Victor Hugo, Les châtiments, especially Bk. III, 4, 5; Bk. IV, 2.
[63] Littré, Conservation, Révolution, Positivisme, pp. 100, 198.

the Christian regime of the Middle Ages by republishing old calumnies on the so-called "seigneurial right." Michelet, in his introduction to the Histoire de la Révolution française, which would appear in 1855, pointed to Christianity as the chief obstacle to the progress of mankind.[64] Quinet, particularly exasperated by the coup d'état and by his exile, was even more radical. He declared: "We are here concerned not merely with refuting papism but with wiping it out; not merely with wiping it out, but with dishonoring it." [65] A less apparent corruption, but not less profound, of minds manifested itself at the same time by the diffusion and popularization in France of the rationalist philosophy of Germany.[66]

Of this new outburst of hostility toward the Church, the editors of the Correspondant (Albert de Broglie and Alfred de Falloux) placed the responsibility on the polemics of the Univers, which it considered excessive and bungling.[67] Veuillot, writing in the Univers, remarked that the people of the drawing-rooms who attacked it, almost all being members or future members of the Academy, had the defects that are contracted in the academic cenacles, mutual admiration and a complete indifference for public opinion, franker and sharper than theirs. But both sides did better: they took up, with tireless energy, the defense of the Church against the attacks of unbelief. The Correspondant, by the pen of Montalembert, Ozanam, Charles Lenormant, Franz de Champagny, Foisset, Gratry, Augustin Cochin, Fathers Frappel and Sisson, Fathers Chastel and Daniel, of the Society of Jesus, carried on a work of historical, literary, philosophical, and theological apologetics by producing in evidence the blessings and benefits of the Church in the different realms of thought and action. In the Univers, Louis Veuillot, Coquille, Aubineau, and Melchior du [64] See Jules Simon, Mignet, Michelet, Henri Martin, the chapter on Michelet.

[65] Quinet, Le livre de l'exilé, p. 473.
[66] In 1854 Barni had translated most of Kant's works into French.
[67] The Correspondant, April and May, 1856.

Lac did not let pass any calumny or error of the unbelieving or secular press, of the platform, or of the theaters, without pointing it out in a lively style, with prompt retort, often with a brilliance of talent which often crushed the most violent assaults of impiety. Wrote Louis Veuillot: "Why should not truth have light-armed squadrons, soldiers experienced in fighting in thickets?" [68]

Besides, the editor of the Univers did not limit himself to this war of sharpshooters. In 1854 he had already published the Pèlerinages de Suisse, Pierre Saintive, the Nattes, the Honnête Femme, the Français en Algérie, in which he contrasted the power of Christian civilization with Arab morals, and the Libres Penseurs, considered by Jules Lemaitre one of the finest books of social satire.[69] On the other hand Ozanam had brought out his remarkable studies on Civilisation chrétienne and the Poètes franciscains; Gratry, his works on Sophistique contemporaine and his Théodicée; Montalembert, fragments of his Monks of the West; Pitra, his Spicilège de Solesmes; Blanc de Saint-Bonnet, his philosophical meditations on the Restauration française and on the Douleur; Ginoulhiac, his Histoire des dogmes chrétiens pendant les trois premiers siècles; Migne, the greater part of the Patrologie; Father de Ségur, his Réponses aux objections les plus familières contre la religion. By all these publications, an apologetics, traditional in its principles, new in its form and in its adaptation to the intellectual tendencies of the time, made its appearance.

In 1852 two zealous priests, Father Gratry, former chaplain of the Normal College, and Father Pététot, pastor of St. Roch in Paris, determined to give a fresh impulse and an organization to this movement by founding what Gratry called "a workshop of apologetics." To bring their project to a successful issue, they thought the best instrument would be an association like that founded by St. Philip Neri: small groups of priests, living in common, without vows, quite free in their activities, but encouraging and helping one another. Such was the origin of the Oratory of the Immaculate Conception. The first Oratorian group, comprising, besides Father Pététot as superior and Father Gratry, Fathers Valroger, Cambier, Lescoeur, and Adolphe Perraud, met at first, in November, 1852, at 21 rue de Calais, then moved to 11 rue de Regard; there for several years Father Gratry's sermons attracted a choice audience. There Guizot found himself beside Duke de Broglie; Vitet met Berryer; Montalembert was a regular attendant.[70] As Gratry said: "God inspired in His servants the idea of an embracing science. To connect everything to Christ, letters, natural sciences, arts, philosophy, and history, jurisprudence and laws: this thought is one that ferments in the Church." [71] This great ideal could not be realized; and Gratry, discouraged, twenty years later spoke of what he called "the miscarriage of his project"; [72] but the Oratory had communicated a notable stimulus to a movement that would continue throughout the nineteenth century and that received from Pope Leo XIII most solemn encouragement.

[68] Tavernier, Louis Veuillot, p. 94.

[69] J. Lemaitre, Les contemporains, 6th ser., p. 32.

The Curé of Ars

While at Paris eminent priests were undertaking to found a center of Christian science, an obscure village in the diocese of Belley became, by the eminent holiness of its pastor, a center of supernatural graces. In 1854 the pastor of Ars, John Baptist Vianney, unable alone and with the help of the zealous priest who had been his collaborator for six years, to satisfy the spiritual needs of the numerous pilgrims who flocked to him, added

[70] Chauvin, Le P. Gratry, pp. 139, 140, 154.

[71] Gratry, Discours sur le devoir intellectuel des chrétiens et sur la mission de l'Oratoire.

[72] Chauvin, op. cit., p. 187.

a group of missioners. The holy priest who was thus attracting throngs, was born on May 8, 1786, in the village of Dardilly in the department of the Rhone. His childhood was spent in the labors of the fields. His earliest religious instruction had been given him in secret during the revolutionary persecution. He made his first Communion in a barn, the poverty of which reminded him of the destitution of the stable of Bethlehem. His progress in the study of human sciences and even of ecclesiastical sciences had been difficult. But a boundless faith, an angelic piety, an ardent zeal for the glory of God and the good of souls, all had marked him for the priesthood; and from the time of his appointment to the little parish of Ars, the renown of his holiness kept increasing.

Wonderful deeds of charity, graces obtained through his prayers, the lights which this humble priest shed on the souls that confided in him in the tribunal of penance or even that heard him preach in his church, had spread his reputation of holiness far and wide. From 1848 to 1852, at the time when so many souls, moved by the great events of that time and by the renaissance of a Catholic movement among the educated classes, turned instinctively to religion, pilgrimages were organized from all the provinces of France and even from abroad, to the holy curé of Ars. Many souls found with him the faith they had lacked; others obtained divine enlightenment or even bodily cures, instantly obtained.

This priest's words were simple and without affectation, but they possessed in a high degree that distinctive quality of the priestly word: unction. When speaking of supernatural things —heaven, hell, the Eucharist, the priesthood, sin—his words were wonderfully penetrating. For example, he said:

In heaven a soul will be nourished by the breath of God. Heaven is founded in the soul of the saints. It is like a downpour from above in which they bathe. The damned will be enveloped by the wrath of God. They have lost the power of loving. If a damned soul could say even once: My God, I love you, hell would no longer exist for it. . . . When we are before the Blessed Sacrament, let us close our eyes and open our heart; the good God will open His. . . . What a grand being a priest is! If we could grasp this truth on earth, we would die, not of fright, but of love. . . . To offend the good God, who wishes us only good! To gratify the demon, who wishes us only evil! What folly! If you saw a man piling up a big pyre, heaping fagots together, and if, when you asked him what he was doing, he should reply: I am preparing the fire that is to burn me up, what would you think? Well, in committing sin we are acting thus.[73]

[73] See A. Monnin, Vie du Curé d'Ars; Vianney, Le bienheureux J.-B. Vianney; Monnin, Esprit du curé d'Ars. (Father Vianney was canonized by Pope Pius XI in 1925. Tr.)

CHAPTER XXVI

The Church in Italy

LIKE the Papal States and France, the other states of Europe, notably Italy, Austria, Prussia, Switzerland, England, Holland, Belgium, and Spain, were more or less disturbed about 1848. There, too, the liberal movement appeared suspect, full of misunderstandings, a mingling of good and bad. Only by studying it in each state can we determine the genuine elements and discern the character of it in each country.

The political situation of Italy was as complex as its religious situation. The kingdom of Lombardy-Venetia, connected to Austria, and the duchies of Parma, Modena, and Lucca, placed under the exclusive protection of the court of Vienna, as well as the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, more jealous of its independence of foreign powers, and the grandduchy of Tuscany, which followed an uncertain policy, were, by their constitutions, their origins, and the princes governing them, born enemies of the revolution. But the spirit of distrust toward the Holy See and the spirit of meddling in ecclesiastical affairs, which Joseph II of Austria and Leopold II of Tuscany had spread at the close of the preceding century, still survived them in the courts of these different states.

Naples continued to avail herself of the so-called privileges of the Sicilian monarchy. Florence was not resigned to let fall into desuetude the principles proclaimed by the pseudo-council of Pistoia. Similar inconsistencies appeared in the liberal movement which, beginning with cries of "Long live religion!" and "Long live Christ!" and "Long live Pius IX!" accepted the promptings of the conspirator Mazzini. By words and deeds, Mazzini endeavored to keep up a dubious attitude that was calculated to compromise the Holy See and turn to the advantage of the revolution. The kingdom of Sardinia, which, like the other states of the peninsula, was a state of the old regime, but which the prospect of a hegemony over Italy made almost revolutionary, oscillated between the double tendencies, political and religious, that we have just spoken of.

Could it, like Italy, emerge from this incoherence? The evil, though deep, did not appear beyond remedy. Amid so many divergent or contrary currents, one current, broader, capable of drawing with it all the others toward a common ideal, could be distinguished: the ideal of a united and constitutional Italy.

In 1846 Pius IX had tried to direct this mighty current. He had asked the Italian princes to modernize their governments, to give up part of their prerogatives in order the better to win the confidence of their peoples; he himself, giving an example, inaugurated a constitutional regime in his states, with the applause of his subjects and of the world in general. But the revolution had at once tried to seize the Pontiff's undertaking as soon as it began. Mazzini hastened to put forward his program of an Italy one and liberated, and, having been able to draw the Pope into his enterprise, had turned the movement against him. This new plan in turn had failed. The evolution of Italy would take place, not for the Church, with Pius IX, nor for the anti-Christian sects, with Mazzini, but in a dubious way for Piedmont, with Victor Emmanuel.

Victor Emmanuel

If we regarded only the appearances, we might suppose that the young king who succeeded King Charles Albert on the throne of Sardinia was not destined to such a work. The connections of his house, his family traditions, the circumstances of his coming, and even his character seemed to keep him apart from this movement. To the oldest races of Europe, to the house of Austria, to the house of Bourbon, the house of Savoy, to which the new king belonged, had asked marriage connections. Victor Emmanuel, nephew of the grandduke of Tuscany and of Archduke Rainier; a close relationship connected him with the Bourbons of Naples; he himself had married an Austrian princess. Furthermore, "the dynasty of Savoy, among its titles of honor, prized nothing so much as its traditional renown of fidelity to the Church, strict orthodoxy, and austere devotion."

The circumstances of Victor Emmanuel's coming seemed calculated to turn him away from the political adventure. The first day of his reign had been one of the most tragic in the history of his country. On the evening of March 23, 1849, in the confusion of defeat, in the face of the enemies' camp, Victor Emmanuel received a half-broken scepter by fate. The first act of his power was to beg from Radetsky an armistice and peace. Having barely escaped the danger, would he desire to cast himself back into it? Personally until then Victor Emmanuel had shown no sort of ambition beyond a single one, that of avoiding ceremonial formality which at that time was displeasing to him and for which later on he had a horror. "His education had been that of a gentleman rather than of a politician. Brought up remote from the affairs of the world, he had not been introduced by any progressive experience to the art of governing." [1]

Such were the appearances. But the young king, as the future of his reign would show, possessed a natural gift of intuition, which often takes the place of study and genius. At the first contacts with his people he understood that the mystical reveries of his father Charles Albert on Italy united and freed by Piedmont found a deep echo in public opinion. He acted only to realize those dreams by practical means. Of all the ethnical groups of the peninsula, the Sardinian, Piedmont, and Savoy peoples, whom the diplomacy of Vienna had put under the dominance of the house of Savoy, seemed to him the most robust, the ablest in handling arms, and the most amenable to military discipline. The bonds of obedience which attached them to the dynasty were solid, confused with that love of country so powerful among these generations of shepherds, mountaineers, and plains people. Moreover, the King felt himself surrounded by choice men. In the army he soon felt that warriors like General La Marmora and Colonel Menabrea would be instruments of the greatest value for him. In his council, diplomats like Count Balbo and Massimo d'Azeglio impressed him by the daring and firmness of their spirit, as much as by the flexibility of their mind. These were qualities that the young prince possessed himself. Wrote d'Azeglio: "I like loyalty for many reasons; among others, because it frequently serves to deceive others." [2]

[1] La Gorce, "Les origines de l'unité italienne" in the Correspondant, November 10, 1893 (CLXXIII, 441 f.).

Of frankness and dissimulation, of sudden attacks and hidden maneuvers, he would need many to reach the desired end, to humor powerful friends, to lull the watchfulness of some and to stir the activity of others.

What increased the confidence of the King of Sardinia was the attitude of France, promptly perceived by him. "Let us defend the Tessin frontier as well as that of the Var," wrote (October 23, 1848) the French foreign minister.[3] Certain words of Louis Napoleon, spoken in this sense in confidential conversations, had been also remarked. They were repeated in Sardinia, and they were amplified. People remembered that the prince had recently been the friend, even the accomplice, of the Italian liberals, and public opinion counted on him to bring France into a cause that must have been personally appealing to him.

[2] Massimo d'Azeglio, Lettere inedite, p. 63.

[3] Bastide, La République française et l'Italie, p. 123.

The question of the attitude toward the Holy See remained to be considered. Since the King of Naples had no design of conquest or of supremacy and since the other Italian princes were paralyzed, whether by their vassalage to Austria or by their own weakness, the Pope and the King of Piedmont remained the only preponderant powers in Italy: the Pope, with the prestige of his religious majesty; the King of Sardinia, with that of his military might and of his ambitions. The Sardinian ruler, subordinating his whole policy to his plan of domination in Italy, was faced with this alternative: either to cast his lot with the Pope's party while subjecting it to his views, or to turn clearly against him. The attempts made to win over the Pope to the projects of the King of Sardinia were rejected, and Victor Emmanuel resigned himself to have the court of Rome as an enemy. But such a situation was not without something to frighten him. He strove at any price to avoid any divergence of a dogmatic or disciplinary order, and to limit the disagreement to questions of a purely political order. Such was the aim to which all the efforts of his diplomacy tended. We shall see how the force of affairs rendered these efforts futile and how the court of Turin was brought to adopt measures of persecution.

First Steps of Persecution

Public opinion, cleverly exploited by the secret societies, drew the Turin court into this path. Mazzini and his followers, adroitly associated with the Italian national claims a spirit of opposition to the Holy See; this spirit assumed a coloring of vague Christianity. Mazzini wrote: "Almost two thousand years ago a great philosopher, Christ by name, preached the fraternity that the world still seeks. . . . All personal discontents and disappointed ambitions can serve the cause of progress." [4] This appeal was calculated to reach the foundations of Christianity which was in the popular soul, and likewise all the evil passions.

This hidden pressure on public opinion had not escaped King Charles Albert. It prompted him to write to Prince Metternich a strange letter, which Metternich inserted in his Mémoires. Said the King: "A vast conspiracy is in the world. . . . I am not intending to teach you anything in this regard. . . . What is certain is that the position of every king of Sardinia is the most difficult of all positions. It is never free." [5] King Charles Albert might well reflect that he had contributed to create that situation. His son resolved to extricate himself from it, not by resisting the popular current nor by trying to alter the direction, but by accepting it as it was and yielding to it. "He resigned himself to serve the cause of the revolution because he flattered himself that in this way he would be working for his own advantage. He put himself at the head of the national movement whose riotous demonstrations were organized by the clandestine societies." [6]

Victor Emmanuel II at that time was acquainted with this phrase of Mazzini's Instructions: "The earthly globe is formed of grains of sand; whoever wishes to advance a single step must be one of ours." [7] In any case, the King was inspired by this strategy and advanced, in the path of the persecution, only by calculated steps.

The first step was made by the law known as the law of the Foro, or the Siccardi law. The ground was cleverly chosen. Certain prescriptions of the canon law withdrew from the jurisdiction of the civil courts a certain number of religious cases and, in some instances, even the person of clerics, and made

[4] Lubienski, Guerres et révolutions d'Italie, p. 46.
[5] Metternich, Mémoires, IX, 267.
[6] Van Duerm, Vicissitudes politiques, p. 253.
[7] Lubienski, loc. cit.

them subject to trial in the ecclesiastical tribunals. The prescriptions had fallen into disuse in most of the states; but they were still observed in Sardinia, and the concordat concluded between Gregory XVI and King Charles Albert (March 27, 1841) confirmed them, as also certain vestiges of the ancient law of asylum.[8] Anyone might easily conjecture that this legislation was destined to disappear gradually in the Sardinian States, as in the other European states. In proportion as the faith weakened in the masses, they became less suited to grasp the reason for such privileges; and the unjustified scandal resulting could not be compensated for by the good which these privileges procured for the Church. No one objected when the government of the Sardinian States entered on negotiations with the Holy See for a loyal discussion of the question of modifications that were to be made to the concordat of Charles Albert.

We may suppose that such were the intentions of the King of Sardinia. He sent to Portici, where the Pope still resided, Count Siccardi, commissioned to begin the concordat negotiations (October, 1849). But this move was open to suspicion when the King's envoy, in the name of his sovereign, asked as a prerequisite that the Archbishop of Turin and the Bishop of Asti, charged with having protested against the encroachments of the civil power, should be asked to leave their sees. At the same time Victor Emmanuel allowed the press to attack with impunity the clergy and the monastic institutions in a manner extremely heated. The King's aim was said to be to terrify the Pope just when the King proposed to enter upon diplomatic conversations with him. Pius IX was suspicious and declined Siccardi's offer. History has justified this attitude on the part of the Pope: the publication of the correspondence of the president of the Sardinian council has now revealed that at the very time when he was asking the Holy See to give up the benefit of a concordat stipulation, he wrote: "With the Pope we must use formalities, salaams, and hand-kissings, but an iron firmness, and especially the accomplished fact." [9]

[8] Acta Pii IX, Part I, Vol. II, p. 140.

As the "salaams" and "hand-kissings" did not succeed, "the accomplished fact" was to be expected next. Siccardi left Portici in November, 1849.[10] Three months later he presented to the Chamber a bill abolishing the ecclesiastical immunities. Article 1 of the bill provided that all civil cases between ecclesiastics, whether personal suits or property claims or mixed, of whatever sort were subject to the civil jurisdiction. Article 2 subjected to the same jurisdiction all cases concerning the right of active and passive nomination to ecclesiastical benefices, or the property belonging to the latter or to any other ecclesiastical establishment.[11] On the pretext of ending some abuses not favorably viewed by modern peoples, this measure amounted to annulling reciprocal stipulations by the will of merely one of the contracting parties. Furthermore, it arrogated the evidently usurped power of appointments to benefices, and of the goods of the Church. But the defenders of the bill in the Chamber of Deputies and in the Senate passed lightly over these latter points and strove especially to deride "the Gothic and superannuated character" of the institutions which the bill purposed to abolish, appealing to the modern spirit and pre-

[9] Massimo d'Azeglio, op. cit., p. 53. Mazzini, at this time, wrote, in an appeal to the clergy: "Italian priests, listen to us. . . . We would be able to conquer without you, but we do not wish to do so" (quoted in Ami de la religion, March 17, 1850, p. 442).

[10] After Count Siccardi's departure, the Holy Father sent Archbishop Charvaz of Sebaste to explain to the King the reason for his refusal. The King's reply (January 25) promised the Pope his protection for the two prelates of Turin and Asti and declared that the negotiations undertaken for the concordat would be resumed at the opportune time. A month later the King presumed to solve the question by a unilateral action on the pretext that the Pope had obstinately refused a new concordat. The history of these negotiations, based on diplomatic documents, has been published in a memoir which is inserted after the papal allocution of January 22, 1855 (Acta Pii IX, Part I, Vol. II, p. 9). This memoir is a historical source of the greatest interest.

[11] For the complete text, see Ami de la religion, April 15, 1850.

senting this as opposed to the obstinate routine of the Holy See.[12]

The law passed by the Chamber, was ratified by the Senate (April 8, 1850) and promulgated the next day amid noisy manifestations. Cries of "Down with the priests" mingled with those of "Long live the Siccardi law!" [13]

The Supreme Pontiff did not wait for the passing of the law before uttering a solemn protest against an act that violated both the rights of the Church and fidelity due to treaties.[14]

The bill having been passed, the bishops of Savoy and of Piedmont raised their voice in protest. They said that, by breaking concordats made with the Holy See and taking no account of the most solemn treaties, this law offended and afflicted all those who wished to live and die in obedience to the Catholic faith. The bishops of Savoy added courageously: "Perhaps, if the question concerned treaties concluded with one of the great powers of Europe, the government would have acted with greater reserve. . . . These great powers have the effective means of making themselves respected; but Pius IX has no army; he is in exile." [15]

Further Measures of Persecution

The Sardinian cabinet, with Marquis d'Azeglio still at its head, did not stop at these measures. Soon it demanded a new circumscription of the dioceses, the suppression of certain sees, the secularization of several monastic orders. The Roman [12] In his declaration "To the Italian priests," Mazzini called on the clergy to choose between the spirit of the papacy and the modern spirit, in which he pretended to see the spirit of the gospel. Ami de la religion, March 17, 1850, p. 442.

[13] See the accounts given by the Risorgimento of April 9, 1850, and by the official journal of the Turin government on the same date (Ami de la religion, CXLVII, 201).

[14] The act of protest, addressed by Cardinal Antonelli to Marquis Spinola, chargé d'affaires of the Holy See at Turin, bears the date of February 9, 1950. See Chantrel, Annales, p. 91.

[15] Ami de la religion, CXLVI, pp. 485, 603.

court then received this impression, that the court of Turin had but one aim: to drive it to refusals which Turin would then noisily point to, presenting them as reactions of the ancient regime against the modern spirit, which Piedmont assumed to be championing. A bill on civil marriage (June 12, 1852) provoked fresh protests on the part of Rome. But in that same year some rearrangements took place in the ministry of King Victor Emmanuel, which were destined to have considerable historical importance. D'Azeglio, bending under a burden too heavy for his shoulders, yielded his place to Count Balbo. The latter in turn, after a few weeks, withdrew before the enormous task which Piedmont had assumed by posing, in the presence of Europe, against the Pope and against Austria, as the moving power of a united and regenerated Italy.

November 4, 1852, is an important date for history. On that day the head of the Sardinian ministry was confided to Count Camillo di Cavour. In appointing him (October, 1850) minister of commerce, the King said to his other ministers: "Take care, this man will take over from you all your portfolios." Indeed, no burden seemed to be unwelcome to this man. Even before holding any official position, he was able, by exercising a tireless activity in the domains of agriculture, industry, finances, journalism, social economy, and religious controversy, to impose everywhere the authority of an astonishing faculty of assimilation and a will that recognized no obstacle. Cavour was about to take upon himself the immense task of carrying on the strife against the Roman court and that of Vienna, and to labor at making Italy one of the great powers of Europe by organizing it about the kingdom of Piedmont.

Cavour

At the age of forty-two, Count Camillo Benso di Cavour was in the maturity of age and strength. "Whoever saw him inconspicuously taking a walk on the streets of Turin would hardly have surmised in him the future master of Italy. His small stature, his near-sightedness, his stoutness, a certain negligent and commonplace appearance, all these kept him from the masses. But, although lacking attractive gifts, he had the qualities that subdue: sharpness of views, promptness of resolve, and energy in accomplishing what he had resolved." [16] His almost unbelievable power of work and his aptitude to embrace everything amazed his fellows. Indifferent to praise or blame, he asked only the success of his views, declaring himself a moderate, making appeal to the participation of the worst revolutionaries, setting himself forth as a knight of an ideal of justice and trampling underfoot the rights of the common people, proclaiming himself Catholic in heart and yet not hesitating to outrage the Church in her holiest institutions and in her most venerated leaders.

A Savoyard on his father's side and a Genevan through his mother, offspring of the family of St. Francis de Sales and connected with the Clermont-Tonnerres, he was endowed from childhood with an insatiable curiosity, which he sought to gratify by frequent journeys, by deep inquiries about men and things. Thus you might suppose that his mind would be tossed about by the many influences among which he was a sort of crossroad. But he had a singleness of aim clearly conceived and perseveringly pursued, namely, Italian independence. This unity of purpose set order and clearness, if not greatness and virtue, in that rich organization.[17]

[16] La Gorce, "Les origines de l'unité italienne," in the Correspondant, November 10, 1893, p. 456.

[17] The question has been asked whether this celebrated statesman was a Freemason and whether Freemasonry played a part in the formation of Italian unity. According to Cantù (Gli eretici d'Italia) and Balan (Storia d'Italia X, 324), Cavour had been grandmaster of Freemasonry. The studies published in the Corriere della sera (October 30 and November 7, 1913) by Alessandro Luzio, director of the public archives of Mantua, seem to destroy this legend. If the great proponent of Italian unity had obtained that high degree, the Freemasons would have boasted of

With Cavour the policy of Piedmont became more precise and broader. To take hold of the interests of all Italy, without appearing to abandon the particular interests of Piedmont; to organize and make at home in the peninsula the heavy burdens of the great nations (conscription and excessive taxes) without arousing too much outcry; to favor the Italian liberal movements of Italy without alarming the neighboring monarchies; to fight against the Holy See without breaking with the Church: such were the ends which Victor Emmanuel's prime minister proposed to himself. These he pursued at the cost of unheard-of efforts. And these labors wore him out prematurely. But so powerful was the impulse given by him that his work continued after his death.

Religious Orders

In this place we need to study directly merely the religious aspect of that policy. When a simple deputy, Cavour had contributed to the passage of the "law of the Foro"; as president of the council of ministers, he proposed and had passed (March 2, 1855) by the Chamber of Deputies (May 22 by the Senate) the "law of convents." The kingdom of Sardinia at that time had 4 archbishoprics, 26 bishoprics, more than 600 religious communities, a considerable number of collegiate churches and benefices, almost all of them provided with important endowments. The object of the new law was to secularize a considerable part of the ecclesiastical properties. The charitable religious orders were allowed to live; but the goods of the men-it thereafter. Cavour himself would not have been so eager to sustain the Société nationale, a rather recent organization, if he could have made use of the powerful association. Besides, Cavour, who hoped to die in the bosom of the Catholic Church and who for some time was known to be indebted to the spiritual helps of Father Giacomo, did not appear to be favorably disposed toward Freemasonry. From 1848 to 1860 that society did not show signs of life in Italy, or at least exercised only a feeble and intermittent influence.

---

dicant orders would be assigned to a clergy fund. The clergy, no longer a body salaried by the state, would realize the ideal formula: the free Church in the free state.[18] Cavour was not unaware that a measure of this sort was objectionable to the mass of the population, attached as a whole to the religious orders. He had to fight for several months with a tenacity that finally overcame all resistance. His bill, he said, was not aggressive against religion. Economically profitable to the nation, it would end solely, from the ecclesiastical point of view, in a happier partition of the goods of the Church among the members of the clergy. King Victor Emmanuel somewhat disliked to commit this encroachment of the civil power on ecclesiastical property. Once the law was passed, he probably thought to calm his conscience by asking that an exception be made to the confiscation in favor of two chapels which his mother and his wife were fond of visiting.[19] With this reservation, he sanctioned the confiscation law, which was a forerunner of many other spoliations.

Thirty-five monastic orders thus fell under the proscription. Religious to the number of 7,850 were despoiled. Many of those whom the law regarded as contemplatives, were maintaining charitable works. But these perished along with the rest. Certain others were zealously working at the progress of the sciences; they were not spared. Not only did the law outrage [18] Cantù wrote: "I have heard several of my colleagues boast that they had suggested this maxim to Cavour. But Cavour himself did not claim its paternity. On the contrary he said that 'an illustrious writer, in a lucid moment,' had wished, by this formula, to show to Europe that liberty had mightily contributed to the awakening of the religious spirit (Actes officiels of 1860, p. 594). The fact is that Montalembert complained that this formula had been stolen from him and put in circulation by a big culprit (Correspondant, August, 1863). We know d'Azeglio's judgment of this expression, and the session of July, 1867, showed what importance the deputies attached to it. It was used by those who like the use of equivocal situations to profit by them" (Cantù, Gli eretici d'Italia). Cf. Charles Benoist, "La formula de Cavour: l'Eglise libre dans l'Etat libre," in the Revue des Deux Mondes, July 15, 1905.

[19] The chapel of the Sacramentines and the church of the Consolata at Turin. Two statues later marked the place where the pious queens used to kneel there.

religion, science, and charity; it openly violated the constitutional law of Piedmont. In vain, M. de Revel, a former minister of King Charles Albert, appealed to article 29 of the Statute: "All property, without any exception whatever, is inviolable." Parliament ignored the appeal. It was not stopped even by the thought of respecting the wish of the former princes of the house of Savoy, who had intended to perpetuate liturgical prayer on their tombs. The religious of the monastery of Hautecombe had to abandon their sacred post.[20]

Other Measures

The expressions of respect toward the Church, lavishly used by Cavour in the course of the debates, did not deceive the Holy Father. The imprisonment of Archbishop Franzoni of Turin because he protested against the law of the Foro, his banishment on September 25, 1850, the dismissal of a chaplain who recommended prayer for the courageous prelate, the imprisonment and exile of Archbishop Marongini of Cagliari for a similar reason in 1851, the arrest of several priests, pastors or missioners, who were arbitrarily accused of stirring uprisings, insults uttered in the Chamber of Deputies against the episcopate, circulars sent out by Cavour directing the syndics to exercise a continual watchfulness over the pastors,[21] and many other deeds of the same sort left no doubt as to the hostility of the Piedmont government toward the Church.

They exiled bishops and placed the clergy under the surveillance of the police. At the same time the revolutionary and impious press was granted every liberty to insult the Pope and the priests, the revolutionaries were permitted to interrupt the sermons in the churches, and the theaters were allowed to ridicule the holy mysteries. So far did this outrage go that Sauzet, in his famous work on marriage (1853), was able to write: "I know not what fatal spirit has breathed over Piedmont." The government's culpable tolerance encouraged every daring, and the deputy Brofferio even declared in the Chamber: "Let us show these proud prelates that the people also have their fulminations and their anathemas." [22] In vain did the Holy Father repeat his complaints and protests.[23] The government, after some banal replies, paid no further attention to them.

[20] See the text of the law in Ami de la religion, June 7, 1855 (CLXVIII, 563–67).
[21] Mentioned by Dupanloup, La souveraineté pontificale, p. 309.

Grieved and disappointed were the eminent Catholics who had but shortly before fancied a movement of national liberation under the auspices of religion. Among these Manzoni and Pellico were especially conspicuous. The illustrious author of The Betrothed was now more than ever "that suffering genius, with a gentle and sad face, with eyes full of yearning"; [24] and the author of Le mie prigioni wrote: "I do not reply to the people who regard me as a revolutionary nor to the fanatics of liberalism who blame me for not sharing their mad illusions. . . . From me they will receive no answer but my open conduct, without servility with regard to any of the violent parties, and also as Christian as possible." [25] Father Ventura, after allowing himself to be drawn for a while into Cavour's following, nobly retracted. Having learned from experience, he corrected his philosophical and political ideas. Gioberti alone, who had withdrawn from public affairs since 1849, went ahead in his liberal utopias, suggesting to Victor Emmanuel the political line to be followed for accomplishing the regeneration of Italy. But the sharp attacks of his last work, the Rinnovamento d'Italia, published in 1851, against the temporal power of the popes, and some other rash views, drew down upon him (January 14, 1852) the placing of all his writings on the Index by the Holy Office.

[22] Cf. ibid.

[23] Notably on September 19, 1852, in a letter addressed to the King of Piedmont.

[24] Lamartine, Harmonies poétiques, commentary on the "Hymne au Christ."

[25] Letter to Antoine de Latour.

As for the clergy as a whole, both secular and regular, the trials they had just gone through and the prospect of still greater ones, did but tighten the bonds of charity between them. This union made them, as in the first days of the Church, one heart and one soul. These feelings were nobly expressed in the letter which all the superiors of religious orders with houses in the Sardinian States sent from Rome to all the archbishops and bishops of the kingdom. They said: "In our tribulations you have become the buckler of the laws made by the Church to assure monastic vocations under the protection of the cloister."

This union of the monastic body and the episcopate under the supreme authority of the pope would now become especially necessary to face the persecutions which the events of 1850 to 1855 enabled them to foresee.

CHAPTER XXVII

The Church in Austria and Germany

PIUS IX was saddened at sight of the turn taken by the Italian national movement. He had but lately hoped to rule over it by his fatherly influence. But he saw it following the way of revolution and impiety. The power opposed to this movement, the Austrian Empire, born-protector of the Church and of the Holy See, did not spare him subjects of complaint.

Austria

Undoubtedly Austria, by its Constitution of 1848 and its concordat of 1855, seemed willing to abandon finally the Josephist traditions of its bureaucracy. But these legislative acts did not appreciably modify the fundamental tendencies of the court at Vienna and the Austrian administration. The Pope, on his part, still found serious matters of concern.

The revolution of 1848 had its repercussion in Austria. As in France, the consequences had at first been happy for the Catholic Church. In fact, the revolutionary outbreaks in Vienna and in the Austrian provinces in the spring of 1848 were caused by a demand for political rights in favor of the subjects of the Empire rather than by a demand for independence by the various nationalities (Slav, Hungarian, Croat, Albanian, Bohemian) that formed the amalgam of the state. But the movement, at least at the outset, was equally favorable to the cause of the political liberties, civil and religious, as it was to that of the national autonomies. Emperor Ferdinand (April 10, 1848) granted Hungary an Assembly to sit at Pest, the national capital, the official use of the Magyar language, a broadened, and in principle universal, suffrage, the abolition of feudal dues, and equality of taxation. The sovereign (April 25) promulgated at Vienna a Constitution copying the Belgian regime, establishing a parliament of two chambers, and indirect and electorally qualified suffrage.[1] The tyranny of the old Austrian bureaucracy seemed to be abolished for good.

This same Constitution of April 25, 1848, suppressed the ecclesiastical autocracy of the state, until then tied in with the bureaucracy. It guaranteed the free exercise of worship; and this principle of religious autonomy survived the Constitution itself. In fact, it was maintained even after the revocation of that Constitution by the ministerial decree of May 17 of the same year. Francis Joseph, succeeding his uncle Ferdinand (December 2, 1848), did not change it. At the beginning of the following year, the minister Schwarzenberg invited all the bishops depending on the crown to meet at Vienna to offer their proposals concerning the future relations of the Church and the state. On April 29, twenty-nine bishops, soon joined by six others, began their deliberations, and on June 15, they sent the result to the ministry. By ordinances of April 18 and 23, 1850, the placet was abolished, the dealings with Rome were declared free, as well as the full exercise of the disciplinary authority and of worship; the lawful control of the bishops over higher education was guaranteed.[2] Apparently Josephism was dead.

The fall of Metternich was not unrelated to this emancipation of the Catholic Church. We may well believe that the end had come to that double-faced policy which secretly, by force of the Josephist traditions, pestered the action of the Church and publicly fought against the revolution.[3] Cardinal Schwarzenberg,

[1] Lavisse and Rambaud, Histoire générale, XI, 109–15.

[2] Hergenroether, Histoire de l'Eglise, VII, 335.

[3] Metternich himself wrote: "For fifty years the moral situation of Austria has been this: it has been engaged in a secret war against the Church while at the same time it is in open war against the revolution" (Mémoires, VII, 34).

archbishop of Salzburg, wrote: "Millions of Austrian citizens hail the new order of things, not only because it guarantees them more political liberty, but also because it promises the Catholic Church the same impulses of liberty." [4]

Emperor Francis Joseph

This happy impression would not last. The new emperor, Francis Joseph, whose long reign would be marked by so many tragic events for which history must hold him responsible, was not the man destined to make a regime of liberty prevail in his kingdom and in the Church of Austria. He was personally violent, authoritarian, and sensual, with mediocre intelligence, not without shrewdness but without breadth of view and without loftiness of mind. In consequence of a systematic education, which aimed only at inculcating him with the traditions, way of acting, and thinking of a dynasty, he was the man of that dynasty, the Hapsburg, the guardian of a deposit, of a system of government for which he felt himself accountable only to God, to his ancestors, and to his heirs; in short, less a man than a personage, less a character than a link in a chain.[5] From the religious view, Francis Joseph of Hapsburg-Lorraine, emperor of Austria and apostolic king of Hungary, will increase the public testimonies of his piety and will contribute to giving an unheard-of splendor to the feasts of the Eucharistic Congress of Vienna in 1912. But he will die (1916) without being cleansed of the responsibility for a war which, according to the words of Pope Pius X, "stained his white hair with blood." His last will contains a public avowal of a misconduct that dishonored his home to his last days.[6]

[4] Wolfsgruber, Joseph Othmar, cardinal Rauscher, p. 98.

[5] See René Pinon, "François-Joseph" in Revue des Deux Mondes, January 1, 1917; Henry Wickam, The Monarchy of the Hapsburgs; Louis Eisenmann, Le compromis austro-hongrois.

[6] Following the death of Francis Joseph, the newspapers announced that he left in his will a million francs to a former actress, Mlle Catherine Schratt.

Under his reign, the public liberties granted by the Constitution of 1848 would not long continue. His first proclamation announced the intention of uniting all the countries of the monarchy into a great state. A Constitution which he granted, on his own authority, to the whole Empire (March 15, 1849) accorded personal and religious liberty to the citizens, but with capital restrictions. It proclaimed the rights of all nationalities, but without establishing any guaranty of them.[7] This Constitution was never applied. The crushing of Hungary, which had been in revolt since the summer of 1849, returned to the Empire a regime of strictly personal power, marked by the two traits of absolutism in government and Germanization in culture.[8]

By taking up all the traditions of his dynasty, Francis Joseph resumed those of Josephism. True, by a concordat concluded in 1855 he restored to the Church the jurisdiction over education, over marriage, and over such acts of civil life as directly affected the religious life.[9] But these attitudes were in vain. The provisions of the concordat clashed with the Josephist habits of the clergy and the police traditions of the bureaucracy. Part of the secular and regular clergy feared that, if it sought support from the Holy See against the civil encroachments, it would encounter the control which its morals, corrupted by wealth, made particularly necessary. The state dreaded that a clergy too zealous for the welfare of souls would soon cease to be a docile tool of the crown and of the bureaucracy. The Josephist spirit continued to prevail in the official Austro-Hungarian Church.[10]

[7] Eisenmann, op. cit., XI, 128.

[8] The German language became the official language of the Empire.

[9] For the text of the concordat, see Ami de la religion, CLXX, 424–31.

[10] The Austrian concordat, containing thirty-six articles, was promulgated in consistory by Pius IX on November 3, 1855, and by the Emperor of Austria two days later. "Pius IX, wishing to draw from this concordat all the good possible, thought he ought to address a brief to the bishops of the Austrian Empire, dated March 17, 1856. In this brief, praising the zeal and prudence of the venerable prelates, he urged them to take advantage of what the new legislation furnished them to preserve their diocesans from the harmful doctrines of rationalism and indifference.

Another subject of grief was given the Pope by Emperor Francis Joseph. In spite of the pressing exhortations of Pius IX, the imperial troops continued to hold Lombardy and Venetia under the oppressive yoke of Austria. The Emperor remained under the blow of severe reproaches addressed by the Sovereign Pontiff to his predecessor, when, in his letter of May 3, he begged His Apostolic Majesty to "withdraw his armies from a war which, powerless to conquer the hearts of the Lombards and Venetians," could end only in "a domination without glory and without happy results, since it rested solely on iron."

Germany

Another dark spot obscured the horizon of Christianity from the side of Austria. Notwithstanding its defects and faults, the monarchy of the Hapsburgs still represented Catholicism. But, since 1848, the question arose whether its power was going to be absorbed, in the project of a new Germany, by the growing might of Prussia, or even whether it would not be expelled from the federation that Prussia was dreaming of. For these plans of absorption or of exclusion of Austria, the reason was precisely the latter's official Catholicism. What the monarchy of the Hohenzollerns was already projecting was nothing less than a league of the Protestant sovereigns confronting Catholicism and Austria.[11] "Catholicism and enemy of Prussia," wrote Bismarck (January 20, 1854), "are synonymous terms." [12] Evidently if such a dream should be realized, "the Germany of the morrow would have neither the same outline nor the same denominational personality. With Austria at the top, the Ger-

---

But the concordat legislation, after being poorly observed, was at first partly violated by laws on marriage and on schools, then brutally abrogated by the public authorities" (A. Pougeois, Histoire de Pie IX, IV, 62).

[11] G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, III, 18.

[12] Briefe Bismarcks an Leop. von Gerlach, pp. 121–24.

manic body would present a Catholic face; cut off from Austria and seeking its basis at Berlin, it would take on the aspect of a Protestant power." [13]

Prussian Hegemony

The danger was real. It was all the greater since this design of a Germany grouped around Prussia and ruled over by her was the plan for a long time pursued by these secret societies which we have seen laboring for the ruin of the Catholic faith and the triumph of freethought.

The memoirs of General Lamarque show that this plan was already determined on in 1826.[14] Relating the interview he had at that time with Count Bismarck, he adds:

He has found the means of being received in all the secret societies of Italy and Germany, and he holds that these societies are undermining the ground on which the present social order rests. According to him, the Carbonari will attain their goal, which is to unite all Italy in a single power. This desire for union is also one of the chief aims of the Teutonic Society in Germany. The mysterious numbers 37 and 38, which it has adopted, signify that out of thirty-eight princes that shared the rule of Germany, there must be only one who will establish

[13] Goyau, op. cit., p. 14.

[14] A letter (1778) from Empress Maria Theresa to her daughter, the queen of France, was quoted in 1868 in a lawsuit of the press at Darmstadt against the paper Hessiche Volksblaetter. According to this letter, the plan of Prussian dictatorship over all Germany went back to Frederick II, the head and propagator of the Masonic lodges in Germany, the great correspondent of the Masons in France. "Everyone knows in Europe to what extent we may count on the King of Prussia and what account is to be taken of his word. France has been able to perceive the situation in different circumstances. And yet see the sovereign who has the pretention of raising himself to be protector and dictator of Germany. What is even more extraordinary is that the powers do not think of joining together to prevent such an evil, from which, sooner or later, all will have to suffer the harmful consequences. What I have just said concerns all the powers of Europe. The future does not appear to me bright. . . . If this Prussian beginning is allowed to gain ground, what may be expected by those who will some day succeed us?" Quoted by Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 4.

the constitutional regime and who will lay the foundation of liberty. Which one is this prince, who should succeed so many others and make only one state out of so many states? He is known only to the adepts of the great directive circle.[15]

The secret was not hard to penetrate for anyone who knew even a little about the organization of the secret societies at that time. Frederick William III and his ministers were deeply involved in the Tugendbund, which was given to patriotic tendencies strangely mixed with Masonic ideas. Since 1821 all German Masonry was converging toward Berlin; it had become a sort of branch of the administration, conducted to a determined end with the rigidity proper to the Prussian bureaucracy.[16]

In 1848 the union of Germany was on the point of being realized. The creation of a Prussian empire that would separate France from Russia was the objective of Lord Palmerston. The Masonic paper, the Globe, in its August 18, 1849, number, set forth the program of the English statesman: destruction of the arbitrary and artificial structure erected by the Congress of Vienna, and the reconstitution of Europe by the erection of a vigorous German kingdom, with Prussia for its center. The eminent Bishop of Mainz has related that, when at that time he was elected a deputy to the parliament of Frankfort, a personage of high rank declared to him that the chief mission of the parliament was to extend the frontiers of Prussia to the Main, and that his duty as a deputy was to concur in this plan. The prelate adds: "I am now certain that this man was not expressing a personal opinion, but that he had adopted the thought of a secret society." [17]

We have treated at some length this political question of the Prussian hegemony in Germany. We have done so because, as later events show, it was destined to have a considerable influence on the religious history of the nineteenth and the twentieth century. To substitute Prussian domination for that of Austria in Germany was to substitute the Protestant influence for the Catholic influence; to strengthen, in the heart of Europe, the German Empire thus remade, was to favor the spread of Luther's religion in the world.

[15] Mémoires du général Lamarque, II, 4.

[16] Deschamps, op. cit., p. 400.

[17] Ketteler, Deutschland nach dem Krieg von 1866.

Since 1848 this plan had been that of the king of Prussia, Frederick William IV. Unquestionable evidence of this fact is to be found in the private and diplomatic documents of the time, published later. The Berlin government, in its domestic policy, will at first have nothing but flattering smiles for the Catholics; it will even grant them real liberties, to such a point that the Church, deceived for a moment, will indicate to the different rulers the King of Prussia as an example to be followed. But the favors granted in the realm of domestic policy have often been, for the despotic powers, merely the means of veiling the outrages contrived by their foreign policy.[18] This latter, by its very nature, easily escapes the notice of public opinion.[19] However, in 1854 the Feuilles historico-politiques of Munich wrote that, wherever occasion offered to wound or mistreat the Church, "we must suspect the Prussian influence, and the thoughts of Prussian hegemony." [20]

We would be mistaken if we were to believe that the definite exclusion of the Catholic influence in Germany, to the advantage of the Protestant influence, dates from the crushing of [18] At the beginning of his reign Napoleon III will give satisfaction to the conservative party by having religion, property, and public order respected, while its foreign policy will be contrary to the interests of religion and will always be inspired by the feeling which in 1845 prompted the signing of a plan of German unification. (See the document in Deschamps, op. cit., II, 401.) But the policy of the French Emperor will be less consistently pursued in this direction; it will have happy reversals; it will not proceed hand in hand with that of the Prussian King.

[19] Men like Ketteler and Diepenbrock still hoped in 1852 for an intervention by the King of Prussia in favor of the Catholics of Baden. Cf. Pfuele, Ketteler, I, 252; Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, IV, 28.

[20] Quoted by Goyau, op. cit., III, 18.

Austria by Prussia in 1866. The military Sadowa was preceded by an intellectual Sadowa. As the historian of L'Allemagne religieuse wrote:

> Between her prostration at Olmütz and her victory at Sadowa, Prussia won over Austria, progressively, insensibly, silently, a first victory, at the beginning unperceived by the military general staffs and even by many diplomats. That victory, won on the banks of the Isar, was the moral conquest, not merely of the Bavarian people, but of the Bavarian intelligence, and the formation at Munich of a liberal-national party sharply hostile to Catholicism and to Austria. Therein is to be found the result of the reign of Max. Legends were current according to which the King in vain personally gave a conspicuous example: if Dahlmann, his former professor at Goettingen, had not dissuaded him, he would have become a Protestant. Moreover, he would have tried to receive the Masonic initiation, without the advice of the minister Sfordten, who considered it inopportune. Bound to the Catholic religion by his royal dignity, by the precedents of his house, and by the susceptibilities of his people, Max took his revenge by surrounding himself with advisers all of whom belonged to Protestantism.[21]

One of those advisers was the celebrated historian Heinrich von Sybel, whom a certain writer without any sympathy for Catholicism calls a "Homais of patriotism." [22] Sybel wrote in 1847 that to be ultramontane and a German patriot are two things mutually exclusive.[23]

Bismarck

In 1847 Prince Bismarck entered into the affairs of government. That same year marked the beginning of practical realization of Prussian hegemony in Germany. Otto Leopold von Bismarck-Schoenhausen was born at Schoenhausen in the

[21] Ibid., p. 24.
[22] Ernest Denis, La fondation de l'empire allemand, p. 132.
[23] Guilland, L'Allemagne nouvelle et ses historiens, p. 159.

March of Brandenburg in 1815. At the age of thirty-two he already had that authoritarian attitude, that cold and inflexible manner, that hard look, and, beneath a heavy moustache, that sarcastic line of the lips, which grew more pronounced with age, when the success of his undertakings added to his features an expression of satisfied pride and fierce triumph. The moral character corresponded to the physical. His letters and likewise his speeches were filled with strong figures, sharp retorts, brutal sallies. A skeptic and cynic, he despised men and was accustomed to say that all men had a price if you offered it to them. With much force he asserted his belief in God; but he easily rid himself of the burden of morality. "Scruples did not halt him, any more than did rancor; for him treaties were merely transient combinations, and he judged them outworn as soon as he had drawn from them all the desired advantages." [24] "Conflicts," he said, "become merely a question of might. Whoever has the might goes ahead." This expression was formulated by Count Schwerin in the famous formula, "Might surpasses right."

Bismarck was a Christian in a way. But assuredly he was more German than Christian, and more Prussian than German. He was prepared to subordinate everything to his double objective: Prussia's domination over Germany, and Germany's domination over the world. He said: "Prussia's material importance does not correspond to its intellectual importance. . . . The history of Prussia for a hundred years represents only a series of missed opportunities." By "missed opportunities" he was referring to the neglect Prussia had shown in failing to establish her hegemony in Germany. Moreover, as soon as he attained to power, he went straight toward his goal, rushing on his foes with imperturbable daring. In the Diet the representative of Austria had some exceptional prerogatives. Among other privileges, he alone had the right to smoke there. Bismarck handed him a long cigar and boldly asked the Austrian ambassador for a light. Bismarck's whole character is exemplified in this little incident. The affair of the cigar won for him a prestige among the diplomats. Thereafter nothing remained that he would not dare to try. In a famous report he wrote: "The unity of Germany will be realized, not by speeches or majority decisions, but by steel and blood." That unity will indeed be realized by three wars: by the defeat of Denmark in 1864, by the crushing of Austria in 1866, and by the victory over France in 1870–1871.

[24] Ernest Denis, in Histoire générale, XI, 318.

Catholicism in Prussia

In the presence of such schemes, what had been the attitude of German Catholics? Most of these men gladly accepted them, even enthusiastically praising the idea of the unification of Germany. But they rejected the idea of a unified Germany that would have Berlin for its capital and that would exclude or absorb Catholic Austria. The Rhineland deputy August Reichensperger became the eloquent defender of this view, which would set up a Catholic "Great Germany" beside a Protestant "Little Germany" distinct from each other by their elements and their aims. Later on, a new idea sprang up among the Catholics as being more in conformity with the state of minds and more easily practical: that of a German unity based on the freedom of the Churches. But the situation facing Catholicism was so different in the different realms that it needed to be the object of a special study for each of the principal states.

In Prussia the attitude of the Catholics was at first hesitant, anxious. On one side, upon hearing statesmen like Bismarck so loudly affirming the identity of the Prussian idea and the Protestant idea, they wondered whether they were not going to be subjected to the lot of their Belgian brethren in the Netherlands and of their Irish brethren in England. On the other side, the liberties granted to the Catholics in Prussia seemed such as to reassure them.

The status of the Catholic Church in Prussia had, in fact, just been regulated by the Constitution itself. The constitutional act of 1848 proclaimed the autonomy of the Churches. The Prussian bishops at once profited by this declaration to correspond freely with the pope and to confer ecclesiastical benefices on their own authority. The Constitution of February 5, 1850, confirmed these liberties. Article 12 declared that "the Evangelical Church, the Roman Church, and the other religious societies were free to organize their affairs by themselves." Article 13 permitted them to communicate freely with their heads. Article 15 renounced the right of the Prussian state to intervene in ecclesiastical appointments.

These provisions favorable to the Roman Church had been inspired by political views, rather than by a spirit of kindness toward Catholicism. They formed part of the liberal Constitution issuing, in Prussia as elsewhere, from the liberal movement of 1848. Besides, Prussia, to succeed in her design of domination over Germany, needed first of all to conciliate the sympathy of the Catholic party, which might offer formidable opposition to that design. But these clever calculations, which later events clearly brought to light, were not altogether evident. The Catholics of Prussia, the Roman court itself, could be fooled in the matter.

Openly and wholeheartedly the Church in Prussia rejoiced. Pius IX gave it two cardinals, Diepenbrock of Breslau and Geissel of Cologne. The Prussian Church, beguiled and grateful, assisted at the honors which the papal nuncio of Vienna (Viale-Prelà) received at Bresslau when (November, 1850) he brought the cardinalitial insignia to Diepenbrock. Prussia had for a long time refused recognition to every papal envoy, regarding him as a messenger of Antichrist; now in that Prussia both military officers and government dignitaries joined officially in the ceremonies that celebrated the presence of Viale-Prelà. At Berlin, for the first time since the Reformation, a Corpus Christi procession, led by the pastor Ketteler, made its way along the Unter den Linden. As you might have read in the Civiltà cattolica, "The movement of Germany toward Catholicism is today so strong that the peoples and the governments yield to a common impulse, without perhaps taking account of it themselves." [25]

Many of the works of charity in which Catholic Germany glories date from these first years of freedom: for example, at Berlin the St. Hedwig Hospital, founded for fifty patients in 1846, five years later was reorganized by Ketteler in a new structure and at once provided 300 beds; at Munster the St. Vincent de Paul Fraternity in 1849 embraced 1,300 generous Catholics to advise on the placing of poor children. The diocese received the Vincentians in 1851, the Franciscans in 1853. These were preceded by the Jesuits, whose first novitiate was opened in Westphalia in 1850. Big missions were begun: those of Cologne in 1850, of Heidelberg in 1851, of Frankfort in 1852, of Augsburg in 1853. These deeply stirred the religious atmosphere of Germany.[26] Some noble minds abjured their Protestantism and increased the number of apologists of the Roman Church. Of this number were the celebrated Countess Ida von Hahn-Hahn, and the future sociologist Vogelsang, who founded the Christian social school in Austria. A large association was founded under the patronage of St. Boniface with the aim of grouping the Catholics together, coordinating their efforts, and supporting their apostolic labors with financial assistance.

By giving freedom to the Catholic Church, Frederick William IV probably did not expect such progress. The Protestant Church took alarm. In 1851 the Gazette de la Weser said:

[25] Civiltà cattolica, December, 1851, p. 707.
[26] G. Goyau, op. cit., III, 180–91.

"Anyone would have to be blind not to see what dangers Protestantism is running." [27] In August, 1852, the meeting of the Gustavus Adolphus Society [28] called the attention of the Protestants to the gravity of the situation. In September the Protesant congress of Bremen passed a similar declaration.

The Catholics told themselves that they had the Constitution on their side. They thought that to touch the Constitution would be to arouse the liberal party against the government; that the King would not dare attempt anything of that sort. Consequently they were often led to contend side by side with the liberals, at times even coalescing with them, to defend, against the too narrow interpretations of the conservatives, the text of the Act which had given them liberty. As at that very time the Catholics of France were doing in their campaign for freedom of education, so the Catholics of Germany, while rejecting doctrinal liberalism, took their stand boldly on the ground of the liberal Constitution and of the common law.[29] For themselves they demanded no right that they did not at the same time claim for others. August Reichensperger more than once intervened in the Chamber to defend the injured rights of the Protestants.[30] This policy brought to him and to his colleagues of the Chamber a real popularity. In 1852, the group of Catholic deputies sitting in the Prussian Chamber numbered seventy and was a political power that had to be reckoned with.

The Constitution was always their basis, their great argument. They did not suspect that at the side of the Prussian King a minister without conscience, Bismarck, would feel himself but little inconvenienced by a constitutional text, on the day when he might think that reasons of state would call upon him to infringe on it; that he had already worked out his famous [27] Quoted by the Civiltà cattolica of August 11–September 1, 1851.

[28] This Society was founded in 1843 to sustain the small Protestant centers in Catholic countries. The King of Prussia accepted the office of its protector.

[29] Pastor, Reichensperger, I, 337, 356.

[30] Goyau, op. cit., III, 246–48.

theory of the "constitutional gaps." This theory consisted in cleverly putting himself in a case that he presented as not foreseen by the constitutional text, and then in solving it according to his own pleasure.[31]

Bismarck's Policy

For Bismarck one principle dominated the Constitution, namely, that the Prussian state was a Protestant state. Thus he considered as not admissible that he should allow the formation in its bosom of a grouping of Catholics that might constitute a state within the state. Prussia could not suffer within it the Roman Church following its own laws. Moreover, in Bismarck's mind the alliance of a certain number of liberal Protestants with the Catholic faction was unpardonable. He conceived the Machiavellian plan of compromising the two parties, one by the other. The order was issued to discredit among the people the liberal Protestants as allied to the Jesuits and to denounce to the court of Rome the Catholics compromised in the liberal movement.

This maneuver was only the preliminary move. What Bismarck wished was the complete ruin or at least the absolute subjection of Catholicism in Germany. "With the ultramontanes," he said, "every concession produced the effect of a partial payment, an encouragement. . . . The invading spirit that prevails in the Catholic camp will force us to engage in a pitched battle."

Frederick William IV finally entered into these views. This prince was sincerely opposed to the growing rationalism and to the Hegelian pantheism, the moral consequences of which he dreaded. Hence he intended to raise up, against these dangerous theories, an effective dike by reconstituting German Protestantism on solid foundations. Two tendencies, however, appeared among the theologians of the Reformation. The "theology of conciliation" or "the unionist theology," erected on the foundations laid by Schleiermacher and Neander, attempted to find a just mean between the orthodox Lutheran theologians and the liberal theologians, inclined to rationalism. It strove to get its views accepted by the Revue de la science et de la vie chrétienne, founded in 1850. On the other hand the "neo-Lutheran theology" endeavored to win acceptance for the dogmas of primitive Lutheranism by giving them a form accommodated to the spirit of the age. The neo-Lutheran theology prevailed in the universities.

[31] Accordingly, when the Chamber plainly showed its dissatisfaction with the royal policy by refusing to pass the budget, Bismarck ignored it and governed against the majority, declaring brazenly that the Constitution had not foreseen the case where the Parliament would refuse the necessary funds.

The King of Prussia at first tried to maintain the peace between the two Protestant parties by a see-saw policy. At one time he gave satisfaction to the party of the Lutheran creed by concessions, at another time he endeavored to restrain it. He was tired of these fluctuations when, in 1852, the congress of Bremen gave him to understand in a brutal way that the only real ground of union between the Protestants was the strife against Rome. This view was a resumption of an idea cherished by Bunsen. According to this idea a vast Evangelical society must be formed to form a counterweight to the Church of Rome.[32]

The first act of political oppression against the Catholic Church was the concession to the Evangelical Church of a series of budgetary favors.[33] Then followed an undertaking of secret negotiations between the Holy See and the Prussian government. These attempts made the Pope hope for the conclusion of a concordat. In the spring of 1853 Manteuffel even seemed inclined to place at the service of the Holy See the political influence of Prussia over the other states of Germany. Whether the Roman diplomacy surmised the double game of the Prussian diplomacy,[34] or whether other currents prevailed at Berlin, these negotiations suddenly ceased in 1854. Undoubtedly Bismarck was putting on a sort of rehearsal of the diplomatic comedy which he would later play as chancellor of the Empire and by which he would try to arouse a criticism by the Pope against the center.[35]

[32] On the organization of German Protestantism during the reign of Frederick William IV, see Hergenroether, Histoire de l'Eglise, VIII, 66–73.

[33] Goyau, op. cit., III, 255.

We may consider 1854 as the date of the start of Prussia's strife against Catholicism, a strife destined to become widely known under the name of Kulturkampf. It found the Catholics ready to resist. This resistance, directed by a man of high worth, was both able and courageous. Until the day when an exaggerated national pride changed its haughty independence, it won for the German Catholics the honor of being proposed as models for the Catholics of other nations.

Bishop von Ketteler

In the grand duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, in the duchy of Nassau, in the kingdom of Würtemberg, and in the grand duchy of Baden, the strife had already broken out. Particularly in Baden it reached a tragic intensity. Not only did the courts of Darmstadt, Wiesbaden, Stuttgart, and Karlsruhe follow in 1848 the example of Prussia, but since 1820 they had agreed to maintain the same religious policy, the policy of a vexatious and tyrannical bureaucracy. The sovereign, supreme head of the Protestant establishment, claimed the same prerogatives over the Catholic Church. The old Josephist spirit was there completely prevalent.

[34] At the time when Manteuffel was making these advances, Bismarck, in the name of Prussia, was dissuading the grand duke of Baden from coming to an understanding with Rome for a peaceful religious settlement.

[35] Goyau, op. cit., III, 272.

In the summer of 1850, in Hesse-Darmstadt began the struggle of the Catholics to win their liberties. This strife was carried on under the leadership of the valiant Bishop Ketteler of Mainz. This Baron William Emmanuel von Ketteler, born at Munster in 1811, had at first worn the embroidered uniform of referendary at the court of Saxony. The anti-Catholic persecutions (1834–1838) made him conscious of his priestly vocation. At the age of thirty he began his theological studies. He was ordained priest three years later. His first appointment was as curate at Beckum, a little town of 4,000 inhabitants, then in 1846 he was appointed to take charge of a rural parish of Hopsten, which had about 2,000 souls. For about four years Emmanuel von Ketteler was a model country priest. His works of social doctrines were a sort of forerunner of his later advanced theories. The electors of 1848 sent him to the Frankfort parliament. In a long open letter to his electors, he showed that he was opposed to the centralizing policy. "So long as the family and the commune can suffice for themselves," he said, "they ought to be left their free autonomy. Let the people themselves regulate communal affairs: they will make the experience an apprenticeship for the political life and will acquire the capacity that gives man the feeling of his responsibility." The new deputy would sit on the extreme left and he asked "the greatest possible liberty for all, including the Catholics." [36]

Ketteler, however, had little confidence in purely political arrangements. In his mind the political question was overshadowed by the social question, and this by the religious question. This doctrine was what he set forth (November and December, 1848) in six eloquent sermons delivered at Mainz,[37] after resigning as deputy to devote himself exclusively to the work of [36] J. Lionnet, Un évêque social, Ketteler, p. 25.

[37] These sermons will be found in Decurtins, Œuvres choisies de Mgr Ketteler; Lionnet, op. cit., pp. 28–39, gives a summary of them.

his priestly ministry. Shortly afterward, he was called to direct the important and sole Catholic parish in Berlin, established under the patronage of St. Hedwig .Tirelessly he spent himself in the capital of Prussia, as he had done in the little village of Hopsten. Then the choice of Pius IX appointed him to the episcopal see of Mainz, long before made illustrious by the great apostle of Germany, St. Boniface.[38]

As soon as he was installed (July, 1850), the new bishop displayed in the exercise of his office the apostolic activity which his earlier labors might have predicted. The foundation of a seminary and the holding of annual pastoral retreats awakened the sacerdotal spirit, which for some time had slumbered. Congregations of men and of women, confraternities, and charitable associations, braving the vexations of Josephism, were founded here and there. Ketteler traversed his entire diocese, stirring the zeal of some, quieting the misunderstandings or disagreements of others, sustaining everyone by his counsels. This feudal lord, in his first pastoral to his flock, laid before them the vow of poverty; and this vow he himself held to manifestly.

The progress of Catholicism in the diocese of Mainz began to arouse the complaints of the Protestants and to disturb the bureaucracy of the grand duchy of Hesse. Without being unduly concerned with these agitations and disturbances, the earnest prelate thought to extend his action beyond his diocese of Mainz. If the sovereigns agreed together to maintain their religious policy, why should not the bishops join together on their side for the defense of the rights of the Church? The Rhineland bishops, under the guidance of their venerable metropolitan, responded to his appeal, as did also Archbishop Vicari of Frieburg im Breisgau.

[38] Cf. Goyau, op. cit., IV, 11. Pius IX appointed Ketteler, disregarding the wishes of the Mainz chapter and of the court of Hesse-Darmstadt. Cf. also Lionnet, op. cit., p. 43.

The Rhineland Bishops

Hermann Vicari, born in 1773, was then about eighty years old. While a young man he had been installed in the office of the episcopal chancery of Constance. Later at Freiburg, under Archbishop Demeter, he valiantly sustained the cause of the canon law in the question of mixed marriages. He was a pious priest, with a gentle disposition, ready for outbursts of cheerfulness, even more ready in outbursts of charity. His charity was boundless; his amiability was perfectly frank.[39] His close circle and undoubtedly he himself would have been astonished if, when he answered Ketteler's appeal, anyone had predicted that the affair in which he was engaged would soon lead him to assume the role of confessor of the faith.

In 1850 one of his priests, Professor Hirscher, invited the Upper Chamber of Baden to follow the example of Prussia and furnish the Archbishop of Freiburg with the necessary funds for the creation of the seminaries that he needed. The Upper Chamber applauded him; but the second Chamber, perhaps obeying governmental solicitations, refused his request.

In March of the next year, the bishops of the ecclesiastical province of the Rhine, encouraged by a brief which Pius IX addressed to them (July 25, 1850), met at Freiburg under the presidency of their metropolitan, Hermann Vicari. There they considered the events of the Baden parliament, and also all the denials of justice and all the administrative vexations which they had been obliged to undergo from the little states included in the ecclesiastical region which they represented. The result of their deliberations was a petition which each of them presented to his respective government. They asked that they be made teachers of their clerics, that they be allowed to found Catholic schools, and that they be permitted to administer the property of the Church without hindrance.

[39] Goyau, op. cit., IV, 38.

Eleven months later, when none of the governments had given a reply to their petition, the bishops met a second time at Freiburg and openly protested against "a system whose practice would involve the ruin of the Church in the province." The Rhineland states saw in this statement the beginning of an open strife against their religious policy. In this they were not mistaken. In May, 1851, Ketteler, by virtue of the independence which the natural law and the divine law assured to the exercise of purely spiritual power, opened a seminary without asking any authorization from the Hesse government. A year later, when the Baden ministry requested the Archbishop of Freiburg to give a funeral service for Grand Duke Leopold, who died a Protestant, Vicari refused to celebrate the service, alleging the laws of the Catholic Church. The angered government tried to bear down on the priests. Out of 800 priests, 740 gave the same refusal as their archbishop.

On March 5, 1853, the four governments of Hesse, Nassau, Würtemberg, and Baden decided to reply to the episcopal memorials of 1851 and 1852. They rejected all the requests in toto and in detail. Vicari replied to this act of the government by informing the Baden ministry that the Catholic bishops had resolved to govern their dioceses freely and to freely administer the ecclesiastical possessions. Almost at the same time they made appointments to parishes without referring the matter to the government of Darmstadt; Bishop Blum of Limburg acted in the same way without previous notice to the Grand Duke of Nassau; the bishops of Würtemberg took the same attitude.

Bishop Vicari

The Grand Duke tried to cut short the movement of independence. This he did by issuing (November 7, 1853) a decree prescribing that "no ordinance made by the archbishop of Freiburg would be recognized in any way if its publication had not been expressly authorized by him as Grand Duke of Baden or by a commissioner especially named by him." On November 11 Vicari replied by excommunicating nominatim the royal commissioner, named Burger. The government forbade the episcopal sentence to be read in the pulpit and attempted to terrorize the clergy and the people by proceeding to a large number of arrests. The population of Baden, despite the insufficiency of a clergy too submissive to governmental influences, had remained devout. The persecution revived the zeal of the lukewarm. Alban Stolz wrote: "With the good Catholics, to have been imprisoned is considered almost a glory." In vain the government resorted to one of those base tricks that dishonor any regime. The Jesuits were told that they would be spared if they would blame the acts of the Archbishop. But the Jesuits preferred to desert Freiburg rather than desert the cause of the head of the diocese.[40] The aged bishop seemed to become young again in the fight. In replying to the messages addressed to him by the Catholics of all the nations of Europe,[41] he used words worthy of an Athanasius, a Chrysostom, a Hilary. His words were so touching that Döllinger could not hear them without weeping.

Some independent Prostestants, such as Leo and Gerlach, were grateful to Vicari for having dared to say that the affairs of the Church concern only the Church. Such a movement was of a nature to alarm the government of Baden. It even wondered whether the religious agitation was going to turn toward Austria certain Catholic populations that were in former times subjects of the Hapsburgs. The court of Vienna offered its diplomatic mediation to appease the differences. Such an undertaking must be forestalled. Ketteler was sounded out, and he consented to enter into discussions with the representatives of the different states. An understanding might have been reached in that year 1854; but certain obstacles intervened on the side of Prussia. Its Catholics appealed to the Church legislation in Prussia as a model in comparison with the different Protestant states. Bismarck, who was then, as representative of King Frederick William, at the Diet of Frankfort, strongly pleaded the cause of Protestantism, which he said was threatened by the Catholic agitation. He was so successful that he obtained not only the suspension of the parleys, but also his being sent to Karlsruhe and Nassau.

[40] Goyau, op. cit., IV, 45.

[41] Friedrich, Döllinger, III, 135. Cf. Ami de la religion, December 1, 1853, p. 521; Correspondant, December 25, 1853, p. 442; Montalembert, Œuvres, V, 239–41.

When he left these two cities, the desire for an understanding was replaced, in the minds of the two rulers, by the intention to prosecute to the utmost the repression of every manifestation judged hostile to the government. On May 19, 1854, Vicari, accused of fostering disobedience, was declared under arrest and was kept secluded in his residence. All communication with his clergy was forbidden. This hateful outrage did but add to the popularity of the aged bishop. Without any concerted organization, the faithful went into mourning, suspended every festivity, every rejoicing, so long as their bishop should remain imprisoned. This unanimous manifestation, silent and persistent, which was felt to have come from the depth of the consciences, disturbed the governments more than a riotous uprising would have done. The courts of Baden, Nassau, Hesse, and Würtemberg returned to their plans of appeasement.

A messenger of King William of Würtemberg at first, then an agent of the prince regent of Baden, then some deputies from Nassau and Hesse, set out for Rome in 1855. The example of the concordat concluded with Austria that same year was not without influence on the result of the negotiations. These resulted, in 1857 for Würtemberg, in 1859 and 1860 for Baden and the other states involved in the conflicts, in the conclusion of concordats which, in their main lines, gave satisfaction to the episcopal grievances of 1851 and 1853. The bureaucracy was beaten. But the Catholic Churches of these different states would see rising before them another absolutism, that of the Chambers, that of the ministries, and in this way would undergo persecutions no less grievous.[42]

[42] In the account of the persecutions of the Church in Germany, we have been much indebted to the excellent work of Georges Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme. We shall have occasion to utilize this same work when we take up again the account of the religious struggles in Germany.

CHAPTER XXVIII

The Church in Other Countries

Switzerland

In Switzerland similar attempts at religious oppression were met with similar resistance, and the courage of Bishop Vicari had its counterpart in that of Bishop Marilley. We have seen how the attacks of the radical party on the old federal constitution of Switzerland brought about, in 1846, the formation of a defensive league on the part of the seven Catholic and conservative cantons of Lucerne, Uri, Schwytz, Unterwalden, Zug, Fribourg, and Valais. This league took the name of Sonderbund ("separation alliance").

On July 20, 1847, the federal Diet pronounced the dissolution of the Sonderbund. It also ordered that the Jesuits, to whom the radicals attributed the origin of the resistance, should be expelled from the canton of Lucerne. The charge against the Society of Jesus was not justified. Duke Victor de Broglie shortly afterward, when declaring himself the foe of the Jesuits, affirmed in the Chamber of Peers, after inquiry: "During the thirty years that these religious have been in Switzerland, no possibility existed of finding or supposing any fact whatever on which to rest a ground to justify their expulsion." [1] On July 22 the seven cantons published a protest against the measures adopted by the Diet, which seemed to them to violate the federal pact. The twelve cantons forming the majority replied by raising an army of 50,000 men commanded by General Dufour, who, on November 10, made a military occupation of the canton of Fribourg. One after the other the seven cantons, invaded by forces superior to those at their disposal, capitulated. On November 29 the last of the insurgent cantons made its submission.

[1] Montalembert, Œuvres, II, 682.

Almost everywhere the victory of the radicals was accompanied with outrageous excesses. On January 14, 1848, Montalembert in the House of Peers, questioning the government of Louis Philippe on its non-intervention in the affairs of Switzerland, said:

> Have you not seen the so-called regular authorities strike down one after the other all the congregations that were left standing, the bishops and the curé despoiled, . . . the Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul shamelessly driven out like wild beasts, without compensation? Is this outrage all? No. At the present moment perhaps a Civil Constitution of the Clergy has been passed, copied after ours of 1790. . . . But the Catholic religion is not the only one they turned against. . . . On November 24 a decree explicitly forbade to be practiced, in the canton of Vaud, any worship but the self-styled national worship. And do you know what is the state of freedom of the press in that same canton of Vaud? Forbidden is the publication of even simple news items contrary to the national interests. O fatherland of liberty! [2]

Once again the persecutors of the Catholic Church showed themselves the worst enemies of true liberty.

The federal Constitution of September 13, 1848, which issued from the crisis we have just recounted, marks a notable transformation in the political regime of Switzerland. The central power was strongly organized, and the power of the cantons was notably diminished. As for the religious question, the leader of the victorious party, James Fazy, an admirer of American liberalism, wished to destroy the close alliance of the so-called national Church and the state, which for three centuries made the government of Geneva a Protestant theocracy.

[2] Ibid., pp. 683–86. This speech of Montalembert is considered one of his most beautiful oratorical masterpieces.

But the main body of his party did not let him carry out his idea. In fact, an article was put in the Constitution, which recognized the freedom of religions so far as it would not be contrary to the public peace and the maintenance of order between the different denominations. But if they showed themselves liberal in theory, in practice they were far from being so. The Jesuit order was banned; on several occasions the government resorted to the shabbiest and most odious proceedings to afflict the Catholic Church and her ministers.

On August 15, 1848, the five cantons (Geneva, Fribourg, Vaud, Berne, and Neuchâtel) composing the diocese of Geneva and Lausanne had concluded, by way of concordat, an accord regarding the relations of the Catholic Church with the civil power. The five states reserved to themselves the nomination of the bishops, who had to take the oath of obedience to the Constitution and to all the laws of their canton. The candidates for the priesthood had to pass an examination before a mixed commission. The government's placet was required for "postulation to benefices" and for the exercise of any episcopal office; the exequatur for any notice coming from the Holy See; and reservations were made against the admission of the decisions of the Council of Trent.[3]

When publishing this document, the Observateur de Genève, the organ of the Catholics, said: "Everywhere the Catholics must declare: Non possumus. They should add, with the same firmness: Non volumus. And, if persecution must be undergone, like the marytrs of former times, ah well, we shall see." The clergy of Geneva, meeting in conference, solemnly denounced, in the form of a letter addressed to their bishop, "the appearance of a plan subversive of the divine constitution of the Church." On September 18, 1848, Bishop Marilley of Lausanne and Geneva in a letter protested against the oath which the people of Fribourg were about to be called upon to take to the Constitution. Summoned three times to withdraw his protest, the prelate declared that, following the example of the apostles, he "must obey God rather than men."

[3] For the complete text of the concordat, see Ami de la religion, September 10, 1848, p. 722.

On September 30, Cardinal Soglia, Secretary of State of Pius IX, likewise protested, in the name of the Pope. This he did especially against the right which the five cantons took to themselves to nominate the bishops and against the obligation which they assumed to impose on the faithful the taking of an oath to a Constitution contrary to the rights of the Church. The government replied by arresting (October 25) Bishop Marilley, taking him by force from Fribourg, and interning him in the castle of Chillon. The Fribourg Council of State declared that it would take the necessary measures for the provisional administration of the diocese. But the clergy and the faithful never recognized any other spiritual authority but that of their bishop, who, from the depth of his exile, continued to direct the affairs of his diocese. In December, 1852, the governments of Geneva and of Fribourg, powerless to sever the bond that united the prelate to his flock, decided to enter upon negotiations with Rome. But as Pius IX required, preliminary to any negotiation, the liberation of the Bishop, the Swiss authorities withdrew their project. Bishop Marilley did not return to Fribourg until 1856.

Religious Condition of Switzerland

Whence came, in Switzerland, that religious intolerance which recalled the worst days of the time of Calvin? It sprang from several causes. Switzerland, from the beginning of the nineteenth century, had become the rendezvous of numerous members of the secret societies, who there forcibly injected their spirit of hostility toward Catholicism. The influence exercised in Switzerland by the philosophy of Germany, from which the universities of Basel, Berne, and Zurich obtained their professors, led, by another route, to similar results. The Christian faith, ruined in its foundations, was lost in an anarchy where twenty different sects—Mormon, Anabaptist, Irvingist, Darbyite—professed the strangest doctrines, sometimes most harmful to society. The need of a reaction was felt. The coming to power of the radical party, which fought for political centralization, favored this reaction. But centralizing tendencies, when they are excessive, easily turn to despotism. This change is what happened. All the Churches, except the so-called national Church, were victims of a real persecution, which struck particularly the Catholic Church, which Protestant radicalism considered its most dread adversary.

However, along with the authoritarian and persecuting movement, was another movement which tended to promote the renaissance or, as it was then called in Switzerland, the religious revival, by completely opposite means. Connected by its origin with the teaching started at Geneva in 1832 by Merle d'Aubigné and still farther back with the "Evangelical Society" founded in 1816 in that same city by some English Methodists, this movement was especially represented by a noble spirit, Alexander Vinet. Without ever repudiating the fundamental principles of Protestantism, Vinet tried to regenerate it in two ways: by freeing it from its connections to the state and by more closely connecting it to faith in Christ, true man and true God. Says Saint-René Taillandier: "We see him attack the system of national Churches with equal dignity and vigor; we see him call for the separation of the spiritual from the temporal in the name of the interests of the soul." [4] He was, says Sainte-Beuve, the principal defender of religious liberty at Lausanne; he took up the right of those who were being persecuted.[5] Alexander Vinet spoke with a tenderness which showed a trace of regret, of the flowers of holiness blossoming in the Catholic Church, and he expressed himself on the divinity of Christ in terms marked with the most tender feeling. "I do not understand," he said, "the vague and indiscernible God of the poet Lamartine. He has no feet that I can bathe with my tears, no knees that I can embrace, no eyes in which I can read my grace, no mouth that can pronounce it. He is not a man, and I have need of a God-man." [6]

[4] In the Revue des Deux Mondes, January 15, 1864.

[5] Sainte-Beuve, Portraits contemporains, II, 11.

Vinet's personal influence was considerable. Out of 250 ecclesiastics forming the hierarchy of the "national Church," he withdrew 180 of them. They were at once replaced in the Church which they left. Then they founded at Lausanne a "free Church," which had its special school of theology. But this via media was not more tenable than that which Newman had attempted in England. In the space of twenty years it recruited not more than 3,000 members and often had to bear the hostility of the government and the ridicule of the people. Alexander Vinet died in 1847 at the age of fifty years. His disciples, mocked by their adversaries under the name of "mummers" (from "mummery," grimace, dissimulation), finally accepted this title.

England

We have just mentioned Newman and the Oxford Movement. This movement, although more powerful and much deeper than that which Vinet had created in Switzerland, thereafter developed in England as if by two streams. A number of "tractarians," following in Newman's footsteps, turned toward Rome; others, under the leadership of Pusey, labored more earnestly to give life to the Anglican Church by borrowing some elements from the Roman Church, hoping that their work would some day end in the union of the two Churches, but stubbornly refusing any individual step toward Catholicism.

[6] A. Vinet, Essais de philosophie morale et religieuse, p. 313.

In his apostolic work, Newman was powerfully aided by Wiseman, and soon received the no less valuable help of Manning. In 1847, after a visit to Rome and on the advice of Pius IX, he established in England, under the name of Oratory, taking his inspiration from the rules given by St. Philip Neri, a congregation of priests and clerics which, in August, 1848, counted more than forty members. In this number were two converts who were destined to exercise a conspicuous influence on the development of piety in England: Faber and Dalgairns.[7]

While under Newman's direction a nucleus of converts was trained in religious virtues and ecclesiastical science at the Birmingham Oratory.[8]

In August, 1847, Wiseman succeeded Bishop Griffith as provicar of the district of London; then, two years later, he was named vicar apostolic. Thus he became the most considerable personage of the Catholic Church in England. One of his first cares was to spread the religious life in England. Within two years he founded ten communities in his district,[9] and he had the happiness of seeing several converts enter the religious orders: Coffin entered the Redemptorists; Tickell, Edward Purbrick and Albany Christie became Jesuits; Lockhart joined the Rosminians (Institute of Charity).

The outstanding event of the period of his vicariate was the re-establishment of the episcopal hierarchy in England. Since the schism of Henry VIII the English Catholics were subject to the regime of mission countries, that is, they were governed in spiritual matters by vicars apostolic dependent immediately on the Holy See. The number of these vicars had been at first four, then eight. The Catholic revival that occurred in England, [7] The two principal works that give Dalgairns an honorable place among spiritual writers are: The Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and The Holy Communion.

[8] A papal brief fixed the seat of the Congregation at Birmingham. Later a second house was founded in London, first dependent on that of Birmingham, then independent.

[9] W. Ward, The Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman (1912), I, 503.

first following the Emancipation Act of 1828, then by the conversion of Newman and his companions, and lastly by the apostolic works of Wiseman, gave reason to think that the time had come to re-establish in Great Britain the ordinary regime of Christian countries, comprising definitely bounded dioceses, governed by bishops dependent on a metropolitan. Negotiations had been started for this purpose in 1847; but, hindered by the political troubles in which Rome was the theater in 1848 and by the Pope's exile at Gaeta, they reached a solution only in the autumn of 1850.

On September 29 of that year, a brief of Pius IX declared the ecclesiastical hierarchy re-established in England. It included twelve bishops and one archbishop. Wiseman received this last title, attached to the Church of Westminster. On the next day the new archbishop of Westminster was named a cardinal. A week later Wiseman communicated the news to the Catholics of England by a pastoral letter in which his soul, filled with joy, overflowed in a chant of triumph. He said: "The great work is accomplished. Catholic England has again found its orbit in the religious firmament." But, by the fact of an interpretation which the Archbishop had not at all foreseen, this event was viewed most unfavorably by Protestant opinion in England. They considered it a pretention of the pope to govern England in religious matters, the beginning of a campaign with a view to substituting Catholic bishops for the Anglican bishops. The Times spoke of Pius IX's impudence. Lord John Russell, prime minister, denounced the move as an aggression of the Pope against English Protestantism, and promised to examine the present state of the law to see what measures could be taken against this usurpation of powers.[10] The Cardinal, on his arrival at London, was hooted; stones were thrown through the doors of his carriage.[11] His friends were alarmed for his safety.

[10] On these incidents, see Ward, op. cit., I, 538 ff.
[11] Ibid., I, 556.

In these circumstances Wiseman displayed great coolness. In a few days he wrote an eloquent Appeal to the English People, which, in calm and clear language, set forth the matter in its true focus. Gradually the irritation quieted down. The Times declared that the question thus put deserved the closest consideration. A bill passed by Parliament, which subjected to a fine of 100 pounds any person usurping in the United Kingdom the title of one of the pretended episcopal sees, remained a dead letter.

This unfortunate agitation, so unforeseen by the Catholics, had a no less unforeseen result: this time a happy result for Catholicism: the conversion of him who would be Wiseman's successor in the see of Westminster, Cardinal Manning.

Manning

Henry Edward Manning, like Newman the son of a London banker, was six years younger than Newman. Like Newman he had been brought up in an environment on which Catholicism had no influence. But the tendencies of mind of the two future princes of the Church had been, in their youth, quite different. Whereas with Newman all the energies were directed toward the development of a more and more intense interior life, with Manning the external life was always the aim of his activity. From boyhood the goal of his ambition was the political life, where he aspired to play the part of a statesman. At that time his motto was: Aut Caesar, aut nihil. The ruin of his paternal fortune and some other disenchantments of his youth obliged him to give up his ambitious dream, turning his thought to more serious matters. Happily influenced by a pious friend, he turned to the ecclesiastical life. In 1833 he was appointed curate in the parish of Lavington; but he remained outside the controversies over the tractarian movement. More concerned with practice than with doctrine, he applied himself, with a zeal as ardent as it was wisely inspired, to relieve the moral and material miseries of his people. In 1837 the death of his wife, who died of tuberculosis after four years of an unshadowed union, led him to turn his soul in the direction of piety.

His religious ideas, on the capital points, became almost those which Newman's followers professed. The ties of close friendship which bound him to Gladstone, the future prime minister, then much involved in the Oxford movement, favored this orientation of his life. The prayers and the ceremonies used in the Catholic Church spoke to his heart. But what exasperated him more than anything else in the Anglican Church was to see it governed by a civil authority. To his mind, the things of the Church should depend only on the Church. The interferences of the state in the domain of religious questions repelled him. Afraid of detaching his fellow Anglicans from the Established Church and favoring the exodus toward Rome inaugurated by Newman,[12] he merely groaned in silence. A celebrated lawsuit, the Gorham affair, in which the Privy Council decided, against the ecclesiastical authorities, in favor of a pastor who did not believe in the efficacy of baptism, finally made him lose confidence in the organization of the Anglican Church.[13] The time that passed from the decision of the Privy Council in March, 1849, until the end of 1850 was for Manning a period of agonizing tortures of conscience. He hesitated to leave a Church to which all his memories attached him and in which he no longer believed.

What was called the Papal Aggression summoned him to decide. He did so with courage. Before a notary he made his resignation of his office and his benefice. Then going forth from the lawyer's office, he entered a Catholic church, and there, for the [12] In 1845, when Newman, who had become his friend, informed him of his abjuration, Manning told Newman of his grief at the move, not hiding from him that in his eyes this defection was a sin, or, as he said elsewhere, a fall. E. S. Purcell, Life of Cardinal Manning (1896), I, 309.

[13] On the Gorham case, see Hemmer, Vie du cardinal Manning, p. 66.

first time in his life, recited the Hail Mary. On April 6, 1851, Manning made his abjuration in the hands of the Jesuit Father Brownbill. Shortly after, when the Times announced his return to the Catholic Church, he wrote to the paper that he had found in the Church all that he was looking for, and even more than he could have imagined before belonging to it.[14] From that moment Manning's zeal for Catholicism, for its rites, for its traditions, and for its infallible head, kept growing until his death.

For three years (1850–53) he divided his time between his theological studies in Rome and some apostolic preaching in England. In 1854 Cardinal Wiseman took him as an auxiliary in his works of evangelization and administration. At this period, under the inspiration of the zealous prelate, he was engaged in the foundation of a community of secular priests, who, placed under the hand of the archbishop, would hold themselves ready to undertake any works of the apostolate that would be entrusted to them. He carried out this idea in 1856 by the foundation of the Oblates of St. Charles. His appointment at this time as provost of the chapter of Westminster, giving him a new authority, enabled him to broaden the field of his apostolate.

Puseyism

By the conversions of Newman and Manning, the Established Church of England had lost the two most eminent of its clergy. After their departure, Pusey became the most prominent personage of the party. Was he going to follow the other two? He did not do so. Despairing of revivifying the Anglican Church, he continued to borrow from the Roman Church its devotions, its prayer formulas, and its ceremonies. He re-established two institutions that seemed to be identified with the essence of Catholicism: the monastic life and confession. He made the Eucharist the center of worship. But to see in his work a progress toward submission to Rome, would be a mistake. Pusey was unwilling even to have such a step mentioned. The Church of England, according to him, must by itself rise to the purity of doctrine and of worship which it had lost. This transformation accomplished, the moment would then be at hand to negotiate a union with the Roman Church. Meanwhile the individual conversions were, to his mind, merely drops of water futilely falling into the ocean.

[14] Madaune, Histoire de la renaissance du catholicisme en Angleterre au XIX^e^ siècle, p. 470.

By this single trait, Puseyism, as it was called, or ritualism, was distinguished from the tractarian movement. It separated them in two other ways. The followers of Pusey were thenceforth recruited, no longer in the world of university students, but among the members of the parish clergy. For the same reason, the center of this movement, more practical than doctrinal, less academic than parochial, was no longer the University of Oxford.

The tractarian movement, abandoned on one side by Newman and his followers, and on the other by Pusey and his school, rapidly languished and soon appeared dead. Then the liberal school judged the moment had come to seize hold, at Oxford, of the influence lost by the tractarians. It installed itself there. It even tried to organize there a new Church, which called itself the Broad Church, as opposed to the High Church and to the Low Church. Basically the Broad Church designated less a delimited and organized party, with its own Creed, than a state of mind, a tendency. The Broad Churchman was the personage for whom every new and daring opinion had a particular attraction. He professed to draw his information from German literature and science. Most of the reckless opinions held since then in England on the interpretation of the Bible and the transformation of dogmas, were defended by the Broad Churchmen.[15] [15] On the history of Puseyism, see Thureau-Dangin, La renaisance catholique en Angleterre au XIX^e siècle, II, 37–155, 229–61.

Holland

We must say a few words about the other states of Europe. The religious events that happened in them during the first part of Pius IX's pontificate (1846–1855) had not the same importance as those that took place in France, Italy, Austria, Prussia, Switzerland, and England during this period. Yet they call for mention. Nearly all Europe had experienced the counterstroke of the revolution of 1848, and almost everywhere this shock resulted in the introduction of liberal institutions, from which the Church profited. But, at the same time, as a greater freedom was left to the maneuvers of the anti-Catholic sects, it was subjected, on their part, to ruder assaults.

The Holland Constitution of 1848 guaranteed freedom of education. Encouraged by the dispositions which the new legislation showed, Pius IX thought the moment opportune to resume the negotiations that had been undertaken in 1815, and several times interrupted since then, with a view to reorganizing the Catholic hierarchy in the Netherlands. In 1851 the ministry of that country declared that it did not wish to place any obstacle in the way of this project. Consequently Pius IX, by his apostolic letter of March 4, 1853, decreed the establishment of five dioceses at Utrecht, Harlem, Bois-le-Duc, Breda, and Ruremonde, and erected those five dioceses into an ecclesiastical province under the authority of the archbishop of Utrecht.[16] But this act of the Sovereign Pontiff at once aroused three parties against him: the so-called orthodox party, closely attached to Calvinism and desiring nothing less than the return to the legislation of the old regime, to Protestantism as the religion of the state; the so-called conservative party, which, without going that far, feared to see the disappearance of its influence and its privileges; and lastly the party of the secret societies, which, in Holland especially, had nearly all parties connected with the [16] This letter may be seen in Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, pp. 128–32.

Protestant heresy. An agitation similar to that which three years earlier had been stirred up in England by a similar act of Pius IX, upset the country. But these very violences endangered its success. Several Protestant papers were exasperated and contributed to restore religious peace in the Netherlands.

On August 29, 1853, Pius IX completed the organization of the Catholic hierarchy in Holland. He excommunicated the Jansenist Herman Heykamp, who had usurped the jurisdiction of the diocese of Utrecht, and exhorted the schismatics with fatherly words to return to the fold of the Roman Church.[17]

Belgium

Belgium, which adopted a liberal Constitution in 1830, had no need to modify it in 1848. The attempt of a band of insurgents, who had hastened from France to revolutionize Belgium, resulted merely in attaching it the more strongly to its king, Leopold I. The events of 1848 had, then, little effect on the Church in Belgium. The difficulties it encountered from 1847 to 1855 arose from another source, coming exclusively from the domestic policy of the country.

We have seen that the liberals and the Catholics had joined together in 1830 to win the independence of the nation. This union, which from the outset was declared to be provisional, did not survive the triumph of the national cause. The Catholics, taking for their program the freedom of the Church, and the liberals, adopting for their watchword the independence of the civil power, found themselves opposed to each other. Soon two sharply distinct parties were formed, which, like the Whigs and the Tories of England, would, to our day, by a sort of see-saw, compete for power. In 1847, a liberal ministry replaced a Catholic ministry. Until its fall in 1855, it showed in various ways its suspicion toward the influence of the Church. On May 20, 1850, in a consistorial allocution, Pius IX judged that he ought to express publicly his grief at the sight of the dangers that threatened religion in Belgium. The Catholic press, organized under the direction of the bishops, vigorously sustained the cause of the Church. In June, 1851, the Supreme Pontiff rewarded by honorary distinctions the knight Stas, director of the Journal de Bruxelles, P. Kersten, founder of the Journal historique et littéraire of Liége, and Baron Gerlache, known by several publications undertaken for the cause of religious freedom.

[17] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 151. The papal bull, addressed to all the Catholics of Holland, sets forth the situation of the Jansenist schism in the Netherlands.

Spain

Politically isolated from Europe since the fall of the Bourbons, Spain, under the blows of the events of 1848, ran the risk of falling into the power of the factions. But the government at that time had for its leader an energetic general, Narvaez, whose strong hand was able, in the interior, to restrain the parties without injury to the public liberties. In foreign relations he profited by the occasion which presented itself to him to renew the relations of Spain with the European diplomacy: by sending a contingent of troops, he contributed to the re-establishment of the authority of the Pope in the Papal States.[18] Pius IX, in his allocution of May 20, 1850, gave praise to Spain and expressed his gratitude to the government of Isabella II.

The hour had come to take up again, with more chance of success, the negotiations between the court of Rome and the court of Madrid in view of a concordat. These negotiations had begun in January, 1845, but unfortunately had been interrupted. On March 16, 1851, a convention in forty-six articles was concluded at Madrid between the nuncio Brunelli and the minister [18] On December 21, 1848, the Spanish government, by a diplomatic note, had invited the Catholic states to deliberate on measures to be taken to guarantee the authority of the pope against the revolutionary conspiracies. This letter will be found in Chantrel, op. cit., p. 62.

Manuel Bertran de Lis. This pact guaranteed the maintenance of the Catholic religion as the religion of the state, the inviolability of the rights of the bishops, the capacity of the Church to acquire property, and the re-establishment of the seminaries. In exchange, the Pope consented to the abolition of the ecclesiastical jurisdictions, to a new circumscription of the dioceses, to the maintenance of the old rights of nomination of the Spanish monarchs, and agreed not to raise claims regarding Church property already sold. This concordat was approved by the Cortes, then ratified (September 5, 1851) by Pius IX, who by a circular of May 17, 1852, exhorted the Spanish bishops to profit by the new concordat dispositions to assemble provincial and diocesan councils, to found seminaries, and to defend courageously the freedom of the Church.

Unfortunately the concordat of 1851 could not long be applied. The revolution of 1854 brought on the religious persecution. In the consistory of July 26, 1855, Pius IX was obliged anew to raise his voice against the sale of Church property, the interference of the government in the administration of the dioceses, and other flagrant abuses. He had to wait until 1859 to conclude a new concordat, which was no better carried out.

During this period two remarkable men, one a priest, Jaime Balmes, the other a layman, Donoso-Cortés, particularly honored the Church of Spain. Jaime Balmes was born at Vich in Catalonia, August 28, 1810; he died (July 9, 1848) at the age of thirty-nine. Balmes was a philosopher, historian, social moralist, and political writer. In his Filosophia Fundamental he opposed the eclecticism of Cousin and the German pantheism, and endeavored to adapt the doctrine of St. Thomas to the needs of the nineteenth century.[19] In his El Protestantismo Comparado con el Catolicismo he corrects Guizot's ideas on the general movement of mankind, by claiming for Catholicism the large part belonging to it in the formation of modern civilization. In his writings on social economy he marks out a safe way between the utopias of socialism and the merciless axioms of the liberal economists or, in the political domain, he strives to prepare the future without totally rejecting the legacy of the past. In all his writings he introduces an open, penetrating mind, and often profound insight. His tendencies approach the school that recognized as its leaders in France, Ozanam, Lacordaire, and Montalembert.[20]

[19] Regarding this philosophical work, he himself wrote: "This is merely the philosophy of St. Thomas suited to the needs of the nineteenth century." A. de Blanche-Raffin, Jacques Balmès, sa vie et ses ouvrages, p. 299.

Donoso-Cortés, marquis of Valdegamas, was born May 9, 1809, in the castle of Valdegamas, in the region of Spain known as Extremadura; he died at Paris, May 3, 1853. Like Balmes he took up the questions of philosophy, history, sociology, and politics; but he considered them from a viewpoint that made him a neighbor of his great friend Louis Veuillot. Balmes admires in modern civilization "that wonderful public conscience" which Catholicism slowly trained and which bestows benefits even on those who insult the Church.[21] Donoso-Cortés holds that between modern civilization and Christianity is a bottomless abyss, an absolute antagonism.[22] Balmes states, without fear and even with real satisfaction: "that spirit of freedom which invades the civilized world and penetrates from all sides like an overflowing river."[23] Donoso-Cortés, in a famous speech, declares: "The question is no longer between liberty and dictatorship; it is posed between two kinds of dictatorship: that of insurrection and that of the government. To a dictatorship coming from below, I prefer one coming from above; since we must choose between the dictatorship of the dagger and that of [20] Cf. A. Lugan, Balmès.

[21] Balmes, Protestantism and Catholicity Compared, chap. 20.

[22] Donoso-Cortés, Œuvres, I, 340.

[23] Balmes, Pie IX. Cf. Casanovas, Apologetica de Balmès, pp. 305–10; Lugan, op. cit., p. 105.

the sword, my choice is made: I choose that of the sword." [24]

Almost everywhere in France, England, Italy, and Germany, this kind of difference of opinion appeared. The revolutions of 1848 posed formidable problems, which thinkers sought to solve, some by leaning toward liberty, others toward authority. These differences will lead, between Catholics, to prolonged conflicts that will be the principal objects of Pius IX's concern during the second part of his pontificate.

[24] Donoso-Cortés, op. cit., I, 337. Cf. the Introduction to this work, by Louis Veuillot, I, 1–64; Montalembert, "Donoso-Cortés," in the Correspondant, August 25, 1853.

CHAPTER XXIX

Anti-Catholic Movement

THE world, often failing to look beyond outward events, had until then seen in Pius IX hardly anything more than the head of a state. Until the Gaeta exile those who inclined toward the liberal solutions of the political problems had praised his generosity in responding to the popular aspirations. Beginning with the Gaeta exile, those who inclined toward authoritarian solutions admired him for the courage he showed in the defense of the rights of God and of the Holy See.[1] Only witnesses of his private life and a few penetrating minds, when speaking of Pius IX, considered especially what deep faith and warm piety was in the soul of the new pope. Of this number was Balmes, who, shortly before his death, said: "The question of the change in the Roman policy is most grave and difficult; but I am not much disturbed by it. . . . Pius IX is, first of all, a man of prayer. For this reason I am without misgiving about the final success. What can the revolution accomplish against a man united to God?" [2]

[1] Among those who particularly praised the Pope's efforts to reconcile liberty with power, we mention Balmes, in his book on Pius IX. This was his last work and a sort of last will (see Blanche-Raffin, Jacques Balmès, pp. 105–9, 286–91). Among those who attacked the liberal tendencies of the Pope, we should mention Crétineau-Joly (see Maynard, J. Crétineau-Joly, pp. 316, 386–87, 402). Crétineau-Joly, in his Histoire du Sonderbund, published in 1850, in connection with the Pope's policy in the affairs of Switzerland, takes up the whole history of Pius IX's pontificate, which he pictures insultingly. He represents the Pope as a man of feeble mind, fond of popularity, letting himself be weakened "from ovation to ovation, that is, from fall to fall, to the point of no longer disposing of his will" and condemned to a role "more worthy of a hero in a novel than of the vicar of Christ" (Maynard, op. cit., p. 387).

[2] Blanche-Raffin, op. cit., pp. 104–7.

Dogma of the Immaculate Conception

From childhood he who would become Pope Pius IX was known for his tender devotion to the Blessed Virgin. Driven from Rome by the revolution, hardly had he reached the place of his exile when he conceived the idea, to avert the calamities which threatened the Church and society, of reanimating the devotion of the faithful toward the Queen of heaven. In an encyclical of February 2, 1849, he wrote: "May the Virgin full of grace and of sweetness ward off from us, by her ready and all-powerful intercession with God, the cruel agonies from which we are suffering . . . , and calm the frightful tempests which assail the Church on every side." [3]

The most suitable means of obtaining a renewal of piety toward the Virgin Mary seemed to him to be the proclamation of the dogma of her immaculate conception. He requested all the bishops of the world to gather together in their dioceses the traditions touching the belief in the Virgin's immaculate conception.

Pious souls grasped the import of the new encyclical. Most of the men of politics, who had given great attention to the administrative reforms of Pius IX, smiled or disdained to concern themselves with this act. In the Pontiff's thought, as indeed throughout the history of his pontificate, it would have a considerable importance. Up to then, Pius IX, without abandoning any Catholic dogmas and without yielding any of the rights of the Holy See, had wished to show that the Church was ready to respond to all the legitimate aspirations of modern times. The thwarting of his generous undertakings could be attributed only to the ill will of the revolutionary sects. He thenceforth sought first of all the welfare of the Church and of society in the restoration of the doctrinal truths and the disciplinary authority that God had entrusted to him.

[3] Chantrel, Annales, pp. 69–71.

We may say that this new phase of his pontificate opened on December 8, 1854, when, after appealing to the testimony of an ancient and universal tradition, he defined, "by virtue of the authority of the holy apostles Peter and Paul and of his own, that the Blessed Virgin Mary was preserved from every spot of original sin from the first moment of her conception" and he declared "separated from the unity of the Church whoever would hold a belief contrary to that definition." [4] In reality, basically this great act was nothing but the confirmation of a traditional devotion of the Church. In declaring that the Mother of God alone had been freed from the original stain, the Pontiff affirmed once again, against the pride of the age, the existence, too generally forgotten, of a universal fall of mankind. In proclaiming that the Son of God, in becoming incarnate, had taken only a most pure flesh, he maintained very high the dignity of the God-man even in his human nature. In offering to the homages of men a creature absolutely pure, although formed of the same clay as we are, he recalled to all men the wonderful power of divine grace. Lastly, Pius IX, by imposing the new dogma on all the faithful under pain of anathema, affirmed his supreme authority in the realm of teaching and preluded the proclamation of papal infallibility. From that time on, the preoccupations of an external order, such as his conflicts with the civil powers, often disturbed him. But solicitude for the restoration of doctrinal truth and of disciplinary authority had priority over all his other cares.

The bull proclaiming the dogma of the Immaculate Conception was hardly published when the Pope invited the commission formed for the preparation of that bull, to begin studies relative to the condemnation of the principal modern errors.[5]

The idea of gathering together in a sort of table the errors of [4] Denzinger-Bannwart, no. 1641. See the full text of the bull Ineffabilis of December 8, 1854, in the Acta Pii IX.

[5] Cf. Schrader, De theologia generatim, p. 137.

the time and inflicting on each of them the fitting condemnation, seems to have been set forth for the first time in 1849, at the provincial council of Spoleto, by Archbishop Joachim Pecci of Perugia.[6] Three years later, Cardinal Fornari, on order of Pius IX, communicated privately to the most notable members of the episcopacy and to some eminent laymen the plan of a collection, or syllabus, containing twenty-eight propositions and conforming to the wishes of the council of Spoleto.[7] To examine the replies given to the letter of Cardinal Fornari and further to investigate the important question of the condemnation of the modern errors: such was the task assigned to the papal commission. Pius IX's project resulted in 1864 in the promulgation of the encyclical Quanta cura and the Syllabus.

Anti-Catholic Movement

During the ten-year interval (1854–1864) the modern errors gradually became known. The political opposition to the Holy See, directed by Cavour, led to the invasion of the Papal States by the soldiers of Garibaldi; and the nebulous rationalism of the German philosophy led to Ernest Renan's Life of Jesus. Cavour's political program introduced a new form of the opposition of the states toward the Holy See. Until then the popes had been obliged to contend either against powers clearly hostile to the Church which persecuted it openly, or against Catholic powers which, on the pretext of protecting it, tried to dominate it. Cavour at the time refrained from fighting the Church or mingling in its affairs; but this restraint was on the condition that the Church intervene in no way and under no pretext, even for the spiritual good of souls, in the affairs of the state. Such was the meaning he gave to the motto which he later adopted:

[6] "Singuli errores . . . veluti sub uno oculorum intuitu . . . nominatim recenseantur." Collectio lacensis, VI, 743.

[7] Eugène Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, III, 493.

The free Church in the free state. This policy was the introduction of the liberal thesis into the diplomatic relations of the states with the Church.

Cavour's religious policy was marked by two other traits. Although having as its starting point and its final end a strictly national interest, it hoped to draw into its movement all the states of Europe. While wishing to take its stand on conservative and Catholic ground, it expected to win the revolutionary forces for its advantage: an arduous task, a gamble that was not realizable but before which Cavour's daring did not recoil. Pliant as well as obstinate, patient as well as resolute, Cavour methodically carried out the execution of his plan.

The little Sardinian state, a simple fragment of the Italian mosaic, had no voice in the concert of the great European powers. The first thing to be done was to give the Sardinian state that voice. In 1853 the conflict raised by France in the Orient against Russia regarding the question of the Holy Places seemed to the statesman the favorable occasion for an intervention by which Piedmont would rise to the general politics of the big states. By the treaty of January 20, 1855, which admitted Piedmont as an ally of France and England, the Turin chancery held, so to speak, her admission card to the peace congress. Cavour had the talent to communicate this viewpoint to the army of 15,000 men that he directed toward the Crimea. In the mud of the Sebastopol trenches they were aware that with that mud Italy was being made.

This view was grasped even better when, in 1856, at the congress of Paris, the question of Italy was introduced into the deliberations of the powers and was pleaded by Cavour himself in the name of Piedmont. Until then the able statesman had played a pliant and astute game. Allowed to speak by the same title as the representatives of Russia, Austria, England, and France, and confident of the support of England and France, he was daring. He unfolded his whole plan in broad lines. He pointed out as abnormal the agglomeration of the states of the peninsula and showed, in a violent tone, the threat to Piedmont by the extension of Austria. Moreover, he submitted to Count Walewski and Lord Clarendon, ministers of France and England, a note declaring that the Pope was powerless to govern his States; that a separation, at least an administrative one, of Rome from its Legations, was required.[8] Following a deliberation of the members of the Congress, made acquainted with the proposal of Cavour by the representatives of France and England, protocol 22 of the treaty of Paris was devoted to what was called "the Italian question." The term was too narrow. What was being proposed was the Roman question itself, of concern to the head of the Catholic Church.[9]

This aspect can be seen in the general feeling that followed the deliberations of the Congress. In vain Cavour declared "that his view was not prompted by pretrophobia, that he was ready to give the Church a greater freedom than it was enjoying, that his sole purpose was to separate the temporal domain from the spiritual domain, the state from the Church." [10] While the aging Metternich was writing that "the position taken by the court of Turin made his nerves quiver by a sort of galvanic impulses," [11] Victor Emmanuel was alarmed at the daring of his minister.[12] In fact the congress of 1856 was the [8] With a view to facilitating the understanding of the facts that we are about to relate, we give here the division of the Papal States, such as it was fixed on November 20, 1850. It embraced the district of Rome and four Legations. The district of Rome included the Eternal City, its outskirts, the provinces of Viterbo, Orvieto, and Civitavecchia. The first Legation, known as the Romagna, embraced the provinces of Bologna, Ravenna, Forli, and Ferrara. The second Legation, called the Marches, was formed of the provinces of Urbino, Pesaro, Macerata-Loreto, Ancona, Fermo, Ascoli, Camerino. The third Legation was composed of the provinces of Rieti, Spoleto, and Perugia; and the fourth, those of Velletri, Frosinone, and Benevento. In some documents the term "Legations" is applied to the Romagna alone.

[9] Cf. Correspondant, July 25, 1856; Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 333.

[10] Cavour, Lettere, II, 453.

[11] Metternich, Mémoires, VIII, 394.

[12] Cavour, loc. cit.

starting point of a campaign of pamphlets, calumnies, and various outrages in which the treaties of 1815, the Austrian power, the temporal power of the papacy, and the influence of the priests, mingled together and confused, were vilified by unscrupulous pamphleteers.

Bishop Pie of Poitiers, with that ardent spontaneity and that warm devotion to the Roman See, the Roman doctrines, and the Roman interests, which was the characteristic of his episcopal career, expressed indignant protests which, more than the low-class agitators, pointed directly to the states, which he held responsible for the agitation. "The rationalist governments," he said, "could build nothing solid and durable; and their punishment is no less inevitable." [13] The French government admonished him and prepared reprisals.[14] But the militant Catholics, whose organ was the Univers, acclaimed the Bishop of Poitiers as their ecclesiastical leader. By his theological science, by his inflexible attachment to tradition, and by the fearlessness of his zeal, the Bishop of Poitiers was the indicated scholar of the group of Catholics which had Louis Veuillot as its vigorous spokesman.

Cavour's Policy

Cavour, however, slowly and surely pursued his work. After winning the world of diplomacy to his cause, he labored to master the revolutionary forces to his advantage. Among the men who understood the import of the decisions taken at the congress of Paris about Italy and Piedmont, was one of Mazzini's disciples, Giuseppe La Farina. He was of an earnest spirit, fond of militant politics, but, like many of his fellow [13] Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, I, 634. Cf. Pie, Œuvres, II, 514, and especially the synodal instruction on "Rome considérée comme siège de la papauté," in Œuvres, II, 466–536.

[14] Baunard, loc. cit.

Italians, he did not let his ardor in any way obscure the clear view of real situations and of the practical possibilities. Sincerely attached to his master, but more deeply devoted to the Mazzini doctrines, he realized that these would have a chance for a greater success by allying themselves to the fortune of Piedmont and Cavour. But would Cavour consent to be served by him? La Farina supposed that the minister was too intelligent to miss such a force. In this he was not mistaken. An interview (September 12, 1856) between the conspirator and the statesman was enough to bring them into agreement.

The result of their conferences was the foundation of a national Italian society. It was an association both public and secret: public in Sardinia, where its devotion to the cause of Piedmont and its king would facilitate its growth of membership and its influence; but secret outside for fear of arousing national susceptibilities or of provoking repressions by the public powers. Its composition was quite diverse: lawyers and men of letters there met with artisans and laborers. Thus the influence of its members was likewise quite varied. Whereas the man of the people spread the doctrine of the renovation of Italy among his companions of the workshop, poets and artists and novelists exalted the Italian homeland, and scholars patiently gathered all the old texts that could serve to glorify the national cause. Naturally most of the members belonged to the revolutionary sects; Mazzini's ideas formed the basis of their profession of faith; and, if they desired Italian unity as intensely as the minister Cavour desired it, for them the temporal power of the pope was the big obstacle to the realization of that unity. Neither Victor Emmanuel nor Cavour could entertain the notion of altering the ideas of their new collaborators on this point. They must be accepted as they were, or their help must be foregone; they were accepted along with their ideas. Thus was fulfilled Mazzini's prediction: "Piedmont will enter on the path of our doctrines by the prospects of the crown of Italy." The person of the conspirator had been eliminated as compromising; but his plan triumphed.

Garibaldi

Cavour was desirous of using for his enterprise all the forces he could have under his hand, without too close a consideration of their moral value. In accord with this aim, he would not pass over the strange condottiere who, since 1848, was filling Italy with the sensational rumors of his fame, Giuseppe Garibaldi. Born at Nice in 1807, successively Piedmont sailor, conspirator at Genoa in the service of Mazzini, teacher of mathematics in France, captain of a frigate in the service of the bey of Tunis, and head of revolutionary bands in America, in 1848 he put his sword in the service of Charles Albert in the fight against Austria. In 1849, after the Pope's abandonment of Rome and the proclamation of the Roman Republic, Garibaldi was appointed by Mazzini to defend the Eternal City against the French army of General Oudinot. Obliged to disband his troops, but dissatisfied with inaction, he returned to America, there engaged in industrial undertakings, and finally, foreseeing the awakening of the revolutionary agitation in Italy, he returned there in 1854 with the prestige of a mysterious adventurer.

This singular adventurer had the appearance of a circus hero or a hero from the pages of a novel. He had a martial and grotesque figure, wearing a broad sombrero and over his red shirt an American poncho. His courage was genuine. Sometimes he carried it to the point of the maddest daring. Thus he impressed the masses, whom he attracted also by the oddities of his attitude, by the liveliness of his speech, and by his imperturbable swagger. His membership in all the revolutionary sects extended the circle of his connections. He affected illuminism. Exaggerating the mottoes of Mazzini, he invoked the authority of Christ, shouting: "On to the pope." He was never prouder than when he could surround himself, in his anticlerical manifestations, with some apostate religious dressed in the habit of their order.

Such was the man with whom Count Cavour got in touch for the first time toward the end of 1857, without hiding from himself that such a helper would perhaps arouse as many difficulties as he might bring him assistance.

Cavour's Difficulties

These difficulties, however, may have seemed to him negligible as compared to those he could foresee. These might come from the side of the powers or from the sects directed by Mazzini or from the Italian Catholics and the Pope himself. Among the powers, France was the only one that disquieted Cavour. Russia was far away; Prussia was still isolated; and England was rather unfamiliar with Italian affairs. The probable past connections of the Emperor of the French with the Carbonari might make him sympathetic to the work of Italian unity if this movement were aided by a Garibaldi; [15] but that emperor, since coming to power, plainly sought to conciliate the good will of the Catholics. The question had concerned the revision of the Organic Articles. Undoubtedly the French Catholics as a whole did not have the frank confidence of Bishop Ségur. Ségur, seeing Napoleon become, as he said, more and more papist, wrote to Bishop Pie: "Restorer of religion in France, the prince will, as a result, be so in all Europe." [16] But the mere concern not to alienate from himself the most compact portion of the conservative party might be enough to make the Emperor opposed to any undertaking threatening the tranquillity of the Holy See.

[15] A cousin of the Emperor, Prince Lucian Murat, a month after the coup d'état of December 2, had been elected Grand Master of Freemasonry.

[16] Baunard, op. cit., I, 395. Cf. Marquis de Ségur, Souvenirs et récits d'un frère, Vol. I, chaps. 9 and 11.

With anxious solicitude and stubborn perseverance, as evidenced in his correspondence, Cavour strove to combat, in the mind of the Emperor, whatever might unpleasantly trouble him in the Piedmont undertaking.[17]

Cavour's task was made more difficult since he had also to appease Mazzini, who was then profiting from the popular discontent provoked by a recent raising of taxes, to give a new vitality to his party. As for the Italian clergy, although largely favorable to a national movement, it was especially sensitive to any attack or threat directed against the Pope. Pius IX, in his allocution Probe memineritis (January 22, 1855), complained of the rashness with which the King of Sardinia did not fear to violate the independence of the Church and to utter the most serious insults on the authority of the Holy See.[18] The triumphal journey made by the Supreme Pontiff, in the course of 1857, to Bologna and several other cities of Italy,[19] proved that the Holy Father's complaints stirred profound echoes of sympathy among the clergy and the faithful of Italy. That same year (March 19, 1857) the publication by an English paper, the Daily News, of an important memorandum of the French ambassador at Rome, Rayneval, a memorandum quite favorable to Pius IX and likewise to the Italians, and until then kept secret, might extend to the Catholics of the entire world the sentiments shown by the Catholics of Italy.

The most formidable obstacle to Cavour's projects was perhaps in this popular feeling which might paralyze the action of Sardinia and also encourage Napoleon in his policy favorable to the Holy See. Cavour in vain affected calm and composure, declared that he was neither disquieted nor troubled; he felt the need of masking his religious policy under the cover of a purely national policy and of reviving the popularity of his sovereign.

[17] Cavour, op. cit., II, 484, 492, 605; VI, 69, 100.

[18] Recueil des allocutions, encycliques, etc., citées dans le Syllabus, p. 347.

[19] On this journey, see Chantrel, op. cit., pp. 258, 281–86.

With these views in mind, he persuaded the King to make a tour in his states and he stirred up popular acclamations along the route. But his prodigal efforts for the purpose did but evidence his apprehensions.

A tragic event that occured of a sudden determined the attitude of the Emperor of the French and thus ended the anxieties of the Piedmont statesman.

Attempted Assassination by Orsini

On January 14, 1858, at half-past eight in the evening, when the Emperor and the Empress, in a state coach, were passing from rue de Peletier on the way to the Opera, three bombs were hurled in the direction of the sovereigns. The fragments of the bombs riddled the imperial coach and reached more than 150 persons, eight of whom died. The Emperor and the Empress were saved from harm. An inquiry proved that the authors of the outrage were four Italians: Orsini, Pieri, Gomez, and Rudio, and that the plot had been organized by Orsini. He was born in the Roman States and in his youth (1845) he had been sentenced to prison for life for conspiracy against the government of Gregory XVI. Freed the next year by Pius IX, he was soon noted among the hottest agitators of the revolutionary party. Condemned again several times, he succeeded in escaping and wandered through Europe, spreading about him the most subversive ideas. The secret societies appear to have counted him in the number of their most devoted members. A month after the attack, Orsini underwent the penalty of regicides.

But before dying, he was allowed to have read in open court by his lawyer, Jules Favre, a letter to the Emperor. It ended with these words: "I beg Your Majesty to give Italy its independence. . . . May Your Majesty recall that the Italians joyfully shed their blood for Napoleon the Great. . . . Let Your Majesty recall that, so long as Italy is not independent, the tranquillity of Europe and that of Your Majesty will be nothing more than a chimera." Shortly afterward, the prefect of police, Pietri, went to see the condemned man in his cell and got him to write a second letter to urge his political friends to abandon the use of violent means, such as assassination, and to give them to understand that the freedom of Italy would be at this price. Orsini wrote the letter and then, paying his debt, mounted the scaffold. There he died, crying: "Viva l'Italia!" The day was March 13, 1858. Two weeks later the Piedmont official Gazette published in a prominent place Orsini's two letters, declaring they received them from a reliable source. Modern historians of Italy claim to know that the reliable source was none other than the cabinet of Emperor Napoleon III.[20]

These tragic events had a twofold repercussion on the domestic and foreign policy of the French Empire. In the domestic policy, they marked the beginning of a series of repressive measures, characteristic of an absolute government. The ministry of the interior was entrusted to a general known for his vigor, Espinasse; France was divided into five main military commands, as if it were in a state of siege; more than 2,000 republicans were arrested; more than 300 were deported to the depths of Algeria. At the same time the Emperor's foreign policy, in relation to the Italian movement, was suddenly turned toward the plans of Cavour. The Italians, in celebrating the memory of Orsini "as that of a new William Tell," [21] were not mistaken. Are we to accept the assertion that the conspirator reminded the Emperor of the French of the former oath taken by him at the time when he was a Carbonaro? No precise proof of the statement has been forthcoming. What appears certain is that at this time "the revolution had won Napoleon III." [22]

[20] Bianchi, Storia documentata, VII, 403; Cavour, Lettere, II, 540.
[21] Souvenirs of Marquis d'Azeglio, p. 352.
[22] Debidour, in Lavisse and Rambaud, Histoire générale, XI, 157.

Napoleon III and Cavour

The mysterious negotiation that ended in the secret Plombières accord between the Emperor and Cavour (July 21, 1858) was the first step on the path of the new policy. A decision was reached that France would help Piedmont to expel the Austrians from Italy and to make it into a rich and powerful state by joining to it Parma, Lombardia, Venetia, and the Legations themselves. An attempt would be made to have the Pope accept the loss of his provinces by conferring on him the title of "president of the Italian Confederation." One did not need to be a prophet to see that these clauses were only a minimum, with which Piedmont and the revolutionary sects could not be satisfied.

The French press, secretly requested by Napoleon to prepare public opinion for his political revolution, soon went beyond the limits of the Plombières Convention. The Patrie, whose governmental connections were well known, merely called for war against Austria; but the Presse, directed by Georges Guéroult, a protégé of Prince Napoleon, and the Siècle, whose director Havin received communications directly from the court, became defenders of the Italian revolution. Even the Moniteur, official organ of the Empire, published articles of Edmond About in which the papal policy was warmly attacked and discredited. These articles were presently gathered into a volume; Napoleon was said to have read the proofs. Several close friends of the Emperor had supplied items of information to the author of the book.[23] The editor of the Univers valiantly faced the storm; but he tried in vain to intervene directly with the Emperor to obtain from him the let-up of the bitter campaign. Some good promises of the sovereign were promptly contradicted by the facts.[24]

[23] See Journal des Goncourt, I, 277.

[24] The report of the audience granted to Louis Veuillot by Napoleon III was published, thirteen years later, in volume VI of the Mélanges.

The Mortara Incident

In 1854 a Jewish child of Bologna, then a State of the Church, had been baptized in extremis by a Christian servant. Four years later Pius IX, informed of the event, ordered that, conformable to the papal civil law and the canon law,[25] the Christian child should be brought up in the Christian faith and for that purpose should be separated from its family and placed in a convent. Its parents would be able to see it, but without being permitted to exercise over it a religious influence in the sense of Judaism. As soon as the press hostile to the Church was acquainted with the event, a general cry of tolle was raised against the "superannuated laws" of the papal government, against "the oppression of the natural law by the theological law." Not for a long time [25] Various decisions of the ecclesiastical tribunals and a decision of the Fourth Council of Toledo (December 5, 633) had declared that the sons and daughters of the Jews, baptized in extremis or in case of abandonment by their parents—the two cases where baptism can be conferred on them without the consent of their family—should be withdrawn from their Jewish surroundings and be brought up in convents by good Christian men and women (Mansi, Concilia, X, 634; Hefele-Leclercq, Histoire des conciles, III, 274). Benedict XIV, referring to these decisions, explains them by saying that the natural right of the father of the family is not suppressed, but that it is superseded by the duty which the religious society has to watch over the education of its members (Benedict XIV, Bullarium, II, 85–109). Such is the reason developed by the theologians and canonists (cf. Billot, De Ecclesiae sacramentis, I, 242–44).

But Benedict XIV remarks that in his time the measure proposed to assure the Christian education of the Christian child seemed harsh and that, according to several canonists, the child might be left with the parents if these would agree to return it when it reached a suitable age and, meanwhile, that nothing should be taught it against the Catholic faith. Some recent theologians have taught that the separation should not be made "where the civil laws are opposed to it" (Marc, Institutiones, Part III, tract 2, chap. 3, no. 1473, p. 48), or "when the secular power is hostile" (Lehmkuhl, Theologia moralis, II, 61). In a more general way Billot teaches that the better course is not to take the baptized child from its parents when, to avoid the danger of an apostasy "a greater evil would be caused or a greater good would be prevented" for such is, he says, "the general rule of prudence." (Billot, op. cit., I, 243). This eminent theologian adds: "Permisit tamen divina Providentia ut ipsis nostris temporibus quaedam exempla darentur, tum in manifestationam sanctitatis et efficaciae sacramenti, tum in attestationem juris atque officii quod habet Ecclesia apud baptizatos" (ibid.).

had the enemies of the temporal power found a more promising ground for their attacks. Almost alone in the Catholic press, the Univers clearly from the outset took a stand in defense of the Pope's act and of all its possible consequences, of the laws of the Papal State in the full letter of their tenor.[26] Leaving the ground of the defensive and entering upon the offensive, Veuillot recalled that other Mortaras existed in Europe, with whom the present defenders of the paternal authority did not concern themselves: for instance, those orphans of the Irish soldiers who died in the Crimea and whom England had brought up in Protestant institutions; other paternal rights more outrageously violated: those of fathers whom the Swedish law declared deprived of their authority for the single reason that they embraced Catholicism. These replies were appropriate; but they did not silence the outcry which the daily press, the reviews, the theaters, public meetings, and popular images raised for several months in Italy, France, England, in all Europe.

Public opinion had not yet quieted down, when (February 4, 1859) an anonymous pamphlet appeared in Paris, entitled Napoléon III et l'Italie. Therein were broached the Roman question and the Italian question, viewed in all their amplitude. The papal government was represented as having an urgent need of renovation, of adaptation to the modern spirit, and the Pope was pictured as incapable of carrying out that renovation. The other princes of Italy were there pictured as equally powerless, either on account of their subjection to Austria or from the fact of their isolation. The salvation of Italy, according to the author of the pamphlet, could come to it only by its unification, realized by virtue of the principle of the nationalities. The head of the Napoleonic dynasty in olden times, when putting on the crown, used to declare: "I have always intended to make the [26] The controversy sustained by Veuillot in the Univers occupies no less than 316 pages in his Mélanges. For a defense of the papal authority in this affair, see also the Civiltà cattolica, ser. 3, XII, 385 ff., "Il piccola neofito Edgardo Mortara."

Italian nationality free and independent." "Emperor Napoleon I thought he should conquer the people in order to free them; Napoleon III wished to free them without conquering them." Later the certainty prevailed that the pamphlet was written by a devoted follower of the Second Empire, La Guéronnière, at the prompting of Emperor Napoleon III himself.

The plan set forth in the pamphlet was only an application of the general policy of the sovereign of the French. In 1815 Prince Metternich had pretended to assure the final peace of Europe by the simple principle of equilibrium, without taking account of the nationalities. In 1859 Napoleon III pretended to regenerate it by the simple principle of the nationalities without taking account of the equilibrium. Generous and utopian, he thought of the constitution of a free Italy, of a unified Germany, of an independent Poland, of an autonomous Ireland. In consequence of these changes, Austria, Russia, and England would be weakened, while France would obtain as the price of her concourse, Savoy, Luxemburg, perhaps the left bank of the Rhine.[27] The future would witness the collapse of this policy. The alliance entered into with England for the Crimean War had already made the Emperor abandon the cause of Ireland; the fear of a coalition of Russia, Austria, and Prussia kept him from intervening in favor of Poland. When the Napoleonic policy would seem to succeed, the situation would be worse yet: the unifying movements of Italy and Germany were going to raise up for France dreaded neighbors on the eastern frontiers without weakening the other powers.

Religious Policy of Napoleon III

What was Emperor Napoleon's religious policy? Having had the advantage of appreciating the solidity of the support which the Catholics had given him, he resolved not to offend them, [27] See A. Leroy-Beaulieu, Un empereur, un roi, un pape.

and would not have wished to dispossess the pope of his temporal domain or to give Rome to Italy as its capital. A liberal constitution, modeled on that of 1848, and the cession of Romagna to Piedmont, would have satisfied his policy. In this matter he went less far in his claims than his ally Cavour, who did not recoil before the idea of Rome as the capital of united Italy under the hegemony of Piedmont. Cavour, in turn, forcefully rejected the idea of a violent aggression on the patrimony of St. Peter. Such an aggression, he thought, would injure the harmony of his relations with France, would give too great a boost to the revolutionary party, and would wound his own inner feelings, which he professed to be those of a Catholic respectful of the head of Christianity. But Garibaldi and his sect had decided not to shun any outrage; and, when the leaders of a movement have once made an appeal to popular passions, the most violent parties are always the ones that carry the day. From the plan of the reform of the Papal State and the unity of Italy to the plan of Rome as the capital, then to that of the spoliation of the Supreme Pontiff, the step would be rapid: the most hesitant would be led to say with King Victor Emmanuel: "We will go to the limit."

CHAPTER XXX

The War with Austria (1859)

NAPOLEON, Cavour, and Garibaldi were not in agreement on the ultimate conduct of the compaign that was about to begin. But they were in accord on the act that should start it: the declaration of war on Austria. On January 1, 1859, at the Tuileries, the Emperor, receiving the diplomatic corps, said to Baron von Hübner, Austrian ambassador: "I regret that our relations with your government are not as good as in the past." Nine days later Victor Emmanuel, opening the session of Parliament, made the following declaration: "If we have respect for treaties, we are not deaf to our people's cry of grief." After another three weeks the marriage of Prince Jerome Napoleon, cousin of the Emperor of the French, with Princess Clotilda, daughter of the King of Sardinia, sealed the alliance of the two states. Cavour spent the winter in putting the Sardinian army on a war footing; Garibaldi spent it gathering together his French forces. On April 23, Austria, feeling herself menaced, called upon Sardinia to disarm within three days. Five days later Cavour rejected the ultimatum of the court of Vienna, and said: "Alea jacta est: We have made history." The campaign that led the Piedmont policy so far, was started.

The Italian Campaign

Here is not the place for us to relate the brilliant military actions which, in two months (May 10 to July 11, 1859), brought the French and Sardinian armies to the gates of Venice. The two marked stages of that victorious advance were the battle of Magenta where, on June 4, the imperial guard and General MacMahon and the Duke of Magenta covered themselves with glory; and the battle of Solferino where (June 24) 150,000 soldiers of the Franco-Piedmont army routed 220,000 Austrians. The defeated army withdrew to the famous "quadrilateral" formed by the fortified places of Peschiera, Mantua, Verona, and Legnano, ready to wage the decisive battle that would determine the liberty of Italy or submission to Austria.

Of a sudden, unexpected news was received. It reported that Emperor Napoleon, the leader of the Franco-Piedmont army, and Emperor Francis Joseph, in an interview at Villafranca (May 11), had concluded an armistice and drew up the basis of the peace. Napoleon III, in a speech delivered at St. Cloud, later explained the reasons for this sudden step. Warned by the diplomatic agent of Russia that Prussia was preparing to come to the aid of Austria, he did not think that the army he commanded was capable of sustaining the fight at the same time on the Adige and on the Rhine and he had judged that the prudent thing to do was to treat with the enemy. The clauses agreed to at Villafranca were later (November 10) ratified by the treaty of Zurich. The Emperor notified the Pope (July 14) of the agreement in these terms: "Most Holy Father, I have just concluded peace with the Emperor of Austria on the following conditions: 1. the two emperors will strive to constitute an Italian federation under the presidency of the Holy Father; 2. Lombardy is ceded to Piedmont; 3. the dispossessed sovereigns will return to their states; 4. the two emperors will ask the Holy Father to introduce the necessary reforms in his States; 5. Venetia, although remaining under the scepter of Austria, will be part of the Italian confederation; 6. a full and complete amnesty will be granted to those who have taken part in the late events." [1]

This peace satisfied no one. We read that Pius IX, upon reading the Emperor's letter, exclaimed: "How handsome! The doge stirring or calming the waves of the Adriatic with a gesture! But I wish no part in this federation or this lay government." [2] He understood that the presidency offered to him would be merely honorary and that the effective presidency of the confederation would belong to Piedmont. Moreover, the French opinion was unfavorable to the treaty. Emile Ollivier wrote: "At that time we were all living on the idea of the irresistible might of the French army. . . . No injurious epithet was spared the Emperor because he had doubted that our soldiers could victoriously sustain the attack of the Austrians on the Adige and of the Prussians on the Rhine. But if in France a deceptive view prevailed, the feeling in Italy was one of despair. Cavour abandoned the helm, almost crazy with grief. People thought they were on the morrow of another Novara." [3] What could have been proposed in 1848 seemed more acceptable in 1859. The idea of a unified Italy under the officially proclaimed direction of Piedmont, and not under its hidden influence, had, thanks to Cavour, made its way, won the minds of the statesmen, and acquired the backing of the masses. "Until then, you might speak of the sects, divisions, federalists, republicans, monarchists; from this moment all were in favor of the unity; by the touch of a wand, what had previously been only the belief of a handful of sectarians became the motto of a nation. On all lips, in Piedmont as in Tuscany and the duchies, a unanimous cry was raised: 'Unity.'" [4]

[1] For the full text of the letter, see Emile Ollivier, who published it in his work, L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile de Vatican, II, 455.

Action accompanied the words. The states of Florence, Parma, and Modena voted the dismissal of their dukes and put themselves under the protection of Piedmont. Romagna itself rose up and joined the other three states of central Italy. Victor Emmanuel did not dare to accept personally the dictatorship

[2] Ollivier, op. cit., p. 457.
[3] Ibid., p. 453.
[4] Ibid., p. 459.

offered him. To show regard for Emperor Napoleon and to respect the letter of the treaty of Villafranca, he decided on one of those combinations to which Italian politics often resorted: a prince of the house of Savoy, Prince Carignan, would, for the sole purpose of maintaining order, which was threatened by the plots of Garibaldi, accept the regency over the four states, joined together under the name of Emilia; and he would exercise this regency only through a proxy, Buoncompagni. This move was calculated to reduce to an apparent minimum a taking of possession that was intended to be firm and final.[5]

In short, by all these agitations and combinations, the clauses of Villafranca crumbled to dust. Three of the states that the Emperor of the French had wished to maintain had disappeared; the Papal State that he pretended to safeguard, was dismembered, and this first dismemberment appeared to be a threat of total destruction. On December 26, 1859, the Pope protested against those who, sustained by advisers and by various helps coming from without, raised the flag of defection and revolt in his States.[6] On the 29th, Bishop Pie of Poitiers,[7] on the 30th Bishop Dupanloup of Orléans,[8] then, after them, a considerable number of bishops of the whole world,[9] in pastorals and public letters, denounced the injustices and violences which had just been directed against the head of the Church.

Napoleon III and Bishop Donnet

On October 11, 1859, the Emperor passed through the city of Bordeaux. There he heard from the lips of the prelate who occupied the archiepiscopal see of that city, a protest which, by the circumstances in which it was uttered, was still more re-

[5] La Gorce, Histoire du second empire, III, 158–62.
[6] Chantrel, Annales, p. 359.
[7] Ibid., pp. 360–62.
[8] Ibid., pp. 363–66.
[9] Ibid., p. 366.

sounding. Public opinion, informed of the reception by the official authorities and of the speeches that would be made, awaited impatiently the words that would come from the head of the important diocese of Bordeaux, Archbishop Donnet.

Cardinal Ferdinand Donnet was a striking figure. The legends, the fictions, and the strange hoaxes with which this prince of the Church was pleased to adorn his daily life, would be the subject of conversation among the Bordeaux clergy. Rumor said that his powerful nature, finding itself cramped in the realm of the real, had need to overflow into the imaginary. But the oddities of his life kept up his popularity without injury to his prestige. In his forty-eight years as bishop and thirty years as cardinal, the building of churches, the public religious ceremonies, and the recruiting of priestly vocations were the ceaseless object of his tireless zeal. He had a shrewd judgment of situations and of opportunities, and more than once that of courageous interventions. For the diocese of Bordeaux, which gloried in having seen pass on its metropolitan see several princes of the Church of eminent merit, Cardinal Donnet has remained par excellence "the Cardinal."

Called on to make an address to the Prince, the prelate began by praising the sovereign's recent victories. He then felicitated him on having restored to the Vicar of Christ his city, his people, and the integrity of his temporal power. Finally he expressed the desire that the Prince "remain faithful to that Christian policy." He declared: "We pray with a confidence that persists, with a hope that cannot be discouraged by deplorable events and by violent sacrileges. The motive of this hope, whose fulfillment seems today so difficult, is, after God, you, Sire, you who have spoken these memorable words: 'The temporal sovereignty of the venerable head of the Church is closely bound up with the luster of Catholicism as with the liberty and independence of Italy.' " [10] The Emperor, visibly embarrassed, replied that "the government which had recalled the Holy Father on his throne was not able to express anything but the counsels imposed by a sincere and respectful devotion to his interests." [11]

[10] Ibid., p. 369.

Pamphlet on the Papal Domain

Two months later (December 22, 1859) appeared a significant pamphlet. Everyone, from the time of its publication, attributed it to the same inspiration and the same editing as the pamphlet of February entitled Napoléon III et l'Italie. The new work had for its title: Le Pape et le Congrès. It was, in fact, inspired by Napoleon III himself and written by M. de la Guéronnière.[12] With a curious mixture of respectful formulas and haughty pity, the author advised the Pope to reduce his domain to the city of Rome and the surrounding country. Thus the Pontiff would govern his little family as a father. Moreover, was he capable of administering a nation? As someone said, the author wished "to reduce the Holy Father to the vineyard of Naboth without suppressing in his neighbors the covetousness of Achab." [13]

The publication of this pamphlet, which had a wide publicity, marked a date in the religious policy of the Second Empire. Pius IX, when receiving General Goyon and the officers of the occupation force (January 1, 1860), expressed the hope that the Emperor "would condemn the principles contained in the pamphlet," which the Pontiff called "a notorious monument of hypocrisy." [14] Napoleon, in a letter to the Pope, dated December 31, but not made public until the following January 11, set

[11] Ibid., p. 370.

[12] When several personages of the court questioned the Emperor about the pamphlet, he replied: "I am not the one who wrote it, but I approve all its ideas" (letter of Lord Cowley to Lord John Russel, December 25, 1859, The Life of the Prince Consort, by Thomas Martin, V, 4).

[13] La Gorce, op. cit., III, 176.

[14] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 385.

forth, in respectful terms, that "he was powerless to halt the establishment of the new regime" and gave the impression that, if the Pope consented to make the sacrifice of the Romagnas, the rest of the Papal State would be guaranteed to him. This proposal was an abandonment of the haughty tone of the pamphlet and of part of its contentions.[15] Pius IX replied "that he could not cede what belonged, not to himself, but to all the Catholics"; that, besides, this concession would be a stimulant for the agitators in the other parts of his States.[16]

Opposition to the French Policy

From that moment all the Catholics who had rallied to the Empire sharply withdrew from its policy. The ultramontane party, whose organ was the Univers, did so, appealing especially to all the indefeasible rights of the papacy. The liberal Catholics, such as Dupanloup and Falloux, protested with no less vehemence, by striving to show, in Napoleon III's Roman policy, along with the violation of the rights of the Church, that of the principles of public law and the peace of the world. Thiers, Guizot, Saint-Marc-Girardin, and Villemain appealed both to the principles of public law and to the perils of that principle of nationalities which inspired the policy of the Empire, and they expressed themselves clearly in favor of maintaining the temporal power of the pope.[17] On the other hand, the Siècle and the Constitutionnel warmly endorsed the political change which the Emperor had just made.

The situation of the French government became difficult. It sought to attenuate the difficulties by suppressing (January 29, 1860) the Univers and by urging upon the entire press, by way of the Moniteur, the exercise of "moderation, in the interest of peace and religion." But the Univers having disappeared, all its editors except Louis and Eugène Veuillot found their way into the Monde,[18] which replaced the Univers. The seven years of the Univers' interruption were used by Louis Veuillot to write seven volumes, six pamphlets, and a number of periodical articles in which his talents as controversialist and writer appeared under a new form. "They have buried me the journalist," he said; "I sprout a pamphleteer." Moreover, at the side of the Monde, the Ami de la religion (a daily since March, 1859), and the Correspondant continued a vigorous defense of the rights of the Church and of the Holy Father. Under the direction of the two leaders of the episcopate (Bishop Pie and Bishop Dupanloup), Melchior du Lac, Aubineau, Jules Gondon, Louis de Carné, Augustin Cochin, Henry and Charles de Lacombe, Poujoulat, Falloux, Foisset, and many others fought valiantly at the breach.[19] The struggle was far from being over. On the contrary, an increase of activity was needed. About the end of January Count Cavour returned to political affairs as prime minister. The Turin official paper, the Opinione, announced this return in the following terms: "Cavour's first ministry signified independence; the second signifies annexation." What annexation was meant? With good reason an annexation was feared that would not spare the papal domain, not even the city of Rome.

[15] See this letter in the Moniteur, January 11, 1860.

[16] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 389.

[17] Cf. Villemain, La France, l'empire, et la papauté. For the letter to Villemain by Count de Chambord on the subject of this writing, see Vauthier, Villemain, pp. 193–95.

[18] On the suppression of the Univers and the foundation of the Monde, see Eugène Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, III, 308–79.

[19] Most of these polemists, as also the non-Catholic liberals who, such as Thiers, came out against the Italian policy of Napoleon III, likewise condemned the violation of the temporal domain of the papacy and the Italian unity. Almost alone, Father Lacordaire, in his pamphlet De la liberté l'Eglise et de l'Italie (February 25, 1860), uttered a note appreciably different. He said: "We declare that the temporal domain of the papacy, if we consider it in its essence and history, has about it nothing incompatible with the nationality and freedom of Italy" (Lacordaire, Œuvres, VII, 314). Says Foisset: "The work on La liberté de l'Eglise et de l'Italie created a lively sensation. In less than two weeks, 12,000 copies were printed. At Rome itself the first impression was favorable" (Foisset, Vie du P. Lacordaire, II, 388).

Garibaldi

Soon the word spread that Garibaldi was stirring. Cavour, in his retirement, had never lost from view the Italian political question, and had even helped it by his advice. Garibaldi, for the moment put aside, had continued to keep up the ardor of his followers. In a proclamation (December 24, 1859) addressed to the students of Pisa, he called on them, in the name of the "sublime maxims of Christ," to destroy "the cancer of the papacy." Besides, he had clever words on "the pious and generous king, given by God to the Italians as a redeeming angel," and on France, "mighty ally, which smiled on Italy with the precious blood of her brave sons." [20]

Napoleon's policy was as hesitant in practice as it was venturesome in ideas. He tried to check the movement by the proposal of a new "combination": the Romagnas would be ruled by Victor Emmanuel, but as the vicar of the Pope and with the payment of a tribute to the Holy See.[21] When this plan was rejected, as might have been foreseen, and when the Emperor made a pretense of counteracting the designs of Piedmont in another way, Cavour was not alarmed. "In a few days," he said, "we shall receive from France a sort of rose-water ultimatum." As another Italian said: "The Emperor shows his teeth; but they are artificial teeth."

Treaty of Turin (1860)

As a conclusion to all these parleys, on March 24, 1860, the representative of France, Benedetti, and Count Cavour signed at Turin a treaty by which Italy ceded Nice and Savoy to France on condition that the cession would be ratified by a popular vote. The following month the people of those districts voted to ratify the treaty. According to one report, when signing the act that detached from Italy the cradle of the dynasty of his country, Cavour experienced a moment of emotion. But he promptly regained his composure. "This cession was, at bottom, a sort of payment that would dispense with any gratitude and would perhaps authorize new undertakings." [22] As he was going out, the Sardinian minister emphasized the meaning of the treaty. Coming up to Talleyrand, who was the chargé d'affaires of France,[23] he whispered these words to him: "So, Baron, henceforth we are accomplices."

[20] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 387.
[21] Falloux, Mémoires d'un royaliste, II, 308.

A body of troops was kept at Rome, officially charged with defending the Papal States against any attack. But "at first the protection was only partial. Although real in Rome and in the old Patrimony of St. Peter, it did not cover either materially or morally the districts located beyond the Apennines. . . . Then, the protector, in return for his services, assumed the right to give his opinions, to advise reforms. . . . Besides, the French had their own manner of sustaining the papal power. They did not neglect any occasion of showing their respect for Pius IX; but, with marked affectation, they separated the Pontiff from his entourage. . . . The Holy Father and his advisers were too sharp not to perceive these distinctions." [24]

Evidently the papal government could enjoy complete independence only when it would have resources sufficient for its maintenance and its defense, and would have at its disposal an army fully subject to its command. These two needs were met by the foundation of Peter's Pence and by the creation of the papal volunteers.

In 1849, at the time of Pius IX's exile at Gaeta, Catholics of various nations were eager, by their offerings, to come to the relief of the despoiled Pontiff. The next year a Belgian Catholic, Professor Feije, recalled, in a Dutch review,[25] how, once upon a time, from the eighth to the sixteenth century, the Christian princes had asked from each house of the kingdom, or at least from each member of the nobility, under the name of St. Peter's pence, an annual contribution intended to provide for the needs of the Church and of the pope.[26] In that article and in several speeches, the eminent Catholic showed what a grand spectacle the faithful would give to the world by offering to their common father, prompted solely by their faith and their love, the tribute which they formerly offered in obedience to the orders of their rulers.

[22] La Gorce, op. cit., III, 210.

[23] As a gesture of protest against the Italian policy, Napoleon III had recalled his ambassador from Turin and replaced him by a chargé d'affaires. This was the "rose-water protest" spoken of by Cavour.

[24] La Gorce, op. cit., III, 360.

This appeal was heeded. Collections and subscriptions were organized in Belgium to provide for the needs of the Sovereign Pontiff. A decision of the tribunal of Mons (July 2, 1860) and a confirmative decree of the court of Brussels (August 10, 1860) condemned the organizers of these collections and subscriptions as violating the royal decree of September 22, 1823, on the crime of begging.[27] But a new decree of the Brussels court (March 9, 1861) declared that the royal edict previously appealed to was not applicable in this case.[28] Meanwhile Cardinal Antonelli, Secretary of State of the Holy See, by a letter of October 6, 1860, addressed to Cardinal Wiseman, had informed the Catholic world that the Holy Father, "who never wished to accept any money offering on the part of any government, would however on such and such conditions, gladly see the faithful of the Catholic world come to his aid with their Peter's Pence." [29] In consequence of this letter, Cardinal Wiseman, recalling that [25] Der Katholick, XIX, 69 ff.

[26] On the old St. Peter's pence, see Wetzer and Welte, Dictionnaire de théologie, s.v. "Denier de Saint-Pierre"; under the same word, in the Dictionnaire d'archéologie of Dom Cabrol, III, 585. Cf. the Revue catholique of Louvain, XVIII, 39.

[27] Revue catholique of Louvain, XVIII, 585–94.

[28] Ibid., XIX, 218–22.

[29] Ami de la religion, November 15, 1860, p. 383.

the Catholics of England had long ago deemed it a point of honor not to yield to anyone the first place in their devotion of the Apostolic See, invited the clergy of the diocese of Westminster to organize meetings and committees, and appointed a treasurer of the Peter's Pence.[30]

In the Ami de la religion (October 23, 1860) Father Sisson made an urgent appeal to the Catholics of France.[31] Louis Veuillot, at that time not allowed to write for a paper, was unable to conduct a press campaign; but Mlle Elise Veuillot, Mesdames Eugène Veuillot, Emile Lafont, and Léon Aubineau, sister and wives of the principal editors of the Univers, exercised such zeal to the profit of the Peter's Pence that Pius IX wished to felicitate them publicly.[32] The French government refused to the undertaking the right to form itself into a legal association; but it did not venture to forbid the collections in the churches; as for the subscriptions made in the homes, these escaped government control. In Italy the Catholic paper, the Armonia, periodically collected considerable sums. Ireland and Poland, from the depth of their poverty, rivaled the richer countries. At Dublin a collection produced, in a single day, more than 200,000 francs.[33]

Papal Volunteers

The Catholics did not limit themselves to giving Pius IX the tribute of their gold; they offered him that of their blood. Almost every steamer brought to Rome, French, Belgian, Irish, Spanish, and Dutch volunteers. Since the assaulting army became more and more, under the command of Garibaldi, the cos-

[30] Ibid., p. 384.

[31] Ibid., October 23, 1860, VII, 181.

[32] Brief of May 5, 1860. See Eugène Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, III, 388.

[33] By the encyclical Saepe venerabiles fratres (August 5, 1875) Pius IX gave the work of Peter's Pence an official consecration. See Daux, Le denier de Saint-Pierre, ses origines, ses raisons, ses convenances.

mopolitan army of the revolution, that of Pius IX would become that of international Catholicism. In the spring of 1860, Pius IX entrusted the care of organizing this army to a prelate as energetic as he was pious, a former officer of the Belgian army and of the French army, Bishop Xavier de Mérode; and the post of commander to a French general, a hero of the Algerian campaigns, Louis de Lamoricière.

The title of "minister of the armies" was conferred by Pius IX on Bishop Mérode. Under the circumstances this office gave him an exceptional authority in the papal State, at the side of the Secretary of State, Antonelli, whose influence had until then not been counterbalanced by any other; but now it was suddenly limited. Antonelli was supposed to favor the views of the intransigent and authoritarian Catholics; Mérode, brother-in-law of Montalembert, was bound by family connections and friendship with the leaders of the liberal movement. The Secretary was blamed for a cleverness that was not far from dissimulation; the most salient defect of the minister of the armies was an excess of sincerity, sometimes going to the point of rudeness. The tractable Italian and the robust Franco-Belgian were at disagreement more than once; but both of them gave evidence of a like attachment to the person and the cause of the Pope. Pius IX accorded equal confidence to each of them. Antonelli impressed the Pope by his experience, his skill in managing affairs, his exquisite knowledge of men and things in diplomatic relations; Mérode, in spite of his bluntness and blunders, pleased the Pope by his frankness, the spontaneity of his heart and of his spirit, by his unreserved devotion. For the command of his new army, Pius IX sanctioned Bishop Mérode's call to one of his companions-in-arms in Africa, General Lamoricière.

Louis Juchault de Lamoricière, born at Nantes in 1806, had already acquired a glorious renown on the battlefield and in the political strifes. The African wars had revealed his brilliant military qualities. After his return to France, he was acclaimed as one of the leaders of the conservative republican party. In the days of June, he had crushed the revolutionary effort. At the time of the 1851 coup d'état he was exiled by Prince Napoleon, who feared his influence. When he returned to France, he did not re-enter the military service. His sword was thus available. Having long been alien to the practices of religion, seduced as he was, like many men of his time, by the sophisms of the dreamers who were preaching a vague social renovation, he had recently found again the faith of his childhood and declared it with courage before his former friends. A few months earlier, Corcelles, former French ambassador at Rome, was speaking of the papal cause in his presence. At this, Lamoricière said: "It is a cause for which it would be beautiful to die." When (March 3, 1860) Mérode went to Picardy to find him and transmit Pius IX's proposal to him, he did not hide from the veteran fighter the difficulties of the undertaking. The military hero wrote to a friend: "I am not wanting in courage; but I wait for my reward above more than here below." [34]

He left his castle of Prouzel on March 19. Reaching Rome on April 3, he declared to the Holy Father that he would put himself at the Pontiff's service on the single condition that he would never have to serve against France. His first proclamation to the troops showed in what spirit he understood his mission. "The revolution," he said, "as formerly Islam, today threatens Europe. Today, as formerly, the cause of the papacy is the cause of the civilization and freedom of the world."

The task confided to the general required the qualities of an organizer no less than those of a general. "The papal army comprised scarcely 7,000 or 8,000 men, poorly clothed, ill equipped, and not well officered. . . . No war material, or material so outmoded that it belonged only in a museum." [35] "With that tireless activity which France and Algeria had admired, Lamoricière organized, created, improved, developed. Under his powerful impulse, the material was refurnished, the staff of officers was reformed, and the services were regularized." [36] Lamoricière made an appeal to the young Catholics of France, to his former companions-in-arms. Many of these joined him.

[34] La Gorce, op. cit., III 367. On Lamoricière, see Emile Keller, Vie du général Lamoricière.

[35] La Gorce, op. cit., III, 369.

During this time Garibaldi, then at Turin, was likewise recruiting volunteers for a mysterious expedition. Was he going to invade the Marches? For a moment such was the surmise. Soon it was learned that he was directing his steps toward the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. According to a trustworthy report, Cavour, having learned of the project, warmly approved it. "It is well," he said; "we must begin in the south and then come up to the north. Be assured that, when the hour arrives, I will be second to none in daring." [37] Officially Victor Emmanuel's prime minister disavowed the expedition.[38] Soon Marsala and Palermo fell to the hands of the adventurer. In the presence of the peril, King Francis II of Naples appealed to a liberal ministry, looked forward to an alliance with Piedmont, then changing his tactics, turned to Russia, Austria, Prussia, France, and England, calling the attention of these powers to the danger of an excessive agrandizement of Piedmont.[39] Not finding a favorable echo in these powers, feeling himself abandoned, betrayed, in Naples itself and even in his entourage, in consequence of intrigues to which Cavour was perhaps not a stranger, on September 6, 1860, the King of Naples embarked with his family on a Spanish vessel and headed to Gaeta, amid a sympathetic people, but a silent one, whose timorous respect did not dare to manifest itself by any outward sign. The next day, [36] Freppel, Œuvres, VII, 200.

[37] Speech of Sirtori in the Italian Chamber, June 19, 1863 (Parlamento italiano, p. 214).

[38] Gazzetta officiale, May 18, 1860.

[39] La Gorce, op. cit., III, 394.

without firing a shot, Garibaldi, preceding his army with a few companions, took possession of Naples.[40]

Garibaldi's Prestige

Garibaldi's popularity was already great. That coup, that unheard-of success in daring, made of him, in the eyes of the masses, a sort of mysterious hero, superhuman. He was the Impregnable, the Invulnerable, the providential Liberator, with the invincible talisman. The prestige of the conqueror of the Two Sicilies even won over some men of the high society. Baron Ricasoli wrote: "Our Garibaldi ought to be the king." [41] Garibaldi was on the road to personify in the eyes of public opinion, more than Victor Emmanuel, more than Cavour himself, that movement of the Risorgimento, the mention of which gave a thrill to the Italians. In the strength of such an influence, what was he going to do? To invade the Marches, according to his first plan? To turn northward, according to Cavour's formula, that is, toward the Roman state, after his triumph in the south?

All circumstances led to that surmise. But was Cavour's whole plan going to be upset? The statesman had wished to seize the revolutionary forces to the advantage of the Savoy dynasty; the condottiere, by continuing his triumphant march, had every chance of seizing the power of that dynasty to the profit of the revolution. For a man as unscrupulous as was Cavour, regarding the choice of means, a means presented itself of warding off the danger: to have preceded Garibaldi to Naples had been impossible; he must be preceded at Rome. Cavour's decision was at once made in this sense. An astonishing fact was revealed, which gives an idea of the state of mind of [40] Garibaldi had set out with a force of about a thousand men. Hence the name of expedition of the thousand, which was given to the campaign.

[41] Ricasoli, Lettere e documenti, V, 161.

that period: some Italian patriots of conservative and Catholic tint, seemed to be resigned to this extremity. Said Count Pasolini, former minister of Pius IX: "What would you have? I now understand that Cavour has nothing to do but invade the Marches." [42] That seemed to be the only means of not losing the whole fruit of the national movement.

However, an obstacle rose up. The French troops were still in the Roman state, put there to defend it. But Napoloen appeared to have been vanquished in turn by the reasoning that had decided Cavour. Mysteries still hover over the meeting which the Emperor of the French had on August 28, 1860, at Chambéry with the Italian minister Farini and general Cialdini. If Napoleon did not utter the famous phrase, "Fate presto" ("Act quickly"), to whom it has been attributed,[43] it well expresses the depth of his thought, such as revealed by his subsequent acts. A serious historian, writing of Napoleon's attitude in this affair, says: "I do not know whether the word 'complicity' would be too strong; but the word 'weakness' would certainly be too weak." [44]

A pretext was needed for the invasion. Cavour referred to the Pope's armament, "those papal troops, made up of people of every nation and of every religion: all this deeply offends the public conscience of Italy and of Europe." [45] By an ultimatum he demanded the immediate disarming of the new forces of the Holy See. Antonelli's sagacity saw the trap. What was intended was to provoke a violent reply of the Roman chancery, thus giving ground for a casus belli. But The Secretary of State of Pius IX was calm, correct, diplomatically irreproachable. But before this reply had reached its destination, the Sardinian troops, [42] Pasolini, Memorie, raccolte da suo figlio, p. 626.

[43] On this interview at Chambéry, see La Gorce, op. cit., III, 406–10, and Villefranche (Pie IX, p. 188), who declares that he had from well informed witnesses certain important details of the meeting.

[44] La Gorce, op. cit., III, 408.

[45] Ibid., p. 410.

urged to be ahead of the Garibaldi army, had crossed the frontier.

Lamoricière could not fail to recognize the fact that, notwithstanding his efforts, the armament and the organization of the army that he had at his command was in a state of notable inferiority. He said to his friend Quatrebarbes: "I am in the position of a man who would have to fight at a distance of fifty paces with a pistol against a foe armed with a rifle." [46] Moreover, adapting his conduct to the explicit declarations that reached him from Cardinal Antonelli, he had supposed, up to the last moment, that Piedmont would not intervene in the campaign, and that France would oppose the invasion, even against the Sardinian forces.[47] Consequently the general, expecting only some partial uprisings and an aggression of Garibaldian bands, had scattered his forces over the whole papal territory. The invasion of the state along the entire Piedmont frontier took him by surprise. Only one tactic was possible: to reassemble at one point all the available troops and endeavor to penetrate the Piedmont lines, and to take refuge at Ancona. Next to Rome, that city was almost the only one that could be effectively defended, at least for a certain time. There the defense might be prolonged until the arrival of the French reinforcements. For, confident in the assurances which Antonelli sent to him, Lamoricière kept counting on the assistance of France.

[46] On the armament and organization of the papal army, see (in Eugène Veuillot, Le Piémont dans les Etats de l'Eglise, documents et commentaires) the "Rapport du général Lamoricière sur les operations de l'armée pontificale dans les Marches et l'Ombrie," pp. 482–84.

[47] See the explicit declarations in Lamoricière's Rapport (ibid., pp. 482, 486, 493). The Duke de Gramont wrote to the consul of Ancona: "The Emperor has written that, if the Sardinian forces enter into the papal territory, he will be obliged to oppose them" (ibid., p. 493). How was Antonelli's far-sightedness at fault in such serious circumstances?

Battle of Castelfidardo

The forces assembled in accordance with that plan met the enemy, near Notre Dame de Loreto, at Castelfidardo, on September 17, 1860. The inevitable clash would apparently take place the next day. The Piedmont troops occupied the hills that descend from the height of Castelfidardo to the plain. Their artillery threatened the slopes on all sides. The chief centers of resistance were two farms, strongly fortified and situated about 2,000 feet one behind the other.[48] The army was commanded by General Cialdini, who had 45,000 men and several cannons. The papal army counted 5,600 men at most and a single artillery piece of old model.

At four o'clock in the morning the soldiers of the Pope, with their two generals at their head, Lamoricière and Pimodan, prepared for the battle by attending Mass in the holy chapel of Loreto. At eight o'clock Pimodan attacked the two farms, following the instructions he had received. The first farm, although stoutly defended, was taken; but the Sardinian troops had time to mass strongly about the second. Arrived at a distance of fifty paces from its objective, the attacking force was decimated by a steady fusillade. The superiority of numbers and of position was so crushing on the side of the Piedmont forces that the issue of the fight could not be doubted. But the papal volunteers wished at least, "while losing the battle, to save their honor." After a momentary retreat movement, they were seen to face about suddenly, await the enemy at fifteen paces' distance, discharge a well directed fire, then make a bayonet charge with such fury that the enemy, disconcerted by such daring, withdrew 200 paces. The death of Pimodan decided the outcome of the combat. Lamoricière, still calm amid the inevitable disorder which followed this loss, tried to direct the retreat, which became inevitable. Then, believing everything lost, he resolved to carry out, with forty-five horses and only a hundred foot soldiers, the project which he had intended to realize with his whole army. He passed through the lines of the enemy, who were astonished at his daring, and reached Ancona at five o'clock that evening, leaving the Castelfidardo hill and the surrounding fields covered with wounded.[49]

[48] For a detailed description of the field of battle, see ibid., p. 497.

Siege of Ancona

The arrival of Lamoricière and his little force brought to 4,200 the number of soldiers for the defense of the city. This number was indeed small for a place whose defense works had a perimeter of five miles and that was soon assaulted on the land side by the army of Cialdini and on the side of the sea by a fleet of eleven large warships carrying more than 400 pieces of artillery. It was again the fight of "the man who fights at a distance of fifty paces, with a pistol, against a foe armed with a rifle."

On the 18th the firing began from the cannons of the fleet; four days later the blockade of the port was effected. Lamoricière anxiously awaited the arrival of the French army. "If Goyon has not lost any time," he said, "he ought to be on the march." [50] Each day the garrison lost from twenty to eighty men. On the 28th the Piedmont frigates began a furious attack. A large number of gunners were slain; many of the cannons were overthrown; the walls crumbled, and their fall widened the embrasures. A 2,000-foot breach was opened, offering to the enemy the facility of landing on the quay and taking the city by assault. Lamoricière hoisted the white flag on the citadel.[51] The capitulation was on the 29th at two o'clock in the afternoon. The little papal army no longer existed. The Marches and Umbria were occupied by the Piedmont army.

[49] At the side of General Pimodan, the following had fallen for the defense of the Pope: Arthur de Chalus, Joseph Guérin, Félix de Montravel, Alfred de la Barre de Nanteuil, Alphonse Ménard, and many others, whose heroism was celebrated by the funeral orations of Bishop Pie and Bishop Dupanloup. See Pie, Œuvres, IV, 44–70; Dupanloup, Œuvres choisies, I, 181–226; Veuillot, op. cit., p. 146. Cf. Segur, Les martyrs de Castelfidardo.

[50] General Goyon was, as we know, the head of the French troops intended for the protection of the papal state.

A short time after that (February 15, 1861) appeared a pamphlet entitled: La France, Rome, et l'Italie. Its author was Arthur de la Guéronnière, from whose pen had already come two resounding pamphlets: Napoléon III et l'Italie and Le Pape et le Congrès. They maintained that the one responsible for the recent catastrophies was not Cavour, but the Pope, who, by his stubbornness in not complying with the desires of his people and the requests of the powers, had caused the whole evil. In this pamphlet, the work of a man who had been several times the spokesman of Napoleon III, public opinion saw a new expression of the imperial thought.[52] The strange assertion of this writing was compared with the singular inaction of the troops whom the Emperor had destined for the defense of the papacy. In a pastoral letter dated February 22, Bishop Pie of Poitiers wrote the following words in which everyone saw an allusion to the attitude of Napoleon III: "Pilate could have saved Christ, and without Pilate they could not have put Christ to death. . . . Wash your hands, O Pilate; declare yourself innocent of Christ's death." [53] When denounced to the Council of State as guilty of abusive use of power, the prelate declared that he had intended to depict "not what was, but what would be if the conclusions which the press gave to the pamphlet, but which the pamphlet rejected, would end by being realized." [54] In spite of this defense, the Council of State declared it a case of abuse.

While the trial of the Bishop of Poitiers was going on, a [51] Lamoricière, Rapport, pp. 508–25.

[52] According to Thouvenel, the Emperor had no hand in the pamphlet; but its inspiration came from Count de Persigny (Le secret de l'empereur, I, 432).

[53] Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, II, 116.

[54] Ibid., II, 125.

young layman, a deputy, had spoken from the height of the rostrum a more direct and no less courageous accusation against the sovereign. Emile Keller, who would later hold a place of honor among the good servants of the Church and of France, was at that time unknown. When he spoke (March 13, 1861) in the Chamber of Deputies, his speech began amid general indifference. But gradually, interspersed with strong reflections that he made on the political and religious events of the preceding year, the lively account caught the attention of his fellow deputies. "Piedmont could have been stopped; but the wish to do so was needed. . . . The revolution, incarnate in Orsini, was what made France draw back." The boldness of these words was even surpassed, if such was possible, when the speaker, using direct discourse, added: "You have recoiled before Garibaldi, at the very time when you were saying you were his greatest enemy; at the same time you sent a help to Piedmont and tatters to the King of Naples; you have written on the same pages the inviolability of the Holy Father and the fall of the Holy Father. Say, then, what you are." By the mouth of the minister Billault, the government attempted to reply, but was unable to escape from the equivocation.

Intervention of Napoleon III

At bottom, ever a chimerical dreamer, Napoleon pursued the idea of making himself the agent of a conciliation between the papacy and Italy on the basis of accomplished facts. This idea furnishes us with the key to all the diplomatic negotiations that continued from 1861 to 1864 between the court of Paris on one side and the court of Turin on the other and that ended in the convention of September 15, 1864.

On May 20, 1862, the Emperor wrote to his minister of foreign affairs, Thouvenel: "My policy has always been the same with regard to Italy: to second the national aspirations and to induce the Pope to become their supporter rather than their foe; in a word, to consecrate the alliance of religion and liberty." [55] In conformity with these directions, the minister wrote to Marquis de La Valette, French ambassador at Rome: "Any combination resting on another territorial basis than the status quo could not be sustained today. . . . The Holy Father could reserve his rights in whatever form he should judge fitting. . . . Italy, on its side, would have to give up its claims on Rome." [56] Thouvenel privately called such a project "the dream of an impossible marriage." [57] Anyone would have to be blinded, as was the mind of Napoleon by the mists of an ideology lacking contact with the realities, not to see that at the point to which matters had come, neither would the Pope sanction these violent injustices just inflicted on him nor would the King of Italy stop, unless by force, in the movement that was pushing Piedmont toward Rome.

On June 24, 1862, Marquis de La Valette acquainted his government of the complete failure of all the steps he had taken with the Holy See to have the imperial proposals accepted.[58] As for the King of Italy, if he decided (August 29) to stop the march of the Garibaldian army at Aspromonte, that decision was solely to prevent the condottiere from acting prematurely and snatching from him the honor of the expedition which he planned to make himself. A dispatch sent (September 20, 1862) to the diplomatic agents of Italy by General Durando, minister of foreign affairs, leaves no doubt on this subject. Said the minister: "The whole nation demands its capital. Not long ago it resisted the ill considered dash of Garibaldi only because it is convinced that the government of the King will be able to carry out the mandate it has received from the parliament with re-

[55] Moniteur, September 25, 1862.
[56] Ibid.
[57] Thouvenel, op. cit., II, 303. Letter to the Duke de Gramont, May 24, 1862.
[58] Ibid.

gard to Rome." [59] In spite of all, Napoleon, obstinate in his dream, continued to seek the compromise formula that would satisfy both the independence of the Pope and the so-called rights of Italy. After several fruitless combinations, the diplomats of Paris and of Turin finally made the Convention of September 15, 1864 between France and Italy. The text is as follows:

Art. 1. Italy agrees not to attack the present territory of the Holy Father and to prevent, even by force, every attack coming from outside against the said territory.

Art. 2. France will withdraw her troops from the Papal States gradually and in the measure in which the army of the Holy Father will be organized. However, the evacuation must be accomplished within two years.

Art. 3. The Italian government refrains from any protest against the organization of a papal army, even composed of foreign volunteers, sufficient to maintain the authority of the Holy Father and the tranquillity of his States, both internally and on the frontier, provided this force does not degenerate into a means of attack against the Italian government.

Art. 4. Italy declares itself ready to enter into an arrangement for taking over a proportional part of the debt of the former States of the Church.

Art. 5. The present convention will be ratified, and the ratifications will be exchanged within two weeks or sooner if possible.

We shall see presently that this convention, instead of assuring the peace, did but let loose the war.

[59] Jules Zeller, Année historique, fifth year, 14.

CHAPTER XXXI

Attitude of Various States

IN THE minds of all Catholics, the Franco-Italian treaty seemed to express, according to the words of a historian, "the abandonment to a final expiration of the temporal power and of the papacy " [1] by France. But we need to remark that this policy of abandonment was not special to the French government. Austria, which always gloried in continuing the traditions of the Holy Empire and whose emperor was fond of proclaiming himself the born-protector of the Holy See, had, like France, made promises to the pope, but did not keep them. At the time of the invasion of the papal territory by the Piedmont army, Austrian troops were massed along the Mincio on a war footing. Nothing was needed but an imperial order to launch them on the Sardinian territory. That order was signed by the Emperor; but, two hours later, it was recalled, when his ministers and his principal generals, who were consulted by him, reminded him of the gaps in his army, and pointed out the still bleeding wounds of Magenta and Solferino, and pictured France again passing the Alps and revolution breaking loose in his country. "His fleet remained at anchor in the harbor of Trieste, where it was able to hear, a few days later, the bombardment of Ancona; and the army of the Mincio was immobilized in its quadrilateral, while waiting for Italian unity to become a reality, which would combine forces with Prussia to expel it." [2]

The powers signatory of the treaties of Vienna, who had

[1] Besson, Xavier de Mérode, p. 226.
[2] Villefranche, Pie IX, p. 195.

sworn to intervene with armed force against whoever should attempt to break the equilibrium established by them, did not move. Russia contemplated the catastrophe without saying anything.[3] England, through its prime ministers, Palmerston and Russell, had, from the outset, vied with France to encourage the projects of Italian unification and thereby the aggression against the States of the Church. As for Prussia, feeling that Italian unity, formed about the Savoy dynasty, would be the prelude of German unity, to be realized around the dynasty of the Hohenzollerns, she had followed the events with sympathy. As formerly the dismemberment of Poland, so the invasion of the papal domain was "the sin of all Europe."

Furthermore, nearly everywhere in Europe the Church had to undergo persecutions or vexations on the part of the states. Adding encroachments in the spiritual order to his aggressions in the temporal order, the King of Italy, by a decree of March 16, 1863, subjected to the royal exequatur "every ecclesiastical provision coming from an authority non resident in the kingdom," and a large number of acts about benefices, pious legacies, alienation of Church property, dispensations from marriage impediments, dispensations from monastic vows, and other similar questions.[4] The next year (July 12, 1864) a royal ordinance required the placet in the kingdom of Italy for all rescripts or decrees of the diocesan ordinaries containing the appointment of pastors or curates, or containing provisions about ecclesiastical property.[5]

[3] "The dislike which Russia had in common with Austria for the principle of nationalities, and the respect she professed for the old European law and for the threatened treaties, seemed to make Russia in duty bound to take part against the Italian unity, but the logic of interests and of passions won the day over the logic of principles. We see her, by her maneuvers, furnish the revolutionaries the support which they lacked." Lescoeur, L'Eglise catholique en Pologne, p. 216.

[4] For the complete text of the decree, see Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, pp. 522–24.

[5] Ibid., p. 548.

France

In France, Napoleon III was disturbed by the opposition which his Italian policy had stirred up among the Catholics. But he thought he could disarm it by giving free rein to the irreligious press. This press, beginning in 1860, redoubled its attacks on the clergy and on the Church in general.[6] The Emperor was not satisfied with this indirect persecution. His minister of justice, Delangle, ordered (March 8, 1861) the procurators general, by virtue of art. 201 and 204 of the penal code, that is, by rendering them subject to imprisonment or banishment, to prosecute the members of the Catholic clergy who, in the exercise of their office, criticized the policy of the government.[7] Lastly, by several acts of the end of 1861 and the beginning of 1862, the imperial government attacked the laity itself, in their charitable and apostolic works, notably in the most flourishing of these works, that of the St. Vincent de Paul conferences. These were called upon, either to accept a president appointed by imperial decree, or no longer to have any connection with one another.[8] Two other significant facts deeply afflicted the Catholics in the course of January, 1862. On the 11th of that month an imperial decree named as professor in the Collège de France, Ernest Renan, who had just given the scandal of his apostasy; the same day a second decree instituted Marshal Magnan grand master of the Grand Orient of France.[9]

Other Countries

Spain, which had been so disturbed in 1859, experienced a revival of troubles in 1866. In the interval between these two [6] Cf. La Gorce, Histoire du second empire, Vol. IV, Bk. XXIV; Weiss, Histoire du parti républicain en France.

[7] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 450.

[8] Circular of Persigny, October 6, 1861 (Chantrel, op. cit., p. 459). Cf. ibid., pp. 466, 479, 480.

[9] Ibid., p. 470.

dates, the country enjoyed a period of calm which permitted the Catholic Church to develop there. But the campaign conducted between 1861 and 1865 to obtain from Queen Isabella the recognition of the kingdom of Italy, and the success of that campaign in 1865, were a cause of grief for the Catholics, for the aim of the agitators took in the Roman and papal question no less than the Italian question properly so called.

In Portugal a royal decree (March 5, 1861), pronouncing the dissolution of the communities of the Daughters of Charity and declaring their possessions incorporated in the national domain,[10] was the forerunner of other measures touching all the religious congregations.[11]

In Switzerland, Bishop Marilley's return from exile in 1856 had not put an end to the measures of persecution. On July 22, every foreign jurisdiction was suppressed on Swiss territory. The government took part in the direction of the seminaries and monasteries, and gave the clergy numerous matters of complaint. The courts in Sweden continued to act rigorously by penalties of exile and loss of civil rights against persons convicted of embracing Catholicism.[12] In Germany, the Chambers of the kingdom of Würtemberg refused to approve in 1861 a concordat concluded between the King and the Holy See.[13]

In the movement which led the Bulgarians, about the middle of the nineteenth century, to demand their religious independence from the Phanar, an influential minority turned their eyes Romeward and launched the idea of union with the Catholic Church. At Constantinople in 1860 the delegates of 2,000 of them declared themselves Catholics. On January 21, 1861, Pius IX confirmed this act, and less than three months later he himself consecrated the first uniate arch-

[10] Ibid., p. 486.
[11] Ibid., p. 487, 495, 524.
[12] Ibid., p. 299.
[13] Ibid., p. 454.

bishop of Bulgaria, Sokolski, an aged and ignorant archimandrite whom the Turkish government recognized officially on June 1 of the same year. All these events brought about numerous conversions; in a few years the abjurations amounted to 60,000.

Unfortunately for Catholicism, Russia was on the watch. On June 18, 1861, Archbishop Sokolski disappeared suddenly on a Russian ship which conveyed him to Odessa; from there he was conducted to some unknown place. No one has been able to determine exactly whether he must be considered an accomplice or a victim of the Muscovite maneuvers; but the former seems more likely. This unexpected blow slowed down the movement of conversions. In 1862 Sokolski was given a successor in the person of Raphael Popof, who governed the Catholic Bulgarians until 1883. At that date Rome created a new ecclesiastical organization. Constantinople was given an apostolic administrator with the title of archbishop, and two vicars apostolic: one of Macedonia, with residence at Salonica, the other of Thrace, with residence at Adrianople.[14]

Russian Persecutions

The court of Russia was a party to the intrigues in this affair. These showed once more how well inspired the Holy See had been when, neither in 1772, while Catherine II was solemnly promising freedom to the Catholics, nor in 1815, when Alexander I made himself the head of the Holy Alliance against the Revolution, it did not trust unreservedly in the promises of the empire of the Czars. Basically the czars never considered themselves bound by such promises, whether toward the nations of which they made themselves the protectors, or toward the Ruthenian Catholics of their states, or toward those of Poland. The principle of "reason of state," which, under the absolute governments, too often serves to cover the whims of despotism, obliged them, they said, to act thus.

[14] R. Janin, in Echos d'Orient, September–October, 1915, p. 521. Cf. S. Vailhé, s.v. "Bulgarie" in Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie, II, 1228–31.

In 1854 the coreligionists of Czar Nicholas were the object of some vexatious measures by the Ottoman Porte. He made this deed a pretext for organizing a formidable persecution against all those of his subjects who did not belong to the Orthodox religion. Mussulmans, Lutherans, Jews, and Catholics were embraced in the same persecution. He held that, in acting thus, he was simply resuming the work of "Russification" dear to Catherine II and for a time abandoned by Paul I. He "purified" the clergy by introducing into their ranks the greatest possible number of those won to his plans. Several of them passed over to the schism. But they did not draw with them the people, who refused to imitate the shameful defection of their leaders and manifested an admirable faithfulness to their beliefs. Prison, the knout, and Siberia made thousands of martyrs. After the coming of Alexander II, who mounted the throne in 1855 and at once showed the desire to pursue his father's plan, Pius IX, by several acts (April 9, 1855, January 30 and September 7, 1856) set forth the complaints of the Holy See. The only results of these steps were some vague declarations and some ineffectual measures. The diocese of Chelm remained the last asylum of the uniate Ruthenians. The Czar sent there, as seminary professors, some clerics trained in the schismatic universities. When, on January 31, 1859, Pius IX repeated his grievances, the Emperor merely replied in general terms that he was watching over the interests of the Roman Catholics.[15]

Persecution of Polish Catholics

In 1856, at the very time when the Russian persecution was being waged against the Ruthenian Church, the court of St. Petersburg appeared intent on adopting a milder policy toward the Catholics of Poland. This attitude was soon explained. The Czar was afraid that the peace treaty which regulated the Eastern question would affect the Polish question. On this point the treaty of Paris was silent. On January 7, 1857, the Czar issued a ukase permitting the repairing of ruined churches and even the building of churches in places that had none. But in practice the government so contrived as to hinder or even to annul the concessions made to the Catholics, and several times the materials prepared by them for the construction of a church were confiscated and given to a pope (that is, a parish priest of the Orthodox Church).[16] On November 12, 1859, a rescript forbade, "under pain of immediate expulsion," any Catholic priest "to admit to any religious act other persons than their own parishioners." [17] This measure amounted to an absolute prohibition of every act of proselyting by the priest and any conversion of the schismatics. In 1860 Father Lescoeur thus defined the state of Poland under the Russian regime: "Total political absorption, gradual but inevitable religious absorption." [18] In 1861 Archbishop Anthony Fialkowski of Warsaw died, and the chapter elected a capitular vicar who was displeasing to the government; the newly elected was imprisoned and the chapter was forbidden to communicate with the Pope. On this occasion armed forces entered several churches to terrorize the people.

[15] See E. Likowski, Historya unii Kasciola ruskiego z Kosciolem rezymskim; Pierling, La Russie et le Saint-Siège, Vol. III; Lescoeur, L'Eglise catholique et le gouvernement russe.

The people, closely watched by numerous police agents, gathered about the nobility of the country. These, residing on their domains, had remained attached to the cause of national independence and had their rallying center in an agricultural society with headquarters at Warsaw. During this time the Polish émigrés tried to arouse Europe for their cause. The nobles, most of them refugees in Paris, about Prince Czartiryski, counted on the intervention of the Catholic governments; students and workmen, who had joined the democratic parties, counted on the revolutionary movement. This latter element, however, was never predominant.[19] The Catholic element as a whole always marked the Polish insurrection.

[16] Cf. Lescoeur, op. cit., pp. 220–23.
[17] Ibid., p. 225.
[18] Ibid., p. 243.

This revolt broke out suddenly in January, 1863. The Russian authorities, on the pretense of an enlistment, had convoked the chief young men suspected of nationalism, and then arrested them. Several succeded in escaping; others, suspecting a trap, did not answer the summons. They took refuge in the woods and there organized themselves in armed bands, which made sudden appearances, engaged in small skirmishes, then disappeared in the forests, concealing themselves in country places, protected by the complicity of the peasants. The strife did not have the same character as in 1831, when Poland possessed a regular army. The Russian government had dissolved the agricultural society; but this, before disappearing, constituted a secret committee at Warsaw, which directed all the operations and which the police were never able to discover. An army of 200,000 men was unable to get the better of these bands of rebels whose total number did not reach 8,000. Alexander II, perplexed, wavered between two policies. At one time he tried, by liberal concessions, to win the Polish population; and then he had recourse to rigorous repression.

The Poles understood that the victory would finally go the number and force of their enemy, if Europe did not come to their aid. But France, Austria, and England limited themselves to Platonic manifestations.[20] As for Prussia, whose political attitude was governed by Bismarck, it helped the Russian government to crush Poland, signing an agreement which closed the frontiers to the insurgents. The Landtag even accused Bismarck of having turned over some Polish refugees to the Muscovite government.[21] From that time on the lot of Poland was decided. The conqueror took brutal advantage of his material superiority, giving the repression a ferocious and implacable character from which the Catholic religion especially had to suffer. Archbishop Felinski was deported to Iaroslav. His clergy were forbidden to correspond with him. Priests were imprisoned and put to death on the simple charge that they brought the aid of religion to Poles wounded in the fights. Heavy contributions were imposed on the clergy. Many monasteries were converted into barracks, and several churches were sacked. Lithuania, which, transformed into a Russian department, had petitioned its reunion with the kingdom of Poland and had sustained the insurgents, was subjected to the same measures of terror as Poland. General Mouraviev, who was charged with directing this war of destruction, was given the surname of "hangman of Vilna"; but the Russian patriots acclaimed him on his return and even decided on the foundation of an annual feast to commemorate the crushing of the Polish nationality.

[19] Garibaldi wrote to the Poles: "Cease giving a religious character to your heroic struggle; for you will thus alienate men's sympathies" (quoted by the Correspondant, May 25, 1864, p. 10).

[20] Three times (April, June, and August, 1863) France, Austria, and England took a collective step in favor of Poland. But, as these powers did not hint that they would back up their demands by acts, Russia merely replied that it did not hold itself bound by the treaties of 1815 for the government of Poland, and that it was simply suppressing a revolutionary insurrection. See Montalembert, "Le Pape et la Pologne," in the Correspondant, May 25, 1864, p. 9, 17.

The Pope's voice alone championed the cause of justice and religion. On April 24, 1864, Pius IX, celebrating in the chapel of the Propaganda, the feast of a Capuchin martyr, Fidelis Sigmaringen, of a sudden exclaimed:

> No, I do not wish to be obliged some day, in the presence of the eternal Judge to cry out: Woe is me, because I have held my peace! (Isa. 6:5). The voice of the weak and of the innocent call out for vengeance. . . . I feel myself prompted to condemn a potentate whose name I now pass over in silence only to name him in another discourse. . . . He persecutes and massacres the priests. He banishes the bishops to a remote depth of his empire. Mad man! He does not know that a bishop, in his see or in the catacombs, is still the same, and that his character is indelible. Let no one say that, in rising up against the potentate of the North, I am fomenting the European revolution. I know how to distinguish the socialist revolution from right and from reasonable freedom. If I protest against him, I do so to solace my conscience.[22]

[21] Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 571.

Said an eyewitness: "As he pronounced these words, the Sovereign Pontiff was a sublime sight. A holy anger crimsoned his brow, his voice thundered, and he seemed, from his extended arm, to hurl an invisible thunderbolt." [23]

Antichristian Intellectual Movement

The year 1863 gave the common father of the faithful another subject of grief. The states of Europe, which had impassibly or sympathetically looked on at the invasion of the papal domain and at the crushing of Catholic Poland, offered no hindrance to the spread of a blasphemous writing that repeated the heresy of Arius, adapting it to the mentality of modern times. This book, which had for its title The Life of Jesus and was written by Ernest Renan, a professor in the Collège de France, made its first appearance in Paris. It expressed a movement of ideas which, born in Germany, influenced all European thinking more or less.

In 1835, a German, Heinrich Heine, at the close of his From Kant to Hegel wrote: "Do not laugh at these counsels, although they come from a dreamer, who asks you to beware of the followers of Kant and Fichte and of the philosophers of nature. . . . Thought precedes action as lightning precedes thunder. The German thunder is not sharp, and it comes in slow rolls; but it will come, and when you hear a cracking such as was never yet heard in the history of the world, know that the German thunder has at last touched the end." [24] This is not the place for us to speak of the unwholesome influence exercised by Germany, in the middle of the nineteenth century, on religious philosophy.

[22] Correspondant, May 25, 1864, p. 17.

[23] Ibid. On the events of Poland in 1863, see Montalembert, L'insurrection polonaise; Lescoeur, L'Eglise catholique et le gouvernement russe; Pierling, op. cit., Vol. III; Montalembert, "Le Pape et la Pologne," in the Correspondant, May 25, 1864, pp. 1–41.

Kant, wishing to reduce the gospel teaching to the morality of the categorical imperative, and all the supernatural law of Christianity to the natural law of duty; [25] Hegel, professing the identity of the real and the ideal in a perpetual becoming; [26] the followers of Hegel, representing God as the specter of the human conscience: [27] all these had created a movement of ideas which, by its vagueness, by its equivocations, and by its religious formulas embracing a doctrine of strict individual autonomy, was of a sort to disturb souls profoundly. But the very form of these doctrines hardly permitted them to pass beyond the limited circle of the university public of misty Germany. Twice some Frenchmen had endeavored to translate in a clearer language the new Germanic philosophy and thus to popularize it. Victor Cousin, in 1817, introduced into his system, at least partly, the Kantian theory of knowledge; in 1828 Edgar Quinet, in a study on Herder, glorified the creative idealism of Germany.

Ernest Renan

But Cousin's philosophical initiation was incomplete, and Quinet's work was nothing more than an eloquent appeal. Besides, both of them mingled in the German doctrines some that were their own. The real popularizer in France, and thereby in the whole world, of the German philosophy, propounded if not [24] Heine, De l'Allemagne (French trans.), I, 182.

[25] Ruyssen, Kant, p. 353.

[26] C. Renouvier, Philosophie analytique de l'Histoire, IV, 19. Hello, M. Renan, l'Allemagne et l'athéisme au XIX^e siècle, p. 89.

[27] Saint-René Taillandier, Histoire et philosophie religieuse, p. 20.

in all the parts of its technical teaching, at least in the general inspiration of its doctrines and of its method, was a writer devoid of any personal philosophy, but exceptionally supple, varied, subtle, insidious in his thought as in his style: the author of the Life of Jesus, Ernest Renan.[28] Breton on his father's side, he belonged, as he tells us, to those "races of fancy" [29] whose "lively and delicate imagination" likes to create for itself an ethereal world; [30] but Gascon on his mother's side, he compared himself humorously, but quite exactly, to the animal of the fable whose two natures formed a mass of contradictions, one being engaged ceaselessly in destroying the other, the first laughing when the second wept.[31]

Born at Trèguier (February 27, 1828), brought up in a deeply Christian atmosphere, the young Breton at first turned to the ecclesiastical state. His classical studies he began at the minor seminary of St. Nicholas du Chardonnet in Paris under the direction of Father Dupanloup; then, at the age of nineteen, he entered the seminary of St. Sulpice. At a later date he paid homage to the virtue and scholarship of the teachers he met there. Soon, however, he lost his faith. "I learned German and Hebrew," he says; "that changed everything.[32] . . . German philosophy was beginning to be known, and it strangely fascinated me.[33] . . . An eternal becoming, an endless metamorphysis, seemed to me to be the law of the world." [34] In other passages of his writings, Renan declared that the loss of his faith in his case was the consequence of his critical studies rather than the result of his reading of German philosophy. This assertion is contradicted by the explicit testimony of one of his fellow stu-

[28] Renan, Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse, p. 20.
[29] Ibid., p. 40.
[30] Ibid., p. 73.
[31] Ibid., p. 145.
[32] Renan, op. cit., p. 263. We have here an exaggeration. Ernest Renan lost his faith before studying Hebrew. See Cognat, M. Renan hier et aujourd'hui, p. 112.
[33] Renan, op. cit., p. 740.
[34] Ibid., p. 742.

dents [35] and by his own writings. The young seminarian was at the beginning of his philosophical studies and had not yet started the study of Hebrew, when, supposing that his sister Henrietta was going to make a journey in Germany, he told her to make a pilgrimage at Königsberg to the tomb of Kant.[36]

After three years in the seminary and before taking the final promises of the subdiaconate, Renan, according to his own expressions, "wishing to quit an interior which could no longer be anything but a lie," [37] abandoned the ecclesiastical state and devoted himself to Oriental studies. His unbelief, his hostility to the Church, appeared first in writings full of bitterness. Saint-René Taillandier wrote:

His first declarations breathe a sharp bitterness. His thought and his language had in them a singularly sharp tone, at times even traces of fury. After the February revolution, irritated at seeing the Catholic Church joining in the feelings of those stormy days and taking a part in the feasts and in the popular ceremonies, with extreme spirit he denounced the hypocrisy of the clerical liberalism. With regard to the great works of German exegesis, if along his way he met a violent writer, he judged him with unexpected sympathy. Without hesitation he wrote phrases like these: "The material temples of the real Jesus will crumble; the tabernacles where His flesh and blood are believed to be contained will be smashed; already the roof is opened to the daylight, and the water of heaven comes through to wet the face of the kneeling believer." [38]

[35] Cognat, op. cit., pp. 31, 112. Cf. Vigouroux, Mélanges bibliques, p. 532. Renan's Souvenirs always needs to be controlled by those of Father Cognat, his fellow seminarian.

[36] "I greatly like the manner of your German thinkers. If you ever go to Königsberg, I wish you to make a pilgrimage to Kant's tomb." Ernest Renan to Henrietta Renan, Lettres intimes, p. 97. Renan's elder sister Henrietta, a school teacher in Poland, had already lost her faith and she is the one who urged her young brother, when he was a seminarian, to study the German thinkers. She was also the one who later decided him to quit the ecclesiastical state. She flattered his pride by making him to see vaguely a great scientific position. See the Lettres intimes, passim.

[37] Letter of November 12, 1845 (Cognat, op. cit., p. 189).

[38] Saint-René Taillandier, Histoire et philosophie religieuse, p. 2.

Renan's Life of Jesus, published in 1863, had some calmer turns. Was the author's unbelief moderated? Not at all. His denial was not a bit less radical; it was more dangerous. It was in vain for him to declare in his preface and to repeat in his conclusion that "Jesus is the common honor of that which bears a heart of man," [39] that "He founded the absolute religion," [40] that "to make Himself adored as He has been, He must have been adorable," [41] that "His sublime person may rightly be called divine." [42] Under this apparent serenity, where a haughty irony showed through, the whole work rested on two philosophical prejudices that he had taken, the first from Kant, the second from Hegel, namely: 1. that all revelation is condemned in advance by philosophy, for it would be a derogation to the general laws of nature; and "whoever speaks of something above or outside the laws of nature in the realm of facts, speaks a contradiction"; [43] 2. that all is in the way of becoming, even God. On these principles, the thought and the phrase of the historian, or rather of the artist or the dilettante, makes game of himself, opposes himself, contradicts himself, tries to conciliate himself in ambiguous, sonorous, and sweet-sounding formulas in which the author takes pleasure at ringing the chimes which he claims he has received, as an innate gift, from nature. Is he a materialist or an idealist? We cannot say; for, if he admits that the world is the rule of mechanics, he professes that an obscure conscience pushes the possible to exist. Is he an atheist or a deist? We do not know; for, "if God is not yet, perhaps He will be some day." Is Renan's method of exegesis naturalist like that of Paulus, or mythical after the manner of Strauss? In fact, he is ready to adopt the most convenient or poetic explanation or [39] Renan, Vie de Jésus, p. liv.

[40] Ibid., p. 446.

[41] Ibid., p. 447.

[42] Ibid., p. 457.

[43] Renan does indeed several times use the word "revelation"; but he intends it in a totally different sense. Cf. Vie de Jésus, p. lix.

the most picturesque; the choice matters little to him if only it excludes the supernatural. Lastly, is it religious? He himself gives the answer: yes and no; for this disciple of German thought seems to have taken for his motto these lines of Schiller:

What religion do I profess?
None of those that you name.
Why none?
For the sake of religion.

The scandal produced by the appearance of Renan's Life of Jesus was immense. Several editions followed one another in 1863. The next year a popular edition was published, 50,000 copies being sold in a short time. After the educated classes, the popular masses were reached by the poison. The irreligious rejoiced; true believers were pained. Undoubtedly, among those who did not share the Christian faith, some lofty minds felt the unfitness of such a writing; but a number of shallow Christians were to be found for whom the graces of the style, the charm of the descriptions, and the soft seduction of a wavering thought disguised the character of the book.[44]

The priests in the pulpit, the bishops in their pastorals, and Catholic writers in journalistic articles and in pamphlets,[45] refuted the sacrilegious work, which the Congregation of the Index was not slow in condemning.[46] The strongest protest was that of Bishop Pie of Poitiers who, the successor of St. Hilary, not merely stigmatized the blasphemies of the new Arius,[47] but let part of the responsibility for the scandal fall on the public [44] D'Hulst, "M. Renan," in the Correspondant, October 25, 1892, p. 205.

[45] Louis Veuillot, at that time prevented from writing in any paper, in opposition to the Life of Jesus wrote a Vie de Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ, which of all his writings did the most honor to his character and his faith. Cf. A. Nicolas, L'art de croire, II, 240. Cf. also Eugène Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, III, 471–82.

[46] Decree of August 24, 1863.

[47] Cf. his synodal address of August 25, 1863; Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, II, 198.

authorities.[48] The Revue des Deux Mondes, the Journal des Débats, the Constitutionnel, the Opinion nationale, and the Temps, the great learned bodies and the government authority itself expressed indignation at this "tone of inquisitor," this "appeal to the secular arm," this auto-da-fé, as they said, which was no longer of our age.[49]

Congress of Malines (1863)

Other Catholics wished to raise a protest no less absolute, no less keen, but by placing themselves solely on the ground of respect for consciences and of the freedom of the Church. They chose Malines for a congress that was to be held from the 18th to the 22nd of August, 1863. No question was to be raised about the forms of government, as the Church accepted all forms.[50] They intended not only to make a solemn protest but also to create, according to the expressions of the organizers of the congress, "a center of light, charity, and love where the holy alliance of the sons of the Church would be consolidated." [51]

The chief orator of the congress was Count Montalembert, who, wishing to take a clear stand on the ground already defined by Bishop Parisis, following the conduct of the Belgian Catholics, undertook to set forth the way in which the Catholics, after winning freedom of education, intended to win all religious freedoms. He declared: "Please God, I do not pretend to discuss a dogma, to draw up a formulary, to invent or correct a the-[48] "Judge to what times we have come, when, in a Catholic nation, a man, not simply anyone, but a public man, showered with high honors, supported by the money of the taxpayers, and still more, officially holding one of the most eminent academic chairs, has yet been able, without the protest of any authority, with the applause of the crowd of journalists, and with still other encouragements, to write, publish, and spread everywhere a book of such impiety." Baunard, op. cit., II, 199.

[49] Ibid., II, 199.

[50] Eugène Veuillot, op. cit., III, 485.

[51] Compte rendu officiel de l'assemblée, p. iii.

ology. . . . I do not profess an absolute theory, but a practical doctrine, drawn from the lesson of the events; I do not intend to transform into a question of orthodoxy what is a question of conduct." [52] After making this reservation, the orator made no hesitation about declaring that, "if everywhere, except in Belgium, the Catholics were inferior to their adversaries in public life, that condition was owing to the fact that, in mind and heart, many still belonged to the ancient regime, that is, the regime that did not allow civil equality or political liberty or freedom of conscience." [53] "The Church," he declared, "can be free only in the bosom of general freedom.[54] The Spanish inquisitor saying to the heretic, 'The truth or death,' is as hateful to me as the French terrorist saying to my grandfather, 'Liberty, fraternity, or death.' " [55] "Need I remark," he added, "that the religious freedom to which I appeal, cannot be unlimited, not more than any other liberty, nor more than any authority?" [56]

In the strict meaning of its terms, the doctrine set forth by Montalembert did not contradict the encyclical Mirari vos. But the earnest tone, a bit sharp, almost provocative, in which it was presented, the plain allusions to the attitude of the Univers, clearly charged with disloyalty,[57] and the very title under which [52] Montalembert, L'Eglise libre dans l'Etat libre, p. 93. The speeches of Montalembert will be found also in the Correspondant of 1863, Vols. LIX and LX, and in the Journal de Bruxelles of August 25 and 26, 1863.

[53] Montalembert, op. cit., p. 10.

[54] Ibid., p. 23.

[55] Ibid., p. 135.

[56] Ibid., p. 92.

[57] "If the good faith were banished from the world, said our King John, it would have to be found again on the lips of the king of France. Gentlemen, for the defense of our faith, let us all be kings of France. . . . Let us never imitate those who, in France, under Louis Philippe and under the Republic, called for freedom as in Belgium, and, as soon as they think themselves the stronger or, what amounts to the same thing, the friends of the stronger, have not hesitated to say: 'Freedom is good only for us, for we alone have the truth' " (Montalembert, op. cit., p. 137). In a footnote at the bottom of the page containing this passage, Montalembert refers to several articles of the Univers.

the two speeches were published (L'Eglise libre dans l'Etat libre), a title recalling the famous motto of Cavour, the aggressor of the papal territory, made Montalembert's declarations seriously suspect in the eyes of a good number of Catholics.[58] Therein they saw the revival of the condemned liberalism. The illustrious speaker abstained from attending the second Malines congress, held in 1864, where the two principal speakers were Bishop Dupanloup and Father Félix. According to Eugène Veuillot, the Bishop of Orléans "was able to observe enough moderation so that they were not obliged to take back anything," [59] and the celebrated Jesuit preacher merely said that the Church, after resisting the persecution as also the protection of the kings, would have been able to accommodate herself to their tolerance. As proofs of this view, he referred to Great Britain, "where each rising stage of public freedom marked the increasing progress of Catholic life," and America, "where fifty new dioceses, founded in less than fifty years, show, to those who can see and understand, how freedom destroys us." [60]

A pamphlet entitled L'erreur libre dans l'Etat libre sharply attacked Montalembert's speeches, which were, moreover, denounced to the Index.[61] Pius IX, after some hesitation, refrained from any public blame and simply testified to the [58] Some even believed they could discover an argument against the temporal power of the popes in a phrase of Montalembert, protesting against "that horrible confusion of the two powers which is the ideal of all tyrannies" (Montalembert, op. cit., p. 102). The orator, who had always so ardently taken the defense of the temporal power of the Holy See, as likewise his friends Bishop Dupanloup and Falloux, indignantly protested against this charge (ibid., pp. 102–5). On an inscription in the château of La Roche in Brény, commemorating the promise made in 1862 by Dupanloup, Falloux, Foisset, Montalembert, and Albert de Broglie, to fight "for the free Church in the free fatherland," see two different interpretations given by Lecanuet (Montalembert, op. cit., III, 330–33) and by Lagrange (Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, II, 395); and by Eugène Veuillot (Louis Veuillot, III, 487–92) and by Jules Morel (Somme contre le catholicisme libéral, II, 445, 544).

[59] E. Veuillot, op. cit., III, 497.

[60] The Correspondant, September 25, 1864, LXIII, 245.

[61] E. Veuillot, op. cit., III, 286.

Catholic orator his dissatisfaction by a confidential letter of Cardinal Antonelli.

Thus about the middle of 1864, not only had the Church been odiously attacked in the temporal power of her supreme head and in the most essential points of her dogmatic teaching; but her own children, the most zealous of her defenders, were divided as they had been in 1831, and in 1850. Pius IX, who, since 1852 was concerned with drawing up a catalogue of modern errors accompanied with suitable censures, thought the time had come to speak to the Catholic world a word emanating from his sovereign authority. He realized this project by publishing (December 8, 1864) his encyclical Quanta cura, which reached the bishops of Christendom, accompanied by a catalogue or Syllabus of the principal errors of the time.

CHAPTER XXXII

The Encyclical Quanta cura

WITH the bull Unam sanctam of Boniface VIII and the bull Unigenitus of Clement XI, the encyclical Quanta cura of Pius IX, along with the Syllabus, is one of the three papal acts that have most profoundly stirred public opinion in the course of the centuries. In the Unam sanctam the legists took pleasure in showing the papacy's seizure of the lawful authority of the kings; in the Unigenitus the Jansenists pretended to see the disowning of the primitive Church; in the encyclical Quanta cura and the Syllabus the nineteenth-century denounced the anathema hurled at modern civilization and the liberty of peoples. The study of these two last documents, of their reverberation, and of their consequences up to the Vatican Council, will constitute the chief object of the next chapters.

Reasons for the Encyclical

We would be arbitrarily narrowing the doctrinal scope of the documents that appeared on December 8, 1864, were we to feign to see in them, as some have done, simply a retort to the convention of September 15, 1864, or to the publication of the Life of Jesus, or to the speeches delivered at the Malines congress. As history has for a long time amply shown, Pius IX had long considered condemning, by a solemn encyclical, the principal errors of modern times, and we know that the preparatory labors had been undertaken on that subject.[1] The events that we have reviewed, may have hastened this condemnation; but the encyclical carrying that condemnation shows, by its destination and by its contents, that it goes beyond the contingencies of these particular facts. The Supreme Pontiff declares at the very outset that the teachings he is going to give are addressed, "not only to individuals, but also to the nations, not only to the peoples, but also to the sovereigns"; and, in perusing the papal letter, we perceive that the teachings concern the intellectual movement, the social movement, and the political movement of the times.

[1] The document that seems to have served as a starting point for the encylical Quanta cura and the Syllabus is a pastoral letter published on July 23, 1860, by

Of the intellectual movement, Gregory XVI had condemned the traditionalist or fideist tendency, which thereafter disappeared along with the school of Lamennais. Pius IX, whose pastoral solicitude had been made vigilant by the philosophical doctrines of which the Life of Jesus was the most scandalous manifestation, pointed and condemned, at the opposite extreme, the rationalist tendency, according to which "human society ought to be constituted and governed without further account being taken of religion than if this did not exist." [2]

In the social order the Pope condemned the doctrine of the socialists, which declared that "domestic society has its whole raison d'être in purely natural civil law," that is, in the laws of the state and the doctrine of the economists, teaching, or at least leading by their teaching to his consequence, that the social organization "has no other end but to amass and accumulate riches."

Bishop Gerbet, bishop of Perpignan. We often read that the final form given to the Syllabus is owing to Cardinal Bilio. J. B. de Rossi, questioned about the matter in 1884, at the time of the learned cardinal's death, believed he was in a position to give a formal denial to this report. Cardinal Bilio had declared to him that his only cooperation in the drawing up of the papal document had been to take cognizance of it before its publication and to have had four or five propositions suppressed. On the origins of the Syllabus, see Pierre Hourat, "Le Syllabus," a documentary study, in the collection Science et religion. On the participation of Louis Veuillot in the writing of the Syllabus, see Eugène Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, III, 493.

[2] For this text and the texts quoted in the rest of this section, see Denzinger-Bannwart, nos. 1689, 1694, 1691, 1697, 1690, 1692, 1695.

In the political order the Pontiff proscribed, on one hand, the Gallicanism of the heads of states and their advisers, according to which the acts of the Roman Pontiffs about religion need to have the sanction of the civil powers; and on the other hand the liberalism of the democrats, proclaiming that "every citizen has the right to the full liberty of publicly manifesting his opinions, whatever they may be, by the spoken word, the press, or otherwise, without the ecclesiastical or civil authority having any right to limit it."

Lastly, the Pontiff demanded for the Church "the right to govern itself by its own laws and not to permit anyone to put an obstacle in the way of its liberty." [3] He protested against "the abolition of the religious orders, a prohibition which violates the liberty of publicly practicing the evangelical counsels." He rose up against the monopoly in education being placed in the hands of the state, "so far as it has for its effect the complete withdrawal of the training and education of youth from the influence of the Church." In fact, if man is free, "nothing is so mortal as to think that the free will we received at birth is sufficient for us, without having anything else to ask of God, that is, forgetting our Creator, we dare to deny His power in order to show ourselves free." [4] "If kings are independent in temporal affairs, their interest is served, whenever a question arises of the affairs of God, by carefully following the order He has laid down and subordinating the royal will to that of the priests of Christ, and not vice versa." [5]

In short, Pius IX, in promulgating the encyclical Quanta

[3] Ecclesiam catholicam . . . sinant (principes) uti legibus suis, nec libertati ejus quemquam permittant obsistere.

[4] Nihil tam praeceps ad casum . . . si hoc solum nobis putantes posse sufficere, quod liberum arbitrium, quum nasceremus, accepimus, ultra jam a Domino nihil quaeramus, id est, Auctoris nostri obliti, ejus potentiam, ut nos ostendamus liberos, abjuremus.

[5] Certum est enim, hoc rebus suis esse salutare, ut, quum de causis Dei agatur, juxta ipsius constitutum, regiam voluntatem sacerdotibus Christi studeant subdere, non praeferre.

cura, was doing nothing more than repeat, as he himself avowed, a teaching several times given by his predecessors, and notably by Gregory XVI in the encyclical Mirari vos. But the act of Pius IX had a considerably greater reverberation than that of Gregory XVI. This difference may be traced to several causes.

Reception of the Encyclical

At the very beginning Pius IX expressed himself in a spontaneous manner, gave vent to his grievances in stirring accents, formulated his complaints in direct terms. He was, not so much a doctor who teaches, as a father who, before his children, opens his soul "overwhelmed with grief at sight of the terrible tempest," [6] provoked to indignation at seeing the horrible machinations by which "wicked men . . . , promising freedom, although themselves the slaves of corruption . . . , strive to deprave men's souls." Moreover, even when he begs "the gentle heart of the Savior to draw to Him men's souls by the bonds of His love . . . and the loving Mother of God to have generous pity for our miseries," he cannot, like the divine Master, hold back the hand ready to chastise "the impious and absurd principle of naturalism," and "men of lying tongue," who, in the name of socialism, undertake to ruin the family institution, and the arrant audacity of the heads of states who conspire against the liberty of the Church, and the madness of that liberty of perdition which places its confidence in the language of human wisdom.

A second cause was of a nature to stir men's minds. The encyclical Quanta cura did not stop at condemning principles. More than the encyclical Mirari vos, it made applications of those principles. When it spoke of the claims of the civil power to control the acts of the Church, to exclude it from the public schools, when it alluded to campaigns of the press against her dogmas, it awoke the memory of recent concrete facts. Besides, it appeared on the morrow of events which were still stirring the intellectual and political world. The sharp fashion in which the Roman question had just been put, the troubles aroused in souls by the appearance of the Life of Jesus, the controversies aroused on the occasion of the Malines congress, had, with governments as among the people, in the Catholic world as in the freethinking atmosphere, exceedingly stirred the minds of men.

[6] Quum videremus summo animi nostri dolore horribilem sane pro cellam.

A last circumstance filled up this excitement. The encyclical of December 8 was, as we have stated, accompanied with a Syllabus of the principal errors. This catalogue contained eighty propositions, taken from various consistorial allocutions, encyclicals, and other apostolic letters. But some of these propositions, isolated from the documents from which they had been taken, were cunningly interpreted by the enemies of the Church so as to make it appear that the Pope was condemning in one mass all the progress of modern civilization and particularly the freedom of philosophy, the independence of the civil powers, and the citizens' liberty of conscience. These were the consequences they pretended to deduce from the condemned propositions numbered 80, 14, 42, and 15, which were thus conceived: prop. 80, the Pontiff can and ought to be reconciled to and put himself in accord with progress, with liberalism and modern civilization; prop. 14, one ought to engage in philosophy without taking any account of natural revelation; prop. 42, in case of conflict between the two powers (civil and religious), the civil right prevails; prop. 15, each man is free to embrace and profess the religion which he has been brought to regard as true by the sole lights of reason.

In the midst of freethought, this was, according to a striking expression of Bishop Dupanloup, like "an abominable death signal of all the snarling of the press against the old disarming of the Vatican." [7] Le Siècle considered the Syllabus the "supreme defiance hurled at the modern world by the expiring papacy." The government of Napoleon III declared the enyclical and the Syllabus "contrary to the principles on which the Constitution of the Empire rests," [8] and it denounced, to the Council of State, as guilty of abuse Cardinal Mathieu (archbishop of Besançon) and Bishop Dreux-Brezé of Moulins, for having had the encyclical read in the pulpit.[9]

[7] Lagrange, Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, II, 450.

All the Catholics submitted to the papal teaching; but, for those who had applauded Montalembert's speeches at the Malines congress, the appearance of the encyclical was, as one of them said, "a thunderbolt," [10] which at first disconcerted them. "Never," wrote Bishop d'Hulst twenty-two years later, "shall I forget the surprise, the emotion, the disquietude in which I was thrown by the reading of this doctrinal document. I saw clearly that I had something to change in my concept of society. . . . The memory of that inner evolution will be ineffaceable in my soul. Beginning in sadness and distress, it ended in joy and peace. But at that time I found it impossible to admit that the liberal error had never existed; for I was aware of it and noted it in myself and did not invent it." [11] Many Catholics then had to modify their ideas. Others suffered only in consequence of regrettable misunderstandings.

Bishop Dupanloup strove to dissipate these misunderstandings by hurriedly drawing up and issuing (January 25, 1865), under the title of La Convention du 15 septembre et l'Encyclique du 8 decembre 1864, a commentary on the two papal documents.[12] Basing himself on the distinction, thenceforth admitted

[8] Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, p. 569.

[9] Ibid., p. 573.

[10] Father de Broglié's phrase, quoted by Baudrillart in the Correspondant, March 25, 1902. Cf. Revue pratique d'apologetique, November 15, 1907.

[11] D'Hulst, Le droit chrétien et le droit moderne, p. 14. Cf. Baudrillart, Vie de Mgr d'Hulst, II, 8.

[12] This commentary will be found in the Nouvelles Œuvres choisies of Dupanloup, Vol. IV. See Lagrange, Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, II, 456, for interesting details of the composition, publication, and extraordinary diffusion of that work.

by theologians, between the thesis and the hypothesis, he showed that the encyclical gave the ideal of a completely Christian society, but that it left the faithful free to act in conformity with the conditions of the presently existing political society.[13] Further, putting each proposition of the Syllabus in its context, he showed that the sense that should be attached to it was always just and reasonable.

The papers unfriendly to the Church, confused by these explanations, declared that the Bishop of Orléans had "transfigured" the encyclical. But the Pope himself cut short this subterfuge by writing (February 4, 1865) to Bishop Dupanloup: "You have reproved these errors in the sense in which we ourselves have reproved them." The eloquent prelate was congratulated on his work by 630 bishops.[14]

The Catholics who had pointed out the suspect doctrines in the addresses delivered at the Malines congresses, in the articles published in the Correspondant and in the Ami de la religion,[15] did not conceal their joy at seeing the condemnation, by the same document, both of freethought and of Catholic liberalism.[16] Among the latter were to be numbered some who gave the papal documents forced interpretations, giving to these pronouncements a character they did not have in the thought of the Holy Father. A theologian not suspected of liberal tendencies, Father Freppel, so held in a letter written shortly before the Vatican Council.[17] If the future bishop of Angers, in writing

[13] The fathers of the Society of Jesus, editors of the Civiltà cattolica, had written: "By way of hypotheses, the modern liberties can be legitimate, and Catholics can love them and defend them" (Civiltà cattolica, October 17, 1868).

[14] Lagrange, op. cit., II, 465, 473 f.

[15] Since November, 1855, the direction of the paper had passed into the hands of a young priest, Father Sisson, who was attached to the editorial staff in 1854 on Bishop Dupanloup's advice. The influence of the Bishop of Orléans was there predominant. Dict. d'histoire et de géographie ecclésistique, s.v. "Ami de la religion," II, 1229.

[16] Pie, Œuvres, V, 436; E. Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, III, 497.

[17] For this letter, see Lecanuet, L'Eglise de France sous la troisième République, I, 326; Nicol, Mgr Bécel, p. 146.

thus, had in mind some polemical work written after the appearance of the Syllabus, he was undoubtedly thinking of the pamphlet written by Veuillot, under the title, L'illusion libérale. This little work, according to Eugène Veuillot, had the purpose, "not so much to refute the enemy as to take to task the liberal Catholics." The celebrated Catholic writer thought thus to fill in a regrettable gap in the work of the Bishop of Orléans. Eugène Veuillot considered the beginning of his refutation of liberalism absolute and severe.[18] Said Louis Veuillot: "The liberal Catholic is neither Catholic nor liberal. 'Sectarian' is his true name." Moreover, the whole pamphlet kept this absolute and severe tone. The editors of the Correspondant and of the Ami de la religion, the speakers at the Maline congresses, had spoken of the possible adaptations of the Church with modern institutions. Veuillot replied: "The rock (on which the Church rests) is not a rolling stone, inconstant. It has its place, its matter, its form. All is immoveable." [19] Mention was made of the limits which the nature of things put to the power of the pope and of the Church, by quoting words of Bossuet and St. Bernard [20] in this sense. "Let us face the trickery of words. We owe obedience to the Church in the limits she has herself set. . . . If this obedience is theocracy, those who are afraid of it have not enough fear of something else." The writers that Veuillot wished to refute had found fault with the inopportune use of compulsion against the unbelievers, holding that such an attitude was a perpetuation of pagan despotism. Veuillot replied: "The Christians have taken the arms of the pagan society to transform them, not to destroy them. . . . As right by itself is a force, so force by itself can be a right." The liberal Catholics had insisted on the necessary union of the body of the Church, taken as a whole, with its head, the pope. Veuillot admitted their separation, at least as a realizable hypothesis. "I propose a hypothesis. I admit that we all follow the current. I say all, except the pope, for the hypothesis cannot go that far. What would be its result? A power would at least exist on the earth." [21]

[18] E. Veuillot, op. cit., III, 500, 416, 501.

[19] Louis Veuillot, L'illusion libérale, pp. 23, 34.

[20] Bossuet, "Sermon sur l'unité de l'Eglise," Œuvres, XV, 532–35; St. Bernard, De consideratione, Bk III, chap. 4, no. 17; epist. 238, nos. 2, 6; epist. 255, no. 2. St. Bernard, Opera (Gaume ed.), Vol. I, Part I, cols. 1050, 1051, 500, 502, 538.

After quoting these lines and other parallel ones, the Siècle turned to Bishop Dupanloup and said: "You have for allies some organs doubtless less clever than Your Grandeur, but they have at least the merit of a rude frankness." Pius IX did not send a letter of approval to the author of the Illusion libérale. Probably he thought the occasion was not opportune to consecrate, by his supreme authority, affirmations which passed beyond those of his encyclical and which at least in their form, of an intentional ardor, could not be presented as expressing the Catholic doctrine; but he refused to impose censures on some propositions that two bishops denounced to him as inexact in the pamphlet. At bottom, he appeared satisfied that his encyclical was shown as condemning at the same time free thought rationalism and liberal Catholicism.[22]

Social and Political Doctrine

Some Catholic places outside of any controversy viewed the papal documents under a different aspect. These places considered them rather in their positive part than in their negative part. Therein they saw the principles of a social and a political doctrine that could open to the children of the Church a most fertile field of action. In this number was the courageous Catholic whom we saw, in 1861, make a noble protest in the Chamber of Deputies against the anti-Roman policy of the imperial government, Emile Keller.[23] In a volume entitled L'encyclique du 8 décembre 1864 et les principes de 1789, ou l'Etat et l'Eglise

[21] L'illusion libérale, pp. 45, 68 f., 74.
[22] Eugène Veuillot, op. cit., III, 503.
[23] E. Keller, L'encyclique du 8 décembre, pp. 268–90.

et la Liberté, he noted that the Pope, in so precisely signaling the shoals of communism on one hand and the liberal political economy on the other, and in showing that the social question was first of all a moral problem, resting on respect for the truth, opened to speculation and to Catholic action a wide and safe field. A. de Mun relates that, in reading and contemplating the chapter of that work which had for its title, "Social truth, principle of social liberty," [24] he had the first intuition of the social apostolate to which he was going to devote his life. He wrote later: "I am asked what relation exists between the Circles of Workers and the Syllabus. It is the same relation as between the product and the principle, between the effect and the cause, between the child and the mother." [25]

From the more strictly political viewpoint, was it not to indicate to the world a safe way, equally removed from despotism and from anarchy, to remind it that right does not consist in the material fact, that other forces exist besides those that reside in matter, that the state is not the origin of all rights, that the violation of an oath is never lawful, even when it is inspired by love of country, that the authority is something other than the sum of numbers, and that the doctrine of the Church is not opposed to the well being and the interests of human society? Such was the sense of propositions 58, 49, 60, 39, 40, and 64 of the Syllabus.[26]

[24] A. de Mun, Ma vocation sociale, p. 13.

[25] Association catholique, I, 246. Cf. D'Hulst, Le droit chrétien et le droit moderne, p. 7.

[26] The theologians have questioned what is the doctrinal authority of the Syllabus. Some, considering that the document is not signed by the pope, have gone so far as to deny it the character of an act of the Holy See. This opinion should be set aside. Cardinal Antonelli sent the Syllabus to the bishops in the name of the Pope. Pius IX and his successors have always regarded the Syllabus as an act of the Holy See. Leo XIII in particular considered it such, when, in his encyclical Immortale Dei, he cites propositions 19, 34, 40, and 79. (See Boudinhon, in the Revue catholique des Eglises, March, 1905.) But is the Syllabus an act ex cathedra? The opinion which maintains the affirmative rests: 1. on the fact that this catalogue of errors makes one body with the encyclical Quanta cura, which, being addressed to the Catholic world to condemn errors, has the character of an ex cathedra act; 2. on the fact that the whole Church has accepted the doctrinal authority of the Syllabus, either as it has regarded it as making one body with the encyclical, or as it has regarded it as an act of the ordinary magisterium of the pope. Among those who call in question the ex cathedra character of the Syllabus, we may cite: Father Newman of the Oratory who, having written (May 12, 1879) in a public letter to the Duke of Norfolk: "The Syllabus does not have dogmatic force," was made a cardinal by Leo XIII shortly afterward; Bishop Fessler of St. Hippolytus in Austria and secretary general of the Vatican Council, who presented the same thesis as probable in his book The True and False Infallibility of the Popes (Eng. trans. by Father Ambrose St. John, 1875); and the learned canonist De Angelis, professor in the Apollinare college. The following is the chief argument of these authors: For a collection, even one made on orders of the pope, to have a special authority as a collection, it is not enough that the collection was made by order of the pope or accepted as authentic by the Christian people; according to the doctrine accepted by all canonists, it is necessary that the pope made it his own, either by his signature or by his seal or by a formal declaration. Thus the decretals collected, on orders of the pope, by St. Raymond de Pennafort, have a proper authority only by the Constitution Rex pacificus of Gregory IX, who expressly approved the collection; on the contrary, Book VII of the decretals, although drawn up by order of the pope, has not a proper authority. The same is true of the Decretum of Gratian, which has been unanimously accepted as the official text in the schools, but which no pope has made his own by an express act. Such, they say, is the case of the Syllabus. It was indeed drawn up and sent by order of the pope, like Book VII of the decretals; it was received and accepted by the Church, like the Decretum of Gratian; but, not having been signed or sealed or approved expressly as his own act by Pius IX, it cannot have proper authority. The propositions composing it have precisely the authority of the documents from which they are taken, as they have precisely the meaning given them by the context of those documents. Apropos of the Syllabus, Father Choupin quotes the words said to have been spoken by Pius X in a private audience granted to Mr. Charles A. Briggs. The following are the words of Mr. Briggs: "The Holy Father himself assured me that it (the Syllabus of Pius IX) did not come under the category of infallibility." (C. Briggs, The Papal Commission and the Pentateuch, p. 9.) Cf. L. Choupin, Valeur des décisions doctrinales et disciplinaires du Saint-Siège, p. 122. Basically the controversy we have been speaking of has less practical importance than at first view it would seem to have; for those who defend the ex cathedra character of the Syllabus concede that each proposition must be taken in the sense given by the source from which it is taken; and those who refuse to acknowledge in the Syllabus the same authority as in the encyclical, are obliged to admit that this latter document contains all the principles of the assertions given by the Syllabus. Various commentaries of the Syllabus have been published. We are not aware of any more reliable than the simple Recueil des allocutions consistoriales, encycliques, et autres lettres apostoliques des souverains pontifes cités dans l'encyclique et le Syllabus du 8 décembre 1864. This volume contains the Latin text and the French translation of the encyclical, of the Syllabus, and of all the other documents.

CHAPTER XXXIII

The Roman Question

LIKE the French government, the Italian government at first forbade the publication of the encyclical and of the Syllabus. Soon it revoked this decision. On February 8, 1865, it gave the exequatur to the two documents. Was it returning to a more conciliatory policy? By no means. By the convention of September 15, the court of Turin had at hand an act that would open the way to all its ambitions; it could, for the moment, refrain from any manifestation against the authority of the Holy See. Said General La Marmora, the head of the cabinet: "We can advance slowly; but we must never retreat." [1] The goal of this advance was known: it was Rome. Once Rome should become the capital of the kingdom of Italy, that achievement would be the end of the papal temporal power. As Visconti-Venosta, the minister of foreign affairs said: "Deprived of foreign bayonets, the temporal power cannot last long." The convention granted two years to the French government to withdraw its troops from Rome. During these two years the nations made several supreme efforts at a peaceful solution of the "Roman question." Austria and Spain again took up the plan of a collective guaranty to maintain the papal domain. But Napoleon did not join in these views; he kept hoping to arrive at a solution by a double effort: one, to persuade the Holy See to yield some territorial concessions; the other, to keep the Italian government from proceeding to a violent aggression.

Neither of these attempts came to anything. Austria, whatever her sympathies for the papacy, hesitated to push too far her intervention in Italy, for which she felt an inveterate hostility. Spain was too weak to exercise a preponderant initiative; Emperor Napoleon, in his attempts, was met with a double Non possumus: that of the Pope, who, in answer to all the proposals, replied that he was merely the depositary of an authority that he had sworn to defend even to death; and that of Victor Emmanuel, who could neither dispense with the support of the followers of Mazzini and Garibaldi nor make them give up their aggressive claims.

[1] Parlamento italiano, pp. 3728, 3790.

Pius IX, moreover, thereafter participated less and less in the diplomatic negotiations. A fatherly letter which he wrote to Victor Emmanuel on the subject of the religious questions, obtained the return to their dioceses of thirty bishops who had been removed from them, but he made no headway at all in an agreement on the fundamental questions. This failure disabused the Pope of the usefulness of any fresh attempt at discussions. What had he obtained in all the advances heretofore made to the peoples and the princes? To declare his rights and to expect only from God the defense of his prerogatives: Such now seemed to be his whole policy. At the end of the summer of 1865 he removed Bishop Mérode from his office of minister of the armies, and did not put anyone in his place. For the diplomatic negotiations he referred the problems more and more to Cardinal Antonelli, who always loftily proclaimed the principles of his master, without always exactly realizing the Pope's thought.

Pius IX, whose smiling liveliness and amiable spontaneity were in strong contrast with the cold tenacity and calculated attitudes of his Secretary of State, continued to preserve, in spite of age and misfortune, that gracious open-heartedness, that charming good nature, and those other traits which had won him so much popularity at the outset of his reign. "Lively, gentle, full of retorts, he always had on his lips words that characterize the speaker, and precise remarks that put things in their proper light." [2] "This probably is the last time," he declared (January 1, 1866) to the officers commanding the body of French troops, "that I shall bless you. After your departure the enemies of the Church will perhaps come to Rome." This feeling was not the sadness of discouragement. He said to the ambassador of Spain: "I do not wish to die without having done all I can to fulfill my conscientious duty." [3] Moreover, he did not believe that this conscientious duty consisted in negotiating with the powers that he distrusted, but in repeatedly asserting his rights. Louis Veuillot expressed the Pontiff's thought when he wrote: "Pius IX disdained the underhanded scheming of politics. His mission was not to bring about the triumph of the truth, but to confess that truth until death. To all suggestions, he replied: No. To all threats: Go ahead, do it." [4]

Attitude of Various Governments

In Italy the publication (November, 1865) of the martyrology of the Italian episcopate in the Unità cattolica had just made known to the public the extent of the sufferings of the Church, when King Victor Emmanuel forecast fresh sufferings in announcing new legal projects on the separation of Church and state and on the supression of the religious corporations. Six months later (May 17, 1866) a law (the Crispi law, so called from the name of the deputy who introduced it) punished with fine and imprisonment anyone who, during the war against Austria, would be suspected of wishing to restore the old order of things or in any way harm the unity of Italy. The vague terms of this law recalled those of the worst revolutionary laws. The defeat of the Italians (June 24, 1866) at Custozza did not stop the series of scheming measures of persecution. On July 8

[2] Louis Veuillot, Pie IX,
[3] La Gorce, Histoire du second empire, V, 249, 252 f.
[4] Louis Veuillot, Le parfum de Rome, II, 434 f.

of that same year the Gazette officielle of the kingdom of Italy published a decree giving the force of law to the project, already approved by the Chamber, which enacted the abolition of all the religious bodies and the "conversion" of the property of the clergy. Half a year later a convention was signed by the representatives of Italy and of France for regulating the papal debt.[5] A few days later this agreement was officially promulgated, and the revolutionary committee of Rome, in a proclamation, said: "The day of December 14, 1866, opens a new era, an era which, at the side of the religious minister, set free from the impure contact of an abhorred despotism, will see Rome free and flourishing." The 29th of that same month, Mazzini exclaimed: "Rome is the tomb of the two great religions that formerly gave life to the world, and Rome is the sanctuary of a third religion destined to give life to the world of the future." [6]

These manifestations were owing not merely to the convention of December 7, but also to the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome, which took place on December 11. Emperor Napoleon had indeed tried to palliate the impression produced by this measure; he constituted, for the service of the Pope, a legion raised in France, embodied in the French cadres, and intended to be enrolled under the papal flag. This legion was organized at Antibes: whence the name legion of Antibes, which it retained. But the very way the Antibes legion was organized indicated the hesitation and lack of firmness on the part of the Emperor.[7]

The Spanish government recognized the new kingdom of Italy. This it did (December 14, 1865) in spite of the opposition of the clergy. However, it protested its attachment to the [5] For the preceding items of this paragraph, see Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, pp. 602, 606, 640, 644, 675.

[6] Ibid., pp. 677, 688.

[7] The Emperor wrote: "The legion must be increased (at first it counted a thousand men); but it should be augmented gradually and quietly." See Maréchal Randon, Mémoires, II, 118, 125; Rastoul, Vie du maréchal Randon, p. 278.

Holy Father and to his temporal sovereignty; but it declared its approval of the convention of September 15 and thus showed a certain connivance with the governments of France and Italy on the Roman question.

In Germany the preponderant position given to Protestant Prussia by the treaty of Prague (August 23, 1866) created a permanent danger. The future would reveal the importance of this situation, which did not escape the attention of Pius IX. Austria, crushed at Sadowa in the preceding July, was thenceforth eliminated from the Germanic confederation and was despoiled of Venetia to the profit of Italy. The house of the Hohenzollerns would now intend to make the law in Germany. The Prussia of Bismarck, with its formidable military organization, would become a threat for all Europe. And this growth of a Lutheran power took place at the very time when Italy saw the increase of its territorial extent and its hostility toward the papacy, and when France, the sole official protector of the temporal power, saw herself lessened in the face of Europe by the eclipsed, almost servile, part she had played in the recent war.

Furthermore, Catholic Austria forgot her old traditions and, in many circumstances, held to the shabby policy of Joseph II. After Sadowa the Vienna municipal council recovered its energy only to prevent the Jesuits, expelled from Venetia, from finding refuge in the Austrian capital.

In Russia two imperial ukases (November 4, 1866, and January 5, 1867) annihilated all the hopes that had been entertained for an improvement of the religious situation. The first ukase decided that for the future "the affairs of the Roman religion would return to the jurisdiction of the imperial administrations"; the second ukase declared the definitive and complete absorption of the kingdom of Poland in the Russian Empire.

On November 15, 1865, a big meeting at London launched the idea of the union of the Anglican Church with the Russian Church; on February 4, 1866, Prince Orlof, Russian minister in Belgium, declared that he favored such a plan. Three months later another meeting was held to consider the means for suppressing, in public worship, whatever was not in conformity with the principles of the Reformation. Even the Parliament judged it ought to treat rigorously against the rites thought too much marked with Catholicism and, with this view in mind, denounced the practices of the ritualists.[8]

Communism

A more general and radical danger was threatening civilized Europe. This danger attacked the supernatural principles of which the Catholic Church is the guardian and also the natural principles without which no free and prosperous nation can exist.

After the sentimental socialism of Saint-Simon and the political socialism of Louis Blanc, revolutionary communism was formulated with Karl Marx and Lassalle. Its aim was to group the proletarians of all countries for the purpose of establishing the collectivity of the instruments of labor. The Revolution of 1789 had dispossessed the nobles; the time now came to dispossess the middle class. For this undertaking the workers would not seek any support from outside. "The emancipation of the working class," they said, "must be won by the working class itself." [9] "What we wish to overthrow," declared one of their leaders, "is not merely the tyrant, but tyranny. We wish no more government, for governments crush us with taxes; we wish no more religion, for religion stifles the minds." [10] "Neither God nor master": such might be the motto of the new socialist school.[11]

[8] For these events in Austria, Russia, and England, see Chantrel, Annales, 486–673.

[9] Declaration of the Geneva Congress in 1866. C. Seignobos, Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, p. 692.

[10] Dupont, president of the Brussels Congress in 1868. Cf. La Gorce, Histoire du second empire, V, 433.

[11] On the doctrines of this school and its relations with Freemasonry, see Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 545, 555.

Communism was organized by the International Association of the Workers, whose first idea was enunciated in 1862 at the World Exposition of London; it held its first congress at Geneva in 1866.[12] At the closing banquet of this congress, they acclaimed Garibaldi.[13] At a meeting held in 1864, Mazzini had tried to place the Association in the service of his cause.[14] He had in mind a vaster field of action than the one proposed by Karl Marx.[15]

We may well suppose that attacks were not wanting against a theory so radically subversive. But with Lassalle and Marx, they had to deal with formidable foes. Lassalle, a brilliant writer, had, in his principal work on capital and labor, caustically refuted the contentions of the liberal economy. Marx, in his heavy but powerful work, Das Kapital, in a scientific way and with close reasoning, set aside a priori any moral or religious argument. He took his stand on the single ground of tangible and visible facts, positive facts duly verified. On these data he pretended to base his doctrine as a necessary deduction, therefore legitimate, of the structure of society and of the essential laws of the world.

Frederick Le Play

But, in 1864, appeared a work which rested solely on the study of facts and general laws scientifically observed. This work concluded to the restoration of society on the traditional foundations of respect for religion, of the family, and of property. This study had for its title, La réforme sociale en France, [12] See E. Lamy, Le Second Empire et les ouvriers.

[13] Annales du congrès de Genève.

[14] See Seignobos, op. cit., p. 692.

[15] Later on, along with the purely Marxist movement, called also the "integral, revolutionary, or libertarian" movement, we shall see, in the International, take shape the "possibilist" movement, sometimes called "evolutive, political, or moderate" movement. But the aim will always be the same: the total overthrow of religion and society.

déduite de l'observation des peuples Européens. Its author was Frederick Le Play, a mining engineer, member of the Council of State, former commissioner general of the Paris universal Exposition in 1855. The elements of his work he had gathered in the course of numerous journeys in England, Belgium, the Scandinavian states, Germany, Russia, Turkey, Italy, Spain, and central Asia. His method consisted in rejecting a priori, by a methodical doubt like that of Descartes, all theoretical systems of the social schools and in observing impartially the conditions in which nations were living, the families, the free and prosperous societies.[16]

Giving special attention to the working classes, whose condition of living had engaged his concern from childhood,[17] in 1855 he published, under the title Les ouvriers européens, monographs about workers' families observed in the most varied surroundings. Soon after this, he founded the Société d'économie sociale, which was called upon to continue his immense task. He himself would express the philosophical synthesis of his works by the publication of several writings, besides others the following: the Paix sociale (1871), the Réforme en Europe (1876), the Question sociale (1879), and the Constitution essentielle de l'humanité (1881). But in its fundamental elements his doctrine was already expounded in the Réforme sociale. The appearance of this work drew the attention of reflecting minds. Sainte-Beuve hailed in Frederick Le Play a new Bonald, progressive and scientific. Charles Montalembert wrote: "Without hesitation I say that Le Play has turned out the most courageous and original book, and in all respects, the strongest of this century." [18] Le Play was certainly courageous, not only in fear-

[16] See Laveleye, Le Socialisme contemporain; Winterer, Le socialisme international.

[17] Jules Lacointa, "F. Le Play," in the Correspondant, April 25, 1882, CXXVII, 215.

[18] Quoted by E. Demolins, "F. Le Play," in the Correspondant, December 10, 1879, CXVII, 870.

lessly placing himself on the ground of scientific observation, chosen by the new theorists of socialism, but also in denouncing, in the name of that method, the principles most widely admitted since the Revolution of 1789, the ideas spread by Rousseau under the ancient regime, the "false dogmas," as he called them, of "original perfection," "providential equality," and "the perpetual right of revolt," in proclaiming the need of respect for the family, for the social, political, and religious authorities, in a word, of the "eternal Decalogue." [19]

Paris Exposition

In 1867, when Emperor Napoleon conceived the idea of holding a universal Exposition at Paris, he entrusted the organization of it to Frederick Le Play. The author of the Réforme sociale profited by the task entrusted to him to introduce his most cherished ideas into this work. Thanks to him, the universal Exposition of 1867, which assembled at Paris the majority of the products of human activity and drew there most of the sovereigns, was not only the expression of the social state of the world in the middle of the nineteenth century; it also contributed to the progress of the soundest social economy by means of two institutions: the organization of a group comprising "the objects destined for the material and moral improvement of the workers," and the creation of an "order of rewards in favor of persons and institutions assuring the welfare and good harmony of those who collaborated in the same labors." [20]

Of course, in that immense exhibition of the products of the entire world and in that coming and going of peoples of all na-

[19] On F. Le Play, see: C. de Ribbe, Le Play d'après sa correspondance; Paul Ribot, Exposé critique des doctrines de M. Le Play; Delaire, "Le Play et la science sociale," in the Nouvelle Revue, February 15, 1896; H. Ramière, "L'école de la réforme sociale," in the Etudes of May and June, 1873; E. de Curzon, Frédéric Le Play, sa méthode, sa doctrine, son oeuvre.

[20] On the Exposition of 1867, see La Gorce, op. cit., V, 149, 241.

tions, the faults of modern society appeared. If the conversations that might have taken place among the sovereigns of Europe, gathered in the capital of France, served to avoid certain conflicts, more than one "dark spot," as Napoleon III said, clouded the horizon.[21] Noting that the peoples were greatly absorbed by the cares of material prosperity, Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi might well think that the chivalrous spirit of the Crusades was dead, and that they could with impunity pass over the frontiers of the Domain of St. Peter. Bismarck, according to report, upon leaving a comic opera [22] in which the small details of military discipline were held up to ridicule, thought he saw in this an uncurable decline of France and perhaps of all the nations of Europe to the advantage of Germany. Both judged their age too superficially. The invaders of the papal territory would reach the Eternal City only by passing over the bodies of new Crusaders, who had come from all points of the globe for the defense of the pope; and the day when Prussia, confident in the invincibility of her military organization, would attempt to impose her hegemony on the world, the entire world, half a century later, would rise up against her for the defense of true civilization. The symbol of the real danger then threatening the world was to be seen in that colossal piece of artillery which came from the Krupp works and which by its size so keenly attracted the looks of the curious spectators. Reflecting minds saw in it, and rightly so, the insolent defiance of a people who, by restoring the pagan cult of might, were preparing nothing less than a revival of ancient barbarism.

Project of an Ecumenical Council

The sight of the great industrial, scientific, and artistic manifestations occasioned by the Paris Exposition suggested to the Catholics the idea of another meeting, more solemn and more important, to which the representatives of the whole world would be summoned, to consider, not mankind's material interests, but its eternal destinies. On December 6, 1864, two days before publishing the encyclical Quanta cura, Pius IX had made known, before some members of the Sacred College, his intention to convoke an ecumenical council. Since the Council of Trent, that is, for three centuries, the Church had not held such an assembly. Never had so long an interval passed between two general councils.

[21] Ibid., V, 238.

[22] "La grande-duchesse de Gerolstein."

Early in March, 1865, a commission of five cardinals was appointed to discuss certain preliminary questions. Toward the end of that month thirty-five bishops of the Latin rite had been invited to send to the commission of cardinals a summary of the points of dogma and discipline which they wished to have treated in the assembly. At the beginning of the next year, a similar invitation was addressed to the bishops of the Oriental rite. Both groups replied to the request.[23]

The results of these inquiries were not communicated to the public. But Catholics could not be indifferent to this great undertaking. Pope Paul III had written, when convoking the Council of Trent, that "in the great perils of Christianity, no better remedy could be found than an ecumenical council." [24] In the fourth century, at the height of the Arian crisis, the Council of Nicaea had proclaimed the absolute equality of the three divine Persons and the absolute divinity of Christ. In the sixteenth century, in the midst of the Protestant revolt, the Council of Trent had defined the conditions of man's justification by divine grace. In the nineteenth century, in the face of the revolutionary error, no less invading and no less to be dreaded than the Protestant heresy, people felt that the episcopate was going to take up the notion of the authority in the [23] On these preliminaries of the council, see T. Granderath, Histoire du concile du Vatican (French trans.).

[24] Paul III, in his bull Initio nostri.

Church and in the person of the pope. On June 3, 1867, the Civiltà cattolica took the initiative of a movement in favor of the papal infallibility, proposing to the Catholics a vow to the public profession and defense of that belief.

However, the revolution, justifying by its acts the alarms of the Catholics, turned its most violent attacks against the pope. In the course of June, 1867, the "insurrectional committee" of Rome circulated the following proclamation: "Romans, the revolution which Italy will accomplish cannot have its full development except at Rome; it can triumph only on the Capitol." On June 21, Marshal Niel complained that a certain number of soldiers of the Roman legion, "shamefully deserting the pontifical flag which they had freely chosen, were abandoning their leaders and were following wretched foreign recruiters." The big feasts celebrated on June 29, 1867, at Rome on the occasion of the eighteenth centenary of the martyrdom of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, the ovations that the Pontiff received that day, did but exasperate the hatred of the enemies of the papacy. On July 19, Garibaldi, haranguing the crowd at Pistoia, exclaimed: "Rome ought to be ours." [25] A week later the French government, in the Moniteur, declared that it was turning over to the government of Florence [26] the care of protecting the papal frontier. This declaration was a fresh matter of anxiety for the Catholics. On the 31st, the Bishop of Orléans uttered a cry of alarm. "I am uneasy," he declared; "I scarcely believe in Italian good faith. Can I forget Garibaldi's expedition in Sicily, the disavowals and the shamming of Cavour?" The third Malines congress at the close of its deliberations (September 12) declared that it regarded the occupation of the States of the Church, not only as a sacrilegious crime, but also as a most serious prejudice against right, liberty, and the welfare of all

[25] Chantrel, Annales, pp. 81, 560, 564, 566, 602.

[26] In the convention of September 15 and by virtue of an article of that convention, the capital of Italy had been fixed at Florence.

Christianity. The week before, the conspirator Mazzini had refused to be present at a so-called peace congress held at Geneva by several of his freethinking friends, gathered about Garibaldi, because, as he said, he could not renounce the war against the Church and the papacy.

Invasion of the Papal States

On October 8, the journal Italia, the organ of minister Rattazzi, declared that "the solution of the Roman question had become a necessity," that "the moment had arrived when, at all risks and perils, the Gordian knot must be cut." On October 19, Garibaldi, taking advantage of a ministerial crisis, left the island of Caprera, which had been assigned to him as a place of residence, and landed on the continent. Two days later, from Florence, he issued a proclamation full of violent declarations.[27] A few days after this date, he passed beyond the cordon of Piedmont troops placed on the frontier, without meeting any resistance, and at several points he had the States of the Church invaded by his soldiers. His tactic was to entice the pontifical army outside the city of Rome, which would thus be left without defenders, and there promptly to stir up a revolution. In fact, on the night of October 22, in different quarters of the city at the same time, bands of insurgents attacked the posts and the barracks, attempting to penetrate to the Capitol and there sound the alarm bell. But everywhere the papal soldiers remained in Rome; zouaves, carbineers, and gendarmes, successfully repulsed the rioters.

However, the rumor spread that Garibaldi was advancing toward Rome. In fact, the peril was grave. Happily, the heroic resistance which 300 legionaries opposed to the condottiere at Monte Rotondo hindered his advance, and caused a disconcerting disturbance in his army. He delayed almost two days to deliberate and left the French forces time to reach Rome ahead of him.

[27] Chantrel, Annales, pp. 607, 636, 638, 660, 679.

France had just decided to intervene. The first article of the September convention, specifying that Italy promised to prevent, even by force, any violation of the papal territory, had it not been openly violated? On October 30, the papal soldiers posted on the heights of the Janiculum heard a sound of bugles and drums. This signaled the arrival of the French vanguard. This was soon followed by two divisions, commanded by General Failly.

General Kanzler, commander-in-chief of the pontifical troops, in a conference with Failly, won the acceptance of his stragetic plan, as daring as it was prudent: to meet the Garibaldian bands and overwhelm them promptly. This scheme was the surest means of localizing the strife, of preventing a conflict in which four armies, prompted by different and ill-defined views, might find themselves oddly implicated: the army of Garibaldi, that of Victor Emmanuel, that of Napoleon III, and that of Pius IX. The papal army, backed by a part of the French army, set out toward the revolutionary troops, which they encountered on November 3, camped in a well-chosen position on elevated land defended by several irregularities in the land formation. There two old castles, that of Mentana and that of Monte Rotondo, played the part of veritable fortresses.

The zouaves claimed the honor of being the first to march to the assault, and seized the first hills, in a dash in which Lieutenant Colonel Charette distinguished himself. The vigorous intervention of the French troops completed the rout of Garibaldi's forces, who left on the field of battle a thousand men, wounded or slain, and 1,500 prisoners besides. Those who escaped were seized at the frontier and were disarmed. The revolutionary army no longer existed.

Franco-Italian Conflict

The battle of Mentana had saved Rome; but it revived the conflict between Napoleon and Victor Emmanuel. In reply to General Failly's words, "Our chassepots [28] did wonders," the King of Italy said: "Those chassepots have crushed my royal heart." When (December 5) the French minister Rouher, wishing to confirm the alliance of his government with the Catholics, said: "Never will Italy take possession of Rome; this France will never tolerate," Victor Emmanuel murmured: "We will make him see his never."

On January 1, 1868, Pius IX blessed France, its Emperor, and its army, which he thanked for having come with such eagerness to the succor of the papacy. But Italy called on France to evacuate Rome by the French troops within two months.[29] By his not fearing to alienate King Victor Emmanuel, for sustaining the Pope and faithfulness to treaties, the Emperor of the French deserved the gratitude of the Catholics. But by entering into conflict with Italy after helping her to become a formidable power, he was preparing difficulties that only an absolute devotion to the Holy See, based on a deep Catholic faith, would enable him to surmount. However, the hesitant and wavering soul of him who then represented "the eldest daughter of the Church" did not possess such a sentiment.

Austria

The Emperor of Austria, apostolic king of Hungary,[30] did not give any better satisfaction to the Holy Father. In the course of 1867 and 1868, the Chamber of Deputies and the Chamber of Lords voted, on the proposal of the Austrian government, a series of so-called confessional laws, which annulled, [28] A name given to recently adopted guns, so called from the name of the inventor.

[29] Chantrel, Annales, pp. 728, 741.
[30] On June 8, 1867, Emperor Francis Joseph had been crowned king of Hungary.

without explicit mention, the main clauses of the concordat of 1855. One of these laws instituted civil marriage; another placed both public and private education under the direction of the state. Another regulated the relations between the members of the different religious denominations and the right of a person to change his religion. In vain, precisely when these laws had been presented (September 28, 1867) to the Chambers, the Austrian bishops protested against them by a letter addressed to the Emperor. After noting that these laws were intended to rule a Catholic nation, the bishops ended their letter by these grave words: "The more loudly they proclaim that the will of the people is the sole source of law, the less do they respect the wishes and convictions of the great majority. . . . Sire, the question is not only about the Catholic Church, but also of Christianity. . . . The undersigned bishops, your faithful subjects, are deeply convinced that, in taking up the defense of the rights of the Church, they are fighting for God, for your throne, and for your people." The Austrian Emperor ignored the appeal. The laws contrary to the concordat were promulgated on May 25, 1868. In reporting the debates, which began about two months before, the Univers said: "Liberalism goes further in Austria than in the other states of Europe." On December 16 the prime minister of the court of Vienna, Baron von Beust, wrote to the Austrian ambassador at Rome: "We are not yielding to antireligious tendencies. We are simply stating the need of putting the relations of the Church and the state in harmony with the new institutions with which Austria is endowed." [31]

Repressions in Other Countries

Catholic Spain, governed by Marshal Serrano, president of the provisional government, "suppressed (October 18, 1868)

[31] Chantrel, Annales, pp. 460–66, 476, 713.

all the monasteries, convents, and other houses of religious and declared their possessions the property of the state." In Switzerland the Council of State at Geneva refused Mermillod his title of bishop on the pretext that it had been conferred directly by the Pope without the consent of the state.[32] The Irish clergy complained more bitterly than ever of the painful situation inflicted on Catholic Ireland by the English government.[33] In Russia, the amnesty ukase (May 17–29) excluded the clergy from this general measure. Were these measures of defiance by the governments toward the Church determined, at least in part, by an influence of the anti-Christian sects? The fact is that the Freemasonry and the International Society of Workers bestirred themselves feverishly. Garibaldi wrote to the Supreme Council of Palermo that haste was required to make "a Masonic Rome," that "the Masonic unity would carry with it the unity of Italy." And the International proposed to make "a revolution against the whole social order." [34]

Undoubtedly the defenders of Catholicism became more ardent than ever. In Germany the Stimmen an Maria Laach, with extreme vivacity, attacked the modern liberties; and a speaker at the congress of Trier even proclaimed that the Syllabus "was the greatest act of the century, perhaps of all the centuries." [35] In France, the Univers, appearing again on April 16, 1867, declared, in its program, by the pen of Louis Veuillot, that it recognized "no other social architect but the Vicar of Jesus Christ," and for its motto took these words, attributed to a Father of the Church: "Christ is the solution of all the difficulties." "We wish," said Veuillot, "to engage in discussing the imperishable exactness of this inspired word." [36]

[32] Ibid., pp. 826 f. Cf. p. 457.

[33] For the statement of the grievances of the Irish Catholics, in a declaration of the clergy (December 23, 1867), see ibid., pp. 721, 726.

[34] Ibid., pp. 558 f., 566, 838.

[35] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, IV, 268.

[36] Chantrel, Annales, p. 541.

But at the opposite extreme, in Germany, Döllinger proposed to the Protestants a basis of understanding in which no question of the temporal sovereignty of the pope entered; he even held that the vexations from which the pontiff suffered were of a nature to enlighten him.[37] In France, Father Hyacinthe, Notre Dame preacher, wrote to a democratic paper that he separated his cause "from that of certain Catholics who regretted the Inquisition." [38]

So many agitations and controversies made everyone desire the prompt meeting of a universal council, whose authority, imposed on the entire Church, would render it calmer and stronger to fight its enemies effectively. Moreover, the Catholic world joyfully welcomed the bull Aeterni Patris, by which (June 29, 1868) Pope Pius IX convoked the bishops of the whole world to assemble in council at the Vatican on December 8, 1869.[39]

[37] "Vexatio dabit intellectum," he wrote to Gladstone. Friedrich, Döllinger, III, 269.

[38] Chantrel, Annales, p. 840.

[39] Ibid., pp. 804, 806.

CHAPTER XXXIV

Convocation of the Vatican Council

GRAVE perils threatened the papacy and the Church. These perils came from the vague hostility of the powers, the plots of the anti-Christian sects, and the lively controversies among Catholics themselves. None of these escaped the notice of the Sovereign Pontiff. Said Pius IX: "A council ordinarily has three periods: that of the devil, that of men, and that of God." At the time the period was that of the devil; that of men was soon to arrive; that of God would triumph at last, and it was already in preparation.[1]

Anti-Catholic Movement

The Roman Pontiffs, when condemning the revolutionary secret societies, often considered them the works of the spirit of evil.[2] Pius IX, in a brief to Bishop Darboy (October 26, 1865), had called Freemasonry "the synagogue of Satan."

Since the appearance of Renan's Life of Jesus, a twofold character had marked the anti-Catholic movement. First of all, it was a turn toward atheism and anarchy; also, it became increasingly associated with Freemasonry. With blasphemous irreverence Renan had spoken of "those good old words—God,

[1] For a detailed account of the Vatican Council, see Cecconi, Historia de Concilio ecumenico Vaticano, 1879; Granderarth, Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, 1903; Collectio lacensis, Vol. VII.

[2] On the various condemnations issued against the secret societies by Clement XIII, Pius VI, Pius VII, Leo XII, Pius VIII, and Gregory XVI, see the allocution Multiplices of Pius IX, delivered on September 25, 1865. Acta Pii IX, IV, 23; Dict. apol. de la foi cathol., s.v. "Franc-maçonnerie," II, 127.

Providence, soul, immortality—which philosophy would interpret in more and more refined meanings." By this comment he meant more and more favorable to atheism. A short time before Renan, a writer who addressed especially the world of workers, but who, by the paradoxical originality of his thought and apparent strictness of his logic, would influence the cultivated classes, Pierre Joseph Proudhon, bluntly declared himself an atheist, even antitheist. "God is the evil; property is theft." Such were his mottos. But Proudhon openly declared himself a Mason.[3] On the day of his reception into Freemasonry, to the question: "What does man owe to God and to his fellow men?" he answered: "To all men, justice; to God, war upon him."

Like Renan, Proudhon seems to have been subject to the influence of the German philosophy.[4] Through the works of Wirchow, Moleschott, Vogt, and Büchner, translated into all languages at the same time as those of Kant, Hegel, and Feuerbach, that philosophy had spread the most unadulterated materialism. For fifteen years the dissolving idealism of some and the brutal atheism of the others had done their work.[5] In 1866 Bishop Duplanloup uttered a cry of alarm in an eloquent pamphlet, L'athéisme et le péril social. Two years later, Montalembert, in one of his last writings, gave Catholics a glimpse of "a development of sensualism, materialism, and atheism which had no example in the eighteenth century." [6]

In his pamphlet the Bishop of Orléans distinguished the anti-religious and antisocial propaganda from the Masonic propaganda. In fact, the most eager adepts of atheism and anarchy came from the Masonic lodges or became admitted to them. Ferry, who, in his electoral program of 1869, declared: "Only [3] See Proudhon, De la justice dans la Révolution et dans l'Eglise, II, 212.

[4] On Proudhon's dependence upon Hegel, see Lanson, Histoire de la littérature française, p. 902.

[5] The philosophy of Comte and that of Littré had also contributed much to this evolution.

[6] Cf. Correspondant, May 25, 1868.

two parties exist: the clerical party and that of liberty"; Léon Gambetta, who, at this same period, proclaimed himself a disciple of Proudhon; Arthur Ranc and Georges Clemenceau, who took their stand about Blanqui, the famous author of the formula, "Neither God nor Master": all scoffed at the spiritualism of the veterans of 1848 and tried to have their political and religious radicalism accepted in the lodges.[7] Moreover, they enthusiastically welcomed a similar movement in Protestantism. Ferdinand Buisson regarded the liberal Christianity which was formed at Neuchâtel in Switzerland, as "a lay religion, without dogma, without moral teaching, and without priests, separated from traditional Christianity." [8] And Edgar Quinet said he saw in Channing's American Unitarianism: "If it still preserved a shadow of Christian antiquity, it extends its hand to the most daring philosophy." [9]

Plan of a Masonic Anticouncil

We are not surprised that the announcement of an ecumenical council deeply moved the Masonic lodges. At the general meeting of the Grand Orient of France in July, 1869, Colfavru proposed to convoke an extraordinary assembly of Freemasons to proclaim, "in face of the ecumenical council the great principles of universal human right." [10] The question was to reply to the Syllabus by "a solemn affirmation of principles, which would serve, in the future, as a banner for Masonry." [11] A member of the Italian Parliament, Joseph Ricciardi, wrote a letter to all the freethinkers of all nations, "to invite them to meet on December 8, 1869, at Naples." Among the adherents might be noted those [7] On this movement and its connection with Freemasonry, see Weill, Histoire du parti républicain. Gambetta received Freemasonry in 1869 (Tournier, Gambetta franc-maçon, p. 143). Under the patronage of Masonry was founded the Ligue de l'enseignement, presided over by Jean Macé.

[8] See F. Buisson, L'enseignement de l'histoire sainte.

[9] E. Quinet, Le livre de l'exilé, pp. 538, 568.

[10] See the full official report of the meeting in Cecconi, op. cit.

[11] Ibid.

of Garibaldi and Victor Hugo. Not satisfied with convoking an anticouncil at Naples, the organization committee prepared, in the chief cities of Italy, some manifestations against the Vatican Council. These demonstrations would, so they said, at the same time be manifestations in favor of Italian nationality.[12]

In spite of this appeal to Italian patriotism, the Naples anticouncil and the popular manifestations that were to accompany it were a complete failure. The organizers were not agreed either on the method of propaganda or on the program of the anticouncil. Whereas one group of Freemasons, whose leader was the freethinker Regnard, wished to declare that "the idea of God is the source of so much despotism and so much injustice," others, more circumspect and perhaps more clever, wished, following Ricciardi, simply to proclaim "the freedom of reason in the face of religious authority and the solidarity of the peoples in the face of the alliance of princes and priests." Three meetings were held (December 6, 10, 16). That of the 10th was the occasion of such subversive clamors that the police declared the meeting dissolved, "because it departed from the domain of philosophy and entered that of socialism." At the meeting of the 16th, the uproar was so violent that the owner of the hall refused after that to receive the members of the "council." They were unable to find any other place in which to meet, and the great projected assembly ended in ridicule.[13]

Schismatic and Non-Catholic Churches

In schism and heresy the Church has often seen the work of the demon. But it has never forgotten that those who adore Christ have not broken every bond with her; she calls them

[12] Cf. ibid.

[13] The documents relative to the Naples anticouncil may be found in a 448-page work published at Paris, at the Grand Orient, and entitled Enquête maçonnique à propos du convent extraordinaire du 8 décembre 1869, and in the bimonthly, Le chaîne d'union. Cecconi, in his volume IV, gives some extracts from these publications.

"separated brethren." Pius IX resolved to invite to the council their hierarchical representatives.

On September 8, 1868, he wrote to the schismatical bishops of the Oriental rite, inviting them to come for the council. "May you come," said the Pontiff, "as your predecessors came to the Second Council of Lyons and to the Council of Florence, that the schism may at last cease." [14] A few days later, Pius IX addressed a letter to the Protestants, or rather, in a more general way, to all those who, bearing the name of Christians, were not in communion with the Roman Church. Said the Pope: "A father never abandons his children, even when they have abandoned him." Then, recalling the marks of the true Church, he contrasted the stability of the Church of Rome with the instability of the other Christian societies. Lastly he urged all Christians to profit by the occasion which the future council offered them "to return to the bosom of that Church to which their forefathers had formerly belonged." At Rome no exaggerated hope was entertained for the success of these invitations.

Concerning the 70,000,000 Christians who, under the names of Copts, Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, Greeks, and Russians, constituted the group of Oriental Churches not united, Bishop Valerga, patriarch of Jerusalem, previously consulted by the prefect of Propaganda, foresaw a negative reply. What impression was produced, in the mass of the faithful and among the clergy, by the Roman Pontiff's appeal? This cannot be easily ascertained. Of course, many were unaware of the existence of the papal letter. But we know that some Jacobite bishops, upon receipt of the Pope's invitation, believed they were conforming to the desire of their people by replying: "We wish, indeed, to go to the council of Rome if our patriarch consents." But the [14] Pius IX, on the occasion of the council, exhorted the Protestants to the union; but he did not invite their bishops to attend the assembly because, in most of the Protestant Churches, the invalidity of the ordinations was not doubtful and because, even among the Anglicans, the validity of the episcopal powers was not certain.

patriarch did not consent. "If the Pope wishes a council," he said, "let him come and hold it here." The jealous autocracy of the patriarchs, who feared seeing their authority lessened, the too strictly national character given to religion in the Eastern countries, the traditional prejudices against Rome, and, especially in the case of the Russian Church, the Caesarian despotism that weighed on it like a nightmare: such were the obstacles which the papal invitation encountered.

In vain Pius IX declared that he would assume the expenses of their journey and their sojourn, that the patriarchs and bishops would receive all the honors due to their rank, that interpreters would be provided, and that they would enjoy entire freedom of speech; no prelate came in answer to the appeal. Some gave no reason for their refusal, like that Syrian-Jacobite bishop of Jerusalem who read the letter, then put it on his desk and merely replied: "Well." Others, such as the Greek patriarch of Constantinople, maintained "that they believed in the infallibility of the ecumenical councils, but that in their eyes such councils were vitiated by the simple fact that the pope did not there take his rank as a simple patriarch, equal to the others." This view was, by a simple sophism easy to refute, to prejudge precisely the very question to be solved. In short, the refusal to Pius IX's invitation by the non-uniated Oriental Churches must be attributed to the despotism of their religious and civil leaders.

The opposition which the Pope's appeal met with in the Protestant Churches was of a diverse nature. Moreover the organization of those Churches was less uniform.

The German Protestants

In Germany a Protestant who would later adjure his heresy, Reinhold Baumstark, wrote a pamphlet in favor of the council, in which he saw the means of realizing the union among all the faithful of Christ. But his peaceful voice was lost amid the hostile clamors of his fellow Lutherans. On October 20, 1868, the nuncio at Munich wrote to Cardinal Antonelli: "The Pope's letter has stirred up most violent articles in the Protestant press. These articles tend to represent the Holy Father's paternal act as an insult and a defiance, as a poorly disguised solicitation to return to the corruption of the Middle Ages and to the world-wide domination of the popes." The national feeling, so strangely exalted and perverted, combined with the heretical spirit in that irritation of public opinion. The German people were still quivering over the splendid festivities celebrated at Worms (June 18 of that year) in connection with the erection of a colossal statue of Luther. At the moment when the king of Prussia, William I, appeared, surrounded by a brilliant military staff, the cries of "Luther! Luther!" were suddenly drowned by those of "Hurrah for King William! Hurrah for Prussia!" A group of demonstrators had even climbed up on the royal tribune and from there cried: "Hurrah for the Emperor of Germany!" And the King of Prussia greeted this significant shout with a gesture of approval. At the foot of this Luther monument the assembly of the general Protestant Federation wished to draw up a reply to the Roman Pontiff. They said: "We, Protestants, assembled today at Worms . . . at the foot of the Luther monument, taking our stand on the ground common to all men of the Christian spirit, of German patriotism and of civilization . . . publicly protest against the so-called apostolic letters of September 13, 1868, . . . and we energetically reject every hierarchical claim, every dogmatic authority, which for us would be as so many bridges intended to conduct us to Rome."

In France, Guizot, the noblest representative of the Reformed Church, at a meeting uttered the following words: "Pius IX has given proof of an admirable wisdom in convoking this great assembly, from which perhaps will emerge the salvation of the world, for our societies are indeed very sick; but great evils call for great remedies." [15] Other Protestants, such as Edmond de Pressensé, considering the meeting of the council merely the prelude to the consecration of the Syllabus, and in the Syllabus merely "the absolute bondage of conscience," [16] united in the campaign of the freethinkers' press to protest against the enterprise of Pius IX.

The English Protestants

As might be foreseen, in England the papal letter found the most sympathetic echoes. The Oxford movement had accustomed the minds to the idea of a union of the Churches. Ferard Cobb, a Cambridge professor, published two works on the coming council, both of them from a friendly point of view. Another Protestant, David Urquhart, wrote an appeal to the Pope for the establishment of the law of nations; he even succeeded in having his fellow Protestants send to the Pope a request that, on the occasion of the future council, he take in hand the cause of the law of nations. Among the ritualists some pastors and laymen (e.g., the Scottish Bishop Forbes, residing at Dundee) were disposed to reply to the advances of the Roman Church. Having no objection to the ecumenical character of the council just convoked by the Pope, irritated at the hostility of the civil powers toward them, and persuaded that, as soon as the Anglican Church would no longer be the State Church in Ireland, the days of the Anglican Church as the State Church in England would be numbered; and, seeing therein the breaking of one of the bonds which made their cohesion and their moral force, they turned to Rome with confidence. In February, 1869, an Anglican ritualist, John Stuart, general archivist of Scotland, [15] For details of the preceding accounts, cf. Cecconi and Granderath.

[16] E. de Pressensé, Le Concile du Vatican, p. 197. The Alliance évangélique asked the prayers of its followers "at the moment when Rome was going to put the seal on its work . . . by condemning the progress and the liberties without which modern society would no longer be able to subsist."

who was in scientific relations with the Bollandists of Brussels, put Bishop Forbes in touch with the Bollandist Victor de Buck, who shortly before had published in the Etudes of the fathers of the Society of Jesus, several articles marked with sympathy for the Puseyite movement. The learned Jesuit was not only an eminent scholar; he had also the reputation of being a man of high doctrine; the Jesuit father general had appointed him, the preceding month, his theologian in the general council.[17] But, from the very first letters exchanged with the Anglican prelate, the Jesuit perceived that a man was increasing the obstacles to the understanding. That man was Pusey.

Pusey

Forbes had the cooperation of Pusey in his replies. But Pusey continually added fresh objections to the first objections submitted by the Scottish bishop. He showed that he was offended at the failure to invite the Anglican bishops personally like those of the Oriental non-united Churches; still more offended at being treated as a heretic. However, he declared he did not admit certain points of Catholic dogma on transubstantion and the authority of the pope. As to the council, on the pretext that the Anglican bishops had not been personally invited, he denied its ecumenical character. Father de Buck wrote: "Pusey stops everything";[18] and a ritualist of Cambridge, making known to the Jesuit father that "Pusey raised all imaginable difficulties to prevent anything being done with regard to the council," added: "Talk to me about the infallibility of the Holy See! It is nothing compared with the need of absolute abandonment of faith, of reason, and of everything into [17] The details given above are taken from the correspondence of Victor de Buck with Bishop Dupanloup, which is preserved in the archives of the St. Sulpice Seminary, notably the letters written by Father de Buck on January 30, 1869, and March 9, 1869.

[18] V. de Buck, letter of July 29, 1869, to Dupanloup.

the hands of the great Doctor Pusey in person, who reigns as supreme chief among us Anglicans." [19] Such was the first obstacle to the negotiations. A second obstacle was met with. Father de Buck, not thinking himself authorized to treat the affair in person, decided to place it in the hands of Dupanloup, an intermediary willingly accepted by the Anglicans.[20] But Cardinal Bilio required that negotiations should be conducted by Bishop Manning, with whom the ritualists were unwilling to treat at any price. In short, when Father de Buck went to Rome, the Congregation of the Holy Office (November 15, 1869) enjoined on him to break off his parleys with the Anglicans.[21]

The papal letter did not receive any better welcome among the Protestants of Switzerland, Holland, Austria, and America, and there the negotiations remained.

The Catholic Rulers

A no less delicate question was that of the representation of the Catholic rulers in the ecumenical assembly. Since the Council of Nicaea, where Emperor Constantine held a place of honor, the Christian emperors and kings had taken part, either themselves personally or by an ambassador, in all the general councils. But the relations between the Church and the states were so profoundly changed since the fall of Christendom, that scarcely can we picture a modern ruler mingled with the episcopal body in the hall of deliberations. After mature examination of the question by the preparatory Congregation, they decided that the Catholic princes could be present at the solemn sessions, but that they would not be invited to take part in the deliberations. Cardinal Antonelli was directed to explain to the diplomatic representatives that "the Holy Father had nowise the intention of keeping the princes apart, but that, because of the impossibility of convoking without distinction all the rulers of Catholicism, one of them being under the ban of excommunication, he limited himself to asking them, in general terms, to lend their benevolent concurrence." [22]

[19] Ibid.

[20] See his letters, passim.

[21] Cecconi (op. cit.) conjectures that the reason for the prohibition pronounced by the Holy Office would have been the following: they feared that the negotiations undertaken with the unionist party, which was not numerous (not more than 400 out of 18,000 Anglican clergy), and was detested by the Established Church, would endanger the general movement of the Church of England toward the Roman Church. These reasons, according to the unpublished correspondence of Father de Buck with Bishop Dupanloup, seem to us more likely. The members of the Holy Office were undoubtedly guided by the slightness of hope which they had in the success of the negotiations and perhaps also with the slight confidence they felt in the proposed negotiator. In fact, Bishop Dupanloup published (November 11), in connection with the council and the papal infallibility, a letter which greatly stirred the men at Rome.

This decision seemed at first to satisfy the minds belonging to the most opposite parties. On July 10, 1868, a liberal deputy, Emile Ollivier, said in the Chamber of Deputies: "Gentlemen, I am not aware, since 1789, of an event of equal importance; it is the separation of Church and state, carried out by the Pope himself. The Church, for the first time, says to the lay powers: I wish to be and to act outside of you and without you. I have my own life, which I hold from my divine origin. This life is enough for me; I ask from you nothing but the right to rule myself in my own way. Gentlemen, I find this language possesses an imposing boldness; it strikes me with respect and admiration." [23] The next day, under the signature of Louis Veuillot, the Univers had the following lines: "We have a view of the Christian and Catholic organization of democracy. On the ruins of infidel nations, we see a more numerous rebirth of the multitude of nations, equal with one another, free, forming a universal confederation in the unity of the faith, under the presidency of the Roman Pontiff; a holy people, as formerly a holy empire. And this baptized and consecrated democracy will do what the [22] E. Ollivier, L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile du Vatican, I, 508.

[23] Moniteur universel, July 11, 1868; E. Ollivier, op. cit., I, 401.

monarchies were unable to do and did not wish to do: it will everywhere abolish the idols, it will bring about the eternal reign of Christ." [24]

These optimistic perspectives were far from being realized. A diplomatic agitation, organized in view of the council, was soon produced. The promoter of this agitation was a German doctor whose name will appear again and again in the course of this history, Doctor Döllinger, professor at Munich. He was said to have felt slighted at not having been named to one of the preparatory commissions of the council.[25] Outside the council he would keep up a ceaseless agitation. His first step was to suggest to Prince Clovis von Hohenlohe, the Bavarian minister, the idea of intervening with the different European cabinets to put them on their guard against the danger with which the coming council threatened them. The question was, he said, nothing less than declaring the propositions of the Syllabus dogmas of faith, that is, proclaiming the absolute subjection of the states to the authority of the Roman Pontiff. In fact, on Döllinger's urgent solicitations, Prince von Hohenlohe (April 9, 1869) communicated to all the cabinets of Europe a dispatch drawn up in this sense, and submitted to them the idea of an international conference with a view to meeting the danger.

The intended result was not fully attained. The proposed conference did not take place. Bismarck declared that an intervention of the powers in the affairs of the Catholic Church seemed to him to belong to a state of things that had permanently disappeared. He added, however, that the Roman curia would meet on his part with an energetic resistance as soon as it would per-[24] Univers, July 11, 1868; Louis Veuillot, Rome pendant le concile, I, nos. 65–66.

[25] On December 28, 1868, he wrote to the Bishop of Orléans: "You ask me whether I have been invited to Rome to take part in the preparatory labors. I answer that I have not been. . . . For some years past I have fallen into disgrace. . . . At Rome they consider me a man too little ultramontane, and you know that this fault is not pardoned." The letter ended with the words, which might already show that a defection was to be feared: "Not without a feeling of admiration mingled with envy do I contemplate you, . . . resolved to defend whatever will be decided at Rome."

mit itself any encroachments on the temporal. Prince de la Tour of Auvergne, Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, declared that the Emperor was disposed to judge the acts of the council in a broad and liberal spirit, but that he was resolved strongly to defend, if unhappily the need should present itself, the rights of which the confidence of the French nation had made him the depositary. This attitude of "threatening expectation" was almost that of all the European cabinets.[26]

Attitude of the Catholic World

In the Catholic world the announcement of a universal council aroused at first unanimous joy. "Countless bishops of all countries spoke to their flocks about the future assembly. Especially notable was a beautiful letter of Bishop Dupanloup of Orléans, which went through a large number of editions and, after its publication, was also translated into German, Spanish, English, Italian, Polish, Hungarian, and Flemish." [27]

But this universal accord could not long endure. The controversies recently stirred up with regard to the Avenir, the campaign for freedom of education, the question of the classics, and many other philosophical, social, and political questions, did not disappear without leaving, in the minds of the combatants, certain irritations ready to be transformed into new controversies. The encyclicals Mirari vos and Quanta cura had succeeded in bringing about unity in the faith and in discipline; they had allowed diversity of tendencies to subsist. Veuillot and Manning did not view the questions from the same standpoint as Dupanloup or Newman. But what marked both groups was, with an [26] These diplomatic incidents have been extensively set forth by Emile Ollivier in his L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile du Vatican, I, 403–536. But we should accept the appreciations of this writer with reservations.

[27] "This letter," wrote Father Victor de Buck, "is probably the best writing that has appeared in this century. It is an example of how we should speak about the Church" (letter of November 13, 1869).

equal desire to serve the Church, an ardor in the strife, an impetuosity in the attack and in the retorts, which recent combats against unbelief had revived and which unfortunately wasted itself in internal quarrels. Moreover, not all the controverted questions had been solved by the latest papal decisions. The program of the council would raise up fresh questions, still more fiery. What Pius IX had called the period of strife against the infernal powers was almost over; but the period of strifes stirred by the passions, misunderstandings, and men's reciprocal failure to understand, was about to open.

The Civiltà cattolica's publication of an anonymous correspondence, which was regarded as a manifesto of the ultramontanes, the controversy which soon started in Germany between Doctor Döllinger and Doctor Hergenröther, the appearance of a book of Bishop Maret on Le concile et la paix religieuse, the publication in the Correspondant of an article in which was seen the program of the liberals, and Dupanloup's entrance into the campaign by the publication of a pamphlet entitled Observations sur la controverse soulevée relativement à la definition de l'infallibilité: such were the chief incidents of this period of strife.

Article in the Civiltà cattolica

On February 6, 1869, the Civiltà cattolica, an Italian review edited by the fathers of the Society of Jesus, published, on the future council, a long French correspondance which contained these lines:

> No one is unaware that unfortunately the Catholics of France are split into two parties: the members of one party are simply Catholics; those of the other call themselves liberal Catholics. . . . The Catholics strictly so called believe that the future council will be very short and, in this respect, will resemble the council of Chalcedon, . . . of such a sort that the minority, however eloquent it may be, will not be able to furnish a long opposition. From the dogmatic point of view, the Catholics desire the proclamation, by the future ecumenical council, of the doctrines of the Syllabus. . . . They would gladly welcome the future council's proclamation of the dogmatic infallibility of the Supreme Pontiff. . . . Everyone is aware that the Pope, by a feeling of august reserve, will perhaps not wish to take the initiative of proposing it. But hope is expressed that the unanimous outburst of the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of the fathers of the future ecumenical council, will define it by acclamation.

The appearance of the Civiltà's article had an immense reverberation and aroused lively protests. "By what right," it was said, "does the Roman paper, when speaking of two factions of Catholics who equally make profession of submission to the Church and to the Holy See, permit itself to call one group, to the exclusion of the other, the Catholics strictly so-called?" Furthermore, the way the author of the article expressed himself when he spoke of the desires of the "Catholics properly so-called," seemed to give to his wishes the appearance of a summons. Lastly, were the objects of these wishes, so imperatively formulated, in the spirit of the Church? While desiring that the council would be "very short," and even that the votes would be made "by acclamation," did one forget that, "if Bellarmine and other theologians rejected the Council of Constance defining the superiority of the council over the pope, they did so precisely because that decree was passed without sufficient discussion"? Had one sufficiently reflected that "the Holy Ghost does not inspire the Church, but assists it," and that, "if God, who guides all, should will that something be defined by the council on the infallibility of the pope, that definition ought to be made, not by acclamation or with precipitation, but after mature consideration of the opportuneness, the basis, and the form."

On April 17, 1869, the Civiltà declared that it refrained from having "dared to fix the duration of the council and from having limited it, with a view thus to rendering impossible a thorough examination of the questions." It further said: "For that we would have to be ignorant of the first elements of theology." [28] Besides, the Roman paper declared that, "in accepting the incriminated correspondence, it had no intention to making its own everything therein contained." But these explanations did not lead to peace. Minds were irritated. A controversy began, in the course of which the German Allgemeine Zeitung, with insolent acrimony, and Le Français, with comparative moderation, maintained their accusations against the Civiltà cattolica. The German paper even held responsible for what it called "an outrageous attack on the Church," the Society of Jesus, the Roman court, the Supreme Pontiff himself. "We do not exaggerate," it said, "in supposing that the ideas of the Civiltà are in accord with those of the supreme head and the other heads of the court of Rome." [29]

[28] As theologians and Jesuits, the editors of the Civiltà could not, in fact, forget the doctrine so masterly expounded by Bellarmine: "Patres in conciliis debent rem ipsam quaerere, id est, conclusiones investigare, disputando, legendo, cogitando." Bellarmine, Controversia generalis de conciliis, Bk. II, chap. 12.

[29] We need not remark how far such accusations were gratuitous. The foes of the Civiltà were not on the side of truth when they accused it of stirring up the first of the irritating questions with regard to the future council. As early as 1867 several anonymous articles of the Allgemeine Zeitung and of the Neue Freie Presse had broached the same questions, having charged "Manning, for example, with devoting himself to the theory of infallibility with the ardent zeal of a convert." Friedrich (Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, II, 3) is not excusable when he holds that the Roman curia deliberately aroused a controversy on the infallibility "because it needed to have the doctrine attacked so that it might say that it was constrained to propose the definition." All we can say is that "undoubtedly the famous correspondence of the Roman review notably accentuated the movement that was hostile to the council." Who was the author of the famous correspondence? Neither Granderath nor Cecconi nor Emile Ollivier nor any other historian, so far as we know, has named him. In an unpublished letter, addressed (July 20, 1869) to Bishop Dupanloup, Father Victor de Buck wrote the name of Father Darras, the author of a Church history then widely known, but much criticized by the Bollandists. Father de Buck, having at least indirect relations with Father Piccirillo, director of the Civiltà (letter of April 15, 1869) and with several other Jesuits of Rome, was in a position to be well informed.

Döllinger

Later the information transpired that the author of the violent articles published under the veil of anonymity in the Allgemeine Zeitung was Dr. Ignaz von Döllinger, professor in the faculty of theology of Munich. Between Döllinger and Félicité de Lamennais certain points of resemblance are striking. "Döllinger had formerly taken an outstanding part in the awakening of Catholic Germany; he had fought, as publicist and as parliamentarian, against the religous despotism of the state. In 1848 he figured among the 'grave-diggers' of Josephism; and at that time he received the renown of an ultramontane, which he accepted." [30]

The university of Munich venerated him as a glory; Church history held him to be a master. He had enthusiastic disciples. Says a certain German historian of theology: "For twenty-five years he was looked upon as one of the first theologians of Germany." [31] He was quite conscious of his worth, of his renown, of his influence, and perhaps he exaggerated the power of that influence. His words were vivid, colorful, nervous, cutting. One of his contemporaries has pictured him in these terms: "His head is strong and grave; his eye has the cold limpidity and impassible penetration of the collector of ideas and facts; the ironical grin of his lips excluded all passion, if it is not the passion of knowing." [32] That knowledge was immense. Döllinger was above all a scholar. This quality seemed to dominate everything in him, even—for this was the impression of those who approached him—that of priest. His theological training was incomplete. Never had he grasped the role of the magisterium of the Church, and he got accustomed to the false idea of the [30] Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, IV, 240.

[31] K. Werner, Geschichte der Katholischen Theologie seit dem Trienter Konzil, p. 470.

[32] Emile Ollivier, op. cit., I, 425.

function of the theologian. In a famous speech delivered in 1863 at the scientific congress of Munich, he declared: "As in the time of the Jews, beside the priesthood, was prophecy; so in the Church, beside the ordinary power, is an extraordinary power, which is public opinion. Thereby theological science exercises the influence which returns to it and which, in the long run, nothing resists." Like Lamennais, Döllinger dreamed of an accord between the Church and modern ideas. Being surrounded by Protestants, he was obsessed with the thought of the Churches drawing closer together. "He took an interest in that question as a Catholic, and perhaps even more so as a German." [33] "In 1850, at the Catholic assembly of Linz, he had sketched the architecture of a national German Church which, in the vast Roman unity, would have its own life, its own organization, its councils, and its literature, and its institution would be a first stage toward the reunion of the Christian denominations." [34]

Toward the end of 1869, Döllinger, more and more confident in the victorious power of his science, decided to gather in a little volume the five articles that had appeared in the Allgemeine Zeitung. "I am gathering together," he wrote on November 29, "the testimonies and the necessary explanations to determine with finality the question of infallibility." [35] The volume appeared under this title: Der Papst und das Konzil, and under the pseudonymn of Janus. The author was not satisfied with saying, as did the editor of the Français, that the proclamation of papal infallibility seemed to him inopportune; he attacked the thesis itself. He went still further and held that the council, whatever it should decide, would have no authority, because it would not be free. "In fact," he said, "can we call free an assembly of men on whom is imposed a duty of conscience, sworn to on their honor, to consider as the chief end of their efforts the upholding and increase of the power of the pope? A meeting of men who live in the fear of drawing down on them the displeasure of the curia, who dread the fetters that Rome may put on them in the exercise of their office?" [36]

[33] Goyau, op. cit., IV, 242.

[34] Ibid., p. 241. Many manifestations, prompted by a no less rash spirit, were made in Germany under the form of manifestos. We mention only the address of a number of Catholics of Baden, published by the Journal des Débats of July 2, 1869.

[35] An unpublished letter (archives of the St. Sulpice Seminary). The context of the letter breathes such a scientific self-conceit and so well characterizes the unfortunate German professor, that it ought to be quoted: "My citations of editions, volumes, and pages will be so exact, so scrupulously exact, that every person can verify them at once. If a certain number of bishops can be persuaded to enter seriously into the discussion . . . the victory of the truth is almost assured."

A doctor having an erudition equal to that of Döllinger and a theological science of better quality, the future Cardinal Hergenröther, took up his pen and, in a work which he called the Anti-Janus, subjected the pamphlet to a severe criticism, convicted its author of more than once altering the texts, of having more often selected them arbitrarily and grouped them systematically, and of having drawn fantastic conclusions by procedures where logic was lamentably mistreated. A German priest already in revolt, one who later would separate from the Church by a complete apostasy, Frohschammer by name, subjected Döllinger's work to a criticism in a more terrible sense. He easily showed that Janus, if he wished to be logical with his principles, should have gone farther, denying not only the infallibility of the pope, but that of the Church and consequently withdrawing from it and abandoning the Christian faith.

Bishop Maret's Du Concile général

While the different phases of this discussion were unfolding in Germany, a controversy arose in France in connection with a work published in September, 1869, by the dean of the theological faculty of Paris, Bishop Maret. The title of the book was Du Concile général et de la paix religieuse. The author, taking his stand on ground different from that of the Français, which opposed merely the opportuneness of the definition of papal infallibility, and different from Doctor Döllinger, who made his assault on the very thesis of infallibility, pretended to combat only the doctrine of what he called personal and separate infallibility. "Papal infallibility," he said, "can be understood in different ways. That which seems to prevail in the school which calls for the conciliar definition, is the most absolute of all. In this system, dogmatic infallibility is a privilege entirely and exclusively personal to the pontiff: that is, a privilege of the pontiff teaching alone and without any necessary concourse of the episcopate. Thus understood, infallibility is identical with the pure, indivisible, absolute monarchy of the Roman Pontiff." The author summed up his own doctrine in the following lines:

[36] Some have held that Bishop Dupanloup made common cause with Döllinger. The latter's correspondence as well as the writings of the Bishop of Orléans belies this too absolute assertion. See Döllinger's letters published by the Revue internationale de théologie, 1899, pp. 236, 238. Cf. Goyau, op. cit., IV, 344.

> The pope is, by divine right, the supreme head of the Church; the bishops, by divine right, share, under his authority, in the government of the religious society. The spiritual sovereignty is, then, composed of two essential elements: a principal one, the papacy; the other subordinate, the episcopate. Infallibility, forming the highest attribute of the spiritual sovereignty, is necessarily also composed of the essential elements of the sovereignty. . . . This doctrine seems to me easily reconcilable with the most moderate doctrines of the school that is called ultramontane. This doctrine does not deny the infallibility, but brings it to its true nature.

Apart from this principal thesis, Bishop Maret advocated the periodical holding of general councils, and, without espousing all the doctrines called Gallican, without holding himself at one with any assembly or any declaration, and professing all due respect for the decisions and bulls of Sixtus IV, Alexander VII, Clement XI, and Pius VI, he said that he considered that the theological Gallicanism, the Gallicanism of the French episco-pate, seemed to him to contain a fund of eternal and necessary truth. Foreseeing that he would be accused with publicly discussing one of the questions that were going to be submitted to the conciliar deliberations, he availed himself of his title of bishop, of the liberty that seemed to him to properly belong to the preparation of the council as to its debates, and of the fact that several of his fellow bishops had already brought the question before the public.[37]

The work itself touched on burning questions; but the quarrel it aroused was especially embittered by the press. Several months before the appearance of the book, the Figaro, the Indépendance belge, and some other papers had spread the most fantastic rumors about him. The author, they said, was in previous concert with the Emperor; furthermore, he was merely the mouthpiece of an important group of bishops. They said further that the book was already translated into Latin and the principal European languages; yet neither the Spanish ambassador nor the apostolic nuncio nor the Jesuits themselves had been able to procure the least scrap of proof. The whole thing did not contain a grain of truth. But the stir caused by these rumors was at its height when the work was put on sale. The calmest minds became heated. In the Univers, Louis Veuillot, precisely on the basis of the rumor, thought himself authorized to raise his voice with more freedom.

"Bishop Maret lays his book open to the public: undoubtedly that they may read it; he must wish that it be appraised; he must allow himself to be accused." Bishop Pie of Poitiers, Bishop Doney of Montauban, Bishop Plantier of Nimes, Bishop Delalle of Rodez, and Archbishop Manning of Westminster, believing themselves informed on the opinions opposed by Bishop Maret, criticized his work keenly. The religious press entered the fight. The Correspondant and the Français replied to the Univers. "While having the air of attacking only the pope's personal and separate infallibility," said some, "his supreme magisterium is what they have in mind." The others replied: "A strange way of honoring the head of the Church, to separate it from its body." [38]

[37] Du Concile général, I, xviii, xxvi; III, 389.

Amid these disputes, Bishop Maret had to step in several times. Again and again he did not hesitate to declare that, whatever might be the decision of the council, "submission would be easy for him." He would keep his word and declare later on, in lofty language, that he took back whatever in his works would be out of agreement with the conciliar definition of infallibility.[39]

Article in the Correspondant

But the French head of the school attacked by the Civiltà and the Univers, was not Bishop Maret; in the eyes of all, friends and foes, it was Bishop Dupanloup. At the time of his decisive intervention in the campaign conducted for winning freedom of education, Dupanloup's reputation had continued to grow. His strifes for the independence of the temporal power of the Holy See brought him the warm congratulations of Pius IX. Says Granderath: "Rare qualities of intellect, remarkably deep knowledge, were not the only reasons for his pre-eminence; what was dominant and characteristic in him was a tireless activity." After being the inspirer of the Ami de la religion and the Journal des Villes et des Campagnes, he founded, at the beginning of 1868, the paper Le Français; and the editors of the Correspondant habitually resorted to his counsels. In the articles of the Français, which replied to the French correspondence of [38] Archbishop Manning, in a pastoral published in the month of October, used the expression "apart from the bishops": these words, taken literally, could be understood in two senses: without the bishops, without their direct concourse; or, against the bishops, in possible opposition to the bishops; in the latter sense the Univers apparently interpreted the English expression.

[39] Cf. Bazin, Vie de Mgr Maret.

the Civiltà, friends and foes recognized his pen; in a sort of manifesto which the Correspondant (October 10, 1869) published, his inspiration was evident.[40] In lofty language and under prudent forms, said some, clever forms, said others, the author of the article expressed his hopes about the future council. He could not imagine that the convocation of the States General of the Church could end with the proclamation of a despotic monarchy. Such a result would be contrary to the laws of history as well as to the traditions of the Church. The author hoped that the bishops, far from consecrating certain absolute propositions, whose poorly grasped meaning had troubled the Church, would seek to explain them or reject them.

This declaration stirred up fresh controversies. Louis Veuillot made a lively attack on it in the Univers. Bishop Pie criticized "this language with being of a haughty self-conceit." The whole religious press of France, Italy, Germany, and England took up the question.[41]

Dupanloup's Observations

The agitations increased when (November 11, 1869) Bishop Dupanloup, in his own name, publicly intervened in the controversy by a pamphlet in the form of a letter to his clergy, [40] The author of the article seems to have been Prince Albert de Broglie; but granted the importance of the subject and the habitual relations of the editors of the review with the Bishop of Orléans, probably the article was not published without the approval of Bishop Dupanloup.

[41] The principal religious journals of France were then: the Univers, directed by Louis Veuillot; the Monde, directed by Taconet; the Union, the paper of Sebastian Laurentie; the Gazette de France, of Gustave Janicot; the Français, of François Beslay. We might add the Moniteur universel of Paul Dalloz. The principal periodical publications of the Italian Catholics were the Civiltà cattolica of Rome and the Unità cattolica of Milan. In Germany the most important Catholic paper in 1869 was the Volkszeitung of Cologne, which had a tone corresponding to that of the Français and the Correspondant, while the Doxau Zeitung of Munich was attached to the ideas of the Univers. Two Catholic papers of Vienna, the Volksfreund and the Vaterland, had few subscribers. In England, the chief Catholic paper was the Tablet, the organ of Cardinal Manning. The Weekly Register, more moderate, was inspired by Bishop Capel.

entitled, Observations sur la controverse soulevée relativement à la définition de l'infallibilité. The biographer of the Bishop of Orléans, who was then his close friend, relates that, before issuing this publication, the prelate had engaged in a most rugged combat.[42] Never had he been seen so perplexed. Among the friends that he consulted, some, in particular Count de Falloux,[43] entreated him to keep his situation intact for the debates of the council. Others urged him to go ahead. These were the counsels he heeded. The future showed that the way indicated by Count Falloux was the wiser. Considering the point of irritation to which man's minds then reached, this intervention risked the authority of the Bishop of Orléans in the council and aroused against him controversies that irritated him. He who, in the campaign for freedom of education, had been a wonderful agent of conciliation, an able and happy negotiator, could not enjoy the same role in the assembly of bishops. The aged Bishop Baillès of Lucon said to M. Icard, the director of St. Sulpice Seminary, upon meeting him at Rome (November 28, 1869): "Bishop Dupanloup is overwhelmed." and Father Icard, theologian of the Archbishop of Sens, noted, at his arrival in Rome, that the Bishop of Orléans, by the publication of his letter and by the resulting troubled situation, had forever lost the influence which his talent and his piety had won for him over his fellow bishops, and the calm which he would personally need in his speeches and his proceedings.[44]

[42] Lagrange, op. cit., III, 144.

[43] Letter of Falloux to Montalembert, October 31, 1869. Prince Albert de Broglie wrote to the Bishop of Orléans: "I would keep in the writing what is peaceful; I would remove what is militant" (letter of November 5, 1869). Augustine Cochin offered similar advice. Dupanloup evidently entered into the controversy only in self-defense. On September 17, 1869, he wrote in his private journal: "Appearance of Bishop Maret's book. Most unpleasant complication; perhaps calamity. I became an eldorado of a council of charity, zeal, and love. And behold, of a sudden, by this absolutely blind imprudence, appears a frightful quarrel." In November the "frightful quarrels" began, and the Bishop of Orléans thought he had the duty to participate in them.

[44] Icard, Journal de mon voyage et de mon séjour à Rome, pp. 1–13, 25, and passim.

Bishop Dupanloup's writing expounded the principal reasons that could be adduced, according to him, against the opportuneness of a definition of papal infallibility. But, among these objections, was one that concerned the very basis of the question, on the difficulties that some minds would encounter in reconciling papal infallibility with certain historical facts; and these objections were presented under so lively and impressive a form that a pretext was found therein to accuse it with attacking the doctrine itself.[45] At the very least, such a pastoral letter might be said to reveal the polemist rather than the pastor of souls.

On November 18, Louis Veuillot wrote in the Univers: "This letter gives an episcopal head to that, taking up of arms. . . . The opposition has now its leader." Therein was the mischief. The Bishop of Orléans reached Rome with the repute of a party leader, an opposition leader.[46] However, we must not forget that, in his farewell letter to his faithful, the prelate wrote that, "obedient, and obedient unto death, he would faithfully adhere to the decisions of the head of the Church and of the council, whatever those decisions might be, conformable or contrary to his particular thought." [47]

As the date for the meeting of the council approached, peacemaking voices were heard. Archbishop Darboy of Paris published (October 28, 1869) a pastoral letter in which, after briefly setting forth the nature of ecumenical councils, he endeavored to calm the uneasiness aroused by certain evil-minded [45] Some anti-infallibilists, such as Lord Acton, had the same interpretation. See his unpublished letter of February 9, 1870.

[46] On November 21, 1869, Bishop Dupanloup communicated to his clergy a strong writing, entitled: "Avertissement à M. Louis Veuillot." The Bishop of Orléans charged the editor-in-chief of the Univers with "usurpations over the episcopate," with "perpetual intrusions in its gravest and most delicate affairs." In the Univers of November 22, Veuillot replied: "We will say the least possible, not wishing to lose all the advantages that comes to us from a too irritated adversary."

[47] Pastoral letter of December 10, 1869. This letter to the faithful and the pastoral to the clergy, dated the 11th, appeared at the same time.

rumors. On November 1, Archbishop Manning requested the faithful of his diocese to await with confidence the decisions of the future council. A few days later the editor-in-chief of the Correspondant, Léon Lavedan, wrote: "Respect, duty, and confidence impose on us silence and peace: it is the Truce of God."

Minds were still too stirred to conclude a lasting truce. Besides, as at Trent and at Nicaea, new subjects of disagreement were going to arise from the very heart of the conciliar debates. But henceforth, amid the agitations of men, the Holy Ghost, hovering over the ecumenical assembly by His divine assistance, would realize the work of God.

CHAPTER XXXV

Opening of the Vatican Council

ON DECEMBER 8, 1869, after a day of fast and abstinence which the Holy Father had ordered for the whole Catholic world, the nineteenth general council of the Catholic Church opened at Rome.[1] More than 700 bishops, abbots, and generals of religious orders [2] took their place in the council hall, disposed in the left arm of the Latin cross formed by St. Peter's basilica. In this vast space (about 70 feet by 150 feet), all the nations were represented: the young Churches of America beside those of old Europe; the Latin Church with its shepherds dressed in the white cope and, in accordance with the liturgical prescriptions, wearing a simple linen miter; and the Eastern Church,

[1] Or the twentieth (Kraus, Histoire de l'Eglise, III, 382) for those who consider as an ecumenical council the assembly gathered at Pisa, in 1409, to end the Schism of the West by the election of a pope (Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, V, 136). The first eight councils had been held in the East: I Nicaea (325), I Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), II Constantinople (553), III Constantinople (680), II Nicaea (787), IV Constantinople (869). The succeeding councils were held in the West: I Lateran (1123), II Lateran (1139), III Lateran (1179), IV Lateran (1215), I Lyons (1245), Vienne (1311), Florence (1438), V Lateran (1512–1517), Trent (1545–1563), Vatican (1869).

[2] To indicate the number of the fathers present at the first session is not possible (Fessler, secretary of the council, Das Vatikanische Konzilium, p. 13). According to the commonly accepted opinion, the number of fathers present at the various councils was as follows: Nicaea, 300; Constantinople, 186; Ephesus, more than 250; Chalcedon, 520 (according to some), 630 (according to others), II Constantinople, 165; III Constantinople, 170; II Nicaea, 367; I Lateran, between 300 and 400; II Lateran, 1,000; III Lateran, more than 300; IV Lateran, about 1,300; I Lyons, about 300; II Lyons, about 1,600; Florence, between 200 and 400; V Lateran, 120; Trent, 213. These figures are conjectural. Three councils were more numerous than the Vatican Council: II Lyons, II and IV Lateran. But we should note that these three councils admitted to their deliberations a large number of personages who were not bishops.

with its prelates dressed in sumptuous tunics and wearing rich tiaras. The missionary bishops in simple and poor vestments, the regular bishops, uniting to the insignia of their prelatial rank the habits of their religious profession, the abbots and the generals of orders, were easily recognizable.[3]

United in the same faith and subject to the same head, these representatives of all civilizations and all races differed from one another no less by their national habits than by their costumes. The Eastern bishops, elected by the clergy and the people, and consecrated by the patriarchs, who themselves assumed the government of their patriarchates before confirmation of their authority by the pope, were, as was known at Rome, the more jealous of their power, independence, and national customs as they counted among their faithful a good number of recently converted schismatics, whose feelings they had to treat with consideration. Then, too, the Vatican was aware that ths bishops of the United States thought they needed to observe the same cautious attitude with regard to their peoples; that, with this thought in mind, they had spoken the least possible about the Syllabus; that several undoubtedly would carry into the deliberations the democratic habits of their country. No fear about their orthodoxy was felt with regard to the Slav and Hungarian episcopate; but some, like Bishop Strossmayer of Diakovar, leaders of the peoples as well as shepherds of souls, after the manner of the great bishops of the fifth century, might introduce in the assembly initiatives annoying for the general good order. Among the German prelates, some minds might be imbued with the disciplinary and doctrinal temerity of Döllinger. The French bishops arrived at Rome sharply divided into three parties, whose controversies, amplified by the press, were still reverberating.

[3] "At the fixed time could be seen the arrival of the bishops of California, Mexico, Brazil, Peru, Chile, New-Granada, the Philippines, and Australia; the vicars apostolic of the East Indies, Siam, Tonkin, China, and Japan" (Fessler, Le Concile du Vatican, p. 21).

The Question of Procedure

In such a situation we understand that the Sovereign Pontiff, having to decide the important question of the regulation of the council, wondered whether it was prudent to let these regulations be elaborated, following the invariable usages of the preceding conciliar assemblies, by the council itself. One might rightly fear that this elaboration would become an occasion of painful misunderstandings and thus of endless discussions. On the other hand, to impose on the gathering, contrary to the constant traditions of the Church, a ready-made regulation, might stir up lively discontents. After maturely weighing the pro and con, Pius IX decided for this latter view.[4] The regulation of the council, prepared by the preparatory commission under the direction of Pius IX, was brought to the knowledge of the fathers in the presynodal session of December 2, by the act known under the name of the letter Multiplices.

Emotion ran high. The Pope, with a view to simplifying and speeding the council's deliberations, had stressed the centralizing character of the regulation. In fact, according to the apostolic letter: 1. the right of proposing a question to the council would belong exclusively to the Holy See; the fathers, however, were authorized to make motions, but on condition of doing so privatim, in their own name, and after a previous communication to a congregation appointed by the Pope; 2. the projects, elaborated for two years past by commissions of theologians, would first be proposed to the general congregations that would precede the sessions; these general congregations would have as presidents Cardinals Luca, Bilio, Reisach, Bizzarri, and Capalti, directly designated by the Pope; 3. the Pope, informed by the congregations, would have the exclusive right of deciding whether the propositions emanating from the bishops would be submitted to the deliberations or definitively rejected.

[4] To justify the right which the Pope arrogated to himself of imposing a regulation on the council, we do not need to base it (with Hinschius, Das Kirchenrecht der Katholiken, III, 612) on the false idea that the council is only an adviser of the pope. This right, quite compatible with the legislative and judiciary power of the ecumenical assembly, is implied in the fullness of power devolving on the Sovereign Pontiff.

Those of the bishops who had been troubled by the article of the Civiltà saw in this regulation the confirmation of their anxieties. Did not these measures indicate a distrust with regard to the episcopate, a desire to put across a program fixed in advance by systematically obstructing, stifling, so to speak, the deliberations of the council? The language of the papers that became the warmest defenders of the Holy See seemed to justify these fears. "When the Pope will proclaim the definition of infallibility . . . ," wrote Louis Veuillot in the Univers (December 4).[5] The explicit declarations of Pius IX soon calmed these fears. Thus in an audience granted on December 4 to fifteen bishops, he assured them that his sole intention had been "to put some order at the beginning," and that "he wished that they should all be free." In fact, soon it would be noted that the utmost freedom was left to the speakers to expound their opinions.

The Pope forcefully refused an immediate modification of the regulation; but, toward the end of December, he made known to the bishops that, notwithstanding the letter of papal prescriptions, they would be permitted to labor by groups in the editing of their proposals. About the end of January, he declared that a broad interpretation of the regulation would be applied according to circumstances.[6] On February 20, 1870, moved by the needs which experience revealed, he made important changes. The new pontifical act loudly proclaimed the principle of "complete freedom of discussion," permitting the president to put to a vote, on the proposal of ten fathers, the closing of discussion when it would be prolonged beyond measure. The right of amendment on the projects, or schemas, proposed by the Holy See was officially recognized and regulated. The right of replying to the speakers, the method of voting was also the object of special dispositions. The new regulation was not safe from all complaints. Several bishops asked that specific instruction be given that the decisions of the council should be made, following a usage that seemed to them traditional, by unanimous vote, moral or otherwise, as the act of Pius IX appeared to say, by numerical majority. But when the presidents gave an assurance that the new prescriptions would be applied in the most benevolent spirit toward the fathers of the council, the agitations gradually calmed down.

[5] Veuillot, Rome pendant le concile, I, 7.
[6] Icard, Journal, pp. 25, 26, 67, 151.

Two other papal documents, after at first arousing similar feelings, were finally seen to be dictated by wisdom and by a real sense of their opportuneness. We refer to the bull Apostolicae Sedis, of October 12, 1869, repeating fundamentally the legislation of the censures, and the Apostolic constitution of December 4, regulating the election of the Sovereign Pontiff for the case that the Holy See should become vacant during the course of the ecumenical council.

The Bull Apostolicae Sedis

The idea of codifying and simplifying the penal law of the Church was manifestly opportune. The texts decreeing the different censures—excommunications, suspensions, and interdicts, censures reserved and not reserved, censures latae or ferendae sententiae—were scattered a little everywhere, in the decretals, in the canons of the councils, in papal bulls, in decrees of the Roman congregations, where great difficulty was experienced in finding them. But some bishops thought it strange that an affair of this nature, concerning the episcopate as well as the Holy See, should be treated and settled under the eyes of the council and without its participation. Others were of the opinion that such a work was rather suited to a small commission, like that to which the Holy Father had entrusted the preparation of the bull, instead of an immense assembly, that was solicited by questions of greater importance. Another blame was laid on the bull. Among the innovations that it introduced in the penal law, it considered as excommunicated all magistrates and lawmakers who would oblige clerics to appear before the secular tribunals.[7] In the presence of a text so precise, Catholic magistrates and lawmakers of all the states would find themselves called upon to give up their office or to regard the bull as null. The French ambassador had two interviews with Cardinal Antonelli on this subject. In the first of these interviews, the Secretary of State of the Holy See, taken by surprise, declared that he was not well enough acquainted with the papal document to express his opinion. In the course of a second visit which the representative of France made to him, the Cardinal declared that the provision did not concern the concordat states.[8] This reply calmed the susceptibilities of the governments as well as those of the episcopate.

Groups in the Council

All these questions, agitated in different senses, had brought out the different tendencies that divided the fathers of the council, and these tendencies were emphasized by different groups outside the council. Besides the meetings determined by nationality, such as the meetings of the bishops of Spain, the United States, and Canada, four principal centers were soon distinguished. This dissociation was especially the consequence of the attitude taken by the prelates on the touchy subject of papal infallibility. Those favoring an immediate definition of infallibility (the infallibilists, who liked also to call themselves ultramontanes) were grouped about Archbishop Dechamps of Malines. Archbishop Manning of Westminster, Cardinal Cullen (archbishop of Dublin), Bishop Pie of Poitiers, Bishop Plantier of Nimes, Bishop Roess of Strasbourg, Bishop Martin of Paderborn, Bishop Senestrey of Ratisbon, Archbishop Spalding of Baltimore, and Bishop Mermillod (vicar apostolic of Geneva), were the principal representatives of this group.

[7] See Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie, s.v. "Apostolicae Sedis."

[8] Icard, Journal, p. 57; Emile Ollivier, L'Eglise et l'Etat au Concile du Vatican, I, 531.

The bishops opposed to the immediate definition of infallibility formed at first several groups. In contemporary documents they are designated as antidefinitionists or anti-infallibilists. Often their adversaries called them the liberals, the Gallicans, or the opponents.[9] In connection with those who, without denying the infallibility, disputed the opportuneness of its definition, Veuillot created the epithet of opportunist, which has since passed into the political language.[10] The French who followed this line met at the house of Cardinal Mathieu, archbishop of Besançon. Bishop Dupanloup of Orléans and Archbishop Darboy of Paris were the most influential members of this group. Almost all accepted the dogma of the papal infallible authority, but considered that its definition, at least immediately, was not opportune. The German "opponents," who generally went further than the French and some of whom even questioned the very doctrine of papal infallibility, recognized as their leader Cardinal Schwarzenberg, archbishop of Prague. The most outstanding among them were Bishop Hefele of Rottenburg, Archbishop Haynald of Colocza, Archbishop Rauscher of Vienna, and Bishop Strossmayer of Diakovar.[11] A fourth group was called the group of the third party because, less keenly opposed to the definition than were the friends of Schwarzenberg and Dupanloup, they took a less ardent attitude than did the friends of Dechamps. The group had at its head Cardinal Bonnechose, archbishop of Rouen, and counted among its members Guibert, archbishop of Tours, Lavigerie, archbishop of Algiers, Bernadou, archbishop of Sens, and Forcade, bishop of Nevers.[12]

[9] The prelates thus called always protested against this designation. In their turn, they called their adversaries "opponents of the episcopate," and gave themselves the name of "moderates." But these names did not last. Finally they accepted that of "members of the minority."

[10] In the Univers of January 12, 1869, Louis Veuillot first used this word "opportunist," or rather "non-opportunist," adding: "I ask your pardon for the word." Veuillot, Rome pendant le concile, I, 104.

[11] Strossmayer was titular bishop of Bosnia, Sirmium, and Diakovar. He had his ordinary residence at Diakovar or Diakovo, whence the title of bishop of Diakovar, which was commonly given him.

Before beginning the account of the conciliar debates, we must point out the existence and tendencies of these four groups, because they represented exactly the four movements of ideas then prevalent in the Catholic world. While outside of the council some defended the dogma of the papal infallibility and the immediate definition with such ardor that they seemed at times to forget the divine right of the bishops and wished to stifle their deliberations; others held the inopportuneness of a definition and did so with such arguments that sometimes they suggested doubt about their belief in the doctrine itself. Some Christians, less numerous perhaps, or rather appearing to be less numerous because they were less noisy and less agitated, were confident that, by the help of the Holy Ghost, the fathers of the council would be able, for defining the supreme magisterium of the head of the Church, to find the serene formula that would proclaim the absolute authority of the pope without seeming to absorb therein that of the bishops, the luminous and calm word that would enlighten our separated brethren without embittering them. In this result, by the grace of God, all collaborated, [12] Other groupings were roughly outlined; they were of less importance than the ones we have just enumerated. Toward the end of January, 1870, Archbishop Spalding of Baltimore tried, in a plan of union, to organize a third party, whose program would be the definition equivalent to that of infallibility, but without using that word (Icard, Journal, p. 152). On the other hand, Dupanloup and Darboy attempted to organize an "international commission" with a view to regularizing the action of the different opposing groups. But as Cardinals Mathieu and Bonnechose refused to follow that path, the project did not have the expected success (ibid., p. 76; Ollivier, op. cit., II, 7). These two cardinals were in favor of another project, that of uniting into one group all the French bishops. In the name of the Pope, Cardinal Antonelli objected to the plan. In the presence of this opposition, the plan was not pursued. Icard, op. cit., pp. 39, 50, 58.

some by forcefully making the absolute character of the dogma stand out, the others by recalling the maternal solicitude of the Church, ever attentive to dispense her teaching under the form best adapted to the needs of souls.

The Heads of the Groups

Among the eminent prelates we have enumerated, some we are already acquainted with: Dupanloup, by the decisive part he took in the campaign for freedom of education and by several works of the apostolate; Manning, by the fame of his conversion and the high position he soon occupied in the Catholic Church of England; Guibert, by the lofty wisdom which he evidenced among delicate controversies. On a higher plane all three were about to employ their eminent qualities: the first in the group of the "opponents," the second in that of the "infallibilists," the third in "the third party." But along with them, and in each of these groups, Dechamps (archbishop of Malines), Pie (bishop of Poitiers), Hefele (bishop of Rottenburg), Strossmayer (bishop of Diakovar), Darboy (archbishop of Paris), Bonnechose (bishop of Rouen), and Mathieu (archbishop of Besançon) would exercise such an influence on the progress of the conciliar deliberations that history must sketch their characteristic features, if only by a few fleeting traits.

Adolphe Dechamps, brother of the Belgian minister, had taken an active part in the Malines congresses, was for a time a follower of Lamennais, then a priest, a Redemptorist, bishop of Namur in 1865, and archbishop of Malines in 1867. For a long time Bishop Dechamps was known by the warmth of his patriotism, the winning liveliness of his apostolic zeal, and the powerful originality of his apologetic teachings.[13] Uniting, as he said, the internal fact and the external fact, he held: 1. that the attentive study of man such as he is "furnishes an absolute proof of the necessity of the Christian revelation"; 2. that the living tradition of the Catholic Church constitutes by itself an absolute proof of the truth of that same revelation.[14] The first of these propositions had brought against him the charge of Baianism; the second made him suspected of fideism. But the Vatican council would clear him of this double charge by declaring: 1. that as result of the fact that God has called man to a supernatural end, "revelation is absolutely necessary for him," and 2. that "the Church is, by herself, an irrefutable witness of her divine mission." [15] As soon as the question of papal infallibility was posed, Dechamps took up its defense. He saw in it the peremptory answer to the Gallican error, which he had fought from his early youth in the liberal and ultramontane journals of Belgium.[16] Dupanloup replied, excusing himself for contradicting "his holy friend," and a lively polemic followed between the two prelates.

[13] Saintrain, Vie du cardinal Dechamps, archevêque de Malines.

In the group over which he presided, Dechamps had no more active helper in his campaign for the definition of infallibility than Bishop Pie of Poitiers. Of lowly birth, born of a village cobbler and a humble daughter of the people, but possessing a dignity of manners that was revealed in the gravity of his countenance and in his majestic bearing, Bishop Pie professed, in politics, devotion to the Bourbon monarchy and, in the religious controversies, ideas most favorable to the pope in regard to the bishops, to the Church in regard to the civil society, to revelation in regard to reason. With equal energy he had fought the policy of Napoleon III, the ideas of Dupanloup, and the doctrines of Victor Cousin.[17]

At the council the Archbishop of Malines and the Bishop of Poitiers met formidable adversaries in Bishop Hefele, Bishop [14] Dechamps, Lettres théologiques sur la démonstration de la foi, p. 296.

[15] Denzinger-Bannwart, no. 1786.

[16] L'emancipation and the Journal des Flandres, where he signed himself A.V.D., disciple of Lamennais. Dechamps was then less than twenty years old.

[17] Cf. Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie.

Strossmayer, and Archbishop Darboy. Hefele represented especially science. As Emile Ollivier wrote: "Bishop Hefele is a vigorous spirit and strikes on facts like a blacksmith on his anvil. Gifted with prodigious knowledge, at the same time artless and subtle, under his gruff and rather rough exterior, he has a pliancy quite suited to conciliation." [18] Well in advance of the meeting of the council the Pope had recourse to his inexhaustible science, unusually well informed on the conciliar questions.[19]

Strossmayer, bishop of Diakovar and vicar apostolic of Serbia, represented the eloquence, an eloquence without an affected style, but of singular power. He never took the attitude of a theologian or a philosopher, but of a tactician of the Catholic apostolate. Later he said: "If I opposed resolutely the project of the definition of the dogma of infallibility, that was not because I had, like Döllinger or Hefele, the least theological objection to that dogma; it was not because I feared, like Dupanloup, to stir up uselessly and to irritate what is called the modern spirit. No. I took a point of view, which has directed my life, the development of the Slav nation, which is at the period of formation and which I feared to see hindered by an excessive centralization."

This development of the Slavic race had, in its spirit, a considerable religious capacity. According to him, to prepare the religious peace, the union of the Churches was needed. His town of Diakovar appeared to him as a connecting link between the West and the East, as the meeting-place of three religions: the Roman, the Russian Orthodox, and the Islamic. Strossmayer was in continuous relations with the Russian philosopher Soloviev and with the Roman Barnabite Tondini. This great lord, who had founded a museum with its own pictures and had built a cathedral with the proceeds of the sale of part of his [18] Ollivier, op. cit., I, 425.

[19] Granderath, Histoire du concile du Vatican, I, 88, 92, 468, 481 f., 490 f., 494, 496, 502. Hefele's masterpiece is his history of the councils, translated into French by Father Delarc, then by Dom Leclercq.

forests, was also in correspondence with the minister Gladstone and Prince Michael of Serbia, who treated with him as with a power. At the council, almost always in opposition to the majority of the assembly, he made himself always listened to by it, so natural was his eloquence, so taking, always well suited. After condensing his ideas in a few notes, he improvised his speeches in the purest Latin.[20] "Daring, supple, stirring, spiritual," says Ollivier, "Bishop Strossmayer is always dazzling." [21]

In the opposition, Bishop Darboy represented the diplomacy. "Penetration and serenity, mild boldness, with a captivating air of insinuation—wrote a statesman well placed to know the Archbishop of Paris—behold what one read on the face of Archbishop Darboy. Pious, regular, utterly devoted to his episcopal duties, he was, nevertheless, more of Richelieu than of St. Vincent de Paul. His mighty soul animated a frail body, which it made submit; but in his dealings he brought a certain ease, of charm that no one could resist. . . . The Emperor, whose full confidence he enjoyed, readily followed his indications on ecclesiastical matters." [22]

Cardinal Bonnechose, archbishop of Rouen, and Cardinal Mathieu, archbishop of Besançon, were spirits of less breadth than that of the men we have just now described. But, less conspicuous by their talents, they effectively influenced the two groups of which they were the heads, and thereby the whole council. Bonnechose had worn the magisterial toga before he was a priest; as a priest he performed at Rome the duties of superior of St. Louis of the French. From his first profession he kept his devotion to justice, the sense of affairs, and the taste for methodical and clear exposition. The archbishop of Besançon, [20] In 1905 he said: "One reason why I did not in the council come to agreement with the majority of the bishops was that they spoke such poor Latin" (Correspondant, April 25, 1905, p. 270).

[21] Ollivier, op. cit., II, 12.

[22] Ibid., II, 12.

with heavy body and subtle mind, possessed in the discussions an advantage rather rare among his fellow French bishops: he handled the Latin language with a dexterity and elegance that was not second to that of Strossmayer. The two French cardinals had given the Holy See striking proofs of their devotedness: Cardinal Bonnechose, in courageously defending in the Senate the temporal power of the pope; Cardinal Mathieu in incurring a declaration of abuse for having published in the pulpit the encyclical Quanta cura. Neither of them, however, aroused the suspicions of the French government, which knew their habits of discretion and prudence. Each of them assumed the task of counterbalancing whatever was too sharp in the manifestations of the extreme parties and of upholding the cause of moderation in the council.[23]

The Program

From the mere fact that the classification of the parties took place on the question of papal infallibility, the chief object of the conciliar deliberations could be foreseen. But the program submitted to the assembly was a vast one. The Index schematum that was distributed to the fathers of the council [24] embraced a double series of dogmatic and disciplinary questions. The dogmatic questions treated the modern errors coming from materialism, rationalism, and pantheism, as well as the attacks directed against the Church, its organization, and its rights. The disciplinary questions related to ecclesiastical persons (bishops, canons, pastors, religious, etc.), as also to the ecclesiastical institutions and works (seminaries, liturgical ceremonies, the administration of the sacraments, catechism, preaching, missions, Oriental rites, etc.). Article 7 of the regulations ordered the fathers to begin with the dogmatic questions. After that they could deliberate on dogma or discipline at their pleasure. To serve as the subject of their first discussions, the fathers chose the project De doctrina catholica contra multiplices errores ex rationalismo derivatos.[25] They would then discuss several disciplinary questions concerning bishops, synods, vicars general, vacancies of episcopal sees, the life of clerics, the editing of a universal catechism, and lastly entered on the dogmatic schema of the constitution of the Church by the question of papal infallibility. This last question had hardly been settled by a solemn definition, when the beginnings of the Franco-German war and the invasion of the papal territory by the Italian troops disturbed and then interrupted the labors of the council.

[23] See Besson, Vie du cardinal de Bonnechose; Vie du cardinal Mathieu.
[24] Collectio lacensis, VII, 505.

The conciliar debates, then, comprised three periods: the discussion of the first dogmatic constitution, a series of discussions on various disciplinary questions, and the discussion on the second dogmatic constitution.[26]

The debates devoted to the first dogmatic schema De doctrina catholica gave at first the impression of extreme confusion. From December 28, 1869 to January 10, 1870, in the course of six general congregations, thirty-five fathers, belonging to the most diverse nationalities, spoke; of these, twenty-four, with more or less insistence, asked the return of the project to a commission for its revision. It was criticized for resembling a professor's treatise rather than a conciliar doctrinal exposition. Fault was found with the obscurity of its wording and the stiffness and harshness of its expressions. Bishop Connolly of Halifax criticized the whole schema in substance and form and asked that it be not corrected, but buried. Dimittatur, he said,

[25] Collectio lacensis, VII, 507–53.

[26] These three periods, in a general way clearly distinct, were not strictly separated in their chronological order. The debates on the disciplinary constitutions began when the deliberations on the first dogmatic constitution were not yet concluded; and the deliberations on the second dogmatic constitution were started before the end of the debates on the disciplinary constitutions. For convenience of exposition, we will treat the three phases separately.

non ad corrigendum, sed ad sepeliendum. Bishop Strossmayer declared himself deeply amazed that the proposed text, instead of bearing at its head, like the decrees of the Council of Trent, the words, Sacrosancta Synodus decernit ("The holy synod decrees"), begins with the words: Pius, episcopus, servus servorum Dei, sacro approbante concilio ("Pius, bishop, servant of the servants of God, with the approbation of the sacred council"). By reason of the vehemence of his protest on this point, he was interrupted by the president of the council.[27] Outside the assembly, some theologians expressed their opposition to the schema by saying they saw therein the work of the Jesuits, intended to lead the council to adopt the ideas of the Civiltà cattolica.[28] Others, including some Jesuits, summoned up their impressions by declaring the work too Germanic. The principal author of the schema was, in fact, a German Jesuit, Fr. Franzelin.[29]

John Baptist Franzelin, born in 1816, at Altino, in Tyrol, was professor of dogmatic theology in the Roman College, from 1851 on. His students admired the breadth of his knowledge, and his works put him in the foremost ranks of nineteenth-century theologians. But clearness of expression did not always equal the depth of his erudition and of his philosophical penetration.[30] In vain he tried to defend the wording of the schema [27] The bell was struck by President de Luca, and the observation was made by President Capalti. "De Luca was a reserved man, somewhat timid. Capalti answered in his stead." Thus Granderath, Hist. du concile du Vatican, II, 124, n. 2.

[28] "Mgr. Vecchiotti thinks that the Jesuits have planned this schema, in order to have the council accept the ideas which they uphold in the Civiltà cattolica" (Icard, Journal, p. 52.) Mgr. Vecchiotti, counsel of the state at Rome, was the author of a well-known treatise on Canon Law (Institutiones canonicae, Turin, 1869). This treatise had been sharply criticised by Fr. Bouix, S.J. Mgr. Vecchiotti had also been sent by the Holy See on several diplomatic missions.

[29] "Father Matignon was not more satisfied with the schema than we were," writes Icard. "He admits that some fathers of the Society are the ones who worked on its composition, . . . but he adds that the product is their personal work, a work too Germanic." Icard, op. cit., p. 77.

[30] On Franzelin, see Hurter, Nomenclator litterarius, V, 1507–10; Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie, VI, 765–67; Louis Teste, Préface au conclave, pp. 273–79.

before the deputation of the council.[31] This committee was unanimous in requesting the recasting of the schema, which this time was entrusted to three fathers of the council: bishops Dechamps, Pie, and Martin (of Paderborn).

The new project, brought before the assembly (March 14, 1870) under the title of De fide catholica, there received a most favorable welcome. The editors had taken account of the wishes expressed by their colleagues. Its style was simple and clear, the exposition short and methodical. The debates began under the presidency of Cardinal de Angelis, who had just been promoted to that post by the Pope, replacing Cardinal de Reisach, recently deceased. Several amendments were proposed on points of detail, and it was sent back to the commission, which carefully examined them, then proposed them to the vote of the assembly. The fathers could formulate their votes in three ways: a simple placet, a simple non placet, or a placet juxta modum, that is, conditional. In this last case, they handed in their written comments or amendments. The vote on the ensemble of the schema took place on April 12. Present were 598 fathers. Of these, 515 gave a simple placet; 83, placet juxta modum; no one voted non placet. The commission received the comments annexed to the placet juxta modum, and took account of them for the revision of the text, which was returned to the assembly on April 23. This time the fathers would vote either placet or non placet. Any explanation was excluded.

The Constitution De fide

On the 24th the project, since known as the Constitutio de fide catholica (or Dei Filius) was passed, in a public session, by unanimous vote. All the fathers, from the cardinal highest in

---

According to Matignon, Father Franzelin was aided in his work by another German, Father Schneider (Icard, Journal, p. 77).

[31] Collectio lacensis, VII, 1647.

dignity to the last of the religious superiors, at the call of their name, cast their vote. Only one non placet was voted. Says one of the members: "It was like a procession of the whole world to render testimony of the faith of the Catholic world." [32]

Cardinal Manning writes: "The importance of this first Constitution on Catholic Faith cannot be over-estimated, and, from its great breadth, may not as yet be fully perceived. It is the broadest and boldest affirmation of the supernatural and spiritual order ever yet made in the face of the world; which is now, more than ever, sunk in sense and heavy with materialism." [33] As stated in its preamble, "the minds of many have lapsed at length into the depth of pantheism, materialism, and atheism . . . and the Catholic instinct has become feeble." To contemporary unbelief, confounding God with the world when it does not deny Him altogether, refusing in any case to believe in any divine intervention in humanity and in particular in revelation, and denying the possibility of faith or at least subordinating it to reason, the council opposed, in four chapters, a solid and luminous summary of the Catholic doctrine: 1. on God, 2. on revelation, 3. on faith, 4. on the relation of faith to reason. In the first of these chapters it proclaims the existence of a personal God, free, Creator of all things, and absolutely independent of the material and spiritual things that He created. The second chapter affirms the existence of two orders of truths: the order of nature, accessible to the faculties of knowledge possessed by man, and the order of the supernatural, which can be known only by a divine revelation. The third chapter treats of faith; it teaches to see, in the act of faith, an act of reason and an act of freedom, an act of man and an act of God; and it shows how the Church, guardian of the deposit of faith,

[32] Ketteler, in Der Katholik of 1870, I, 529. Strossmayer alone did not attend the public session of the 24th. He complained that no account was taken of his reservations. His placet juxta modum of April 12 carried these words: "Salvis conciliorum oecumenicorum juribus."

[33] Manning, The Vatican Council, pp. 55, 50.

bears in herself the guaranty of her infallibility and truthfulness. The fourth chapter, having in view on the one hand the fideist tendency, and on the other hand the rationalist tendency, marks off the two domains of reason and of faith, and recalls that an apparent disagreement between science and religion can come only from an error on the doctrine of the latter or from a false idea on the conclusions of science.[34]

Thus was accomplished the first phase of the Vatican Council. Begun amid divisions and difficulties that seemed irreducible, it ended by a unanimous vote. The apprehensions of those who, at the outset, had seemed to fear a systematic stifling of discussion, were soon dissipated. About 200 prelates had spoken with such freedom that more than one member of the assembly, even among those most jealous of their independence, complained of the excessive tolerance of the presidents. The first discussions, on a theme that was often poorly drawn up, seemed at the beginning only to accumulate mists, but gradually from these mists emerged the clear and luminous formulas of one of the most beautiful conciliar Constitutions. In the midst of the discussions of men, who could then misunderstand the supreme action of the Spirit of God?

[34] See the scholarly commentary on this Constitution in Vacant, Etudes théologiques sur les Constitutions du Concile du Vatican.

CHAPTER XXXVI

Disciplinary Questions

BEFORE the closing of the first discussion, a second phase opened. While the conciliar commission was preparing a revision of the dogmatic schema, the fathers, taking advantage of the faculty granted them by the regulation, chose as the subject of their deliberations two projects of the disciplinary constitution: the schema on bishops, synods, and vicars general, and the schema on the vacancy of episcopal sees.

The discussions began on January 14. Even more than in the debates aroused on the dogmatic questions, very pronounced difference broke out among the fathers. These were to be expected. The truths to be believed are the same throughout the world; but the disciplinary rules, before being adapted to the particular needs of different countries, are necessarily different.

The first admonitions that were presented against the schema De episcopis were not, however, prompted by preoccupations of local or national interest, but by that impression, so obsessing with some fathers, that the Roman curia had a prepossession of distrust toward the episcopate. Cardinal Schwarzenberg and Bishop Strossmayer expressed the wish that, before concerning itself with the reform of the bishops, the Vatican Council, following the traditions of several councils, in particular the V Lateran, would issue a decree on the College of Cardinals, on the curia, and on the Roman congregations. More need existed, they said, for this procedure in the present council, since the congregations created by Sixtus V had received their present form after the last council. Some wishes had been deposited on this subject. In what concerned the bishops, why speak only of their duties? Was nothing to be said about their rights and their dignity, of their election and of their promotion? Bishop Strossmayer, according to his custom, had been particularly keen in the discussion. When Bishop Dreux-Brezé remarked to him that the College of Cardinals had a father, the pope, and that this father would know how to impose a reform on them when that reform would be necessary, Strossmayer replied: "If all of us have a father, who is the pope, all of us have a mother, which is the Church." Moreover, the Church universal, officially represented by its bishops, has the right to ask that the College of Cardinals should be, as the Council of Trent required, a representation of all the Christian nations.[1] Cardinal de Pietro answered the two previous speakers with spirit. According to him, to compare to the pompous princes of the Church in the sixteenth century the present cardinals, so worthy, so austere in their lives, so assiduous in their labors, was to offer them a gratuitous insult. To appear to apply to them the words of Batholomew de Martyribus and to ask "that the most illustrious cardinals have need of a most illustrious reform," [2] was an anachronism entirely unjustified. However, he did not object to having deleted from the schema certain words having an implication somewhat hard for the bishops. The omission of these words was the chief result of the discussion.

The numerous observations suggested to the different fathers by local necessities, by particular customs, at first had the disadvantage of disturbing the ready-made notions and the unduly simplified ideas, even of giving an impression of inconsistency or illogicality in the ecclesiastical discipline; but they had the invaluable advantage of making Rome acquainted with these local needs, those particular customs, and thereby of hindering,

[1] The following are the words of the Council of Trent: "[The cardinals] whom the most holy Roman pontiff shall, in so far as it can be conveniently done, choose from all the nations of Christendom." Sess. XXIV, de Reform., cap. 1. (Cf. Schroeder, Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, p. 192. Tr.)

[2] See Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, V, 568.

as a historian of the council remarks, "that henceforth no attempt would be made to establish general laws when the diversity of practices did not comport with them." [3] Among the speeches that were made on this subject, we must mention that of Bishop Audu, patriarch of Babylonia, of the Chaldean rite. The venerable prelate, evidently alarmed at the thought that the fathers were going to apply a uniform discipline to the East and to the West, begged the council not to do so. He strove to show that between the Western Church and the Eastern Church more profound differences existed than the fathers could imagine. He said: "I implore you not to undertake to treat a patient that has barely emerged from convalescence as if he were a vigorous warrior. We are ill from the insufficient training of our clergy, from the inexperience of many new converts who have barely emerged from the Nestorian sect, from the fewness and the scattered location of our churches, from the oppression of the Mohammedans, from the contact with schismatics. Besides, our peoples have an attachment, perhaps excessive, but needing to be treated with kindliness, for their ancient traditions. I am not opposed to the reform of our Churches, I even ask it; but I judge that the soundest means of carrying it out is to proceed by national synods. I beseech the Pope and the council to fix a date for us and a place of assembly. We will make a choice of disciplinary canons that can be suited to our Churches, we will combine them with our ancient laws, and we will submit to the examination of the fathers our canon law thus worked out." The wisdom of such views could hardly be denied. But Pius IX, to affirm his direct right over the Eastern Churches, sent word to the Chaldean patriarch and ordered him to consecrate without delay two priests whom he, the Pope, had just designated for two vacant sees of Chaldea. The patriarch submitted; but this incident determined, between the Roman court and the Eastern bishops, a tension that lasted to the end of the council.[4]

[3] Granderath, Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, II, 209.

After the examination of the two disciplinary projects about bishops and vacancies of episcopal sees, the council entered on the discussion of two other projects about the life of clerics and the writing of a universal catechism. The new debates unfolded with incidents like those which had marked the first deliberation. The following took a notable part in the discussions: Bishop Martin of Paderborn, always ardent in defending the Roman traditions and always on the watch against Gallicanism; Bishop Dupanloup of Orléans, sometimes too quick in repartee; Bishop Langalerie of Belley, with words full of unction; Bishop Guibert of Tours, always master of his discourse, simple, firm, and moderate; Bishop Vérot of Savannah, too often obliged to take back an expression that exceeded or misrepresented his thought; Cardinal Mathieu of Besançon and Bishop Strossmayer of Diakovar, two rivals in the art of handling the Latin language, the former with calculated moderation, the other with deliberate boldness. They spoke of the common life of priests, of clerical celibacy, of the Roman breviary, of the advantages and the disadvantages of a uniform catechism for all Christendom.

Outside Discussions on Infallibility

Let us note a strange fact. On subjects that apparently would give rise to an exchange of calm and peaceful remarks, the debate was animated; the discussion waxed hot. When discussing the regulation of seminaries or the dress of clerics, the speakers seemed to have in view more general and exciting questions.

[4] Bishop Audu accepted all the decisions of the Vatican Council. Subsequently new difficulties would arise between him and the Holy See; but he never went as far as schism. He would even energetically resist attempts at schism, which took place in his Church. After his death, Leo XIII praised his zeal and his piety. Cf. Acta Leonis XIII, I, 199.

Some speakers seemed ceaselessly afraid of an infringement on the rights of the pope; others, an encroachment on the prerogatives of the episcopacy. Still others, seeing the dangers of these two excessive concerns, asked God for the grace of never separating in their heart the love of the Church from the love of its supreme head.[5] At bottom, the question of papal infallibility, which had not yet appeared on the program, more and more dominated all other questions both in the council and outside of it. It was discussed in the press, where it became the subject of resounding pamphlets.[6] A long controversy, entered into at the beginning of 1870, between Father Gratry of the Oratory and Bishop Dechamps on the subject of the so-called heresy of Pope Honorius, stirred public opinion. An article appearing in the Moniteur universal (February 24) under this title, "La situation des choses à Rome," embittered the quarrel. In the Allgemeine Zeitung and in the Gazette d'Augsbourg, Döllinger violently attacked the very doctrine of infallibility;[7] Hefele and Ketteler, in pamphlets and in periodical articles, repeated the criticisms of Bishop Maret against the "personal and separate" infallibility. Gustave Janicot, in the Gazette de France, inserted with commentary the letters of Father Gratry against "the absorbing infallibility."[8] Meanwhile the Univers organized peti-

[5] This is the prayer that M. Icard often made and that he mentions several times in his Journal.

[6] These disputes often had for their starting point, in the anti-Catholic press, the total misunderstanding of the dogma under discussion. This misunderstanding unfortunately persisted even after the definition of the dogma. You might suppose you were dreaming when reading in Henri Martin's Histoire de France populaire (VII, 139): "The infallibility of the pope has as a logical consequence, along with the suppression of all the ancient rights of the episcopacy and the direct sovereignty of the pope over all the dioceses, the renewal of the most exorbitant maxims of theocracy. . . . It implies the claim to the indirect power over the temporal and the condemnation of liberalism and of modern civilization."

[7] "Who today affirms the infallibility? A pope. . . . Moreover, behind the pope, the Jesuits. The Jesuits are the ones who, for several years, have been preparing the definition of the pretended dogma." Gazette d'Augsbourg of January 21, 1879.

[8] The royalist daily press was then represented in Paris chiefly by three papers. The Union, directed by Pierre-Sébastien Laurentie, strongly defended the doctrine tions to call for the immediate proclamation of infallibility, and Louis Veuillot lumped together the "antidefinitionists" and the "antiopportunists," as he called them, in the same scornful raillery. "One day," he wrote, "I felt an odor of sweat on me which disturbed me. . . . I summoned the chimney-sweep. . . . The fire was in the girders and began to blaze up. We recognized the opportuneness of extinguishing it. I have recounted the story of the nineteenth ecumenical council. Assuredly, I will not say that M. Janicot and the other knights of the inopportunism are girders. But M. Gratry, of the Academy and of the Oratory, M. Döllinger, of the Faculty and bourgeoisie of Munich, Bishop Maret of the episcopacy and of the Sorbonne, and others whom I refrain from naming, are at least little beams, and no one will deny that they are ablaze. Behold the opportunism." [9] These lines appeared in the Univers of February 14, 1870. Two weeks later, Montalembert replied to Louis Veuillot not less spirited in tone. He rose up against "those lay theologians of absolutism, who began by making a litter of all our liberties before Napoleon III, and then immolated justice and truth, reason and history, in a holocaust to the idol which they have erected at the Vatican." [10] "Never," he said, "thanks be to God, have I thought, said, or written anything favorable to the pope's personal and separate infallibility, such as they wish to impose on us." [11] The increasingly sharp tone of these newspaper discussions every day added to the ardor of the two parties. At Rome, in spite of the prudent prohibition by Pius IX, who had forbidden the printing of any writings on the council, the agitations reached of papal infallibility; the Gazette de France, under the direction of Gustave Janicot, publicized the objections of Gratry and Montalembert; the Français, more moderate, with François Beslay and Paul Thureau-Dangin, followed the ideas of Dupanloup and attacked only the opportuneness of the definition.

---

[9] Veuillot, Rome pendant le concile, I, 213.

[10] Collectio lacensis, VII, 1386.

[11] Ibid., 1385. Evidently Montalembert's letter made a deep impression on the Pope. Pius IX had the letter read to him three times in succession, listening with closed eyes; then he himself read it again.

the Roman people. Every time that Pius IX appeared in public, a throng received him with cries of "Long live the infallible pope!" At the entrance door of the council the curious gathered, among whom might be noted the sister and the daughters of a French journalist, eyeing the passage of the prelates, and giving each one his note.[12] People repeated the sallies of the Bishop of Tulle. "Those who are wise according to the world," said Bishop Berteaud, "would perhaps have judged that it was not opportune that the Son of God should be born in a stable. That would have been shocking to many ideas of the time." In a more tragic tone, Bishop Wicart of Laval wrote to his diocesans: "Before God, ready to appear before His judgment seat, I declare that I would prefer to fall dead on the spot than to follow the Bishop of Orléans along the path he is following today." [13]

The Pope counseled calm; but he sent his congratulations to the writers who defended the infallibility, and to the faithful who sent petitions for the definition.[14] These interventions were regarded by some as an official pressure that might alter the freedom of the assembly. On February 20, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Daru, sent to Cardinal Antonelli some strictures on this point. On April 6, a document of more considerable significance, a Memorandum was sent by the same minister to all the powers, inviting them to see that the council respected "the rights and liberties of the civil society." [15] This [12] Upon their aunt's indications, the grandneices gave a smile to the "good" ones, and made faces at the "bad" ones.

[13] Quoted by Ollivier, op. cit., II, 65.

[14] Granderath, op. cit., II, 374.

[15] Ollivier, op. cit., II, 101. We are certain that the letters written by Bishop Darboy to the heads of the French government informed them of the agitation outside the council. But other indiscretions, important in other ways, committed by lesser officials, by workmen in printshops, pamphlets, etc., had kept the ambassadors acquainted with the most secret documents. On February 9, 1870, Icard wrote: "Bishop Vecchiotti told me that the secret of the council is so poorly kept that often he has seen ministers of the different states (and he mentioned to me among others diplomatic action aroused an extreme agitation in all Europe, but simply stirred up the zeal of the partisans of infallibility. After all, was so much to be feared from the powers of the world? Their backing could be dispensed with. Following a popular demonstration in honor of the Pope, Louis Veuillot wrote from Rome: "The Pope and the people! I believe that these words are visibly written on the door of the Vatican Council, and that this door is the entrance way of a new world, or rather that it is an arch of triumph on the recovered path of the human race." [16]

Decidedly, since the question of infallibility was arousing so much feeling outside of the council, the question needed to be resolved without delay. The third party, which at first seemed inclined toward the partisans of inopportunism, was turning now toward the defenders of opportunism. Speaking of the former party, they said: Quod inopportunum dixerunt, necessarium fecerunt ("They have made necessary the definition which they declared inopportune").[17] The petition voted by the fathers to ask the urgency of a discussion on the question of infallibility had 480 signatures,[18] whereas the petition asking for a delay was signed by not more than 137. From that time the Odo Russel), who related to him in all detail what was happening and was being said in the congregations" (Icard, Journal, p. 188). Sir Odo Russel, later Lord Ampthill, England's chargé d'affaires at Rome, was however, although an Anglican, favorable to the cause of the majority. He had a close friendship with Archbishop Manning. Subsequently Pius IX released the Archbishop of Westminster from his oath of secrecy with respect to Sir Russel so that the latter would be able to rectify, with the diplomatic corps, misleading items of informations coming from elsewhere. Several other prelates of the majority were apparently also relieved of their oath for similar reasons. On this subject, see Hemmer, Vie du cardinal Manning, pp. 213–15; Granderath, op. cit., II, 367.

[16] L. Veuillot, Rome et le Concile, I, 14.

[17] These words are generally attributed to Bishop Cousseau of Angoulême. But apparently the prelate merely translated into an elegant Latin saying an expression of Veuillot. On this point, see an article of Eugène Veuillot in the Univers et le Monde (December 13, 1897) and G. Barbier, Mgr Sauvé, II, 181.

[18] This is the figure given by the calculation of Granderath, op. cit., II, 179.

outcome of the deliberation appeared to all as certain, for the number of the fathers opposed on principle to the doctrine of infallibility was insignificant.[19] The question concerned solely the terms of a definition that henceforth left no doubt.

[19] Cardinal Manning says that the number was limited to not more than five. Manning, The True Story of the Vatican Council, p. 99. On this point, see Granderath, II, 333–41.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Papal Infallibility

THE drawing up of the dogmatic formula defining papal infallibility passed through several phases which ought to be recounted by us. In January, 1870, Archbishop Spalding of Baltimore wrote and had signed by five American bishops a motion asking for, not the direct definition of infallibility, which would alarm the governments and which the bad faith of the enemies of the Church would seek to make a bugbear for the people, and which a number of bishops, for various reasons, would abstain from voting, but an indirect definition. This would be formulated simply by the proclamation of certain propositions already universally admitted in the Church and from which the infallibility would flow immediately and clearly. For example, the following would be condemned: 1. the contention of appealing from the pope to a council; 2. that of being satisfied with an outward obedience to the pope's authority; 3. the opinion maintaining that the pope, in condemning a proposition, can be deceived as to its true meaning. The main advantage of such a procedure, said the signers of the petition, would be that it would unite, not merely the majority of the fathers, but an overwhelming moral unanimity, thus closing the mouth of all the fomenters of revolt.[1]

The advantages of the procedure suggested by the note of the five American bishops were real; but a certain number of the fathers judged that the proposed formulas would still leave some margin for ambiguity.[2] On February 15, Archbishop Manning, who, for some time "was laboring night and day to procure the happy issue of this grave affair." [3] proposed to formulate anathema against anyone who would maintain that "the decrees issued on matters of faith and morals by the Roman Pontiff, acting as supreme Pastor and Doctor of the universal Church, are reformable." [4] Three weeks later the commission charged with the drawing up of the schema De Ecclesia added a chapter entitled, "Romanum pontificem in rebus fidei et morum definiendis errare non posse." [5] This project was destined to have no more success than the preceding, but for reasons quite apart from its form. The schema De Ecclesia, to which it was appended and which had been distributed to the fathers on January 21, was, by an abuse of confidence, communicated to the newspapers and stirred up a violent opposition of the governments. In fact, this project touched on the most fiery questions. In its fifteen chapters it treated of the rights of the Church in her relations with the civil society, on the rights of the civil society in its relations with the Church, on the temporal power of the Holy See, on the formula, "Outside the Church no salvation," etc. "Its twenty-one canons fulminated, in short formulas, anathema against those who would dispute the doctrines contained in the schema." [6] "As soon as the genuineness of these reported texts was beyond doubt," says Emile Ollivier, "clamor of disapproval arose in the press of all Europe." [7] Many governments prepared to offer positive resistance to the council, and so informed Cardinal Antonelli, Secretary of State of the [2] Icard writes: "It seemed to me that the schema presented to the examination of the fathers of the council included all that, and said it better." Journal, 153.

[1] Collectio lacensis, VII, 938–40; Granderath, Histoire du concile du Vatican, II, 180–82.

[3] Granderath, II, 173.

[4] Ibid., p. 183; Collectio lacensis, p. 952.

[5] Granderath, III, 7.

[6] Ibid., III, 7.

[7] Ollivier, L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile du Vatican, II, 100.

Holy See.[8] Decidedly the question of papal infallibility was less irritating, at least for the governments, than most of those proposed in the new schema. This consideration, joined to more direct arguments,[9] was not without influence on the decision taken, to introduce the schema De romano pontifice before the schema De Ecclesia.

Projected Constitution De romano pontifice

This decision was a most happy one. If it had not been taken in opportune time, the fathers, soon obliged to disperse in consequence of events that we will have to relate, would have found themselves faced with this alternative: either to leave unsettled a question that was profoundly agitating the assembly, public opinion, and the states; or to resolve it with precipitation, under conditions that would not have sufficiently guaranteed the moral authority of their definition, perhaps even its dogmatic value.

On the contrary, the discussion and the voting on the schema De romano pontifice took place in conditions of the widest freedom. An eminent member of the assembly writes as follows: "On the general discussion of the Schema De romano pontifice some eighty bishops had spoken. Of these nearly half were of what the newspapers called the Opposition; but the proportion of the Opposition to the Council was not more than one sixth. They had therefore been heard as

[8] Antonelli's emotion was such that, fearing grave diplomatic complications, he prevented Bishop de Dreux-Brezé, bishop of Moulins, from presenting to the deputation of the council a project which he judged was capable of stirring up the governments. In Icard's Journal, under date of March 21, 1870, we read: "Cardinal Antonelli, who up to the present has been little involved in the affairs of the council, has halted, as very imprudent, the project that the Bishop of Moulins was fathering. He insisted on the need of proceeding only with the utmost circumspection."

[9] See Manning, The Vatican Council.

three to six." [10] The experience of the previous discussions had, moreover, allowed an improvement of the regulation or, at least, a broadening of the interpretation. "The subject matter was distributed in print to every Bishop, and a period of eight or ten days was given for any observations they might desire to make in writing. These observations were carefully examined by the deputation of twenty-four; and when found to be pertinent were admitted, either to modify or to reform the original Schema. The text so amended was then proposed for the general discussion, on which every Bishop in the Council had a free right to speak, and the discussions lasted so long as any Bishop was pleased to inscribe his name. The only limit upon this freedom of discussion consisted in the power of the Presidents, on the petition of ten Bishops to interrogate the Council whether it desired the discussion to be prolonged." [11]

The debates opened on May 13 with a report of Bishop Pie.[12] This report, sometimes read, sometimes improvised, set forth the reasons why the doctrine of the primacy of the pope was put at the head of the Constitution on the Church. It then explained how this primacy essentially allowed two prerogatives: a supreme power in the government, an infallible authority in the teaching. To anticipate misunderstandings on the most burning question which was met with in the schema, the speaker declared clearly that, in the intention of the commission which offered the present text, 1. the privilege of infallibility in no way applied to the pope as a private person, and 2. the pope and the Church could not be separated from each other. "Far from us," he declared, "be that gratuitous, fantastic, and insulting image of a head separate from its body." [13]

[10] Ibid., p. 37.
[11] Ibid., p. 35.
[12] Collectio lacensis, VII. 790.
[13] Ibid., 300.

The general debates on the schema were prolonged for almost three weeks. The doctrine of papal infallibility was there attacked chiefly by Bishop Hefele, who based his stand especially on the condemnation of Pope Honorius by the sixth ecumenical council, and by Bishop Strossmayer, who appealed particularly to St. Cyprian's disobedience to Pope St. Stephen in the baptismal dispute. The reply to the first point was that Pope Honorius was not condemned for having taught heresy, but for having not resisted heresy as the duty of his office demanded of him.[14] On the second point, the reply was made that Pope St. Stephen had not published any dogmatic decree against St. Cyprian, and that the latter had never resisted a decree having in his eyes the character of a definition of faith.[15] The inopportuneness of the definition was maintained, among others, by Bishop Clifford of Clifton, by Bishop Rivet of Dijon, by Cardinal Schwarzenberg, archbishop of Prague, by Bishop Greith of Saint Gall, and by Archbishop Darboy of Paris.[16] Certain arguments of Darboy, presented against the opportuneness, had the appearance of attacking the doctrine itself. Various bishops claimed that the definition of infallibility might definitely estrange from the Church Protestant and schismatic populations, and even lead to the apostasy of certain Catholics. Such a fear was considered exaggerated by most of the fathers, of whom Bishop Dechamps and Archbishop Manning were the most eloquent interpreters. Moreover, the scandal, if scandal there was, had already taken place, and would be removed not by the simple postponement of the definition.

[14] See Mourret, op. cit., III, 132.

[15] See ibid., I, 404.

[16] Bishop Clifford and Bishop Rivet asked that the definition be postponed out of regard for Catholic opinion, which was not prepared for this dogma and which the Church regularly did not offend uselessly. Bishop Schwarzenberg and Bishop Greith expressed a fear of seeing the governments rise up against Rome and perhaps form national Churches. Granderath, III, 267–71.

Infallibility Attached to the Papal Office

This general discussion, in which a few sharp words, inevitable in such a debate, were spoken, had the appreciable result of removing certain regrettable misunderstandings. The "infallibilists" having often, in defending their thesis, used the expressions "personal infallibility" and "separate infallibility," their opponents, the "anti-infallibilists" or "antiopportunists," reproached them with thus sustaining a doctrine either false or at least equivocal, and with wishing thereby to proclaim a new dogma, if not basically, at least in its terms. In fact, they said, the traditional doctrine, when it speaks of the infallibility of the pope, connects it with the office rather than with the person, and intends it of the pope united to the Church of which he is the head, and not separate from it. Bishop Dechamps, in the name of the commission, declared that, if the infallibility of the pope can be spoken of as personal, in the sense that it belongs to him exclusively and in a way incommunicable, we may rightly say that it is connected to his office, since it belongs to him only as pastor and doctor of the Church. On the other hand, if it can be spoken of as separate because it has no need of the assent of the Church for its exercise, it is not separate in the sense that is supposedly realizable of a pope and a Church forming two beings not connected to each other. Said Bishop Gastaldi of Saluces: "My head has no need of an arm in order to see, to hear, and to speak; however, it is because it is united to the body that it does all that; separate, it would be without life." [17] From these considerations and some other remarks, Bishop Dechamps concluded that the infallibility of the pope, such as they wished to define it, was in no way presented as an absolute infallibility, but as an infallibility clearly limited; and lastly that, under these conditions, it was not possible to see in the schema proposed the intention of introducing a new dogma.

[17] Granderath, III, 279.

These explanations and this happy stating of the idea in its true light removed many of the oppositions. But a small number of bishops, at whose head were Bishop Strossmayer and Bishop Dupanloup, persisted in calling for a postponement of the definition. Strossmayer still thought that his Slav populations, with their exceedingly naive spirit, would not be able sufficiently to grasp, and consequently would not be able to tolerate, the projected definition. As to Bishop Dupanloup, Emile Ollivier went so far as to say that, if he had not had Louis Veuillot before him, he would have taken his stand among the most ardent infallibilists, as he had done among the most ardent defenders of the temporal power of the pope. This assertion is less paradoxical than it appears to be at first glance. Not that the Bishop of Orléans, as Ollivier adds, "opposed the infallibility only by dislike for Louis Veuillot, its most earnest promoter"; [18] but he knew and perhaps somewhat exaggerated the influence exercised by the editor-in-chief of the Univers over certain members of the episcopate,[19] and to the very end he feared that this influence would have the result of making prevail one of those impressive formulas at which the mighty journalist had the happy gift, but which he thought unseasonably placed in a dogmatic definition.[20] [18] Ollivier, L'Empire libéral, XIII, 125. In his writings previous to the council, Dupanloup had always clearly professed the infallibility of the pope.

[19] "The other day"—I have the fact from the Bishop of Vannes, to whom the words were spoken—"when M. Veuillot entered the parlor of the French seminary, a bishop venerable by his age said to Bishop Bécel: 'He is one of ours, and we are his'" (Icard, Journal, p. 70). No doubt, in the mind of the venerable prelate, these words had a meaning quite avowable. But such words, reported to the Bishop of Orléans, stirred in him a feeling of hierarchical susceptibility, although its principle was equally respectable.

[20] We hardly need to recall that the assistance of the Holy Ghost guarantees to the Church only exemption from all error, and does not necessarily suggest the happiest formula. This is the ordinary fruit of wisdom and reflection.

Pope's Direct Authority over Dioceses

The proposed Constitution had a prooemium, or preamble, and four chapters. The discussion of the preamble and of the first two chapters was speedily conducted. It was concluded in two general congregations (June 6 and 7). The assembly spent a longer time on the third chapter. Its subject was the primacy of the Roman Pontiff, showing itself chiefly by "a direct authority" of the Holy Father over all the dioceses and by "a supreme and final jurisdiction" in every case, not only of a dogmatic or moral order, but also of a judiciary and administrative order. The question of the pope's direct power over the dioceses of the entire world sharply divided the assembly. Among the canonists to whom the fathers were accustomed to turn in the course of the debates, outstanding was the Italian scholar, Bishop Vecchiotti, counselor of State to the Holy Father, and M. Icard, director of the St. Sulpice Seminary. Father Icard energetically upheld the doctrine of the "ordinary power," which the former forcefully opposed. Vecchiotti maintained that the collision of this direct power of the pope with the special power of the diocesan bishop was of a nature to create confusion and disorder in the Church. His opponent said: 1. that the question was not of two equal and concurrent powers, but of two powers, one subordinate to the other; 2. that the question could be only, on the part of the pope, of a transient intervention in the government of a diocese, not of a substitution of his power for that of the bishop, of an absorption of the episcopal jurisdiction by the papal jurisdiction, which would then be a power ad destructionem, non ad aedificationem, according to the doctrine of St. Paul; 3. that, in the course of the ages, the popes had acted as persons possessing this right, and that therefrom a great good had resulted for the Church.[21]

[21] In his Journal, Father Icard often returns to this question of the direct juris-

This latter opinion, defended in the council by bishops Desprez, Freppel, and Dechamps, won out in spite of the objections by bishops Dupanloup and Haynald. A lively incident occurred in the midst of the discussion. Several bishops of the majority, among others Bishop Valerga, patriarch of Jerusalem, had, in connection with Gallicanism, strongly attacked the Church of France and the authority of Bossuet. Bishops Mathieu and Dupanloup replied with an eloquence full of emotion, recalling the evidences of devotion given the Holy See by the French clergy, the praises bestowed on them by Innocent III, Benedict XIV, Pius VI, and Pius VII, and that great testimony of blood they had given in the turmoil of 1793. Bishop Valerga returned to the pulpit to declare that "in his words he did not have any idea of ill will and that he did not identify Gallicanism with the French episcopate. He closed his address by exclaiming: "May the noble Church of France live forever!" [22] The incident was closed.

Discussion on Infallibility

The discussion of the fourth chapter, devoted to the question of the infallibility of the pope, began on June 15, 1870, and terminated on July 14. The long-dreaded debates on this burning question were spirited, but serious and comparatively peaceful. Outside interventions, which Cardinal Antonelli had feared,[23] did not occur. The French government, when asked diction of the pope, either to recount his discussions with Bishop Vecchiotti or to recall the efforts made by him to bring Archbishop Darboy around to his view. Cf. Icard, Journal, pp. 144, 163, 207.

---

[22] Granderath, III, 394–99.

[23] "March 27, 1870. This morning M. Combes related to me what was said to him the day before yesterday by the secretary of the imperial Academy, as the defender of Cardinal de Pietro. Cardinal Antonelli, seriously concerned over the consequences which might result from a definition in the present circumstances, gathered together a certain number of cardinals whom he often consulted on political affairs. They agreed that they would go to see the Holy Father and to intervene by Archbishop Darboy and Father Gratry, rejected these overtures. Writes Ollivier: "We did not hesitate.[24] When the majority tried to draw us to it by the disavowal of the memorandum, we replied: No, we side with no one. We made the same reply to the minority." [25]

Speakers to the number of 118 entered their names to speak on the fourth chapter.[26] But, in the course of the preceding discussions, light was shed little by little. Cardinal Manning wrote: "I can conscientiously declare, that long before the general discussion was closed, all general arguments were exhausted. The special discussion of details also had been to such an extent anticipated that nothing new was heard for days. The repetition became hard to bear." [27] Furthermore, the heat was oppressive. Sixty-one fathers withdrew their right to speak.

The amendments offered by the speakers, however, had happy consequences. The commission, after taking note of them, five days later presented a text notably improved. For the original title, De romani pontificis infallibilitate, it substituted the following: De romani pontificis infallibili magisterio. This change it made to mark that what was meant was to speak of an assistance accorded to the office, to the magisterium. The commission also introduced the formula, cum ex cathedra loquitur, a formula that had the advantage of being traditional, for it was in use in the theological schools.[28] In the third place it qualified the privilege of infallibility as a charearnestly ask him to remove the famous question from the council. The Pope did not at all welcome their remarks. He said to them: "I have the Blessed Virgin on my side; I will go ahead." Icard, Journal, p. 298.

---

[24] See Archbishop Darboy's letter in Ollivier, L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile du Vatican, II, 236–38.

[25] For Archbishop Darboy's letter, see ibid., II, 236.

[26] Granderath, III, 89.

[27] Manning, The Vatican Council, p. 37.

[28] This is the expression currently used by Bellarmine in his treatise De Romano Pontifice.

ism, thus calling up the idea of a gratia gratis data, that is, given for the benefit of others, not a grace gratum faciens, that is, which sanctifies the one who receives it and which might have suggested the idea of impeccability in the person to whom it is attributed. Lastly, the learned reporter, Bishop Gasser of Brixen, explained that the infallibility of the pope, such as it was proposed to define it, had for its object, like that of the Church, only the preservation and explanation of the deposit of revealed faith. This last remark was of a nature to reassure those who were alarmed at the thought of seeing the pope proclaiming new dogmas.[29]

The fathers of the council, meeting in a general congregation (July 11), adhered almost unanimously to nearly all the propositions of the reporter. On the same day, the commission drew up the corrected schema, which was proposed, on July 13, to the votes of the assembly.

Present were 601 fathers. Of these, 451 voted placet; 88, non placet; 62, placet juxta modum.[30]

Although, according to the rules of the council, a moral unanimity was not necessary, it appeared most desirable. To obtain it, the presidents of the council, in accord with the commission, declared themselves ready to yield, as far as possible, to the wishes of the minority. This minority was granted the suppression of two texts of St. Irenaeus and of St. Augustine, which, separated from their context, might have been understood in an inexact sense;[31] but a deputation—made up of Darboy, Ginoulhiac, Simon, Scherr, Rivet, and Ketteler—were refused the insertion of a clause mentioning the assent of the Church in the definition ex cathedra. Furthermore, to avoid any ambiguity on the significance of this refusal, the [29] Bishop Gasser's report occupied thirty-four entire columns in the Collectio lacensis (col. 388–422). Granderath gives a summary of it (III, 92–116).

[30] These 62 conditional votes did not all belong to the minority. Half of these votes were given by prelates who asked for more vigor in the formulas.

[31] Collectio lacensis, 473.

formula was revised by the reporter in the following manner: Hujusmodi definitiones romani pontificis irreformabiles esse ex sese, non autem ex consensu Ecclesiae.[32] These two modifications were submitted (July 16) to a vote. The first was accepted by nearly the whole assembly; the second, by a very large majority.[33] The final form of the schema was thus drawn up. Nothing remained but to submit it to the vote of the assembly, whose members had no longer any choice but to accept it or refuse it. According to the customary practice, this vote was deferred to the following Sunday, in public session. The news of the serious conflict that had just broken out between France and Prussia decided the fathers to advance this date. The public session was determined for two days later, July 18. The president of the assembly then read a monitum of the Holy Father declaring that the fathers who would have reasons to absent themselves, either for reasons of health or for business reasons, could return to their diocese until November 11, the feast of St. Martin, on the single condition of notifying the secretary of the council of their departure.[34]

Absentees

What were the members of the minority going to do? On this question, let us quote the words of one of those prelates.

[32] "These definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable in themselves, not by virtue of the consent of the Church."

[33] Granderath, III, 126. We see how false is the accusation by Friedrich and reported by E. de Pressensé (Le Concile du Vatican, p. 316). Cf. Ollivier, op. cit., II, 337. In the view of pacification, they had also suppressed the explicit condemnation of the doctrine which attributes to the pope a preponderant part, but not the fullness of the supreme power. But Bishop Freppel, who had this formula admitted, insisted and obtained the reinsertion in the text of these words: aut eum habere tantum potiores, non vero totum plenitudinem hujus supremae potestatis. Thus were cut short certain subterfuges of Gallicanism, traces of which had been found in the work of Bishop Maret. See Cornut, Mgr Fréppel d'après des documents authentiques et inédits, p. 166.

[34] Collectio lacensis, VII, 761.

Bishop Dupont des Loges of Metz relates: "The eve of the day when the schema of the infallibility was to be read in general session, we met together, the bishops of the minority, to examine what procedure to follow. Our opinion was to say: Non placet. Bishop Dupanloup came in late. He was made acquainted with our decision. He told us that he could not agree to our view: we could not say placet, for no one would believe us; we could not say non placet, for the Catholic world would not understand us and perhaps would be scandalized; thus we must abstain. His view prevailed." [35] A letter to the Holy Father was at once drawn up and signed by the 55 bishops agreeing to the decision. The letter, couched in respectful terms, announced to the Pope that, not to have to say, in the face of their father, on a question which touched him so closely: Non placet, they were going to return to their dioceses.[36] Several left Rome that same evening.

The Vote

The next day (July 18), at nine o'clock in the morning, following the ordinary ceremonial, the public session took place in the large hall of the council. At the moment of the balloting, a storm, which was rumbling over Rome since early in the morning, suddenly broke out. Says a Protestant witness: "The placets of the fathers fought with the storm, amid the roaring of the thunder, the flashes of lightning, shaking all the windows, lighting up the dome and all the cupolas of St. Peter's. . . . This lasted without interruption for an hour and a half. Never have I witnessed a more grandiose scene and a more striking effect." [37] Present were 535 fathers. Only two non [35] This account of Bishop Dupont des Loges, told to Father Bourdon, canon of Rennes, has been published by Father Branchereau in a note of the Journal intime de Mgr Dupanloup, p. 311.

[36] See the letter in Ollivier, op. cit., II, 344.

[37] Quoted by Brugère, Tableau de l'histoire et de la littérature de l'Eglise, p. 1175.

placets were heard. These were from Bishop Riccio of Cajazzo in the Two Sicilies and Bishop Fitzgerald of Little Rock in the United States. These two prelates had not been present at the meeting of the minority bishops and they had not been informed of the decision taken. They submitted, both of them, immediately after the definition of the dogma. Report had it that, at the moment when the Pope sanctioned by his supreme authority the dogmatic Constitution, a great calm took place in the atmosphere and a brilliant ray of sunshine illumined the face of the Pontiff. This was the symbol of the entire work of the council, which was opened and continued amid so many storms and which ended in light and peace.

Franco-Prussian War

The next day (July 19, 1870) the French chargé d'affaires at Berlin brought to the chancellery a declaration of war against Prussia. On August 2, Emperor Napoleon III declared that, as the war which had just begun demanded all the forces of France, he intended to withdraw his troops from Rome.

But, as the German historian of the Vatican Council declares, "it is thanks to the armed protection of France that the council was able to last thus far." [38] Thereafter everything was to be feared from the violence of the revolutionary troops and from the complicity of the court of Florence. For a moment at Rome it was hoped that Austria would take in the Holy City the post of honor abandoned by Napoleon III. However, it was soon learned that, on the contrary, Count von Beust, prime minister of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, proposed to the Emperor of the French to abandon Rome to the monarchy of Savoy.[39] The King of Prussia, on whom some Italian Catholics had also counted,[40] informed Victor Emman-

[38] Granderath, III, 180.
[39] Ollivier, op. cit., II, 473; H. d'Hideville, Les Piémontais à Rome, chap. 8.
[40] Rothan, L'Allemagne et l'Italie, II, 84.

uel that "the sympathies of Prussia for the person of the Holy Father had their natural limits in the good relations between Prussia and Italy." [41] After the battle of Sedan (September 2, 1870), which decided the lot of Napoleon [42] and made the Prussian victory evident, Victor Emmanuel no longer hesitated. On September 7 his Minister of Foreign Affairs, Viscount Venosta, informed the foreign powers that "His Majesty the King, in the presence of Europe, assumed the responsibility of maintaining order in the peninsula and of safeguarding the Holy See." But we know what had to be meant by such a formula. On September 10 the King himself wrote directly to the Holy Father: "I see the inevitable necessity that my troops, already put in charge of guarding the frontiers, advance and occupy the positions that will be indispensable for the security of Your Holiness and for the maintenance of order." Upon receiving the King's letter, Pius IX is said to have exclaimed: "Belle parole, ma brutti fatti" ("Fine words, but brutal acts"). He answered the sovereign that "his letter was not worthy of a loving son," and that "he placed his cause in the hands of God." [43]

The Taking of Rome

On the 11th of September, 60,000 soldiers penetrated the States of the Church. Surprised at this unexpected attack, the pope's soldiers retreated on Rome and Civitavecchia. The Italian General Bixio marched on this latter city, while General Cadorna advanced toward Rome. Civitavecchia surrendered. The next day, the investment of Rome began. The Pope had at his disposal about 10,000 combatants, resolved to defend [41] Cadorna, La liberazione di Rome, p. 361.

[42] Before his fall, toward the end of August, Napoleon III would have sent Prince Jerome to Florence, charged with obtaining some helps from Italy, by means of the promise of not opposing the taking of Rome. Cadorna, op. cit., p. 52; Van Duerm, Vicissitudes politiques du pouvoir temporel des papes, p. 403.

[43] Van Duerm, Vicissitudes politiques, pp. 405–10.

themselves until death, on fire to avenge at Rome the ambush of Castelfidardo. The Prussian ambassador, von Arnim, came to get the Pope to consent to the occupation of Rome. But he met with an absolute non possumus. On September 20, from five o'clock to ten o'clock in the morning, the Piedmont artillery battered the old ramparts and hurled their projectiles on the city. The first breach was made near Porta Pia. The attack went on, and then the white flag floated on the walls and on Castel Sant' Angelo. Pius IX, wishing to avoid too great bloodshed, gave orders for the resistance to cease. The capitulation expressly stipulated that the Leonine city would remain in the Holy Father's possession; but the following day, Pius IX, in the presence of serious disturbances, had to resign himself to let the Italian forces penetrate there. The ruin of the temporal power was complete. The Pope was left only the Vatican and its gardens. "Gentlemen," said Pius IX, addressing the diplomatic corps gathered about him, "you are witnesses that I yield to violence; from this moment, the Pope is the prisoner of Victor Emmanuel."

What was the council going to become? On October 20, following the publication of the royal decree which changed the patrimony of St. Peter into a "Roman province," appeared the bull of prorogation of the council. Said the Pope: "We have decided to put off the continuation of the sessions to a later time. We declare the council suspended, begging God, the master and avenger of His Church, to restore peace and freedom as soon as possible to His faithful spouse." [44]

Bishop Fessler's Pamphlet

To enlighten public opinion, the secretary general of the council, Bishop Fessler, bishop of St. Hippolytus in Austria, published a pamphlet entitled, La vraie et la fausse infallibilité, [44] Collectio lacensis, col. 497. See Fessler, La vraie et la fausse infallibilité, p. 41.

which was at once honored by a brief of approbation by Pius IX. Therein he clearly established: 1. that the Vatican Council, in its definitions, did nothing but fix and make precise, according to its expressions, "a tradition going back to the origin of the Christian faith"; 2. that the infallibility of the pope defined by the council was attached only to his office of supreme doctor of the universal Church, and not to the offices of supreme priest, supreme judge, and supreme lawmaker; 3. that, even in the dogmatic decrees, not everything is an article of faith, and it should not be considered as such what is mentioned merely in passing or what serves only as introduction or as grounds; 4. that in saying that the definitions promulgated by the pope "are irreformable by themselves, and not in virtue of the consent of the Church," it is not at all the intention to say that the pope can ever decide something contrary to the tradition or that he can put himself in opposition with all the other bishops; 5. that, in short, theology meets with a small number of ex cathedra judgments or infallible decisions of popes in the history of the Church;[45] 6. lastly, that the domain of papal infallibility, far from depending on the pope's arbitrary will, is clearly limited, and that it is impossible, for example, that this domain extend to "juridical matters," which are not contained in divine revelation.[46]

Not content with approving and recommending Bishop Fes-

[45] Fessler, op. cit., pp. 41, 63–78.

[46] Ibid., p. 78. Similar explanations, likewise approved by a brief of Pius IX, were given (June, 1871) in a collective pastoral instruction of the Swiss bishops. This Instruction is reproduced in Bishop Fessler's work. In his pamphlet, Bishop Fessler seems to limit the papal infallibility to "the revealed truths." If such is the thought of the eminent theologian, it would be erroneous. Papal infallibility extends to truths connected with revelation and to certain facts so bound with the teaching of the revealed truths that have been called "dogmatic facts." For example, the existence of the soul, its spirituality, its immortality, its free will, are truths not revealed, but they are so connected with the faith that to deny them would be to undermine all revelation and all religion at the foundation; the fact that the Augustinus contains heresies is a dogmatic fact. On this subject, see Choupin, Valeur des décisions du Saint-Siège, pp. 14-18; Dumas in Etudes of March, 1876.

sler's pamphlet, Pius IX wished to reassure the heads of the state on the subject of the implications which some publicists attributed to the definition of infallibility. He declared: "It is a pernicious error to represent infallibility as including the right to depose the sovereigns. . . . Only bad faith can confuse matters so diverse, as if an infallible judgment applied to a revealed truth had some analogy with a right which the popes, solicited by the wishes of the peoples, have had to exercise when the general good required it." [47]

Submission of the Opposition Bishops

All the opposition bishops, without exception, humbly submitted to the decisions of the Vatican Council. The most notable were the submissions of bishops Dupanloup, Darboy, Maret, Strossmayer, and Hefele. "Among the liberal Catholics of some renown," remarks Ceconni, "not a single one refused to bow before the oracle of the Holy Ghost." [48] Döllinger in Germany and Loyson in France, who had taken a stand of open revolt against the council, were not followed by any well-known disciple. Loyson tried to found at Paris a "French Church," which was discredited more and more as time went on. Döllinger, who for a moment seemed to dream of playing the role of a Luther, died isolated. Some high personages (Cardinal von Hohenlohe, Bishops Fessler, Nardi, Dupanloup, Father Duchesne) tried to bring him to sentiments of humble submission. Döllinger received their visits and their letters politely, without recrimination, but also without giving them any hope of success.[49] He died suddenly, perhaps without hav-

[47] Allocution of July 20, 1871, quoted by Ollivier, op. cit., II, 374; Granderath, III, 362; Voce della Verità, July 22, 1871. Pius IX explains here the indirect power of the popes of the Middle Ages over the sovereigns, following a theory expounded by Father Gosselin, a priest of St. Sulpice, in his work, Pouvoirs des papes sur les souverains au moyen âge. This theory has been sometimes disputed. Pius IX here gives it the support of his authority.

[48] Ceconni, Historia de Concilio ecumenico Vaticano, II, chap. 6, nos. 15, 487.

[49] In an unpublished letter to Bishop Duplanloup, Döllinger enumerates several ing time to repent, at any rate without retracting his errors.

At his side some less celebrated professors (Friedrich and Sepp of the Munich university, Hilgers and Reusch of Bonn, Reinkens of Breslau, Schulte of Prague) pretended to found a Church of "Old Catholics," which the governments of Germany favored eagerly. Döllinger disdained to attend the congress which they held at Cologne in 1872, fraternizing with the Anglicans, the Russians, and the Freemason Bluntschli; he likewise refused to take part in the conciliabulum which they organized at Constance (September 12 to 14, 1873), at which they adhered to the principles of the Lutheran Reformation. In spite of the learning of its organizers, in spite of the backing of the thrones, the German "Old Catholic Church" did not show more vitality than "the French Church." Public opinion never took note of either of them except to despise or ridicule them.

However, the governments generally manifested their hostility to the decisions promulgated by the Vatican Council. France, which, after the war, had elected an assembly with a majority favorable to Catholicism, did not have a hostile attitude; but Prussia affected to regard the dissidents as Catholics; and Austria-Hungary protested against the dogma of infallibility by denouncing its concordat. Most of the German states forbade the publication of the decrees of the council. Portugal did as much. Some Swiss cantons took an attitude clearly opposed to Catholicism; the federal Council elaborated a new regulation of relations between the Church and the state. Bishop Lachat of Basel and Bishop Mermillod, coadjutor of Geneva, who were known as zealous defenders of papal infallibility, were expelled from Swiss territory. In England the former prime minister, Gladstone, undertook to show, in a resounding pamphlet, that the infallibility of the pope not only of these steps. He does so with a curtness in which some bitterness is evident, but which remains strictly polite. The letter ends suddenly, without any form of salutation. Archives of St. Sulpice.

---

threatened the conscience of individuals, but also the state, "for," he said, "this dogma can, at any moment, put the subject of a nation in the necessity of sacrificing his loyalty to the pope's good pleasure." [50]

This big agitation quieted down. It never took hold of the masses of Catholics. It could not do so. A certain non-Catholic statesman wrote: "No one will admit that a man who believes in revelation, in the divinity of Christ, and in the infallibility of the Church, who has not disputed any of the doctrinal decisions rendered by the popes for eighteen centuries, separates from the communion in which he has lived, because an infallibility, whose necessity and power he does not contest, will be explained by the divine assistance in place of being so by the consent, even tacit, of the bishops." As for the authority of the council, "the various reproaches that have been turned against it did not stand the examination of the next day's calmness." [51] In the council freedom of speech was complete; and can anyone suppose that, in the balloting on infallibility (July 18, 1870) a more overwhelming moral unanimity was needed? Cardinal Manning says:

> Since that date, a crowd of events have hurried to their fulfillment. The French Empire has passed away. Rome is occupied by the armies of Italy. The peace of Europe is broken. . . . The Church may suffer, but cannot die; the dynasties and civil societies of Europe may not only suffer, but be swept away. The Head of the Church, be he where he may, in Rome or in exile, free or in bondage, will be all that the Council of the Vatican has defined, supreme in jurisdiction, infallible in faith. . . . The Council has thus made provision for the Church in its time of trial, when it may be, not only Œcumenical Councils cannot be held, but even the ordinary administration of ecclesiastical government and consultation may be hardly possible. Peter's bark is ready for the storm. All that is needed is already on board.[52]

[50] Gladstone, The Vatican Decrees in Their Bearing on Civil Allegiance.
[51] Ollivier, op. cit., II, 396.
[52] Manning, The Vatican Council, p. 164.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

The Church in Italy and France

THE invasion of Rome on September 20, 1870, was but the beginning of a series of trials from which Pope Pius IX would cruelly suffer until his death. These trials came to him especially from Italy, France, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Spain, and England.

Rome

The very day when the Piedmont troops opened the breach of Porta Pia, Cardinal Antonelli communicated to the members of the diplomatic corps a note by which Pius IX, "declaring null and void the usurpation of which he was the victim," made the King of Italy and his government responsible for that "unworthy and sacrilegious spoliation." [1]

Once this solemn protest had been made, the Secretary of State of the Holy See judged it prudent to provide for the means to assure the safety of the Pope. In the capitulation signed by General Kanzler, a stipulation was contained that the Leonine City would remain to the Holy Father. The next day Cardinal Antonelli informed Baron Blanc,[2] secretary of Visconti-Venosta, Minister of Foreign Affairs, that he desired to confer with him at the Vatican. There Antonelli declared to him that, "as the Leonine City had become the rendezvous of all the criminals and no authority any longer remained there, he asked

[1] Van Duerm, Vicissitudes politiques, pp. 418–20.

[2] Baron Blanc, a native of Savoy, had been at first a lawyer at Chambéry, then attached to the personal cabinet of Count Cavour. Subsequently he was called to fill the office of ambassador to Constantinople and to London, and lastly to become Minister of Foreign Affairs.

General Cadorna to establish there, as in the rest of Rome, police posts and a regular service of military administration." The Cardinal specified that this request emanated from the Holy Father's initiative, solely prompted by the desire to avoid violence and other evils to the populations that dwelt in this quarter of the Eternal City. Agreement was reached between the two parties that "the question concerning that part of Rome was not thereby to be prejudged either theoretically or practically." Such were the conditions under which the Italian government at once occupied the territory which it had until then respected.[3]

Moreover, it was not without an inner repugnance that Victor Emmanuel saw himself led to forcibly enter the capital of the Catholic world. He knew that this act would plunge into the most cruel anguish the heart of two pious princesses who touched him closely. Until the last moment, he had hoped that Pius IX would freely let the Italian troops enter the papal territory.[4] The Pope's Non possumus disconcerted him. Yet he disregarded it. He believed he had need of the revolutionaries to realize the work of his life, Italian unity; and the party of the revolution forced on him the war on the Holy See, even to the taking of Rome. Roma o morte ("Rome or death") was the cry of the Garibaldian bands. The wretched sovereign, however, might have reflected that, in yielding on this point to the insistence of his confederates, he made himself their slave. As Massimo d'Azeglio wrote in 1866: "The day when the government will be in Rome, Mazzini and his will be the masters."

[3] The negotiations that took place on this occasion between Cardinal Antonelli and Baron Blanc involved several other points. They spoke of a temporary modus vivendi between the two powers residing in Rome. The details of these discussions may be found in a collection of diplomatic documents published in 1895 by Baron Blanc, printed in small number and not to be found in general circulation. These documents have been in large part reproduced and fully analyzed by François Carry in an article of the Correspondant (November 19, 1895) and entitled "Le Vatican et le Quirinal d'après des documents nouveaux."

[4] Correspondant of December 10, 1895, CLXXXI, 782.

The forecast of the far-sighted statesman was realized. Victor Emmanuel could henceforth no longer rid himself of the chains that he accepted. To palliate the flagrant injustice of the invasion of the papal territory, a junta, formed at Rome under the protection of the Piedmont army, summoned the electors of the Eternal City and of the entire Papal State to vote, by Yes or No, October 2, on the following question: "Do you wish your union with the kingdom of Italy under the constitutional monarchical government of Victor Emmanuel and of his successors?" The Catholics loyal to the Pope abstained from voting, and the agents of the government admitted to the voting, under the name of émigrés, a large number of outsiders, drawn from different provinces and provided with cards of their prefects or subprefects. Under these circumstances, the majority of the Yes votes was overwhelming. Rome gave 46,785 Yes votes against 47 Nos; the whole Papal State, 133,681 votes favorable to the annexation, against 1,507 to the contrary. The fiction of this plebiscite appeared four months later, when 27,161 Romans of voting age and in the enjoyment of their civil rights, affirmed, by their duly legalized signatures, in spite of the pressure of the new government, that they remained faithful to the authority of the Pope.[5] But already, on October 4, the King of Italy, taking advantage of the plebiscite, promulgated the following decree: "Art. 1. Rome and the Roman provinces form an integral part of the Kingdom of Italy. Art. 2. The Sovereign Pontiff preserves the dignity, the inviolability, and all the prerogatives of the sovereign." On October 18, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Visconti-Venosta, addressed to the governments a circular having for its purpose to reassure them about the status given the papacy by the suppression of its temporal power.[6]

In a letter of November 8, 1870, Cardinal Antonelli strongly

[5] See E. Rendu, La lettre du pape et l'Italie officielle, p. 64.

[6] Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, p. 427.

protested against the affirmations of this circular. He recalled to the representatives of the Holy See accredited to foreign courts, that they might inform the governments to which they were accredited, the principal measures taken by the government of Florence against the freedom of the Church: "the suppression of all the religious orders, the incameration,[7] the shackles imposed on the episcopate, the enlistment of the young clerics in the armies, the imprisonment of ecclesiastics who refused to obey the laws condemned by their conscience, the hindrances to the exercise of worship, the teaching of the most impious doctrines in the classes of the universities, the freedom given to the spread of newspapers, pictures, writings of all sorts, letting loose contempt on the pope and the Catholic religion." [8]

Not without visible apprehension did King Victor Emmanuel affix his signature to these persecuting laws; but "the way he viewed his duties of constitutional sovereign did not permit him to refuse his sanction to the laws passed by the Chambers." [9] His emotion was especially poignant when he had under his eyes the famous encyclical of November 1, by which Pius IX pronounced, "against all those who had perpetrated the invasion, the usurpation, and the occupation of the papal domain, and against all the orderers, aides, and counselors of these acts, the major excommunication and all other censures and penalties decreed by the holy canons." [10]

Victor Emmanuel in Rome

The King's anguish was full when, a short time afterward, the question arose of transferring the court of Florence to the [7] Thus the Italians spoke of the spoliations of the goods of the Church, which have also been called laicization or disaffections.

[8] Chantrel, op. cit., pp. 428–30.

[9] Count Conestabile, "Le Roi Victor-Emmanuel," in the Correspondant of January 15, 1878, p. 200.

[10] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 436; Acta Pii IX, V, 623–78; the Correspondant, CX, 206.

Quirinal palace. Says a well informed historian: "Victor Emmanuel experienced an invincible apprehension at fixing his residence in the Eternal City." [11] But once again he had to yield. On November 5, a tumultuous crowd, gathered by revolutionary leaders, paraded through the streets of Rome, shouting: "We wish the Quirinal." The Council of the ministers were of a mind to annex the Quirinal to the royal domain. "Victor Emmanuel hesitated before sanctioning this double outrage against the sovereignty of the Pope. Rome, the Holy City, filled this soldier with fear. Summoning a former counselor of King Charles Albert, one of the most devoted servants of the house of Savoy, he declared to him that he wished to abdicate. He ordered him to draw up an act of abdication. On the next day the act of abdication was brought to the Pitti palace in Florence; but he who had been ordered to draw it up could not reach the King. New influences had triumphed over the hesitations of the prince." [12] He was persuaded that, by quitting the throne at so difficult a moment, he was endangering the entire enterprise to which he had dedicated his life. The house of Savoy thought it needed the alliance of the revolution to realize the work of Italian unity, and the Church must pay the costs of that alliance. On December 5, when opening the session of Parliament, the King of Italy spoke these words: "With Rome as the capital, I accomplish my promises and I complete the undertaking begun by my father twenty-five years ago." On December 31 he made his triumphal entry into Rome and installed himself in the Quirinal.

The Catholics had not waited for this last outrage before raising their voice in favor of their common father. Most of the bishops sent to the Pontiff addresses and collective letters to express their sorrowful indignation. Meetings of protest assembled at Vienna, Fulda, Malines. But the great states of Europe remained silent. France was absorbed by her struggle with [11] Count Conestabile, in the Correspondant, CX, 206.

[12] Ibid.

Prussia. Among the other states, some appealed to the principle of non-intervention to remain inactive and silent in the presence of the accomplished fact; others took an expectant attitude, which seemed to be prompted by fear of the anti-Christian sects, if not by a secret complicity with them. Only one state uttered an energetic protest: this was a little American republic, Ecuador. On January 18, 1871, the Journal officiel of Quito contained the following: "The government of Ecuador despite its weakness and the distance separating it from the Old World, protests, before God and men, in the name of outraged justice, in the name of the Catholic people of Ecuador, against the iniquitous invasion of Rome." [13] The statesman who inspired this protest, Garcia Moreno, would be killed by an assassin's bullet four years later; his last words were those of a Christian hero: Dios no muere ("God does not die").

At a certain time people wondered whether the French Republic was going to follow in the footsteps of Ecuador. The Italian government thought so, or pretended to think so. The Assembly elected on February 8, 1871, was certainly the most favorable to the religious cause that France had possessed for a century and a half, perhaps at any time in the course of her history. It did not have a legitimist, Orleanist, or republican majority; but it had a clearly Catholic majority. This character was so marked that unfair writers have said, in a spirit of ill will toward the French Catholics, that, following the war, they had forgotten the work of the preservation of their country only to think of the restoration of the temporal power of the pope. The statement is doubly unjust. The French Catholics, patriots during the war, were not less so after the defeat; if Jules Favre, Minister of Foreign Affairs, informed Pius IX that France would be happy to receive him in the island of Corsica, at the same time he congratulated Victor Emmanuel over "the happy event that delivered Rome." [14] But the King of [13] Chantrel, op. cit., p. 438.

[14] Lecanuet, L'Eglise de France sous la troisième République, I, 89. Jules Favre

Italy was not unaware that the faithful, in a song that had become popular, called upon God "to save Rome and France." He knew that the French Catholic papers bitterly reproached the Italian government for having profited by the evils of their country in order to seize the Papal States. He had seen the French government testify its gratitude to Pius IX for having been the only sovereign who publicly interested himself in the misfortunes of the "eldest daughter of the Church." [15] He was mindful that one of the most influential members of the French parliament, Adolphe Thiers, had always regarded the temporal power as necessary for the independence of the Holy Father.[16]

The Law of Guaranties

The King of Italy thought that the moment had come to reassure the Catholics, or at least the powers, about the situation of the Pope. He presented to the Chambers, had passed, and signed (May 13, 1871) the measure known as the Law of Guaranties, by which the Italian state recognized the inviolability of the person of the pope and his quality of sovereign, granted him the use of the Vatican palace, the Lateran, the chancery, and the villa of Castel Gandolfo, guaranteed the freedom of conclaves and councils, renounced all control over ecclesiastical affairs, and assured the papal court of an annual gift of 3,225,000 francs. The law was silent on the ruin of the sovereignty over the Leonine City promised by the capitulation of Rome.[17]

The Pope did not accept this law. No government recognized it. Having been passed by the Italian Parliament without any wrote: "I believe that if you do not go to Rome, the city will fall into the power of dangerous agitators. I prefer to see you there. But of course France does not give you any consent." Beaufort, Histoire de l'invasion des Etats pontificaux, p. 486.

[15] Such was the expression used in an official dispatch addressed to the Italian cabinet. Gambetta, upon reading it, said to Chaudordy: "Forward it, but it is useless to publish it." Ernest Daudet, Histoire diplomatique de l'alliance franco-russe, p. 52.

[16] See Thiers' clear opinion in the Moniteur in the report of the sessions of April 14 and 16, 1865.

[17] See the complete text of the Law of Guaranties in Chantrel, op. cit., pp. 502–4.

agreement either of the Pope, whom it pretended to treat as a king, or of the other powers, this law was without any of the marks of a reciprocal contract. It was a unilateral act, a regulation which the conqueror intended to impose on the vanquished. It had neither the form of a concordat nor even that of a peace treaty, of a capitulation. It was an expedient. An Italian statesman has been obliged to acknowledge its true character. Writes Minghetti: "From sincere minds the fear had to be removed that Italy, in going to Rome, did not purpose touching the spiritual independence of the head of the Catholic religion. Besides, this other suspicion had to be set at nought, that the Italian government might some day make use of the papacy as an instrument for its political views." [18] Was this end attained? Let us hear what Emile Ollivier said in 1879: "The Law of Guaranties reassured no one. The Council of State, so it was said, declared it an integral part of the constitutional order. What value has a declaration of this sort? Who will prevent a new ministry from obtaining a contrary declaration, or who will oblige the deputies to take account of it? The independence of the head of the Catholic religion is at the discretion of a majority vote in an Italian parliament. . . . The abolition of the Law of Guaranties is precisely the slogan of the Garibaldian party. At the same time that the attacks against the guaranties increase, the conduct of the government becomes sharper. Since it has been at Rome, instead of treating the Pope with respect, it is continually aggressive. Without mentioning the wretched fate assigned to the religious congregations, the right of exequatur, reserved to the government, becomes the very negation of the right of free appointments recognized to the pope." [19] Ollivier here alludes to the numerous expulsions of religious congregations, to their dispersion, and to their spoliation. During the first eighteen months of the occupation of Rome, thirty-two religious houses were expropriated.[20]

[18] Minghetti, De l'Eglise et de l'Etat, p. 54.

[19] Ollivier, L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile du Vatican, II, 478–80.

At the same time, on the pretext that the Catholics of France were preparing for the coming of Count Chambord and that the latter announced that one of his first cares would be to restore the temporal power,[21] King Victor Emmanuel turned away from France and turned to Germany. His envoys met at Gastein with Bismarck and von Beust, and there they laid the foundation of the Triple Alliance. In February, 1872, Prince Frederick Charles was staying at Rome, went hunting with the royal family, and came out with aggressive proposals against France. To Visconti-Venosta he said: "Are we not behind you? If Italy were to be attacked by France, it would be backed by Germany." [22]

Protests of Pius IX

On April 12, 1872, Pius IX, replying to an address by Italian Catholics, expressed himself thus: "Each day aggravates the affliction which the events of September 20, 1870, have brought to us; and each day the disastrous consequences of that outrage appear more cruel." The next day, when receiving in the hall of the Consistory 400 visitors who had come from France, Austria, Germany, England, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Belgium and America, he had a word for each of those countries, and the Pontiff's tone of sadness was remarked when he spoke of Italy, of "poor Italy"; his tone of profound feeling when he spoke of France, "that country where dwell so many generous souls, [20] For the list of these houses and the new use they were put to, see Chantrel, p. 587.

[21] On May 8, 1871, Count Chambord, in one of his manifestoes, wrote: "Some have said that the independence of the papacy is dear to me. They speak truly." And on the next July 31, Louis Veuillot wrote in the Univers: "The twenty-fifth year of Pius IX is a marvel, which announces another, that of his deliverance by the Most Christian King."

[22] On this subject, see the curious correspondence in the Univers (February, 1872). Cf. Lecanuet, op. cit., I, 159.

that France fertile in so many good works, which it would take too long to enumerate." [23] At the end of November, 1872, on the occasion of the presentation of a new bill against the religious orders and for the erection of a Protestant church in Rome, the Pontiff repeated his complaints.[24] From 1873 to 1876, fresh outrages aroused new protests of the Pope. The Italian Chamber having passed (January, 1877) a law decreeing prosecutions and penalties against the priests who, by their discourses or by the spread of papal writings, should continue to oppose civil oppression, Pius IX, now in his eighty-fifth year, and feeling his strength giving way, wished to have the world hear a supreme protest. He declared: "We lack all necessary freedom so long as we are under the yoke of the tyrants. . . . Let the faithful make use of the means which the laws of each country place at their disposal, to act promptly with the men who govern." [25] These words aroused, in the entire world, a movement of petitions, addresses, and motions, by which several governments were stirred.[26] The Italian minister, Mancini, author of the bill, tried to justify it by a circular.[27] But the government recoiled before this universal protest of the Catholics. On May 12, 1877, the Senate rejected the bill, which Victor Emmanuel had declared he would refuse to sign. Report had [23] Chantrel, p. 632. In that allocution is found this passage, so much commented on by the press: "I pray that certain parties, exaggerated on this side and that, may disappear forever. One party fears too much the influence of the pope. Opposed to this, is another party which entirely forgets the laws of charity." On reading this passage of the allocution, Louis Veuillot exclaimed: "Behold a blessing which enters by smashing the windows!" And he wrote in his paper: "Our business is to obey. . . . If, then, the judge thinks that our work can no longer receive from us the character which the interest of the Church demands, we will disappear." A few weeks later, in answer to a letter from the Univers' editor-in-chief, Pius IX declared to him that, "while regretting in him some excess of zeal, he asks him to continue the combat." See François Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, p. 131.

[24] Chantrel, pp. 714-18.

[25] Allocution of March 12, 1877. Cf. Chantrel, p. 582.

[26] On this occasion (May 4, 1877) Gambetta pronounced his famous formula: "Behold, clericalism is the enemy."

[27] Chantrel, p. 589.

it that the pious Princess Clotilda, alarmed at the rapidity with which her unfortunate father let himself be led on the revolutionary descent, had added her suppliant voice to that of the Catholic world. She said to the King, her father: "God may not leave you an hour for your repentance." A few months after this, King Victor Emmanuel (January 9, 1878) appeared before the judgment seat of God. By a singular irony of fate, the minister Crispi, of whom Mazzini had said that he would be the last minister of the Italian monarchy, he who had vowed an implacable hatred for the papcy, was directed to announce to the Italian people that the King of Italy had died in the Quirinal palace, fortified with the sacraments of the Church.[28]

The Church in France

In all these trials of the papacy, what had been the share of responsibility of the governments of France? The Austrian government having (July 20, 1870) suggested to the French government the idea of an agreement that would be for the purpose of handing over Rome to the Italians,[29] the custodian of the seals of the imperial government, Emile Ollivier, at once declared this idea "pitiful and impractical," [30] and Napoleon III fully agreed with the view of his minister.[31] The papal government was nevertheless informed that, as France had need of all its forces in the war it had to maintain against Prussia, the Emperor saw himself in the necessity of withdrawing all his troops from Civitavecchia. Was the alleged reason the real one? In a dispatch (July 31) from the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to his ambassador at Rome, Banneville, another reason was given. Said the dispatch: "Assuredly a strategic necessity is not what prompts us to evacuate the Roman state.

[28] On Victor Emmanuel's last moments and death, see ibid., pp. 691–98.

[29] See the dispatch in Chantrel, p. 393.

[30] Ollivier, op. cit., II, 474.

[31] Ibid.

. . . But the political necessity is evident. . . . We must be reconciled to the good intentions of the Italian cabinet." [32]

Of this policy of Napoleon III we may say, once again, that it was at least dubious. Many Catholics judged it with greater severity, some murmured the words of cowardice and sacrilege. Louis Veuillot, viewing the eventualities of the war, wrote: "We have a fine army and excellent fortresses; but if we abandon Rome, and if God Himself asks, for what purpose these serve Him, France. . . ." [33]

Pius IX appeared deeply afflicted at the attitude of the French government; but his grief did not prevent him from being interested in the lot of France. On November 13, 1870, he wrote to the King of Prussia to beg him to halt the shedding of Christian blood.[34] He said: "I do not pass a single day without praying to God for France, whose image ceaselessly appears to my mind." [35] The Pontiff followed with anxiety the terrible vicissitudes of a war that set against each other the country which always showed itself the strongest defender of heresy and the nation which remained the eldest daughter of the Church: the defeats of Wissembourg, Forbach, Reischoffen, and Sedan; the fall of the empire on September 4, 1870; the successive capitulations of Strasbourg and Metz.

With tears of compassion he learned how, on December 2, his papal zouaves, authorized to fight for France under the command of their colonel, Charette, had stained with their blood and ennobled by their glory the plateau of Loigny. They had been hurled against the invader, the flag of the Sacred Heart unfurled, with cries of: "Long live France! Long live Pius IX!" [36]

In spite of the heroic resistence of the French, the German

[32] Chantrel, p. 394.
[33] François Veuillot, op. cit., p. 119.
[34] Lecanuet, op. cit., I, 90.
[35] Ibid.
[36] Cf. Baunard, Vie du général de Sonis, pp. 347–57.

army, long since prepared for the struggle, forced to give way all the armies that were opposed to it. In the north, Fraidherbe beat a retreat. In the east, Bourbaki turned toward the Swiss frontier. In the west, the army of the Loire, commanded by Chanzy, fell back before the superior forces of the armies of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg and of Prince Frederick Charles. On January 11, the German armies entered Le Mans.

Amid these sad circumstances, some children of the Pontmain parish in the diocese of Laval saw (January 17, 1871) in the air a great lady, her forehead encircled with a golden crown, at her feet the following inscription: "God will shortly hear you; my Son is moved." [37] Eleven days later the belligerent armies concluded an armistice and signed the prelimiaries of the peace.

The Paris Commune

The disasters of the war against a foreign foe were followed, unfortunately, in France, by the horrors of civil war. The causes of the Paris Commune have been discussed at great length. This explosion of revolutionary fury has been attributed to the accumulation of the working population in Paris, to the prolonged sufferings of the siege, to the formidable arming imprudently granted to the national guard. The real causes of this bloody insurrection are of a moral and religious order. In 1865 Archbishop Darboy said: "When antireligious ideas have intoxicated men's minds, all that is needed is one of the thousand accidents which fill the existence of the people for a mass of institutions to be swallowed up in a supreme collapse." [38] Bishop Pie thought the same when he saw in the atrocities committed by the Paris Commune a frightful commentary of the [37] Pastoral letter published on February 2, 1872, by Bishop Wicart of Laval.

[38] Foulon, Vie de Mgr Darboy, p. 339.

condemnations issued against revolutionary naturalism by the Vatican Council.[39]

"From the religious point of view, the only one that needs to occupy us here, the Commune has been rightly called a saturnalia of impiety."[40] The confiscation of all property called "mortmain," that is, ecclesiastical;[41] the immediate and brutal closing of the churches of Paris;[42] the famous decree of the hostages, published on April 5, ordering the arrest of any person accused of complicity with the government of Versailles and the execution of three hostages chosen by lot at the news of every execution of a prisoner of the Commune; the terrible carrying out of this hateful decree; the massacre of Archbishop Darboy and his companions on May 24, of Father Captier and his Dominican brethren on May 25, of Father Olivaint and forty-seven other victims, religious, secular priests, and laymen, on May 26 and 27: such were the principal outrages of the Commune. The union already realized by a Christian submission between the partisans of infallibility and the followers of the "Opposition," was sealed in the blood of both sides.

The terrible events of the Commune, added to the bloody lessons of the war, were the starting point of a springtime in the Catholic works of France. Two brave officers of the general staff, René de la Tour du Pin and the lieutenant of dragoons Albert de Mun, having had to take part, after the war, in the repression of the Commune, found, in the bloody scenes before their eyes, the inspiration to devote themselves thenceforth to the relief of the popular classes. From this inspiration was born the work of the Cercles catholiques d'ouvriers.[43]

[39] Cardinal Pie, Œuvres, VII, 197.

[40] Lecanuet, op. cit., I, 98.

[41] Journal officiel de la Commune, April 2, 1871, p. 133.

[42] Maxime du Camp, Les convulsions de Paris, III, 317; Fontoulieu, Les églises de Paris sous la Commune; Lecanuet, op. cit., pp. 100–5.

[43] A. de Mun, Ma vocation sociale.

Montmartre Basilica

In the month of January, 1871, during the worst days of the Prussian invasion, some Frenchmen had made a vow "to contribute, according to their means, to the erection at Paris of a church dedicated to the Sacred Heart." [44] The following October 27, Archbishop Guibert [45] encouraged the work, called thereafter the National Vow to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. On July 24, 1873, on the proposal of the minister of public worship, Jules Simon, the National Assembly, by a vote of 389 against 146, declared the public usefulness of the construction of a church at Montmartre. The Archbishop of Paris dedicated the new temple to the Heart of Jesus, and had engraved on the façade the following inscription: Sacratissimo Cordi Christi Jesu, Gallia poenitens et devota ("To the Sacred Heart of Jesus, France penitent and devoted"). To the increasing pilgrimages to Lourdes, Chartres, Paray-le-Monial, Salette, and Pontmain, were now added the pilgrimages to Montmartre.

Catholic Schools

The law of July 12, 1875, on the freedom of higher education, had in a way, crowned the great Catholic movement aroused by the events of 1870 and 1871. The first legislative bill on the freedom of higher education was deposited on the desk of the National Assembly, July 31, 1871. The urgent labors of Parliament delayed the discussion of this measure until December. The debates were sparkling and intense. All the Catholics had taken part in the campaign; but, as in 1850 on the question of secondary education, they did not all take exactly the same viewpoint. The encyclical Quanta cura and the Vatican Council had established unity in the doctrine, but they had not been able to get rid of the diversity of the tendencies. Louis Veuillot, who was suffering, was unable to take an active part in the conflict; yet he intervened to write: "I have not asked the liberals for freedom in the name of their principle. I asked it and I ask it because it is my right. And this right I do not hold from them, but from my baptism, which made me worthy of freedom and capable of it." [46] Father Alzon revived the Revue de l'enseignement chrétien, which appeared carrying as an epigraph this war cry, directed against the University: Delenda Carthago. Dupanloup employed in the fight that activity, that tactic, that ability in discussion by which, in 1850, he had succeeded in reassuring the moderate parties of the left. As he had formerly won Thiers to his cause, he won to the new project Edouard Laboulaye. Under the republic of 1848, he had appealed to the danger of socialism; under the republic of 1870, on the morrow of more disasters, he took his stand on the ground of patriotism. "Everyone, after the war, notes the gaps of the public education in France, the weakness of the higher education, the need of a scientific renewal; he declared that only freedom, with the competition, would be able to give to the faculties the needed life." [47] The bill, warmly opposed by Challemel-Lacour and Jules Ferry, was passed (July 12, 1875) with a majority of fifty votes.

[44] Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, II, 438.

[45] He succeeded Archbishop Darboy in the see of Paris.

Higher education was declared free. The departments, the communes, and the dioceses could freely open courses and faculties. For the conferring of degrees, agreement was finally reached on a compromise: the students of the free universities would have the choice of presenting themselves, for their examinations, before the faculties of the state or before a mixed

[46] François Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, p. 143.

[47] G. Weill, Histoire du catholicisme liberal en France, p. 196. The two leading organs of the Catholics which placed themselves on the same ground as Bishop Dupanloup, were the Correspondant and the Bulletin de la Société générale d'éducation.

jury, composed of professors of the state and professors of the free universities, half from each. The mixed juries were later suppressed.

Anticlericism

In the course of the debates on this important question, lively attacks were delivered by the left against Catholicism. The anticlerical opposition, in fact, was not dead, and it took advantage of all the weaknesses of the Catholic movement. The first weakness was in the persistence of the two tendencies, liberal and authoritarian, which we have already spoken of. The second weakness of the Catholics was in their split in several political parties. From different attempts of monarchical restoration, between 1871 and 1874, they emerged more divided than ever into legitimists, Orleanists, imperialists, and republicans. Lastly, the manifestations they had given in favor of the temporal power of the pope, some exaggerations of language by the journalists, some acclamation of the crowds, perhaps imprudent, exploited by the bad faith of the hostile press, made them pass, in the eyes of some people, for reckless provokers of a new war, full of risks. The freethinking committees founded new papers. The Freemason Jean Macé, director of the Ligue de l'enseignement, by the publication of numerous pamphlets pushed his rabid campaign for "the republican and lay idea." Gambetta proclaimed himself the "travelling commissioner" of anticlericalism. The République française, founded by Gambetta, the Dix-neuvième siècle, directed by About and Sarcey, the Rappel, with Vacquerie and Lockroy, daily denounced the pretended abuses of the power of the priests. Charles Renouvier, in the Critique philosophique, attacked the Catholic principles. Renan recovered his chair in the Collège de France. An effort was made to identify, in the minds of the masses, Catholicism with the conspiracy against the established government, the Republic with free thought. The Chamber elected in 1876 had a republican and anticlerical majority. In vain Marshal MacMahon, president of the Republic, attempted, by relying on the Senate, to resist the Chamber. On May 4, the Chamber, "stating that the ultramontane intrigues constituted a flagrant violation of the laws of the state, asked the government to employ the legal means at its disposal." Two weeks later Marshal MacMahon showed his intention of resisting the Chamber by nominating a conservative minister. The left feigned to see in this act a clerical inspiration. "It is a coup of the priests," exclaimed Gambetta; "it is the ministry of the curés." A flood of journals, pamphlets, and booklets, spread abroad by the Freemasonry, propagated this idea in the popular atmosphere, and won them partly. Cardinal Bonnechose wrote in his private journal: "The great mass of the citizens imagines that the triumph of the present government will lead to despotism and a foreign war." [48] Moreover, the elections of October 14–28, 1877, gave a strong majority to the left. Evidently the Chamber would triumph sooner or later over the Senate and the President. "Everything will then be ready," wrote the Rappel, "to start the great reforms." [49] "The great reforms" were the open strife against Catholicism under the direction of a man whose influence continued to grow, Léon Gambetta.

[48] Besson, Vie du cardinal de Bonnechose, II, 234.
[49] Le Rappel, December 24, 1877.

CHAPTER XXXIX

The Church in Other Countries

Germany

DURING the last of the crises we have just related, about the middle of September, 1877, Pius IX, receiving some French pilgrims, ended his fatherly address with this prayer: "O my God, I recommend France to Thee." [1] But France was not the greatest object of his anxieties. From 1870 to 1877, Germany, led by Bismarck, had directed against Catholicism attacks no less violent and more to be dreaded than those which Gambetta was meditating.

The story is told that Bismarck, when receiving at Reims (September 10, 1870) the deputy Werlé, former mayor of that city, said to him: "The Latin races have had their time. . . . A single element of force is left to them, that is religion; when we get the best of Catholicism, they will soon disappear." [2] The surest means of getting the best of Catholicism in the Latin races was to harass it everywhere, even in the Germanic nations. It was harassed in Germany. The tactics employed during the Franco-German war were most insidious. "If we succeeded in making people believe that the Catholic priests were wishing for the defeat of Germany, then in establishing that the German victories were the victories of Protestantism, we would then need only a few votes to put the Catholics outside the law. Then the remarks of the priests were spied on; and the spies, worn out, finally invented them. They said that the priests had prayers said for the victory of the French." And again, "reckless questions were asked: German and Protestant, barbarian and Catholic, became synonymous terms." When, in 1870, the Catholics of Germany organized pilgrimages to Beuron, Fulda, even to Rome, Bismarck showed his displeasure.[3]

[1] The Univers, September 13, 1877.

[2] Mme Edmond Adam, Après l'abandon de la revanche, p. 396. Cf. Diancourt, Les Allemands à Reims.

The Center Party

Toward the end of that same year, when the sixty Catholics elected to the Prussian Landtag formed themselves into a group under the name of "Center, Party of the Constitution," although the leaders of the group, the two Reichensperger brothers and Savigny, were loyal servants of the monarchy, the Gazette générale d'Augsbourg wrote: "A lost battle on the Loire would be a lesser evil." [4] The better to fight Catholicism, Bismarck for a moment had the idea of organizing the "Old Catholics" into a national Church; but he was soon convinced that no real strength was there. The people never let themselves be drawn into that current; the "Old Catholic" Church never amounted to more than a "Church of professors"; Bismarck, with his political sense, said to himself that as a fact of religious movement, three hundred peasants living their faith counted for more than a dozen professors spouting in their chairs.

The Kulturkampf

Following the victory of Prussia over France, on the morrow of the establishment of the empire of Germany to the advantage of William I, Bismarck thought of the Kulturkampf. Baron von Beust wrote in his Memoirs: "In 1871 Prince Bismarck announced to me at Gastein the Kulturkampf even in the smallest details."

[3] Goyau, Bismarck et l'Eglise, I, 41, 69, 71.
[4] Ibid., I, 80.

What are we to understand by this word "Kulturkampf," which is heard in all discussions about the internal politics of Germany? This term, meaning "fight for culture," or "fight for civilization," does not sufficiently specify what it is about. We reach a greater exactness if we remember that, for Bismarck, the whole movement of the world goes back to two cultures or civilizations: the Germanic culture, which takes its inspiration from Luther, and the Latin culture, which comes from Roman Catholicism. The Kulturkampf is, then, the great duel of Germanism against Romanism.[5]

A moderate Berlin newspaper, the Kreuz Zeitung, gave the signal of attack in a much publicized article, on June 22, 1871. Later it was known that Bismarck furnished the ideas of the article, and even corrected the proofs.[6]

Actions followed the words. On July 8, 1871, was suppressed by administrative measure, the Catholic section in the ministry of worship. Once this first step had been taken, the measures of violence followed one another in rapid succession. The first persecuting law was passed by the Reichstag. It permitted the courts to condemn to the penalty of prison the priests who "abused the use of the pulpit to endanger the public peace."[7] Under this expression, the broadest path was open for arbitrary action.

The second persecuting law came from the Prussian Landtag. But, Bismarck, when presenting it, meant that it should become a law for all Germany. The object of this law was the scholastic organization. After the creation of the Empire, the [5] At times the Kulturkampf appeared to be the strife against the Center Party, or the struggle against the Constitution of 1850; but we see that at bottom the whole thing amounts to the battle against Romanism.

[6] Kannengieser, Catholiques allemands, p. 25.

[7] Cf. Chantrel, op. cit., p. 596; Goyau, op. cit., p. 209.

question considered was to train the minds in the school as bodies are trained in barracks. On November 19, 1871, the minister laid on the desk of the Chambers a bill that made the state absolute master of the school. The state arrogated to itself the right of teaching the catechism as well as calculus and spelling.[8]

Ludwig Windthorst

He who was already called "the little Excellency" was of very small stature. With his enormous head, his little searching eyes, and his features divided by a wide mouth, which the least outburst of laughter opened wide, you would have thought him a living caricature taken from some drawing of Callot. He was born on January 17, 1812, in Saxon territory, of a peasant lawyer, who engaged in farming and at the same time in the practice of law. Ludwig Windthorst, like his father, at first was a lawyer. In 1837, the persecutions against the illustrious Archbishop of Cologne aroused his deep indignation. The Machiavellian policy of the Prussian bureaucracy, which he himself witnessed, left in him memories that obssessed him throughout his life. He entered the Hanover parliament in 1848 and soon held an important place there. In 1851 the King entrusted to him the ministry of justice. In 1870 he thought, like Ketteler, that the defeat of France would favor the development of Catholicism in Germany. His disillusion was profound. He did not cease loving his German fatherland; but, having entered the Landtag, he there presently became one of the most active orators of the Catholic Center, which purposed, while remaining on constitutional grounds, to defend the Church against every encroachment of the civil power.

He who would become the unquestioned leader of the Catholic Center in the Reichstag had none of that broad and sonorous eloquence which in France was then admired in a Montalembert or a Berryer. Nor was he a strict logician, deducing from a solidly established principle consequences rigidly reasoned. More a debater than an orator, more a strategist than a dialectician, his interventions in a debate were maneuvers. Opponents feared his catchy sayings, his spiritual repartees, his allusions that touched the sensitive point. He was one of the greatest interrupters of the German parliament; but his adversaries interrupted him as little as possible; for they knew that, instead of disconcerting him, on the contrary they but aroused the sharpness of his repartees.[9]

[8] The law was passed on March 11, 1872, after a most lively discussion. It was the occasion of the first big oratorical duel between the Iron Chancellor and a deputy from Hanover, until then little known outside of his little native district, Ludwig Windthorst.

From that first great debate, Windthorst revealed himself with all his qualities of warmth and of wonderful fitness. The materialist Virchow, the jurist Gneist, the radical Lasker, and the sectarian minister Falk tried to prove that all the parts of the parliament ought to be welded together to defend the state against the enterprises of an external enemy, the Church. The state, the interests of the state, the defense of the state: such were the words incessantly recurring on the lips of the speakers. Windthorst, in his little piping voice, but who was manifestly implacable, kept asking: "This state, on what principle does it rest? Is it on the monarchical principle, hitherto respected? Is it on an inverse principle, lately discovered by the Chancellor?" This was to make a gap in the majority which Bismarck had composed at such pains, even to make Bismarck appear as against the King himself. The Hanover deputy continued his speech, full of disagreeable allusions, of personalities remotely alluded to. One said that, on hearing him, the Chancellor almost lost the assurance from which he so rarely departed. When he rose to reply, he did so to escape by outrage, by violent and excessive invective, from the prying questions of the [9] Guizot, who had observed him, said: "He is the outstanding disputer of our time."

Catholic deputy. He declared that the clergy had more at heart the interests of the Catholic religion than the development of the German Empire; he tried to embroil Windthorst with the Center, by representing him as a compromising speaker. The law was passed with a majority of fifty-two votes; but Bismarck understood that now he would have to fight against a power which, at each encroachment on the rights of the Church, would rise up and confront him.

On May 15, 1872, in the open Reichstag, Bismarck once again had to measure himself with Windthorst. As in the Prussian Landtag, the Catholic deputies of the Reichstag (the parliament of the Empire) were united in a group known as the Center, and the Hanover deputy had soon won the first place. A bill called for the expulsion of the Jesuits from all Germany. Following his usual tactics, Windthorst disclosed the secret aim of the Chancellor. He said: "I perceive your design. Along with Döllinger you have tried to found a national Church. You failed. But you now take up a more contemptible project: you wish to separate the German Catholics from the Holy See in order to subject them to the knout of your police." The democrats and some progressives voted with the Center; but the law exiling the Jesuits was passed by 183 votes against 101, and was published on July 4, 1872.[10]

The May Laws

How rightly Windthorst had been! The events were not slow in showing. In 1872, Bismarck was preparing that Civil Constitution of the clergy of Germany, so sadly famous under the name of the May Laws. It was known that the Iron Chancellor was mightily aided in this preparation by the Freemasonry. Says Georges Goyau: "William I was a devoted and practicing Mason; a Mason who, if we are to believe Bismarck, gladly protected, in their careers as officeholders, certain of his brother Masons." [11] All evidence indicates that his minister Falk, main author of the May Laws, was, in his campaign, the spokesman of the lodges and the one who carried out their designs. Moreover, the Masonic press of Germany, as illustrated by the Herault Rhenan of October 25, 1873, gloried in saying: "We believe we can rightly declare that it is the spirit of Freemasonry that, in the last proceedings which it directed against ultramontanism, pronounced the sentence." [12] A few days later the Freimaurer Zeitung, following an exchange of letters between Pope Pius IX and Emperor William, published the following lines: "When confronting each other are two antagonists: the Emperor, who, as a Freemason, esteems and protects the order, and the Pope, who curses it, Freemasonry must place itself on the side where it is understood and loved." [13]

[10] Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, pp. 649–58.

The May Laws, so called because they were nearly all passed in May, 1873, May, 1874, and May, 1875, have been justly compared as a whole to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy passed in 1790 by the French Constituent Assembly. The four laws published on May 15, 1873, concerned the education of the clergy, ecclesiastical discipline, and the intervention of the state in the appointment of all the pastors. In vain was it remarked that these laws were in explicit contradiction to two articles of the Constitution: article 15, which recognized "to the evangelical and Roman Catholic Churches the right to administer themselves," and article 18, which likewise recognized "the right to name and confirm the appointments to ecclesiastical offices." The Chancellor insolently replied that articles 15 and 18 of the Constitution did not consecrate a fundamental freedom, but only a modus vivendi, conceded to the Church by the [11] Goyau, op. cit., I, 116. Cf. Kohut, Die Hohenzollern und die Freimaurerei, pp. 125–89; Bismarck, Gedanken und Erinnerungen, I, 204.

[12] Quoted by Deschamps, Les sociétés secrètes et la société, II, 413.

[13] Ibid., II, 414.

state, and that the state remained master to modify them at its pleasure.[14]

In 1874 the laws of May 11, 1873, were supplemented by three new laws (May 4, 20, and 21). A law of May 4, called the law of banishment, permitted the courts to condemn to prison and even to exile the priests deprived of their office by the government if they exercised any ecclesiastical functions. The law of May 20 attributed to the state exorbitant rights over the vacant Catholic bishoprics. That of May 21 regulated, in an arbitrary and tyrannical manner, the appointing of the clergy.[15] Lastly, in 1875, a law of April 22, suppressing ecclesiastical salaries in Prussia, and a law of May 31, ordering the dispersion of all the religious orders, except those vowed to the care of the sick, and granting to the king the right to suppress these latter, by way of special ordinance, topped the persecution.

In the discussion of these different laws, the leaders of the Center, particularly Windthorst, although certain of the final vote, step by step defended the rights of the Church. In the middle of the debates on the laws of May, 1873, Windthorst declared: "As I well know, many of you would desire to see us Catholics employ illegal means of resistance. Very well, we will not employ them. But a passive resistance exists, fully justified. This we must practice, and we will. Against it, sooner or later, all your schemes will be broken." In 1874 he said: "You wish to take our priests from us, and you think you can send us false priests. What a mistake you are making! Do you wish to annoy our feelings? So be it! But you will not snatch the faith from our souls. Take our churches; we will pray at home. Drive away our priests; we will pray by ourselves."

[14] Bismarck's speech of March 10, 1873. On the May Laws of 1873, see Goyau, op. cit., I, 308–408. See a summary of these laws in Chantrel, p. 274.

[15] See the complete texts of these laws in Chantrel, pp. 274–78. The text of all the May Laws will be found in Lefebvre de Béhaine, Léon XIII et Bismarck, pp. 227–49.

Courage of the Catholics

The attitude of the Catholics measured up to this proud language. "In an admirable spirit, faithful and clergy, resolved not to let themselves be absorbed by Protestantism, decided to resist even to martyrdom. Out of thousands of priests, scarcely a dozen were willing to become 'state pastors.' As for the people, the persecution awakened and enlivened their faith. The episcopate and the clergy regarded the May Laws as null, and opposed a formal non possumus to the claims of the state. The result was slow in coming. All the seminaries were closed; the convents, too. Some bishops were cast into prison. On February 3, 1873, Cardinal Ledochowski, archbishop of Psenn, was brutally arrested and underwent a harsh detention of more than two years. On March 7, the venerable Bishop Eberhardt of Treves followed the same path and had the glory of dying on a wretched prison cot, after receiving ill usage. On March 31, it was the turn of Archbishop Melchers of Cologne, who left the hands of the jailer only to take the road of exile.

"The calm and unexcited resistance exasperated the government. The bishops remained unshakable, like the confessors of the faith in the early times of Christianity. The auxiliary bishop of Posen, Janiszewski, had taken in hand the administration of the diocese when Cardinal Ledochowski was snatched from his flock. He was arrested on July 27. Eight days later the Bishop of Paderborn was also cast into prison. Then, March 18, 1874, the same lot befell the bishop of Munster, and, on October 19 the auxiliary bishop of Gnesen, Cybichowski. Hundreds of priests were imprisoned, banished, despoiled of their possessions, reduced to starvation and wretchedness. The violent persecution lasted beyond seven years. The effect was quite the opposite to what its promoters expected. It steeled the German Catholics and was the cement that gave the Center that cohesion by which it became, in spite of its disparate elements, the strongest party of the Reichstag. At the elections of 1871, the Catholics had sent 57 deputies to the parliament. At the close of the Kulturkampf, Windthorst had at his disposal a force three times as great. In Germany was produced that strange phenomenon, that the proportion of the Catholic deputies was greater than that of the Catholic population." [16]

The prince chancellor found that his minister of worship had exercised decidedly too much zeal. On July 3, 1879, the too famous Falk had to hand in his resignation. On the other hand, the Prussian government felt itself invaded by socialism; it needed new supports. In a famous speech, Bismarck said: "The battle for civilization has deprived me of the natural help of the conservative party. But I do not persist the conflicts for durable institutions. The conflicts cease as soon as one has begun to recognize himself in common works." [17] Yet this was not the end of the Kulturkampf, but the prelude of a comparative peace.

Switzerland

If any fact today is proved by history, it is that Bismarck, in carrying on the Kulturkampf in Germany, never lost sight

[16] Kannengieser, op. cit., pp. 30–32. "Moreover, the Catholics were not alone in taking alarm. The practical Protestants, notably the conservatives, had perceived that, behind Catholicism, all Christianity was aimed at. In fact, what were the campaign against the denominational school and the campaign in favor of civil marriage if not two attempts against denominationalism, Protestant or Catholic, and consequently against Christianity itself? Bismarck, on January 1, 1872, declared: 'The Lutheran pastors are not worth any more than the Catholics.' Quite rightly, then, the Protestant deputy Bruel, apropos of the laws on school inspection, declared the danger to which they exposed both denominations. Clearly he declared: 'It is a pagan law; it depends on the pagan idea of the state-God.' A Christian Bismarck was, after a fashion, not wishing to be inconvenienced by God, but fortified by Him for the service of the state. With the Chancellor, Christianity took the form of Germanism.'" Paul Gaultier, "Le Germanisme contre le Christianisme," in the Correspondant, May 25, 1917, p. 738.

[17] Chantrel p. 798.

of the work of an international Kulturkampf. "He alone it was," wrote the historian of the Allemagne religieuse, "who, at certain times, made an effort to acclimate throughout Europe the idea of a universal war on Rome, and to force this idea on different sovereignties." [18] Nowhere was the Chancellor's plan more fully realized than in Switzerland. "In fact, we can note more than one coincidence between the May Laws issued at Berlin and the open war on Catholics by the governments of Berne and Geneva. No one can be blind to this fact." [19]

By the legendary valor with which its sons defended the independence of their country against the foreigner and by their devoted attachment to their political and religious liberties, Switzerland merits its renown of "the classical land of liberty." But, on the religious plane, nowhere, since Calvin, did Protestantism show itself more intolerant. The federal pact of 1815, in a most formal manner stipulating respect for Catholic institutions, seemed to have put an end to those traditions of religious tyranny. We have seen above how, in 1819, the old Huguenot animosity revived. In 1870, after Prussia's victory, which was looked on as that of Protestantism over Catholicism, and under Germanic influences, which can easily be traced, the spirit of persecution broke out. "At Geneva they were ready. The plan of campaign had been worked out at leisure. On October 23, 1871, the government announced to the Great Council, that is, the Chamber of Deputies, the proximate filing of a bill on the fabrics, "which would have as a result to democratize the Catholic Church." [20]

On this occasion Carteret, president of the Council of State (head of the executive power) spoke these famous words: "What we need is that the Catholic Church should be gone with the cane and the beggar's wallet." Upon reaching to [18] Goyau, Bismarck et l'Eglise, I, 22. Cf. Gaultier, loc. cit.

[19] Burnichon, in Etudes, February 20, 1868, p. 437.
[20] Ibid., p. 442.

power, this man had declared that he had a commission, that of fighting the "denominational agitations." When we recall that, since the beginning of the century, Switzerland was the gathering place of the secret societies, we can surmise, with considerable probability, whence his commission could have come from; and when we study its phrases, we may conclude with certainty that he received it from Germany.

The first blows were delivered against the religious congregations. A law of February 3, 1872, obliged them to ask authorization from the state. A few months later (June 29, 1872) the government issued a decree of expulsion against the Brothers of the Christian Schools, forbade the Daughters of Charity to teach, and forbade all religious communities to receive new members. These first measures were but the prelude of a more sensational feat.

Bishop Mermillod

On September 25, 1854, Pius IX, already the restorer of the Catholic hierarchy in England and Holland, desiring to supplement his work by the revival of the see of St. Francis de Sales, had named, as auxiliary to Bishop Marilley, for the canton of Geneva, a young priest, already celebrated by the sermons he had given at Turin, Vienne, Paris, and Rome. His name was Gaspard Mermillod. He was born in a humble Christian family in the town of Carouge, near Geneva, and from 1847 to 1857 was a curate of the parish of Notre Dame in Geneva; for the next four years he was administrator of that same parish. When conferring on him the sacred character of the episcopate, the Sovereign Pontiff addressed these words to him: "Go, ascend the see of St. Francis de Sales; go to that Geneva which even calls itself the Protestant Rome, and convert it." [21]

[21] Chantrel, p. 681.

Such an exhortation caused a lively emotion among the Protestants of Switzerland and of the whole world. The "Protestant triangle" (Berlin, London, Geneva), already imperiled at London by the Oxford movement, was it going to receive a new assault at Geneva? The new prelate was not only an eloquent speaker; he was a man of action, a fighter. From the outset of his ministry, during the period of his curateship at Notre Dame in Geneva, he was actively occupied with works of the press and showed that he was a tireless controversialist. In 1851 he joined a group of priests, constituted into an association, to evangelize the canton of Geneva. In 1852 he founded a monthly review, the Annales catholiques de Genève, intended especially for the controversy with the Protestants.[22] At the same time he visited the big cities of Europe, begging for his works. Returning to Geneva, he there built churches and schools with the fruits of his begging. In 1867 at Geneva he created a weekly journal, since then become a daily, the Courrier de Genève, to stimulate the Catholics in the struggle. After the taking of Rome (September 20, 1870), he was one of the first to condemn the entrance of the Piedmont troops into the Eternal City. He declared: "Pius IX is a prisoner in the Vatican, and Europe remains silent! . . . Would we have believed that our proud age would witness such ignominies?" [23] During the Franco-German war he organized, along with the cooperation of several Catholic publicists of different countries, the Correspondance de Genève, which for more than two years was the most widespread international organ for the defense of the Holy See.

The new prelate did not hide his great plans. He even pursued them with an earnestness that no one found untimely. On October 30, 1864, when taking possession of the church of Notre Dame, he declared: "I am going to walk on hot coals; but I naturally like plain and clear situations. . . . The Holy Father was able, at a single stroke, to create a bishopric of Geneva, to revive the ancient diocese. He could do this in virtue of the treaties of 1815; he could do it by virtue of the federal and cantonal laws which guaranteed freedom of worship. By his discretion Pius IX has created only an auxiliary bishop. I am without a salary, without an episcopal residence; but when I have nothing more to give, I will take the pilgrim's staff, I will go and beg in the great cathedrals of Europe." [24] The same day all the curés of the canton read in the pulpit a pastoral letter on the subject of the election of deputies to the Great Council.

[22] Dom Grospellier, Introduction aux œuvres du cardinal Mermillod, p. 10.
[23] Chantrel, p. 682.

The promotion of Father Mermillod to the episcopacy had been officially notified to the Council of State, which registered it without protest; and, for seven years, the authorities of the Helvetic Republic raised no objection to the state of things. But the irritation produced in the Protestant circles by Bishop Mermillod's ceaseless activity increased visibly. In June, 1872, when the prelate appointed a priest to a country parish and notified the government, the latter affected to ignore this notification, and addressed directly the actual ordinary of the diocese, Bishop Marilley, who was residing at Fribourg. He was asked whether the appointment had been made by his order or at least with his approval. Bishop Marilley did not see the trap. The prelate kept in a corner of his heart a drop of bitterness for the dividing of his diocese. He made the mistake of letting the Geneva magistrates see this. He declared to them that, at the request of the Supreme Pontiff, he had turned over to Bishop Mermillod the entire spiritual administration of the Catholics of their canton. Further, he saw no difficulties in the appointment made by his auxiliary.

"This letter, interpreted maliciously, became, in the hands of the Council of State and its chief, a manifest proof of the underground machinations of the curia and Bishop Mermillod. So, they said, it was indeed the see of Geneva that one wished to establish on the sly. Everything was allowable for the repression of such a move. On August 30, an order of the government forbade Bishop Mermillod to perform any episcopal act. A few days later, a decree of the Council of State deprived the prelate of his offices of curé and of vicar general; another decree forbade the priests of the canton to have any hierarchical relations with him. An open war was thus begun." [25] Monsignor Agnozzi, the Holy See's nuncio at Berne, vainly proposed to the Geneva Council of State that they confer with a view to an accord. The Supreme Pontiff then decided to subject the Christian Church of Geneva under the regime of the infidel countries by appointing Bishop Mermillod vicar apostolic. This appointment was the subject of a brief of January 16, 1873.

[24] D'Agrigente, Le cardinal Mermillod, p. 28.

At this news, President Carteret was furious. For a second time he called upon Bishop Mermillod to renounce every ecclesiastical duty and, upon the Bishop's refusal (February 11, 1873), he had him arrested by the police who seized him in his apartment, put him in a carriage, and brought him to the frontier. A decree of the Council of State forbade him to set foot on Swiss territory.[26]

"Bishop Mermillod established his residence in that village of Ferney which had been made famous by the residence there of Voltaire. There the Bishop passed ten years. If he could not go to Geneva, Geneva would go to him. And Geneva did go to him. Furthermore, nothing prevented him from visiting the territory confided to his pastoral care. The canton of Geneva, formed of two narrow strips along the end of Lake Leman and then along the Rhone, is like a corner thrust in the land of France. Without leaving French territory, the vicar apostolic could see all the church towers, could make his voice heard by the peoples who thronged to the frontier at his passing along, could administer confirmation, in a word, fulfill a ministry which the persecution rendered more striking and fruitful." [27]

[25] Burnichon, in Etudes, LXXIV, 446.

[26] The details of this arrest and this expulsion will be found in Chantrel, p. 777.

What was the Council of State going to do by way of revenge? In the German Reichstag, the minister Falk filed (January 8, 1873) his famous bills of persecution. President Carteret found nothing better to do than follow in Falk's footsteps. A short time after this, the Temps wrote: "The Swiss Republic might imitate the system of her great sister of the Atlantic; she preferred to imitate Germany and make laws of warfare." On February 19 the Great Council passed a bill of reorganization of the Catholic Church. On May 30, Switzerland had its law of the organization of the Catholic Church, as France had had its Civil Constitution of the Clergy, as Germany had its May Laws, as Austria would have its denominational laws. Following the ordinary procedure, articles 1 and 2 guaranteed "liberty of conscience" and the "free exercise of worship." But article 6 declared that to the Grand Council belongs the right "to suppress parishes or to create new ones"; article 19, that "the surveillance of the religious life and the divine service" belonged to the jurisdiction of the parish councils; articles 25 and 26, that "to be part of the clergy, the Catholic priest would have to request this of the executive council." Articles 29 to 33 regulated the election of the curés by the parish assembly by a majority of votes, and article 48 subjected all instructions and ordinances of the ecclesiastical authority to the placet of the state.[28]

Swiss National Catholic Church

For that "National Catholic Church" priests were needed. To the honor of the Geneva clergy, not a single defection took place in its ranks. Appeal was made to apostates from the outside. A former Carmelite offered himself (October 12, 1873) to the votes of the electors for the parish of Geneva, and he was elected, with two assistants; but less than a year later, unable to tolerate the encumbering tutelage of the lay committee which, conformable to the law, assumed the right to watch over his administration, the wretched intruder resigned from his office, declaring (August 4, 1874) that the so-called liberal and Catholic Church of Geneva appeared to him "neither liberal in politics nor Catholic in religion." Intruders of lesser worth were satisfied with the conditions imposed on them.

[27] Burnichon, op. cit., p. 449.

[28] Chantrel, p. 30.

For the "National Catholic Church" religious edifices were needed. The new law had declared that every religious edifice would belong by right "to the worship salaried by the state." Consequently the government laid hands on all the Catholic churches, chapels, and rectories. In some places the faithful, despoiled, protested. Many of them were condemned to fine or imprisonment.

In fact, the clergy as well as the faithful, greatly encouraged by their first shepherd, did not let themselves be disheartened by the persecution. They met in sheds and barns, which they transformed into chapels. By a singular irony, where the hand of Providence could be seen, when the Masonic temple of Geneva was put up for sale by a court order, some Catholics acquired it, and the meeting place of the lodges became the church of the Sacred Heart.

In 1879 the "National Catholic Church" was in full decline,[29] and Catholicism at Geneva showed a powerful vitality. If Bismarck had counted on the success of the schism in Switzerland to consolidate his work in Germany, he found himself singularly deceived.[30]

[29] See the Revue des Deux Mondes, 1879, XXXVI, 705.

[30] On this question several interesting documents will be found in an anonymous work entitled Histoire de la persécution religieuse à Genève, essay d'un schisme d'Etat. Cf. Marchal, Les Réformateurs de Genève.

Austria

In his scheme of an international Kulturkampf, the German chancellor not only sought auxiliaries in Switzerland; he had anticipated the concourse of Austria. In the course of his strife with the Church, till then he had not had a better auxiliary than his Austrian colleague, Chancellor von Beust. At the moment when the schema De Ecclesia, including the definition of papal infallibility, was under discussion, in full council the prime minister of Emperor Francis Joseph protested with a haughty brutality that forecast the worst deeds of violence. He said (February 10, 1871), in a dispatch to Count von Trauttmansdorff: "The attitude taken by an imposing minority, in which we are happy to see the most illustrious names of the Austro-Hungarian episcopacy, permits us to believe in a final result more in conformity with our wishes. . . . The imperial and royal government reserves to itself the right to ban the publication of any act harmful to the majesty of the law, and any person infringing such a defense will be held responsible for his conduct before the justice of the country. . . . Please call to the attention of the Cardinal Secretary of State the principles of the application from which His imperial, royal and apostolic Majesty cannot deviate." [31]

This letter was not an empty threat. After the definition of the infallibility, the ministers of His Majesty declared that "the infallible pope was not the pope with which Austria had concluded a concordat and that the bishops henceforth would not be the prelates to whom the concordat had accorded certain rights." In consequence of this declaration, which was published in the Gazette officielle of Vienna, the Emperor addressed the following letter to the minister of worship: "Dear minister Stremayr: As the convention concluded at Vienna on [31] Chantrel, p. 281.

August 18, 1855, with His Holiness Pope Pius IX has been nullified in consequence of the recent declaration of the Holy See, . . . I urge you to prepare the bills that will be needed with a view to regulating the relations of the Catholic Church with my empire, conformable to the fundamental laws and considering the conditions indicated by history. Vienna, July 30, 1870. Francis Joseph."

This denunciation of the concordat did not, indeed, introduce any greatly marked modification in the situation of the Catholics in the Austrian Empire. For a long time the clauses of the concordat favorable to the Church had gradually become a dead letter.

After the outrage of September 20, 1870, against the temporal sovereignty of the pope, the Austrian bishops tried to bring about a complete change of policy of the court of Vienna, by appealing to the religious sentiments publicly professed by the Emperor. They sent him an address in which they begged him to take the initiative of a step to the European states, with a view of requiring from the Italian government at least some serious guaranties of independence for the Holy See. Francis Joseph, as constitutional sovereign, judged that he could not himself reply to this address; this task he left to his prime minister, and von Beust informed the bishops that the government did not favorably receive their request, as "no change could take place in its policy."

In October, 1871, the city of Vienna having granted the use of a public chapel to a rebellious priest, Louis Anton, who professed membership in the "Old Catholic" Church, Cardinal Rauscher, archbishop of Vienna, addressed a complaint to Jirecek, the minister of worship. Jirecek replied that the concession by the Vienna municipality of the St. Savior chapel was not contrary to the fundamental laws of the Empire; then, on the Cardinal's solicitation, as the conflict was of a purely ecclesiastical nature, the government was not qualified to make a decision. The Cardinal at once counteracted that sophism: "I have not begged Your Excellency," he replied, "to decide the question, but to defend the Catholic Church against a manifestly unjust usurpation. . . . Louis Anton has never been authorized by the ecclesiastical authority to perform acts of the sacred ministry in the diocese of Vienna; and the government well knows that it would not be able to confer such an authorization on him. Is it that henceforth a handful of factious men, by merely taking the name of religious society, will be able to seize churches and rectories and drive out the lawful possessors?" [32] The minister refused to admit that he was wrong; but an interdict, pronounced by the archbishop on the St. Savior chapel, was obeyed by the faithful and put an end to the scandal.

The suppression of two dioceses of Dalmatia, those of Sebenico and of Cattaro, requested by the Reichsrath toward the end of 1871, was a new assault against the evident rights of the ecclesiastical authority. The Archbishop of Zara, in a long memorial published on March 24, 1872, readily showed that the suppression of a diocese could take place only by the authority of the Holy See, and that the reasons advanced for this suppression were vain. This time the Emperor yielded to the reasons adduced by the prelate and promised not to follow up the measure asked for by the Parliament.

The rapprochement which occurred in 1872 between the court of Vienna and the court of the Quirinal was also a sad surprise for the Catholics. Not only did Emperor Francis Joseph accredit an ambassador to King Victor Emmanuel, but he ordered his representative, Count von Wimpffen, to present him with a rich gift which, in the circumstances, seemed to be a congratulation given to the sacrilegious usurper of Rome.[33]

[32] Ibid., p. 588.
[33] Ibid., p. 637.

The School Laws

The most fatal blows that the Church had to stand in the Austrian Empire were delivered to her by the educational laws and regulations. The simple enumeration of these legal provisions will be enough to convey the gravity of the evil.

On January 16, 1869, the minister of public instruction, Hosner, considering that "the education of the clergy is not something indifferent to the state," subjected to the control of the government the certificates of studies furnished by the diocesan minor seminaries. On March 1, 1869, an ordinance of the same minister took from the bishops the supervision of the Catholic schools and confided it to inspectors appointed by the governors of the provinces. The bishops would henceforth retain only the supervision of the religious instruction. In the presence of the situation confronting it, the Austrian episcopacy with one accord decided that "the clergy would accept the part which the new legislation left them in the school so long as these schools would remain faithful to the Christian spirit, but would withdraw as soon as the schools should become hostile." This firm protest did not stop the sectarian hatred of minister Hosner, who, at the sessions of April 22, and 23, had discussed and passed by the Austrian Reichsrath a law more tyrannical than all that had preceded. Resting on this pretended principle, that the education of youth belongs exclusively to the state, he restricted and regulated the action of the Church, even in religious instruction. The time fixed for the teaching of religion was reduced; the priests could not put themselves into relation with the schoolmasters except through the mediation of the inspectors appointed by the state; they were rigorously excluded from the normal schools. The very day after the passing of this law, Emperor Francis Joseph, opening the Hungarian Diet, showed himself not yet satisfied. He regretted that the teaching force was in a deplorable situation in consequence of the revolution that had driven out the German professors; he said: "The mission of the Hungarian Diet was to break with the traditions of the past contrary to the progress called for by the present times." On the following June 5, Bishop Rudigier of Linz, arrested for having protested against the school laws in a pastoral letter, was condemned to an imprisonment of fifteen days. The Emperor, in the presence of the agitation which this judgment stirred up among the people, granted pardon to the prelate, but the sectarian spirit continued its work.

On July 27, 1873, it attacked the universities. Those venerable institutions, works of the Church, founded by it out of its own funds, were placed in the hands of the state. The bishops were excluded from the part they had in the administration, and faculties of Protestant theology were admitted on the same footing as the faculties of Catholic theology, and even more, with a favor which they made no attempt to hide. In the House of Lords, Cardinal Rauscher voiced an eloquent protest, saying: To secularize the universities is to tear the best attire of Austria, which will fall into shreds at the first European crisis. But the Josephist poison had too deeply entered into the traditions of the court of Vienna for it to pay attention to his just criticisms. On March 5, 1874, a thoroughgoing revision of the ecclesiastical civil legislation was presented to the Chambers by the Austrian imperial cabinet. Article 1 declared that "the religious prescriptions had force only within the limits of the laws of the state." The other articles, regulating the action of the Church in a large number of its more or less important acts, sometimes of trifling interest in relation to the state, were corollaries of this principle. This series of prescriptions was called the "confessional laws." When the Austrian bishops drew up energetic protests, Pius IX. sent them (April 25, 1874) his felicitations for having fought the detestable principles of these laws. The next year, the Pontiff again had in his heart the pain caused him by the attitude of one who, in his official acts, always gave himself the titles of "imperial, royal, and apostolic Majesty." In an allocution of March 11, 1875, the Pope spoke of "those Catholic governments which surpass the Protestant governments in the shameful scope of religious oppression." He added: "God will cry out to the Protestant persecutor: You have sinned and sinned gravely. But to the Catholic persecutor, He will say: You have sinned still more gravely." [34]

Spain

These words of the Pope, having Austria directly in mind, applied also to another Catholic country, Spain. The provisional government constituted in Spain under the presidency of Marshal Serrano after the revolution of September, 1868, promised freedom of worship as a peremptory need of the time, as a measure of security against difficult eventualities, as a means offered to Catholicism to strengthen itself in the struggle. Such were, in fact, the expressions employed in the proclamation of October 25 of that year. The first results of that proclamation were scenes of disturbance and violence, which occurred with cries of: "Death to the pope! Death to the priests!" and which came near to bringing about the burning of the palace of the nunciature at Madrid. In the course of the discussions of the Constitution, which took place in April and May of 1869, freethinking deputies delivered speeches full of blasphemies and outrages against Catholicism. The proclamation of freedom of worship by the Constitution of June 6, 1869, did but aggravate the situation. You would have said that, by these words about freedom of worship, the people meant only freedom to outrage the Catholic Church.

[34] For these details on the school laws, see ibid., pp. 26, 72, 79, 111, 113, 134, 147, 754.

That same Constitution, which so unhappily regulated religious questions, declared the re-establishment of the monarchy. What was that monarchy going to be? If France was not opposed to the arrangement that called a Hohenzollern to the throne of Spain, the kingdom would have been governed by a lieutenant of Prince Bismarck. In the midst of the Franco-German war, the provisional government of Madrid turned to the house of Savoy, whose troops had just entered Rome, and proposed the second son of Victor Emmanuel. He was elected by the Cortes and took the name of Amedeus I. In a circular addressed to the diplomatic corp by the minister of state of the new king, he said that the new government "greatly desired to establish with the Holy See relations as cordial as those existing between the Holy Father and the nations that realized civil reforms similar to the recent reforms of the Spanish nation."

So vague a declaration could not lead to religious peace. On June 18, 1871, on the occasion of the feasts celebrated by the Catholics of Madrid in honor of the Pope, who had just reached the twenty-fifth year of his pontificate, tumultuous bands paraded through the city, crying out: "Death to the pope! Death to the pope! Long live liberty!" A few days after this, in the course of an interpellation made in the Chamber by a Catholic deputy, Martos, one of the ministers, declared that the pope's encyclicals needed, for publication in Spain, the royal exequatur. A short time later a decree of January 11, 1872, declared that the state no longer recognized any civil and legal effect for the religious acts and especially for canonical marriage. On March 25 a royal memorandum enacted that every dispensation, every indult, and in general every apostolic favor could be obtained only through the intermediary of a general bureau dependent on the minister of state.

Alphonse XII

Meanwhile the state, failing in its most explicit promises and most established obligations, neglected, under pretext of financial straits, to pay the clergy the salaries fixed by the Constitution of June 6, 1869. The Spanish episcopate, in a petition (October 22, 1872), said: "For almost two years and a half the clergy has not received anything at all of what is due it." The abdication of King Amedeus and the proclamation of the Spanish Republic by the Chamber (February 11, 1873) made the situation worse. A number of Spanish Catholics put their hope in the triumph of the pretender Don Carlos, who, upon taking up arms for the winning of the throne, had said: "My mission is to fight the revolution, and I will destroy it." The liberals of Spain set up in opposition to him the son of Isabella, who took the name of Alphonse XII. He was the last to bear that name. Pius IX, asked by both sides to intervene, simply replied that "he gave apostolic benedictions, but not political benedictions." Alphonse XII began his reign by several measures favorable to the Church. He ordered returned to the ecclesiastical authorities the archives, libraries, and art works which the state had seized, except some art works or precious manuscripts which were assigned to public establishments. He re-established, for the most part, the endowment of the clergy and annulled the most objectionable provisions of the decree of June 20, 1870, regarding religious marriage.

The severe provisions of the law of June 29, 1875, against the Carlists keenly irritated the Spanish Catholics, since most of their leaders were affected by those measures. King Alphonse sought to lessen the effect of that law by showing that the purpose intended by the legislation was purely political. He was urgent with the Holy Father to obtain the sending of a nuncio to Madrid; and the nuncio, Bishop Simeoni, strongly seconded by the episcopacy, acted so successfully that the Spanish government renounced the admission on the same footing the dissident sects of the Catholic religion and the Catholic religion itself.

The Constitution of 1876 proclaimed Catholicism the religion of the state, while, however, maintaining freedom of conscience, and in a general way imposed the respect due to Christian moral teaching. In favor of this Constitution the government of Alphonse XII finally grouped a serious majority. On March 1, 1876, Don Carlos solemnly laid down his arms. "His flag," he said, "would remain furled until God should fix the supreme hour of the redemption of Catholic and monarchical Spain." Little by little the episcopacy and the clergy, as a whole, rallied to the cause of Alphonse XII.[35]

England

Like Catholic Spain, Protestant England, following the Vatican Council, at first took an attitude hostile to the Church, but this attitude was gradually modified in a direction less unfavorable. The irritation produced in the High Church by the definition of the dogma of infallibility appeared first by the conferring of the doctorate on Döllinger by the University of Oxford, then by the participation of two Anglican bishops and a certain number of clergymen in the congress held in 1872 at Cologne by the Old Catholics.[36] In the government spheres, the discontent determined by the movement of Catholic revival was shown (March 29, 1870) by Parliament passing a motion inviting the public powers to make an inquiry into the inner organization of the monastic institutions and the origin of their properties. On the proposal of Gladstone, the British [35] For these details on the Church in Spain, see Chantrel, pp. 33, 37, 101, 119, 245, 299, 330, 401, 489, 509, 599–601, 697.

[36] Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre, III, 149.

houses softened, by a vote of May 2, this harsh decision and enacted that the inquiry would be exclusively into the sources of the monastic possessions, and not on their interior discipline; but even with this restriction the measure appeared tyrannical to the Catholics. Other similar measures were taken in the course of the same year. The Catholics, now accustomed to public life, organized legal agitations.

In November, 1871, all the Irish bishops, who had to suffer so much from the interference of the government agents in their schools, demanded, in a common pastoral letter: 1. the absolute independence of religious teaching in the primary Catholic schools; 2. the sharing by the secondary schools in the government allowances, until then reserved for the Protestant or neutral schools, and 3. the authorization to found a Catholic university or at least Catholic colleges attached to the state universities and enjoying the same rights as the other colleges. On July 16, 1872, in England the young Catholic Union organized at London under the presidency of the Duke of Norfolk a big lay meeting to protest against the conduct of the Italian and German governments, for the former had just closed at Rome the religious houses, and the latter had just expelled the Jesuits from Germany. On January 2, 1873, Bishop Vaughan, recently made bishop of Salford, laid the foundations of an association that would permit Catholics to exercise an effective political influence, not with a view to changing the form of government or to modify the administrative or financial laws, nor to dictate in matters indifferent to Catholic doctrine, on which the faithful were free to vote, at pleasure, along with the liberals or with the conservatives, but with a view to defending, by all lawful means, the religious freedoms, in particular the freedom of the Catholic education of the children of Catholic families.

This agitation, conducted with as much prudence as firmness, was not fruitless. To it can be credited the decision by which the Parliament declared (July 30, 1872) to maintain a diplomatic agent at the Holy See;[37] and the introduction of a bill by which Gladstone did justice to part of the demands of the Irish Catholics. This bill, however, was not passed by the British Parliament. It failed (March 11, 1873), having obtained only 284 votes in its favor against 287 opposed. The conversion to Catholicism (September, 1874) of the Marquis of Ripon, one of the most esteemed members of the English Parliament, had a considerable influence on the Catholic movement in England. Pius IX rejoiced greatly at this progress. In January, 1872, he said to the Prince of Wales: "I have great respect for that English people because it is more really religious at heart and in conduct than many that call themselves Catholic. When, some day, it returns to the fold, with great joy we will wish a welcome to that flock, which has gone astray, but is not lost."

Pius IX had opened his pontificate by re-establishing the Catholic hierarchy in England. In 1878, the last year of his reign, he wished to give the same honor to the kingdom of Scotland. He signed (January 28) a decree of the Congregation of Propaganda, re-establishing the two old archbishoprics of Glasgow and Edinburg and the four bishoprics of Aberdeen, Dunkeld, Galloway, and Argyll. But death prevented his consecrating and proclaiming these creations. This task was reserved for his successor, Leo XIII, who did so on March 28 next.[38]

Pius IX left this world on February 7. Weakened by age, he had held a consistory on December 28; then he was confined to bed. Thereafter the illness became worse. His last words were:

[37] At the time of the Council, Odo Russel, legation secretary at the court of Naples, had been sent to Rome on a temporary mission to the Vatican. There he remained after the council and was later replaced by another diplomat. This actual situation was regularized by Parliament in 1872.

[38] For these details of the Church in England, see Chantrel, pp. 205, 310, 603–8, 661, 715, 724, 767–71.

In domum Domini ibimus ("We will go into the house of the Lord"). He had entered into his eighty-sixth year, and had occupied the chair of St. Peter thirty-one years. This successor of the Prince of the Apostles had even surpassed the years of Peter, and his pontificate had been not only the longest in history; by the great events that filled it, it had been one of the most memorable.

CHAPTER XL

Catholic Works

In our chronological account of the chief religious events of the pontificate of Pius IX, we have more than once mentioned the good works stimulated by the clergy and the faithful during that period. We must now give a general view of those works. Charity, piety, and zeal were the outstanding traits in the features of that pope who started his reign by so many institutions of benevolence, who labored so earnestly to promote devotion to the Immaculate Virgin, who was concerned with so great watchfulness with the spread and purity of the Catholic faith. To close the history of his long pontificate by a picture of the works of piety, charity, and apostolic zeal that flourished in the Church, from 1846 to 1878, is to give to that pontificate its natural crown, its radiant halo.

Devotions

Most of the works of piety which Pius IX's pontificate saw blossom, can be ranged around three major objects of devotion: the Blessed Sacrament, the Sacred Heart, and the Blessed Virgin.

From 1845 to 1878 a Carmelite of German origin, Father Hermann, a French priest, Father Eymard, two prelates, Bishops Bouillerie and Ségur, two English Oratorians, Fathers Faber and Dalgairns, and a young Carmelite postulant, Théodelinde Dubouché, were the providential promoters of a renewal of the worship of the Blessed Sacrament. "A young Jew of Hamburg, twenty-six years old, Hermann Cohen, a wonderful artist, after touring Europe in a path of glory, liberty, and voluptuousness, one day entered a church in Paris. 'The priest was at the altar,' he himself relates, 'In his hands he was rasing aloft a white form. I looked. I heard a voice that seemed to come from the Host: I am the way, the truth, and the life.' There, cast to the ground, he was converted, devoted for his whole life to Jesus in the host. The Jew became a Catholic, the Catholic became a Carmelite; the Carmelite would make resound from the greatest pulpits of Europe his cries of enthusiasm for the Eucharistic Christ; the artist chanted the most penetrating mystical melodies, the most inflamed that our age has heard. In 1871 he, too, became a victim for his brethren: he died at Spandau in Prussia, in the service of the French prisoners." [1]

In 1840 a Marist, Father Eymard, felt himself called by God to honor our Lord in the greatest of His mysteries. His superiors understood him. Pius IX encouraged him. In 1856 he founded at Paris, in a modest house on rue Enfer, the Society of the Priests of the Blessed Sacrament. Two years later he instituted the congregation of the Servants of the Blessed Sacrament. Soon thousands of priest adorers gathered about the religious founded by Father Eymard and spread devotion to the Eucharist throughout the world.[2] At the same time Bishop Gaston de Ségur, by his apostolate among young men and by his lively pamphlets,[3] Bishop Bouillerie by his ardent sermons and by his moving poems, Fathers Faber and Dalgairns by their doctrinal and mystical works, turned souls toward the tabernacle. Under the influence of their writings, words, and works, the practice of frequent Communion became general; while that of perpetual adoration, under the impulse of the episcopate, was established in a large number of churches and chapels. In 1878, at the death of Pius IX, in a large number of dioceses the Blessed Sacrament, solemnly exposed, was adored throughout the year by each of the parishes or communities in turn.

[1] Baunard, Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, p. 212. See Sylvain, Vie du P. Hermann.

[2] Beatif. et canon. servi Dei Petri Juliani Eymard.

[3] M. de Ségur, Mgr de Ségur, souvenirs et récits d'un frère.

In 1848, during the June days, at the sound of the cannons of the bloody uprising, Théodelinde Dubouché had the inspiration of a work, then of a religious congregation, which would unite in its double aim the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament with the worship of the Sacred Heart. The Congregation of Ladies of the Adoration of Reparation, founded by her, has for its purpose to offer reparation for the outrages on the Sacred Heart of Jesus by an uninterrupted adoration, day and night, of the Blessed Sacrament exposed on the altar.[4]

In 1856 Pius IX inserted in the liturgical calendar the feast of the Sacred Heart. Eight years later a decree of beatification placed on the altars the humble Visitation nun of Paray-le-Monial, Margaret Mary Alacoque, to whom the Savior had asked for the institution of a cult toward the divine symbol of His love. The devotion of the faithful responded to this act of the Holy See by the consecration of the month of June to the Sacred Heart and by the pious custom of Communion on the first Friday of each month in His honor. Parishes and dioceses were consecrated to the Heart of Jesus. The events of 1870 favored this movement. A banner on which the nuns of Paray-le-Monial embroidered the divine emblem was borne on the battlefields by the papal zouaves, organized under the name of Volunteers of the West. On June 29, 1873, fifty deputies went on pilgrimage to Paray and "declared, as far as appertained to them, that they consecrated France to the Sacred Heart." [5]

In April, 1875, Father Ramière, director of the Apostleship of Prayer, presented to the Pope a petition signed by 525

[4] D'Hulst, Vie de la Mère Marie-Thérèse.

[5] Lecanuet, L'Eglise de France sous la troisième République, I, 206. We have mentioned above the erection of the Basilica of the Sacred Heart at Montmartre.

bishops, begging the Holy Father to consecrate to the Heart of Jesus the Eternal City and the world. The Pontiff did not think the moment had come to make this solemn consecration, but he gave some satisfaction to this pious wish by ordering the Congregation of Rites to propose to the bishops of the entire world a form of consecration. On June 16, 1875, the second centenary of the apparition of Our Lord at Paray, this form was adopted by a large number of dioceses, parishes, and communities. The official consecration of all the nations on earth to the Sacred Heart would take place only at the close of the nineteenth century by Pope Leo XIII, following a revelation of the Savior to a holy religious of the Good Shepherd, Sister Mary of the Divine Heart (née Droste zu Vischering).[6]

Like devotion to the Heart of Jesus, devotion to the Blessed Virgin developed in wonderful proportions. Three apparitions of the Mother of God (at Salette, Lourdes, and Pontmain) stimulated this devotion.

In the very year of Pius IX's election, two children (Maximin Giraud, eleven years old, and Mélanie Mathieu-Galvat, fourteen years old) saw, in the mountains of la Salette, near Grenoble, a Lady shining with brightness: it was the Virgin herself, who spoke to them with tears about the sins of her people: blasphemy, violation of the Sunday, and forgetfulness of the holy laws of the Church; and she urged prayer to them.[7] From that moment, pilgrimages were organized to the place of the apparition, and most of the pilgrims returned home filled with the spirit of penance. Many persons there imbibed that spirit of victim which associates souls closely to the Savior's sacrifice.[8]

The definition of the Immaculate Conception in 1854 gave a [6] See Chasle, Sœur Marie du Divin Cœur. Cf. Nilles, De rationibus festorum SS. Cordis Jesu; Bainvel, La dévotion au Sacré-Cœur de Jésus.

[7] On the apparition of la Salette, see Berthier, Notre-Dame de la Salette, son apparition, son culte.

[8] Giraud, De l'union à Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ dans sa vie de victime, pp. 364–97.

new impulse to devotion to Mary. About three years later, in a little town of the Pyrrenees, at Lourdes, at the foot of the Massabielle rock, the Blessed Virgin appeared again to a girl of the people, Bernadette Soubirous, and again recommended penance. But her look was so gentle, her smile so kind, that the humble girl was entranced by it and comforted. Said the Lady: "I am the Immaculate Conception." This was heaven's response to the definition of earth.[9] With fresh ardor the throngs hastened to Lourdes. On March 4, 1858, more than 20,000 persons thronged to the foot of the Massabielle rock. On April 4, 1864, the number of pilgrims amounted to 60,000; in July, 1876, on the occasion of the crowning of the Madonna, more than 100,000. Soon the number of pilgrims or visitors coming to Lourdes in the course of one year rose to more than a million. Never, in the course of the ages, did devotion set on foot toward a sanctuary more men of all nations. From all parts of the world they came to seek from the Virgin cures of body and soul.[10] Miracles increased there in number.[11] Some of these took place at the grotto; others, more numerous, at the passing of the Blessed Sacrament, as if God wished clearly to indicate that devotion to the Mother of God could not be separated from that due to her divine Son. New congregations were founded under the title of the Immaculate Conception. Countless churches arose in honor of the Virgin. On September 12, 1860, Bishop Morlhon of Le Puy inaugurated, on an incomparable pedestal, in memory of the definition of the Immaculate Conception of Mary, a most gigantic and most gracious statue. This work of a French sculptor, Bonnassieux, made with the bronze of the cannons taken at Sebastopol, carries the title, Notre-Dame de France.[12]

[9] The definition had been made on December 8, 1854; the first apparition took place on February 11, 1858.

[10] See Henri Lasserre, Notre-Dame de Lourdes.

[11] See Bertrin, Histoire critique des événements de Lourdes.

[12] Dubosc de Pesquidoux, L'Immaculaée-Conception, histoire d'un dogme, II, 202.

In 1871, the apparition of Pontmain, which we spoke of above, aroused a new center of pilgrimages, while the old devotion to the sanctuary of Notre Dame of Chartres revived in French hearts.

Works of Charity

From this general movement of piety toward the Eucharist, the Heart of Jesus, and the Blessed Virgin, works full of mercy were born. In the course of his notable studies on the modern regime, Hippolyte Taine relates that Father Etienne, superior general of the Vincentians and of the Daughters of Charity, after showing some unbelievers through some of his charitable works of his two institutes, said to them: "I have made you acquainted with the detail of our life, but I have not imparted to you the secret. And this secret is Jesus Christ, known, loved, and served in the Eucharist." [13]

The priest who is, in Italy, the chief promoter of the works of corporal and spiritual assistance, the founder of the Institute of Charity and of the Sisters of Providence, Antonio Rosmini-Serbati, was distinguished by his devotion to the Eucharist, the Sacred Heart, and the Blessed Virgin. When his works were taking their first great impulse, he wrote in his private diary: "I ask of you, O Father, what is in the Heart of Jesus. . . . O Mary, ask of God for me what is good in God's sight, in the sight of your divine Son." [14] Until the close of his mortal life in 1855, a similar prayer is still found under his pen: "O my God, I ask of you what the Heart of Jesus desires that I ask." [15] Inspired by such a spirit, the Rosminian works developed, increased, overflowed Italy, and worked marvels abroad, principally in England.[16]

[13] Taine, Le régime moderne, II, 115.
[14] Lockhart, Antonio Rosmini-Serbati, p. 446.
[15] Ibid., p. 447.
[16] Ibid., pp. 344–80.

English by race and education, the great man of works in England at this period, Archbishop Manning, created a cardinal by Pius IX in 1875, did not have a different way of viewing and practicing piety. "The priest," he said, "should live as if he had continually at his side his divine Master. If he goes into the world, this should be as a legate a latere Jesu." And that one of his biographers who has most closely studied his social influence adds, after those words: "The devotion to the Sacred Heart, considered as a consequence of the Incarnation, was for him the practical means of establishing that close union between the soul and Jesus." [17] While still attached to Protestantism, he devoted himself particularly to works that had the aim of diminishing among the poor the habits of drunkenness. Having become a Catholic, priest, and archbishop, he continued to spread temperance societies; but he extended the field of his labors. He asked home rule for Ireland, out of compassion for the sufferings of that nation and because he viewed this reform as an application of social justice. His relations with the Irish became the starting point of his relations with the workers of London. He was called "the father of the poor," "the cardinal of the workingmen"; when, in 1889, an immense and terrible strike threatened the city of London, he alone was able to bring peace and get the 250,000 threatening workers to return to their work.[18] "Take care," someone said to him one day. "You are turning to socialism." He replied: "I know not whether for you it is socialism; but for me it is pure Christianity." [19]

What Manning was for England, Bishop Ketteler of Mainz was for Germany. He was called "the social bishop." Like his brother bishop of London, he declared that he drew from the love of God, as taught by Christianity, the solution of all the [17] Lemire, Le cardinal Manning et son action sociale.

[18] Ibid., p. 108.
[19] Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre, III, 270.

formidable problems raised by the present organization of labor and ownership. He said: "Since the Son of God came down to earth, the creative spirit of Christianity has, within the limits of the possible, solved all the big questions, even those that concern the sufferings and livelihood of men." [20] In the realm of theory, Ketteler expounded his doctrine in a large number of addresses, pamphlets, and extensive works, the most celebrated of which discusses the question of the workingman and Christianity. Therein, with a vigor that few writers have attained, he describes the deep unrest created in society by the development of industry on the one hand, and, on the other hand, by the progress of doctrines worthy of paganism. He then examines and criticizes with rare competence the solutions proposed by the socialists Lassalle, Karl Marx, and Engels. He acknowledges that the founding of cooperative societies of production, solidly organized, would be the most direct means of relieving the condition of the working classes. But he at once adds that such a means could not be effective without the Christian spirit of which the Catholic Church alone has the authentic deposit. "The Church," he says, "which does not exercise its influence by means more or less mechanical, but by the spirit that she inspires in men." [21]

That this action of the Church would necessarily take place in a very slow manner, Ketteler did not hide from himself; but he believed that the Church, which put an end to the ancient slavery by destroying the pride of the master and raising the slave from his degradation, will be able, so far as human condition permits, to overcome the selfishness of the modern capitalist and moderate the envy of the worker.[22] In the practical realm, Ketteler founded at Mainz workers' circles, societies for the building of inexpensive workmen's houses, [20] Lionnet, Un evêque social, Ketteler, p. 70.

[21] Ibid., p. 72.
[22] Ibid., pp. 70, 77.

employment offices, and asylums for all kinds of suffering;[23] and his works were so well conceived that they serve as models for all those afterward formed in Germany. Fathers Kolping and Hitze, to mention only the most celebrated among the "social priests" of Germany, called themselves the disciples of the Bishop of Mainz;[24] and Pope Leo XIII himself would say, apropos of his encyclical De conditione opificium: "Ketteler was my great precursor." [25] This great friend of the poor died in 1877, poor himself, in a poor Franciscan monastery of Bavaria, where he asked for hospitality.

In Austria a convert from Protestantism, Baron Vogelsang, increased his works of social science as he more deeply investigated his Catholic faith.[26] Gaspard Decurtins and Charles Verin realized similar works in Switzerland and in Belgium.

In France the spirit of Frederick Ozanam and of St. Vincent de Paul, a spirit of tender and entirely supernatural charity, inspired the continuators of their works: Armand de Melun, Léon Lefébure, Albert de Mun, René de la Tour du Pin, the Daughters of Charity, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, and the Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul. "From 1838 to 1877 the life of Armand de Melun was, so to speak, identified with the charitable movement." [27] At least we may say that his name, his action, and his initiative are found in all the legislative reforms enacted, during this period, for the material and moral improvement of the popular classes. He was one of the most energetic collaborators of Sister Rosalie, whose life he himself recounted.[28] To him is due the existence or development of the [23] See Kannengieser, "Ketteler, l'évêque social," in the Correspondant of 1893, and Ketteler et l'organisation sociale en Allemagne.

[24] On the social works of Kolping and Hitze and on the social movement in general in Germany during the second half of the nineteenth century, see Kannengieser, Catholiques allemands, pp. 51–319.

[25] Correspondant of 1893, CLXXII, 243.

[26] See Vogelsang, Morale et économie sociale; Politique sociale.

[27] Cornudet, in the Correspondant of January 25, 1878.

[28] A. de Melun, Vie de la Sœur Rosalie.

following: L'oeuvre de la Miséricorde, the Amis de l'Enfance, the Apprentis et des jeunes Ouvrières, the Société d'économie charitable, the Société de secours aus blessés. Elected a deputy in the legislative Assembly in 1849, he there prepared and defended, with a competence recognized by political friends and foes, the best laws of that period: the laws on unhealthful lodging, on apprenticeship contracts, on pawnshops; and he took an important part in drawing up the law on freedom of education.[29]

Léon Lefébure, in his youth a faithful disciple of Armand de Melun, a collaborator of Frederick Le Play in the Exposition of 1867, deputy from Colmar in 1869, undersecretary of the treasury in 1873, did not give his name to any particular work; but he collaborated with active intelligence in most of the charitable institutions of his time, and prepared entirely the foundation of that Office central des oeuvres de bienfaisance which crowned his useful life.[30]

We had occasion above to say how the young lieutenant Albert de Mun and the headquarters captain René de la Tour du Pin founded in 1871 the Cercles catholiques d'ouvriers. Never was a work more brilliantly begun. Under the regime of a National Assembly that was largely deeply religious, we see Albert de Mun, without neglecting his professional duties, but also without quitting the saber and the armor, enthusiastically stir immense meetings, which authorities of all sorts—generals, magistrates, prefects, even the marshal president himself—sometimes honored with their presence. After the disasters of 1870 and the disorders of the Commune, the work of the Cercles catholiques d'ouvriers profited from the eloquent conviction of its apostles and their initiatives, patriotic, social, and frankly Christian. "Men of action and far-sighted patriots joined together to sustain and spread the new work. The favor of a large number of bishops and soon the high approval of Rome did the rest. United in the same sentiment of social preservation and national rescue, workers and the upper classes fraternized. This fact is evident in the report written by Albert de Mun the evening of the pilgrimage of the circles to Notre Dame de Liesse, August 17, 1873.[31] It is a report of victory, written in military style by a fearless soldier." [32] At the side of Captain de Mun, another captain, La Tour du Pin, with a keen-sighted mind, reflective, profound, elaborated in the "Council of Studies," the doctrine which he later formulates in his important work, Vers un ordre social chrétien and in his precious little volume, Aphorismes de politique sociale. Pascal, Ségur-Lamoignon, Savatier, and Bréda took part in the social discussions presided over by one who dominated them as a master. A review, the Association catholique, and a weekly, the Corporation, were founded to spread the ideas of the new group.

[29] Baunard, Vie du vicomte Armand de Melun.

[30] Joly, Ozanam et ses continuateurs, pp. 183–231.

But these bright beginnings had no sequel. The first generation of young men, united and enthusiastic, was not replaced by sufficient recruits. The doctrine of the work was contested by serious economists. The circles offered to already Catholic workers some real advantages, but they scarcely attracted the others. One has often spoken of the failure, at least partial, of the work of the circles of Catholic workers. One forgets that the work of Albert de Mun and René de la Tour du Pin survived in other works, which, though bearing different names, go back to it for their origin, their spirit, and their impulse. The Association catholique de la Jeunesse française is related to a gathering of young men founded by the two valiant officers. The study circles, so widespread in our day, are derived from the Council of Studies. The present Christian trade unions were outlined in the projects of a Christian corporation elaborated in 1871. The "social weeks" had had as their promoters some disciples of de

[31] A. de Mun, Œuvres, I, 62.
[32] L. de Grandmaison, in Etudes, CXLI, 32.

Mun and La Tour du Pin; and at the beginning of the twentieth century groups sharply hostile in politics appealed with equal ardor to the social doctrines proclaimed after 1870 by the work of the circles.

The Daughters of Charity do not profess a social doctrine; but the successful initiatives of Sister Rosalie, her Bureau of Charity, her various foundations, patronages, congregations, asylums for the aged, different institutions for children, became models for the Daughters of Charity, giving fresh life to their charitable apostolate and enabling them to adapt their traditional methods to the new needs.[33]

Under the pressure of events and under the high direction of Brother Philip, their superior general, the Brothers of the Christian Schools also broadened their means of action. Their starting point, their first work, was the primary school. But, when the family offered so little Christian assistance to the boy who finished the school, naturally his former teachers thought of doing something for him. Brother Philip considered that circles of young men, family houses, classes for adults, farming colonies, orphanages, besides professional, industrial, agricultural, and commercial teaching, was connected with the work intended by St. John Baptist de la Salle, and God blessed them abundantly.[34]

The Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul did not have to consider such questions. They were founded precisely to engage in all the popular works required by the needs of the time. The revolution of 1848, then the war of 1870 and the Commune of 1871 were, for the young congregation, occasions for redoubled activity and success. Wearing lay dress, "the Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul, unknown to the great number of people, in all externals like the zealous Catholics who devoted themselves to the works, not only escaped the persecutions; they could, in the [33] A. de Melun, Vie de la Sœur Rosalie, pp. 36–163.

[34] Poujoulat, Vie du Frère Philippe, pp. 129–61.

midst of the most violent political commotions, continue, almost without hindrance, their hidden apostolate." [35] In 1871 Pius IX asked them to add, in their Constitutions, to the works of workers and of the poor, the works of soldiers.[36] It was in one of their houses, that of Notre Dame of Nazareth, on the boulevard Montparnasse, that the work of the Catholic Circles of workmen was born, and from their initiative was born, under the presidency of Bishop Ségur, friend and protector of the institute, the Union des associations ouvrières catholiques, which powerfully contributed to an increase of the workmen's works in all the dioceses of France.[37]

Christian Art

Was it a work of art or a work of the apostolate that, in the time of Pius IX, was pursued by the painter Hippolyte Flandrin in France, the disciples of Overbeck in Germany, the Pre-Raphaelites of England, who took Ruskin as lawmaker and herald? The predominance of the idea of apostolate is undeniable in the painter of the churches of St. Vincent de Paul and St. Germain-des-Prés in Paris, of the church of St. Paul at Nimes. There one sees the marvelous features in which his pure soul shines through, "a tender reflection of the past" rather than the radiant clearness of a "new dawn." [38] But his painting expresses a piety so gentle and recollected that a competent judge has compared it to a "Christian neophyte painting the catacombs" and also to "an artist of the fifteenth century decorating the chapels and monasteries with inexhaustible fervor." [39]

[35] Vie de M. Le Prévost, p. 156.

[36] Ibid., p. 262.

[37] For details of the works of the Society of the Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul, see the Vie de M. Le Prévost, which is also the history of the Congregation up to 1871.

[38] André Pératé, in Un siècle, movement du monde de 1800 à 1900, p. 633.

[39] Address by Beulé, secretary of the Académie des beaux-arts, on the tomb of Hippolyte Flandrin. See Louis Flandrin, Hippolyte Flandrin.

In the religious renewal of architecture which occurred during the same period, the inspiration is purely Christian in Montalembert, who, in 1833, in his letter on the vandalism in France, wrote: "For the art of the Middle Ages I have an old and deep passion; a passion mostly religious, because that art is, in my eyes, above all Catholic." [40] But with Victor Hugo, Michelet, Mérimée, Vitet, as with the German disciples of Wackenroder, the inspiration is especially artistic. Didron, in his Annales archéologiques, founded in 1844, and Arcisse de Caumont, in his Abécédaire d'archéologie, which appeared in 1850, prepared its realization. A talented architect, Viollet-le-Duc, whose writings and monumental work dominate the period, realizes it. His restoration in Notre Dame of Paris and in a great number of monuments at Vézelay, Autun, Beaune, Toulouse, and Carcassonne are not beyond all criticism. But his work has admirable parts, and the earnestness of his proselytism was unwearied. His influence penetrated Europe. It was felt in Germany, which would soon glory in completing, with some heaviness, the Cologne cathedral; and his influence, coinciding in England with that of Ruskin, inspired the restoration of several Gothic monuments.[41]

From the monuments of the Middle Ages also religious music sought the secret of its renovation. In 1840, the appearance of the first volume of Dom Guéranger's Institutions liturgiques and the publication of the Bishop Parisis' pastoral instruction on the Chant de l'Eglise,[42] gave the first impulse to the movement. The formation, in 1849, by the archbishops of Reims and Cambrai, on Pius IX's advice, of a commission charged with restoring the liturgical chant according to the ancient manuscripts, the publication by the Jesuit Father Lambillotte of his Clef des mélodies grégoriennes, the particularly suggestive

[40] Montalembert, Œuvres, VI, 8.
[41] Pératé, op. cit., p. 629.
[42] Guillemant, Pierre-Louis Parisis, I, 200–10.

studies of canon Gontier and the edition, made in 1876 by a canon of Trèves, Hermesdorff, of part of the Graduale: such were the principal steps of a reform which was achieved in 1880 by the publication of the Mélodies grégoriennes of Dom Pothier. To him belongs the honor of restoring the Gregorian chant in the Church. His capital work was the fruit of twenty years of patient research.

In 1860, Dom Guéranger, while still a simple novice in the Benedictine abbey of Solesmes, struck by Pothier's special aptitudes, directed him to transcribe, with the help of two confreres, Dom Hansion and Dom Fonteinne, the dusty antiphonaries of St. Gall and of the Metz school, to compare the notations of the codices with the texts of the theorists, and to establish a clearly readable copy of the Gregorian Graduale. A first attempt appeared in 1868. But "the most delicate points had still to be investigated, and twelve years passed in new attempts, in new works, obscure but fruitful. At length, in 1880, appeared the Mélodies grégoriennes, the publication of which aroused a considerable stir among the students of plain chant. The work is as fresh today as when it first appeared; if, in certain respects, it can be supplemented, nothing is found in it to be done over." [43]

In the middle of the nineteenth century the Church borrowed from the Middle Ages not only the principles of the revival of its architecture and its liturgical chant; to the medieval period she also turned to find again the traditional paths of her philosophy and her theology.

Philosophy and Theology

In 1840 the librarian of the royal library of Naples, canon Cajetan Sanseverino, who, it was said, had only two passions: to classify on the shelves the dusty volumes and to read the [43] Amédée Gastoué, L'art grégorien, p. 108. On the beauty of the religious chant of Solesmes, see Revue des Deux Mondes, November 15, 1898.

works of Descartes, received the visit of a Jesuit from Reggio, Father Sordi, who revealed to him the depths of St. Thomas' Summa. The good canon, fascinated by the new horizons opening to his mind, studied, with growing fondness, the teaching of the Angelic Doctor; and, after three years of silence and study, published seven volumes, with the title, Philosophia christiana cum antiqua et nova comparata. It had a considerable success. Already, among the Catholics, many vigorous and independent minds, disappointed with the vague or inconsistent theories of traditionalism, Cartesianism, and ontologism, turned to the Philosophy of St. Thomas.[44] In 1846, Jaime Balmes began his Filosofia fundamental with these words: "This is nothing more than the philosophy of St. Thomas fitted to the needs of the nineteenth century." The appearance of Sanseverino's work emphasized this position. In 1853 Father Gratry, in his book, De la connassance de Dieu, wrote: "We can say that St. Thomas Aquinas embraces St. Augustine, Aristotle, and Plato. . . . He needs to be understood. In him are heights, depths, and precisions that perhaps contemporary intellect will grasp only in a few generations, if philosophy recovers." [45] In that same year 1853 a German Jesuit, Father Kleutgen, published the first volume of his Theologie der Vorzeit. In Italy another Jesuit, Father Cornoldi, founded at Bologna an Academy of St. Thomas. Pius IX did more than simply praise Sanseverino for having "aided the young clergy in the principles of sound doctrine"; [46] he did not conceal his admiration for the old scholastic doctors, he defended their method,[47] he interpreted some of their fundamental doctrines; [48] and Archbishop Pecci of Perugia, the future Leo XIII, as a prelude to the encouragements he would later give to scholasticism from the height of [44] Gratry, De la connaissance de Dieu, I, 276.

[45] Ibid., p. 326.
[46] Letter to the Archbishop of Naples.
[47] Denzinger-Bannwart, no. 1652.
[48] Brief of June 15, 1857, Eximiam tuam.

the papal chair, requested of the Holy Father that he declare St. Thomas the patron of the universities. This movement did not, however, injure the development of positive theology, already illustrated by Melchior Cano, Petavius, and Thomassin. The Histoire du dogme de la Trinité of Bishop Ginouilhiac, the patristic studies of Freppel, Hefele's History of the Councils, and the scholarly work of Bishop Malou of Bruges, on the Immaculate Conception, are learned counterparts of the learned works of Sanseverino, Kleutgen, and Cornoldi.[49]

Rational theology and positive theology did not absorb the activity of the Catholic clergy. Mystical theology, at about the middle of the nineteenth century, had two illustrious representatives: Father Faber and Father Charles Gay.[50] Of both we may say what Bishop Mermillod said in 1872, when Father Gay had not yet published anything, that they seemed to be placed on the threshold of the new times as St. Francis de Sales was after the Middle Ages, and that after the example of the illustrious and holy Bishop of Geneva, they tried to bring into harmony the old spirituality of the Church with the modern.[51] Both of them assimilated the substance of the great theologians of all times, but both continually had in mind their contemporaries and thus spoke for the men of their age and their country.

Spiritual Writings

Frederick William Faber, born in 1814, in York county, of a Protestant family that had sought refuge in England after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and that proudly preserved the traditions of their Huguenot ancestors, came to Catholicism

[49] For a full idea of the theological movement at this period, see Bellamy, La théologie catholique au XIX^e siècle, and Hurter, Nomenclator litterarius, Vol. V. In these two works will be found the elements of a study on the biblical movement and the apologetic movement during the same period.

[50] Later bishop of Anthédon, auxiliary of Bishop Pie of Poitiers.

[51] Bowden, The Life and Letters of Frederick William Faber.

in 1845 through a thousand distresses and obstacles, because he felt his soul dying of hunger and thirst in Protestantism, because there he found neither angels nor saints nor the Blessed Virgin, nor Jesus present in the Eucharist, nor the Holy Ghost speaking to him through a holy, one, catholic, and apostolic Church. On the day of his confirmation he felt himself, like the apostles, invaded by the sensible presence of the Holy Ghost.[52] And thereafter he sang his happiness. His treatises of spirituality are poems. A less profound psychologist than Newman, a less solid logician than Manning, less scholarly than Manning, he was more supple, more varied, more captivating. His books have not that order which is pleasing to a French reader, but they abound with striking, picturesque, original, and unexpected features.[53] He excells in giving a poetical form to the most austere theses, in expressing in modern metaphors the most ancient dogmas. Says a certain critic: "Father Faber would be an audacious theologian if he were not a well trained theologian." [54] Faber's independence was, however, more apparent than real; and many a one was astonished to see this Anglo-Saxon push the love of Rome to the point of extolling the queerest forms of Italian devotion, and preach, not only devotedness, but even devotion to the pope.[55]

Charles Gay, quite taken with the beauties of art even in childhood, an accomplished musician, a friend of Charles Gounod, was converted when eighteen years old by Lacordaire. When ordained priest, he preferably joined Father Gaston and Bishop Pie, collaborated in this bishop's work, and accom-

[52] Ibid., p. 370.

[53] "The literary spirit of what is called the Romantic school, was not a stranger to Father Faber. He mingled the treatment of morals and even mockery with the most grandiose ideas. He said whatever he thought, and he said it with an artists's stroke." Hello in the Revue du Monde catholique, March 28, 1875.

[54] Gautier, Portraits littéraires, p. 81.

[55] The writings of Faber include the following: The Precious Blood, Bethlehem, The Blessed Sacrament, Spiritual Conferences, The Creator and the Creature, All for Jesus, Growth in Holiness.

panied him to the Vatican Council. There he was a member of the group known as the "infallibilists," among the most decided. In 1874 he published some conferences given to the Carmelite nuns, and gave this book the title, La vie et les vertues chrétiennes dans l'état religieux. The work had an immense success. In eighteen months 12,000 copies were sold, without counting the translations. By the classical order that prevailed in these two volumes, Father Gay surpassed Father Faber; but his language has a stiffness which does not always, at the first reading, allow the taste of its full depth, its warmth, and the life in his thought. Not until after his death, by the publication of his correspondence, did the public know all the spontaneity, simplicity, gracious and gentle harmony contained in his soul. However, anyone who did not grasp the depth, surmised it. The special character of Father Gay's work on the Christian life and virtues is the close union of dogmatic theology and mystical theology. Previous to him, many authors had joined them by placing them side by side; with him, they are blended. In one and the same expression the theologian recognizes his doctrine and the mystic perceives his own inner experience.

More than any other, the learned and pious author succeeded in realizing this ideal, for that compenetration of dogma and piety constituted his inner life. Raised in a family that was a stranger to Christian beliefs, he came to Catholicism peacefully, without shock, following the deepest promptings of his reason and his heart. Having arrived at the full truth, he converted all the members of his family by the simple radiance of his interior life, by what he was rather than by what he said; therein was undoubtedly the difficulty he experienced in translating into intellectual expressions what he felt as a life, which at times gave such a tenseness to his style. "Books," he wrote, "at bottom do nothing." [56] "The phrase is a house which our earthly condition makes precious, perhaps indispensable. How many people tend to transform this abode into a prison!" [57] But the attentive reading of a book as profound as his, makes life visible through the phrase, because the phrase, with this mystic who is a theologian, came forth from his soul and kept, as it were, an echo of the emotion that vibrated in him. Thus his seventeen writings on the Christian life in general, on the virtues which are its fruit, on the religious life, on the obstacles which the Christian life and virtues encounter here below, become nourishment for the mind as for the heart. Is the mystic something different from a soul which, by a special grace of God, feels what the simple faithful believes, or rather, which feels by the heart what it knows by the mind, according to the celebrated saying of the Areopagite? [58]

[56] Gay, Correspondance, II, 50.

[57] Ibid., p. 69.

[58] Denis the Areopagite, The Divine Names, chap. 2, sect. 9. Migne, P.G., III, 647. "What we believe by faith," says St. Theresa, speaking of the mystical states, "the soul perceives by sight." Interior Castle, seventh mansion, chap. 1.

CHAPTER XLI

Foreign Missions

A MISTAKEN view sometimes represents the nineteenth century as marked by the elimination of all metaphysics, even of all theological speculation and of all mystical tendency.[1] The immense success of the works of Father Faber and Father Gay are plain refutations of such an assertion. That century had its mystics, as it had its miracles at Lourdes, as it had its saints in the overflowing life of the supernatural, such as the Curé of Ars, as it had its missioners and its martyrs.

The pontificate of Pius IX is precisely marked by a special expansion of the foreign missions and of apostolic zeal, an expansion which Gregory XVI had effectively prepared.

In the course of the centuries the Church has counted three great movements of spreading the gospel. In the first centuries it followed and sometimes went ahead of the Roman eagles, to preach the gospel to the ancient world; in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries it followed and often preceded the great European explorers, and eagerly went forth to plant the cross in all the new lands where the love of gold drove the new conquerors. About the middle of the nineteenth century the big evolution of the colonial policy became, for the apostolic zeal of the Catholic Church, a new stimulus. Of course the virtue of the apostolate remains always, for the Catholic Church, a "reserved virtue," as Lacordaire proclaimed from the Notre Dame pulpit; Protestantism, from the religious point of view, continues to disintegrate, and the Greek schism, as a Church, does not emerge from its static condition; but both of them, as national religions, follow the movement of penetration which England, Germany, and Russia pursue in the different parts of the world, and implant themselves there under the protection of the civil and military authorities of those states. Was Catholicism going to lose the fruit of its long labors?

[1] Well known is the vogue of August Comte's theory of the "three states." See Faguet, Politiques et moralistes du XIX^e siècle, pp. 352–58.

The Near East

On the eastern frontiers of Europe, the Greek schism, which made but one with the Muscovite empire, had long had its eye on Constantinople, that key of two worlds, and coveted the domination or at least the protectorate of the Balkan nations. Would the Holy Places be safer in the hands of the Holy Synod than under the authority of the Sultan? Everything pointed to the contrary. But the pre-eminence of Russia or Turkey at Constantinople was a question of the political order with which the Holy See was not directly concerned. On the other hand, from the religious viewpoint, the Catholic Church for a long time had given up any direct undertaking for the conversion of the Greeks and of the Turks; the prejudices of the Greeks were so deep and the fanaticism of the Turks was so violent that one might fear that any attempt of this sort would, without profit for the faith, merely end in an increase of intolerance and hostility.

A step taken by the Sublime Porte in January, 1847, following the election of Pius IX, gave some hope to the Catholics. The Sultan's ambassador at Vienna went to Rome to offer his homage to the Holy Father. This was the first time that an Ottoman diplomat requested an audience of the vicar of Christ. The audience took place on January 20, 1847. The words exchanged were vague, but marked with good feeling on both sides. Six months later, Pius IX, by his apostolic letter Nulla celebrior, announced his intention of re-establishing the Latin patriarchate of Jerusalem with residence obligatory. In the secret consistory of October, he raised to the high office Father Joseph Valerga, a missioner at Mossul since 1841. On January 6, 1848, he addressed to all the Christians of the Orient a long and eloquent letter, announcing to them the sending of a papal ambassador to the Sublime Porte, recalling the past grandeurs of the Eastern Churches and inviting the separated Christian bodies to unity.[2] Pius IX was under no illusion: the fulfillment of his wishes could take place only after the expiration of a long time; but the different missions that were organized, encouraged, and sustained by him in Palestine, Syria, Chaldea, and Armenia had as their purpose to hasten the return of our separated brethren; apparently this end has been attained to a considerable extent.

In Palestine, the Franciscans, since their foundation, had an important place, which they kept, even after the election of a patriarch residing in Jerusalem.[3] Besides, from time immemorial France exercised there a religious protectorate, officially recognized by agreements concluded, from 1535 to 1740, under the name of "capitulations," [4] a protectorate which the treaty of Berlin in 1878 would recognize and ratify. From 1847 to 1874 Bishop Valerga and Bishop Bracco founded numerous Catholic works in Palestine. Helped by the Propagation of the Faith Society and by the Association of the Holy Sepulcher, founded at Cologne, they made new parishes, called to Palestine a large number of religious congregations, and with their cooperation founded schools, orphanages, and hospices. These foundations counterbalanced as much as possible the influence of the Russian schismatics and the German Protestants, who, with considerable sums available, increased their efforts to consolidate and enlarge their positions in the Holy Land.

One of the most interesting works in Palestine, in the pon-

[2] Chantrel, Annales ecclésiastiques, 1847, pp. 6, 11, 14, 19–23.
[3] Civezza, Histoire universelle des missions franciscaines.
[4] E. Lamy, La France due Levant, pp. 57–62, 164–236.

tificate of Pius IX, was that of Father Marie-Alphonse Ratisbonne. Born in 1814 at Strasbourg, of an Israelite family, raised apart from any religious idea, given to a worldly life and pleasures in his youth, he had been suddenly converted at Rome while on a journey of pleasure, by a miraculous apparition of the Blessed Virgin on January 20, 1842.[5] He entered the Society of Jesus in June of that same year. He felt himself drawn by a growing force toward the apostolate of his brethren of Israel and toward the work which his brother Marie-Théodore, converted to Catholicism a few years before him, had founded under the name of Notre Dame de Sion. In December, 1852, he joined his brother, having no more earnest desire than to go to Jerusalem, to work, "to weep and suffer with Jesus on Calvary for the redemption of Israel." In August, 1855, he set foot on that holy soil where his apostolate lasted more than thirty years. The following year he was joined by a small group of sisters belonging to the Congregation of Notre Dame de Sion, which Father Marie-Théodore had founded at Paris,[6] and which, in the minds of the two brothers, was to assume a double task: one a work of expiation by ceaseless prayer, the other a work of regeneration by the free education of the children of Palestine. The foundations of the sanctuary and of the large orphanage of the Ecce homo, of the House of St. John of the Desert, and of the institute St. Peter of Jerusalem realized the wishes of the two holy priests. Other nuns, Carmelites, Trappists, Dominicans, Assumptionists, also established schools, where pupils came in large numbers. These latter were a prelude to their celebrated pilgrimages of the Holy Land.

In 1878 Bishop Lavigerie installed the White Fathers in the monastery of St. Anne of Jerusalem, put at their disposal by the [5] See the detailed account of these facts in the life of his brother, Le R. P. Marie-Théodore Ratisbonne, I, 186, 246.

[6] On the foundation of this Congregation and of the Fathers of Sion, having as their purpose "to labor earnestly to bring back the lost sheep of Israel to the true Church," see ibid., I, 317, 357, 407, 546.

French government.[7] Catholic propaganda strictly so called remained always impossible; but, as a clear-sighted historian remarks, charity, the devotedness of the missioners and of the nuns, brought about a lessening of the fanaticism. "The Turks educated in the Christian schools, who, more and more numerous, held positions in the army and in politics, were free from the instincts of Mussulman ferocity." The girls, trained in Christian boarding schools, had a vision: the dignity of woman, of the wife, of the mother had appeared to them. "It is on the degradation of woman that Islam was founded. The day when the woman, in the dignity of the re-established home, passes her conscience on to the sons raised by her, the woman will vanquish Islam." [8]

Above the Jordan, in the mountains of Lebanon, in Syria, not only the religion of Mohammed, but the Greek schism, the Jacobite heresy, the strange and wild religion of the Druses,[9] and, in the midst of this disparate world, also an intense Protestant propaganda the Catholic missioners encountered. "The fertility of the country, the number of its harbors, and the importance of business there kept a European colony in the principal cities of Syria." [10] The English and the Americans flocked there. "From the island of Cyprus, its eagle's nest, England sent and disseminated its Bibles, its money, and its men." [11] The Protestant ministers of America had established their preaching center among the Druses, a vigorous people, who until then had counted only on themselves against the Catholics, protected by France, against the Moslems, backed by the Porte, against the Orthodox, clients of Russia. These ministers made them see the powerful backing of the Protestant nations. Prot-

[7] Baunard, Le cardinal Lavigerie, II, chap. 4.
[8] Lamy, op. cit., pp. 350 f.
[9] See Silvestre de Sacy, Exposé de la religion des Druses.
[10] Lamy, op. cit., p. 202.
[11] Baunard, Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, p. 438.

estantism sought another support in the educated classes. In 1875 it founded at Beyrouth a school which took the name of a university, and from there could graduate doctors, influential men of all kinds, perhaps statesmen, who in their turn could direct public opinion.

The Catholics had for themselves, in the Lebanon mountains, the valiant nation of the Maronites. A target for the perpetual attacks of the Druses, victims in 1860 of frightful massacres, they were helped by France, which, as protector of the Christians of the East, sent a body of 7,000 men to protect them, raised up the nation from its ruins, and obtained for it from the Sultan the appointment of a Christian governor. At the same time Bishop Samhiri, patriarch of Antioch for the Syrians, with tireless zeal traveled through Europe, begging for his poor Church. By his preaching the Capuchin Castelli brought about many conversions among the Jacobites. In 1869, Bishop Samhiri's successor, Bishop Harcus, went to the Vatican Council at the head of eight bishops, who were joined by the Bishop of Madiat in Mesopotamia, converted in 1850. The foundation in 1885 by the Jesuits, under the protection of the French government, of the University of Beyrouth greatly contributed to combat the Protestant influence.

The mission of Chaldea, confided to the Dominicans, Carmelites, Capuchins, and Vincentians, was confronted by the Nestorian heresy. In 1843 an Anglican Puseyite mission, under the direction of the preacher Badger, had established itself at Mossul to oppose the French influence. But the protection accorded by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London to this Puseyite undertaking caused scandal in England. Badger left Mossul at the end of 1844. Missions organized by the Americans at Mossul, in Mesopotamia, and in Turkish Kurdistan had no greater success. Distribution of money in profusion injured their cause more than helped it. The Nestor-ians, speaking of Protestantism, said: "That religion is not a religion; rather it is the overturning of all religion." [12] Catholicism, on the contrary, won many proselytes. Bishop Audu wrote that 35,000 sheep had been brought back to the fold.

Unfortunately the beginning of schism which occurred in the Church of Chaldea interrupted the course of its happy destinies. We saw above what was the attitude of the patriarch Audu at the Vatican Council. There he had strongly defended the ancient usages of his Church regarding the election of the bishops. The appointment of two prelates by Pius IX had greatly offended him. Nevertheless his submission to the dogma of infallibility and the other dogmas proclaimed by the council had been unqualified. He merely added that, from the disciplinary point of view, he made a reservation, already proclaimed by the Council of Florence and not abolished by the Vatican Council: Salvis omnibus juribus et privilegiis patriarcharum. Cardinal Barnabo had registered his declaration, remarking to him that the council, by decreeing the direct authority of the pope over the whole Church, made no exception for the Eastern Church, but that this authority would always be exercised by taking account of particular circumstances.[13] But in 1873 difficulties arose, still about episcopal elections, between Propaganda and the patriarch. The latter refused to submit to the decisions of Rome, which he declared were arbitrary, and led with him several bishops, the chief personages of the nation, and the monks of Raban Ormez. On May 24, 1874, on his own authority he consecrated nine bishops. A letter which Pius IX wrote to him on September 16, 1875, was regarded by him as null, because he considered it inspired to the Pope by the jealousy of the Dominicans. But when, in 1877, the Sovereign Pontiff called upon him to comply with the papal orders or to separate from the Church, the venerable prelate, who was animated by a deep sentiment of piety and devotion to the Church,[14] promptly submitted. He then had the grief of seeing many of his faithful and of his priests rise up against him. His successor, Bishop Abolian, elected on February 28, 1879, succeeded in establishing peace in the Chaldean Church. We know with what care Leo XIII had at heart to grant the Eastern Churches all the privileges based on respectable traditions and compatible with the essential rights of the Holy See.

[12] Marshall, Christian Missions, II, 118.
[13] Granderath, III, 268.

Otherwise serious was the crisis that broke out in Armenia. The Catholics of Armenia had passed through varied fortunes. Those who, to escape from the Turkish persecutions, had taken refuge in Austria, had the better lot. Those fixed in Russia saw themselves organized on the model of the Muscovite Church and were never able to have relations with a Catholic missioner. We have already seen how the Catholic Armenians of Turkey, at first made dependent on the schismatic patriarch, were finally freed. In 1850 Catholicism had made such progress that Pius IX authorized Archbishop Hassoun to erect six suffragan bishoprics: those of Brousse, Angora, Artwin, Erzeroum, Trebizond, and Ispahan. Sixteen years later, Hassoun was elected patriarch by the bishops of his district. Pius IX, who knew the new patriarch's devotion to the Holy See, profited by this choice to accomplish in the Armenian Church a reform decided on long before. By his bull Reversurus (July 12, 1867), destined to become famous in the history of the Eastern Churches: 1. he united into one the two ecclesiastical circumscriptions of Constantinople and Cilicia and fixed the residence of the patriarch at Constantinople; 2. he decided that in the future the elections to the Patriarchate and to the episcopal sees would be done by the bishops to the exclusion of the laity and that the patriarch-elect would not be enthroned or perform any act of jurisdiction before receiving confirmation of his election by the pope; 3. he stipulated that the intervention of the bishops in the election to an episcopal see would consist merely in proposing to the pope three candidates, from whom the pope would make his choice, moreover, reserving to himself the right to choose a priest outside the three proposed if these did not appear to him sufficiently able or worthy.

[14] In his consistorial allocution of February 28, 1879, Leo XIII called him Antistes quem eximius pietatis et religionis sensus ornabat. Acta Leonis XIII, I, 199.

Protests were made. Those protesting held that the Pope exceeded his rights and reduced those of the nation. An intervention by Bishop Valerga, papal legate, temporarily restored peace in 1868, giving the clergy and people a part in the election of the two bishops who assisted the patriarch. But in a synodal assembly (July 5, 1869) an open revolt broke out. The patriarch was loudly accused of having betrayed, to the profit of the pope, the age-long rights of the Armenian Church. A month later, when Bishop Hassoun had to go to Rome for the council, the boldness of his adversaries increased. The patriarchal administrator, Bishop Gasparian, put himself at their head. The new administrator, sent from Rome, was not received; the bull Reversurus was publicly burned. A new patriarch, Badhiarian, was elected. The grand vizir Aali pasha entered into negotiations, to appease the difference, with Bishop Pluym, then with Bishop Franchi, papal legate; but his successor, Mahmoud pasha, favored the dissidents. Patriarch Hassoun was exiled. In July, 1872, he left for Rome. There he remained until February, 1874. At that time he was able to return to Constantinople, but could not yet recover the possession of the property which the dissidents had seized. That restitution was made only to his successor, Bishop Azarian, elected in 1887. After that, the schism disappeared.[15] [15] The bull Reversurus, directed to the Armenians, announced that its prescriptions would presently be extended to all the Eastern patriarchates. But the disturbances stirred up in Armenia by this bull and those provoked in Chaldea by the extension of these measures prompted the Pope not to pursue this project. On this point, see De Angelis, Praelectiones juris canonici, I, 131.

This was not, alas, the only calamity the Church had to fight in Armenia. Of all the Eastern nations, none was more disturbed by the Protestant propaganda. "The American societies were established in Armenia after the war of 1854. They were not satisfied with training Armenian ministers and teachers, for the apostolate of Armenia. The children of the most important families were accustomed to seek in Europe, especially at Paris, a more complete education; the advice of the American teachers urged on this elite to London. The English, if they did not put an end to the evils of Armenia, at least proclaimed its rights." [16] This union of peoples attached both to the free government and to the Reformation, would work to the profit of Protestantism.

The importance of this movement cannot be denied. Yet "the influence of the zealous Catholic priests of the Armenian nation and that of numerous Latin missioners, Jesuit, Franciscan, Capuchin, Dominican, and Assumptionist, produced consoling results which increased with time." [17] An Armenian seminary, erected at Rome in 1884, helped to tighten the union of Catholic Armenia with the Holy See.

The Far East

If, from the countries of the East, we pass to the regions commonly designated as the Far East, we shall again meet, at the side of the infidels, whether pagan or Moslem, the formidable competition of Protestantism. In Hindustan, at the outset of Pius IX's pontificate, the evil was twofold. On one hand the substitution of the English influence for the Portuguese favored the development of Protestantism; on the other hand, schemes of the Lisbon court, which avenged its political failures by encroaching on the religious domain and by backing the schismatic clergy of Goa, hindered the action of the Holy See and thereby of the Catholic apostolate. On May 9, 1853, Pius IX, in severe language, summoned the schismatics to obedience; but the Lisbon Chamber of Deputies (July 20) declared that the act of the Pope was invalid because it was without the royal placet and because the rebellious ecclesiastics had merited well of the fatherland. The treaty concluded (February 20, 1857) between Cardinal di Pietro and the minister Fonseca Magalhaes, provided that the dioceses of Goa, Cranganor, Cochin, Meliapour, Maccala, and Macao would be given boundaries and that the Pope would issue a new bull of circumscription. Thus was the schism virtually ended. And from this period the progress of the Catholic evangelization was rapid. The new archbishop of Goa, Amorin-Pessoa, in 1862 suspended the schismatics who still resisted. But at each difficulty arising between the higher authorities on one side and the clergy and people on the other, the schism, assured of the protection of the government, revived. The Portuguese cabinet, attached to Freemasonry, opposed the sending of religious missioners and contested the validity or the meaning of the apostolic letters or decrees of the Roman congregations. These obstacles, in addition to those created by the caste spirit of the Indians, their idolatrous prejudices, and the Protestant proselytism made the efforts of the missioners most meritorious. The number of Catholics in eastern India, which in 1864 rose to 990,000, attained the figure of 1,210,000 in 1875.

[16] Lamy, op. cit., p. 209.

[17] Janin, in the Echos d'Orient, January, 1916, p. 32.

India

The rapid extension of the Catholic missions in India is owing chiefly to the exceptional worth of one missioner, Bishop Bonnaud. Missioner in the Indies in 1824, appointed coadjutor to the Bishop of Pondichery in 1833, then raised to the office of vicar apostolic of the Indies in 1836, Bishop Bonnaud had all the qualities of an apostle and an administrator.[18] He published several works of religious exposition and apologetics. The principal one was the Veda-poura-telteimaroutel, an exposition and history of Catholicism under the form of a history of mankind. The work, well written and lively, summed up the Old Testament, the Gospel accounts, and the annals of the Church, carefully noting and then refuting in passing the various heresies, particularly Protestantism and contemporary objections against the true religion. This work made a deep impression in the world of the educated.[19] By the training of a native clergy in minor and major seminaries, by the meeting of several synods at which the most important questions of worship and discipline were regulated, by the education of the youth of the country in numerous schools, Bishop Bonnaud gave a lively impulse to the Catholic movement. One of his most useful creations was that of colleges for girls. Thanks to these institutions, soon very prosperous, the old Indian prejudice forbidding any intellectual training for a decent woman,[20] was attacked and overcome. Thus the condition of woman was raised and her influence was increased.

Bishop Bonnaud died in 1860 in the course of a visit of all India, which the Sovereign Pontiff had asked him to make. This visitation was completed by Bishop Charbonneaux. The results of this survey of the Catholic forces in India, which lasted four years (1858–1862), were beyond measure. Relying on these results, Leo XIII was able to establish (1886) the Catholic hierarchy in India.

Bishop Bonnaud's successor, Bishop Laouënan, harvested the fruits of these labors. His episcopate, lasting till 1900, was, according to the missioners, the most brilliant and most consoling period of the history of Catholicism in India since St.

[18] Launay, Histoire de la Société des Missions étrangères, III, 8, 19.

[19] Ibid., p. 141.

[20] Dubois, Mœurs, institutions et cérémonies des peuples de l'Inde, p. 476. In this work, Bishop Bonnaud was seconded by the zeal of an excellent missioner, Father Dupuis.

Francis Xavier. The chief feature of this period was the evangelization of the pariahs by a holy missioner, Father Ligeon. Making use of a method of evangelization that resembled that of Father Nobili among the Brahmans,[21] Father Ligeon presented himself one day, accompanied by a servant, to a village chieftain. "I am fleeing from the wicked world," he said. "I am seeking a solitude where I may pray." The chieftain pointed out to him a piece of waste land; there, after the manner of the "saints" of the country, he made a shelter of branches, taking neither fermented drink nor animal food. He was venerated. The chieftain said: "This man is a saint. The gods are good since they allow this man to come and sanctify the country." At the end of a month, the inhabitants ventured to speak to him. The solitary replied to them in the words of St. John the Baptist: "Do penance for your sins." Then he taught them that God, the Master of the world, ought to be adored, loved, and served. He baptized those who were willing to accept the doctrine he preached. The baptisms increased in number. After the villages, the towns were evangelized by him. Between 1873 and 1886 he counted 76,000 conversions. This movement of conversion of the poor classes coincided also with a conversion movement among the educated classes. Catholicism soon counted one of its members in the royal Council of Maimour, Tambuchetti by name.[22]

China

Whereas in India the spread of Catholicism met especially the obstacles of a social and religious order, in the organization of the castes, and the people's attachment to a very ancient religion, in China it found itself in the presence of difficulties rather in-[21] See Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, VI, 192 f.

[22] Piolet, Les missions françaises au XIX^e siècle, II, 254. Interesting episodes of this conversion movement will be found in the Annales de la propagation de la foi, XLV (1872), 194–98.

herent in the national and family order: they did not wish a religion of foreigners, a religion that did not accept the worship of ancestors as practiced in the families of the country.

The treaties concluded (1842–1844) between China on the one side, and England, the United States, and France on the other, opened the Celestial Empire to the free intercourse of these three states. Guizot, president of the council of ministers, even obtained from the emperor, through the intermediary of the French consul, Lagrené, an edict (February 20, 1846) which restored to the Christians their former churches and permitted them to put up churches "at their good pleasure." [23] The missioners had reason to rejoice at these results. However—on this point the missioners did not delude themselves—the era of dangers was not closed. Easy to foresee was that the Chinaman, who is clever even to the point of being astute when he is ill disposed, would find ways to twist the literal force of the treaties; more than that, the freedom which the treaties left to every Christian religion to enter China would put the Catholic missioners in the presence of the formidable competition of the Protestant missioners, backed by England and America.

The immediate consequences of the treaties were excellent. In 1847 Bishop de Bési, making his official visit to the great mandarin of Chang-hai, was received with salvos of artillery.[24] The good dispositions of Emperor Tuo-Koang were continued at the beginning of the reign of his successor, who mounted the throne in 1851 and was prompted by a Christian governess to have a certain veneration of Christianity. During this period of peace the Vincentians Huc and Gabet made a journey in Tartary and Tibet, of which Father Huc wrote a most interesting account.[25] At this same period the Jesuits introduced the Carmelites into China. The Jesuits themselves penetrated into [23] See Annales de la propagation de la foi, XXI, 23 ff.

[24] Ibid., XXI, 28.
[25] Huc, Souvenirs d'un voyage dans la Tartarie, le Thibet et la Chine.

Kiang-Nan and founded in the Celestial Empire the famous observatory of Zi-Ka-Wei. In 1848 the Annales de la Propagation de la foi estimated at 315,000 the number of Christians in China, who were divided into 16 dioceses, evangelized by 84 European missioners (Vincentians, Priests of the Foreign Missions, Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans) and 135 native priests.[26]

But before long a pitiless persecution broke out. In 1851 the young Emperor Hien-Fong, who at first had manifested dispositions favorable to the Christians, let himself be dominated by a trusted sectarian, the literatus Tcheou-tien-tsio. Without openly denouncing the treaties of 1842 and 1844, which had been a casus belli, he communicated to the mandarins secret edicts revoking all the concessions made and revived all the ancient laws against the Christians. These latter finally procured the text of the famous edict, for, as Father Delaplace, a Vincentian missioner wrote, "in China no veil is so thick as not to become transparent in the light of a few sapeks." [27] The mandarins then proceeded by roundabout ways. Instead of proceeding against the Christians directly, they were satisfied to let bands of brigands full liberty to plunder and massacre. The Annales of 1852 are filled with accounts of outrages of this sort. In a word, in one way or another the treaties of 1842 and 1844 were, for the Chinese, a dead letter.

This violation of international law occasioned the Anglo-French expedition of 1857, which ended with the treaty of Tien-tsin, signed in 1858. Article 12 of the treaty stipulated that "properties belonging to the French and the English would be inviolable"; article 13 provided that "the laws issued against Christianity would be considered abrogated." [28] Bishop Des-

[26] Annales, XXI, 12.

[27] Ibid., XXVII, 103.

[28] France obtained the insertion of the following clause: "The passports of the Catholic missioners will be conferred by the French legation alone." This was a recognition of the sole protectorate of France over the Catholic missions. See flèches of Su-Tchuen, expressing the joy of the missioners, wrote in 1860, in a movement of enthusiasm: "The future belongs to us." But the future undeceived those premature hopes. The missioners had reckoned without the knavery of the Chinese sectarians. Two years had not passed since the signature of the Tien-tsin treaty when the persecutions began again. In 1862 Father Néel, of the Foreign Missions, was condemned to death and executed. Three years later Father Mabilleau was massacred in eastern Su-tchuen, and the mandarin, when called, refused to go to his rescue. In 1869 Father Rigaud was slain at the same time as ten of the faithful while he was kneeling before the altar of his church. From 1873 to 1878 the massacres increased with particular ferocity. Not merely every Christian, but every European was menaced. However, if this regime of terror paralyzed the weak, the noble souls, at sight of the superhuman virtues and the wholehearted unselfishness shown by the Catholic martyrs, began to love a religion that produced such examples of heroism. In the very midst of the persecutions, the missioners kept the hope of seeing Christianity spread in this vast empire. They abandoned neither their missions nor their orphanages nor their colleges, which continued to prosper; this was so true that, after the death of Pius IX, Leo XIII was able to erect several new vicariates or prefectures apostolic.[29]

Missions in Japan

Of all the missions, that of Japan brought the Holy Father the greatest consolations. In Japan the Christians had formerly undergone the most violent persecutions; and at the time of Pius IX's elevation to the Supreme Pontificate, the leaders of that vast empire were still observing with the most pitiless rigor the

---

Cogordan, "Les missions catholiques en Chine et le protectorate de la France," in the Revue des Deux Mondes, December 15, 1886.

[29] Acta Leonis XIII, I, 67; III, 140, 295.

terrible statement of the edict of 1640: "As long as the sun warms the earth, let no Christian enter Japan. Even if it should be the king of Spain or the God of the Christians, he will pay for it with his head." [30]

In 1844, after the conclusion of a pact known as the treaty of Lagrené, which proclaimed religious liberty in China, Admiral Cécille formed the project of opening relations with Korea and Japan. He landed on Riou-Kiou, to the south of Japan, a young missioner, Father Forcade, later bishop of Never, afterward archbishop of Aix, and a Chinese catechist, presenting them to the authorities as two interpreters who were going to learn Japanese on the island. But they were so closely watched and guarded that they were unable to get in touch with the natives, who were forbidden to speak to them under penalty of death. Other missioners had the same fate. Father Colin, who walked 400 miles over horrible roads, in order to penetrate Japan by the north, died worn out by fatigue upon arriving in Manchuria. In 1855 three missioners succeeded in establishing themselves in a monastery of bonzes, on one of the Riou-Kiou islands. This time they succeeded in instructing and baptizing a young man, their servant. But immediately after his baptism, the young neophyte disappeared, probably assassinated; and shortly afterward the King of Nafa issued a law punishing with death whoever should embrace Christianity.

The expedition of the Franco-English fleet in China (1857–1860) had an influence on the relations of Europe with Japan. A treaty of 1858 opened to commerce certain ports of the empire and admitted the presence of a consul general of France at Yedo. In these ports open to commerce some missioners were established; and even the construction of some churches for the use of European Catholics was tolerated; but entrance into them was strictly forbidden to the Japanese. The government had 55 natives arrested who allowed themselves to visit these places. Seemingly never did a country put up a more invincible opposition to the preaching of the gospel. However, the day of the great evangelization of Japan was approaching. It came following the events that we are about to relate in some details, because they constitute a unique episode in the history of the Church.

[30] See Mourret, op. cit., VI, 199.

For five years (1860–1865) the missioners, deprived of any means of direct apostolate, had nothing else to do but pray and sanctify themselves, while carefully studying the language, the customs, and the political, social, and religious organization of the people they were preparing to evangelize. The population seemed to them mild, intelligent, sympathetic, but trembling under the sometimes meddlesome authority of the lords and of the literati. The lords were divided into two classes: the daimos, belonging to the higher class, who had fortresses and raised armies, and the samourai, who formed a lower nobility. At the apex of the hierarchy, the mikado, legitimate sovereign, residing at Tokio, had a power more nominal than real; immediately below him, the taicoun or shogun, chief of the aristocracy, filled almost the same role as the mayors of the palace under the last of the Merovingian kings. The national religion was shintoism, which honored as gods the ancestors of the mikado; but, in the measure that the mikado's power was weakened, Buddhism, imported from China in the sixth century, had supplanted shintoism, which was scarcely anything more than a national liturgy. While the missioners took note of these details, the population and the authorities, on their side, carefully observed the missioners' life, customs, and, as far as possible, their religious habits.

Discovery of Christians in Japan

About noon on March 17, 1865, the missioners of Nagasaki saw enter into their church a group of from twelve to fifteen persons, men and women, whose religious attitude struck them.

An aged woman came up to them and, holding her hand on her breast, said to them in a low voice: "Our heart is the same as yours. . . . Where is the image of St. Mary?" The visitors were led before the altar of the Blessed Virgin. They fell to their knees. Beyond question, they were Christians. In secret conversations with them, the missioners learned that, for two hundred years, without priests, without the sacraments except baptism—its rite and form having been religiously kept—they had kept the Catholic faith, waiting for priests in whom they were to recognize these three signs: devotion to the Virgin Mary, celibacy, and obedience to the chief at Rome. They had three centers in Japan: the first, in the valley of Urakami, near Nagasaki; the second at Omura, north of Nagasaki; the third in the Soto islands, to the west of the same city.

The Catholic missioners had as their superior a holy priest, Father Petitjean. In the posts which he held successively as professor in the minor seminary, sisters' chaplain, and curé in the diocese of Autun, by his zeal and kindness he won the regard of all. In Japan, where he became the first bishop, he soon received the same testimonies of esteem and respectful confidence. Under his direction the Christian group of Urakami soon became "a nursery of apostles as well as a vast catechumenate." [31] Even some bonzes asked to be instructed in the Christian religion. At first the authorities did not seem to be upset. Were they afraid of reprisals on the part of the European governments or, by a refinement of perfidy, did they intend to encourage the Christians to declare themselves openly that they might be the better known?

However this may be, on the night of July 13, 1867, without any forewarning of such an event, all the chapels of the valley of Urakami were pillaged by emissaries of the government, and sixty-four of the principal Christians were arrested. How are we to account for this sudden outrage? Presently it was known that the policy was largely instigated by the party of the mikado, if not in the outrage itself, at least in the suddenness of its execution. In the conflict that put the partisans of the mikado in opposition to those of the shogun, the former blamed the latter for too easily opening the empire to the foreigners; to strengthen their case, they appealed to the old Japanese patriotism. In taking the initiative of the persecution against the Christians, the mikado claimed to win over or to retain more easily to his cause the patriots of the empire.

[31] Marnas, La religion de Jésus ressuscitée au Japon, I, 578.

The tortures began. They were of an unprecedented cruelty. The victims' arms and legs were twisted, the throat was gradually squeezed to the point of choking, and then they were promised immediate release if they agreed to abandon "the religion of the foreigners" and return to the religion of their country. On the first day, when a leader yielded, many followed his example. But a young man, of timid appearance and of frail constitution, Zen-Yemon, by his unshaken constancy, raised the courage of his brethren. Seven times he was made to appear and be tortured; seven times he refused to deny "the religion of Jesus." Probably out of fear of a repression by the European powers, they did not dare put him to death. His example put to shame the apostates, who retracted in a crowd. After that, the courage of the Christians of Urakami did not give way. Equally admirable was the courage of the Christians of Omura who were proceeded against soon afterward.

But at this juncture (January 3, 1868) a political revolution took place in favor of the young mikado Montzu-Hito; the shogunate was abolished, the party of the nobility was crushed. At first it was believed that this triumph of the party that particularly showed hostility to the foreigners was going to be fatal to the Christians. But it was not so. The troops of the mikado had won only by the support of the nations of Europe and America, which had furnished them with munitions and engines of war; the war power and the industrial and commercial might of those nations was revealed to the eyes of those Japanese, inquiring minds, ambitious for glory and progress. On the other hand, the abolition of a rival party made more evident the full intent of the new government. This was the starting point of that prodigious rise of the Japanese people toward European civilization which, in a short time, would raise it to the level of the most advanced peoples.

This political revolution would little by little lead the empire of Japan to the tolerance of Christianity. A new persecution did, however, begin in June, 1868. This time it reached not only the Christians of Urakami and Omura, but also those of the Soto islands. From Urakami 4,000 Christians were deported to the different provinces of the empire. Many were tortured; none were put to death; but about 2,000 died in consequence of ill treatment.

But the revolution of 1868 had its repercussion on the religious situation of Japan. The mikado, head of the national religion, advanced the pretext that the Buddhist bonzes had favored his rival and had opposed the reforms. He confiscated their endowments and turned a number of their temples into buildings of public use. This decline of Buddhism was favorable to the spread of Christianity. Fundamentally, shintoism was merely a sort of divinizing of the Japanese patriotism. The missioners pointed out to the Christians that they could, without turning their patriotism into idolatry, show themselves, toward the mikado, the most respectful of his subjects, and, toward their country, the most ardent of patriots. A French diplomatic intervention did the rest. On February 21, 1873, the Japanese minister of foreign affairs transmitted to the dean of the diplomatic corps at Tokio the following note: "Regarding the persons who follow the religion of Jesus, we suppress all the edicts." A month later all the Christian prisoners were released.

Not all the obstacles were removed. The missioners often had to encounter the popular prejudices, the jealousy of the shintoist priests and of the bonzes, and the ill will of the imperial officials; but the field was open to the apostolate. That apostolate was shown especially in public conferences which attracted large numbers of hearers, by works of the press, which carried religious truth to the popular masses, by works of education, which reached the children of the upper classes, and lastly by the training of a native clergy. On December 21, 1882, Bishop Petitjean ordained the first Japanese priest; he was the son of Zen-Yemon, the heroic confessor of the faith in the Urakami valley.[32]

Korea

The Church of Korea, after being a long time without shepherds, in 1827 was confided to the Society of Foreign Missions, which, barely succeeding in reorganizing its staff which had been destroyed by the Revolution, was able to send to Korea, in 1832, Bishop Brugnière, previously coadjutor of the vicar apostolic of Siam. With the title of vicar apostolic of Korea, Bishop Brugnière spent more than three years crossing China from south to north. Exhausted with fatigue, the venerable prelate died (October 25, 1835) in a village of Mongolia, in sight of the mountains of Korea. At the end of 1837, Bishop Imbert was more fortunate; he joined in Korea two missioners, Fathers Mauband and Chastan, who were already there. But in 1839 a sudden persecution broke out, in which the three apostles received the palm of martyrdom.

For six years the poor Church again was without a priest. In 1845 Bishop Ferréol was able to enter that land, accompanied by Father Daveluy, who was martyred eleven years later, and by Andrew Kim, the first Korean priest, who also gave his life for the faith. On the death of Bishop Ferréol in 1853, a former confessor of the faith in Tonkin, Bishop Berneux, became the next bishop. Under his direction, the mission of Korea developed. At the beginning of 1866 it counted a vicar apostolic, Bishop Berneux, a coadjutor, Bishop Daveluy, ten European missioners, a seminary, and 18,000 Christians. It had never prospered so well; but, alas, it was on the eve of being completely wiped out. The party hostile to the Europeans controlled the court of Seoul; the mass extermination of the Christians was decided on. Bishop Berneux, Bishop Daveluy, and Father Just Brentenières were the chief victims of that persecution.

[32] For more details, see Marnas, op. cit.

At Rome, in the midst of the council (June 5, 1870), on Pentecost Sunday, Cardinal Bonnechose, archbishop of Rouen, in the presence of thirty-six bishops, nearly all of them missioners and several of them confessors of the faith, consecrated Bishop Ridel, to whom Pius IX entrusted the perilous task of receiving the inheritance of the martyrs. Almost as soon as he entered Korea, Bishop Ridel was arrested and imprisoned. But, after five years of prison, the prelate was simply sent back to China. The Korean government had finally realized the uselessness of its barbarity. The era of bloody persecutions was over. Bishop Ridel, worn out by hard infirmities, died in France, but his successor, Bishop Blanc, whose apostolate was soon interrupted by his death, and Bishop Mutel, who at once took his place, had the consolation of harvesting the graces obtained by so many martyrs.

Oceania

When we pass from Asia to Oceania, we find there at first the young and flourishing Christianity of Australia. The work of the Irish clergy, it counted in 1845 only 46 priests, 25 churches, and 31 schools. In spite of the attacks, sometimes violent, of the Anglicans and the Methodists, the Catholic centers there continued to prosper. By Irish immigrations and by the conversion of Protestants and of natives, the number of the faithful increased to such a point as soon to require the creation of seven new dioceses. An assembly of bishops, held at Sydney in 1866, considered the questions of schools, mixed marriages, and the state of the seminaries and of the clergy. A second provincial council was held in 1869, at which were convoked the provincials of the Jesuits and of the Marists.

In New Zealand the missioners had also to contend against the Protestants. Not satisfied with evangelizing the natives in the villages and with organizing large religious centers in the cities, the missioners followed the European colonists in their agricultural exploitations, the gold seekers in their placers, and tried to snatch these from vice and crime, to fight by pen and public lectures their heretical doctrines. Their efforts were particularly blessed in the uncivilized island of the Wallis, whose rulers—King Lavéloua, who reigned until 1858, and Queen Falakika, his sister, who succeeded him from 1858 to 1868, and the noble and pious queen Amelia, his daughter, who governed the island after 1868—showed themselves intelligent and energetic protectors of Catholicism. Queen Amelia has left in the memory of the missioners and of navigators who knew her, the impression of a soul remarkably noble and pure. Admiral Aube wrote: "Outwardly mild and humble, but at bottom energetic and resolute, this queen has contributed tremendously to the triumph of Christianity." [33]

In New Caledonia the opposition was violent. The Kanaka cannibals, organized and stirred up by English traders, attacked the missioners and sacked the missions; when France took possession of the country in 1853, the situation did not improve. The vexations of Governor Guillain considerably hindered the work of evangelization. But from 1871 to 1878, under the administration of Bishop Vitte and Bishop Fraysse, numerous conversions took place, and schools were founded. Admiral Courbet, visiting the island at this period, noted with pleasure the progress that Christian civilization had made there.[34]

[33] Piolet, Les missions françaises au XIX^e siècle, IV, 105.
[34] Lecanuet, op. cit., I, 149.

Quite rightly the Marists have been called the missioners of Oceania. In the islands of the Wallis, of Futuna, and of Tonga, which constituted the vicariate of central Oceania; in the islands of Samoa, the Fijis, New Zealand, New Caledonia, New Hebrides, and the Solomons, they exercised an apostolic zeal consecrated by the sacrifice of life. The Picpus fathers evangelized the Sandwich Islands and the Marquises; the missioners of the Sacred Heart of Issoudun evangelized the Gilberts, the Ellices, and New Guinea. When reading the annals of their missions, you would think you were reading the accounts of the first ages of Christianity. When Bishop Bataillon, a Marist, felt himself near death, he summoned the Christians to his church, put on his episcopal vestments as on the most beautiful feast days, and received the last sacraments with incomparable serenity. Shortly afterwards, stretched on a straw mat in the shade of a tree, there to die, he was surprised that he no longer heard the noise of the workmen who were working on his cathedral. A Christian replied: "Father, we fear to disturb your last moments." "No, no," he said, "let me fall asleep to the sound of that music, it is already for me a joy of heaven." [35]

That simple heroism is seen in the life of Bishop Pompallier, who devoted himself to the salvation of the poor Maoris of New Zealand; of Bishop Viard, first bishop of Wellington in New Zealand; of Bishop Epalle, vicar apostolic of Melanesia and Micronesia, massacred by the cannibals; of Bishop Douarre, the apostle of the Kanakas. But the most engaging figure is that of Father Damien Deveuster.

"A native of Belgium, he was a member of the Society of the Sacred Hearts (Picpus fathers); his heroic devotion honors the Church and all mankind. Leprosy was ravaging the Sandwich Islands. All the unfortunates afflicted with the scourge were relegated to the island of Molokai. Abandoned to themselves, without help of any kind, they gave themselves up, to forget their wretchedness, to drunkenness and the most shocking excesses. Stirred to the depth of his soul, the holy religious asked his bishop to let him go to Molokai. For thirteen years he was the companion of the lepers, as well as their pastor and their father. On April 15, eaten up by the disease which decimated his flock, he died, saying: "Oh, how sweet it is to die a child of the Sacred Heart!" [36]

[35] Maugeret, Mgr Bataillon.

Africa

At the same time Providence was opening a new era on the great Dark Continent.

While the European powers were going to divide the land of Africa, new apostles would rise up to precede them or follow them. To the east the movement of evangelization started from the Bourbon Island. Successively two holy priests of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, Father Dalmont and Father Monnet, after evangelizing the islands of Sainte-Marie and Nossi-Bé, were appointed vicars apostolic of Madagascar; but death prevented either of them from establishing himself there. Then, in 1850, the mission was turned over to the fathers of the Society of Jesus. We know the great good they have accomplished there. Without them, Madagascar would today be Protestant and English.

Likewise from Bourbon in 1860 set out the first missioner to carry the gospel to Zanzibar; it was Father Fava, who later died as bishop of Grenoble. Shortly afterward the sons of Father Libermann [37] took possession of the mission. The Congregation of the Holy Ghost was thenceforth charged with the evangelization of the greater part of the Dark Continent. However, a new and providential help came to the Church. In 1859 Bishop Marion de Brésillac founded at Lyons the work of the African missions. Ten years later (1868), Archbishop Lavigerie of Algiers gathered about him a few priests of good will who formed the Society of Notre-Dame of Africa. The [36] Lecanuet, op. cit., I, 445; Correspondant, July 25, 1889.

[37] On the foundation of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, see Pitra, Vie du R. P. Libermann, and Le Floch, Vie du P. Poulart des Places.

"White Fathers," as they are more commonly called, made their first attempts of the apostolate in Kabylie. But in 1876, following the conference of Brussels, which would end eight years later in the congress of Berlin and in the partition of Africa, they saw open before them a new field, vast and fertile.[38]

Greed and ambition were able, with renewed eagerness, to resume "the assault on the Negro countries"; but the Church had solidly set foot there, and the marvels of heroism of which the missions of Uganda would give the spectacle to the world in 1886, would show how deep had been the influence of the Church there.

America

Pius IX, who in his young days had been sent on a diplomatic mission to South America, was particularly interested in that part of the world. Freemasonry was exercising its baleful influence almost everywhere there. In no country was it more powerful than in Brazil, where Emperor Pedro had greatly favored its development. To Freemasonry we must trace responsibility for the law expelling the religious orders and for the persecution against the bishops faithful to defend the rights of the Church. The most courageous of these bishops, Bishop Oliveira of the order of the Capuchins, was exiled in 1874 for having publicly condemned the society of Freemasons and for having refused to appear, in a purely religious case, before the supreme court of Rio de Janeiro. Several priests were imprisoned. However, new elections brought to power men who were more respectful of the independence of the episcopal office. The government maintained a minister plenipotentiary at Rome, and the Pope an internuncio at Rio de Janeiro.

In Venezuela, in the Argentine Republic, evangelized by the new congregation of Don Bosco's Salesian missioners,[39] in the [38] Le Roy, "Afrique," in Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie, I, 543.

[39] See Villefranche, Vie de don Bosco.

Republic of Haiti, where the missioners, almost all of French origin, had to struggle against anarchy; in Mexico, where the Dominicans and the Carmelites found themselves in the presence of the emissaries of Prince Bismarck; to some extent everywhere, except in the Republic of Ecuador, the Church was faced with numerous obstacles to its development. One of the most effective measures taken by Pius IX for the religious improvement of those countries was the erection at Rome of a seminary intended to receive the young clerics of Latin America, sent by their bishops to follow the courses of the Roman universities.

In North America, both in Canada and in the United States, the Church, free from these movements, had, during the pontificate of Pius IX, continually grown in numbers, in influence, and in organization. The chief stages of this development in Canada were marked: 1. by the holding at Quebec in 1868 of a provincial council, which stressed particularly the rights of the papacy, and the various works for the preservation, defense, and spread of the faith; 2. by the erection of a large number of bishoprics and the increase in the number of parishes; 3. by the erection at Quebec in 1876 of Laval University, whose various faculties were organized slowly, but with complete success, from 1878 to 1887.[40]

In the United States, immense efforts were crowned with the most brilliant results. In the first place, the scarcity of priests and the lack of material resources obliged most of the bishops to beg in Europe for vocations and pecuniary help. On the other hand, at each assembly of the episcopate, ecclesiastical discipline was strengthened by a prudent and progressive legislation. The Oxford movement made itself felt in America. Brilliant intellects came to find peace and light in its bosom. Brownson, the celebrated philosopher and writer, Hecker, the future founder of the congregation of [40] For more information on these developments, see A. Fournet, s.v. "Canada" in Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie, and the abundant bibliography given in that article.

the Paulists, embraced the Roman faith. The Catholic forces of the United States appeared especially in the plenary council held in Baltimore in 1852, under the presidency of Archbishop Kenrick. Between 1861 and 1866 the Civil War was for the Catholic movement a severe trial. Catholicism had much to suffer in the states of the South and the West, transformed into battlefields. But, after the war, with the approbation of Pius IX, Archbishop Spalding, Kenrick's successor in the see of Baltimore, assembled (October 7, 1866) a second plenary council, which was the starting point of a new flowering of Catholicism in the United States. The naming of the archbishop of New York to the cardinalate in 1875 was the crowning of a hierarchy which, in less than a century, had become strongly constituted.[41]

Following the Vatican Council, the American Catholics might have feared that their submission to the Holy See and the prodigious growth of their institutions, works, and religious congregations would place them under suspicion in the midst of the American Republic. This danger seems not to have developed. The clergy and the episcopate have, on the contrary, enjoyed a more and more intimate contact with the nation and even with the public powers. The government at Washington received with all the honors due to his rank an apostolic delegate of Pope Leo XIII. In 1893, when celebrating the fourth centenary of the discovery of America by Europe, the public authorities invited the Archbishop of New York to inaugurate, by a religious discourse, the universal exposition organized on that occasion, and the Roman Pontiff was himself invited to participate in the celebration of the American civilization. Did our separated brethren of the New World recall that Christopher Columbus, when setting foot on the soil of the new world and planting the cross there, intended to take possession of it in the name of the Roman Church? In the midst of the increasing dissents and the breaking up of the Protestant sects, were they not impressed by the majestic spectacle of the Catholic hierarchy, [41] André, s.v. "Etats-Unis," in Vacant's Dictionnaire de théologie, I, 1050–61.

by the resulting unanimous accord, among its members, on the great and inevitable problems of life? However this may be, we can say today that the great American Republic regards Rome without hatred or mistrust. Said one of the noblest sons of Catholic America, Cardinal Gibbons: "When a person regards Rome in the midst of Europe, it there appears, like the dome of St. Peter's in the midst of the Roman Campagna, alone attracting and holding the eyes of the traveler, while about him all the rest fades from sight."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The following is a list of the works referred to in this volume.

Acta Leonis XIII.
Acta Pii IX, 1875, 6 vols.
ADAM, Mme Edmond: Après l'abandon de la revanche, 1910.
ADHÉMAR d'Antioche: Deux diplomates.
AGRIGENTE, d': Le cardinal Mermillod, 1893.
ALADEL: La médaille miraculeuse, 1895.
ANGELIS, De: Praelectiones juris canonici.
Annales de la propagation de la foi.
ARTAUD de Montor: Histoire de Léon XII, 1843.
Histoire de Pie VIII, 1844.
AZEGLIO, M. d': Lettere inedite.
Ricordi, 1867.
Scritti politici, 1938, 3 vols.

BAINVEL: La dévotion au Sacré-Cœur de Jésus, 1916.
BAINVILLE, J.: Histoire de deux peuples, 1915.
BALAN, Pietro: Storia d'Italia.
BALLANCHE, P. S.: Du sentiment considéré dans ses rapports avec la littérature et les arts.
Essais de palingénésie sociale.
Essai sur les institutions sociales.
BALLEYDIER: Histoire de la Révolution de Rome.
BALMES, Jaime: Pio IX, 1847.
Protestantism and Catholicity Compared.
BARANTE, M. de: Notice sur M. le comte de Saint-Aulaire.
BARBERI (ed.): Bullarii Romani continuatio, 1835–57, 19 vols.
BARBIER, G.: Mgr Sauvé, 1898, 2 vols.
BASTIDE: La République française et l'Italie.

BAUDRILLART: Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastique.
Vie de Mgr d'Hulst, 1914, 2 vols.
BAUNARD: Frédéric Ozanam, 1913.
Histoire du cardinal Pie, 2 vols.
Le cardinal Lavigerie, 1896.
Un siècle de l'Eglise de France, 1902.
Vie du général de Sonis.
Vie du vicomte Armand de Melun, 1880.
BAZIN, G.: Vie de Mgr Maret, 1891, 2 vols.
BEAUFORT: Histoire de l'invasion des Etats pontificaux.
BEAUREGARD, Costa de: L'epilogue d'un règne, 1890.
BÉHAINE, L. de: Léon XIII et Bismarck, 1899.
BELLAMY, J.: Théologie catholique au XIX^e siècle, 1904.
BELLARMINE, Robert: Controversia generalis de conciliis.
De Romano Pontifice.
BERNARD, St.: De consideratione.
BERNASCONI: Acta Gregorii papae XVI, 1904, 4 vols.
BERSANGE: Dom François-Regis.
BERTHIER: Notre-Dame de la Salette.
BERTRIN, G.: Historie critique des événements de Lourdes.
BESSON: Vie du cardinal de Bonnechose, 1887.
Vie du cardinal Mathieu.
Xavier de Mérode.
BIANCHI: Storia documentata.
BILLOT: De Ecclesiae sacramentis, 1893.
BIRÉ, Edmond: La presse royaliste de 1830 à 1852.
BLAIZE: Œuvres inédites de Lamennais, 1866, 2 vols.
BLANC, Louis: Histoire de dix ans.
BLANCHE-RAFFIN, A. de: Jacques Balmès.
BOEHMER-MONOD: Les Jésuites, 1910.
BONALD, Louis de: Economie sociale.
Législation primitive.
Mélanges, 1852.
Réflexions sur le Mémoire à consulter.
BORÉ, E.: L'Arménie, 1846.
BOSSUET, J. B.: Œuvres.

BOUTARD: Lamennais, 1913, 3 vols.
BOWDEN: The Life and Letters of Frederick William Faber, 1869.
BREMOND, H.: L'inquiétude religieuse.
BRIGGS: The Papal Commission and the Pentateuch, 1906.
BROU, A.: Les Jésuites de la légende, 1907, 2 vols.
BRUGÈRE: Tableau de l'histoire et de la littérature de l'Eglise.
BRUNETIÈRE, F.: Manuel de l'histoire de la littérature française.
BUISSON, F.: L'enseignement de l'histoire sainte, 1869.
Bullarii romani continuatio, 1857, 19 vols.
BUNSEN, Baron: Gott in der Geschichte.
BUNSEN, Frances: A Memoir of Baron Bunsen.
BURNICHON: La Compagnie de Jésus en France, 1914.

CABROL: Dictionnaire d'archéologie.
CADORNA: La liberazione di Roma, 1889.
CALIPPE: Attitude sociale des catholiques au XIX^e^ siècle, 1911.
CAMP, M. du: Les convulsions de Paris.
CANTÙ, Cesare: Della indipendenza italiana.
Gli eretici d'Italia, 1866.
Storia di cento anni, 1851.
CAPPELLARI, B. A.: Il trionfo della Santa Sede et della Chiesa contra gli assalti dei novatori.
CARNÉ, L. de: Vues sur l'histoire contemporaine, 1833.
CARRIÈRE, Joseph: Praelectiones theologicae majores, 1846, 8 vols.
CARTIER: Vie du R. P. Besson.
CASANOVAS: Apologetica de Balmès.
CAUSSETTE: Manrèze du prêtre.
CAVALOTTI, A.: Memorie sulle società segrete dell'Italia meridionale e specialmente sui carbonari, 1904.
CAVOUR, Camillo: Lettere, 1887, 6 vols.
CECCONI: Historia de Concilio ecumenico Vaticano, 1879, 4 vols.
CHANTREL: Annales ecclésiastiques.
CHARON, Cyril: Histoire des patriarchats melkites, 1910, 3 vols.
CHASLE: Sœur Marie du Divin Cœur, 1905.
CHASSEGROS: Histoire du noviciat de la Compagnie de Jésus au Canada, 1903.

CHATEAUBRIAND, F. R.: Etudes historiques.
Mémoires d'outre-tombe.
CHAUVIN: Le P. Gratry, 1901.
CHEVALIER, A.: Les Frères des écoles chrétiennes et l'enseignement primaire après la Révolution, 1887.
CHOCARNE, Bernard: Le P. Lacordaire, sa vie intime, 1866, 2 vols.
CHOUPIN, L.: Valeur des décisions doctrinales et disciplinaires du Saint-Siège, 1907.
CHURCH: The Oxford Movement.
CIVEZZA: Histoire universelle des missions franciscaines.
CLAIR: Les Jésuites et la liberté religieuse sous la Restauration.
Vie du P. Olivaint, 1879.
CLÉMENT: Histoire du système protecteur en France depuis Colbert, 1854.
COGNAT: M. Renan hier et aujourd'hui, 1886.
Collectio lacensis, 1870, 7 vols.
CORMENIN, L. de: Le livre des orateurs.
CORNUT: Mgr Freppel, 1898.
Correspondance du prince de Talleyrand et de Louis XVIII.
CRÉTINEAU-JOLY: Histoire du Sonderbund, 1850.
L'Eglise romaine en face de la Révolution, 1859, 2 vols.
CRUICE: Vie de Denis-Auguste Affre, 1849.
CURNIER: La jeunesse de Frédéric Ozanam, 1888.
CURZON, E. de: Frédéric Le Play, 1899.

DALGAIRNS, J. D.: The Devotion to the Sacred Heart, 1853.
The Holy Communion, 1861.
DARRAS, J. E.: History of the Catholic Church, 1866.
DAUDET, Ernest: Histoire diplomatique de l'alliance franco-russe.
DAUX, C.: Le denier de Saint-Pierre, 1907.
DECURTINS: Œuvres choisies de Mgr Ketteler, 1892.
DENIS, Ernest: La fondation de l'empire allemand.
DENZINGER-BANNWART: Enchiridion symbolorum.
DESCHAMPS: Le monopole universitaire.
Les sociétés secrètes et la société, 1881, 3 vols.
Lettres théologiques.

DESDEVISES du Dezert: L'Eglise et l'Etat en France, 1908, 2 vols.
DIANCOURT: Les Allemands à Reims, 1884.
Dictionnaire de la foi catholique.
DIDIOT, J.: Un siècle.
DIONYSIUS the Areopagite: De nominibus divinis.
DITO, Oreste: Massoneria, carboneria ed altre società segrete nella storia del Risorgimento italiano, 1905.
DOELLINGER, Ignaz: Der Papst und das Konzil.
Dom Guéranger, abbé de Solesmes, 1909, 2 vols.
DONOSO-CORTES: Œuvres, 1862, 3 vols.
DOUMIC, Max: Le secret de la Franc-Maçonnerie, 1905.
DUBOIS: Mœurs . . . des peuples de l'Inde, 1825, 2 vols.
DUDON, Paul: Lamennais et le Saint-Siège, 1911.
DUPANLOUP: La souveraineté pontificale.
DUPLAY, Simon: Mémoire sur les sociétés et les conspirations sous la Restauration.

ECKERT: Die Freimaureorden in seiner wahren Bedeutung. Magazin der Beweisführung für Verurtheilung des Freimaurer-Ordens, 2 vols.
EISENMANN, L.: Le Compromis austo-hongrois, 1904.
ESTAMPES and Jannet: La Franc-Maçonnerie et la Révolution, 1884.

FAGUET, E.: Mgr Dupanloup, 1914.
Politiques et moralistes du XIX^e^ siècle, 1898.
FALLOUX: Mémoires d'un royaliste, 1888, 2 vols.
FESSLER: La vraie et la fausse infallibilité.
FLANDRIN, Louis: Hippolyte Flandrin, 1909.
FOISSET: Vie du P. Lacordaire, 1870, 2 vols.
FOLGHERA, J. D.: L'apologétique de Lacordaire.
FOLLENAY, J. P. de: Monsieur Teysseyre, 1882.
Vie du cardinal Guibert, 1896, 2 vols.
FOLLIOLEY: Montalembert et Mgr Parisis, 1901.
FONTOULIEU: Les églises de Paris sous la Commune, 1873.
FORGUES, E.: Correspondance de Lamennais.
FOULON: Vie de Mgr Darboy, 1889.
FOVILLE, A. de: La France économique, 1890.

FRAYSSINOUS: Œuvres.
FREPPEL: Œuvres.
FRIEDRICH: Döllinger.
Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils.

GAILLARD, L. de: Histoire de l'expedition de Rome en 1849.
GASTOUÉ, A.: L'art grégorien, 1911.
GAUME, Joseph: Le vers rongeur des sociétés modernes.
Les trois Rome.
GAUTIER, Léon: Esprit du P. Faber, 1873.
Portraits littéraires.
GIOBERTI, V.: Del primato d'Italia, 1840.
GIRAUD: De l'union à Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ dans sa vie de victime.
GLADSTONE, William: Life of Bishop Wilberforce.
The Vatican Decrees in Their Bearing on Civil Allegiance, 1874.
GOERRES, J. J.: Athanasius.
Gesammelte Briefe.
Politische Schriften.
GONDON, Jules: Biographie de Daniel O'Connell, 1847.
L'agitation irlandaise depuis 1829, 1845.
GOYAU, Georges: Bismarck et l'Eglise.
L'Allemagne religieuse, le catholicisme, 1909, 4 vols.
L'Allemagne religieuse, le Protestantisme, 1898.
La papauté et la civilisation.
Moehler, 1905.
GRANDERATH: Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, 1906, 3 vols.
GRANDMAISON: G. de: La Congrégation, 1890.
GRATRY: De laconnaissance de Dieu.
GRIMAUD, L.: Histoire de la liberté de l'enseignement en France, 1898.
GUÉRANGER: Institutions liturgiques.
L'année liturgique.
GUICHEN: La France morale et religieuse à la fin de la Restauration, 1912.
La Révolution de Juillet 1830 et l'Europe, 1917.
GUIDÉE, P. A.: Vie du P. Varin, 1854.

GUILLAND: L'Allemagne nouvelle et ses historiens, 1900.
GUILLEMANT: Pierre-Louis Parisis, 1916, 3 vols.
GUIZOT: Lettres à sa famille.
Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps, 1884, 8 vols.
GYR: La Franc-Maçonnerie en elle-même, etc., 1859.

HALLER: Lettre à sa famille, 1821.
HATIN: Bibliographie de la presse périodique française, 1866.
HEFELE: Konziliengeschichte.
HEINE: De l'Allemagne, 1865, 2 vols.
HELLO: Renan, l'Allemagne et l'athéisme, 1897.
HEMMER: Vie du cardinal Manning, 1898.
HENRION: Vie de Mgr de Quélen, 1842.
Vie de Mgr Frayssinous, 1842.
Vie du P. Loriquet.
HERGENROETHER: Kirchengeschicte, 1880, 3 vols.
HERMES, G.: Dogmatik.
Philosophische Einleitung.
Unteruschungen über die innere Wahrheit des Christenthums.
HIDEVILLE, H. de: Les Piémontais à Rome.
HINSCHIUS: Das Kirchenrecht der Katholiken.
Histoire de la persécution religieuse à Gèneve, 1878.
HOURAT, Pierre: Le Syllabus, 3 vols.
HUC: Souvenirs d'un voyage dans la Tartarie, le Thibet et la Chine, 1850, 2 vols.
HULST, d': Le droit chrétien et le droit moderne, 1914.
Vie de la Mère Marie-Thérèse, 1882.
HURTER: Nomenclator litterarius.

ICARD: Journal.

JACQUENET: Vie de M. l'abbé Gagelin, 1850.
JANNET, C.: La Franc-Maçonnerie au XIX^e^ siècle, 1832.
JOLY, H.: Le socialisme chrétien, 1892.
Ozanam et ses continuateurs, 1913.
JOURDAIN, Eloi: Souvenirs de jeunesse, 1911.
Journal des Goncourt.

KANT: Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft.
KEITER: Joseph von Eichendorff.
KELLER, E.: L'encyclique du 8 décembre, 1866.
Vie du général Lamoricière.
KETTELER: Deutschland nach dem Krieg von 1866.
KLEUTGEN: Theologie der Vorzeit.
KOHUT: Die Hohenzollern und die Freimaurerie, 1909.
KRAUS, Franz: Kirchengeschichte.

LACOMBE, H. de: Le débats de la Commission de 1849, 1899.
LACORDAIRE: Considérations philosophiques sur le système de M. de La Mennais.
Œuvres.
LA GORCE, P. de: Histoire de la seconde République.
Histoire du second empire, 1905, 7 vols.
LAGRANGE: Vie de Mgr Dupanloup, 3 vols.
LAMARTINE: Confidences.
Harmonies poétiques.
LAMENNAIS: Affaires de Rome.
Articles publiés dans le Mémorial catholique et l'Avenir, 1836.
De la société première et de ses lois.
Des progrès de la Révolution.
Essai sur l'indifference.
Les maux de l'Eglise et de la société.
Mélanges.
Nouveaux mélanges, 1826.
Œuvres complètes.
Paroles d'un croyant.
Réflexions et mélanges, 1819.
Réflexions sur l'Eglise de France.
Troisièmes mélanges, 1835.
LAMORICIÈRE: Rapport sur les operations de l'armée pontificale.
LAMY, E.: La France du Levant, 1900.
Le Second Empire et les ouvriers.
LANSON: Histoire de la littérature française.
LASSERRE, Henri: Notre-Dame de Lourdes.
LAUNAY: Histoire de la Société des Missions étrangères.

LAVELEYE: Le socialisme contemporain, 1896.
LAVISSE and Rambaud: Histoire général.
LE FLOCH: Vie du P. Poulart des Places.
Le R. P. Colin, 1900.
LECANUET: Berryer.
Montalembert, 1901, 3 vols.
LECKY, William: History of Rationalism.
LEHMKUHL: Theologia moralis, 1896.
LEMAITRE, J.: Les contemporains.
LEMIRE, J.: Le cardinal Manning et son action sociale, 1893.
LEROY-BEAULIEU: Un empereur, un roi, un pape, 1879.
LESCOEUR, L.: L'Eglise catholique en Pologne sous le gouvernement russe, 1860.
L'Eglise catholique et le gouvernement russe, 1903.
LEVASSEUR, E.: Histoire des classes ouvrières en France depuis 1789, 1903.
LIKOWSKI, E.: Historya unii Kasciola ruskiego z Kosciolen rezymskim.
LINGARD, John: History of England.
LIONNET, J.: Un évêque social, Ketteler, 1905.
LITTRÉ: Conservation, Révolution, Positivisme.
LOCKHART, William: Antonio Rosmini-Serbati.
LUBIENSKI: Guerres et révolutions d'Italie, 1852.
LUGAN, A.: Balmès, 1911.

MACKENZIE, Colin: Six Years in India.
MADAUNE: Histoire de la renaissance du catholiscisme en Angleterre, 1896.
Ignace Spencer et la renaissance du catholicisme en Angleterre, 1875.
MAISTRE, J. de: Lettres et opuscules, 1853, 2 vols.
MANGERET: Mgr Bataillon, 1884, 2 vols.
MANNING, H. E.: The Vatican Council, 1896.
MANSI: Conciliorum collectio, 1927, 60 vols.
MARBOT: Vie de Mgr Forcade, 1886.

MARC: Institutiones, 1887.
MARCEL: Chefs d'oeuvres de l'éloquence française et de la tribune anglaise, 1844, 3 vols.
MARÉCHAL, C.: La famille de La Mennais sous l'Ancien Régime et la Révolution, 1913.
La jeunesse de La Mennais, 1913.
Histoire contemporaine.
MARNAS: La religion de Jésus ressuscitée au Japon, 1896, 2 vols.
MARTIN: Histoire de France populaire.
Vie de l'abbé Gorini, 1863.
MARTIN, T.: The Life of the Prince Consort.
Martyre de sœur Irena Macrina Mieczysloska, 1846.
MARX, Karl; Communist Manifesto.
MATHIEU: Le souveraineté pontificale.
MAUGERET: Mgr Bataillon, 1885.
MAYNARD, M.: Jacques Crétineau-Joly.
MELUN, A. de: Vie de la Sœur Rosalie, 1857.
MENCACCI, Paolo: Memorie documentata per la storia della rivoluzione italiana, 1879.
MENZEL: Neuere Geschichte der Deutschen von der Reformation bis zur Bundes acte, 1848, 14 vols.
METTERNICH: Mémoires, 1884, 8 vols.
MIGNE: Orateurs sacrés.
Patrologia, 387 vols.
MINGHETTI, Marco: La chiesa e lo stato.
MOELLER, J. A.: Affaires de Cologne, 1838.
Symbolik.
MONNIN, A.: Esprit du curé d'Ars.
Vie du curé d'Ars, 2 vols.
MONTALEMBERT: L'Eglise libre dans l'Etat libre.
MONTLOSIER: Mémoire à consulter, 1826.
MONTOR, Artaud de. See ARTAUD.
MOREL, Jules: Somme contre le catholicisme libéral, 1877, 2 vols.
MORONI: Dizionario di erudizione.
MUN, Albert de: Ma vocation sociale, 1909.
MUSSET, A. de: Confessions d'un enfant du siècle, 1876.

NETTEMENT, A.: Histoire de la Restauration, 1872, 8 vols.
NEWMAN, J. H.: Apologia pro vita sua.
Essay on Development of Doctrine.
The Second Spring.
NICOL: Mgr Bécel.
NICOLET: Vie de B. Chanel.
NILLES: De rationibus festorum SS. Cordis Jesu, 1916.
NOBLE, H. D.: Lacordaire apôtre et directeur des jeunes gens, 1908.
NODIER, Charles: Histoire des sociétés secrètes de l'armée.
NORMANBY, Marquis de: Une année de Révolution, 1860, 2 vols.

O'CONNELL: Ireland and the Irish.
Life and Speeches of Daniel O'Connell, 1847, 2 vols.
Œuvres de Saint-Simon et d'Enfantin.
OLLIVIER, Emile: L'Eglise et l'Etat au concile du Vatican, 1879, 2 vols.
ONCLAIR: La Franc-Maçonnerie contemporaine.
Origines de la Société de Saint-Vincent-de-Paul, 1909.
OZANAM: Vie de Frédéric Ozanam, 1882.
OZANAM, Frederick: Œuvres complètes.

PACCA: Œuvres complètes.
PASCAL, G. de: Mgr Gay d'après sa correspondance, 1910.
PASOLINI: Memorie, raccolte da suo figlio.
PASTOR: Reichensperger.
PEIGNÉ, J. M.: La jeunesse de La Mennais.
Lamennais, sa vie intime à la Chênaie, 1864.
PÉRATÉ, A.: Un siècle . . . 1800 à 1900.
PESQUIDOUX, D. de: L'Immaculée Conception, histoire d'un dogme, 1892, 2 vols.
PFUELE: Ketteler.
PIE: Œuvres complètes.
PIERLING: La Russie et le Saint-Siège, 1901.
PIERRE, Victor: Histoire de la République de 1848.
PIOLET: Les missions françaises au XIX^e^ siècle, 1901, 6 vols.
PIONEAU: Vie de Mgr Dupuch, 1866.
PITRA, J. B.: Vie de R. P. Libermann, 1872.

PONLEVOY: Vie du P. de Ravignan, 1860, 2 vols.
POUGEOIS: Histoire de Pie IX, 1886, 6 vols.
POUJOULAT: Vie du Frère Philippe, 1875.
PROUDHON: De la justice dans la Révolution et dans l'Eglise.

QUINET, E.: Le livre de l'exilé.

RAMBART: Vie de Mgr de Mazenod, 1883, 2 vols.
RANDON: Mémoires.
RANKE: Zur Geschichte Deutschlands und Frankreichs im neunzehnten Jahrhundert, 1887.
RASTOUL: Le P. Ventura.
Vie du maréchal Randon.
RATISBONNE, M. A.: Le R. P. Marie-Théodore Ratisbonne, 1905.
RATTAZZI, Maria: Rattazzi et son temps, 1881.
Recueil des allocutions, etc. citées dans le Syllabus, 1865.
RENAN, Ernest: Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse.
Lettres intimes, 1896.
Vie de Jésus.
RENDU, E.: La lettere du pape et l'Italie officielle.
RENOUVIER: Philosophie analytique de l'histoire, 1897.
REUSCH: Briefe an Bunsen, 1897.
RIBBE, C. de: Le Play d'après sa correspondance.
RIBOT, Paul: Exposé critique des doctrines de M. Le Play, 1882.
RICARD: L'école menaisienne.
RICASOLI: Lettere e documenti.
RIO: Epilogue à l'art chrétien.
RIVIÈRES, P. de: Vie de Mgr de Forbin-Janson, 1892.
ROHRBACHER: Histoire universelle de l'Eglise.
ROSKOVANY: Monumenta catholica pro independentia potestatis ecclesiasticae, 1847, 2 vols.
ROTHAN: L'Allemagne et l'Italie, 1884.
ROUSSEAU, H.: Guillaume-Joseph Chaminade, 1913.
ROUSSEL, A.: Correspondance inédite de Lamennais et de l'abbé Guéranger, 1905.
Lamennais d'après des documents inédits.
ROUSSET, Léon: A travers la Chine.

SACY, S. de: Exposé de la religion des Druses, 1838, 2 vols.
Variétés littéraires.
SAINTE-BEUVE: Chroniques parisiennes.
Portraits contemporains, 1855.
SAINT-HILAIRE, B.: Victor Cousin.
SAINT-SIMON: Le nouveau christianisme.
Système industriel.
Parabole.
Vues sur la propriété et de la législation.
Lettres d'un habitant de Genève à ses concitoyens.
SAINTRAIN: Vie du cardinal Deschamps, 1884.
SALOMON, Michel: Bonald, 1905.
SAY, J. B.: Traité d'économie politique.
Cours d'économie politique.
Catéchisme d'économie politique.
SCHLEGEL, Frederick: Philosophy of History.
SCHMOEGER: Das Leben der gottseligen Anna Katharina Emmerich, 1870, 2 vols.
SCHRADER: De theologia generatim.
SEGOND, E.: Œuvres de Rosmini.
SÉGUR, Marquis de: Souvenirs et récits d'un frère.
Les martyrs de Castelfidardo, 1860.
Vie de l'abbé Bernard, 1883.
SEIGNOBOS: Histoire politique de l'Europe contemporaine, 1897.
SILENGARDI: Ciro Menotti.
SIMLER: Guillaume-Joseph Chaminade, 1901.
SIMON, Eugène: La cité chinoise.
SIMON, Jules: Mignet, Michelet, Henri Martin.
SOREL, Albert: Essais d'histoire et de critique.
SPULLER, E.: Lamennais, 1892.
STENDHAL, H. B.: Promenades dans Rome, 1858, 2 vols.
SYLVAIN, Charles: Grégoire XVI et son pontificat, 1890.
Vie du P. Hermann, 1881.

TABARAUD, M. M.: Essai sur l'état des jésuites en France.
Histoire critique de l'assemblée du clergé de France en 1682.

TAILLANDIER, S. R.: Histoire de la jeune Allemagne, 1848.
Histoire et philosophie religieuse, 1859.
La Révolution en Allemagne.
TAINE: Le régime moderne.
TAVERNIER, E.: Louis Veuillot, 1913.
TESTE, Louis: Préface au Conclave, 1877.
THOMAS, Emile: Histoire des ateliers nationaux.
THOUVENEL: Le secret de l'empereur.
THUREAU-DANGIN, Paul: Royalistes et républicains, 1874.
Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet, 1885–89.
La renaissance catholique en Angleterre au XIX^e^ siècle, 1906, 3 vols.
Le parti libéral sous la Restauration, 1876.
L'Eglise et l'Etat sous la monarchie de Juillet, 1880.
TIMON: Le livre des orateurs.
TOURNIER: Gambetta franc-maçon.

Un siècle, mouvement du monde de 1800 à 1900.

VACANT: Etudes théologiques sur les Constitutions du Concile du Vatican, 1895, 3 vols.
VALETTE, E. A. de: Vie de M. Dufriche-Desgenettes, 1863.
VAN DUERM, C.: Vicissitudes politiques du pouvoir temporel des papes, 1890.
VAULABELLE, A. de: Histoire des deux Restaurations.
VAUTHIER, G.: Villemain, 1913.
VENTURA: Le pouvoir politique chrétien, 1858.
VEUILLOT, Eugène: Louis Veuillot, 1913, 4 vols.
Le Piémont dans les Etats de l'Eglise, 1861.
VEUILLOT, François: Louis Veuillot, 1913.
VEUILLOT, Louis: Grandes figures catholiques du temps present, 1895, 2 vols.
Le parfum de Rome.
Les français en Algérie, 1863.
Le libres penseurs.
Les odeurs de Paris.

L'illusion libérale, 1866.
Pie IX.
Rome pendant le concile, 1872.
Vie de Notre-Seigneur.
VIANNEY: Le bienheureux J. B. Vianney.
Vie de M. Le Prévost, 1899.
Vie du V. Père Champagnat.
VIEL-CASTEL: Histoire des deux Restaurations.
VIGOUROUX: Mélanges bibliques, 1888.
VILLEFRANCHE: Pie IX, 1889.
Vie de don Bosco.
VILLEMAIN: La France, l'empire et la papauté, 1860.
VINET, A.: Essais de philosophie morale et religieuse.
VOGELSANG: Morale et économie sociale.
Politique sociale, 2 vols.

WARD, Wilfrid: The Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman, 1912, 2 vols.
WEGENER: Anna Katharina Emmerich und Clemens Brentano, 1900.
WEILL: Histoire du parti républicain.
Histoire du catholicisme liberal en France, 1909.
WEISS: Histoire du parti républicain en France, 1900.
WERNER, K.: Geschichte der Katholischen Theologie seit dem Trienter Konzil.
WETZER and WELTE: Dictionnaire de théologie.
WINTERER: Le socialisme international, 1890.
WISEMAN: Recollections of the Last Four Popes.
WOLFSGRUBER: Joseph Othmar, cardinal Rauscher, 1898.

ZELLER, Jules: Année historique.
ZURLA: Memorie intorno alla vita ed agli studii del Padre don Lodovico Nachi.

Index

Abyssinia, missions in, 367 f.
Affre (archbishop of Paris)
  Death of, 428 f.
  The Ere nouvelle and, 427 f.
  Freedom of education and, 321 f. and note, 324, 327
  Louis Philippe and, 322 and note, 327
  The Revolution of 1848 and, 424
  School of journalism founded by, 343 f.
Africa, missions in, 122, 364-69, 761 f.
Alacoque, Margaret Mary: and devotion to the Sacred Heart, 718
Albani, Joseph (cardinal), 132
  On the Belgian revolt, 155
  At the 1823 conclave, 64
  At the 1831 conclave, 185
  And the revolutionaries, 200
  Secretary of State, 132
Alexander I (czar), 118
Alexander II (czar): the Church persecuted by, 553-56; Pius IX's condemnation of, 556 f.
Algiers: French conquest of, 142, 364; missions at, 122, 364-67
Allignol brothers (priests): and the Gallican controversy, 346-48
Alphonse XII, king of Spain, 711 f.
Alphonso I, first king of Portugal, 215 note
Alzon, Emmanuel d': and educational freedom, 431 note; friend of Lamennais, 300 note, 302 note; and the pagan classics, 440
Amedeus I, king of Spain, 710 f.
American bishops, at the Vatican Council, 649
Americanism, Native, 174, 369 f.
Ami de la religion, the, 279 f. and note, 573 note
Amorin-Pessoa, archbishop of Goa, 746
Ancona: capture by Austria, 193; capture by Sardinia, 543 f.; capture by the revolutionaries, 193; French occupation of, 202-4
Ancona expedition, 201-4
Angelis, de (cardinal): at the Vatican Council, 637
Anglican Church, the Divisions in, 499
  The Old Catholic Church and, 712
  The Oxford Movement, 104-7, 162, 253-56, 493 ff.
  The Russian Orthodox Church and, 582
  The Tractarian Movement, 251 ff., 499
  The Vatican Council and, 603-5
Anglicanism, in the early ninteenth century, 58-60
Angoulême, duke of, 111
Antibes legion, 581 and note
Anton, Louis: Old Catholic priest, 705 f.
Antonelli, Giacomo (cardinal): Secretary of State, 402-4 and note, 579, 627; the taking of Rome, 669-72; the Vatican Council, 606, 646, 650, 651 note, 657 note; the war with Piedmont, 540 f.
Apostolicae Sedis (bull), 626 f.
Architecture, Christian: revival of, 729
Argentina, missioners in, 762
Armenia: the Church in, 172, 743-45; Protestantism in, 745; schism in, 744; Turkish persecutions in, 172, 743
Art, Christian, 728-30
Artois, count of: and Leo XII, 69, 71; member of the Congregation, 49 note
Arundell, Mary: and the Sisters of Providence, 245
Association of St. Joseph, 48
Associations of workingmen, forbidden in 1803, 20
Astros (archbishop), and Lamennais, 292, 296
Asylum, law of: in Sardinia, 454
Atheism: and Freemasonry, 597 f.; progress of, 597 f.

Audu (patriarch of Chaldea): Leo XIII's regard for, 643 note, 743 note; and Pius IX, 642, 742; at the Vatican Council, 642, 643 note, 741
Australia, missioners in, 758 f.
Austria
  Attitude toward Italian unification, 548
  Catholicism of, 468 f., 471
  The Church in: during the reign of Leo XII, 92-95; during the reign of Pius IX, 464-68, 592 f., 704-9
  In conflict with France, 197 ff., 524-26
  Defeat at Magenta and Solferino, 525
  Defeat at Sadowa, 472, 582
  Ferrara occupied by, 390-92
  Freemasonry in, 169
  Germanic supremacy and, 93 f.
  Intervention in Italy, 114, 193-204, 408, 548
  The Jesuits in, 92 f.
  Liberal reforms in, 464 f.
  Liberalism in, 593
  The Memorandum of 1831, 195 ff.
  The Polish revolt, 555 and note
  Prussian influence on, 472
  Repressive laws in, 593
  Restrictions on religious education, 707 f.
  Suppression of 1820 revolution, 114
  The Vatican Council opposed by, 704
  In the Venetian quadrilateral, 395 note, 525, 548
Avenir, the (Catholic paper)
  The campaign for educational freedom, 318, 325
  Contributors to, 281, 288 note
  Decline of, 287 f.
  Excesses of, 284 ff.
  Foundation of, 179, 279, 281
  Gregory XVI's condemnation of, 290-96
  Influence of, 303 note
  Liberal teachings of Lamennais, 285 f.
  Lofty expositions of, 282-84, 294 f.
  Socialism opposed by, 283 f.
  Suspension of, 288, 292 note
Azarian, Armenian patriarch, 744
Azeglio, Massimo d': and Italian unity, 238 f.; on loyalty, 451; prime minister of Sardinia, 456 f.; on the taking of Rome, 670
Baader, Francis (philosopher), 97 f.
Baden (state): conference at, 231; religious troubles in, 165 f., 480, 483-86
Badger, Protestant missioner, 741
Badhiarian, schismatic patriarch, 744
Bailly, Emmanuel: and the St. Vincent de Paul Society, 315 f.
Bakunin, Mikhail (anarchist), 5
Balbo, Cesare: and Italian unity, 238; prime minister of Sardinia, 457
Ballanche, socialist teaching of, 24 f.
Balmes, Jaime: writings of, 503 f., 506 and note, 731
Baltimore, councils of, 174 f., 370, 764: and missions in Africa, 368
Baraldi (priest), and Lamennais, 290, 293
Barat, Madeline Sophie (St.), 45
Barbès (socialist), and the socialist uprising, 425 f.
Bataillon (bishop), death of, 760
Barthélemey-Saint-Hilaire, and the educational controversy, 433
Bautain (priest), and traditionalism, 345
Bavaria: Catholicism in, 95-98; Prussian influence in, 472
Becker, the Rhin Allemand of, 261 f.
Belgium: the Church in, 501 f.; persecution by William I, 116 f., 152 f.; the revolt against the Netherlands, 152-55
Benedictine Order, Guéranger's re-establishment of, 302, 308 f., 321
Benoit-Champy, on Lamennais, 281 note, 301 note
Benvenuti (cardinal): captured by the revolutionaries, 193; and the Italian brigands, 124
Béranger, song-writer, 34, 133, 276
Bernadette Soubirous, St.: aparition at Lourdes, 720
Bernadou (archbishop), at the Vatican Council, 629
Bernetti (cardinal)
  At the 1846 conclave, 380
  Diplomatic missions of, 190 f.
  And the French occupation of Ancona, 203 f.
  His removal from office, 241
  The revolt in the Papal States, 191 ff.
Berneux (bishop), missioner in Korea, 757 f.

Berteaud (bishop), and papal infallibility, 646
Bési, de (bishop): missioner in China, 749
Beust, von: and Bismarck, 677, 688; religious persecution by, 704 ff.
Beyrouth: Catholic school at, 352, 741; mission at, 122; Protestant school at, 741
Bilio (cardinal): and the Anglican negotiations, 605; and the Syllabus of Pius IX, 568 note; at the Vatican Council, 625
Bismarck, Otto von, 472-74
  Alliance with Italy, 677
  Attitude toward the Vatican Council, 607
  The Kulturkampf, 688-97
  At the Paris Exposition, 587
  Persecution of the Church by, 478 ff., 687 ff.
  And the Polish revolt, 556
  Political ideas of, 473, 477 f.
  On Protestantism and Prussia, 468, 478
  Religious attitude of, 696 note
  And the religious strife in Nassau and Baden, 486
  And the secret societies, 469 f.
Bizzarri (cardinal), at the Vatican Council, 625
Blanc (baron), Sardinian diplomat, 669 f. and notes
Blanc (bishop), missioner in Korea, 758
Blanc, Louis: and the socialist movement, 336, 425 f., 437
Blanqui, and the socialist uprising, 425 f.
Blessed Sacrament, devotion to the, 716-18, 721
Blessed Virgin: apparitions of, 681, 719-21; devotion to the, 719-21
Bologna: Austrian occupation of, 193, 200; revolutionaries at, 184, 189, 191, 200
Bonald (cardinal), and the Revolution of 1848, 424
Bonald, Louis de: on indifferentism, 74; social teaching of, 24; writings of, 136
Bonaparte (family): and the secret societies, 170, 182 f.
Bonaparte, Charles: revolutionary in Rome, 406
Bonaparte, Louis Napoleon
  Intervention in Italy, 407, 409 f.
  And the Italian liberals, 451
  His letter to Colonel Ney, 413 f.
  Liberal tendencies of, 409 and note
  Personality of, 406
  President of the Republic, 405
  The restoration of the Empire, 437-39
  Sardinia favored by, 451, 518 f., 524 f.
  See also Napoleon III
Bonnaud (bishop): death of, 747; missioner in India, 356 f., 746 f.; writings of, 357, 747
Bonnechose (cardinal), at the Vatican Council, 629 and note, 633 f.
Bonnel (bishop), and the Gallican controversy, 346 f.
Boré, Eugène: and the missions of the Near East, 350 f. and note
Borghi (bishop), on the missions in India, 358
Bossuet, on Gallicanism, 79
Bouillerie (bishop), and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 716 f.
Bourbon (island), and the evangelization of Africa, 761
Bourget, bishop of Montreal, 371
Boyer (priest), 74
Bracco (bishop), missioner in Palestine, 738
Brazil: the Church in, 174, 762; Freemasonry in, 762
Brentano, Clement: and Catherine Emmerich, 96 f.
Broad Church, the (Anglican), 499
Broglie, Albert de: editor of the Correspondant, 443; and the infallibility controversy, 618 note, 619 note; at the Oratory, 445
Broglie, Charles de: and the Society of the Sacred Heart, 44
Broglie, Victor de: on the expulsion of the Jesuits from Switzerland, 488; and freedom of education, 328, 330
Brothers of Charity, foundation of the, 244 f.
Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul, 316, 727 f.
Brothers of the Christian Schools, 49 f.: exemption from military service, 320 f.; expulsion from Switzerland,

Brothers of the Christian Schools (cont.) 698; in Egypt, 353; social work of, 727
Brownson, conversion of, 763
Brugnière (bishop), missioner in the Far East, 362, 757
Brunelli, nuncio to Spain, 502
Bruté, bishop of Vincennes, 370
Buchez, French socialist, 277 f.
Buck, Victor de: and Bishop Forbes, 603-5
Bulgaria, ecclesiastical union with Rome, 551 f.
Bulls, Papal: Apostolicae sedis, 626 f.; Reversurus, 743 f.; Unam sanctam, 567; Unigenitus, 567
Bunsen, Count von: the question of mixed marriages, 257 ff.; religious notions of, 257 f.

Canada, the Church in, 371 f., 763
Capalti (cardinal), at the Vatican Council, 625, 636 note
Capitalism, rise of, 5, 18
Cappellari, Maur (cardinal): and Antonio Rosmini, 242 f.; at the 1831 conclave, 185 f.; and the concordat with the Netherlands, 117; see also Gregory XVI
Capuchins, the: in Greece, 122; in the Near East, 741
Carbonarism, 31-34
  Austrian repression of, 55
  In France, 33 f.
  Freemasonry and, 239
  In Italy, 31-33, 114, 170 f.
  Leo XII's condemnation of, 125
  Napoleon III and, 515, 518
  Organization of, 32
Carlos, Don: dispute over the Spanish throne, 218-21, 711 f.
Carrière, Joseph: theological works of, 344
Carteret, president of Switzerland, 697, 701 f.
Castelfidardo, battle of, 542
Castiglioni, Francis X. (cardinal), 130: at the 1823 conclave, 63 f.; at the 1829 conclave, 129; see also Pius VIII
Cavaignac (general), proposed aid to Pius IX, 405
Cavour
  Cession of Nice and Savoy to France, 532 f.
  At the Congress of Paris, 510 f.
  Garibaldi and, 514 f.
  And Garibaldi's conquest of Naples, 538 f.
  Italian unity, 457-59, 510 ff., 523, 531-33
  Napoleon III and, 518 f.
  Personality of, 458 and note
  Pius IX criticized by, 511
  Prime minister of Sardinia, 457 ff., 509 ff., 531-33
  Religious persecutions by, 459-62
Cazalès, de: and the educational controversy, 434
Cécille, French admiral, 362, 752
Cenacle, the, 135
Chaldea, the Church in, 642, 741-43
Chambord (count), 677 and note
Chaminade, and the Marianists, 40
Champagnat, Marcellin, 40 f.
Chanel, Pierre: missioner in Oceania, 373
Charbonneaux, bishop in India, 747
Charbonnel, bishop of Toronto, 372
Charles X (of France), 88: and the conquest of Algiers, 142 f.; and the July Revolution, 143 f.; opposition to, 88 f.
Charles Albert (of Sardinia), 394
  Abdication of, 408
  Concordat with Gregory XVI, 454
  And Italian unification, 406
  Lombardy invaded by, 394-96
  On the secret societies, 453
Chastan (priest), martyr in Korea, 362, 757
Chateaubriand: on Béranger, 276 and note; at the 1829 conclave, 129; literateur, 25; and the Spanish revolution, 110 f.
Chemin, Jerome (priest): religous founder, 241
Chiefala, and Greek reunion, 121 f.
China, missioners in, 173, 360 f., 748-51
Ciacchi (cardinal), legate of Ferrara, 391
Civiltà cattolica (Catholic paper), and the Vatican Council, 609 ff.
Civitavecchia: French occupation of, 409; Italian occupation of, 663

Clausel de Montals (bishop): and the educational controversy, 324, 436 note; and the pagan classics, 440
Clavel (priest), and the Gallican controversy, 347
Clemenceau, Georges (atheist), 598
Clerical immunity, in Sardinia, 453-55
Clermont-Tonnerre, Anne de (cardinal), 80 f.
Clifford (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 653 and note
Clotilda (princess), Victor Emmanuel rebuked by, 679
Cochin China, missioners in, 123, 173, 359 f.
Coercion Bill, opposed by O'Connell, 248
Coffin, Charles: and the Paris liturgy, 310 f.
Colin, Jean-Claude: founder of the Marists, 40 f.; missioner in the Far East, 752
Cologne affair, the, 257-70: and the Catholic revival in Germany, 270 f.
Combes (colonel), and the Ancona expedition, 202 f.
Communism: danger of, 583 f.; of Karl Marx, 5; Pius IX's condemnation of, 387
Communist Manifesto, 5
Concordats
  With Austria, 467 and note
  With Baden, 486
  With the Netherlands, 117 f., 153
  With Portugal, 217 f.
  With Russia, 226
  With Sardinia, 454, 455 note, 456
  With Spain, 221, 502 f.
  With Switzerland, 490
  With Würtemberg, 486
Confiscation of Church property, 20
  In Germany, 57
  In Italy, 581, 672, 676 f.
  By the Paris Commune, 682
  In Portugal, 217, 551
  In Rome, 407, 676 f.
  In Sardinia, 459-61
  In Spain, 219 and note, 503, 593 f., 711
Congregation, the, 45-48: calumnies against, 48 f. and note, 86 and note; and Prince Polignac, 140; works of, 48, 85, 134
Congregations, religious Agitations against, 42, 330 ff.
  Foundation of, 38, 40-45, 241-45
  Gregory XVI's encouragement of, 241-45
  Suppression of: in France, 45; in Italy, 581, 672, 676 f.; in Portugal, 217, 551; in Sardinia, 460; in Spain, 219, 593 f.
Connolly (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 635
Consalvi (cardinal)
  Carbonarism and, 32 f.
  Cardinal Bernetti and, 190
  At the 1823 conclave, 63
  Leo XII and, 67-70
  On the secret societies, 17 note
Cooperative system, the, 22
Cornoldi (priest), scholasticism encouraged by, 731
Correspondant, the (Catholic paper), 280: controversy with the Univers, 443 f.; foundation of, 134 and note; journalism of, 443
Councils: attendance at, 622 note; list of, 622 note
Cousin, Victor: Kant's influence on, 27, 558
Coux, Charles de: and the Ere nouvelle, 427; and freedom of education, 319; socialists opposed by, 283 f.
Crétineau-Joly: Pius IX criticized by, 506 note; work on the secret societies, 240 and note
Crispi law, 580
Crowns, party of the: at the 1823 conclave, 61 f., 67, 70; at the 1831 conclave, 185
Cubières (general), and the Ancona expedition, 202
Cullen (cardinal), at the Vatican Council, 628
Curé of Ars, 445-47
Curtis, archbishop of Armagh, 161
Custozza, the Italians defeated at, 580

Dalgairns: conversion of, 256; and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 717; writings of, 494 note
Damascus, mission at, 122
Damien, St.: missioner on Molokai, 760 f.

Darboy (archbishop of Paris): on the causes of revolution, 681; murder of, 682; submission to the Council, 666; at the Vatican Council, 628, 629 note, 633, 653, 658 f.
Daughters of Charity
Dispossessed in Portugal, 551
Expelled from Switzerland, 489
In Egypt, 353
In Switzerland, 698
In Turkey, 351
In the United States, 371
Social works of, 727
Daughters of Mary, 40 f.
Daveluy (bishop), missioner in Korea, 757 f.
Daviers (priest), missioner in Turkey, 351
Dechamps (archbishop): career of, 630 f.; controversy with Gratry, 644; at the Vatican Council, 628, 631, 637, 653 f., 657
Decurtins, Gaspard: social work of, 724
Della Genga, Annibal, 65 f., 67 and note; see Leo XII
Della Somaglia (cardinal), 71
Delpuits, and the Congregation, 46 f.
Democratic trends, 3 f.
Desflèches (bishop), missioner in China, 751
Desprez (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 657
Deutinger, work on aesthetics, 272
Deveuster, Damien (St.): missioner on Molokai, 760 f.
Devie (bishop), and the Allignol brothers, 348
Diepenbrock (cardinal), 475
Döllinger, Ignaz, 595
Apostasy of, 666 f. and note
Death of, 666
First works of, 96 f.
Honored by Oxford, 712
Personality of, 612
Vatican Council opposed by, 607 and note, 612-14, 666
Dollard, Canadian bishop, 372
Dominican Order, Lacordaire's re-establishment of the, 307
Donnet, Ferdinand (cardinal): and Napoleon III, 528 f.
Donoso-Cortés: and the pagan classics, 440; writings of, 504
Doyle, bishop of Kildare, 161
Dreux-Brezé (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 641, 651 note
Droste-Vischering (archbishop)
Arrest of, 265 f.
Demonstrations over the imprisonment of, 267-69
Hermes condemned by, 260, 264
And the mixed-marriage controversy, 260 f., 265
Release of, 269
Druses, Protestantism and the, 740
Dubouché, Théodelinde, 716, 718
Dupanloup (bishop of Orléans), 337 f.
The Anglican negotiations, 605 and note
At the Congress of Malines, 565
The controversy over infallibility, 617-20
Defender of the papacy, 531
And Döllinger, 666 and note
And the encyclical Quanta cura, 572 f.
And the pagan classics, 440 f.
His pastoral on the Vatican Council, 608
Religious pacification, 337-39
The struggle for educational freedom, 432, 617, 619, 684
Submission to the Council, 666
At the Vatican Council, 628, 630, 655 and notes, 657, 661
Veuillot's conflicts with, 441, 655 and note
His writing against atheism, 597
Dupont des Loges (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 661
Dupuch, Antoine: bishop of Algiers, 365 f.
Dupuis (priest), missioner in India, 747 note
Durando (papal general), treason of, 395-97

East India Company, and hindrances to missioners, 355
Eastern Question, the, 349, 737
Eberhardt (bishop), imprisonment of, 695
Ecclesiastical immunities, in Sardinia, 453-55
Ecclesiastical property, confiscation of: see Confiscation

Eckert, Ed.: and freemasonry, 30 f. and note
Economists and the social question, 21
Ecuador, protest over the taking of Rome, 674
Education, religious
In Austria, 707 f.
In Belgium, 116, 152
In France, 49-53, 90 f.: agitation for freedom, 317-30, 336 f., 419 f., 430 ff., 683 f.; freedom of, 683 f.; the pagan classics, 439-41; repressions by the July government, 147; at the restoration of the Empire, 439; see also University monopoly
In Germany, 689
In India, 357, 747
In Ireland, 713
In the Near East, 351 f.
In Turkey, 740
Egypt, missions in, 353
Emancipation of Catholics in England, 103 f., 108
Émigrés, indemnity granted to, 88
Emilia (state), formation of, 527
Emmerich, Catherine, 96 f.
Encyclicals, Papal: Mirari vos, 293 ff.; Quanta cura, 566 ff.
Enfantin, French socialist, 277
England (bishop), and missions in Africa, 369
England
Antiritualists denounced in, 583
Attitude toward Italian unification, 549
Catholicism in, 60 f.
The Church in, 60 f.: during the reign of Gregory XVI, 251-56; during the reign of Leo XII, 103-7; during the reign of Pius VIII, 162 f.; during the reign of Pius IX, 493-99, 712-15
Emancipation Act, 103 f., 108
The Memorandum of 1831, 195, 199
The Oxford Movement, 104-7, 162, 253-56, 493 ff.
Paganism supported in India, 355
The Polish revolt, 555 and note
Re-establishment of the hierarchy in, 494 f.
Religious situation in early nineteenth century, 58-61
Sisters of Providence in, 245
The Tractarian Movement, 251 ff.
England (continued)
Treaties with China, 361, 749 f.
Unionist movement in, 605 note
Vatican Council favored in, 603-5
Vatican Council opposed in, 667 f., 712
See also Anglican Church
Epalle (bishop), missioner in Oceania, 760
Ere nouvelle, the (Catholic paper): founding of, 426 f.; suppression of, 429
Espartero, Spanish leader, 221
Essay on Indifference, 27, 81, 301: censure of, 292 f.
Etienne (priest): and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 721; on the missions in the Near East, 354
Eymard (priest), and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 716 f.

Faber, Frederick: conversion of, 256, 494; and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 717; spiritual writings of, 256 note, 732 f. and notes
Falk, resignation of, 696
Falloux, Alfred de: editor of the Correspondant, 445; the papacy defended by, 407; and the Revolution of 1848, 430; and the struggle for educational freedom, 430 f.
Fathers of Charity, foundation of the, 242-44
Fathers of the Faith, Society of, 44 f.
Fava (priest), missioner in Africa, 761
Ferdinand, king of Sicily, 113 f.
Ferdinand VII, king of Spain, 109-13: death of, 218
Ferrara: Austrian occupation of, 193; French occupation of, 390-92; occupation by papal troops, 201
Ferréol (bishop), missioner in Korea, 757
Ferretti (cardinal), Secretary of State, 390 f., 393
Fesch (cardinal), 36, 49
Fessler (bishop), pamphlet on infallibility, 664 f. and note
Fichte, and the Tugendbund, 30
Fideist tendency, Gregory XVI's condemnation of, 568
Fitzgerald (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 662
Flaget, American bishop, 370

Flandrin, Hippolyte: artistic work of, 728
Florence: capital of Italy, 589 note, 672; union with Piedmont, 526 f.
Forbes (Scottish bishop), and the Vatican Council, 603 f.
Forbin-Janson (bishop), and Canadian missions, 371
Forbin-Janson (priest), and parish missions, 37 f.
Forcade (bishop): missioner in Japan, 363, 752; at the Vatican Council, 629
Foreign missions, the British hindrances to, 355
During the reign of Gregory XVI, 349-74
During the reign of Leo XII, 122 f.
During the reign of Pius VIII, 173-76
During the reign of Pius IX, 736-65
Periods of activity, 736
Portuguese intervention in, 174, 358 f., 745 f.
Protestant interference with, 173 f., 740 f., 745 f.
Foreign Mission Seminary, 176
Foreign mission societies, 374
Foreign Mission Society, the, 356: in Korea, 757
Forli: revolutionaries at, 192, 200; occupation by papal troops, 201
Fourier, Charles: socialist teaching of, 23
France
Algiers conquered by, 142, 364
The Ancona expedition, 201-4
Anticlericism in, 685
Carbonarism in, 33 f.
Catholic action in, 418 ff.
Catholic liberalism in, 81-84
Catholic literary revival in, 135 ff.
Catholic schools in, 49 ff.: suppression of, 90 f.
The Congregation in, 45-49
Educational controversy in, 318-30, 336 f., 419 f., 430 ff., 683 f.: the pagan classics, 439-41; see also University monopoly
Gallicanism in, 78-81
In conflict with Austria, 197 ff., 524-26
Intervention in Italy: in 1831–32, 195 ff., 201-4; in 1847–48, 391, 398, 405; in 1849, 407 ff.; in 1859, 519, 524 ff.; in 1867, 591
And the Italian annexation of Rome, 674 f.
The Jesuits in, 42 ff., 84 f.: opposition to, 85-88, 90, 330-36
The Memorandum of 1831, 195 ff.
Misunderstanding with Leo XII, 71-73, 77
The Paris Commune, 681 f.
Parish missions in, 36-39
Pius IX's gratitude toward, 412, 416 f., 592
And the Polish revolt, 555 and note
Protestant opposition to the Vatican Council, 602 f.
Religious congregations in, 38, 40-45
Its religious protectorate in Palestine, 738, 741
Religious renaissance in early nineteenth century, 35 ff.
The restoration of the Empire, 437-39
The Revolution of 1848, 420 ff.
The Roman expedition, 408 ff.
Rome besieged by, 410 ff.
Royalist newspapers in 1870, 644 note
Sardinia favored by, 451, 518 f., 524 ff., 546 f.
And the Spanish revolution, 110 f.
Suppression of religious schools, 90 f.
Treaties with China, 361, 749 f. and note
Treaties with Japan, 752
Treaty with Italy (1864), 547
War with Prussia, 662 f., 679-81
Withdrawal of troops from Rome, 581, 662
Withdrawal of troops from the Papal States, 589, 679 f.
Works of charity in, 314 f., 341
France, the Church in
During the July Revolution, 145 ff.
During the reign of Gregory XVI, 274-348
During the reign of Leo XII, 71-73, 77-91
During the reign of Louis Philippe, 418 f.
During the reign of Pius VIII, 133 ff.
During the reign of Pius IX, 417-47, 550, 572-75, 614-21, 679-86

France, the Church in (continued)
Freedom of education, 318-30, 336 f., 419 f., 430 ff., 683 f.; see also University monopoly
Francis IV (duke of Modena), 183
Francis II (king of Naples), flight from Naples, 538
Francis Joseph (of Austria)
Accession of, 465
Death of, 466
Josephist tendencies of, 467
King of Hungary, 592
Personality of, 466 and note
Religious persecutions by, 704 ff.
Treaty with Napoleon III, 525
Victor Emmanuel congratulated by, 706
Franciscans, the: in Palestine, 738
Franco-Prussian War, 662 f., 679-81
Frankfort, repressive measures adopted by, 165 f.
Frankfort Declaration, 166 f.
Franzelin, John Baptist: at the Vatican Council, 636
Franzoni (archbishop), banishment of, 461
Fraysse (bishop), missioner in Oceania, 759
Frayssinous (bishop)
On Gallicanism, 79
Grand master of the University, 51 f.
Lamennais' criticism of, 83
Minister of ecclesiastical affairs, 122
Parish missions and, 38
Religious indifferentism and, 74
Frederick II (of Prussia), and Prussian hegemony, 469 note
Frederick William III (of Prussia): death of, 269; and the secret societies, 470
Frederick William IV (of Prussia): and Bunsen, 258; and the Lutheran theologians, 478 f.; and Prussian hegemony, 471; religious peace restored by, 269 ff.
Freemasonry
The anticouncil at Naples, 598 f.
Atheism and, 597 f.
In Austria, 169
Carbonarism and, 31-34, 239
In early nineteenth century, 29 ff.
In Germany, 469 note, 470, 692 f.
In South America, 762
Freemasonry (continued)
International activity of, 594
Italian unity and, 181 f.
Napoleon I and, 29 and note
The Tugendbund and, 29-31
French Church (schismatic), 667 f.
French Revolution, effects of the, 6 f.
Freppel (bishop): at the Vatican Council, 657, 660 note; patristic studies of, 732
Frohschammer, Döllinger opposed by, 614
Froude: associate of Newman, 105 f., 254; death of, 253

Gaeta, Pius IX's exile at, 401-16, 506
Galetti, revolutionary minister at Rome, 401
Gallia christiana, 308, 312 note
Gallicanism, 78-81: Guéranger's opposition to, 309 ff.; and the Jesuits, 84-88; Lamennais' opposition to, 79 ff., 138 f., 309; Pius IX's condemnation of, 569
Gallois, and the Ancona expedition, 201-3
Gambetta, Léon, 598: anticlericalism of, 678 note, 685 f.
Garibaldi, Giuseppe, 598
Agitations in Italy, 532, 589
Anticlerical attitude of, 515, 523
Career of, 514
Defeat at Mentana, 591
Flight from Rome, 412
At Geneva, 590
Naples occupied by, 536 f.
The Papal States invaded by, 590 f.
On the Polish revolt, 555 note
Rome defended by, 410 f.
Garnier (Jesuit), on the missions in India, 358
Gasparian, schismatic bishop, 744
Gasser (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 659
Gastaldi (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 654
Gastein, Bismarck and von Beust at, 677, 689
Gaume, Joseph: and the pagan classics, 439 f.
Gay, Charles: spiritual writings of, 732-35

Genoude, Eugène de: Gallicanism attacked by, 347 and note
George IV (of England), 103, 108
Gerbet (bishop)
And Catholic liberalism, 81
And the encyclical Quanta cura, 567 note
And the founding of the Avenir, 281
And Lamennais, 81
Ozanam's attachment to, 313
Writings of, 135 f.
German domination, aspirations to, 261 f.
Germanic Confederation, as proposed by Metternich, 93
Germany
After the revolution of 1830, 165 f.
Catholic renaissance in, 270-73
Catholic scholars and writers, 56 f., 271 f.
The Center Party in, 688, 695 f.
Freemasonry in, 469 note, 470
Jesuits expelled from, 692
The Kulturkampf, 688-96
Philosophy in, 26-29
Protestantism opposed to the Vatican Council, 601 f.
Prussian hegemony in, 261 f., 582
The question of mixed marriages, 167 f., 257 ff., 265
Religious movement in early nineteenth century, 56 f.
Secret societies in, 30 f., 169, 262 and note, 469 note, 470
Vatican Council opposed in, 667
See also Prussia
Germany, the Church in
The Cologne affair, 257-70
During the reign of Gregory XVI, 257-73
During the reign of Pius VIII, 165 ff.
During the reign of Pius IX, 471-87, 687-96
Laxity of, 166 f., 258 f., 266
Persecution of, 687-90, 692-96
Gibbons (cardinal), on the pre-eminence of Rome, 765
Gioberti, Vincenzo: apostasy of, 56; condemnation of his work, 462; and Italian unity, 54 f., 238 f., 406
Giustiniani (cardinal), at the 1831 conclave, 185
Gizzi (cardinal): at the 1846 conclave, 380; Secretary of State, 385, 389 f.
Gizzi (continued)
Gladstone, William, 712: friend of Newman, 107, 253 note, 256; on papal infallibility, 667 f.
Goa, schism of, 359, 746
Goerres, Joseph, 56: conversion of, 58; and Germanic supremacy, 94; and Louis I of Bavaria, 95 f.; the papacy defended by, 212, 267, 270
Golden rose, the, 218 note
Gontier (priest), work on chant, 730
Good Shepherd Sisters, in Algiers, 366
Gousset (archbishop): and Catholic liberalism, 81; theological works of, 343
Gratry (priest): and the infallibility controversy, 644, 658; literary works of, 444; Oratory of the Immaculate Conception founded by, 444 f.; on St. Thomas Aquinas, 731
Greece, missions in, 121 f., 354
Gregorio (cardinal): at the 1829 conclave, 130; and Lamennais' condemnation, 296 note
Gregory XVI
Antonio Rosmini and, 242-44 and note
Arts and sciences encouraged by, 209 note, 210
The Baden proposals condemned by, 231
The Church in America, 369-73
The Church in England, 251-56
The Church in France, 274-348
The Church in Germany, 257-73
The Church in India, 356-59
The Church in Ireland, 246-50
The Church in Poland, 222-26
The Church in Portugal, 214-18
The Church in Spain, 218-21
Concordat with Sardinia, 454
Death of, 375
Early life of, 187 f.
Election of, 185 f.
Encyclical Mirari vos, 293 ff.
The Fathers of Charity and, 243-45
Fiscal reforms of, 192, 206-9
The foreign missions and, 349-74
The French bishops and, 340
The Gallican controversy and, 348
Judiciary reforms of, 194, 206
Lamennais' condemnation by, 289 ff., 296

Gregory XVI (continued)
Liberal reforms of, 205-9, 383
Liturgical reforms in France and, 340
The Memorandum of 1831, 197
Metternich's criticism of, 205
Missions in Africa, 364-69
Missions in the Far East, 359-63
Missions in the Near East, 349-54
Nicholas I and, 223-26
O'Connell's agitation in Ireland, 246-50
The papal militia, 192, 208
Personality of, 186 f.
Political ability of, 205 f. and note
Political reforms of, 192, 206
Public works initiated by, 208 f.
Relations with revolutionary governments, 213 f. and note
Religious congregations encouraged by, 241-45
The revolt in the Papal States, 189 ff.
The revolutionary movement in Italy, 239-41
Traditionalism condemned by, 345
Works of charity, 314 f., 341
Works of piety, 341 f.
Works of scholarship, 308-12, 343 f.
Grieth (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 653 and note
Guaranties, Law of, 675 f.
Guéranger, Prosper: association with Lamennais, 287 f. and note, 300, 311; Benedictine Order restored by, 302, 308 f., 321; on the struggle for educational freedom, 432; works of, 308-12, 321 note, 729 f.
Guibert (archbishop): and the Gallican controversy, 347 f.; and the Montmartre basilica, 683; at the Vatican Council, 629 f., 643
Guizot
And freedom of education, 320-22, 329 f.
French intervention in Italy, 391, 398
The Jesuit controversy, 333
Law on education, 320 f.
On the liberal reforms of Gregory XVI, 206
Metternich and, 93
At the Oratory, 445
On the Vatican Council, 602
Gunther, Anton, 94 f.
Gustavus Adolphus Society, 477 note

Haiti, missioners in, 763
Haller, Charles von, 56: conversion of, 58
Harcus (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 741
Hassoun, patriarch of Armenia, 743 f.
Haynald (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 628, 657
Hecker, conversion of, 763
Hefele (bishop): historical work of, 732; and the infallibility controversy, 644; submission to the Council, 666; at the Vatican Council, 628, 631 f., 653
Hegel, philosophy of, 28, 558
Heine, Heinrich: on German philosophy, 557
Herder, Kirchenlexikon published by, 272
Hergenröther: Döllinger opposed by, 614; on the Cologne affair, 257
Hermann (priest), and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 716
Hermes, George: his condemnation by Droste-Vischering, 260, 264; philosophical teaching of, 28, 263
Hermesdorff (priest), work on chant, 730
Hesse-Darmstadt, religious strife in, 165 f., 480 f., 484-86
Heykamp, Herman: excommunication of, 501
Hirscher, John: German educator, 271 f.
Hohenlohe, Clovis von: and the Vatican Council, 607
Holland, the hierarchy reorganized in, 500 f.
Hosner, Austrian minister, 707
Huc (priest), missioner in China, 749
Hugo, Victor, 25, 135, 275 f.: the Church attacked by, 415, 442; and the educational controversy, 433
Hulst, d' (bishop): on the encyclical Quanta cura, 572
Hungary, political concessions granted to, 464
Hurter, Frederick: conversion of, 272 f.
Hussein, dey of Algiers, 142

Icard, M.: at the Vatican Council, 619, 656 and note
Imbert (bishop), martyr in Korea, 362, 757

Immaculate Conception, dogma of the: and devotion to Mary, 720; Pius IX's proclamation of, 507
India, missioners in, 173, 355-58, 745-48: British hindrances to, 355
Indifferentism: the dispute in 1830, 150 f.; Gregory XVI's condemnation of, 295; Leo XII's condemnation of, 73-75; Pius IX's condemnation of, 387
Individualism, 20
Indo China, missioners in, 123, 173, 359 f.
Industrialization, 17 f.
Infallibility of the pope
  Conciliar discussions, 647-60
  Döllinger's opposition to, 613 f., 644 and note
  Dupanloup's opposition to, 617-20
  Fessler's pamphlet on, 644 f. and note
  Maret's opposition to, 614-17
  Opposition after the council, 666-68
  Preliminary controversies over, 609 ff., 644-48
  Submission of opposition bishops, 666
  The vote on, 661 f.
Infanticide in China, 374 note
Insurance companies, 18
International Association of the Workers, 584, 594
Inventions, 17
Ireland
  The Church in: during the reign of Leo XII, 99-103; during the reign of Pius VIII, 158 ff.; during the reign of Pius IX, 713
  After the Emancipation Act, 246 ff.
  Potato famine in, 250
  Religious emancipation of, 100-103
  Repeal of the Union, 248-50
Isabella, queen of Spain, 218, 221
Islam: conquest of North Africa by, 364; decline of, 350
Italian unification
  Aspirations for, 53 f.
  Attitude of foreign powers, 548 f.
  Austrian recognition of, 706
  Cavour's accomplishments towards, 457-59, 510 ff., 523, 531-33
  Convention of September 15, 1864: 547
  Favored by France, 451, 518 f., 525 ff., 545 f.
Italian unification (continued)
  Garibaldi's Neapolitan campaign and, 538 f.
  Napoleon III and, 518 ff., 525 ff., 545 f., 578 f.
  Progress in Sardinia, 449 ff., 510 ff., 523-27, 531-33
  Spanish recognition of, 581
  The taking of Rome, 662-64, 669 ff.
Italy
  Austrian intervention in, 114, 193-204, 408, 548
  Carbonarism in, 31-33
  The Church in: during the reign of Leo XII, 113-15; during the reign of Pius IX, 448-63, 549, 672, 675-79; persecutions of, 672
  The Law of Guaranties, 675 f.
  Liberalism in, 180 ff.
  Persecution of the Church in, 672
  Political divisions after 1812, 235 note
  The political situation in 1848, 448 f.
  Prussian support for, 662 f., 677
  Revolutionary agitations 1833–44, 237
  Secret societies in, 113 f., 169-71, 239-41
  Treaty with France (1864), 547

Jacobis (bishop), missioner in Abyssinia, 367 f.
Jacobites, the: conversions among, 741; and the Vatican Council, 600-605
Janicot, Gustave: and the infallibility controversy, 644, 655 note
Jansenist schism at Utrecht, 116, 501
Japan: discovery of Christians in, 753-57; missioners in, 363, 751-57; persecutions in, 755 f.; political and social organization in, 753, 755 f.
Jerusalem: Latin patriarchate re-established at, 737; missions in, 739 Jesuits, the
  In Austria, 92 f.
  In Canada, 371
  In China, 749 f.
  And the Congregation, 45-49, 85
  Count de Montlosier's opposition to, 85-87
  And the establishment of seminaries, 51
  Expulsion from Germany, 692, 713
  Expulsion from Lucerne, 488
  Expulsion from Portugal, 216

Jesuits (continued)
Expulsion from Spain, 219
Expulsion from Venetia, 582
In France, 45-49, 84 f.: opposition to, 85-88, 90, 330-36; the re-establishment of, 42-45
In Galicia, 92
Gallicanism opposed by, 84-88
In India, 358
Lamennais' opposition to, 83 f., 300 note
Loyalty to Archbishop Vicari, 485
The pagan classics in education, 440
In Prussia, 476
The re-establishment of, 84 f.: in France, 42-45
In Switzerland, 229, 233
In Syria, 352
And Talleyrand, 42
Theological works by, 731
In the United States, 371
Villemain's fear of, 323, 330 note
Jews, the: Leo XII's solicitude for, 125; Pius IX's solicitude for, 385
Jirecek, Austrian minister, 705 f.
Joachina, queen of Portugal, 214 f.
John VI (of Portugal), death of, 214
Josephism, 467
Journalism, Catholic
Chief Catholic papers in 1870, 618 note
And the Congregation, 48
Disputes in, 443
The educational controversy, 325, 327
In France, 134 ff., 279 f.
Literary works, 444
Pius IX on, 442
Jubilee of 1825, 75 f., 152
Jugan, Jeanne (religious founder), 341
July monarchy, religious attitude of, 274 f.
July Revolution, 144 f.: good results for the Church, 149
Jurisdiction, papal, 656 f.

Kant: influence of, 27, 558, 560 and note; philosophy of, 27, 558
Kanzler (general), and the taking of Rome, 669
Keble, John, 59 f., 105 f.: and the Tractarian Movement, 251 f.
Keller, Emile: and the encyclical Quanta cura, 575; in defense of the papacy, 545
Kenrick (archbishop), and the First Council of Baltimore, 764
Keogh, John, 102
Ketteler, William
Bishop of Mainz, 482, 484 f.
Early career of, 481
And the infallibility controversy, 644
Pastor in Berlin, 476, 482
Social works of, 722-24
At the Vatican Council, 659
Kim, Andrew (priest): martyr in Korea, 362, 757
Kleutgen (priest), theological works of, 731
Korea, missioners in, 361 f., 757 f.
Kulturkampf: the beginning of, 479 f.; in Germany, 688-96; meaning of the term, 689; in Switzerland, 697 ff.

Labrador (ambassador): at the 1829 conclave, 128
Labouré, Catherine: visions of, 342
Lachat (bishop), banishment of, 667
Lacordaire
The Avenir and, 296 note
The campaign for educational freedom, 318-20, 337
Catholic liberalism and, 81
On Daniel O'Connell, 100, 250
Dominican Order re-established by, 307
The Ere nouvelle and, 427, 429
Gay converted by, 733
Lamennais' association with, 81, 288, 291 f., 300: differences, 313 note
The Notre Dame Conferences by, 302-5
Ozanam's attachment to, 313 and note
The restoration of the Empire and, 438
On the resumption of the Avenir, 292 note
On the Revolution of 1848, 423
In Rome, 288, 291 f.
Separation from Lamennais, 297, 304 and note
On the temporal domain of the pope, 531 note
On the University monopoly, 51
Ladies of the Adoration of Reparation, 718
La Farina, Giuseppe: and Italian unity, 512 f.

La Guéronnière, Arthur de: revolutionary writings of, 521 f., 529, 544
Lamartine, French poet, 275: and Lamennais, 299 note; on the Fathers of the Faith, 45; and the Revolution of 1848, 424
Lambillotte (priest), work on chant, 729
Lambruschini (cardinal), 238 f.
The Allignol brothers and, 348
At the 1846 conclave, 380
The Jesuit controversy, 335
Lamennais and, 290, 293
The question of mixed marriages, 259
The revolutionaries in Italy, 241
Secretary of State, 241
Lamennais, Jean: and Félicité Lamennais, 300 f. note
Lamennais, Félicité
The Act of Union, 286
Apostasy of, 298-300 and notes
After his apostasy, 301 note
Associates of, 281, 287 f. and notes, 300, 302 ff.
The Avenir founded by, 281
On the Belgian revolt, 154
Bitterness toward Rome, 297, 299 f.
The campaign for educational freedom, 318
Catholic liberalism and, 81-84
The Congregation of St. Peter, 308, 313 note
Death of, 301 note
Disciples of, 81, 302 ff., 347 note, 350
Döllinger compared with, 612 f.
On the election of Gregory XVI, 186
Essay on Indifference, 27, 81, 301: censure of, 292 f.
On Gallicanism, 79 ff.
Gallicanism opposed by, 79 ff., 138 f., 309
Gregory XVI's condemnation of, 289-96
Guéranger and, 287 f. and note, 300, 311
In Rome, 288, 291 f.
Instability of, 281 and note, 300
Irrascibility of, 83 and note, 138 and note, 299
Jean Lamennais and, 300 f. note
The Jesuits and, 83 f., 300 note
Kant's influence on, 27
Lamennais, Félicité (continued)
Lacordaire's association with, 81, 288, 291 f., 300
Lacordaire's separation from, 293, 304 and note
Leader of the Catholic liberal movement, 81, 136 ff.
Liberalism of, 81-84, 179, 285 f.
The pagan classics and, 440
The papacy defended by, 212
On parish missions, 39
Personality of, 83 and notes, 138 and note, 281 and note, 300
Pius VIII criticized by, 139
Political feelings of, 280 f.
Quélen's criticism of, 137 f.
Religious indifferentism and, 74
Religious philosophy of, 313 note
On the separation of Church and state, 285
Silvestre de Sacy and, 301
Submission of, 294, 298
Ultramontanism of, 138 f.
On the University monopoly, 50, 52
See also: Avenir, the Lamorcière, Louis de (general): career of, 536 f.; and the papal army, 536-38; the war with Piedmont, 541-44
Langalerie (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 643
Lanteri, Bruno: religious founder, 241
Laouënan (bishop), missioner in India, 747 f.
La Rochejaquelein: and the discontinuance of the Ere nouvelle, 429; and Dom Miguel of Portugal, 215
La Salette, apparition of, 719
Lassalle, and the communist movement, 583 f.
La Tour du Pin, René de: social works of, 682, 725 f.
Laurent, John: translator of papal allocution, 267
Laval University, erection of, 763
Lavigerie (archbishop): at the Vatican Council, 629; and the Society of Notre-Dame of Africa, 761; and the White Fathers, 739
Lebanon, missions in, 352, 740 f.
Leblanc, Pierre: and the Society of the Sacred Heart, 44

Le Boeuf (priest), and the Paris liturgy, 310 f.
Lecca, center of secret societies, 171
Ledochowski (cardinal), imprisonment of, 695
Lefébure, Léon: social works of, 725
Legris-Duval (priest), and parish missions, 37
Lenormant, and freedom of education, 329
Leo XII
  Cardinal Consalvi and, 67-70
  The Church in Austria, 92-95
  The Church in Bavaria, 95-98
  The Church in England, 103-7
  The Church in France, 71-73, 77-91
  The Church in Ireland, 99-103
  The Church in Italy, 113-15
  The Church in Russia and Poland, 118-21
  The Church in Spain, 111-13
  The Church in the Netherlands, 115-18
  Death of, 126
  Election of, 63-66
  The Emancipation Act and, 108
  Enthronement of, 68
  The foreign missions, 122 f.
  George IV and, 108
  The Italian brigands and, 124
  The Jews and, 125
  The jubilee of 1825, 75 f.
  Last acts of, 124-27
  Louis XVIII and, 71-73
  The party of the zelanti, 67, 70-73
  Portraits of, 66 note
  Relations with Naples, 115
  Religious indifference and, 73-75
  South American republics recognized by, 112, 213
  The suppression of religious schools in France, 90 f.
  William I and, 117
Leo XIII
  Bishop Audu and, 643 note, 743 note
  Bishop Ketteler and, 724
  The Chaldean Church and, 743
  Devotion to the Sacred Heart, 719
  The establishment of the hierarchy in India, 747
  The re-establishment of the hierarchy in Scotland, 714
Leo XIII (continued)
  Rosminian philosophy condemned by, 244 and note
  Scholasticism encouraged by, 731
  The United States government and, 764
Leopold I, king of Belgium, 501
Leopoldsverein, 374
Le Play, Frederick: sociological writings of, 584-86
Le Roy (bishop), on the African missions, 368 f., 761 f.
Lesquen (bishop), and Lamennais, 301 note
Lesseps, Ferdinand de: diplomatic failure of, 410 f.
Leu, Joseph: Swiss patriot, 229, 232 f.
Liautard (priest), and parish missions, 38
Liberalism
  Belgian independence and, 153 f.
  Catholic, 81 f., 150 f., 564 f., 573 f.: condemnation of, 294, 573 ff.
  After the Congress of Vienna, 17
  Different meanings of, 179 f.
  Gregory XVI's condemnation of, 294
  In Italy, 180 ff.
  Of Lamennais, 81-84, 179, 285-87
  Leo XII's condemnation of, 73-75
  Of Montalembert, 564 f.
  Newman's notion of, 105 note, 179
  In the Papal States, 180, 183-85
  Pius IX's condemnation of, 569, 575
  The Revolution of 1848 and, 421 ff.
  See also Indifferentism
Liberia, Protestant missions in, 369
Libermann, Francis: and the African missions, 368 f.
Life of Jesus, by Renan, 557, 559, 561 f., 596 f.
Ligeon (priest), missioner in India, 748
Literature, romantic, 25 ff.
Little Sisters of the Compassion of Mary, 242
Little Sisters of the Poor, 341 and note
Littré (socialist), religion attacked by, 442
Liturgical reform in France, 309-12, 340
Lloyd and Newman, 105
Lombardo-Venetia, assigned to Austria, 236 note
Lombardy, Sardinian invasion of, 394-96

Louis I (of Bavaria), 95 f.
Louis XVIII (of France): anti-Catholic policy of, 35; and Leo XII, 71-73, 77; religious revival under, 35 ff.; and the University monopoly, 50
Louis Philippe
The defense of the Papal States, 197 f.
Favorable attitude of, 321, 334
Freedom of education and, 321 f. and note
Proclamation as king, 144 f.
Religious ignorance of, 274 f. and note
Lourdes, pilgrimages to, 720
Loyson, apostasy of, 666
Luca (cardinal), at the Vatican Council, 625, 636 note
Ludwigsverein, 374
Lützow (ambassador), at the 1829 conclave, 128
Lutheranism: the theological dispute in Prussia, 478 f.; and the Vatican Council, 602

Mabilleau (priest), martyrdom of, 751
Macé, Jean: anticlericalism of, 685
MacMahon (marshal): at the battle of Magenta, 525; president of France, 686
Madames of the Sacred Heart, 45: in North Africa, 366; in the United States, 371
Madeline Sophie Barat, St., 45
Magenta, battle of, 525
Mahmud (sultan), persecutor of the Armenians, 172
Maistre, Joseph de: and Catholic liberalism, 81; on the Congress of Vienna, 15; Gallicanism opposed by, 79
Maistre (priest), missioner in China, 173
Malines congresses, 563-65, 589: and the encyclical Quanta cura, 572 f.
Malou (bishop), work on the Immaculate Conception, 732
Mamiani, minister of Pius IX, 396-98, 401 f.
Manning, Henry (cardinal), 496-98
Faber compared with, 733
The infallibility controversy, 617 note, 621
Negotiations with the Anglicans, 605
On papal infallibility, 658, 668
Manning, Henry (continued)
Social works of, 722
At the Vatican Council, 628, 630, 638, 647 note, 650
Manteuffel, 479, 480 note
Manzoni, Alexander, 55, 179, 230: disillusionment of, 462
Maret (bishop): and the Ere nouvelle, 427 and note; philosophical work of, 343; submission to the Council, 662; work on papal infallibility, 614-17
Margaret Mary Alacoque, St., 718
Maria Christina, queen of Spain, 218-21
Maria de Gloria, queen of Portugal, 214-18: recipient of the golden rose, 418
Maria Theresa (empress), on Prussian hegemony, 469 note
Marianists, Society of the, 40 f.: in Oceania, 41
Marilley (bishop): and Bishop Mermillod, 700; imprisonment of, 491; return from exile, 551
Marists, the, 41: in Oceania, 373 f., 760
Marongini (archbishop), banishment of, 461
Maronites, the, 353, 741
Martignac, de, 89 f.: appointment as prime minister, 140
Martin (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 628, 637, 643
Marx, Karl: the Communist Manifesto, 5; and the communist movement, 583 f.
Massaia (bishop), missioner in Abyssinia, 367 f.
Mastai-Feretti (cardinal): at the 1846 conclave, 380 f.; see also Pius IX
Mathieu (cardinal): and the Congregation, 134; Napoleon III's denunciation of, 572; at the Vatican Council, 628, 629 note, 633 f., 643, 657
Mauband (priest), martyr in Korea, 362, 757
Max, king of Bavaria, 472
May Laws, the, 692-95
Mazenod (bishop), 41 f.: and the Gallican controversy, 348
Mazloum, bishop of Syria, 352
Mazzini, Giuseppe
Agitations in Italy, 449
Appeals to the Italian clergy, 455 note, 456 note
Carbonarism and, 239

Mazzini, Giuseppe (continued)
The communist movement and, 584
On the "death" of the Church, 581
On Italian liberalism,
Italian unity and, 54, 180, 235 f., 513 f.
Motto of, 215, 228
The papacy attacked by, 237
Religious doctrine of, 237, 452
In Switzerland, 228
Triumphant in Rome, 407 f., 411
Young Europe organized by, 228, 235
Young Italy organized by, 180, 235
Melchers (archbishop), imprisonment of, 695
Melchites, emancipation of the, 353
Melun, Armand de: social works of, 724 f.
Memorandum of 1831, the, 195 ff.
Memorial catholique, the, 280: foundation of, 81 f.; and Lamennais, 136
Menotti, Ciro: and Italian unity, 183 and note
Mentana, battle of, 591
Mermillod, Gaspard: at the Vatican Council, 628; banishment of, 667, 701; bishop of Geneva, 698-702; his episcopal appointment, 594, 698, 700
Mérode, Xavier de (bishop): and the papal army, 536 f.; his removal from office, 579
Mesopotamia, missions in, 352
Metternich
The Cologne affair criticized by, 268
At the Congress of Vienna, 93 note
On the election of Gregory XVI, 186
The emancipation of English Catholics and, 104
Fall of, 396, 465
On the French occupation of Ancona, 203
Gregory XVI criticized by, 205
His influence in Europe, 93
The Jesuits and, 92 f.
The July Revolution and, 144
Lamennais' condemnation and, 293 note
Liberalism in Italy and, 182
Pius IX criticized by, 390 note
Religious indifferentism of, 74 f. and note
The revolution in Spain and, 110
Mexico, missioners in, 763
Meyer, Swiss patriot, 229, 232 f.
Michelet, Jules: the Jesuits opposed by, 331-33; religion attacked by, 443
Migne (priest); Gallicanism attacked by, 347; patrologies published by, 344 and note, 444
Miguel, Dom: cruelty of, 216 f. and note; dispute over the Portuguese throne, 214-16
Miraculous medal, the, 341
Mirari vos (encyclical), 293 ff.: indifferentism condemned by, 295; and Lamennais, 293 f., 296; liberalism condemned by, 294
Missionaries of France, Society of, 38 f.
Mixed marriages, question of: during the reign of Gregory XVI, 257 ff., 265; during the reign of Pius VIII, 167 f., 257 f.; in Switzerland, 231
Modena, duchy of, 236 note: agitation in, 183 f.; union with Piedmont, 526 f.
Moehler, Adam, 94, 272 note
Mohammedanism: decline of, 350; north Africa conquered by, 364
Monde (French paper), the founding of, 531
Monita secreta (of the Jesuits), 331 and note
Montalembert, Charles
Association with Lamennais, 281 f., 288 ff., 298, 300
On atheism, 597
On the Catholic revival in France, 274
On Christian art, 729
At the Congress of Malines, 563-65
Droste-Vischering and, 266, 269
Faith of, 282, 319, 328 note
Freedom of education and, 319, 325, 327-29, 434
In the House of Peers, 306 f., 319, 328 note
The infallibility controversy, 645
On the Jesuit controversy, 334 f.
Liberal views of, 564 f.
Literary works of, 444
At the Oratory, 445
The papacy defended by, 415
On Pius IX's liberal reforms, 392
Pius IX's praise of, 419
Pius IX's rebuke of, 565
On the Polish revolt, 158

Montalembert, Charles (continued)
On the religious persecution in Switzerland, 489
The restoration of the Empire and, 438
The Romantic movement, 135
In Rome, 288, 291 f.
Student at the University, 52
His tour of southern France, 283
Montlosier, Count de, 85: on the Congregation, 46, 86; the Jesuits opposed by, 85-87
Montmartre basilica, the, 683
Montmorency, member of the Congregation, 49 note
Morlhon (bishop), and devotion to the Blessed Virgin, 720
Moroni, Dizionario di erudizione by, 210
Mortara incident, the, 520 f. and note
Mossul, Protestant missions at, 741
Müller, Adam, 56
Mun, Albert de: social works of, 682, 725 f.; and the Syllabus of Pius IX, 576
Munich school of writers, 96-98
Music, sacred: restoral of, 729 f.

Nagasaki, Christian communities near, 753 f.
Naples
Garibaldi's capture of, 538
Intervention in the Papal States, 410
Masonic anticouncil at, 598 f.
Relations with the Holy See, 115
Revolution of 1820 in, 114
Napoleon I
And the Brothers of the Christian Schools, 48
Death of, 13
And Freemasonry, 29 and note
Pius VII imprisoned by, 438
And the University monopoly, 48
Napoleon III
Attempted assassination of, 517 f.
The Church persecuted by, 550
Domestic and foreign policy of, 471 note, 522
Italian policy of, 518 ff., 529 f., 544 f., 578 f.
Religion favored by, 471 note, 515 f., 522, 529 f.
Napoleon III (continued)
Rome abandoned by, 622, 663 note, 679 f.
And the secret societies, 515, 518
Treaty with Austria, 525 f.
Vacillating policy of, 532, 545-47
See also Bonaparte, Louis Napoleon
Narvaez (general), and the Spanish government, 502
Nassau, repressive measures adopted in, 165 f., 480, 484-86
Néel (priest), martyrdom of, 751
Neo-Guelfs, 54
Netherlands, the: and Belgian independence, 152-55; the Church in, 115-18, 500 f.
New Caledonia (island), missioners in, 759
New Zealand, missioners in, 759
Newman, John Henry
Anti-Catholic beliefs of, 105
Associates of, 105-7, 251, 256
On the authority of the Syllabus, 577 note
On Catholicism in England, 60 f.
On the condition of Anglicanism, 162 f.
Early studies of, 60 f.
And the Emancipation Act, 104
His history of the Arians, 162
At Littlemore, 255
His meaning of liberalism, 179
And Manning, 497 note
The Oratory founded by, 494
The Oxford Movement, 105 f., 251 ff., 493
Sermons at Oxford, 106, 253
The Tractarian Movement, 252 f.
His Via media, 253, 255
Ney, Napoleon's letter to, 413 f.
Nicaea, Council of, 588
Nice, cession to France, 532
Nicholas I (czar): and Gregory XVI, 223-26; his persecution of Polish Catholics, 119 f., 156 f., 223-26, 553
Notre Dame conferences of Lacordaire, 302-5
Notre Dame de Sion, Congregation of, 342 note, 739
Notre Dame of Africa, Society of, 761 f.
Nouridgian, Anthony: patriarch of Armenia, 172
Novara, Austrian victories at, 114, 408

Oblates of Mary Immaculate, 41 f.: in Canada, 371
Oblates of St. Alphonsus Liguori, 241
Oblates of St. Charles, 498
Oblates of the Blessed Virgin, 241
Oceania, missions in, 41, 373 f., 758-61
O'Connell, Daniel, 99-103, 158-60: after the Emancipation Act, 247-50; the Coercion Bill opposed by, 248; death of, 250; repeal of the Union, 248-50
Old Catholic Church, 688: founding of, 667
Olivaint: French socialist, 277; Jesuit, 278
Oliveira (bishop), exile of, 762
Olivier, Emile: on the convocation of the Vatican Council, 606; and the educational controversy, 434; on Italian unity, 526; on the Law of Guaranties, 676; on papal infallibility, 668
Oratory, the: Newman's founding of, 494
Oratory of the Immaculate Conception, 445
Orsini, attempted assassination of Napoleon, 517
Ottoman Empire: decline of, 349 f.; see also Turkey
Oudinot (general), and the Roman expedition, 408-12
Our Lady of Sion, founding of, 342 note, 739
Owen, and cooperatives, 22
Oxford Movement, the, 104-7, 162, 253-56, 493 ff.
Ozanam, Frederick
  Charitable works of, 313-16
  And the educational controversy, 316 f.
  The Ere nouvelle founded by, 426 f.
  Literary works of, 444
  On the social question, 426

Pacca (cardinal): at the 1829 conclave, 130; at the 1831 conclave, 185; on the German episcopate, 57; and Lamennais' submission, 298
Paccanari, the Fathers of the Faith founded by, 44
Pagan classics, in French education, 439-41
Palestine, missions in, 738-40
Pallota (cardinal), and the Italian brigands, 124
Palmerston: interference in Italy, 396; and Prussian hegemony, 470
Papal army
  Desertions from, 589
  At the fall of Rome, 663 f.
  Formation of, 581 and note
  In the Franco-Prussian war, 680
  Garibaldi defeated by, 590 f.
Papal States, the
  Austrian intervention in, 193-204, 548
  Carbonarism in, 114
  Divisions of, 184 note, 206, 235 note, 511 note
  During the reign of Leo XII, 124 f.
  Fiscal reforms of Gregory XVI, 192, 206-9
  Foreign intervention in 1831, 195 ff.
  French intervention: in 1832, 201-4; in 1847–48, 391, 398, 405; in 1849, 407 ff.; in 1859, 519, 524 ff.; in 1867, 591
  Garibaldi's invasion of, 590 f.
  The government of, 205-11
  Italian absorption of, 671
  Judiciary reforms of Gregory XVI, 194, 206
  Liberal reforms of Pius IX, 384 ff., 392-94, 414
  Liberalism in, 180, 183-85
  Political reforms of Gregory XVI, 192, 206
  Political reforms of Pius IX, 385, 393, 414
  Rebellion in, 184 f., 189 ff., 397 f., 400 ff.
  Revolutionary stirrings in, 387 ff., 393 f.
  Sardinian invasion of, 540-44, 663 f.
  Secret societies in, 170
  Withdrawal of Austrian troops from, 199
  Withdrawal of French troops from, 204, 589, 679 f.
Paris, Congress of, 510 f.
Paris Commune, the, 681 f.
Paris Exposition, 586 f.
Parish missions, 36-39
Parisis (bishop): and freedom of education, 324 f., 328 f.; and liturgical reform, 340; his pastoral on chant, 729

Parma, duchy of, 236 note: union with Piedmont, 526 f.
Pecci (archbishop), scholasticism encouraged by, 731 f.
Pedro, emperor of Brazil: dispute over the Portuguese throne, 214-18; religious persecutions in Portugal, 216 f.
Peel, Robert, 103
Pellico, Silvio: disillusionment of, 462; Italian liberal, 55, 179, 230
Périer, Casimir: French minister, 198, 201, 203
Persia, missions in, 352
Peter's Pence, the establishment of, 533-35
Pététot, and the Oratory of the Immaculate Conception, 444 f.
Petitjean (bishop), missioner in Japan, 754, 756
Phalansteries, 23 note
Philip, Brother: social work of, 727
Philosophy: in the early nineteenth century, 26-29; the German school, 27, 491, 557 f., 597; revival of scholasticism, 731 f.
Picot, Michel: and the Ami de la religion, 79, 133, 279; in defense of Gallican liturgies, 311
Picpus fathers, in Oceania, 760
Pie (bishop of Poitiers)
  Career of, 631
  On the Church during the Republic, 417
  In defense of the papacy, 512, 531, 544
  Renan condemned by, 562, 563 note
  Trial of, 544 f.
  At the Vatican Council, 628, 631, 637, 652
Piedmont
  Cession of Savoy to France, 532 f.
  In the Crimean war, 510
  Defeated at Novara, 408
  France allied with, 518 f., 524 ff., 547
  Lombardy invaded by, 394-96
  The Papal States invaded by, 540-44, 663 f.
  Persecution of the Church in, 453 ff.
  Revolution of 1820 in, 114
  Rome occupied by, 663 f., 669 ff.
  Secret societies in, 452 f., 513
  The unification of Italy, 449 ff., 510 ff., 523-27, 531-33
Piedmont (continued)
  See also Italy
Pietro, de (cardinal): at the Vatican Council, 641
Pimodan (general), at the battle of Castelfidardo, 542
Pius VII, death of, 13
Pius VIII, 130
  The Armenian Catholics, 172
  The Belgian revolt, 154
  Cardinal Castiglioni and, 129
  The Church in France, 133 ff.
  The Church in Germany, 165 ff.
  The Church in Ireland, 158 ff.
  The Church in Scotland, 161 f.
  Death of, 176
  Election of, 128-30
  First encyclical of, 132 f.
  The foreign missions, 173-76
  And the German bishops, 167 f.
  The July government, 148
  And Lamennais, 139
  Secret societies in Italy, 169-71
Pius IX, 381 f.
  Alexander II condemned by, 556 f.
  Amnesty granted by, 384 f. and note, 517
  The antichristian intellectual movement, 557 ff., 596 f.
  Apostolicae Sedis (bull), 626 f.
  Army organized by, 535-37
  Balmes' praise of, 506
  On Catholic journalism, 442
  Cavour's criticism of, 511
  The Chaldean schism, 742 f.
  Christian art, 728-30
  The Church in America, 762-65
  The Church in Austria, 464-68, 592 f., 704-9
  The Church in Belgium, 501 f.
  The Church in England, 493-99, 712-15
  The Church in France, 417-47, 505, 572-75, 614-21, 679-86
  The Church in Germany, 471-87, 687-96
  The Church in Holland, 500 f.
  The Church in India, 745-48
  The Church in Ireland, 613
  The Church in Italy, 448-63, 549, 672, 675-79
  The Church in Poland, 554-56
  The Church in Portugal, 551

Pius IX (continued)
The Church in Russia, 553, 582, 594
The Church in Spain, 502-5, 550 f., 593 f., 709-12
The Church in Switzerland, 488-91, 551, 594, 697-703
Crétineau-Joly's criticism of, 506 note
Death of, 714 f.
And devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 716-18
And devotion to the Sacred Heart, 718 f.
And the educational controversy in France, 436
Election of, 381
The encyclical Quanta cura; see Quanta cura
Exile at Gaeta, 401-16, 506
The foreign missions, 736-65
France's Italian policy and, 529 f.
The Franco-Prussian war, 680
Gallicanism condemned by, 569
His gratitude toward France, 412, 416 f., 592
The hierarchy re-established in Britain, 495
The hierarchy re-established in Scotland, 714
The hierarchy re-organized in Holland, 500 f.
The Immaculate Conception proclaimed by, 507 f.
Liberal ovations accorded to, 385 f., 388 f., 393
Liberal reforms of, 384 ff., 392-94, 414
Liberal tendencies of, 382 ff., 506
Liberalism condemned by, 569
Metternich's criticism of, 390 note
Missions in Africa, 761
Missions in China, 748-51
Missions in Japan, 751-57
Missions in Oceania, 758-61
Missions in the Far East, 745-62
Missions in the Near East, 737-45
Montalembert admonished by, 565 f.
On papal infallibility, 666 and note
And the Papal States, 383-416
And philosophical studies, 730-32
Political reforms of, 385, 393, 414
Preliminary studies for the Syllabus, 508 f.
Pius IX (continued)
Relations with the Turkish government, 737
Religious persecution in Sardinia, 454-62
Reversurus (bull), 743 f. and note
On the Revolution of 1848, 424
The Roman question, 579 f.
The Russian persecutions, 553, 556 f.
The Sardinian invasion of Lombardy, 395 f.
Socialism condemned by, 568
The Syllabus; see Syllabus
The taking of Rome, 663 f., 669 ff.
Taxes raised by, 516
Victor Emmanuel's attitude toward, 452, 454 ff.
And the unification of Italy, 449
And works of charity, 721-28
And works of piety, 716-21
Plantier (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 628
Poland
The Church in: during the reign of Gregory XVI, 222-26; during the reign of Leo XII, 118-20; during the reign of Pius VIII, 156-58; during the reign of Pius IX, 55:, 554-56; Russian persecutions of, 119 f., 223 f., 554, 556
Churches in, 156 note
Persecutions by Nicholas I, 119 f., 223 f.
The revolt against Russia, 157 f., 555 f.
Russian absorption of, 582
Polignac, Count de: and the July Revolution, 143; member of the Congregation, 47, 49 note, 140; the prime minister of France, 140 f.
Pompalier (bishop), missioner in New Zealand, 373 f., 760
Pondichery, missioners in, 123, 356 f., 359
Pontmain, apparition at, 681, 721
Portugal: the Church persecuted in, 216 f.; dispute over the royal succession, 214-18; the foreign missions hindered by, 174, 358 f., 745 f.
Pothier (priest), work on chant, 730
Priests of the Blessed Sacrament, founding of the, 717
Private ownership: the economists' view

Private ownership (continued)
of, 21; Fourier's condemnation of, 23; obligations of, 20
Propagation of the Faith Society, 123 f., 341, 356, 364: encouraged by Pius VIII, 175
Property: confiscation of, 20; ecclesiastical; see Confiscation of Church property
Protestantism: and Catholic missions, 173 f., 740 f., 745 f.; the disintegration of, 736; in the Near East, 740-42, 745; of Germany, 164, 468 f., 471, 688
Proudhon, Pierre: atheism of, 597; religion attacked by, 442
Prussia
Charitable and religious works in, 476
Italian unification favored by, 549, 662 f., 677
The Kulturkampf, 479 f., 688-96
The Memorandum of 1831, 195, 199
The Polish revolt and, 556
Protestantism of, 164, 468 f., 471, 688
The question of mixed marriages, 167 f., 257 ff., 265
Religious liberties in, 270 f., 471, 474 ff.
Religious repressions in, 479 f.
Secret societies in, 469 f. and note
War with France, 662 f., 679-81
Victory at Sadowa, 472, 582
See also Germany
Public opinion, the influence of, 7
Public works: by Gregory XVI, 208 f.; by Leo XII, 124 f.
Pusey, Edward: friend of Newman, 106, 256; his objections to the Vatican Council, 604 f.; and the Tractarian Movement, 253, 499
Puseyism, 498 f.

Quanta cura (encyclical), 566-71
Political teaching of, 569, 576
Preliminary studies for, 508 f.
The publication of, 566
Reasons for, 567-69
The reception of, 570 ff.
Quebec, provincial council at, 763
Quélen (archbishop of Paris)
On the conquest of Algiers, 143
And the July Revolution, 145, 147, 149
The miraculous medal, 341
Quélen (continued)
The Notre Dame conferences, 303, 305
Protest over the University monopoly, 90
Warning against Lamennais, 137 f.
Quinet, Edgar: the Church attacked by, 443; the Jesuits opposed by, 331-33, 336; philosophy of, 558

Radetsky (general), campaigns in Italy, 201, 395 f.
Railroads, Gregory XVI's opposition to, 209 note
Ramière (priest), and devotion to the Sacred Heart, 718
Raspail, and the socialist uprising, 425 f.
Rationalism: of the Revolution, 344 f.; Pius IX's condemnation of, 568, 575
Ratisbonne, Marie-Alphonse, 342 note, 739
Ratisbonne, Marie-Théodore, 342 note, 739
Rauscher (cardinal): at the Vatican Council, 628; and the Austrian persecutions, 705 f.
Rauzan (priest), and parish missions, 36 f.
Ravenna: captured by Austria, 193; captured by papal troops, 201; revolutionaries in, 192, 200
Ravignan (Jesuit), in defense of the Jesuits, 333
Reichensperger: and the Center Party, 688; and Droste-Vischering's arrest, 269; popularity of, 477; and the unification of Germany, 474
Reisach (cardinal): at the Vatican Council, 625; death of, 637
Renan, Ernest
Apostasy of, 559 f.
In the Collège de France, 550, 685
Condemnation of, 562 f. and note
Kant's influence on, 560 and note
Life of Jesus, 557, 559, 561 f., 596 f.
Personality of, 559
His tribute to Dupanloup, 338
Resorgimento movement in Italy, 54
Reversurus (bull), 743 f. and note
Revolution of 1830, 379
Revolution of 1848, 379
Riccadonna (Jesuit), missioner in Syria, 352

Ricciardi, Joseph: and the Masonic anti-council, 598 f.
Riccio (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 662
Ridel (bishop), missioner in Korea, 758
Rieti, Spanish occupation of, 410
Rigaud (priest), martyrdom of, 751
Right of exclusive: abolition of, 7 note; at the 1823 conclave, 64; at the 1831 conclave, 185
Rivet (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 653 and note, 659
Roess (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 628
Rohan, de (priest): and the Congregation, 134
Rohrbacher, 81: association with Lamennais, 288 f., 300; and the University controversy, 321
Romagna, union with Piedmont, 526 f.
Roman question, the, 579 ff., 590-92
Romantic literature, 25 ff., 135 f.
Romantic movement, the, 25, 53, 135
Rome
  Carbonarism in, 114
  Civic guard: of Gregory XVI, 192, 208; of Pius IX, 385, 392
  French occupation of, 412
  French siege of, 410 ff.
  French troops withdrawn from, 581, 662
  Italian occupation of, 663 f., 669 ff.
  Rebellion in, 400 ff., 669
  Secret societies in, 407
Ronsin, Pierre: and the Congregation, 47 f.
Rosalie, Sister: social work of, 315, 724, 727
Rosmini, Antonio, 242 f.: charitable works of, 721; devotion of, 721; philosophical notions of, 244 and note; religious foundations by, 243-45, 721
Rosminian philosophy, condemnation of, 244 and note
Rossi, Pellegrino
  Assassination of, 400
  French ambassador at Rome, 382 note, 388, 390
  French citizen, 333 note
  The Jesuit controversy, 344 f.
  Papal minister, 398-400
  Swiss constitution revised by, 230
Rudigier (bishop), arrest of, 708
Ruskin (artist), 728 f.
Russel, Odo: at the Vatican, 614 note; and the Vatican Council, 647 note
Russell, John: and the re-establishment of the British hierarchy, 495
Russia
  Attitude toward Italian unification, 549 and note
  The Church in: during the reign of Leo XII, 118-21; during the reign of Pius IX, 553, 582, 594
  And the Memorandum of 1831, 195, 199
  The persecution of Polish Catholics, 119 f., 223 f., 554, 556
  Poland absorbed by, 582
  And the Polish revolt, 555 f.
  Unreliability of, 552
Ruthenian Church, Russian persecution of the, 553

Sacred Heart: devotion to the, 718 f., 721; Society of the, 44
Sacy, Silvestre de: and Lamennais, 301
Sadowa, Austrian defeat at, 472, 582
Sailer (priest), 57, 96
Saint-Aulaire, French ambassador at Rome, 202 f.
Saint-Cyr, Louis de (priest): on the missions in India, 358
St. Paul's Basilica, reconstruction of, 125, 208
St. Peter, Congregation of, 308, 316 note
Saint-Simon: disciples of, 278 f.; socialism of, 5, 22 f., 277, 437
St. Vincent de Paul Society, 314 f., 341
Sainte-Beauve (French writer), 135, 276: on Ballanche, 25; as Trappist, 137
Salesians, the: in South America, 762
Salinis (priest), social work of, 135
Salvandy, and freedom of education, 419
Samhiri, patriarch of Antioch, 741
Sanseverino, Cajetan: philosophical studies of, 730 f.
Sardinia
  Cession of Savoy to France, 532 f.
  In the Crimean war, 510
  Defeated at Novara, 408
  Friendly relations with France, 451, 518 f., 524 ff., 547
  Lombardy invaded by, 394-96

Sardinia (continued)
The Papal States invaded by, 540-44, 663 f.
Patriotism in, 451
Persecution of the Church in, 453 ff.
Rome occupied by, 663 f., 669 ff.
Secret societies in, 452 f., 513
The unification of Italy, 449 ff., 510 ff., 523-27, 531-33
See also Italy
Sardinian states, 400 note, 451
Savoy, cession to France, 532
Say, Jean-Baptiste: on the social question, 21
Schelling, German philosopher, 96, 98
Schlegel, Frederick, 56, 96 note: conversion of, 58; and Germanic supremacy, 94
Schleiermacher, philosophy of, 27 f.
Scholasticism, revival of, 730-32
Schools, religious; see Education
Schwarzenberg (cardinal): archbishop of Salzburg, 465; at the Vatican Council, 628, 640, 653 and note
Scotland, the Church in, 161, 714
Secret societies
The Bonapartes and, 170
Consalvi on, 17 note
In the early nineteenth century, 29-34
In Germany, 169, 262 and note
And Italian unification, 180 f., 452 f., 513
In Italy, 113 f., 169-71, 239-41
And the July Revolution, 145 f.
Papal condemnation of, 387, 596
In the Papal States, 387, 401 f.
In Poland, 121
In Portugal, 215 f.
In Prussia, 469 f. and note
In Rome, 407
In Sardinia, 452 f., 513
In Switzerland, 171, 228, 491, 698
Ségur, Gaston de: and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, 716 f.; Napoleon acclaimed by, 515; social work of, 728
Seminaries
In Austria, 707 f.
In Belgium, 116 f., 152
In Beyrouth, 352
In France, 90
In India, 357
In Lebanon, 352
Senestrey (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 628
Serrano, president of Spain, 709
Servants of the Blessed Sacrament, 717
Severoli (cardinal); at the 1823 conclave, 63 f.; and Leo XII, 71
Siam, missions in, 123
Sibour (canon), and Lamennais, 287 note
Sicardi law (in Sardinia), 453-56
Siestrzencewicz, Stanislas (bishop), 118 f.
Signay, archbishop of Quebec, 372
Sisters of Providence, extensive works of the, 245
Smyrna, missions at, 351 f.
Social crisis, in the early nineteenth century, 17 ff.
Social question, the
The Catholic social school, 24
Inventions and, 17 f.
In the nineteenth century, 5, 21-25
Louis de Bonald and, 24
After the Revolution of 1848, 425 ff., 436 f.
Socialism (in France)
Of Ballanche, 24 f.
Of Charles Fourier, 23
After the July revolution, 277 f.
Lamennais and, 300
Le Play's assault on, 584-86
Pius IX's condemnation of, 568
After the Revolution of 1848, 425 ff., 436 f.
Of Saint-Simon, 5, 22 f., 437
Society of Mary, 41: in Oceania, 373 f., 760
Society of Notre-Dame of Africa, 761 f.
Society of the Fathers of the Faith, 44 f.
Society of the Holy Ghost, 369, 761
Society of the Holy Heart of Mary, 369
Society of the Sacred Heart, 44
Society of the Sacred Hearts, 760
Sokolski, Bulgarian archbishop, 551 f.
Solferino, battle of, 525
Sonderbund, the: defeat of, 488 f., formation of, 234
Soubirous, Bernadette (St.), 720
South American Republics
Appointment of bishops in, 188
Gregory XVI's solicitude for, 372 f.
Independence from Spain, 110 f., 112 note

South American Republics (continued)
Missions in, 762 f.
Papal recognition of, 17, 69, 112, 213
Slavery in, 372 f.
Spain
The Church in: during the reign of Gregory XVI, 218-21; during the reign of Leo XII, 111-13; during the reign of Pius IX, 502-5, 550 f., 593 f., 709-12
Civil war in, 220 f.
Confiscation of Church property in, 219 and note, 503, 593 f., 711
The dispute between Carlists and Christinos, 218-21
In the early nineteenth century, 108-11
Intervention in the Papal States, 410, 502
The kingdom of Italy recognized by, 551, 581
Religious persecutions in, 219 f., 503 f., 593 f.
The revolution of 1820, 110
Spalding (archbishop): at the Vatican Council, 628, 629 note, 649; and the second council of Baltimore, 764
Spiegel, August (archbishop): death of, 260; and mixed marriages, 168, 259
Spoleto, Spanish occupation of, 410
States of the Church; see Papal States
Sterbini, revolutionary minister at Rome, 401
Strossmayer, bishop of Diakovar, 628 note: papal infallibility opposed by, 632 f., 653, 655; submission to the Council, 666; at the Vatican Council, 636, 638 note, 640 f., 643
Sue, Eugene (writer): and the Jesuits, 332
Sulpicians, the: in the United States, 371
Supply and demand, law of, 21
Sweden, persecution of Catholics in, 551
Swiss National Catholic Church, 702 f.
Swiss soldiers, in the papal militia, 208
Switzerland
As constituted in 1815, 227
The Church in: during the reign of Gregory XVI, 229-34; during the reign of Pius IX, 488-91, 551, 594, 697, 703
The episcopate in, 229
Formation of the Sonderbund in, 234
Switzerland (continued)
Form of government, 227, 229 f.
Liberal Christianity in, 598
Protestant sects in, 492 f.
Religious persecution in, 231 f., 489-91, 697 ff.
Revolutionary movement in, 228-34
Secret societies in, 171, 228, 491, 798
Vatican Council opposed in, 667
Syllabus, the Doctrinal authority of, 576 f. note
Misinterpretation of, 571
The origin of, 567 note
Preliminary studies for, 508 f.
Publication of, 566, 571, 578
Syria, missions in, 122, 352, 740 f.

Talleyrand, 35, 43: and Cavour, 533; at the Congress of Vienna, 93 note; and the Jesuits, 42; religious indifferentism of, 74 f. and note Taxes: in the Papal States, 192, 207, 516; on imports, 18 f.
Teutonic Society, the, 469
Teysseyre (priest), 74
Theological studies, 731 f.
Thiers, Adolphe: attitude toward the temporal power, 675; and the July Revolution, 144; on the protection of the papacy, 414 f.; and the struggle for educational freedom, 431 f., 434 f.
Thouvenel, French minister, 544 note, 545 f.
Tobacco monopoly in the Papal States, 210 note
Tories, the: and the Catholic revival in England, 251; and Irish liberation, 247 f., 250
Torlonia family, and the tobacco monopoly, 210 note
Toulouse Censure, the (of Lamennais), 292 f. and note, 296
Tournély, Léonor de (priest), 44
Tournély, Xavier de (priest), 44
Tractarian Movement, 251 ff.: decline of, 499
Traditionalism, error of, 344 f.
Trappists, in North Africa, 366
Trent, Council of: Paul III's convocation of, 588
Trinitarian Sisters, in North Africa, 366

Triple Alliance, foundation of the, 677
Tripoli, missions in, 122
Tugendbund, the, 29-31, 33 note, 470
Tunis, mission in, 364
Turin, treaty of, 532 f.
Turkey
  Christian education in, 740
  Missions in, 350-54, 737
  Relations with Pius IX, 737
  Religious persecutions in, 172
  Russian and English interest in, 349, 737

Unam sanctam (bull), 567
Unigenitus (bull), 567
Unitarianism, 598
United States, the: Native Americanism in, 174, 369 f.; treaties with China, 361, 749
United States, the Church in the Councils of Baltimore, 174 f., 370, 764
  During the reign of Gregory XVI, 369-71
  During the reign of Leo XII, 123
  During the reign of Pius VIII, 174 f.
  During the reign of Pius IX, 763-65
  Persecution of, 369 f.
  The trustee system, 174 f.
Univers (Catholic paper)
  Controversy with the Correspondant, 443 f.
  The educational controversy, 432 f.
  Founding of, 303 note
  Reappearance of, 594
  The restoration of the Empire and, 438
  Suppression of, 530
University monopoly
  Catholic attack on, 318-30, 337, 430 ff.
  Changes in, 431 f., 435
  The end of, 683
  Extension of, 90
  Louis XVIII and, 50
  Napoleon I and, 49
  Pius IX's condemnation of, 569
Utrecht, schism of, 116, 501

Valerga, Joseph: papal legate, 744; patriarch of Jerusalem, 738; and the Vatican Council, 600; at the Vatican Council, 657
Vandalism, during the July Revolution, 145
Varin de Solmon, Joseph, 44 f.
Vatican Council
  The Catholic rulers and, 605-8
  The Civiltà cattolica and, 609 ff.
  Constitution De fide catholica, 637-39
  Constitution De romano pontifice, 651 ff.
  Controversies preceding the, 608-21
  Convocation of, 595 ff.
  Disciplinary questions, 634 f., 640-43
  Discussions on papal infallibility, 647-60
  Dogmatic discussions, 635-39
  Fathers in attendance, 622 f.
  Grouping of the fathers, 627-34
  The Masonic anticouncil, 598 f.
  Opening of, 622 f.
  Opposition of the governments, 607 f., 646, 667 f., 704, 712
  Opposition of theologians, 666 f.
  The Orthodox bishops invited to, 600 f.
  Papal jurisdiction and, 656 f.
  Preparations for, 588
  The program, 634 ff.
  Protestants invited to, 600 ff.
  Question of procedure, 624-26
  Schema De doctrina catholica, 635-37
  Schema De Ecclesia, 650
  Submission of the opposition bishops, 666
  The vote on papal infallibility, 661 f.
Vatimesnil, and freedom of education, 327, 329, 434
Vaughan, bishop of Salford, 713
Vecchiotti (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 646 note, 656 and note
Venetian quadrilateral, Austria in the, 395 note, 525, 548
Venezuela, missioners in, 762
Ventura (priest): disillusionment of, 462; and Lamennais, 290, 293; and the restoration of the Empire, 438
Verin, Charles: social work of, 724
Vérot (bishop), at the Vatican Council, 643
Veuillot, Louis, 325 ff.
  On Catholic liberalism, 574 f.
  On the conversion of the Mohammedans, 365 note, 366
  On the convocation of the Vatican Council, 606
  On the death of Gregory XVI, 379
  In defense of the Pope, 419, 531

Veuillot, Louis (continued)
Dupanloup's conflict with, 441
The educational controversy, 325 note, 327-29, 432, 435 f.
On freedom of education, 684
The infallibility controversy, 616, 618, 620 and note, 625, 645
Literary works of, 444, 541, 562 note, 574
The Mortara incident, 521 and note
Napoleon III and, 519
And the pagan classics in education, 440 f.
The restoration of the Empire, 438 f.
On the Revolution of 1848, 421 f.
On the Vatican Council, 647
Vianney, John Baptist (St.), 445-47
Viard (bishop), missioner in New Zealand, 760
Vicari, Hermann (archbishop), and the religious conflict in Germany, 483-86
Victor Emmanuel, 449 ff.
Accession of, 408, 450
Attempted abdication of, 673
Austrian recognition of, 706
Death of, 679
Italian unity and, 523
Political connections, 450
Relations with the pope, 452, 454 ff.
Religious persecutions by, 454 ff.
The taking of Rome, 592, 662-64, 670 ff.
Vienna, Congress of, 14 f., 93 note
Attitude of the Church toward, 16
Criticism of, 15 f., 62
Disregard for, 15
Division of Italy, 235 note
Organization of Germany, 164
Organization of Switzerland, 227
Vigny (writer), 135, 137
Villafranca, treaty of, 525 f.
Villemain: book on Christian eloquence, 441 and note; and freedom of education, 322 f., 328, 330; his fear of the Jesuits, 323, 330 note
Vincentian missions, 122, 351 and note, 364, 367, 749 f.
Vinet, Alexander, 492 f.
Viollet-le-Duc (architect), 729
Visconti-Venosta, Italian minister, 669, 671
Vitte (bishop), missioner in Oceania, 759
Viviers (diocese), Gallican controversy in, 346-48
Vogelsang: conversion of, 476; social work of, 724
Voltaire: influence of, 34; publication of the works of, 89

Wallis (island), missioners on, 759
Ward, William: and Newman, 255 f.
West Tonkin, missions in, 123, 173, 359 f.
Whigs, the: and Irish liberation, 247, 251
Whitfield (bishop), and the Council of Baltimore, 175
Wicart (bishop), and papal infallibility, 646
Wilberforce, Henry: and Newman, 107
William I (of the Netherlands), and the persecution of Belgian Catholics, 116 f., 152 f.
William I (of Prussia): at the festivities at Worms, 602; a Freemason, 692
Windthorst, Ludwig: career of, 690; and the Kulturkampf, 690-92, 694, 696
Wiseman, Nicholas, 254: Newman influenced by, 254 f.; on Leo XII and Consalvi, 68; on the papal recognition of new governments, 214; and the re-establishment of the British hierarchy, 494-96
Work of the Holy Infancy, 374 and note
Workingmen, laws unfavorable to, 19 f.
Würtemberg: opposition to the concordat of 1861, 551; repressive measures adopted by, 165 f., 480, 484-86; religious concessions granted by, 271

Young Europe, organized by Mazzini, 180, 228, 235
Young Ireland, opposed to O'Connell, 250
Young Italy, 54: and Carbonarism, 239; and Freemasonry, 239; organized by Mazzini, 180, 235; secret character of, 239

Zanzibar, missioner at, 761
Zelanti, party of the, 62 f., 67, 70-73, 185
Zen-Yemon, Japanese confessor, 755
Zumalacarreguy, Spanish leader, 220